The Colonial Officers' Decoration, the Long Service Decoration was secured for the militia of this country through the efforts of this government.

Officers are now required to have a much higher state of qualification.

The Medical Service branch of the militia was established by the government.

A Military Pension Act by which the officers of the permanent force and the staff and all the men of the active militia will receive pensions was passed by this parliament at the instance of this government.

A school of musketry was established by this government, one of the most important things in the interests of the militia that has ever been done in this country.

Rifle associations are being encouraged all over the country and enormous amounts of money up to $100,000 a year are being expended in the construction of rifle ranges, so as to put in the hands of our people the means of making themselves efficient in the art of rifle shooting.

The corps of guides, to which I referred a little while ago, has been established by this government.

The engineering branch has been established.

The military stores branch has been converted into the ordnance corps.

A military intelligence branch has been organized as an additional permanent unit of the Army Service corps.

We hear a great deal in this report about the unpreparedness of this country for war. The Dominion Arsenal, the output of which was under a million rounds of cartridges a year, has been increased so that it has an output of 10,000,000 or 12,000,000, and its capacity is very considerably above that quantity.

We have succeeded in establishing in this country a small-arms factory which at the present moment is turning out rifles, which will be able to supply the government at the rate of 1,000 a month and which has a capacity of double that quantity, if necessary.

We have established factories at which steel gun carriages, limbers, &c., are being manufactured in this country instead of having to be manufactured in the old country, both at Quebec and in this city.

So, I might go on, but surely I have said enough to demonstrate to the satisfaction of any fair-minded man that we have not been indifferent to the needs of the militia of this country. This manifesto refers to my having interfered with the courses of instruction. I am sorry to weary the House with reference to this matter, but it seems to be necessary for me to do it. Some months ago Lord Dundonald came to me and said that it would be very much better if the educational branch of the service in relation to the officers could be put completely under his control, that it was rather tiresome to have to be going to council all the time to get any business through and if I would let him have carte blanche, to use the phrase of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, he could manage it—he could do it all. I had my doubts about it, because I felt that the Governor in Council, although often inconvenient, was rather a sound institution; and it took him a good many weeks, I think some months, to convince me. When at last I did acquiesce I did it under protest and with the distinct understanding that if the thing did not work we would revert to the old conditions. What has happened? I have not time to elaborate it, but as no doubt the discussion upon this subject will occur again, I will have an opportunity of letting you see that as a result of that mistake which I made in granting that extraordinary power, chaos reigns to-day in the Department of Militia in reference to matters of education.

The late General Officer Commanding says that I refused to grant certain courses of instruction he wanted to give in September. Let me tell you that the late General Officer Commanding succeeded in putting through militia orders and general orders absolutely contradictory of each other until he has got now two or three absolutely contradictory orders governing the same thing. He need not worry. The courses of instruction which he recommended should take place in September, will take place, but they will not take place until we get proper regulations passed to carry them into effect.

But, Sir, he complains that I have refused to adopt a central camp, or rather he says that after adopting the principle I have refused to carry it into effect. I have correspondence here which would show the reason why. I will not trouble the House with it to-night, but let me say that it was proposed to purchase or acquire a great tract of country, some twenty or thirty square miles or more in extent, upon which the central camp should be established, and where conditions similar to those which take place in time of war could be had, for the education chiefly of the officers of the militia of this country, to which a certain number of the militia might be brought and all the officers to the number of thousands. The idea is a good one. I believe in it. I said so last year, I repeat it now, but, Sir, the expenditure involved in establishing that central camp will be very heavy. The buildings alone, estimated by Lord Dundonald himself, would cost $100,000. If we succeed in getting a grant from either one of the local governments of the province in which we may decide to locate the central camp, the land granted would not cost much, but we will have to acquire by purchase a certain amount of land. Rifle ranges will have to be established in that camp ; so that it will involve an expenditure of at least $250,000 at the very best that can be done. Well, now, that is a somewhat serious expenditure. Then, we have not only that initial expenditure, but we have to consider the expenditure for transportation for ever, or for fifty years, because we are not going to construct your central camp for a day or for a year. It is a permanent camp and when you establish it you want to look forward, you want to see what you are about, you want to exercise the same caution that any business man would in making a very heavy expenditure of money ; and surely it is just as important and as necessary for the government of the country to exercise due caution, it is just as much their duty as if they were doing this work for themselves. So Lord Dundonald made up his mind that we should locate this camp at Kazubazua, in the province of Quebec, near the line of railway running northward. I am favourably impressed with the loaction, but I have heard of others and men in whose judgment I have confidence told me that they believed there were others. I have gone myself to the trouble of going to the Kazubazua district, I have gone to the Sharbot Lake district, I have gone to other districts to examine and see for myself, as I think it is my duty to do, as the custodian, in this regard, of the public money, and in the interest of the people of Canada. I came to the conclusion that we must not be in too much of a hurry and I refused to be, to use the phrase of my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, either dragooned or stampeded into selecting a site before I believe that site is the best that can be got in the whole wide Dominion of Canada.

But he has a very serious grievance. He has in this great state document, this paper which is going to emancipate the people of this country from the domination of this vile government, in this serious, sober document upon which the destinies of the nation hang, another grevious complaint against me. Why, he said he made some placards to hang up in the camp and that I refused to have these placards reprinted this year.

Well, I did, and I will tell the House why. Last year, at a very considerable expenditure of money, placards, as he calls them, a kind of large map, illustrating different operations in engineering, cutting down trees, and all that kind of thing—rather superfluous information, perhaps, for the soldiers of Canada—various placards with various figures upon them were printed and distributed among the camps. But, Mr. Speaker, it turned out that when we had the services of an engineer, whom we had borrowed from the imperial service at Halifax, it turned out that these placards were wrong. And so His Lordship, who is so very anxious about the expenditure of public money that he was afraid that I was giving some favourites of mine small increases of salary by promoting them from majors to lieutenant-colonels—which was not true, all the same—he coolly sends down these amended, improved, corrected—that is the proper phrase—corrected placards, and asked us to do it all over again. Well, I thought a good deal about the placards, as I did about the guns which were to be located at one of three places that these experts have selected. I felt I would wait until I could get hold of some one who knew how to make placards before I would spend any more of the public money of Canada on them. I am sorry these placards were bad and were wrong, because I am afraid that some erroneous ideas may have gotten into the heads of the soldiers who went to the camps last year. I only hope they will come back long enough to see the corrected placards, which I hope—when we get the benefit of the services of a practical militia council in this country sitting around the board and aiding and assisting the Minister of Militia, whoever he may be—we will be able to fix the places where guns are to be put, and to make placards which won't have to be corrected the next year. So much for this serious complaint as to the placards.

Now, Sir, we have heard a good deal in this manifesto about the system. He is exposing the system ; the system is a bad one. All of this letter is for the purpose of showing that we are living, as he says, in a fool's paradise, and under a system which is absolutely wrong. Well, I have a letter here which is very short, and which I would like to read, with regard to this very same much-abused system. Here is a letter which was addressed to me by this same noble lord, after he came to Canada. It is headed from the Three Rivers camp, and is dated September 15th, 1902 :

Dear Sir Frederick Borden,—I am considering the permanent corps matter and also other questions to bring before you later on. At the moment I am very fully occupied with the camps. So far, I may say, they have been a success, and I do not think I can improve much on the system adopted.

The system in vogue then was more particularly due to the industry and ability of General O'Grady-Haly, and Lord Dundonald says of that system, the system which was in actual operation—because these camps were actually going on when he came here ; he did not call these camps together at all ; possibly this camp may have been called later, but the Ontario camps were going on at the time he came—he says :

So far, I may say, they have been a success, and I do not think I can improve much on the system adopted, so far as the means at my disposal have permitted.

So much then for this system, which, if persisted in, is going to destroy any prospect this country may have of ever being able to defend itself.

Well, now, Sir, one word in conclusion. What was the intention of this document ? Was the object of that document to make the militia of this country feel satisfied and comfortable and happy ? Was its object sincerely to improve the condition of the militia ? Was it not rather to sow discord ; was it not rather to breed in the ranks of the militia the idea that the men responsible for the government of this country, the man chiefly responsible for the care of the militia in this country, was utterly and absolutely disregarding the interests of the militia ? Is that a high and noble object for a high and noble gentleman to pursue ? Mr. Speaker, the militia of this country are the everyday citizens of Canada. We have no army ; the militia are the people—good, practical, common sense people, who can see through motives of interested persons about as quickly as any people in this world. And these people will look very carefully to see whether the professions contained in that document, of good-will towards them, are real and genuine, or whether they are not. They will look at that document with suspicion, having learned, as they have now, of its utterly unreliable and disingenuous character. I have faith, I have always had faith in the good common sense of the militia of Canada. They are not going to be dissuaded from their duty or stampeded into any unfair or unjust course. They will look into the merits of this whole question, and I invite them to do so most carefully and most fully. I am prepared to stand by the verdict of the people, whatever it may be, but I have no fear as to what that verdict will be.

I was asked a question about the report, and before I sit down I would like to deal with it. I said last year, and I repeat now, that I would be most gratified and delighted to submit to a committee composed of any gentlemen on both sides of this House who are interested, any matters of this kind. I think I have some right to speak in this matter ; I am charged with the responsibility I say, and any military man knows that it is not desirable—I do not care what Lord Dundonald may say ; I believe he knows better—it is not desirable to publish to the world either your strength or your weakness. And, Sir, I think that the publication of this paper, especially as it does not correctly represent the facts, was a most unpatriotic act. But, Sir, I am prepared to submit these reports at any time to a committee. I do not at the present moment think that they should be published to the world ; but the committee may be made as large as necessary, with the understanding that the documents are being submitted for confidential consideration.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, in view of the lateness of the hour and with the consent of the House, I have great pleasure in moving the adjournment of the debate.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I expected that we would have been able to conclude this debate to-night ; but in view of the great importance which the subject has attained in the country, I think every latitude should be given to the other side to ventilate their grievances, and therefore I assent to the motion.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 12.15 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, June 24, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SEIZED SEALERS—PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to know from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Préfontaine) if he has any information to communicate to us with regard to the recent negotiations between Canada and Russia.

Hon. RAYMOND PREFONTAINE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). The recent negotiations between representatives of Canada and Russia, in London, reached the point that a certain suggested settlement would be submitted to their governments by respective delegates, for ratification or otherwise. The delegates separated on the understanding that the conclusion of the Russian government in the proposed settlement would be communicated to Canada through ordinary diplomatic channels for consideration by Canada. Russia's decision has not yet been received by the Canadian government.

SCOTTISH LIGHT DRAGOONS—CORRESPONDENCE.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). This morning I received a letter from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) containing this request :

> Dear Sir Wilfrid Laurier,—May I ask that the original 'Gazette' containing the erasure of non-approval by the Hon. Sydney Fisher of Dr. Pickel's name will be placed upon the table of the House this afternoon. I refer to the 'Gazette,' a copy of which is set forth at page 25 of the printed correspondence.
> Yours faithfully,
> R. L. BORDEN.

I may observe that this is a very unusual request. I do not know what is meant by it, and I would not feel inclined to accede to it. But in view of the fact that there were insinuations made yesterday against my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), at his special request, I now lay the original 'Gazette' on the table of the House.

SUPPLY—DISMISSAL OF LORD DUNDONALD.

House resumed adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Fielding :

> That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into supply ; and the motion of Mr. R. L. Borden in amendment thereto.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). Mr. Speaker, in resuming the debate adjourned last evening, I may at the outset express my surprise at the conduct of the government in relation to this matter. Many of us felt, immediately after Lord Dundonald's speech had been delivered in Montreal and published through the country, that having been caught red-handed, as he undoubtedly was in the—I will not use so strong a term as crime—in the act of interfering politically in the appointments of militia officers in this country, the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr.Fisher) would frankly confess to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) his fault and ask pardon from the people of Canada, and from the House of Commons, and from Lord Dundonald ; and if he had done so the incident would have been passed over and forgotten. But instead of that, Sir, we find that the government are hanging together, and as a government and individually, are glorifying in their conduct. Ever since the visit of the Minister of Agriculture to the Orient, a year or so ago, his friends have noticed the enlarged size of his head, and whether he had so impressed the people of Japan with the greatness of Canada, or whether he had led many of them to suppose that he was the Mikado, that he was the ruler of Canada, these people, I am told, actually fell down in front of him and almost worshipped him on some occasions ; and he has returned to Canada with his head abnormally enlarged, and seeks to secure from the people of the Dominion of Canada the same treatment that was meted out to him by the Japanese. In other words, he was regarded as a little tin god whilst in Japan, and on his return he is seeking to impress upon the people of Canada the same opinion.

Now, Sir, I may say that we were not surprised at the exhibition of the Minister of Agriculture ; but we were more than surprised at the exhibition made by the Minister of Militia last night ; and I am satisfied that when that hon. gentleman, in his calmer moments, reads over the remarks that he made in this House last night, and which have gone broadcast throughout the country, he will, deep down in his heart, be ashamed of the manner and the spirit which he displayed in this House last night. If there has been any act on the part of the Minister of Militia which would call for a rupture of the truce that has been extended to him ever since he was appointed head of the department, if there has been any act which would have called for a rupture of the truce that has been observed loyally towards him by the Liberal-Conservative party in this House and this country, it was the evidence that we had last night of his sympathy with the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture to introduce politics into the administration of the militia of this country. We did not expect anything better of the Minister of Agriculture. We knew it was his size to go down dabbling and meddling in the militia affairs of the eastern townships; but we did expect something better from the Minister of Militia than to back up the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture. I am satisfied that in his calmer moments he will apologize to this House and apologize to Lord Dundonald for the position he occupies in suppressing reports of the general, which, he says, are secret and confidential, and trying to blacken the character and reputation of Lord Dundonald, not only in this country, but throughout the empire, on the strength of reports which the general issues, but which the minister, to suit his convenience, will not place before the people of this country. Now, Sir, I stand here to demand that that part II. of the confidential report of Lord Dundonald be given to this House and this country.

We have had confidential reports brought down to this House before. I myself asked the Minister of Militia some time ago in this House—the questions are in the 'Hansard' if he disputes it—asked him the categorical questions: Was this a confidential report, was it a secret report? And the answer I got was that it was confidential, that it was secret, and that it was not to be put before the House. I have Lord Dundonald's word for it that the report was neither secret nor confidential, any more than any other report between a general and his minister is secret and confidential. The covering letter may have been marked 'private,' but according to the hon. Minister of Militia himself that covering letter was sent some days before the report reached him. We demand that that report be placed before the country. It cannot possibly be any harm to do so. The rumour has already got abroad, it is already in the air that Lord Dundonald has proposed some tremendous scheme involving an expenditure of millions, and it has been said that the Canadian border from the Atlantic to the Pacific is to bristle with forts. The organ of the right hon. First Minister, not the organ that was complained of last night by the hon. Minister of Militia, not the Toronto 'News,' but the other organ, has charged that Lord Dundonald's report involves an expenditure of from $35,000,000 to $50,000,000 for a line of forts along the border and for armaments that would turn this country into a regular hive of militarism. As I understand Lord Dundonald's policy, it is the reverse of a regular military policy. He aims at the upbuilding of the militia of this country, not an aristocratic army, not an army controlled either by oligarchs or autocrats. The hon. Minister of Militia has admitted that because he has adopted almost in its entirety Lord Dundonald's confidential report. Then, why cannot it be brought down? I maintain in the interest of the country and in fair play to Lord Dundonald that the report must be brought down. I do not see that Lord Dundonald needs to obtain any one's permission after the very cavalier manner in which he has been treated, but in case he requires to obtain any one's permission to publish that report, I maintain that it is Lord Dundonald's duty at the very earliest opportunity to publish that report broadcast to the world in order that we may judge whether the slanders that were heaped on that gentleman last night are justified or not. The hon. Minister of Militia last night undertook to read the House a lecture on constitutional history and constitutional law and he read extracts showing that the Secretary of State in the old country and the Minister of Militia here, each in his proper place, is the superior of the Commander in Chief or of the General Officer Commanding. There is no child in the fourth book in any of the ordinary schools but knows that, yet he and his colleague in iniquity in this instance, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, were endeavouring to read us these lectures. I may point out that a lesson was taught these hon. gentlemen long, long ago and I thank the hon. Minister of Agriculture for having profited by the lesson I gave him the other night. I promised him that if I took him in hand I would teach him something.

Mr. INGRAM. It is a hard job.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes, it is a hard job, but he has evidently profited by it. He has been reviewing some of the lessons which it was my pleasure and privilege to teach a certain gentleman in the past. I do not know that I could at any other period of my remarks better illustrate the position than at the present time. Let us contrast the conduct of the two officers concerned. One of them we find, as the hon. Minister of Agriculture pointed out last night, violated the principles of responsible government and the constitution. The former General Officer Commanding—I refer to General Hutton—actually arrogated to himself the authority of over-riding the Minister of Militia and passing directly to the Governor General without the consent or advice of the Minister of Militia. That was clearly in defiance of the spirit of responsible government. I shall come back to this case a little later on. The former General Officer Commanding, General Hutton, took it upon himself without the consent or authority of the Minister of Militia, to receive from the Governor General and from the imperial authorities, letters concerning officers of the Canadian militia and to transmit such letters without the consent of the Minister of Militia. Lord Dundonald neither directly nor indirectly has attempted to do anything of the kind, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture, although from his remarks last night he is filled with venom towards that officer, did not for one second attempt to say that Lord Dundonald had pursued anything but a constitutional course in all his dealings with him in this matter. The former General Officer Commanding, General Hutton, undertook without the consent or approbation of the Minister of Militia, without the consent of the officers commanding the regiments, to make appointments to these regiments and in that way he clearly violated the constitution of this country. Lord Dundonald neither directly nor indirectly has ever trespassed on the constitution. In a dozen different ways General Hutton usurped the functions of the Minister of Militia, and the minister tamely submitted to it, and Sir, the right hon. Prime Minister will recollect that I had the privilege at his request, of looking up the authorities to show him that in Lord Palmerston's time, when he was secretary of state for war in 1810, I think it was, he brought the Commander in Chief of the English forces, General Dundas, before him and told him that he dare not lift his hat to the sovereign officially without the permission of the first lord of the treasury. General Hutton violated all the principles of responsible government. Lord Dundonald has never violated one of them. In relation to the erasure of Dr. Pickel's name and to the 'Gazette' having gone through with the name of the hon. Minister of Agriculture attached as acting Minister of Militia, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, I am sorry to say, in a tone reeking with pomposity and venom towards the late General Officer Commanding last night, asked: Is the act of the hon. Minister of Agriculture valid or invalid? He said: If it is valid I presume the hon. Minister of Agriculture had the power to initial that list in the absence of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence. I want to tell him that his bombast in this House and before the country is not law and is not the constitution, and I want to say that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has committed an unconstitutional act, that, under the constitution of England, it is only the Prime Minister who can act for another minister, unless any other minister so acting is actually sworn in to take the duties of the office. The Prime Minister and the Prime Minister alone is the only man who could have initialled that list unless the minister acting was actually sworn in. I shall take that up though at a later period. I want to tell the hon. Minister of Agriculture further that if this matter is reported to His Excellency the Governor General, as it should be, I maintain that His Excellency would be justified in dismissing from his cabinet the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and if the right hon. Prime Minister does not see fit to dismiss the hon. Minister of Agriculture, I maintain it is the bounden duty under the constitution of the Governor General to dismiss any officer who would arrogate to himself that line of conduct that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has lately pursued and which has culminated in this unfortunate incident. Of that, though, later on. The hon. Minister of Agriculture went on to tell the House that in organizing a corps you must look to the prominent men of the country, men of standing, men physically fit, and he gave a magnificent description of Christian De Wet, General Delarey, and Dr. Pickel. Yet, although he has described the very type of man that Dr. Pickel is, a splendid horseman, a magnificent rifleman, a man in the prime of life, commanding the confidence of the community, prominent in his own village, warden of his own county, the ideal commander, the Minister of Militia, obeying the dictates of the puny Minister of Agriculture, connives at this man being shut out of the militia. Why? Because he happened to be a political opponent to the Minister of Agriculture. Here we find a man living on the border whose only professed crime in the eyes of the Minister of Agriculture is that he is willing to place his body between any invading enemy and the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec. And here forsooth he is turned down because he is a Tory. The Minister of Militia in one of his calmer moments last night uttered a word or two that restored the feeling I have had as to the characteristic of that hon. gentleman when he said that if he had been here this unfortunate trouble would not have occurred.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I said that if I had been here, I would have consulted my colleague the Minister of Agriculture early in the affair, and that I believed that then this unfortunate trouble would not have occurred

Mr SAM. HUGHES. I am willing even after his speech of last night to give the Minister of Militia credit for his utterance of to-day. I believe he would have turned the meddling Minister of Agriculture down had he been here to attend to his business. I feel satisfied, knowing what I know of him, and of his expressed desire to keep the militia free from the meddling of petty politicians, that he would have done his best to turn the Minister of Agriculture down, and it would then have depended on the question whether that minister had power enough to command the Prime Minister, and to force his hand. We know that he boasts of his power. He has inherited position and wealth and these are all that he has. He has no superior ability over any man along the side roads of the country and yet he has power enough in the cabinet to control the Prime Minister, to control the Minister of the Interior and we are told he even turned down the Minister of Justice, but I can hardly believe it. Why such an official can have such power, passes our comprehension; possibly history will reveal the reason.

The Minister of Militia last night took the opportunity of reciting a number of acts that he has performed, as Minister of Militia for the Dominion of Canada. The Minister of Militia took credit to himself for a long list of meritorious acts. I do not seek for an instant to minimize the goods work that he has done, but why has he been able to do it? Because he has had the backing of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Ward), myself and other Liberal-Conservatives in the House who are interested in military matters. He knows right well and the Prime Minister knows that in 1896 when the Liberal-Conservative party wishing to place this country in a small state of readiness to meet any invading enemy, placed in the estimates $3,000,000 to purchase rifles, an agitation was carried on by the Liberals throughout the length and breadth of Quebec against that sum of money being placed in the estimates. Why, Sir, I recall that when the Solicitor General was speaking in his place in the House, the hon. member for Sherbrooke told him right on the floor of the House, that his place was behind the prison bars and not on the floor of the House for the conduct he displayed in the last general election in Quebec, in seeking to raise race against race, creed against creed, locality against locality. Had we carried out the same policy towards the Minister of Militia when he desired to add even $100,000 the minister would not have been able to get the money. In this House and out of this House the Tory party of the country to a man have backed the Minister of Militia in his attempts and he knows it. If the gauntlet has been thrown down, if trouble accrues in the future, let the Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister not blame the Tory party; let them blame the Minister of Agriculture and the weakness of the Minister of Militia in heeding any such interference. I was more than surprised at the Minister of Militia last night seeking to take advantage of a little trifling matter. I presume it was intended more as an illustration. I refer to the ordnance corps. The ordnance corps is a very proper thing and I give the minister credit for what he has done. He has placed in command of that corps Colonel Macdonald, a Liberal it is true, but a splendid fellow. I believe that Colonel Macdonald and the seven lieutenant colonels are all very good men. The minister made a good deal last night of the statement that Lord Dundonald was dishonest in saying that one dollar of extra responsibility was incurred by the country owing to the gazetting of these colonels. What we complained of was that these officers had not been made colonels by Lord Dundonald. I do not know the details but the facts stand out. These officers when the first gazette came out were gazetted as majors. They did not appear as colonels until Lord Dundonald went away on his western trip then they suddenly appeared as full-fledged colonels, and as a natural result these men took their rank and seniority over all the other colonels in the country. It is a pretty hard matter for an officer after years of faithful service in a regiment to find out that some officer long his junior, owing to a little pull at headquarters, has been put over him. We would not mind it if it were done for any distinguished service, or meritorious conduct or superior work, but when they are put over the heads of officers who have distinguished themselves in a dozen ways as much as these men have done, the question naturally arises in the minds of these officers, where is the pull that has put these officers where they are? I have not looked into the question of the salaries carefully but I would point out that these men come under the Military Superannuation Act and they will draw higher superannuation on account of having been made lieutenant colonels.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The superannuation will depend on the amount of pay they receive, and the pay as lieutenant colonels is the same as it was when they were majors.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The pay depends on rank.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Not when it is fixed by Order in Council.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I did not look up the law and I accept the minister's statement.

Both the ministers last night tried to make a little point from the fact that we had not limited the debate entirely to the defence of Lord Dundonald. Mr. Speaker, I need not tell you, I need not tell the ministers nor their followers—their servile followers—I need not tell this House, that Lord Dundonald needs no defence before the people of this country. I have here—I shall not read them—scores of extracts from the best leading Liberal papers, outside of the subsidized organs of the government—the Montreal 'Witness,' the Hamilton 'Times' and a score of others, as well as the official organ of the militia of the country, the 'Military Gazette,' each and every one of them scoring the government for their conduct in relation to Lord Dundonald. First, in reference to the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture, who is the best detested man in the Grit ranks to-day, I venture to say that when the grand old Liberal bows his head at his morning meal or at his bedside in the evening, his anathema is strong against the Minister of Agriculture. Lord Dundonald needs no defence from the people of this country or from the members of this House; but incidentally we may gratify the wishes of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Militia by showing, not that Lord Dundonald has done right, but wherein, in their treatment of him, they have done wrong.

The Minister of Militia was also good enough, to speak in very scathing terms of the Prime Minister's friend's journal, the Toronto 'News.' I had here last night the biography of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by Mr. Willison, now the editor of the Toronto 'News'; and as I glanced over the book, I could not conceive what sort of man this Mr. Willison could be—I never had the pleasure of meeting him or seeing him—that he would fall down in such adulation before a man as great as may be the Prime Minister of this country. I have a very high appreciation of the Prime Minister in some respects. I know it breaks his heart to have to put up with a man like the Minister of Agriculture, and to have all these troubles—I do not know any more moderate term to use—forced upon him by a man of the calibre of the Minister of Agriculture. Even then I fail to see eye to eye with Mr. Willison in his admiration of the Prime Minister of Canada. Yet this editor scathes the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Agriculture in the terms that were referred to in this House last night. The biographer of the Prime Minister is the biographer of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Militia, and, Sir, if we are to accept his authority in the one case—and he is quoted by Liberals all over the country—then surely we must accept his authority in the other case, as displayed in his appreciation of the great powers of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Militia. However, it is a quarrel among themselves, and, as an old trapper up our way says when any of these questions come up, I am not going to meddle in it—we will let them skin their own skunks.

Another reference last night by the Minister of Militia was to our good friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), whom he taunted with having lost his head. Well, if he has lost his head, he gets on splendidly. As an American once said, he is a mighty lively corpse. The stand that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier made in this House last night is the same stand that he made on former occasions, when he justified himself in Montreal and elsewhere in his public speeches. I may tell the Minister of Militia that his friend the right hon. leader of the government will not express the views he did in relation to the lack of power and ability of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. Perhaps the minister was touched a little, because, according to his view, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier had been decapitated by his friends while Lord Dundonald had lost his head by his enemies.

Another point attempted to be made by the Minister of Militia last night was that Lord Dundonald had had a reporter in his pay at the meeting in Montreal. Bad as the Minister of Militia had been up to that time, I thought that was terrible. I did not really believe that the Minister of Militia could so far forget the little courtesies due from one gentleman to another, especially men who had been associated together for two years past in the capacity of minister and adviser. I could not credit it, until I read 'Hansard' this morning, that the minister could have so far forgotten himself as to charge Lord Dundonald with hiring a reporter to take notes of his remarks in order that they might be published, and then, in the next breath, to charge that Lord Dundonald had sought to keep those remarks from being published. I may say that after I wrote to Lord Dundonald for data, previous to the last time this matter was before the House, I was requested to call upon him; and I may say that he stated then to me, what the Minister of Militia very properly pointed out last night, that he had got sick of the meddling, and that he was determined, as my good friend from South Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) said, to cut the painter, and if possible educate the people of Canada to the iniquities that were going on, and that he had nothing whatever to do, directly or indirectly, with the bringing of this matter before the public, and cared not whether it was reported or kept in darkness.

Mr. SCOTT. Was the reporter at the dinner?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I was not at the dinner.

Mr. SCOTT. I was led to understand from the opposition benches that it was a private dinner.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Then possibly the hon. member was educated from the opposition side. I do not know anything about the dinner. I know the result of it; and Lord Dundonald has nothing to be ashamed of, nothing to retract or apologize for in connection with that dinner. I have just been informed by the leader of the opposition and by the hon. member for West Toronto that the Montreal 'Gazette' to-day positively states that its reporter went there of his own accord—that it was a public function. Hon. gentlemen opposite can read it for themselves. I do not know whether they are losing their heart or not, but their tones are very mellifluous to-day.

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON. The Montreal 'Gazette' says the reporter went there in obedience to the orders of his chief.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. That is his newspaper chief, of course, as we expect reporters do. I may say that I have had a good deal to do with reporters in this country, and I have never known one who could be hired to go to any meeting and report for any man unless he was sent by his paper. With regard to the insinuations by the Minister of Militia that Lord Dundonald was publishing these confidential reports broadcast over the old country, that comes with very bad grace from one who has before him every day the Toronto 'Globe,' the Montreal 'Herald' and other organs subsidized by this government whose columns are reeking with denunciations of the late General Officer Commanding because forsooth they charge him with wanting to impose a system of militarism on this country and build a line of forts from one end of it to the other and all that sort of thing. Let me tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Agriculture that they will fail in their efforts to prejudice Lord Dundonald, that they will fail to strengthen their own case and make political capital for themselves by publishing only what suits them, and they will find that they will be forced by public opinion to publish the report of Lord Dundonald in its entirety. I demand, in justice to Lord Dundonald and to the people of this country, that that report be laid on the table of this House, so that we may know really what it is, and I have every reason to believe that before the snow flies my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will be brought to his senses and be convinced of the necessity of furnishing that report in its entirety. The right hon. gentleman ought to know what the principles of responsible government are, though I must confess he has not in this matter given any evidence that he has the slightest conception of those principles. He may stand up here, as I have seen him do often before, and shake that magnificent head of his and slap his breast and declare that he is a politician of the type of the old English politicians—

Mr. BENNETT. A democrat to the hilt.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes, and a democrat to the hilt, but what we require of him is to stand by the principles of responsible government and put his thumb down on men like the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Agriculture who will use these reports and then refuse to let them go to the country. Was it a guilty conscience which led the Minister of Militia to talk of subsidized reporters? Is he aware that it is the Dominion government which paid for the cabling of the Order in Council of the other day to the English papers? Is he aware that the Order in Council was cabled across at the instance of a member of the government and was paid for by the government? Is the Prime Minister aware that out of the fund—I am not sure whether it was the money of the people or the money raked in from contractors—the English press is supplied with rubbish from this side, boosting him and his government to the skies? Is he aware that out of the money of this country the subsidized agents of the government in the the old country, the officers in Lord Strathcona's office and in the government agencies, are paid for spending their time writing articles for publication in the North Wales 'Gazette,' the South Wales 'Mirror,' the West Yorkshire 'Tooter' and a lot of little one-horse country papers, and then this stuff is cabled back as the opinions of the English public. This stuff, which is written up in the back offices of the government agencies and published in these newspapers is then cabled back to this country as expressing English public opinion. If the right hon. gentleman is not aware of this, I draw his attention to it now so that when the $15,000 item comes up for paying these men he will be able to explain it with some knowledge of what is taking place. Periodically we get papers from the old country with two or three columns—and mark you, Sir, these are not published for nothing—of speeches of the Minister of Agriculture at different places, describing how eloquently he addressed the public on the way to kill chickens and make butter and things of that sort; and no doubt it is the good solid money from the pockets of Canadian farmers which pays for these eulogistic articles. That sort of thing will have to be stopped. All we ask is fair play. All we ask is that honest reports be sent out to the English press and that our officers in the old country, paid with our money, shall not send columns of hogwash to such papers as the 'Daily News' and the 'Chronicle.' If the government want to make use of the English press, let them send reliable matter to journals of the stamp of the 'Spectator,' the 'Post,' the 'Times' and the 'Telegraph,' and not to disloyal journals which took the part of the Boers, which were subsidized by the Boer.

Mr. BUREAU. Who killed the Boers?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I can guarantee that there are not many obituary notices traceable to our hon. friend or any of his party.

Mr. MACPHERSON. There was no room there for anybody else but yourself.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. There is another little matter to which I wish to refer. The Ministers of Militia and Agriculture and also the Prime Minister have charged Lord Dundonald with not observing the principles of responsible government. But neither in their subsidized organs nor from their places in this House have they pointed out one act of Lord Dundonald which is not in harmony with the principles of responsible government. Suppose Lord Dundonald did defy them and make a speech in Montreal, is that contrary to the principles of responsible government? Did not Hampden defy the government of England and bring about a reform? Did not William the Third and his friends defy tyranny in Great Britain and bring about a reform? Did not George Washington and his friends in the United States take a stand against the government of that day and bring about a reform? If Lord Dundonald has taken a stand in this country in order to bring our people to a realization of the position they occupy and the practices that are going on, he is quite prepared to take the responsibility of what he did and there is nothing in his action contrary to the principles of responsible government. Suppose he has fallen foul of our friends, he is ready to abide by the consequences. He asks no favours and he has acted in a legal and constitutional manner. Where then has he done anything which was not in perfect harmony with the principles of responsible government? Hon. gentlemen opposite failed to show us that Lord Dundonald has sinned in any way against responsible government, but they have attempted by their bluster to cover up the real issue and justify their own shortcomings. The Minister of Militia waxed very warm last night because Lord Dundonald had said that there was some difficulty between himself and the government. But surely the hon. minister must understand the use of the English language. The charge is made by Lord Dundonald against the government and not the government against him. I hope the Minister of Militia will study up the proper use of the English language and not give us another exhibition similar to the one he gave last night. At one time I thought the hon. gentleman was going to explode when he told us in excited tones that this officer had yet to learn the first principles of proper conduct and before trying to control the government should learn to control himself. But I do not see how Lord Dundonald could say otherwise than that the charge was made by him against the government. It is he who is putting the government on its defence, and before the government are through, this matter they will find they are very much on their defence.

The Minister of Agriculture did not say much; but he claimed that it was his right as a citizen, his right as a member of parliament, his right as a Minister of the Crown —nay, more than his right, it was his duty —to intermeddle with the organization of the regiment. All I have to tell him is this—that had I been Colonel Smart he would have got out of that business in mighty short order. As the Minister of Militia knows, one Liberal heeler tried it in reference to my own regiment, and he got out of it about as quickly as he knew how. And I may say that, in the olden days, long before I had anything to do with politics, when a Conservative administration was in power, a pettifogging Tory——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes—you have scrubs in every camp—a pettifogging Tory, one about the calibre of the Minister of Agriculture, undertook to meddle in the affairs of that regiment and to force the appointment of a chap who happened to be a friend of his, and a Tory. I say it to the credit of every Tory in that regiment, he was jumped on with both feet, and the officer who was entitled to the place got it in spite of this fellow's meddling. And in the days of Alexander Mackenzie, when the Liberals were in power, the Liberal organization undertook to force an appointment in that same old regiment, and, to the credit of Alexander Mackenzie, I am glad to say that, when the matter came before him, he turned them down and sternly said: There must be no political interference in the militia. But I want to say this—I blame Colonel Smart, I blame him very severely, for his course in this matter, in that, though knowing that this meddling was going on, he had not cleared the decks long ago and publicly branded the Minister of Agriculture for his interference. But I presume that he was anxious to get the regiment together, and to keep things going smoothly and pleasantly, and so he put up with the petty persecuting, meddling spirit displayed by that gentleman. The Minister of Agriculture speaks of his close political connection in the eastern townships. How is a man who only knows the people in their political relation to judge who are the proper men to command a regiment? No. Give me the man who knows the boys as they show up at the rifle range, the man who is ready to go into camp with the young fellows of the regiment. Colonel Smart knew these men; Colonel Roy knew them; Colonel Whitley knew them. I am informed that Colonel Whitley is a prominent Liberal, that Colonel Roy is a prominent Liberal——

Mr. BUREAU. The hon. gentleman makes a mistake as to Colonel Roy.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Is he a Tory?

Mr. BUREAU. Yes.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I am very glad to hear it. At all events, Colonel Roy was only the District Officer Commanding. And here let me point out where the Minister of Militia was unfair last night. And I want the minister to hear this, for I am reading him a lecture and I intend that he should profit by it. The minister was unfair in half a dozen things, but the one thing to which I wish now particularly to refer was this—that he made it appear that Colonel Roy had been overlooked by the General Officer Commanding. As a matter of fact, not a solitary recommendation was made by the General Officer Commanding that did not come through Colonel Roy—and it was through Colonel Roy as District Officer Commanding, that they should have come. I take it from the remarks of the minister that he wished to leave the impression that Colonel Roy, as District Officer Commanding, had been overlooked in this matter because he was of French Canadian descent. I thought that was far beneath the Minister of Militia. For he knows, and knows well, that the District Officer Commanding has nothing—and ought to have nothing—to do in these matters, other than to take the reports of the officer commanding the regiment in the organization of the regiment. The General Officer Commanding, with the minister's knowledge and consent, gave the organization of the regiment to the brigadier, Lieutenant-Colonel Whitley, a staunch Liberal, as the minister knows. And the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Militia were closeted with Colonel Whitley when Colonel Smart came on this first expedition to Ottawa. Was Colonel Smart admitted to the sacred precincts within which that conference was held? No. He was kept at the door, and Colonel Whitley the Liberal was taken in and consulted with by these gentlemen.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Sam. Hughes) will allow me to correct him. My recollection is that Colonel Whitley and Colonel Smart were both in the room with me—in room 27—the only time I ever saw them.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Well, perhaps the Minister of Militia may be let out. It may be that it was only in the sacred conference with the Minister of Agriculture that this occurred. Of course, Colonel Smart was not in the room with Colonel Whitley in the office of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. BRODEUR. Most upright conduct on the part of Colonel Smart.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What does the minister mean?

Mr. BRODEUR. In discussing these things with my hon. friend (Mr. Sam. Hughes).

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Why, it has been in the papers all over the country. Colonel Whitley admits it.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to understand what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sam. Hughes) has stated. If he will put it clearly we shall all know what he means.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. It will require more than the equivocation displayed in this House to make us believe the charge is not true. I may tell the Minister of Agriculture that, so far as any denial from him is concerned. Colonel Whitley and Colonel Smart came to Ottawa on this matter early in the obstruction. Colonel Whitley had an interview with the minister when Colonel Smart was not present, and, later on, after three o'clock, all three had a meeting over here. Colonel Whitley is a good Liberal—nobody will deny that. And he is a good officer—nobody will deny that either. The General Officer Commanding followed exactly the course that the constitution of this country lays down as the proper course for one in his position. And, on this point I would address myself particularly to the Prime Minister. Lord Dundonald has been charged with pursuing a course contrary to the principles of responsible government. Mr. Speaker, these hon. gentlemen have failed to show where he stepped aside from the proper course in one single particular. What course does the constitution of this country provide in such matters? This regiment was to be organized. In the first place, a commanding officer was appointed—Colonel Smart. The brigadier, Colonel Whitley, was instructed to look after the regiment. He and Colonel Smart selected the officers of the regiment as it was their duty to do. It was understood from the first that the officers of the old 53rd Battalion of Infantry, and the 97th Regiment, the old regiment down there on the border, were to be taken, as far as possible, in the formation of the new regiment. And yet one would gather from the tenor of the remarks that have been made—and I should much dislike to say that there was an intentional effort in those remarks to mislead the House, but I think that, considering the way in which the case is put we would be justified even in saying that there was that intention—that Colonel Smart had gone about the country drumming up a lot of Tories who had had no previous experience, and taking them, simply because they were Tories to be officers in the organization of the regiment. Under the constitutional course, Colonel Smart, selected his officers. Of course, he could get advice wherever he chose, but it was for him to make the choice. There is one constitutional avenue of communication according to the laws of responsible government and of common sense government. There must be an official channel of communication. That channel was from the officers, the captains of the companies and the majors commanding the squadron, through Colonel Smart to Colonel Roy and from Colonel Roy to the authorities at Ottawa. There is the plain, well understood course. The man who pursued the unconstitutional course, who followed principles inimical to responsible government was the Minister of Agriculture? He is the man who tramped under his feet the forms that have been in use for ages, and that will continue to be in use for ages in any properly organized community. He tried to make himself the medium of communication between the officers organizing the regiment and the department at Ottawa.

He is the man who stands branded, and will stand branded to the end of time, as the only instance of a minister of the Crown in Canada who has ever stooped to interfere in the organization of a regiment, and has constituted himself the Colonel of the regiment, the brigadier of the district, the District Officer Commanding of the district, the General Officer Commanding, and the Minister of Militia. Following the precedents laid down by this government, and rightly laid down, in dismissing General Hutton, and in the dismissal of ministers again and again in British history, I maintain that the Prime Minister is bound to turn the Minister of Agriculture out of his cabinet, or he is guilty of a violation of the principles of responsible government, and himself merits dismissal by the Governor General of the country. Our friend, the juvenile member for London (Mr. Hyman), may sit there with a sardonic smile; he may not know as much about the principles of responsible government as about pigs feet; but I may tell him that the more he studies the principles of responsible government he will find that away down in the hearts of the people of this country, where the sentiment has not been swallowed up by chicanery, opportunism and trickery on the part of the government of this country—I say that deep down in their hearts there is an admiration for the old principle of responsible government, and he will find it out sooner or later.

Now, we will come to a few details. Not only has the Minister of Agriculture been guilty of meddling with and trampling on the constitution, but he has been proven guilty in this House of deception, not to use a stronger term. He has stated again and again in this House that these regiments along the border were Tory preserves in the olden times, and that he was going to take particular pains to see that they no longer remained Tory hives. He has had the hardihood to stand up and state in this House what he must know is a deliberate untruth.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, if the rules of parliament forbid me to utter what is in my heart, then I retract the word.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I have retracted the statement, I bow promptly to parliamentary rules. As an American said the other day in the House of Representatives at Washington, a man will sometimes speak from his heart. The Minister of Agriculture has stated in this House on two or three occasions recently, and he has made the welkin ring with the statement, that the regiments along that border had been Tory preserves in days gone by, that they are Tory preserves to-day, and that was the reason he interfered. The charge was made in Monreal in his own paper, and in order to avoid a lawsuit, I presume, he has had to publish a letter from the officer commanding one of the eastern townships regiments who is charged with that sort of thing. I will read the article:

> The colonel of the regiment——

I think he is the colonel of the regiment, H. R. Fraser signs the letter. And let me say this before I pass on, that I see they are resorting to a little species of petty intimidation in relation to Colonel Smart, and the Hamilton 'Times' warns any officer who wants to keep his place in the militia that he had better keep his mouth shut. The Waterloo 'Advertiser' does the same thing. Let me tell the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmelee), who, I believe is the editor of that paper, let me tell the Minister of Agriculture, and the Hamilton 'Times,' and the Toronto 'Globe,' and the Montreal 'Herald,' that when an officer of the militia of this country is not on service he is just as free a man to tell his colonel, to tell the District Officer Commanding, to tell the Minister of Militia or any other man in this country, what he thinks of him as any other man living, and there is nothing in the militia laws of this country that can possibly prevent him. That was the fight that I fought with General Hutton, and let me tell the Prime Minister hat the militiamen of this country while they are ready to defend their country, abdicate none of the rights of citizenship in joining the militia. Let me tell the hon. member for Shefford that it ill becomes him to write what appears in the last issue of his paper, and which I will read. Mush less does it become him when the public know that Colonel Smart, the gentleman whom he is threatening here, took him into his confidence and took his advice in the selection of a number of the officers of that corps. It ill becomes him to stoop to a threat resembling the tyranny of the dark ages. He says:

> Colonel Smart's connection with the matter stamps him as unfit to command a corporal's guard. To employ no harsher term, his usefulness is gone.

Mr. Speaker, let me draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that that article is in the paper of one of his supporters and if that is the spirit that is going to be displayed and acted on in this country, let us know it. Let me tell him that the people of this country are going to stand by the principle of responsible government. If that is the treatment that is to be meted out to the free men of this country, let us know it, that is all I ask. We are ready any time they wish to meet them on this ground. This trouble has been brewing for a long time, and we are ready, at any time they chose to throw down the gauntlet, to pick it up. Here is a statement made by Colonel Fraser in relation to the absurd charge made by the Minister of Agriculture that these regiments were Tory hives. Colonel Fraser first quotes from the article in the 'Herald:'

> I quote the following extract from the article: 'Any one who is conversant with the affairs of the 53rd regiment will see how ridiculous the 'Gazette' is when it states that the officers of the 53rd regiment are above politics. Is there a Liberal officer in the regiment? It is well known in Sherbrooke that no Liberal-minded gentleman need apply for a commission in this regiment.

This is from his own organ, the Minister of Agriculture. Colonel Fraser then goes on to say:

> This statement is as false as it is malicious, and I designate its writer an infamous liar, and I challenge him to take action against me for calling him such, or to come out and repeat the statement over his own signature, when I will take action against him for malicious libel.

That cap fits the Minister of Agriculture. He has stated in his speeches in this House, he has repeated it again and again, that these regiments were Tory hives, and I now ask him to peruse the article dealing with that letter. Colonel Fraser goes on :

I have been in the regiment for twenty-six years, from drummer-boy to its commanding officer, and during all that time not one word of politics or political influence has ever been heard to my knowledge, either on the part of the commanding officer, the regimental staff, the company officers or in the ranks.

Let me say in passing, that I have associated with these men on the rifle ranges here and in Montreal, and in camps in the eastern townships, I have talked with the boys of those regiments, and I never knew what politics any one of them believed in, and I cared less. I never heard that any politician interfered in the political allegiance of the men of any of the regiments, whether Colonel Gibson's regiment in Hamilton, or any other, and I defy any man to point out where the question of politics has ever been allowed for one second to intervene between the officers and the men of the regiment.

We have never even pretended to know, inquired into or cared what the politics, religion or nationality of incoming officers or men might be.

What we have sought for has always been the right kind of stuff to make good officers and men for the regiment, and to serve their country and their King, and I think we have succeeded in some slight degree. In this respect the record of the regiment will speak for itself. What the number on either side of politics may have been from time to time in the past I do not know, but this I do know: that I served for many years under Lieutenant-Colonel W. A. Moorehouse, a staunch Liberal, and who obtained and held his command under a Conservative government, and I could refer to many other past officers who have been on the Liberal side of politics. It may not be out of place for me to say that my immediate predecessor in the command of the regiment has been repeatedly spoken of as the next Liberal standard-bearer at the Dominion elections, and again that my late surgeon-major, the present P. M. O. of the district, has also been prominently spoken of in the same direction.

When the scarlet coat is on, the boys drop politics. We regard is as a little bigger than politics. The late right hon. Sir John Macdonald, of whom I had the honour to be a humble follower in politics, had two staunch rules in political life that I heard him enunciate. He preserved the integrity of the bench and as far as possible made it rise above party politics and he preserved the integrity of the militia. My good friend the right hon. minister sometimes seeks to follow in his footsteps. Let me draw his attention to the fact that in relation to the bench hon. gentlemen opposite have woefully, in the province of Ontario at all events, departed from that rule laid down by the late Sir John Macdonald and in the organization of this 13th Scottish Light Dragoons they have woefully departed from that rule. Let me point out to the right hon. Prime Minister that if he wants to do credit to himself and the country, he will follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, Sir John Macdonald. The right hon. Prime Minister, in his remarks the other day on this matter, did not do himself credit in seeking to make it appear that Lord Dundonald and not Colonel Smart was selecting the officers of this regiment. In that connection when he was growing eloquent, endeavouring to make a speech which would read well in certain parts of the Dominion, saying that he wanted no interference from a man of Lord Dundonald's stamp, a man who did not understand the country, it was at that unfortunate moment —possibly he spoke from the heart rather than from the head—that he called Lord Dundonald a foreigner and a stranger. Let me tell him that Lord Dundonald is neither a foreigner nor a stranger either in Canada or in any land under the British flag. Take the right hon. gentleman's words in 'Hansard' where he leads up to these expressions and endeavours to make it appear that Lord Dundonald was selecting these officers when he said the hon. Minister of Agriculture had a greater right to do it, and it will be seen that he was neither fair nor just to Lord Dundonald. Lord Dundonald was pursuing a constitutional course, and the right hon. Prime Minister knows it. He had no politics, but he trusted his brigadier, Colonel Whitley, a man of experience and judgment in military matters, not like the hon. Minister of Agriculture, he trusted Colonel Smart, a man of experience and judgment in military matters also, men who knew the country and who, although they did not know every grit heeler in every polling subdivision as well as the hon. Minister of Agriculture did, at all events showed that they knew the free men of that locality just as well as the hon. Minister of Agriculture did, he trusted to the judgment of officers appointed by the government of Canada. He pursued a constitutional course. Yet, the right hon. Prime Minister sought to make it appear that Lord Dundonald had made these appointments. I do not charge the right hon. gentleman with anything improper farther than that he was endeavouring to make a little political capital out of the course of the government in bouncing Lord Dundonald by trying to make it appear that Lord Dundonald and not these officers was picking the officers of that regiment and it was at that time, when, carried away by the impulse of the moment, that he made that unfortunate break which does him little credit. It is not necessary that he should explain what the French idiom means. The word in French or English means a man unknown, an alien, a foreigner, an outsider, a man who does not belong to us. He cannot explain it away in French or English.

Now, I will come down to the point where the hon. Minister of Agriculture has been caught red-handed in deception and I am afraid that the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence will require to keep on his best bib and tucker in order to convince his friends throughout the country, that he has not been caught red-handed in a piece of the pettiest political intrigue that the Dominion of Canada has ever furnished in my time, at all events. I shall not read all the letters. My good friend the leader of the opposition has pointed them out very carefully in their order and has made all the points that it is possible to make out of them. All I shall do is to summarize. The evidence of political interference is apparent from start to finish. The hon. minister writes on the 20th May:

I have written to our friends.

There is another letter written by Colonel Whitley on May 22nd, from Toronto to the hon. minister, in which he says:

You will remember the Minister of Militia pointed out that it was not nceessary to have all the officers (which of course is the most difficult part of the organization) at first, they can follow and be selected with much more care and consideration later on.

Then he goes on :

I think I told you, in Ottawa, my views re the drinking question. I dread an intemperate officer, they are useless, indeed of great harm wherever they appear and candidly I would prefer political opponents to such.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture was not honest enough to tell the House who the drinking Liberal was who was being appointed. We want to know who the officer was but the hon. gentleman did not give us his name.

Mr. FISHER. You will find that Colonel Whitley did not recommend anybody who was a drunkard.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Well, Colonel Whitley is here in black and white reasoning with the minister. It was evidently the Minister of Agriculture that was recommending the drunkard. I shall read it again :

I think I told you, in Ottawa, my views re the drinking question. I dread an intemperate officer——

So would any one in command of a regiment.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES.

—they are useless, indeed of great harm wherever they appear, and candidly I would prefer political opponents to such.

A sober Tory rather than a drunken Grit.

Mr. R. JOHNSTON. Perhaps he drank that case of Walker's whisky which was purchased in England.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. No, I think that case was all drunk over at Wolverhampton unless the hon. minister brought some of it here. If he did he would keep it for his own special use. On May 10th, the hon. Minister of Agriculture wrote to Mr. Clinton Benham. Every one knows that Mr. Benham is a very respectable Liberal in the eastern townships :

Would you care to join and take a captaincy or a lieutenancy ?

The hon. Minister of Agriculture meddling and trampling responsible government under foot—tramping on Colonel Smart, on Colonel Whitley, on Colonel Roy and on the General Officer Commanding. Meddling, meddling! Then he goes on:

It would be only a matter of a few years for our men to work up into one or two of these positions, but in the meantime those who have no military experience must commence lower down.

Then he goes on in another letter in which he writes to Mr. Benham.

He——

Colonel Smart——

—and Mr. Parmelee and I have been discussing matters here at length, and Mr. Parmalee and I are satisfied that he is honestly desirous of remedying these mistakes and doing anything he can to meet our views.

The views of the two politicians of the riding. I have just pointed out the unfair action of the hon. gentleman referred to here as Mr. Parmelee in trying to knife Colonel Smart because he stood by his right as an officer of the militia. The letter goes on:

It is impossible, however, to make all the changes that our friends would like. The most important ones, have, however, been made.

Letter after letter points out that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is trying to make of this regiment a regular Liberal preserve.

The Minister of Militia in his innocence has admitted in the former debate that when he went away he left the matter to be dealt with by his colleague the Minister of Agriculture, but that he told the deputy minister to see that the Minister of Agriculture dealt with this matter. Colonel Smart and Colonel Whitley anxious to get this matter pressed through were directed to meet our friend the Minister of Militia in Montreal. I do not know what transpired there, all we know is that they met and that Colonel Smart came to Ottawa the next morning and the Minister of Agriculture has admitted that whether Dr. Pickel retired or not, it was prearranged between the Minister of Militia, the Minister of Agriculture and Colonel Smart that the 'Gazette' should go through without Dr. Pickel's name. That being the case, what can we think of the Minister of Agriculture standup in his place in the House as he did only yesterday and trying to make it appear that he was influenced to drop Dr. Pickel's name out owing to the fact that Dr. Pickel had withdrawn to Colonel Smart on the 19th and that he had received a letter from Colonel Smart that day. When the Prime Minister lays that fact before the Governor General—no I do not think it need go that far—when the Prime Minister reflects on it in his own mind, whatever his personal views may be, he will believe that the honour of the Dominion of Canada will not permit that a man of the calibre of the Minister of Agriculture should remain in office an hour. I do not see how the Prime Minister can retain a minister guilty of the trickery and deception——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Will the Prime Minister tell me what word I can use ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is not for me to instruct the hon. gentleman. I wish to call your attention Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the hon. gentleman has just stated that the Minister of Agriculture was guilty of trickery.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman knows very well that that is not parliamentary.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I do not know it is not parliamentary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FISHER. I think Mr. Speaker, you will have to inform the hon. gentleman that it is not.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I read the rules of parliament very carefully, and I do not want to trespass on the rules of parliament but if you say that the word trickery is unparliamentary, I shall retract the word.

Mr. SPEAKER. I certainly say it is unparliamentary ; there is no question about it at all.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I retract the word. Is deception unparliamentary ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think so.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Then how in the name of goodness can I use a term that is parliamentary ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Order, order.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I cannot get any language that is not unparliamentary which is fit to characterize the action of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture.

We have here the 'Gazette' brought up by Colonel Smart. At the head it is dated May 19, 1904. That is the 'Gazette' as it left the department. It is signed 'Dundonald, Major General.' Then there is a note : 'As a special case, so and so will be required to pass the qualifying examination.' Then we find a note : 'not approved, Sydney Fisher, for F. W. Borden,' and there it is dated for Mr. Fisher's signature, May 19, 1904. I am not going to say when that was sent to the Council, all I know is that the Minister of Militia has confessed that he slipped out of the city leaving the matter and told the deputy to arrange it with the Minister of Agriculture and that Colonel Smart also says it was prearranged, that whether Dr. Pickel withdrew or not, his name was to be dropped, but for the sake of form, in order to prevent any ruction in the regiment, Dr. Pickel was to be induced if possible to withdraw. We have the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that Colonel Smart came to him as though it was a matter of surprise with this 'Gazette' and asked to have it shoved through Council on that day, and we have his admission, drawn from him by the leader of the opposition, that he had prearranged that whether Dr. Pickel withdrew or not that name was to be dropped. I leave it to the Prime Minister in his calm moments to supply me with a word that will cover the action of the Minister of Agriculture. I can find no parliamentary term harsh enough to characterize it.

The minister claimed a good deal of credit for appointing young Holland over Mr. Russell, a Liberal. He did not state that he had first insisted on Mr. Russell being appointed to command the squadron and on its being objected to, he consented to Mr. Holland being appointed. He stated that it was his action that forced Holland over Russell. I want to tell him that men who are regarded by people of the eastern townships as much more reliable than he is state the contrary, and that the minister first wished Russell's name to go and then he consented to Holland's name being placed over Russell's.

Mr. FISHER. There is absolutely no foundation for that statement.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I have a great deal of foundation in my hand for it.

Mr. FISHER. I demand that the hon. gentleman shall show the statements he has which he says will prove it.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I want the Minister of Agriculture to remember that I do not require any statement to show him or any one else in this House. I want the Minister of Agriculutre to know that my word passes current where his word will not be accepted, and that when I make a statement in this House I am not going to have any four-cornered gentleman to get up and demand of me that I give the name or the letter in order that the little, petty, persecuting tyrannny of the Minister of Agriculture——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I want him to understand where he belongs. He also claims—and I am within the judgment of this House if yesterday as on a former occasion, he did not make it appear deliberately that Captain Adams or whatever his rank may be was a resident of the eastern townships and knew the country well. He did not tell us, although he must have known it to be true, that Captain Adams has been a resident of Montreal for a long time, and that gentlemen who live in Montreal know the eastern townships as well as Dr. Adams. He wanted to make it appear that he wished Captain Adams to be appointed as third in command because he lived in the eastern townships. He did not say so in so many words, but he gave that impression by that power of equivocating that he possesses, of saying a thing to be taken one way but to mean something different. Captain Adams does not live in the eastern townships. Captain Adams lives in Montreal. The Minister of Militia has made the statement that he communicated with Colonel Whitley some time ago in relation to this matter. May I ask him whether he has brought down the correspondence in that behalf?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. As I informed my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I sent a letter to Colonel Whitley asking for his permission to do so. I hope to have that to-day, and I will bring down the papers as soon as I get it.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The Minister of Agriculture has boasted that he wished to give Major Carr the command of 'E' squadron, and that he knew that Major Carr was a Tory. He wished to make out that he was going to do this out of the magnanimity of his heart. What was his game? It was to give that to Major Carr so that he could put a Liberal in command of the Knowlton squadron in Major Carr's place. He also boasts that he accepted Surgeon-Major Macdonald and Surgeon-Lieutenant Martin for the regiment. He did not tell us that he understood that Doctor Macdonald was going to retire, and that in that event, ignoring the claims of Surgeon-Lieutenant Martin, a doctor of great experience in the eastern townships, he wished to place over his head another doctor who is a Liberal. Another point in connection with that is, that of the two squadrons transferred from the 6th Hussars one was commanded by a Liberal and the other by a Conservative, and they are both capable and efficient cavalry officers. For the new squadrons two Liberals were selected and one Conservative, Doctor Pickel. Does that look like partisanship on the part of Colonel Smart? And yet, according to the Minister of Agriculture, this was going to be made a Tory hive by Colonel Smart and Colonel Whitley, a life-long Liberal. The Minister of Agriculture speaks of the Baker clique. Has he produced the slightest tittle of evidence, other than his own words, to prove that the Baker clique, as he calls them, directly or indirectly, sought to influence these people politically? He knows, if he knows anything about that district—and I do not think he knows much about it—that the rifle ranges are on the property of Doctor Pickel and his friends, that it is there they practice, that the grain is trampled down every year by the people coming to the rifle shooting, and that Doctor Pickel is the leading man in that district in every respect, except the one of military qualification.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes, and if my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture had been managing in the veldt, he would have ruled out Christian DeWet and General Delarey on the same ground as he ruled out Doctor Pickel; because I am satisfied that they are both sensible men, and would have been Tories as well as good soldiers.

The Minister of Militia, according to the Toronto 'Globe,' referred to the General Officer Commanding as having made very impolitic speeches when he was sent out to the Pacific coast in British Columbia. I do not remember what the General Officer Commanding said, but I saw it reported at the time, and I thought he was very temperate in his remarks. Every school boy should know that the two islands about which hon. gentlemen opposite made so much fuss in order to create a prejudice against British institutions, are utterly worthless from a strategic point of view. I saw it stated in the government organ that the minister was very much displeased because Lord Dundonald had made those speeches, so that he must have said something in a lucid moment.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Since my hon. friend has referred to that, I may say that this is what took place. I found that the General Officer Commanding, without my consent, without consulting me, was making a trip to the islands referred to, about which so much discussion has taken place. I telegraphed to the General Officer Commanding to be good enough to get a letter which I was writing to him, and which would be addressed to Victoria, British Columbia. That letter requested him particularly, under the circumstances, to say nothing in public with reference to the matter. He disregarded my instructions absolutely. He got the letter, but paid no attention to it. He took the very first opportunity to make speeches, and he made them on every public occasion in British Columbia.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The minister, I suppose, wished him to keep his mouth shut, and let every other officer of the government do the shouting all over the country. He wished the ally of 'Cap.' Sullivan—I refer to Mr. Aylesworth—to do the talking all over the empire, and wanted the General Officer Commanding to keep silent. Yet everybody knows that the judgment of Lord Dundonald, so far as those two islands are concerned, was absolutely correct. These hon. gentlemen had their Alaskan boundary commissioners in England violating every rule of judicial decency by giving away the decision of the commission before the formal judgment, in order to create prejudice against British institutions and make a fuss over two little twopenny halfpenny islands, which were not worth a five cent piece for strategic purposes. In the summer time, if the sea should subside 22 feet there would be absolute connection between them and the mainland, while in high water the channel is only 200 yards wide. The natural seagoing channel is the wide channel, not the one separating the two islands from the United States mainland. But, for purposes of their own, these gentlemen got their commissioners in the old country to express opinions in advance, and flaunted these around with the sole object of creating an impression in this country inimical to British institutions. When Lord Dundonald went out to the Pacific coast he was telegraphed to and a letter written to him ordering him to keep his mouth closed and not to express an opinion as to the strategic value of those islands. When Lord Dundonald made those speeches, and happened to say that those islands had no strategic value, he did so in order to give confidence to the people of Canada, which hon. gentlemen opposite had sought by their doings to shake.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the deliberate statement that Lord Dundonald has been an absolute success as a General Officer Commanding. This statement is confirmed by the fact that the Minister of Militia himself pronounced a eulogy upon that gentleman only last October at a banquet in the city of Montreal, where he spoke as follows :

> We might congratulate ourselves in this country on having at the head of the Militia Department a gentleman who understood the importance of all he (Sir Frederick) has said. (Cheers.) He was not only a great warrior, as he had proved in a dozen battles—(cheers)—but he was a man of sound sense and judgment, who was here for the purpose not of self-aggrandizement, not of playing to the gallery and having his name and praises sounded on every possible opportunity, but of developing the material he found into one of the best fighting forces on the earth.

These were the views of the Minister of Militia regarding Lord Dundonald, and I do not need to enlarge upon them. In every sense even in his remarks at Montreal, Lord Dundonald has been constitutional. He may have, in the opinion of some, committed a little breach of etiquette, but his whole course was constitutional. He did not seek to violate the constitution in any way. He did not seek to usurp the functions of the Governor General or of the minister. He did not refuse to obey the instructions of the minister or seek to control parliament. He did not deliberately slander Canadians by charging them with disloyalty. In every sense he has shown himself to be the antithesis of the gentleman with whom our hon. friends opposite would seek to compare him. He has in every sense been loyal and true to the empire and to Canada. The exhibition given us by the Minister of Militia last night shows that there must have been bad blood between him and the general for some time. We have heard all sorts of rumours about friction between the deputy minister and Lord Dundonald. It is stated that the minister chose to send his orders through his deputy, and that it was the deputy who was giving orders to the general. That is not the course pursued in the old land, nor do I think it is the constitutional course. The General Officer Commanding, being at the head of the military branch of the government, should have been communicated with directly by the minister or his secretary. That however, is a mere detail. At all events some of the correspondence is not couched in as courteous language as it might have been, and any one can see that there was friction. Under the circumstances it was the duty of the Minister of Militia not to treasure up in his heart the spleen and malice which he let loose last night, but to have stooped to conquer and brought about a better understanding between the officers of his department and himself. Let me now quote from Todd, Volume 2, page 17 on the constitutional question. Todd says :

> It is of the first importance to the public interests that the best possible understanding should prevail between the permanent officers of the Crown and their political chiefs. This can only be ensured by reciprocal confidence and respect; and nothing has contributed more to elevate the English administrative system to its present high standard of excellence than the uniform maintenance of a spirit of hearty co-operation and mutual goodwill between the political and permanent servants of the Crown, totally irrespective of personal opinions of the politics of the day.

Then he goes on to quote from the opinions of Mr. Disraeli on that subject. This unpleasantness between the minister and the General Officer Commanding culminated in the abdication by the Minister of Militia of his duties and powers and in his handing them over in a surreptitious manner to the Minister of Agriculture in order to thwart the wishes of the officers who were organizing this regiment in the eastern townships. I do not know where the Minister of Agriculture got his authority, but I think all this business must have opened the eyes of the Prime Minister to the fact that the people of this country no longer worship him as they did, if they ever did so. Supposing Lord Dundonald did commit a breach of etiquette by making the speech he did at Montreal, he had two or three courses open to him. He could have appealed to the Prime Minister and no doubt his appeal would have been pigeon-holed ; or if he sent it to the Minister of Militia, that minister would likely have refused to forward it. He could have resigned and washed his hands of the whole business and gone out of the country with a great name, or he could have taken the course he did ; and I maintain that in taking that course he has shown that he was actuated by the highest regard for the interests of this country. In any event, the worst charge brought against him is that he committed a breach of etiquette. But what were the offences of the Minister of Agriculture ? That minister was guilty of a breach of etiquette just the same as Lord Dundonald was. When Lord Dundonald telephoned him to arrange a meeting, the minister said : I will go and see you. But he never did. Lord Dundonald telephoned again, and the minister again said : I will call around at your office and see you. And he never kept his promise. That was a breach of etiquette.

An hon. MEMBER. A breach of promise.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES : They say that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has never left himself open to any charge of breach of promise, but merely breaches of etiquette. He is open to the charge of breach of etiquette for having overlooked the General Officer Commanding, for having acted in collusion with the Minister of Militia through Colonel Smart, when he brought this Order in Council to the Council meeting without the knowledge of the General Officer Commanding, brought it in a mutilated shape. He has been proven guilty of having interfered in the selection of the officers in the eastern townships and of having overridden the statute of Canada by preventing the General Officer Commanding having a free hand in the selection of officers. He has been proven guilty of having introduced partisan politics into the militia. Let me refer to the words of an American on that subject, Captain Mahan, who showed that the reason why the Canadians defeated the Americans in 1812 was because the Canadians were united, whereas the Americans were disunited and suffered from political meddling and interfering with the troops. Charles Francis Adams, one of the American statesmen and a veteran of the recent civil war, said :

> When we were blackened by the smoke of Antietam we did not ask or care whether those who stood shoulder to shoulder beside us—whether he who led us—whether those who sustained us were Democrats or Republicans, Conservatives or Radicals ; we asked only that they might prove as true as was the steel we grasped, and as brave as ourselves would fain have been. When we stood like a wall of stone, vomiting fire from the heights of Gettysburg, nailed to our position through three long days of mortal hell, did we ask each other whether that brave officer who fell while gallantly leading the counter charge, whether that cool gunner steadily serving his piece before us, midst gasping comrades, crushed and torn, and dying in agony around us, had voted for Lincoln or Douglas, for Breckenbridge or Bell. We then were full of other thoughts. We prized men for what they were worth to the common country of us all, and reckoned not of empty words. Was the man true, was he brave, was he earnest, was all we thought of then ; not, did he vote or think with us, or label himself with our party name ?

I commend these words to the First Minister and the people of Canada, and I trust whatever may be the future of the Minister of Agriculture, whether he be dismissed by the Prime Minister or not, we will never have another exhibition such as that which we have had regarding this regiment. The Minister of Agriculture is guilty of presenting—well, Mr. Speaker, I have in my notes the word 'false,' but I am not allowed to use that, so I will say 'misleading' and deceptive——

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid those are not parliamentary.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. 'Misleading' is not unparliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think so.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES—Misleading statements to parliament. And when publicly exposed, how did he seek to clear himself ? We all remember, how, the other day, he so calmly read his memorandum to the House, denying that he had, either directly or indirectly, been influenced by party considerations. And when Colonel Smart's letter was produced, a letter of the existence of which he had not been aware, and the cold facts were exposed before the House, he at once turned around and admitted that he had interfered for political purposes. I charge him with being unfit to be a minister of the Crown by reason of his conduct on that occasion.

He has been guilty of collusion with the Minister of Militia. Smirk as he may, that is the fact. Possibly these gentlemen have become so hardened that they do not care what their conduct may be in these things. But men with a high sense of honour, when accused of such conduct would not smirk or grin, as I regret to see the hon. member for London (Mr. Hyman) doing.

Mr. HYMAN. It is enough to make anybody laugh.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. It seems easy to make the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hyman) laugh ; but perhaps the laugh will be on the other side of the face before long. This collusion—I shall not use the word 'conspiracy'—between the Minister of Militia and the gentleman who evidently has been acting as his servant, has been most reprehensible. The idea of the Minister of Militia slipping away, leaving this Order in Council to be put through and Dr. Pickel's name struck off by the Minister of Agriculture, and then, to cover it up, getting Colonel Smart's and Colonel Whitley's consent, Dr. Pickel being induced to resign his position. This is unworthy of a minister of the Crown. And, if the First Minister is true to the principles of responsible government, he will ask for the resignation of the Minister of Agriculture. I furthermore charge, Sir, that in his action as acting Minister of Militia—I presume it was done ignorantly—the Minister of Agriculture has been guilty of violation of the constitution. In 1855, when Lord John Russell was absent in Vienna, his department was taken over by another minister. This was protested against, and it was claimed that it was unconstitutional. And Sir George Grey, admitted that the facts had been correctly stated and that arrangements could not be sanctioned for any length of time, but contended that the Prime Minister was constitutionally competent to take charge of any department. Only the Prime Minister. And so I contend that the Minister of Agriculture, in seeking to act, not in a mere matter of routine business, but in an official matter of this kind, has acted in a manner clearly unjustifiable under the principles of responsible government.

Now, we have instances of men having taken the course which has been taken by Lord Dundonald. It is not long since Lord Charles Beresford, finding that the British navy was rotten, and that the machinery of government had fallen into the hands of men who were unfit to control it, came out and openly stated to the world that the navy of which he was an officer, was unfit to defend the empire. Of course there was a great disturbance about it. Of course, the machine men said: Dismiss him; off with his official head—just as some petty minds on the government side called for the head of Lord Dundonald. But Lord Charles Beresford was too big a man, and the navy too important to the empire, for any such course to be followed.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. If my hon. friend (Mr. Sam. Hughes) will permit me—I do not refer to that case. But, I am sure he will not object to my stating what actually occurred.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I happen to know what actually occurred.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I was afraid he might overlook it. I might remind the House that Lord Charles Beresford wrote a letter, but the letter was published without his consent; and that, and that alone saved him from immediate dismissal from the navy. And Lord Charles Beresford wrote a humble apology which was published in the 'Times' admitting his offense.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes, after he had succeeded. And if this government had had a good sterling head to it and a Minister of Militia with backbone, if there had been a determination to maintain the interest of the country even if it required the turning adrift of the Minister of Agriculture, Lord Dundonald would have got out of his scrape as easily as Lord Charles Beresford was got out of his. But, in this respect the cases were different. Lord Charles Beresford was dealing with the very heart's blood of Great Britain—her navy. And he was backed up in what he did. The people of the House of Commons of Great Britain were independent men: not time-servers; not men sitting here in expectation of office—like the member for Hants (Mr. Russell) whom I see now taking notes, and who is sitting here with a judgeship in his pocket.

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON. You are getting afraid now, are you?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. They were not men simply waiting for the dissolution of parliament in order to begin the enjoyment of the fine offices that were being dangled before them. The British parliament is composed of sterling men: and they gave the admiralty to understand that if they interfered with Lord Charles Beresford, their heads would go off too. But, to the discredit——

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON. Why did Lord Charles Beresford apologize?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES—I say to the discredit of the First Minister and of his colleagues in the cabinet, like the hon. gentleman from Brant—and like my hon. friend the Deputy Speaker—they sit here dumb as oysters and yield to political exigencies rather than demand that the Minister of Agriculture be made to apologize.

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON. Why did Lord Charles Beresford apologize?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I say this whole matter could have been smoothed over and Lord Dundonald kept in Canada, if the Minister of Agriculture had been kicked out and the Minister of Militia put in his proper place. I dare say, that, in that case, Lord Dundonald would have been willing to take back his utterance in Montreal, in order that the country might go on and profit by his efforts. Why, Mr. Speaker, these things are matters of arrangement. We have an instance closer to us geographically. In the Cuban war, when a certain incident arose—which the Minister of Militia seems to have followed as a precedent with his emergency ration—when the American soldiers were being fed on embalmed beef. What occurred ? Roosevelt, the colonel of the Rough Riders, and General Miles, in command of the Yankee troops, came out and stated openly to the world that the secretary of war was guilty of neglect of his duty. And their utterances claimed the attention and roused the spirit of the Yankee nation. The feeling was so strong that, instead of dispensing with the services of General Miles and Colonel Roosevelt, the President was forced to give the secretary of war his walking ticket. And it would have been much more to the credit of the First Minister, if, when this utterance of Lord Dundonald was brought to his attention, he had made the Minister of Agriculture get down on his knees and apologize, or had kicked him out and retained the services of the General Officer Commanding. But he chose the other course. He said : We are a ring of political buccaneers and we are going to stand or fall together : The Montreal 'Herald' is too powerful an organ in the province of Quebec : I dare not turn out the Minister of Agriculture, for he is master not only of himself, but of the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden), and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Sutherland). And, it is said, Mr. Speaker, that he is the master of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) politically, but when it came to the scrapping, if all they say is true, the Minister of the Interior got the start of him in the fisticuffs encounter. The First Minister dare not dispense with the services of the Minister of Agriculture, and so Lord Dundonald had to go and the Canadian militia had to suffer.

There is just another aspect to this case. I wish to read an article from the 'Globe' and 'Commercial Advertiser,' of New York, of June 22nd, day before yesterday :

Editor of the 'Globe' :

Sir,—Within the last two weeks I have received information from high sources that Canada was at or near the parting of the ways with Great Britain. First, from the editor of a leading newspaper of Ontario, which supports Sir Wilfrid Laurier ; second, from a member of the parliament of the Dominion ; third from a Canadian at the head of a great business house here, who also has very large interests in Canada and is in constant communication with powerful political leaders there. The dismissal of Lord Dundonald by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government and the appointment of a Canadian major general of the military forces of the Dominion, if resented by the imperial government, may sunder the tie that binds Canada to the empire.

This is followed by a lot of statements backing up his position, and it is signed by a good old Liberal, Francis Wayland Glenn. Now, Sir, no one in this country who is not blind can shut his eyes to the fact that for a long time there has been a desire on the part of—what shall I term them ?—a little red republican and radical school in the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, led by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who has now a supporter in our young and innocent friend from Montmagny (Mr. A. Lavergne). We are not blind to the actions of the First Minister in having these young gentlemen, at stated periods, break out, turn themselves loose on the innocent public in the province of Quebec, and utter, I shall not say treasonable words, but words looking towards Canadian independence, throwing off the ties that bind us to Great Britain. When these gentlemen go a little too far the Prime Minister pats them on the back and says : You are going a little too fast, boys, don't go so far, you will frighten the people in Ontario and the other provinces ; just keep the pot boiling a little, and we will come out all right. We have all seen that for some time.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. Where?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. All over the province of Quebec, and elsewhere. We have found these young gentlemen——

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. Give us one instance.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. We have heard their speeches in this House, we have heard speeches produced in this House made by these hon. gentlemen and their friends before the last general election in the province of Quebec. We have had documents here, sworn to, and published in the 'Hansard.' My young friend is very innocent, or he would not ask such a question. More than that, we have seen that spirit manifested here by these gentlemen again and again. I do not know who that Liberal friend is that informs Mr. Glenn of these things he mentions in his letter ; but at all events, our friends opposite are gradually going in that direction. They demand the making of our own treaties, they demand that there shall be no appeal to the Privy Council, they demand that we shall have a Canadian General Officer Commanding, they demand that every tie that binds us to the motherland, except the old flag, shall be cut asunder, except that one link the Governor General ; and then it will be a mighty short time until they come out and demand a republic. Whether that is the aim of the Minister of Agriculture, who, on his recent trip to Japan has been lecturing to the Geisha girls, whether he has the desire to supplant the Prime Minister and become a sort of president of a new republic, I do not know. At all events, there is no use in shutting our eyes to the fact that the tendency of these gentlemen is in that direction.

Now, I may say that some years ago, when I had an opportunity of standing up for the rights of the people of Canada against the tyranny of the General Officer

Commanding, not because he was a Britisher but because he was taking an unconstitutional course, I had the privilege then of proceeding along certain lines which had been laid down for upwards of a hundred years in the parliament of Great Britain. I resented the illegal action of that officer. Our good friends opposite do not seem to be able to see the difference between an illegal action and a legal one. I say here that if it can be shown that Lord Dundonald practiced any of the illegal actions that General Hutton practiced, I shall be the first to admit that the government did right in dismissing him. But neither directly nor indirectly have they shown the first solitary instance where Lord Dundonald's course has not been thoroughly constitutional, thoroughly in line with the spirit of responsible government. When the movement was on foot to have a Canadian General Officer Commanding succeed General Hutton, I took the opportunity on February 25, 1901, to say this in the House of Commons :

> That in brief, is the correspondence. I have brought this matter up, not in order to vindicate myself, and not because I have any objection to the General Officer Commanding the Canadian forces being a British general. On the contrary, I desire that our General Officer Commanding should be a British general. I know that a great many of my friends, both on the other side of the House and on this side, in view of the conduct of some of the General Officers in recent years have expressed the wish that a Canadian officer should be appointed to that position. I wish to say, standing here that it is my desire that the General Officer Commanding should be an imperial officer and I believe that if we paid that officer $10,000 a year, which is the pay of a major general in England, and is about what little New South Wales pays to her General Officer Commanding we would get an officer to come out here to take command of our troops who would be a credit to the position and to the empire.

Lord Dundonald came to this country a credit in every sense to the empire. And here it may not be out of place for me to give a few of the reasons of that spirit of antagonism to Lord Dundonald. Who can fail to understand the spirit manifested both by the Minister of Agriculture and by the Minister of Militia last night ? Who can fail, I say, to observe that the antagonism to Lord Dundonald was due to the fact that he was a member of the British aristocracy, and because he was a member of the British army. It ill becomes gentlemen who, a few years ago, boasted themselves as democrats to the hilt, and who on every occasion since have been sacrificing their previously professed principles for titles and for offices—I say it ill becomes them to stand up in this House and sneer at any one because he is a member of the British aristocracy. I maintain that the General Officer Commanding the Canadian troops should be an imperial officer, not because Canadians are not capable of filling the post, because I believe Canadians are capable, not only of being General Officers Commanding in Canada, provided they have the necessary training, but they are capable of being Commanders-in-Chief of the imperial armies, provided they have the necessary training. I want him to be an imperial officer, not because he might be an Englishman, because, although some Englishmen may be bumptious, we have seen Canadians who are bumptious also. That is not a fault belonging exclusively to Englishmen. There are some Frenchmen, there are many in England, some in Scotland and a few in Ireland who are inclined to stick to their own opinions. You will find that all over the world. I want an imperial officer, not because he may be an imperial aristocrat—although let me say this, that other things being equal, a man from the ranks of the aristocracy, if he is thoroughly trained, should be just as good a man at all events to command our militiary forces as any one else. So it should be no drawback to a man that he is an aristocrat. I say that in Lord Dundonald the Canadian government have had a true aristocrat, a gentleman who has done credit to Canada and has been a credit to the empire. I want an imperial General Officer Commanding, not because he is a better man, but because he is better trained ; I want an imperial General Officer Commanding because, if he turns out to be objectionable, we can get rid of him, because there is a greater field for selection in the imperial service than in the Canadian service ; because changes are beneficial ; because there is less jealousy arising in Canada when there is an imperial officer than when there is a colonial officer, because there is a greater selection in the imperial service than in the Canadian service, because changes are beneficial, because there is less jealousy arising in Canada when there is an imperial officer than when there is a colonial, because there is less intrigue, influence and unscrupulousness exerted in the appointment of officers—we have an instance in the organization of this regiment alone of intrigue, influence and unscrupulousness having been brought to bear in order to keep certain officers out of that regiment—because an imperial trained officer has greater chances of becoming proficient than a Canadian trained officer has, because if we limit ourselves to a Canadian General Officer it would tend to prevent the introduction of that system which we hope soon to see in force, an exchange of officers between the two services, because to limit the selection to a Canadian would tend to exclude Canadians from positions in the great imperial army of the British empire, because the retaining of an imperial officer is a link between the old empire and the colony, because in the future of the empire the day is not far distant when there will be one great imperial militia and one great imperial army for the whole empire. Let it be understood that Canada's fighting force must of necessity be the militia. We want no great standing army in this country. The militia is democratic and of the people. A standing army is aristocratic and tends to breed autocrats and oligarchs whom we find exemplified in the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The militia, while maintaining law and order, defending the country and giving the youth of the land necesary discipline, preserves a proper balance between the people and the executive, between an ultra democracy and an aristocracy. The militia upbuilds the independent man and makes all men more self--reliant. The militia trains the mass of the people of the nation as against a few trained by the regular army system. The militia suppresses the spirit of militarism while the standing army develops it. I do not know that it is necessary to go on further, I was going to point out but I shall take another occasion to do it that there is an agitation going on through the country to get rid of the connection between Great Britain and the colonies in so far as it is possible by removing the treaty making power from Great Britain. However, I shall take another occasion to deal with this question. I desire to be through before six o'clock because I understand the right hon. Prime Minister does not want to go on after six.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly we will go on after six.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Gentlemen, in urging the abolition of a British officer commanding have been pointing out in glowing terms the desirability of having a Canadian. Are Canadians and is Canada more independent of improper influences than Britain or Britishers have been ? Are all appointments in Canada made solely on the basis of merit and fitness ? Would Canada be less under the control of such men, women and methods as are complained of than Britain has been ? Is the influence of the ladies less potent in Canada than in Britain ? Are the smiles and the glances of Canadian women less bewitching, less magical with Canadian statesmen and soldiers than are those of Britain's court society beauties upon imperial officers and statesmen ? Are the hearts of Canada's gallant soldiers and cultured ministers more invulnerable to such ? Have policies, regulations and appointments in Canada, as well as in Britain, ever been influenced by a touch of 'The maddening lips of wine, or the wanton ones of beauty ?' Do Canadian statesmen ever permit nepotism—I notice that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is absent—to influence their judgment and actions, or are not appointments in Canada sometimes limited only by the sons and other family connections of ministers ? Or are all things in civil and military affairs in Canada moulded upon right, duty, honour and efficiency ? If Canada can say that she is all these then and then only will it be time to say that a Canadian General Officer Commanding will be freer from these influences than if we bring one from the old country. We are told that it would be a great advantage if we had the treaty making power, if we had the right to arrest people for offences committed beyond our borders and if we had no appeal from our courts to the judicial committee of the Privy Council. Within a hundred years there is not a nation in Europe that has not changed its situation or changed its boundary except Great Britain—not a nation. Take the map of Europe of one hundred years ago and you will scarcely find a country to-day that has the same geographical formation. You will find a score of countries that have existed, that have had the right to make their own treaties, carry out their own extradition treaties to fly their own flag and these countries have all vanished from the map or they have been moulded into some other constitutional or geographical formation. Great Britain is the only country that has flown the old flag for a thousand years, and I am satisfied that the people of Canada are in favour of maintaining that association with the old land for all time to come. I am satisfied that we are not going to sacrifice the substance for the shadow. We are not going, for the sake of having a Canadian General Officer Commanding in order to afford patronage and pull for one locality or another, to enact a law that will deprive us of the services of a well trained man from the British empire. We are not going to dispense with an appeal to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, we are not going to demand or get the right to make independent treaties. Let Canada be consulted by all means, but treaties have to be negotiated under the old flag and we are not going to sever almost the only link that binds us to the mother country. We are going to stand true to the old alliance and the union is going to be rather closer in the future than it has been in the past.

In conclusion I would say to the right hon. Prime Minister that I maintain that it is his bounden duty in view of the offences that have proven to have been committed by the hon. Minister of Agriculture to remove that officer from the government. I am satisfied the country will stop short of nothing else than that, and Sir, if the right hon. gentleman does not see his way clear to do that I maintain that if the facts are placed properly before the representative of the sovereign in this country there is no other course open to him than to dismiss the government. The right hon. gentleman may smile but I want to tell him that the Governor General has just as much constitutional right to dismiss him as he has to take the head off the General Officer Commanding. The Governor may dismiss the ministry upon any of the following grounds : He may constitutionally dismiss the ministry, first :

If they exhibit internal dissensions amongst themselves,——

Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, if these hon. gentlemen have not had internal dissentions. Have we not the remark of one of them to the effect that they 'fight like blazes amongst themselves ?' Have we not had the example of one minister, the late Minister of Public Works, leaving the government a short time ago followed by the Minister of Railways and Canals and now we find through the power of the new Minister of Marine and Fisheries the present hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Sutherland) practically turned out of his job and sent adrift. Then we hear rumours of friction between the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Agriculture so that we find internal dissensions of every kind among the ministers.

The Governor may dismiss his ministers.

If they differ from the sovereign or from the country at large upon a question of public policy.

I do not know about the governor but they differ from the country on the question of public policy in regard to the meddling by the Minister of Agriculture in the formation of regiments so that under this head these gentlemen are as liable to be dismissed by the governor as Lord Dundonald was to be dismissed by them. They stand on the rock of responsible government and so do I in demanding that action may be taken in relation to the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture.

The governor may dismiss them,

If their measures are ruinous to the country at home or abroad.

Without pointing to any of the iniquitous measures which they have recently passed, such as the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, I maintain that the principles embodied in the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture and the actions resulting from them are ruinous to the Dominion of Canada both at home and abroad. Furthermore the governor may dismiss them

If there should exist a general feeling of distrust and disapprobation of them throughout the country.

I maintain that in each and every one of these matters, the feeling of distrust in the country has been exemplified. No words that I can utter could add to Lord Dundonald's standing in the country. No words that I can utter are required to give him a warmer place in the hearts of the people of Canada than he already holds, and I am sorry from the bottom of my heart that this incident has occurred. Let me point out to the Minister of Militia and to the government that the Conservative party in this House and the country have kept politics out of the militia. We have had many occasions when we could have made a little party capital, as the First Minister knows, but I leave it to the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) and the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), the old heads of the party to say if for many and many a year we have not prevented in our caucus anything that might savour of an attack on the military policy of this country. We felt that there was an uneducated spirit abroad, a fear of militarism which is the antithesis of a militia system. There are people who believe that anything favouring a scarlet coat and rifle is tending towards a standing army. It is essential that the public should be informed that the real position is exactly contrary to that, and that with a proper militia system you need no standing army, that a militia system and a standing army are absolute antitheses. I leave it to the hon. gentlemen if the policy of the Conservative party for at least fifteen sessions has not been to repress that spirit of criticising anything in the military system on either side. So long as there was any possibility of harmonizing the differences we wanted to stand shoulder to shoulder with the Minister of Militia in upbuilding the militia force of the country, and the hon. gentlemen opposite cannot point out one case where we have violated that policy. If this conduct of the Minister of Agriculture is condoned by the government all I have to say is that the Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister will have themselves to blame if the old truce that has so long and happily existed between the two parties is broken, and if henceforth we treat the militia of Canada as if it was an institution to be controlled by politics rather than by the best interests of the country. The Minister of Militia made an appeal to the militia last night. I see our diminutive friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) is very impatient to get off some of his little work. I presume it will be his final speech in the House, in consequence of the telegrams of which we have heard urging that he be appointed a judge instead of someone else. I see he is very impatient to get at me, and I want to let him at me. The Minister of Militia made an impassioned appeal in his remarks to the militia of Canada. I wish to tell him that he has occupied a warm place in the hearts of the militia of Canada, because they have had faith in his honour and fair play. That is why he has been warmly regarded by them, and not for any personal influence. Men are respected and honoured not for the mere human flesh and blood that is in them. The Minister of Militia, Lord Dundonald and your humble servant in a hundred years will have passed away and be forgotten, but the principles for which we stand and fight to-day are what will last and what will be eternal. Let no one of us forget for an instant that we are creatures of an hour. Should we pass away to-day our places would be filled to-morrow, but the principles that we lay down here, these ideas that are going down in 'Hansard,' the principle at issue in the question whether it is right for the Minister of Agriculture to be able to meddle with the officers of the government responsible for the formation of a regiment or whether he is going to be turned down and dismissed for that interference, these are what will last for all time to come.

I have been afforded very much pleasure by watching the charming expression, the Cheshire cat expression, on the face of the hon. member for Hants and I want to give him the opportunity of skinning me when he gets up and shall therefore hasten my remarks.

The First Minister in the openness of his heart, termed Lord Dundonald a foreigner. I shall conclude by quoting some verses, written by one of the boys who fought in South Africa, I find in one of the papers, which I think puts the matter in a nutshell.

I wonder if I'm a 'foreigner' ? Was I serving a foreign Queen ?
Have I lost my Canadian birthright in the places where I have been ?
I have never been under a different flag from the one on the wall there now,
But neither has Lord Dundonald ; and yet he's a 'foreigner' ? How ?
Gordons, Shropshires and Cornwalls, Boys of the Old Brigade,
Was it a stranger's welcome we got from our comrades ? No !
Right from the heart, my brothers ; and brothers' cheerful aid,
You did not know we were 'foreigners' till our premier told you so.

Mr. BENJAMIN RUSSELL (Hants). Mr. Speaker, I was struck by the pathetic face of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) during the reading of those eloquent verses by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes). He evidently feared that his laurels were about to be lost or be put into the shade. The magnificent poem which he read to us the other day is altogether eclipsed by the beautiful verses which we have just heard. I may say that I cannot feel very anxious to make a speech on this occasion, more especially perhaps because I feel a little bit like MacMorris in Henry V. :

It is no time to discourse, so Chrish save me; the day is hot, and the weather and the wars and the King and the Dukes (and the Dundonalds and the great Colonel Hugheses), it is no time to discourse.

Even if it had been otherwise in regard to all these conditions, I should have to make an apology for occupying much time because this matter has been thoroughly placed before the House, particularly in the luminous and convincing speeches of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) and the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden). My hon. friend has expressed his disappointment with the speech delivered by the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden). We never are disappointed with the speeches which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) delivers in this House : we always know what to expect and always get what we look for, a medley of blatherskite and rhodomontade. Pomposity and enlargement of the head were expressions which my hon. friend used in reference to the ministers. Pomposity ? Heaven save the mark ! Where will you find pomposity such as we have just witnessed ? Enlargement of the head ? Could the Almighty himself make the hon. gentleman's head still bigger than it is ? Bumptious Canadians were talked about. There are certainly bumptious Canadians the hon. gentleman says. When the hon. gentleman says there are some bumptious Canadians we are inclined, because he tells us, to accept his word.

He defends the bumptiousness, the egotism that was charged against the Earl of Dundonald by saying that he was only using a grammatical expression. It was simply a matter of grammar. Well, Sir, that was the way that Cardinal Wolsey defended himself, the way the man of unbounded stomach, ever ranking himself with princes, defended his famous ego et rex meus. The hon. gentleman himself is like Wolsey, a man of unbounded stomach, no such diminutive individual as he insists on reminding me is the humble member for Hants. His egotism recalls to mind the description by Wendell Phillips of the egotism of Andrew Johnston—it was like the mathematician's definition of infinity, with its centre everywhere and its circumference nowhere. If anything else would correctly describe the bumptiousness and the egotism and the vanity of the hon. gentleman, I would like to have it pointed out to me in all the literature of our country. He has read lectures to the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Militia. Well, he once read lectures to General Hutton. What is the use of my hon. friends paying much attention to his lectures, when they do not know but that the next morning he will take back all he has said, and will come crawling on that unbounded stomach of his, as he crawled once before when General Hutton brought him to book. He has named William of Orange, John Hampden and George Washington. True, they were patriots ; and they did certainly take issue with the powers of their days ; but they never went down on their stomachs and crawled, as the hon. gentleman crawled in his apoligy to General Hutton, which I am going to read for his entertainment :

Dear General Hutton,—I desire to make full and ample apology to you for certain letters written by me to you during recent months, letters written under excitement——

Well, the hon. gentleman is speaking under excitement to-day, and he will probably take back all he has said in three or four days from this, and will come to the Minister of Militia and beg for further favours, as he begged from General Hutton—

—letters written under excitement caused by—

Caused by some patriotic ebullition, by some kindling of indignant patriotism? 'Caused by the belief that I,' the great Colonel Sam. Hughes, no diminutive little fellow like the member for Hants, but a man of unbounded stomach—

—was to be debarred from participating in the deeds of a Canadian contingent in the imperial service, should one be sent to the Transvaal, a project which I as the proposer for many years felt deeply at heart. I especially regret one reflecting upon in a sense the system, but the remarks which I deemed provocation—as I construed them—were a reflection upon Canadians; two or three incidents occurring practically on one day which I from the view point of one more familiar with constitutional law——

It is well that the hon. gentleman assures us of his familiarity with constitutional law. I think he ought to repeat that under oath, if he wants us to believe it. Good old Chief Justice Young heard an affidavit read in his court one day in which a proposition of law was stated. Looking down on the practitioner, he asked: 'Does he swear to that?' 'Yes, my lord, he swears to it.' 'I am glad he swears to it,' said the judge, 'because it is a matter on which the court has been divided in opinion for some time.' The hon. gentleman should have sworn to this if he wanted us to believe that he is familiar with constitutional law. But I am doing the hon. gentleman an injustice. When I understand it better, I perceive that he only says that he was more familiar with constitutional law than he was with military practice.

—which I from the viewpoint of one more familiar with constitutional law rather than of British military practice, believed to bear upon my honour and rights as a citizen, caused me to express sentiments that are foreign to my belief in the form in which they seem.

'Believed to bear upon my honour and rights as a citizen.' Why the hon. gentleman is a regular Bombastes Furioso—

> Who dares this pair of boots displace
> Must meet Bombastes face to face.

I most respectfully wish to retract all letters written in what to your military instinct may seem insubordination, but which were not so meant by me.

What humility! I do not think a man could humble himself much more than that before the Creator of the universe.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Is it signed?

Mr. RUSSELL. 'Signed Sam. Hughes'—the redoutable, only one genuine heaven-born, heaven-descended child of the gods, Sam Hughes.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to say a word

Mr. RUSSELL. I cannot help it, but if the hon. gentleman breaks in upon me, I shall forget what I was going to say.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I wish to say that I have a great pleasure in acknowledging the authenticity of that letter, which was written when I was assured by the highest authority in the Dominion of Canada that if I retracted, I would be allowed the opportunity of serving my country in South Africa.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is exactly what I said. It was written, not because the hon. gentleman felt any sincere compunction or penitence; but he intended to continue to hold in his heart all that he had said, and he simply wrote this insincere apology in order to have the chance of going to South Africa to join the other nabobs and swells who were already there.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I would say furthermore that there is only one thing retracted that is, a reflection on the British officer.

An hon. MEMBER. Take your medicine.

Mr. RUSSELL. 'No chastisement for the present seemeth joyous but grievous; nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby.' My hon. friend has gone elaborately into a defence of the Earl of Dundonald in respect of these matters. I do not find the defence of the Earl of Dundonald so pronouncedly in the resolution moved by the hon. leader of the opposition as in the speech which the hon. member for North Victoria has placed on 'Hansard.' I do not see it very much in the resolution; if there is anything at all you have to find it by reading between the lines. But I want to ask this House if the hon. gentleman appealed to any English precedent that justified Lord Dundonald. The only one that he referred to was immediately smashed, shattered and pulverized by the hon. Minister of Militia. It is not in any British constitutionally-governed country that he finds any precedent in justification of Lord Dundonald. Not at all. He has to go to the United States. He has to go to the American republic, to that country where they tell us anarchy prevails, and which is not ruled according to British precedents and constitutional usage. I have no doubt that my hon. friend will find precedents for whatever he may want at some time or other and in some place or other in the United States, but I should prefer that he would, as a Britisher, as a strong imperialist like myself, as a good English constitutionalist, go to that grand old country from which we derive our constitutional system of government and our constitutional law and precedents, rather than to the republic of the United States. I do not propose to deal at any greater length with the hon. gentleman—at all events not just now. I may have occasion to quote some passages from a state paper of his later on, which bears on the subject immediately before the House, but for the present I will leave my hon. friend and let him vanish into space, as Cardinal Newman dismissed Mr. Kingsley in one of the chapters of his 'Apologia.'

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

EDMONTON STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

House went into Committee on Bill (No. 111) respecting the Edmonton Street Railway Company.—Mr. Oliver.

On section 5,

Mr. HAGGART. Is the Chairman of the Railway Committee here? If not, in his absence the promoter of the Bill (Mr. Oliver) perhaps, will explain the effect of this clause.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot explain the full effect of this clause. The provision as it stands is the result of an agreement between the sub-committee of the Railway Committee and the legal advisers of the parties concerned in the Bill. I understand the general intent of the Bill to be to make this company subject to the provisions of the Railway Act, but certain exceptions are necessary of sections that apply only to steam railways. It was pointed out that this company was not subject to the Railway Act or any other General Act, and it was thought advisable to bring it under the provisions of the Railway Act so far as that Act could apply to enterprises of this kind.

Mr. HAGGART. I notice that, only one section of the Companies Act is made to apply. Why does not the whole Act apply?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not thoroughly posted on that point, not being a lawyer. There was a very closely argued dispute between the legal members of the sub-committee and the promoters of the Bill. The Bill covers not only provisions for a street railway but for certain other powers in regard to the holding of land, the working of coal mines and the carrying on of water transportation. The Companies' Clauses Act, as I understand it, would apply to that portion of the powers asked for by the Act which are not connected with the railway, but not to that part connected with the railway. Therefore, the two general Acts, the Companies Clauses Act and the Railway Act are both brought in so far as they apply to the two kinds of powers granted to the company.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—DISMISSAL OF LORD DUNDONALD.

House resumed adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of supply, and Mr. R. L. Borden's motion in amendment thereto.

Mr. BENJAMIN RUSSELL (Hants). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member (Mr. Sam. Hughes) who last addressed the House in a portion of his remarks made a personal reference to myself. I do not know that I ought to take notice of it, but perhaps it is desirable that I should refer to it in a very slight manner. He made a mysterious allusion to some telegrams in his possession, which telegrams, if he has them, have come into his possession through the dishonourable act of some one. It does not matter to me whether he has such telegrams or not, because I am not afraid, and shall never be in the least ashamed, of any record that can leap to light in regard to any ambition I ever cherished in this House or in any other place. The hon. gentleman has seen fit to cast my horoscope, and I have no reason to complain of the pleasant way in which he has done it. If I should have the happiness or good fortune to realize his benevolent expectations on my behalf, it will be my endeavour to discharge my duty in the future as I have in the past. But, so long as I continue to be a member of this parliament and of the House of Commons, I shall discharge my duty here without fear of the hon. gentleman or of anybody else, without fear, favour or affection, without seeking favours from anybody, and without affection for or from anybody but the noble constituents who have sustained me and who are willing to sustain me as often as I am able to ask their suffrages.

I shall continue, I say, to discharge my duty as a member of this House, even although occasionally it involves the disagreeable and unpleasant function which he himself described before dinner with academic chastity as occasionally skinning the skunk.

An hon. MEMBER. Where is the skunk?

Mr. RUSSELL—I am told that the hon. gentleman was taking great draughts of water before he left the House. Mr. Speaker, it was a saying of the late Joseph Hume, who was a very notable parliamentarian in his day, and who was on one occasion asked what was the peculiar qualification above all others for the successful prosecution of a parliamentary career, and the great man, the complete parliamentarian, perhaps having reference to the long hours, the late dinners, the late suppers and the irregular mode of life we are obliged to lead, perhaps also having reference to the doses which are occasionally required to be swallowed by members of parliament on either side—this able parliamentarian said that what was chiefly required was a good digestion. I do not think he was altogether correct in that. In my experience and in my judgment, what is particularly necessary for a member of this House at all events, and what has been necessary, is that he should have a good sound nervous system ; because ever since I have been in this House it has been my experience that we have been distressed and had our nervous systems worried almost daily by various panics of one sort and another. The very first session during which I occupied a seat in this House we were terrified by the danger that threatened us in regard to what was called the abuse of the Governor General's warrants. I remember we were thrown almost into convulsions throughout this country, and particularly we were told that our rights as members of this House on both sides were being absolutely destroyed by the usurpations on the part of the Cabinet. We had hardly recovered from the shock of that alarm before we were again thrown into a state of anxiety by the usurpation of all the functions of the state by Lord Aberdeen. It was not merely the rights of this House but the rights of the government and the rights of the whole people of Canada that were being destroyed by the usurpations of Lord Aberdeen, and we were going to be driven back to the tyranny of George the Third. We were thrown into panics of one sort and another until, in many cases, the health of the hon. members began to give way.

I must confess that the present leader of the opposition is not so fertile in the production of alarming situations as was his predecessor, and he does not disquiet us with terrors of the same kind. His alarms are of a more sordid character. He tells us that our markets are being taken away from us, that we are in danger of being overrun by slaughtered goods from the United States and other countries, he troubles us with various difficulties and various troubles of that sort, but he does not excite us in the same way with regard to the loss of our prerogatives as did his predecessor.

So on the whole we were going along very quietly and very comfortably until suddenly this new trouble, this most alarming panic, has come upon us in the course of which a grave national crisis has been precipitated by the dismissal of General Dundonald. Now that is a very serious matter indeed. If it is a fact that in this country we have been living in a fools' paradise, if it is a fact that we are liable at any moment of the day or night to be overrun by hordes of uncivilized savages that are coming upon us from some unexpected quarter of the world, I think that is a matter that should keep any patriotic man awake during a great part of the night. I was inclined to spend some sleepless nights myself on the subject until my peace of mind was restored by observing the great happiness that all these circumstances seemed to give to our friends on the other side of the House. I knew that if they could enjoy a situation so profoundly as they seemed to be enjoying the present situation, there could be no danger, no cause for alarm, and nothing that anybody need be very much scared about. They would not rejoice in this manner if they really believed that the country was in danger, if they really believed that anything was going seriously wrong I have confidence in my heart to believe that instead of being so merry and so happy, they would be in gloom and sadness, and clouds and shadows and darkness would be hanging about them. They were rejoiced apparently with the situation. It has been a discovery to them of a new issue. Colonel Sellers, as portrayed by the inimitable John Raymond, who after his abortive speculations in corn and hogs, in oil-wells and mica mines at last made his lucky discovery of the missing ingredient for the eye-wash that was to bring him fame and fortune did not rejoice more than our hon. friends opposite have rejoiced at the discovery of this new issue. They might well rejoice, because for the last eight years they have been searching, searching diligently and with tears, for an issue upon which to stir up the minds and hearts of the people of this country, and they have never found it until now, and now that they have found it, we discover that it turns practically upon a question of etymology, it turns upon the meaning of a word ; that is, after all, the new issue which they have discovered in this country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I must discuss that issue a little. The issue is the dismissal of General Dundonald, the issue is the mode in which the government have dealt with that question. Now, I must say, if I am to claim the independence that I did a moment ago, that I cannot agree with the censures some hon. gentlemen have passed upon Lord Dundonald, I cannot agree with some of the criticisms that have been made upon him. He has been criticised in this House for employing as his counsel the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes), and for putting his brief into the hands of that gallant colonel. I am going to stand by him in that, I am going to justify him 'right up to the hilt.' I think it was a most appropriate thing indeed. Nothing in his official life became him better and nothing was so entirely appropriate to the mode in which he launched his campaign, than the defender that he chose to conduct his case in this House. He had discovered a most farcical and fanciful way of starting a great movement, something new under the sun, I think. The very idea of starting a great constitutional crusade, of launching it amid the popping of corks and clouds of tobacco smoke! No doubt it will effervesce like the champagne, and it will pass away like the tobacco smoke amidst which it was launched. It was a farcical campaign which was launched, and I say that no better way of preserving the farcical character of his movement could have been taken than to entrust it to the gallant colonel himself, the gentleman who combines the characteristics of the ancient Pistol and Fluellen the Welshman. It never came within the scope of Shakespeare's genius to construct any single character which altogether would cover the case of the hon. member for Victoria.

He combines the character of the ancient Pistol with that of Fluellen the Welshman. He has the bravery of Pistol and the military knowledge and experience of Fluellen. I do not mean the ancient Pistol as described by his critic, 'a gull, a fool, a rogue, who goes now and then to the wars to grace himself on his return to London in the form of a soldier.' I do not mean the ancient Pistol who would give a lying, bogus, insincere apology to General Hutton for the purpose of getting a free pass to South Africa in order that he might take his position in the South African army with the view of eventually superseding and supplanting General Buller as Commander in Chief of the British army; I mean the ancient Pistol who is described by himself in this state paper which I hold in my hands, the ancient Pistol described in a letter written by himself in the Toronto 'Globe' of August 14th, 1900, and from which I may be pardoned for reading some extracts.

The most recent letter received in Lindsay from Colonel Sam Hughes was addressed to Capt, Williamson of that town. It reads as follows:—

I shall not read the whole letter.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Read it all; you could not be better employed.

Mr. RUSSELL. No, I do not think I could be.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. That is about your size—reading that sort of thing.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad the hon. gentleman is not afraid to listen because the last time I had the pleasure of reading from some of his writings he seemed undesirous of hearing them read.

Well, the show is over! With Capt. Mackie and seventeen men I have just concluded the surrender of General de Villiers and all his corps of about 300 men and fifteen great ten-team ox wagons, nine carts, tons of ammunition and thousands of animals.

He is following in the footsteps of the ancient Pistol.

The terms are signed. Thus the war is over—

It is all done. I did it. I, said the sparrow, with my bow and arrow.

Thus the war is over, except in remote corners of the Transvaal and Orange River colony.

An hon. MEMBER. Where he could not go.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, he could not be expected to be everywhere at the same time. Nobody but a bird said Sir Boyle Roche could be in two places at once.

After our advance from Griquatown to Reitfontein and Papkine the work has been sharp. At Griquatown I arranged that the wives, daughters and sweethearts of the leaders and others of the enemy should write them urging peace and giving facts re Pretoria, &c.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I always look after the wives and sweethearts.

Mr. RUSSELL (reading).

At Papkine General Sir C. Warren sent me on free-handed to Daniels 'Kine. Well, in three and a half hours——

Not three and a half months, or three and a half years, but —in three and a half hours my force—Warren's scouts and Intelligence corps—with Capt. Mackie, of Pembroke—

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL (reading).

—covered the distance, twenty-two miles, and had the wire in operation an hour later. thence I got instructions to proceed onward on a reconnaissance, again free-handed. This is how I like to go—

No orders from General Hutton for him.

Then a fellow is on his own responsibility and feels it so.

You bet he feels it——

—accordingly he takes far more precautions than if tied up by orders and cautions. At Daniels' Kine the enemy got out so hurridly that they left their Union Republican flag flying. I now have it, as well as the Transvaal one I captured at Griquatown. I wired for seven days' rations, in addition to four I already had, and on Saturday morning, in a terrible storm of rain, sleet and hail, began my march of forty miles to Koenig, where the enemy were supposed to be. I looked at it this way: The horses were better saddled and moving than shivering in rain and frost, and so were the men. I made all fold the blanket Indian fashion——

This is sublimely picturesque and I want to call the attention of the House to it.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. If the hon. gentleman would get a blanket and put it on he would make a nice object.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would rather put the blanket on my hon. friend.

I made all fold the blanket Indian fashion so as to cover the knees, and with heads set facing the storm off we all went,

Further the eye of the imagination is forbidden to pry, but further as Macaulay says of Robert Montgomery the eye of our imagination will insist on prying.

I had neither blanket nor overcoat—only my light cape, which you have often seen me wear—

I do wish the hon. gentleman would occasionally favour us with an exhibition of himself in that black cape.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I will. I will be glad to oblige the hon. gentleman.

Mr. RUSSELL. What favoured people those were.

—which you have often seen me wear—as a consequence the rain dripped off the cape to the knees and down into my boots.

That is where the hon. gentleman's courage occasionally goes.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. It did not give me cold feet.

Mr. RUSSELL (reading).

These soon filling and the water getting warm, I was quite comfortable.

Then the hon. gentleman says that at Koenig he slept in a church. He is more fortunate than the most of us if he has not slept in a church before. He occasionally makes some of us sleep in the House. This time he was sleeping in a church. I shall not proceed to read about that because I want to give the House some thing more interesting :

The chief landrost came to me and suggested backing out of the agreement—

That is some agreement with the Boers that he refers to.

I at once agreed, said our column would never forgive me for taking their surrender,—

That is the surrender of some of these Boers——

—suggested that their force retire to the position occupied by them the previous day, while we would advance to where we had also been, and two days later we would make their wives widows, &c.

I also circulated a counter yarn.

Oh my, I really did not know this was there or I would not have exposed the hon. gentleman in yarning. I did not know this was coming. He says :

I also circulated a counter yarn as if I had got it from the general.

I suppose it is all fair in love and war.

Admitting the Boer success.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I heard the hon. gentleman deliver a lecture in Lindsay once when he was corrupt enough to say that all was fair in politics too.

Mr. RUSSELL. Well, I do not say you did not, but I do not think you are correct all the same. What I said in Lindsay is very elaborately and correctly reported, and my hon. friend will find that there is no such thing in the report.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I have that report and I was ashamed of the hon. member then and have been ever since.

Mr. RUSSELL. I can say distinctly that the hon. gentleman is absolutely and utterly mistaken. I never made any such statement in Lindsay or anywhere else.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The gentleman did.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is of no consequence whatever. The letter continues :

I also circulated a counter yarn as if I got it from the general admitting the Boer success between Bloemfontein and Pretoria, but that the following day our main force had captured the whole Boer outfit, upon hearing of which Kruger had asked to surrender, &c. I had not heard a word, but I was not going to be caught by them at their own game, and you see how near I was to telling a straight story.

I am bound to say I think the hon. gentleman was nearer telling a straight story than he has been at any time since he began his speech this afternoon.

Was it mind reading ? At all events I last night landed my column of nearly 300 here. Besides Mackie and myself we had only 117 men. I did not let the Boers know until our arrival here, but assured them I was not going to humiliate them by bringing the whole force up to march them back, that I would treat them on their honour, merely guarding the wagons with the rifles piled on, &c.

Really, Jack, they are a rather fine lot, and, in our four days' march back I learned to like many of them. Of course I never allowed anything to stand in the way of duty but while I would shoot one of them with a rifle in his hand as I would a dog.

Shoot him as quick as he transfixed Sydney Fisher or the Minister of Militia.

Yet once in my power as prisoners, I would, and did, use them like gentlemen. No man on our side in South Africa has been ahead of your humble servant where the bullets were flying.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Hear, hear. Read that over again.

Mr. RUSSELL—(reading).

No man on our side in South Africa has been ahead of your humble servant where the bullets were flying.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Or will be in case you try any games here.

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON. You were following on behind.

Mr. RUSSELL—(reading).

And no one has gone straighter for them or made them 'get a move on' quicker than I, but there my old sporting spirit comes in. I have no personal hard feelings against them. One fellow told me he tried to hit me three times at Faber's but within a hundred yards. I had no ill-will towards him for it, but rather a feeling of contempt, at his being such an infernally bad shot. Nearly all assured me before going to their homes that if I wanted a corps against Russia, France, China or any other nation than the Transvaal, they would to a man come with me. The day before yesterday I rode fifty-seven miles. The first word I got from my general was that morning at Coe. He said he was moving from Daniels' Kine to Blickfontein. Thus I had been seventy-five miles in advance.

In advance of the main body, I suppose.

I at once sent Captain Mackie on towards Koenig with the Boers while I crossed country southeasterly to this place. That night I rode to Koenig, covering fifty-seven miles in the saddle. Turpin was with me.

Turpin, who was Turpin?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. A mighty good fellow.

Mr. RUSSELL. Who is Turpin? this House will ask perhaps. There may be some ignorant people in this House, who may not know the story of 'me and Turpin.' There may be those who do not know that the hon. member with this great man Turpin, 'my man Turpin,' as he designates him——

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. He is a bigger man than you are.

Mr. RUSSELL. And only twenty other men, surrounded I do not know how many hundred thousand Boers who appeared like a cloud on the horizon, and actually by spreading themselves land performing a ruse like that described somewhere in Joshua, I think, but I am not sure, with the rattle of crockeryware and the display of lights in different parts of the field, so terrified and paralyzed the Boers that they were actually compelled to capitulate.

Yesterday we came from Koenig here and I can assure you the camp opened their eyes. The Canadian artillery boys are all delighted at my success, and indeed I do not think I have an enemy or jealous officer, barring one or two in the entire force.

I have officially asked the general to relieve me from duty, for the show is over and I want to get back to Canada. I hope to leave here in a day or two. Phillips and Turpin have been at my back through everything. They are fine fighters and good boys.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Good boys, both Tories.

Mr. RUSSELL—(reading).

There is a rumour here that the regiment is in Cape Town and will sail in a few days. That makes the two lads wild to get back, and now that there is not one soldier in arms in the west or northwest of the Transvaal, Orange River colony or northwest provinces, my mind reverts also, Canadawards.

Then comes this interesting foot note:—

I forgot to say General de Villiers at the last moment backed out from surrendering and escaped.

Well, after all that is merely a trifling matter of detail. He had surrendered, what if he did back out, he had surrendered. It is not like the letter which the hon. gentleman addressed to General Hutton which he could take back with an apology a few days afterwards. I maintain that according to the rules of the game when once a surrender is offered, it is a surrender and a man should stand by it. I back up the hon. gentleman in the contention that it was a vile thing, and not according to the rules of the game. When once the surrender was made, it was a finality and that should have been the end of it. However, this is a digression from my argument.

The House will remember that I was making the argument to justify Lord Dundonald in committing his case to the hands of my hon. friend from Victoria; and I say again that it would have been far better if Lord Dundonald had left his defence entirely in the hands of my hon. friend instead of taking it out of his hands and acting on his own behalf, once more realizing the adage with reference to the man who is his own counsel. I am ready to concede, as everybody in this country is, that he is a great soldier. No doubt he has occasionally displayed an excess of zeal like his great ancestor before him, which has got him into trouble in the civil arena, and which might have got him into trouble, if he had not had the best of luck in the military arena as well. He is a great soldier; but his best friend will not say that he is a great writer. And it is not to be expected that he should be; because there are only a few men who combine both qualities. Perhaps there is not more than one soldier in ten thousand who combines the qualities of a great writer and a great fighter—There have been but a few in the whole course of human history,—Julius Caesar, General Roberts, Colonel Sam Hughes——

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Lord Dundonald knows he had a grandfather, which some people do not know.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is not to be expected that all the gifts and all the qualities of the writer and the fighter and the man of affairs can be combined in and monoplized by any nobleman, not even by Lord Dundonald. So that not being a great writer, and not being a skilful advocate, he would have done far better to have left his case in the hands of the hon. gentleman to whom he had first committed it. In his letter, which has been called a manifesto by the Minister of Militia, Lord Dundonald defines three courses which he might have taken in order to bring to the attention of the public mind in Canada the evils he apprehended as existing in the militia system of this country. He might, he says, have made a report to the government, but that would have been only one more document pigeon-holed. He might have tendered his resignation, and then have stated the facts to the public of Canada. I think he might have done that with great propriety; there was no other proper course for him to take. But, for some reason which he does not explain, he took the third course, which I have described as fanciful and farcical, and which I do not hesitate to describe as improper, of making a statement at a banquet in Montreal. He says in his manifesto:

> It seemed better to make a public protest and to leave with the government the option of heeding it, or of upholding the system which is destructive to the efficiency of the national defence.

These are his words. Suppose the government had wanted ever so much to heed the warning of Lord Dundonald, what should they have done? What could they have done? Why, Sir, the misconception evidently existing in the mind of Lord Dundonald on that subject is such as to render him entirely unsuitable for public service in a constitutionally-governed country. He seems to have supposed that if the government desired to heed his warning, all they had to do was to pass over in silence and without reference of any kind what had taken place in the city of Montreal, although he had passed the most severe censure upon his departmental chief. With a singular lack of courtesy, I think, in a nobleman of his standing, he charged the members of the government of which he was a servant with want of etiquette, with being practically cads and boors. Although he had taken such a proceeding as this in the city of Montreal, he seems to have thought the government could have passed it by, accepted his warning, made the changes which he insisted upon in the militia system of the country and gone on as if nothing had happened at all. I say that such a conception of the relations between himself and his departmental superior entirely unfits him for public service in any constitutionally-governed country. Well, having adopted this singular method, which he did adopt in preference to the two others which he mentioned, how did he apply it? Let us look at that for a moment. His great grievances were that there was no adequate support given to the militia system of this country, that there were no adequate camps, that there was no adequate ammunition, that there were no adequate weapons, that there was nothing at all in the nature of a true militia force to protect this country from hostilities from other parts of the world. With these great grievances resting on his mind, he tells us that he said not one word to the people of Canada; and the people of Canada would have known nothing about them if it had not been for the mere accidental circumstance—for which I think those who sympathize with Lord Dundonald may thank the government of this country—of his being dismissed. He says nothing about these great grievances, but merely explodes some little trumpery grievance with the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the 13th Light Dragoons. He speaks in his manifesto of singular coincidences. Here I think are remarkable discrepancies. He was making, he tells us, a deliberate and premeditated assault upon the militia system and the government and the Department of Militia; and yet he omits the very gravamen of his charge against that system, and only mentions this trumpery matter connected with the 13th Light Dragoons. And even as to that, he says he had not a single word in his notes. All these, I say, are singular and remarkable discrepancies. Of course, we have to accept his word; he is a nobleman, and we are bound to and do accept his word; but it requires a supreme act of faith to accept his word that this speech was a deliberate matter with him. 'Credo quia impossibile'—I believe it because it is impossible. He cannot ask more than that from us. If it were not for his statement that this was a deliberate and premeditated thing, I would have drawn the inference, and would have been certain of it, that it was a spontaneous explosion—and as Shakespeare makes Gower say, 'What a beard of the general's cut and a horrid suit of the camp will do among foaming bottles and ale-washed wits, is wonderful to be thought on.'

That, I should have thought, was the secret of the explosion. He tells us in his manifesto that his principal grievance was the suppression of part two of his report by the Minister of Militia. That was the gravamen of his charge against the Minister of Militia. But, Sir, he destroys that by what he says in another part of his manifesto:

> My claim for freedom extended only to the technical side of my work.

His claim not to be under the control of the Minister of Militia only extended to the technical side of his work. That is common sense? Now, as the ex-leader of the opposition used to say, I leave it to any man with a head on his shoulders and brains in that head to say whether this was a technical question or a question of state policy—the question whether that report should not be published and sent broadcast over this Dominion of Canada. Was that a technical matter or a question of state policy ?

In my judgment, he says, it was information as to the actual conditions and possibilities of the militia which it was desirable the people of Canada should know. Well, that was Lord Dundonald's opinion, and as such it is quite interesting. But admitting that that was his judgment, it was not the judgment of his minister ; and suppose his minister, after taking counsel with his colleagues, found that neither was it the judgment of the cabinet, whose judgment was to prevail ? Was it the judgment of Lord Dundonald on a question of state policy or that of the Minister of Militia, supported by his colleagues in the cabinet ? Surely it was the judgment of the latter. On the question as to the policy of publishing a state paper, giving the conditions of our defences, exposing, for all I know, the weaknesses of our defences, to the whole civilized world, so that the whole world might know exactly the condition of things in this country, whose decision should prevail ? If the report of Lord Dundonald was unduly pessimistic, if it was incorrect, if his apprehensions were not justified, if the government thought that his report was not a fair statement of our military condition and one which should not be published to the whole world, surely the question as to whether that report should be published was not one of those technical questions on which Lord Dundonald claims superiority, but a question of state policy, on which the cabinet should decide, and I do not see that Lord Dundonald has any grievance whatever regarding the non-publication of that report. That is practically the essence of this whole question. I will be just to Lord Dundonald. We all must be just to him. He is a great soldier. Of that I have not a particle of doubt as his ancestor was a great sailor, but the very qualities that may make him a great commander of men may be those which absolutely unfit him to be a public servant under constitutional government, and I think my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Sam. Hughes) may have succeeded in divining some of the very reasons why Lord Dundonald has not been a success in this country. In this celebrated state paper which the hon. gentleman addressed to General Hutton, in this famous letter which the gallant colonel sitting opposite to me wrote to that general, he said :

> I was going to give you a few words of suggestion, not as a soldier, but as a Canadian Britisher. You know the causes of failure of your predecessors, some of them good soldiers, some of them honourable men. They nearly all allowed themselves to be influenced by a few in Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto, not by any means the men of sense and judgment in those cities, quite the reverse.

Well, Mr. Speaker, is it not altogether possible that Lord Dundonald, either by himself or through those who were organizing that corps for him, may have been misled or may have allowed himself to be influenced by a few men, perhaps not in Ottawa or Montreal or Toronto, but perhaps in the eastern townships—and perhaps in the Baker settlement. That may have been one of the reasons for Lord Dundonald's failure. Or this may have happened. The secret may be found in another passage of this great state paper, in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sam. Hughes) has shown to General Hutton why it is that in England an officer under the control of the General Officer Commanding cannot be a member of parliament and yet a similar officer in the Canadian force may be a member of parliament. My hon. friend said :

> The rule in Great Britain is that an officer, such as your A. D. C., or some one directly under your control as General Officer Commanding, cannot hold office as member of parliament for two reasons, (a) he is directly in receipt of salary, though that is not the main objection ; (b) he might, as your servant, be made the instrument to attack the minister, your master. In short, it would be a roundabout way of your castigating your master.

It was quite right for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sam. Hughes) to speak of the Minister of Militia as General Hutton's master, but it is awful profanity, an awful sin and shame, when anybody dares to suggest that Lord Dundonald is the servant of the Minister of Militia.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Not at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, the newspapers in this country have made it a matter of public comment that any one should take that ground. They have rung the changes on what an awfully improper thing, what a great sacrilege it was for anybody in this country to suggest that the Minister of Militia was in any sense the master of the great Lord Dundonald.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Not at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. Now we are sometimes told that we ought to have in our militia system a condition of things such as exists in the army in England. We are told that in this Canada of ours, our militia is subject to political influences, that we do not keep it as clear and free from sinister influences of that kind as the military service is in the old country. Well, there is some light thrown on that also by the state paper of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Sam. Hughes). Let me read what his opinion was at the time he was writing General Hutton. He says :

> My Dear General——

The dear general, I may remark, had said something in a very short note to my hon.

friend about self-effacement and modesty as being one of the distinguishing characteristics of great soldiers and one which he did not think, in his imperfect judgment, was a very distinguishing characteristic of my hon. friend. General Hutton had not made the discovery of that really soldierlike modesty which underlies all the gasconade and blatherskite of my hon. friend. 'My dear general,' he says :

My dear General, that is a lovely sentence, 'those great qualities of self-effacement,' &c., but permit me to inform you that I have for upwards of thirty years been a careful student of history and have had favoured opportunities of getting 'behind the scenes' re the 'Horse Guards' and 'War Office' methods and influence and appointments.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Judgeships, for instance.

Mr. RUSSELL. I had spoken on that point before your arrival :

Therefore your beautiful sentence re self-effacement in great officers is entirely lost on me. I am desirous of learning where any British officer of note has, outside of vacancies caused in actual warfare, been promoted to high command on his merits alone, Lord Roberts alone excepted. What the 'Horse Guards'——

These were the sentiments of my hon. friend :

An hon. MEMBER. What about the noble lord himself ?

Mr. RUSSELL. Surely no reflection was intended on him.

What the 'Horse Guards' and 'War Office' do not know about intrigue and influence, and the absence of self-effacement in one's friends if not directly in oneself, cannot be learned from the most noted body for such in the world, the Methodist Conference committees, or any church appointing bodies.

Why are the Methodists selected, of all possible communities, as being the one in which intrigue and influence and the absence of self-effacement are the distinguishing characteristics ?

I shall gladly give details if desired ; but you are a very shrewd observer as well as student and may doubtless have learned or heard of what I state.

If that be the condition of things, it is not wonderful that we should find that there are in England inferior officers. Then the gallant colonel and member for Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) goes on to say :

In your conversation to-day you doubtless gave vent to your true sentiments in comparing me so frankly as you did. All that I ever wrote, spoke or thought of the officer I spoke of was praise in comparison with your statement of me. I do not profess to be skilful in leading expeditions 'to the moon.'

No, only those expeditions in which he surrounded a hundred thousand Boers with a few men and things of that kind, and which culminated in the practical surrender of great generals like de Villiers, which they backed out of the next day. He went on to add :

History shows that Britain has had many experts at such and not so many skilled or capable of leading men against fighting men. True, battles have been won by British generals and minor officers' plans, such as Wellington and his colleagues, Roberts, Kitchener and others, but to the British soldier is due victory again and again, despite the stupidity and blundering of British officers.

The hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Gourley) could not out-Herod that.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Perhaps the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) could.

Mr. RUSSELL. No, that is not in my line.

These, as you know, are not alone my own views. You say I would be incapable to serve alongside British regulars ; why ? Could not I retreat or surrender quickly enough to the Boers ?

He could not surrender; everybody knows he could not. He makes General De Villiers surrender.

History shows that the Yankees, whom Canadians could always defeat, though with great odds against us, repeatedly dressed and combed down British troops led by British officers ; while the old plugs of Boer farmers walloped the British though the odds were often against them.

If my hon. friend who sits beside me (Mr. Monet) had said anything like that, or if the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) had said it, how the newspapers of this country would have flamed with indignation.

In the coming Boer trouble a similar result will be found to arise if ordinary British tactics be employed. We claim to be as good men, and as accurate riflemen as the Boers who have repeatedly 'licked' your British officers. Therefore I fail to see wherein I am unfit to serve alongside British troops. Of course, the Boers have no 'Horse Guards' pull.

That was one of the things which he took back in his apology. But still he stands by it, for the letter was only a pro forma apology to secure the free pass to South Africa, while these continue to be the honest sentiments of his heart.

I said a while ago that the great issue in this campaign—and it must be a great triumph to hon. gentlemen opposite to have discovered such an issue—is a verbal one purely. It is not the case of Lord Dundonald that is the issue, because Lord Dundonald does not appear in this motion except in the faintest and most perfunctory way. The issue is not even the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture, for that, after all is evidently regarded as a minor matter. The real issue on which these

hon. gentlemen hope to win the election is the issue which was set forth in the elegant poem read by the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) in the peroration of his speech—or rather in one of the numerous perorations, for, like the great Adelina Patti, he made seven or eight farewells before he eventually left the stage. The issue chosen by these hon. gentlemen is the allegation that Lord Dundonald was designated by the Prime Minister as a foreigner. That is the issue before the people of this country. Well, Sir, it was an awful thing for the Prime Minister to do. I admit the extreme gravity of the crime he committed against the English language—that is I admit it for the purpose of argument—in calling Lord Dundonald a foreigner ; though there are precedents in the best English prose which entirely justify the use of the word in the way in which it was used, as I intend to show before I sit down—even though it is somewhat immaterial. Everybody knows who reads the context, everybody knew who heard the context, of the expression which was then used and who followed the argument, the right hon gentleman was then making, exactly what was denoted and connoted by the term the Prime Minister used. Everybody knew he was making an argument to the effect that Lord Dundonald not being personally familiar with the conditions in the eastern townships or personally acquainted with the place in which he was organizing the new force, was obliged to trust to the opinions of those who were thus conversant. And everybody knows that when the Prime Minister designated Lord Dundonald as a foreigner, he merely meant to convey the idea that Lord Dundonald was not a person who was acquainted with the local conditions surrounding that force, as a person constituting a militia force should be. Everybody knows that, and everybody knows that it was a most unspeakably mean and despicable thing on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite.——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. I say it without hesitation—a most unspeakably mean and despicable thing on the part of any man in this House or anywhere else to wrest that word from its proper connection and endeavour to put upon it a meaning that everybody in this House knows very well was not in the mind or in the heart of the premier when he uttered the word. The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) if he could be guided by his own manly instincts would repudiate such an interpretation. I know him too well not to know that in his heart of hearts he does repudiate it. But, unfortunately he is the leader of the opposition. He is like the French gentleman who was chasing after a procession of the rag-tag and bob-tail, of scullions and loafers in Paris during a time of political excitement. He met a friend, who was dumbfounded at the gentleman's ridiculous and incomprehensible conduct. He said to him : 'Why, what are you doing here ? Why do you follow these people' ? The gentleman answered : 'Do not attempt to stop me ; I am their leader ; I have to follow them.' The hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L Borden) is the leader, I am sorry to say, of the mean and despicable creatures who are seeking to wrest that word from its proper connection and give it a meaning which it cannot properly bear.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Let him go on.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not apply the term to any hon. gentleman in this House.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) state his point of order.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to ask your ruling on the point whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) has the right to apply to members of this House the expression 'mean and despicable creatures' ?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no fact upon which the point can be raised. I have not so designated these hon. gentlemen.

Mr. HENDERSON. When the point of order is raised, let the hon. member (Mr. Russell) sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) is speaking to the point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then, let him speak to the point of order.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think I have the floor. I say there is no fact upon which such a point can be raised, because I never dreamed of such a thing as applying that designation to any hon. gentleman in this House ; and I am amazed that anybody should suppose me capable of such a thing.

Mr. SPROULE. Why, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) spoke so of the followers of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. RUSSELL. I say he is the leader of those poor, despicable creatures.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPROULE. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) has made it very plain. He says he has not applied that epithet to any hon. gentleman in this House.

Mr. HENDERSON. But we know he did.

Mr. SPROULE. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, that he spoke of the followers of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. RUSSELL. I was going on to say that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads this House would have been perfectly justified in standing by the expression he used. He would have been warranted by the usage of some of the best writers of English, had he stood by the word that first sprang to his lips. Finding that it did not as accurately convey his meaning as another that immediately suggested itself he withdrew it and substituted the other. Everybody knows that he withdrew the word, and did so before any of the hon. gentlemen opposite had the perspicacity to raise any question. But I say he would have been absolutely right, and justified according to the usage of some of our best writers, had he allowed the word to stand. If there ever was a writer who will be recognized as a master of absolutely choice and perfect English it was Joseph Addison. Using this very word 'foreigner,' Addison says that "water is the only native of England made use of in punch, but the lemon, the brandy, the sugar, the nutmegs are all foreigners." These things came, some from our own colony, some from the West Indies, they came from countries under the English flag, yet they were all foreigners because they were not natives. 'Native' is contrasted to 'foreigner' and 'alien' is the only word the right hon. gentleman could have used if he had any such meaning in his mind. A bill of exchange which is drawn in England on Canada is a foreign bill of exchange, not an inland bill; a company incorporated in England is a foreign company and not a domestic company; a judgment recovered in England is a foreign judgment. Lord Brougham talked of English law as foreign law to a Scotchman, and by the same token why could not a Scotchman be spoken of as a foreigner, or an Englishman as a foreigner even in British colonies. In the same way, a Nova Scotia judgment is foreign in New Brunswick; and Scotch commentators treat all English judgments as foreign judgments, and speak of all persons resident out of Scotland as foreigners.

Well, Sir, the right hon. gentleman might very properly have adhered to the word if he had seen fit to do so; but he found another word and a better word for his purpose, and one more accurately conveying the meaning which he undoubtedly meant to convey, as everybody knows, and which every honourable man in this House recognizes that he intended to convey, when he used that expression which has been so much tortured out of its proper meaning, and distorted into a meaning injurious to the right hon. gentleman. And for what purpose? For the purpose of discrediting a man whose record in this country has belied the injurious meaning from the earliest days when he took his seat in this House down to the present, and will continue to do so as long as he may hold a seat in this House—God grant that it may be for many years to come! an hon. gentleman, I say, who has had perhaps more than any other public man in this country a true and just conception of, and has displayed a tenacious adherence to, the two great foundation principles, two of the greatest foundation principles upon which the noble fabric of our civilization is based. One of those great cardinal principles is the principle of local self-government, the right of every portion of the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of every colony of the empire, to exercise a practical sovereignty in the management of its local affairs. That is one great principle which lies at the base of our British system. If there be any that is greater than that, it is the ascendancy of the civil over the military authority, the absolute and unquestioned subordination of military functionaries to the civil authority of the state as administered by a government responsible to the houses of parliament. Those, I say, are the two great basic principles of our English polity and the polity which ye inherit from England, both of which are opposed by this Dundonald campaign, one of them implicitly and the other explicitly and emphatically. Better, I say, that every British nobleman should withhold from us the light of his lordly countenance for evermore than that we should forfeit one iota of our rights of local self-government or abate one particle of the authority of this Canadian parliament to administer the affairs of this Dominion. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, proud as we may be, thrill as our hearts may well thrill in contemplation of the achievements of our soldiers and sailors in all periods of our history and in all portions of the globe, better I say again that the name of every one of them from Henry of Agincourt to Roberts of Kandahar should be blotted from the page of our history and perish from the memory of mankind than that we should abate one jot or one tittle of the principle which subordinates every military authority in this Dominion, high or humble, nobleman, gentleman or yeoman, to the people of Canada as represented in the parliament of this country.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). I am not sure who is to blame for bringing about this great discussion that has been going on now for two days. Although I have listened attentively to every speaker and have read all I could about it, I am not sure I say whether it is the Minister of Agriculture who is responsible for this deplorable discussion. If it is the Minister of Agriculture, or whoever it may be, he should be compelled to pay all the expenses that are incurred in the prolongation of this discussion. Let us ascertain who it is, and all this time should be charged up against him and taken from his indemnity. Some hon. gentlemen may squirm at this proposition, because they may be the guilty parties. We do not know who it may be, but circumstances point towards the Minister of Agriculture. If the Minister of Agriculture had not been so officious, if he had not been acting in the place of the Minister of Militia, and if the Minister of Militia had been at home in his office, this thing never would have happened. Now I think myself that the militia, the military, the navy the church, the school and all like institutions, should be free from politics. I think whenever politicians undertake to interfere with the religion of the people, or with the education of the people, or with the disposition of the army, they are making a great mistake. If a commander prides himself on anything, it is on the men who are to assist him in defending this country if it is attacked, and an officer who has not the good will of his soldiers is not likely to succeed in battle. Therefore I say that the men themselves should be consulted as to the officers who are to be appointed over them. The Minister of Militia told us in his speech last night that he was away from his duty at the time, and had been away previously for five or six weeks, in the city of Boston. Now if a member of this government can leave his duties for so long a time, it seems to me that almost any person could fill that office. If you put the Minister of Agriculture in his place it is not a proper thing to do, and if ever I am appointed to be a minister I will stay in the office and look after my business, and if I go to Boston I shall be able to give a reason for it.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. If the hon. gentleman read the newspapers he would have learned that I was in Boston on account of illness.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON. If the hon. gentleman had told us that last night I would not have referred to it at all, because a man has a right to be away when he is ill.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I do not understand why any hon. gentleman in this House should be so anxious to misjudge the motives of a member of the government who may be obliged to leave his office temporarily. I think it would be fairer and more just to assume that he went away for good reasons and proper motives.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON. If he went away on sickness that is sufficient excuse. But the hon. minister did not tell us that last night, and we might have thought that he was in the States acting as a spy on the American people. I do not want to detain the House because it has been detained long enough on this question and the country is tired of it, I think. But, I want to say that I do not think any man ought to interfere with me, if I am allowed to raise a squadron of horse or a troop of soldiers, in my selection of the men. I say that the hon. Minister of Militia ought to assist me instead of chalking out the name of a man that I had selected to help me and putting another man in his place. The hon. Minister of Militia would not have done that had not the hon. Minister of Agriculture come from that section of the country and intimated that he would pick out some of these people himself. He told him that he was determined that there should be so many Tories in the regiment. I have yet to learn that Tories do not make as good soldiers as Grits and I think there should be no distinction between them. What we want are men who will fight for our country without asking the question as to whether they are Tories or Grits. What do the English government do when they want a man to lead their army ? Do they go to some partisan, to the man who is the strongest Liberal or the strongest Conservative ? No sir, they select the best man they have in their army for that post. Wellington was brought from India and sent to the Peninsula because they knew that he was a soldier of the best type, and he defeated the enemy and won extraordinary victories wherever he went. If they had had poor little politicians in the government of England at that time perhaps there would have been some other man placed over him. Wellington, Wolseley, Roberts and Kitchener were selected—for their politics ? No, Sir, but because they had made themselves perfect in their profession and were known to be the ablest men in England to lead the army. The English navy has done the same thing from the time of Blake, of Drake, of Frobisher, and scores of others, down to the time of the great and immortal Nelson. Did they ever ask what this great admiral's politics were ? Certainly not. So it should be with our troops in Canada. We hope that they may never have to fight, but if they do let us not select one set of men because they are party politicians. I do hope that this debate will close soon because we are only administering pin pricks to the British people. We are injuring ourselves when we do that. The hon. gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Russell) said that he thought it better that we should lose a thousand men from Britain or the light of the countenance of a lord than that we should lose one iota of our liberty. We do not intend to give up our liberty. Every Governor General we have had in this country has helped us from Lord Elgin down. We never had a Governor General who went home who was not a first-class immigration agent for us. We want to try and get the British people to come out here and bring more wealth with them. We have room for them. I am afraid that we are going to prevent squadrons from being formed by such a proceeding as this one. Whenever another squadron is about to be brought out, for pity's sake let the officers choose the men and let the Major General in command of the forces choose the officers.

Mr. RUFUS POPE (Compton). Mr. Speaker, I listened with some attention to the little member for Hants (Mr. Russell) in his valedictory to this House and I could not help but remember the many discussions that have taken place in this House and resolutions moved by the hon. Postmaster General in days gone by pointing out what a vicious sin it was that men should sit in this House with commissions in their pockets. I suppose this principle, like all the principles and professions of hon. gentlemen opposite, has gone to the great scrap pit. The little man from Hants referred to the fact that my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) had a free pass to South Africa. As to that I do not know, but I do know that the hon. gentleman, according to his own confession, anticipates that he has a free pass to a position for life in the province down by the sea. We sent down there a short time ago what we used to style the Goliath of this House, the member for Guysboro and now, in order that these two gentlemen may average up, we are sending the Banty Tim of this House. That hon. gentleman has been the faithful servant of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the party to which he belongs. He has never failed to do any work of a character that some legal men might hesitate in doing. We remember him during the election trials and since 'pettifogger' is the proper word to use, I say that I do not think that any more miserable specimen of the breed whatever it is was ever exhibited either in parliament or the committees of this House than we had in the little member for Hants at that time. He has taken special pains to deal with the word 'foreigner.' What an endorsation for the right hon. Prime Minister and what weight it will have in the country when it is known that the use of that word has been justified by one of the members of this House with a commission in his pocket. The hon. gentleman spent half an hour in discussing the word 'foreigner.' He ceased, but 'Hansard' remains just the same; there is the word, the insult has been given, and though the right hon. Prime Minister down to the smallest follower on his side of the House might spend as many hours and days as they liked in trying to explain it, the word 'foreigner' is on the record of 'Hansard' untouched and there it remains as an evidence of the true heart feeling of the right hon. gentleman when he rose upon that occasion. Why Sir, the little man from Hants stated, as others have also stated that the proposal of Lord Dundonald involved an expenditure of immense sums of money—the newspapers have stated so—and that consequently it could not be adopted by this country. It was said that the hon. Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) had intimated that there were some things in the report that could not be adopted by Canada. I think it is only just that the representatives of the people should see that report and judge for themselves. Business men and railway corporations have reports made by their managers, but they are not always accepted by any means. We see in England a war commission recently reporting in favour of conscription but the government do not adopt the report.

But there was no reason why it should not be made public, and, Sir, we ought to know what was in these reports. We had an expert here, a man of high character, a soldier, a commander who had the endorsation of the Minister of Militia himself, until this difficulty arose. Only a year ago the Minister of Militia stated that we had an officer equal if not superior to any who had preceded him. Under these circumstances I say that we, the people of Canada having a servant—as they chose to call him,—and that servant making a report to the Minister of Militia upon the public defence of Canada, that report should be placed upon the table of this House. Whatever our deficiencies are we should know them and as a nation always be prepared to strengthen any weakness in our defences, let the cost be what it may. I can readily understand that Lord Dundonald in making plans for the defence of a country 4,000 miles long, with all its sea coast and rivers and long line of protection against the United States a foreign nation, would advise measures that would be covered not by the expenditure of a year, or two years or three years but of many years, and I say we, the representatives of the people of Canada, have a right to see and understand what he was proposing. The Minister of Militia last night took special pains to take a very wide scope. He took special pains also to offer very little support to the Minister of Agriculture in the position he had taken. It is quite true that speaking the other day he endorsed the minister. A man often does things on the impulse of the moment which he afterwards regrets, and as I listened to the Minister of Militia last night, I came to the conclusion that he regretted the action he had taken a few days ago, in endorsing body and soul the Minister of Agriculture for his action. He went so far as to tell us that he thought that if he had been at home instead of being away from home, this difficulty would not have arisen. There was only one man to interfere when he was away and to create difficulty, the Minister of Agriculture who was acting in his stead. No severer castigation has been offered to the Minister of Agriculture than was administered by the Minister of Militia in that very short statement. These difficulties commenced with the advent of this government to power. The right hon. the Prime Minister was warned by many of us, and I can remember on two or three occasions, doing my best to impress him with the trouble that would ensue if he followed out the spoils system by dismissing good servants to make places for political friends and driving the political knife into every one for that purpose. To-day we find the smallest Minister of the Crown, coming I regret to say from the section of country from which I come, carrying out the same system. We have had militia affairs in that country as long as in any portion of Canada but this is the first we have ever heard about the interference of politicians in regard to the formation of our militia. Last year the forces in Compton were reorganized and converted in Mounted Rifles, just as they were in Missisquoi, Brome and Shefford. There was no interference there because there was no member who felt that he had a mandate from his electors to select particular officers. The appointments went through the proper channels, and the result was that when the regiment went into camp in June every officer was in his place, the regiment was up to the full establishment permitted by law and there has been no trouble. Two-thirds of the militia men of the eastern townships and two-thirds of the officers are Conservatives. That is the history of the militia there, and history stands behind that statement. The country was originally settled by elements that came in from the United States; some of them empire loyalists, and others American traders who came there to better their position. In 1849 the question of annexation arose, and we had two parties, the Loyalists on one side and the American traders on the other. Following that we had Confederation and the Conservative party were the loyal party of the eastern townships, who contended for the preservation of British rights and the flag of Great Britain, on the northern half of this hemisphere at that time. Consequently when the militia was established shortly after Confederation this militia force was composed very largely of Conservative officers and men. I do not say there has not been some change but it has been a very small change, because in our section of the country the French Canadian element has not gone largely into the militia, and the overflow from the other parts of the province of Quebec have settled the back regions of those counties and you have to-day but a small proportion of English and the remnants of the same people who came there years ago and fought that battle and are still fighting it out.

When the hon. gentleman refers to Mr. Baker and his family his reasons for doing it are well understood. Mr. Speaker, you have not heard anybody refer to the Fisher family in the eastern townships as being great soldiers. Oh no, they prefer to keep behind a fortress which they themselves own and control by a servile following which cannot be penetrated. The Minister of Agriculture has made his choice and has taken a family from which to select officers. He has selected the family of Miltimores, and we find Miltimore No. 1, Miltimore No. 2, and Miltimore No. 3. He has a right to take these men if he sees fit, and to call them his proper representatives as an eastern township family. We find Clifford Miltimore put forward as a fit and proper person for a position of command. I find this record in regard to him :

I, undersigned, John J. Barker, of the village of Cowansville, in the district of Bedford, printer and publisher, do hereby solemnly declare :

1. That I am a resident of Cowansville, in the county of Missisquoi, in the district of Bedford, and a duly qualified elector of said county.

2. I was present at the meeting of the municipal council of Cowansville when the preparation of the voters' lists was in progress, and I made application to the said council to have the name of Clifford Miltimore struck therefrom, as I believed he had not the legal qualifications required by the law. He had previously been a tenant within the corporation but had ceased to occupy the premises which had been leased by him.

He resisted the application to have his name struck off and asserted that he was otherwise qualified as having his domicile within the municipality, and in support of that pretension made oath that he was so qualified and therefore entitled to have his name retained.

The Council being guided by the statement so made by him under oath retained his name upon the list.

Knowing the circumstances, I was impelled to petition one of the judges of the Superior Court to strike his name off. The petition was resisted and after proof his name was struck off the voters' list by the judge.

Here is the judgment of the judge, striking his name off that list, showing conclusively that this man took an oath that was false. That is his first recommendation, I presume, for preferment. I know Mr. Pickel very well, and I have no fear of his reputation, handled as it may be by the Minister of Agriculture, being tarnished. He stands in his community respected and admired by every one. The official positions he fills as mayor of his town and warden of his county are a sufficient endorsation of the man without any statement on my part. We can well understand that a man of that character was not very ambitious, as Colonel Smart's letters and others here show, or very anxious to join the militia. But the young men of that community said, if you can get Dr. Pickel to head this squadron, it will be a great success. Consequently Colonel Smart tried to get Dr. Pickel, and with what result we will see. Now, Sir, I find the Minister of Agriculture on page 5391 of the revised 'Hansard' saying :

I took no exception to this. But I found a recommendation in regard to the neighbourhood of Sweetsburg, which, I confess, surprised me, and to which I did take exception. I must premise my explanation in regard to this matter by saying that Senator Baker of Sweetsburg, is the acknowledged and active leader of the Conservatives of that district.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, Senator Baker is an active leader, as the Minister of Agriculture chooses to describe him, of that district, an old and respected citizen of that district, and also a lawyer; and he had the suit against Mr. McCorkill, the pet of the Minister of Agriculture, who was the provincial treasurer at Quebec and brought that suit to a conclusion; and Mr. McCorkill is ready to throw up the sponge and declare the corruption took place in his election. That is where the sore spot is. The history of the election of Mr. McCorkill shows that everything known to chicanery in elections was used in it. It was one of the most corrupt, I am told by the very best authority, and the very best proof that that authority is good is the fact that Mr. McCorkill has thrown up the sponge. That is the sore spot in regard to the Baker family. We all understand why the Minister of Agriculture feels so tender and waxes so furious when he thinks of the town of Sweetsburg and even of Cowansville, which is only a couple of miles from it. That district haunts him night and day, ever since the time of the Quebec election. It will haunt him more and more in the future. It will be a nightmare for him so long as he remains in public life. He goes on to say:

> I found this list of proposed names for the staff of the neighbourhood of Sweetsburg. First, Mr. John M. Gibson, a nephew of Senator Baker, and talked of as a possible Conservative candidate in the constituency of Missisquoi, to be third in command of that regiment.

Well, Sir, that is not a bad endorsation for this man.

> Dr. Pickel, one of the strongest Conservative workers of the neighbourhood and a family connection of Senator Baker——

This, I suppose, is nearer the truth than the hon. gentleman has been for a long time, because Dr. Pickel is a cousin of a boy who married Senator Baker's daughter. There is a semblance of truth in that statement, and I congratulate the hon. Minister of Agriculture before this House and before the press of Canada on having made one statement that has a grain of truth in it:

> Dr. Pickel, one of the strongest Conservative workers of the neighbourhood and a family connection of Senator Baker, to be major in command of the squadron which, though gazetted for Adamsville, was to be changed to Sweetsburg to suit his convenience. Mr. G. H. Baker, son of Senator Baker, to be senior captain of the said squadron. Mr. Thomas R. Pickel, son-in-law of Senator Baker, to be the junior captain of the said squadron. Then there were the names of two gentlemen, Messrs. Steacie and Reynolds of Montreal to be lieutenants. And down at the bottom of the list Mr. Thomas F. Cotton, a Liberal, son-in-law of the above-mentioned John M. Gibson, and grand nephew of Senator Baker.

I knew you would not find a Liberal very nearly related to Senator Baker. The Minister of Agriculture says: But I have included some Conservatives and I have included some Liberals. Mr. Speaker, what is the principle upon which our militia force should be governed? Is it the principle of selecting some Conservatives and some Liberals? No, Sir, it is the principle of taking men irrespective of party. That is no defence on the floor of parliament. It may perhaps be satisfactory on the hustings; but it is no argument for a minister of the Crown to come here and tell us that cheap sort of thing, that the fact that there were some Liberals and some Conservatives vindicates him for interfering politically with the formation of this regiment. The moment he conveys that knowledge, that moment he confesses judgment on the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition. There is no avoiding it, Sir, In any court of justice, he would have received such sentence as the crime demanded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we will proceed. We find the Minister of Agriculture saying this:

> The position which I took then, and which I take to-day, is this: Colonel Smart was a stranger——

Not a foreigner, Mr. Speaker, only a stranger—

> —going into the district of Bedford to organize this regiment. He appears to have got into the hands of certain people out there.

Any one going to Sweetsburg and Cowansville will get into the hands of certain people if he wants to meet the best people of that district; and that gentleman got into these same hands.

> He told me himself that he had no political intentions. I fully accept that statement.

There is where the difficulty is, Mr. Speaker. If he had had some political intentions, and these had squared with the ideas of the Minister of Agriculture, we would never have heard one word about this question.

> I believe Colonel Smart, in making the statement that he had no political intentions, made a statement which was absolutely accurate and truthful.

Now, Sir, what more does anybody want for a colonel going into that district to form a militia corps, than that he went there free from political intentions? If that is not the very best reason why the hon. Minister of Agriculture should have his nose out of the matter and gone on planting turnips, hoeing corn and spreading manure and keeping strictly to the management of his own affairs, I do not know what is. He says again :

Hon. gentlemen opposite are very solicitous against political interference. They do not condemn me at all, Sir, because I asked that Mr. Russell, a well-known Liberal, should be removed from the place of major of another squadron and that he should be replaced by a well-known Conservative.

Well, I do object. I object just as much against the removal of Mr. Russell as against the removal of Dr. Pickel. It is a great principle we are fighting for. If the integrity of the militia is to amount to anything, if it is to have any strength as a fighting force in the defence of the country, it must be non-political and its officers must be selected from the very best men available.

I said a few moments ago that the hon. gentleman said Colonel Smart's action was non-political. I acquit Colonel Smart, but, as I said a few moments ago, I cannot refrain from saying again that although Colonel Smart's intentions were not political, his actions were intensely political.

Sir, either Colonel Smart went there as a politician or he was not. If he went there, not as a politician, but purely and simply to organize the regiment regardless of politics, then the statement of the Minister of Agriculture is one unworthy of a gentleman occupying his position. The position taken by the government and the minister opens the door wide to every politician in Canada to interfere in our militia. The minister says :

In suggesting the name of Mr. Adams, under the circumstances, was I interfering politically ?

I think he was.

No, I was interfering simply in a common-sense way.

Mr. Speaker, that thing is unknown to the hon. gentleman. It is foreign to him.

I was interfering simply in a common-sense way in the organization of the new regiment. I grant fully, and no man is more prepared to admit it than I am, that on purely military qualifications the military experts at the command of the government ought to rule.

I want to know, Sir, what higher duty can a military expert have to perform than the selection of the officers, upon whose intelligence the lives of the men under him must depend. You may make a mistake in the construction of a fort, but the first basis of a military force is the intelligence of its officers, and the hon. gentleman has pleaded guilty a dozen times over to his interfering politically in their selection. Then the minister went on :

When it comes to matters connected with the affairs of this country ; when it comes to matters involving local knowledge of local conditions and knowledge of the people of Canada——

Mr. POPE.

Will you tell me that when a business man has to fill a certain position of responsibility in his affairs, he does not seek the advice of the very best men who can guide him in his selection of the man most suitable to fill that position. If we have a question of law to decide, we do not go to our next door neighbour but to the very best lawyer of our acquaintance for proper advice and instruction. Consequently, I say that the selection of these officers is the highest function a military officer has to perform.

But when it comes to matters involving local knowledge of local conditions, I venture to think that the public men of Canada know more than any expert military or otherwise.

The public men of Canada—who are the public men of Canada ? They are not the ministers of the Crown alone. We have been told by the First Minister and by the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Agriculture that any minister in the cabinet should be supreme in all these matters which concern the district in which he resides. Sir, it comes down to a simple question of patronage and nothing more. Political patronage is to be the foundation of our Canadian militia in the future, and that means that every representative supporting the government in any particular constituency has the right to dictate to the General Officer Commanding who should be given commissions in the militia force in that county. But here is a tid-bit. Here is as ingenious an admission as we have had in many a day :

The leader of the opposition has said that Captain Converse is a Conservative. I do not know whether he is or not.

The minister does not know so much about local conditions as he thought he did, and he pleads guilty to lack of knowledge with regard to Captain Converse.

I have only this to say : That my colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries wrote to me asking me to recommend Captain Converse for the position as adjutant of that regiment.

It never dawned on the Minister of Agriculture that the Minister of Marine would recommend any one but a Liberal.

It does not look as if he were a Conservative, unless the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is so favourable to the Conservatives that he should recommend one.

Is not that beautiful. There were no politics in the matter at all. Yet the poor little creature could not imagine his colleague recommending any one who was not a Liberal. He had left Ottawa and his farm and had gone down to visit the various parts of the district in order to see that a proper selection of officers was made. And he went down on a Sunday. I was very much surprised indeed to discover that the hon. Minister of Agriculture did not re-remember the Sabbath day in that good old Christian community of the Dominion, the eastern townships. When he saw fit to violate that sacred day, I did not pass judgment upon him, because I know that in these matters he will have to reckon later on. The hon. minister says that he struck out Dr. Pickel's name and put in some other name, and that as the net result he got 16 Conservatives and 15 Liberals and 4 Independents on the list of officers. All he did was simply to change the whole thing upside down and make it to suit himself. But in all this there was no political interference. There is something more to discover in this business, and it is this. The Minister of Marine evidently was convinced that the Minister of Agriculture had the appointments in his own hands, and consequently when he had any recommendation to make, he passed over the Minister of Militia and went to the Minister of Agriculture. But what right had the Minister of Agriculture to have the appointments of these men in his hands ? If you will look the record over, you will find some twenty odd letters written either by or to Sydney Fisher, and you will find only one written by the Minister of Militia himself, and that was to Lord Dundonald, asking him if he had made that speech in Montreal.

Sir, looking at this whole matter from a standpoint of efficiency, I say that a blow has been struck at the militia of Canada. I say more. If Lord Dundonald was dismissed on good grounds, if he was dismissed because he reflected on the conduct of his superior officers, what about Colonel Whitley and Colonel Smart, who were the subordinates of Lord Dundonald and Mr. Fisher ? What is going to happen to these men ? Their heads will not be worth anything if the Minister of Agriculture does not agree with their opinions of ideas. Under these circumstances, who is responsible ? If Lord Dundonald should go, if the government is right in making it necessary for him to go because he was not subservient to the ministers of the Crown, I say that the man who was at the bottom of it, who pin-pricked the condition along, who, by his speeches in this House and by the record which has been developed in this debate was responsible, should go also. How does he prevent himself from going ? He stands there as plaintiff in the case and as judge also. A very courageous position to occupy. If the Minister of Agriculture had been compelled to win his position by the manifestation of the courage which has won his spurs and the reputation of Lord Dundonald, it would be a long time indeed before we should see him gracing a place in this honourable assembly.

Mr. Speaker, the hour is growing late, and the case has been well argued. One thing has been clearly proven. No one will charge the Earl of Dundonald with being a politician. There is no dismissal of Lord Dundonald for being a politician, but we have the dismissal or rejection, of Dr. Pickel for being a politician—that is established by the record and by the Minister of Agriculture's own word in this House. So, if political interference with the militia of Canada is a crime—and it should be—then the resolution before this House should pass. But, had the Prime Minister done his duty, had he exercised duly the powers with which he is vested by the constitution, had he guarded, as he should have done, the best interest of the militia of Canada, this resolution need never have been moved—for the Minister of Agriculture would have been put out of the government. And had this been done the Prime Minister would have stood higher in the estimation of the people of Canada than he does. As for Lord Dundonald, it is not necessary for me to defend him. As has been said in this House, but as I may be allowed to repeat because it gives me great pleasure to do so, he is a man of honourable intentions, a soldier, a wealthy man who left his home and came here to Canada. And what for ? To dabble in politics ? Do you think he came here to appoint people to office or to dismiss Pickel from office ? He came here to spend a few years and to give Canada the benefit of his experience. As an army officer in South Africa he had seen a sample of the boys who had gone out from Canada—had gone out not through any willing action on the part of the government of the day—and he said : Here is a specimen of manhood under the British flag that, I believe, can be made the most efficient portion of the British army. He had no thought of establishing the system of militarism that hon. gentlemen opposite speak of and that their press are shrieking about throughout this country. Lord Dundonald is on record, and strongly on record, on that point. And he is too practical a man ; he learned too well the character of our boys in South Africa, to recommend militarism for Canada. He came here to do his duty. He worked faithfully and hard. He worked under the praises of the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) who, last night, I regret to say, played a role in this House which was creditable neither to himself, nor to the government, nor to Canada. Lord Dundonald came here to perform a great, a sacred duty—for to the soldier his duty is a sacred one. The true soldier is not necessary a mercenary, but he is a man who is moved by deep sentiment of patriotism and loyalty and who believes that the exercise of his profession is necessary to preserve the integrity of the nation to which he belongs. And I say it is a sad exchange, it is an extremely poor bargain, to give away the ability and experience of the Earl of Dundonald in exchange for the privilege of keeping in his place the gentleman who occupies the position of Minister of Agriculture.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, the defence which we heard yesterday from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) against the charges contained in the motion in your hands was so full, so complete and so masterly that there was no need for any of his friends to interfere in this debate. Nothing could be added to what had been said when he sat down. And, if I rise in this debate it is not at all to follow the line of argument that has been pursued; it is to call the attention of the House to the closing paragraph of the motion of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). The words to which I wish to call attention are especially these:

The House regrets that this unwarrantable interference has been approved by the government, and that it not only has unduly delayed the organization of the regiment, but has culminated in depriving the Militia of Canada of an experienced and distinguished Commanding Officer.

'Has culminated in depriving the militia of Canada of an experienced and distinguished officer.' Here is a statement which is not warranted by anything which has been proved to this House. The motion is an indictment against the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture joined issue upon it with his accusers. He has traversed it, in every particular; and I submit to the impartial judgment of those who heard him, that he has cleared himself completely of the accusations and insinuations brought against him. Even if the charges here asserted were true, there is no justification and no reason for saying that the action of the Minister of Agriculture, even if proven, was the cause why Canada has been deprived of the services of an experienced and distinguished commanding officer. For, my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture in the speech which he delivered yesterday, showed conclusively to the House that nothing which he may have done was conducive to the retirement of the General Officer Commanding; he stated and proved, that for several weeks before, it had been the determination of Lord Dundonald to retire from the post which he has occupied for two years. My hon. friend gave the evidence, but I think it will not be amiss if I repeat, in one particular the case which he made. I have here the statement delivered to the press by Lord Dundonald which, has been, not improperly, I think, characterized as a manifesto. Speaking, as he says, of the impediments put in his way by the Department of Militia and of the many things done to mar his work, Lord Dundonald tells the people of Canada that he had come to the conclusion that he would sever his connection with the department. These are his words:

It seemed to me that the best way to help the militia of Canada was to let day-light into the working of the system.

I realized, moreover, that the new Militia Bill would soon be discussed in parliament, and that it was my duty to give a warning of certain dangers before it was too late.

I might have lodged an official protest with the government. I cannot see that this would have been of any avail. It would have been simply one more document in a pigeon hole.

A course offering many attractions was to resign and issue a public statement giving my reasons. So far as I personally was concerned it would have been by far the easier and more pleasant course. The objection was that by so doing I would give neither the government nor the people of Canada any real opportunity to pass judgment upon the matter brought to their attention. My protest would have been made it is true, but not in a manner that would have attracted attention to the evil.

It seemed better to make a public protest and to leave with the government the option of heeding it, or of upholding the system which is destructive to the efficiency of the national defence.

I was in this frame of mind when Mr. Fisher's interference with the 13th Scottish Light Dragoons came to a head. It precipitated my resolution to speak out, no matter what the consequences.

I have quoted at length from the statement of Lord Dundonald simply to show that whatever may have been done by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, whether it was right or wrong, there was not the cause which eventually deprived Canada of the services of Lord Dundonald; this is an issue no longer to be fought out here. That may have been the occasion but it was not the cause why Lord Dundonald took the course he did. If that be the fact, and it cannot be controverted, why is it, Sir, and I submit this to the judgment of the Canadian people, that these words have been imported into the motion of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition?

That the conduct of the Hon. Sydney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture, in interfering with the commanding officer of the 13th Scottish Light Dragoons . . . . has culminated in depriving the militia of Canada of an experienced and distinguished commanding officer.

Sir, if there is any reason for the insertion of these words in this motion, words which are not founded on any fact whatever, that reason is palpably and solely to allow the followers of the hon. gentleman in the country to attack the government for an act which they dare not challenge before the House. For the last two days we have heard the government reviled, attacked and vilified for having taken the course which we felt compelled to take in regard to Lord Dundonald; and, Sir, if these gentlemen are sincere in their utterances, if they want to characterize the course of the government, as they have characterized it in their speeches, if they have the courage to express the feelings of their heart instead of mouth-made indignation how is it that they have not brought forward a vote of censure on the government for having dismissed Lord Dundonald instead of moving this namby pamby resolution?

The leader of the opposition concluded his speech yesterday with words of praise and encomium for Lord Dundonald. Let me say at once that I have not the slightest exception to take to the encomium and praise of Lord Dundonald as a soldier. Even at this moment, though I regret as much as any man can regret, the indiscretion which he has committed and which could have only one termination, I am happy to say that as a soldier and as a man I would join in everything that is said of him. But there is a cloud in every sky, and at this moment if the services of Lord Dundonald are lost to Canada, under circumstances painful to all, yet the necessity of which is callenged by none, it is not through the fault of the government of Canada.

Sir, if you read the history of the difficulties which culminated a few days ago by the painful obligation placed upon the advisers of the Crown of relieving Lord Dundonald from his command, and if you study these difficulties in the light of the speech he made in Montreal, in the light of the explanation given a few days ago by the Minister of Agriculture, in the light of the explanations given by the Minister of Militia, in the light of the statement placed in the hands of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) by Lord Dundonald himself, you can come to but one conclusion ; you will see in this but one more of the numerous contests for supremacy between the military power and the civil power which have taken place in England and in all British countries for many ages back. In England, Sir, and in all British countries, and indeed in all civilized countries, these contests have taken place, but with this difference, however, that in all countries except England and British possessions, this contest invariably terminated by the civil power being crushed by the military power ; whereas in England and in British countries, countries that enjoy British laws, the contest was decided once for all in favour of the civil power and of civil liberty. But though this contest was decided more than 100 years ago, still it is now and then revived by the military power. It was revived, as I shall show later on, even in England two or three years ago, it has been going on in this country for many years. For Sir, this is not the first difficulty of this nature that we have had in Canada, and even in other colonies, for example in Australia, they have the same trouble and the same contest that we have here. Sir, there is one thing in this matter that is very remarkable. Lord Dundonald is a good soldier I readily admit. But I call attention to the fact that the King's regulations for the British army in which Lord Dundonald served and in which he acquired distinction and glory, expressly forbids :

> Deliberations or discussions by officers or soldiers with the object of conveying praise, censure, or any mark of approbation towards their superiors or any others in His Majesty's service.

The regulations of the militia of Canada, the command of which Lord Dundonald volunteered to assume two years ago, expressly declare :

> It cannot be permitted that (officers) shall bring accusations against superior officers or comrades before the tribunal of public opinion, either by speech or letters inserted in any newspaper ; such a proceeding would be in glaring violation of the rules of military discipline, and in contempt of authority.

Lord Dundonald apparently had a disagreement with his minister, and he chose to appeal, not to the proper authority, but to the very tribunal to which he was forbidden to go, to public opinion. The thing was so extraordinary that when the Minister of Militia saw in a newspaper of this city a report of the speech which Lord Dundonald had delivered in Montreal, he could hardly trust his own eyes. He wrote a letter to Lord Dundonald and asked him if the report was correct, and the answer came that the report was substantially correct. In Lord Dundonald's communication to the minister there was not a shadow of palliation, not a word of explanation, not an attempt at justification. The offence therefore was very glaring, and in face of such a breach of dicipline of such an act of insubordination, there was nothing for the government to do but to take prompt and immediate action against the offender, and upon this action the opposition have not dared to challenge the government. There is something more extraordinary. Lord Dundonald tells us in the paper from which I have quoted that the action he was compelled to take was the only means he could take in order to serve the Canadian militia. Sir, it seems strange, to me at all events it is very strange, that the commander of the forces, the man who was placed by the govment at the head of the militia, should have chosen, as a means of serving the militia, to break the fundamental law upon which the militia force rests.

Sir, there is no more essential law for any military organization than discipline. Without discipline as Lord Dunnonald knows even better than I do, no military organization can exist and therefore, while I do not question the intentions of Lord Dundonald, it seems to me a singular mental process that he should have taken such a course as that in order, as he says, to benefit and serve the militia. But, Sir, if we go on further in the paper which Lord Dundonald has placed before the public, in the manifesto in which he says he wants to relate to the Canadian people the difference between himself and the government of Canada, we are bound to come to the conclusion that the true reason of the differences that he has had with the Department of Militia and Defence was simply that my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence would not be dominated. We thought at first after the speech at Montreal that the quarrel of Lord Dundonald was with my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, but we find by the paper which he has placed before the public, that his quarrel with him was only on the surface, that it was only a pretext and that the real quarrel he had was with my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence. What is the source of the difficulty he has had with my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence? He says that he offered advice which was not accepted, that he made suggestions which were refused, that he made a report which was suppressed and he says—in this I have no doubt he was quite earnest and quite sincere—that when he gave such advice, that when he made that report and that when he offered those suggestions he had nothing in his mind but to serve the best interests of the militia of Canada. I have no doubt of that. I do not question the intentions of Lord Dundonald whatever. I am speaking of his actions. I have seen a little of Lord Dundonald and I am bound to say that I believe he is a man very much in earnest and I would not presume to say anything which would impugn his honour or his intentions. But it must be admitted that a man imbued with the best intentions may not always be a safe guide or leader. This is not the first time that a man with the very best intentions has been led into a very wrong course and if that gentleman gave my hon. friend the Minister of Militia advice which was refused, if he gave him suggestions which were not accepted and if he made reports which were not thought advisable to publish while I do not deny that his intentions were good, I believe equally that the intentions of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia were just as good as his own. What happened then was what very often happens. Upon every occasion of a disagreement between honourable men upon acts to be done, upon a policy to be followed; because one is in earnest it does not follow that the other is not as much in earnest, and because one is honest it does not follow that the other is not honest, but it follows that either one or the other is erring in judgment, that one is right and the other is wrong, and in a matter of this kind I would just as soon accept the judgment and intentions of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia as that of anybody else who may serve under him. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence has been eight years in office. I believe I am correct in this, although I speak under advice, that he has held that position longer than any one of his predecessors, and certainly whether he has held it as long or longer than any one of his predecessors I think I am within the mark when I say that there is not one of his predecessors who has done as much for the militia as my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence has.

There is an impression abroad that the General Officer Commanding holds his commission from the imperial authorities, that he is the delegate of the War Office. Nothing of the kind. We know better in this House, but, Sir, I think perhaps, it would not be amiss if I were to quote the law on this subject so as to dispel an impression which exists in many minds. Here is the law on this point and it shows that the General Officer Commanding the forces holds his commission from the Canadian government. The Militia Act, section 37, says:

> There shall be appointed an officer who holds the rank of colonel or rank superior thereto in Her Majesty's regular army, who shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia, and who, while he holds such appointment, shall have the rank of major general in the militia, and shall be paid at the rate of four thousand dollars per annum in full of all pay and allowances.

Now let me quote the Order in Council which was passed appointing Lord Dundonald and which is to be found on the first page of the papers brought down a few days ago:

> On a memorandum dated May 17, 1902, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, stating that he duly received the Colonial Office cablegram, dated May 12, 1902, stating that Major-General O'Grady Haly's retention in the command of the Canadian Militia until July 19, next, was approved.
> The minister recommends that Major-General, the Earl of Dundonald, C.V.O., C.B., who has been selected by the home government, be appointed to the command of the Canadian militia, from July 20, 1902, with a salary of four thousand dollars a year, and allowances of two thousand dollars a year, as provided by the statutes.

Lord Dundonald was suggested to us by the imperial authorities. That is a course which has always been followed. We have always taken the selection offered us by the imperial authorities and in this case I am free to say that I felt glad of the selection of Lord Dundonald. Lord Dundonald has the honour of bearing a name which is not unknown in history. He bears a glorious name and one to which he himself has added much lustre by his own exertions. We thought that we would have a proper commander of the Canadian militia and one under whom the militia would be only too proud to serve. But, everything did not go as smoothly as could have been hoped. What was the cause ? Everything would have gone well and there would not have been any disturbance whatever and we would not have been in the painful position in which we were of having had to exercise one of the most extreme powers at our command, if Lord Dundonald had been satisfied with being the adviser of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence, and if he had not always had something behind and had not always been looking beyond his office. That is the true and only cause, as far as I can see it, of the difficulties that have arisen between Lord Dundonald and my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence. Lord Dundonald has told us more than once in the paper from which I quoted a moment ago that he had a policy. I want to know, Sir, what right has any commander of the forces to have a policy ? Lord Wellington, the most illustrious soldier that ever was at the head of a British army, Lord Wellington one of the greatest warriors that ever appeared in the world, Lord Wellington, perhaps the most successful general who ever fought at the head of an army, never had a policy so long as he was the commander of the forces. The only thing he had in mind, and his voluminous correspondence proves it, was to serve the government of which he was an official and a servant. Take the fourteen or fifteen volumes of his correspondence, peruse them page after page, and you will find that he always gave reports when he was asked for them, that he was most solicitious for the welfare of his soldiers, that he gave advice more than once, but whether his advice was heeded or refused, he did only one thing and that was to carry out the instructions which were given to him.

But, Sir, Lord Dundonald tells us that he had a policy. He tells us likewise that he had no intention of forcing his policy on the cabinet. He tells us several times—he recurs again and again to the same idea—that he had no intention of imposing his views on the cabinet. He says :

> In all of my work I have endeavoured to keep steadily in view the nature of my post. I have not sought to impose my policy upon the minister or upon the cabinet.

Later on he says :

> I had no desire to force my policy upon the ministry.

I do not question the sincerity of Lord Dundonald when he spoke thus, but when he tells us that he had no intention of imposing his views on the ministry, I say that to me there is evidence abundant in the paper which comes from his own pen that he misconceived his own mind in that regard, because Lord Dundonald tells us—and that is one of the grievances he has against the Minister of Militia, and one of the causes of difficulty that have led to this unfortunate conclusion—that he embodied his policy in his report and wanted it published. He had intended it, he says, 'for publication.' Again I ask what right has the General Officer Commanding the militia to write a report for publication ? And what right has he, and where shall we find that he has the power to write a report which he wants to have circulated in the press, debated on the platform, circulated all through the columns of publicity. Sir, the commander of the militia writes a report for his minister, and it is for his minister to decide whether that report is to be published or not to be published. But, Sir, I say this,—and this is a point at issue between the hon. gentlemen opposite and us ; they pretend on the other side, endorsing the policy of Lord Dundonald, that the Minister of Militia was bound to bring down the report which Lord Dundonald had intended for publication. I distinctly say : no ; I take issue with them on this point. I will leave this point aside for the present, but will revert to it later on, and shall substantiate my views by authority. But, Sir, before I depart from the subject let me say that it is with me a grievance against the General Officer Commanding—and again I say I would not say a harsh word against him under the painful circumstances which are his, I would not do a thing of that kind—but I have to say that one grievance which I for one have against the late commander of the forces is that in every possible way he sought to bring his views, the views which he had placed before the minister and which had not been accepted by him, before the public and to raise the issue which is now in question between him and the Minister of Militia. Why, Sir, in a speech which was delivered by Lord Dundonald the first of April, 1903, he referred to his views. He said :

> Though I have recommended certain steps which I think are necessary for the militia, I wish here emphatically to deny a falsehood current in certain papers, namely, that I was much annoyed that $12,000,000 was not provided in this year's estimates for the militia for capital expenditure. If $12,000,000 was provided at this moment I could not with the moderate proposals I made recommend its expenditure with advantage in a year. Such expenditure might well be spread over two or three years on that organization.

Here you have the fact that although the Minister of Militia had not been willing to accept the report of Lord Dundonald, to make it the basis of his policy or to bring it before parliament, yet Lord Dundonald proceeded to give to the public what was, at all events, the generic idea which he had in his mind with regard to the policy he wanted followed.

Let me leave this for a moment, although later I may return to it again. But I will ask a question here, and it is a question which I think is fair. What are the duties of the commander of the forces in Canada ? Sir, I think I can answer that in an easy way. Everybody will agree with me that the duties of the commander of the forces ought to be and are analogous to the duties of the commander of the forces in Great Britain. Upon this point, to be absolutely sure, I quote to the House an authority which will not be questioned, that is the authority of Todd on Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies. Speaking on our law, Todd says

By an amendment of the law, passed in 1875, it is enacted that there shall be appointed to command the militia of the Dominion of Canada an officer holding the rank of colonel, or superior rank thereto in Her Majesty's regular army, who shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia, and who, while holding such appointment, shall have the rank of major general in the militia. The duties of this officer are analogous to those performed in England by the Commander in Chief of the British army and he is, in like manner, subordinate to the civil power, and subject to the direction of the Governor General through the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Now, Sir, it will follow in sequence that I should quote to the House what are the duties of the commander of the forces in Great Britain. I cite now from Todd Parliamentary Government in England. Vol. 2, page 747:

On February 21, 1888, the following Orders in Council were passed concerning the office of Commander in Chief, the financial secretary, and the other heads of the military and civil departments.

The Commander in Chief.

As it is expedient to define the duties of the Commander in Chief, or of any other officer who may hereafter from time to time be appointed to the chief command of Her Majesty's forces, Her Majesty in Council is pleased to order that—subject to the approval of the Secretary of State for War, and to his responsibility for the administration of the royal authority and prerogative in respect of the army—the said officer shall be charged with the command, discipline, distribution, military education, training, and efficiency of the officers, warrant officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the regular and reserve forces and militia of the United Kingdom, and of the yeomanry and volunteer force of the United Kingdom when subject to military law or when assembled for training, exercise, inspection, or voluntary military duty ; with enlisting men for, and discharging men from, the regular and auxiliary forces with the selection of fit and proper persons to be recommended to Her Majesty for appointment to commissions in the regular forces, and with the submission to Her Majesty of qualified persons recommended for appointment to commissions in the auxiliary forces ; with the selection of fit and proper officers, whether of the regular or auxiliary forces, for promotion, for staff and other military appointments, and for military honours and rewards ; with obtaining, holding and issuing to all branches of the regular and auxiliary forces, food, forage, fuel and light, clothing, arms, accoutrements, munitions of war, and all other stores necessary for the efficient performance of their duties, by such forces, of proper quality and pattern, and in proper quantities, according to the regulations governing the provision, custody, and issue of such supplies, and with exercising a strict control over the expenditure of such supplies ; with the construction, maintenance, and custody of all fortifications, works, and buildings, and charge of all lands, belonging to the War Department, and with allotting quarters ; with the provision and maintenance of horses and transports for the troops, and directing land and water transport ; with the collection and record of strategical and other information, including topography, in relation to the military circumstances of this and other countries ; with the preparation and maintenance of detailed plans for the mobilization of the regular and auxiliary forces ; with preparing the estimates for all the above services ; and with the duty of rendering such advice and assistance on military affairs as may be required of him by the Secretary of State for War——

I call the attention of the House to the concluding words :

—and with the duty of rendering such advice and assistance on military affairs as may be required of him.

Not as he may choose to offer himself but as may be required of him, and the difference between the duties which are imposed upon the commander of the forces in Great Britain, and the duties which are to be performed by Lord Dundonald according to his own conception was, that he was not to wait until he was asked to give advice, but he was to proffer advice to the Minister of Militia, which the Minister of Militia was bound to accept whether he approved of it or not. Let me go a point further.

I know—and it is heralded by the press which supports hon. gentlemen opposite—that a crime has been charged against my hon. friend the Minister of Militia—a grave offence has been put upon his shoulders—because he has refused to accept the advice of Lord Dundonald, and has refused to bring that advice before parliament. It was stated in the House yesterday, and I believe it has been repeated to-day, that it was the bounden duty of the Minister of Militia, as soon as he was given that report by Lord Dundonald, to bring it before parliament—that if he failed to do so, he failed to comply with the law of parliament. Sir, nothing could be more in contravention of the law of parliament than such a doctrine. I assert, Sir, as a principle of parliamentary law, that all reports which are sent to the government or to the head of any department by subordinates, unless they relate to mere questions of fact and routine and the every day transactions of the department—that all reports in which are implied questions of policy—are from their very nature confidential, and remain confidential until in the judgment of the minister they become the contrary. This is a broad statement to make, perhaps, but I make it on authority. I have already quoted Todd, who is acknowledged to be the best writer on this subject. Let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to what he says on this point:

> The system of laying upon the table of the House reports from officers addressed to particular departments of the executive government is most objectionable. And the House ought not to insist 'upon the production of papers and correspondence which concerned the preparation and preliminary consideration of measures; they would thereby put a stop to that freedom of criticism which was always invited on such occasions, and which contributed so much to the perfection of public measures.' If the House were to insist upon the production of such documents, instead of the government getting what we get now, confidential reports, containing the most minute details of the opinion of officers, given frankly and freely, for the heads of departments, we shall have a system of reports framed for laying upon the table of the House of Commons, and those will be accompanied by 'confidential reports for the head of the department alone.' There have been cases in which reports of a confidential character from officers of the government have been laid upon the table of the House, to prepare the public mind, and also that of parliament, to consent to some large measure, or perhaps some considerable vote of public money; but, generally I think it is a course which the House ought not to sanction.'

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the right hon. gentleman say whether that is Todd in Canada?

Sir WILRID LAURIER. No, that is Todd in England. That is not simply the opinion of Todd. It is a series of quotations from speeches delivered in parliament by the great leaders who have brought the law of parliament from time to time up to its present perfection. The last quotation of all is from Mr. Disraeli, who says:

> There have been cases in which reports of a confidential character from officers of the government have been laid upon the table of the House to prepare the public mind, and also that of parliament, to consent to some large measure, or perhaps some considerable vote of public money.

This would have been the case here. The report of Lord Dundonald, I understand, would have been a preparation for a large expenditure of public money; but Mr. Disraeli said:

> But generally I think it is a course which the House ought not to sanction.

There is implied in this that such a report might be brought down at some time; but this is a matter of governmental responsibility, on which parliament is to depend, unless there is a vote of censure. But the minister is absolutely free to follow his own opinion in this respect, and not to follow the dictum of the gentleman who is appointed as his adviser.

I may be told that this is antiquated law. Well, there is something more recent than that, which I now give to the House. I have stated that though the question of supremacy as between the military and the civil power in England has been settled more than a hundred years ago, and settled in favour of the civil power, still every now and then there is an attempt made to revive the old rule and to bring back the military power in control. Not later than two years ago, there was at the head of the army in Great Britain a gentleman who has left a record dear to the hearts of Canadians—Lord Wolseley. He was the Commander in Chief; and strange to say—or perhaps I should say, natural to say—even such a soldier as Lord Wolseley, a man acknowledged to be prudent in his course and in his views, had a difference of opinion with the Secretary of State for war. He offered advice to the Secretary of State for War, and the Secretary of State for War, like my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, would not follow that advice. Then Lord Wolseley did what I think Lord Dundonald, if he had been better advised, should have done also: he placed his resignation in the hands of the government. If Lord Dundonald had followed that course—and he says he had the idea in his mind—if, instead of taking the violent, the extreme, the unpardonable course of committing a breach of discipline, he had resigned, and placed his resignation on paper, he could have brought before parliament everything he wanted to bring. It could not have been pigeon-holed, as he suggested, but it would have been brought before the House, and the House could have judged of it. Lord Wolseley took the better course of resigning, and some time afterwards on the floor of the House of Lords, he gave expression to his views. On the 4th March, 1901, he addressed the House of Lords and criticised the administration of the War Office, and the nature of the relationship between the Commander in Chief and Secretary of State for War. Lord Lansdowne, who was the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, replied in the House of Lords, and made use of the following language, which will be found in the Parliamentary Debates, 4th series, Vol. 90, page 356:—

> In another part of the statement of the noble Viscount, he told the House that he thought it was extremely necessary in the interests of public safety, that when the Commander in Chief and the Secretary of State for war were unable to agree, the public should be taken into our confidence, and that we should leave the public, as it were, to choose between the two.

I am afraid that that is somewhat a council of perfection. Does the noble and gallant Viscount think that the government of this country would be possible, that the administration of the War Office would be practicable, if, whenever the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief were not at one, their arguments were to be publicly paraded and to form the subject of controversies in the press or on the platform. I cannot conceive a more fatal arrangement than that there should be disputes of this kind in the eye of the public. The noble and gallant Viscount is a great supporter of a very popular institution called the Military Tournament. I should be very sorry if the Secretary of State were obliged to take part in a military tournament of the kind which the noble and gallant Viscount suggests.

Now I pause and ask the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite : Is not the language of Lord Lansdowne applicable, in every particular to the case we have in hand ? If you substitute for Lord Wolseley, Lord Dundonald, and for the Secretary of State for War, the Canadian Minister of Militia, you have our case in every particular. The following day the debate was participated in by Lord Salisbury, and I commend the language of Lord Salisbury as that of one who has always been noted for his Conservative tendencies and strong, rugged common sense. This is what he said :

It is said of a certain class of correspondent that the important observation always comes at the end. I think that applies to the speech of the noble and gallant Viscount. He told us, not as one of the main points on which he was insisting, but as something which occurred to him at the end, and which ought to be mentioned before he sat down, what was his solution of any difficulties that might arise if the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State were not of the same mind. I think he puzzled the House. He said we were to take the people into our confidence, and to tell the press what we thought, and then the question at issue was to be discussed openly. How you were to decide which party was to be victorious, I do not know, but the result of the battle royal was to determine the particular decision on which the office was divided. I allude to this because I think it is a matter which is really at the bottom of our difficulty. I do not think the disputants, especially if they are military disputants, have entirely realized that the army is under parliament and that the minister who controls the army does it as one who is responsible to parliament and represents all the authority which parliament possesses. Unless you keep that steadily in mind, no doubt you will see many anomalies in our military system, and its relations to the civil power. But it is no use comparing our army with the army of France or of America, or of Germany or of Russia. They all differ in that one point, that the parliamentary system of governing the army does not exist among them. We must accommodate ourselves to the present state of things. Everybody knows historically how it has grown up, and everybody knows that it is intertwined too closely with all the fibres of our constitution to justify any one who forms his projects and bases his reasoning on the supposition that this relation can be modified. At the end we must have an army governed by parliament, governed by a minister who is responsible to parliament, and in any difference of opinion, whatever it may be, the Commander in Chief must be a subordinate of the Secretary of State.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (reading)—

Military men may not like that, but there it is. It is one of the bed rock circumstances of the situation, something from which you cannot depart ; and you must devote your hands to making it work and it has worked in the main hitherto very well.

Yes, I think it has worked very well in England.

And take care that it produces in the future, as it has produced in the past, results which it would have been impossible to produce in any foreign country. I feel that this debate will be lost upon us unless we take care to guide ourselves by that chief and predominant principle. In speech after speech from military men, men who know the language and spirit of the War Office, it is easy to detect a desire that military problems shall only be solved by military men ; but any attempt to take the opinion of the expert above the opinion of the politician must, in view of all the circumstances of our constitution, inevitably fail. It must not be supposed that in such contests the expert must win. In all these discussions there is an evident and growing desire to shake free of this necessity. I thought I traced it even in the peroration of the noble Earl, although I am sure he is too good and constitutional a statesman to entertain any idea that the existing system can be radically changed. That is where the shoe pinches—that the men who know, or who ought to know, namely, the experts, are not the men to decide the dispute in question ; but the decision, if it accords with their view at all, must be brought about by the concession of the civilian and the politician.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If this doctrine had been asserted by me, without saying from whom it came, there would have been a howl from the other side. But this is the true constitutional doctrine. I was told this afternoon that I was a separatist, that my heart was not with British institutions. Sir, I am proud to say once more, as I have said many times that from my boyhood I have been a true adherent of British institutions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I say more, I claim that I understand—and in saying this I do not think I am boasting—British institutions far better than many hon. gentlemen on the other side who try to assail me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When Viscount Wolseley had a difference with the War Office and wanted to bring that difference before parliament and the people, and allow the people to judge between the two, what did the War Office decide ? It decided that Viscount Wolseley, illustrious general as he is, was subordinate to the civil power, and that if the views he submitted to the civil power were not acceptable, there was no help for it and he had to submit. Sir, we assert nothing else in this matter. But I will say more. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia, in his anxiety to do the best he could for the militia, went further than anybody in his position would have gone in England. He submitted last year to the opposition a proposition both wise and patriotic. He stated to the opposition that he had received a plan which he did not endorse, and which, in his opinion, it would be a grevious mistake to make public. But as perhaps there might be some good in it, he offered to hon. gentlemen opposite to have a committee formed, on which they would be represented, so that both sides might examine into this plan, but because there were things in it which it would not be wise to divulge to the world, the proceedings of that committee should not be made public, but be kept secret. This offer was not accepted last year. but nobody then made it a grievance against my hon. friend that he did not parade before the whole world not only our resources, but our weaknesses as well, and under the circumstances it seems to me that the position taken by the government to-day is absolute unassailable. It also seems to me that the position taken by Lord Dundonald cannot be justified from the point of view of constitutional government. What Lord Dundonald wanted was to assert the supremacy of the military power over the civil ; but, as my hon. friend the Minister of Militia said yesterday, so long at all events as there is a Liberal government in Canada, the civil power shall rule over the military.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let me now pass to another subject which has been the proximate cause of all the difficulties between Lord Dundonald and the Minister of Militia. I refer to the recommendations which were sent to Council by the Department of Militia for the organization of the 13th Scottish Light Dragoons. On the 19th of May, Lord Dundonald signed a recommendation to Council. That recommendation came back from Council with a name erased by a member of the cabinet. This seems to have been in the eyes of Lord Dundonald a most grievous offence. I do not wish to say anything offensive; but, if I am to construe according to what seems to me the only sense possible, the speech which was delivered in Montreal some few days ago, Lord Dundonald regarded it as an offence that, he having put his pen to a document, anybody else should put his pen to that document afterwards ; he having stated that such and such appointments should be made, those appointments should stand whether they were good or whether they were bad. Now, some time ago I stated in the House that Lord Dundonald having so recently come to the country and never having been in the eastern townships could not know the men he was recommending. I speak under correction ; he may have known one or two, but I doubt if he knew more. I doubt, if he knew, for instance, Dr. Pickel. When the recommendation came to Council from Lord Dundonald, it was known to every man in the Council that Lord Dundonald had taken his information second hand, that he must have received from somebody recommendations as to these appointments. He tells us that he had got it from the gentleman whom he had entrusted with the recruiting of the regiment. So far so good. But, if there was at the Council a gentleman who could say : I come from the part of the country where this regiment is to be recruited ; I know the gentlemen whose names appear on the list and I approve of all of them except one ; this one, Dr. Pickel, in my estimation is not qualified for the position to which it is proposed to appoint him ; he has never taken an interest in the militia and I assert that it is not right, it is not conducive to the best interest of the regiment and of the militia that this gentleman, who has no military qualification, should be put in such an important post as major ;—if there were at the Council a gentleman able to speak such words with the authority of local knowledge, will any hon. gentleman on the other side say that it was an offence against the dignity of Lord Dundonald for the Council to be influenced by such representations? Will any hon. gentleman say that it was not, I will not say the right only, but the duty of that hon. gentleman to declare his honest convictions ? Yet the head and front of the Minister of Agriculture's offending had this extent, no more.

Sir, I will not go into the minute, petty question whether or not my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture had the right to sign that document for the Minister of Militia. I see before me my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) ; he is an old parliamentarian, and he knows that every day a colleague signs for a colleague and that the recommendation so signed goes before the Council and is dealt with by the Council. That ought to be a sufficient answer to such petty, miserable criticism. But, there is something more. Wonders will never cease,—the once proud Conservative party, in their downward career, have come to this—that yesterday we heard from one of the leaders of that party, my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) a declaration that the General Officer Commander should be given carte blanche. The General Officer Commanding, is appointed by this government and occupies a subordinate position. But, according to the hon. gentleman he should be given carte blanche and whatever he does should be accepted; the minister and the cabinet should be simply recording clerks of his will. And this is the policy of the once great Conservative party. My reading of history has informed me—and no doubt my hon. friend from Victoria, N.S., who is an old veteran in the cause of reform, has the recollection that there was a time in Canada when we had militia authorities to govern us. Those were the old times of the Family Compact, when the military authorities were surrounded by a crowd of sycophants and minions, who could dispose of the public domain for their own benefit and that of their favourites. I do not know how the new doctrine will strike the whole province of Ontario. But if the names of Brown and Mackenzie have not been erased from the memory of the people there, I can imagine how the Grits of Ontario will receive it. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier went even further. Having stated that we should give carte blanche to the General Officer Commanding, he went on to the conclusion, which was inevitable from his premises, that we had acted very wrongly in relieving Lord Dundonald of his command. He went further still; he told us that the treatment which we had meted out to Lord Dundonald was harsh and cruel. How harsh and cruel? That it was painful to those who had to inflict it is undoubted; but if it could have been avoided, I confess I do not see how. We were told to-day that we might have done in the case of Lord Dundonald what was done in the case of Lord Charles Beresford. Certainly we might, if the cases had been alike. If, like Lord Charles Beresford, Lord Dundonald had apologized for his conduct, certainly we would have treated him as Lord Charles Beresford was treated. Lord Charles Beresford had written a letter which was published without his consent and he so declared. But Lord Dundonald went to Montreal for the very purpose of bringing on this scandal. Therefore, there was nothing to do but what we did. For our course we have abundance of authority in the mother country. Only two years ago, just after the conclusion of the South African war, General Colville had a disagreement with some of his brother officers. He was charged with not having done his full duty under certain circumstances in South Africa, and with having left a certain portion of the army in great distress, whereas, if he had been more active and determined he might have relieved it. The War Office took a lenient view of the accusations against General Colville. They did not dismiss him; they did not deprive him of his rank; they gave him a command in Gibraltar. But when General Colville had been given this new command he made the great mistake of going before the public, of writing for publication in the press, commenting upon those who had brought the accusations against him. And what happened then? He was at once relieved of his command. The debate upon the subject is instructive. The War Office had taken a lenient view of General Colville's case. But, when he sought to bring his complaint before the tribunal of public opinion, instead of laying it before the Commander in Chief, the measure of his offences was full. The matter was brought before parliament by Mr. Charles Douglas. I quote from the speech of that gentleman as reported in 'Hansard' page 1251:

> A very considerable prejudice had been created against General Colville by the fact that he had published in the newspapers a statement of his treatment by the War Office. He did not defend that action of General Colville's. It was most desirable and necessary that they should uphold and fortify the great traditions of army reticence. Sometimes it led to hardship, but it was essential to discipline, and more than ever necessary now in view of the extreme activity displayed by the newspapers. He did not defend General Colville's action, but hoped the House would allow him to submit one or two considerations in regard to it. In the first place reticence could not be all on one side. If their generals were never to take means of vindicating themselves publicly, then he ventured to think that a little reticence should be observed by the War Office.
> When General Colville returned to this country the first thing he saw was a newspaper paragraph which was obviously inspired.

Now mark the answer which was made by Mr. Brodrick, Secretary of State for War:

> The question is whether a public stigma would have been put upon General Colville. That is what I wished to avoid. After that General Colville's action cannot be defended by any one. He left for England. He did not avail himself of his right of appeal to the Commander in Chief. He made no representations to the War Office. He immediately published what he called a justification, but which consisted rather of an attack upon the staff officers in the Transvaal; and which also included, I regret to say, what appeared to be some ungenerous sneers against the cavalry whom he had found it impossible to relieve. And obviously it is impossible that officers, whether on the full paylist or the half paylist, should be allowed to make reflections on their superiors as General Colville did. He was placed on retired pay, and any officer who follows his example will necessarily share the same fate.

Sir, it seems to me this is conclusive, and is the fullest justification that can be offered to the House of the painful course we had to take against so distinguished an officer as Lord Dundonald. I am free to say, even at this moment, after all the painful explanations we have had, after the indiscretions committed by Lord Dundonald, that for my part I look back with extreme regret upon the lack of judgment which has impelled Lord Dundonald so far to forget himself, so far to forget his position, so far to forget what was due to him and to his command, as to take the course he did. But law must be maintained, law exists for everybody, military law as well as civil law; and military law ought to be observed above all others by the general who is at the head of the militia. Further upon this point I have no more to say.

Now I may be allowed perhaps to do what I very seldom do. I may be allowed to say a word about myself personally. Some days ago, speaking in this House, I made use of an expression which was not in my mind but which came to my lips. I corrected it immediately. The word which I had in my mind was the word 'stranger' but I used another word. Sir, in my experience of many years I have never heard it called in question until to-day that a man may not be allowed an opportunity to correct a slip of the tongue. I have heard slips of the tongue more than once, I have heard one to-day, I heard one yesterday, some gentlemen using the words 'Minister of Agriculture' when he wanted to say 'Minister of Militia,' another saying 'Minister of Militia' when he wanted to say 'Minister of Agriculture.' These mistakes will occur. A man may want to speak of the city of Toronto, and may say the city of Montreal. But according to the new code of ethics which I find on the other side of the House, no man is to be allowed to correct any slip of that kind. Sir, I bow to this new law—which I hope, however, will never be the law on this side of the House, a law which we will never apply to the other side. I bow to it, but I wish to say to these gentlemen on the other side of the House whom I see before me and who call me to account for having had the misfortune, nay, not the misfortune, but the mere accident of slip of the tongue. I say to them: Let he who is without sin cast the first stone. Sir, I have been told that my meaning was contemplated, was offensive and insulting. I have been in this House for many years, I have seen some of the veterans of former combats pass away, I have been engaged in combats with some of them, I have fought a good many hard struggles, but I am not conscious in all the years of my life, in all the struggles in which I have been engaged with gentlemen on the other side of the House, I am not conscious that I ever deliberately used an offensive word towards any man or towards any class. I never sought a fight, but I was never afraid of a fight. Whenever I had to fight, I think it will be admitted by friend and foe that I always fought with fair weapons. I have been told to-day on the floor of this House twice that when I used the word 'foreigner' there was in my heart a sinster motive, there was in my heart a feeling which found expression. Sir, I have only this to say. I disdain to make reply to such an insinuation. If sixty years of what I believe to be after all an honourable life, a life which has certainly been one of loyal devotion to British institutions, is not a sufficient answer to such an insinuation, I will not attempt to make an answer. I have been told in the press, not in this House, that the word which I substituted for the word I used, the word 'stranger' which I substituted, was just as offensive and insulting as the other. Well, Sir, I do not pretend to be a master of the English language, but I do claim, without I think undue boasting, to have some knowledge of it. When I saw in the press that the word 'stranger' which I had applied to Lord Dundonald was offensive and insulting, I must confess that I was surprised, and I proceeded to brush up my literature; I went to the sources, I went to the dictionary as the first source, I went to the latest dictionary, the Standard, to find the definition of the word 'stranger.' Like many other words in the English language, like many other words in the French language, like many other words in the Latin language, and probably in all the languages, this word has more than one signification. Here they are:

> Stranger. 1. One is not an acquaintance; a person unknown; as, I was accosted by a stranger.
> 2. One not a member of the household; a visitor; guest; as, children should not talk when strangers are at the table. 3. A person coming from another country or a distant region; a foreigner; also, a person coming from another place, though in the same country; as, he had the air of a stranger; a stranger in a strange land. 4. One unacquainted or unfamiliar with something specified; one not versed or experienced; one mentally or spiritually remote; with to; as, he is a stranger to learning and culture. 5. Law. Any person who is neither a party to a transaction nor privy to it.

The Standard Dictionary quotes General Grant, speaking of his appointment to the army of the Potomac in the spring of 1864, saying:

> I was a stranger to most of the army of the Potomac; I might say to all except the officers of the regular army who have served in the Mexican war.

Very few researches brought to me an abundance of precedents. In the 'Story of the Revolution' Henry Cabot Lodge, the author, speaking of a visit by Washington coming from Virginia to Massachusetts, says:

> The people were evidently with him. They looked upon him as he rode down the lines and were content. The popular movement had found its leader and the popular instinct recognized him. Yet, Washington came to the men of New England a 'stranger.'

But, I am accustomed to the loyalty of hon. gentleman on the other side of which we have had such evidence to-day. Perhaps they will not accept these American writers. Let us come back then to British authors, and if there is an opinion which ought to be apposite in a matter of this kind, since I am told that I have insulted my fellow countrymen of the Scottish race, let me quote from Sir Walter Scott. We find in his book 'The Pirate' that, speaking of a Mr. Mertoum, an Englishman who was visiting the Shetland Islands, he says :

No one asked him whence he came, where he was going, what was his purpose in visiting so remote a corner of the empire, or what was likely to be the term of his stay. He arrived a perfect stranger, yet was instantly overpowered by a succession of invitations.

But, that is not all. Let us come nearer home. I have here in my hands the life of Lord Lawrence by Sir Richard Temple. In one of the chapters Sir Richard Temple speaks of the difficulties of every new viceroy sent from England to India. He says :

Usually a new Viceroy and Governor General is, on landing in India, really new in every sense. The European officers, the Native princes, chiefs and people, are strangers to him as he is personally unknown to them.

Here we are very near home when we are in another portion of the British empire, but let us come to Canada itself. There have been commanding officers of the militia before Lord Dundonald. There was one in 1875. His name was Sir Selby Smith. He wrote a report to the Minister of Militia of that day which is to be found in a blue-book of 1875 and here it is :

Headquarters, Ottawa,
January, 1875.

The Hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence, &c., &c, &c.

Sir,—The Militia Reports which have been presented to parliament for several years past, have treated exhaustively the question of its organization and development.

It will therefore be my duty to confine myself to a few condensed remarks, as to the probable improvement of the Dominion forces.

I approach the subject with hesitation, having so recently arrived for the first time in Canada. I would hardly do so at all, but from the experience gained in my late journey through the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

To Nova Scotia and New Brunswick I am still a stranger.

Now, Sir, it seems to me that my vindication ought to be complete, but I know that to-morrow and the day after to-morrow and every day and every week and every month, so long as there are some of those instincts which are now prevalent, in order to defeat a fair opponent, I shall be traduced before my fellow countrymen as having tried to malign and insult them.

Mr. SPROULE. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, there is an echo.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame, shame.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let me say this to that hon. gentleman that I am familiar with these appeals to passion and prejudice. In my own province——

Mr. SPROULE. I want to tell the right hon. gentleman that I have never appealed to passion or prejudice——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. SPROULE—to race or religion and I defy him or any man to say that I have done so, I do not care who he is.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In my own province the allies of the hon. gentleman, those who fight with him, have traduced me for years as a traitor to my race and religion. But, the cry is getting stale and a new one has to be invented. I have no more fear of this one than I had of the other. My experience has convinced me, my experience has proved to me that in this good land of Canada, in all sections thereof, in all classes thereof, in all races thereof, in all creeds thereof appeals to prejudice may create a flurry of excitement but they will invariably end in producing nothing but contempt in the hearts and minds of an intelligent and honest people.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). The taunt has been thrown across the floor of the House several times by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that we have forsaken the cause of Lord Dundonald, that we have nothing to say in his defence. Let me say at the very outset of the few remarks which I am to offer to the House that Lord Dundonald needs no defence from me or from any member of this House especially from this side of the House. The name of Lord Dundonald to-day has become a household word in almost every house in the Dominion of Canada. His defence is in the mouth of every patriotic, loyal and unbiased citizen of this country. Sir, we are now in the times when our young men assemble in the camps, and I have no doubt that every evening around the camp fire the youth of this country are discussing this question and that there are very few if there are any at all of the members of the militia force so assembled in camp who have not the praises of Lord Dundonald on their lips. But, Sir, coming from the province of Quebec, not at all that I believe I represent the province of Quebec, but, I am sure I represent the vast majority of those from the province of Quebec who are members of the militia when I say that if Lord Dundonald's praise is in the mouth of everybody outside of the province of Quebec that same praise is in the mouths of those who form the portion of the militia in the province of Quebec. I have taken particular pains to question my fellow countrymen, not now, but ever since Dundonald has had anything to do with the militia of Canada and the reply which I have received from the French Canadian officers has been that he has been the best commander in chief of the forces that they ever had.

Sir, he has always made himself especially agreeable to the French Canadian officers, speaking their language to them and showing them every mark of confidence and courtesy which one gentleman could show to another. I was struck by one part of the speech made by the right hon. gentleman, the lesson he read to the Minister of Militia and Defence. Last evening the Minister of Militia and Defence spoke of Lord Dundonald but did not at all speak in those terms which the right hon. the leader of the House has employed this evening. On the contrary I must say that I was pained at the tone used by the Minister of Militia, and I can see no better campaign literature for this party than to distribute all through Canada the speech made last night by the Minister of Militia. If I had anything to do with the organization of the party I would have that speech printed by the thousand and distributed all over the Dominion. What do we find ? We find the Minister of Militia constantly contrasting the nobleman, the patrician, with the humble colonial and the plebeian. It seems to me that it comes with very bad grace from the mouth of the Minister of Militia and Defence who not long ago, received the decoration of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, and wears upon his breast the star of that order, and is entitled to be called to-day 'Sir Frederick Borden.' I do not see why these sneers are cast upon the British aristocracy and especially upon Lord Dundonald because the Minister of Militia must have remembered that while it is true that Lord Dundonald was born a nobleman, he has also carved with his sword a great name upon the annals of the empire. Sir, I am an admirer of the British aristocracy. Whilst in other countries the scions of great houses seem to have forgotten the role they are called upon to play in the different vocations in which they should be engaged, in Great Britain, on the contrary, the heirs of the great names have remained faithful to the traditions of their race, and whether it be in peace or war, we find these great men taking their share either in defending the country in time of war or conducting its councils in time of peace.

Another insinuation which my hon. friend threw across the floor of the House against Lord Dundonald was that probably the action which he had seen fit to take when he made his speech at Montreal, knowing that in consequence of that speech he would probably have to separate himself from the militia of Canada was due to the fact that there was a scheme shortly to be placed before parliament by which the office of Commander in Chief was to be abolished. As if Lord Dundonald was to be influenced in any of his actions by the paltry salary of $4,000 which the country had been paying him for his valuable services ! Then again I was pained to hear the Minister of Militia making another insinuation and a more serious one against the noble lord the late General Officer Commanding, when he insinuated, speaking of the ordnance department, in the two cases of Lieutenant-Colonel Roy and Lieutenant-Colonel Bélanger, that probably it was on account of their nationality, of their being French Canadians, that he complained of their elevation to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. I think this was an unworthy insinuation, unworthy of my hon. friend and of the position which he occupies. My hon. friend growing eloquent just now, in speaking of arousing race prejudices, accused this side of the House of having done that. I would like to know what the Minister of Militia had in mind, and what the editors of the government organs have in mind, when they incite these animosities and say that one of the motives of Lord Dundonald in this case was that he made a difference between a French Canadian officer and an officer of another origin. It seems to me that the strong point of the government on which they have rested their case, was that Lord Dundonald was guilty of a gross breach of discipline in making the speech he did. These are the regulations of the British army which govern the British forces. The minister when he quoted these regulations was quoting something absolutely outside the case of Lord Dundonald. The regulation says :

> The regulations of the British army, which govern the Canadian force in all matters not specially provided for, prohibit 'deliberations or discussion by officers of soldiers with the object of conveying praise, censure, or any mark of approbation towards their superiors or any others in His Majesty's service.'
> The regulations for the militia of Canada lay down the rule that 'it cannot be permitted that (officers) shall bring accusations against superior officers or comrades.

What is meant here by 'superior officers?' Not the Minister of Militia, not any minister, but a superior officer in military command, because this word is certainly limited by the next words 'or comrades' which means comrades in arms, and I would like to know whether the Minister of Agriculture was the superior officer of Lord Dundonald on that occasion. Let me read this part of the Order in Council again.

> The regulation for the militia of Canada lay down the rule that 'it cannot be permitted that (officers) shall bring accusations against superior officers or comrades before the tribunal of public opinion, either by speech or letters inserted in any newspaper ; such a proceeding would be in glaring violation of the rules of military discipline, and in contempt of authority.'

If these are the rules which are to govern this case, is it not a fact that at every military banquet which the minister attends where officers laud the minister for what he has done for the militia, they should be summarily dismissed by this government? It shows that these regulations quoted in the Order in Council and again to-night, are absolutely beside the mark and have absolutely nothing to do with the case in point. They have to rest their case on this flimsy argument which cannot stand the light of the least examination for one minute. My hon. friend has tried to define the duties and obligations of the officer commanding from English authority. No hon. member on this side enunciated the extreme doctrine which my hon. friend tried to put in the mouths of hon. gentlemen on this side this afternoon that the General Officer Commanding was delegated here from the British government to represent the British government in matters military. Nobody on this side ever heard of such a doctrine. No newspaper or organ on this side ever promulgated such a proposition before the patient people of this country. The duties of the General Officer Commanding are laid down in the statute which my hon. friend quoted this evening. The statute says:

There shall be appointed an officer who holds the rank of colonel or rank superior thereto in Her Majesty's regular army, who shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia, and who, while he holds such appointment, shall have the rank of major general in the militia, and shall be paid at the rate of four thousand dollars per annum in full of all pay and allowances.

Now, Sir, the ground I take is this, that the General Officer Commanding is an expert adviser whom this government appoints in order to get advice on military matters which concern this country—upon the defence of the country, and upon all matters which relate to the organization and maintenance of the military force of the country. He is not to be here simply as a machine to follow the dictates of this one or that one. He must have some discretion. He is not, as I stated before, an employee of the government. He is a high officer of this government, with functions which have always been recognized, and are recognized to-day. I think Lord Dundonald had an absolutely correct idea of his duties when he said in his statement:

In all of my work I have endeavoured to keep steadily in view the nature of my post. I have not sought to impose my policy upon the minister or upon the cabinet. I have sought to carry out the plans approved by the government. In the technical administration of the force I held that I should be given a fairly free hand.

Not the control, as the Minister of Militia said last night, but simply a fairly free hand in the technical administration of the affairs of the militia.

At the same time I was careful to ascertain and consider the views of all persons interested. I claimed a smaller measure of freedom than is accorded to the general managers of important commercial companies. To make a railway pay it is necessary to leave detail matters of administration largely to the expert official in charge of the system. The managing of a military force is expert work, and the safety of the country is surely as important as the success of a railway. My claim for freedom extended only to the technical side of my work. I had no desire to force my policy upon the ministry.

Now, Sir, was any fact given in this House yesterday or to-day which shows that Lord Dundonald went beyond what he conceived to be his duty, and what was laid down as his duty in plain words? In this statement which he issued to the press there is not a tittle of evidence that he ever did anything which could be classed among acts of insubordination or disobedience to his minister, or which clashed with the authority of the head of his department. A good deal has been said yesterday and to-day with regard to the suppression of the second part of his report of 1902, and the minister's dealings with the report of 1902 and 1903. The leader of the House gave an altogether different reason for holding that those reports should not be published. He did not take the ground which the hon. Minister of Militia took last evening; but he went to a good deal of pains to quote authorities to show that those reports were confidential documents, and could not be laid on the table of the House except with the permission of the minister in charge of the department, in this case the Minister of Militia and Defence. He quoted from page 442 of Todd on 'Parliamentary Government in England.' I will not make the whole quotation again, but I will quote this much:

The system of laying upon the table of the House reports from officers addressed to particular departments of the executive government is most objectionable.' And the House ought not to insist 'upon the production of papers and correspondence which concerned the preparation and preliminary consideration of measures; they would thereby put a stop to that freedom of criticism which was always invited on such occasions, and which contributed so much to the perfection of public measures.'

Again my right hon. friend is beside the mark. These remarks do not at all apply to departmental reports in the sense that they are in the blue-books and are each year put upon the table of the House. You have only to refer to two pages before to see that these remarks refer to 'the practice in regard to the granting or withholding by the executive of information desired by either House of parliament.' When a motion is made in the House for the production of a document, the government on certain occasions is authorized and empowered to withhold the document on the ground that it may contain confidential or secret information, or information which it would not be in the interest of the public to lay before the House. This does not apply to reports which the minister is obliged each year to lay before the House. Why, the very Militia Act, which enacts that a commander-in-chief shall be appointed, contains the following in section 126 :—

All regulations made under this Act, and an annual report of the state of the militia, shall be laid before parliament by the Minister of Militia and Defence, within the first thirty days of the then next session thereof.

My right hon. friend says that even before this report could be handed to the minister, it should be asked ; but the statute says the contrary. I take the right hon. gentleman's word on a great many occasions as laying down the correct law, but when I find him in direct contradiction to the statute, I say he must be wrong. It was the bounden duty of the Minister of Militia and Defence, within the first thirty days of the session, to lay the report of the department before parliament ; and how is this report made up ? It is made up of the report of the General Officer Commanding and the heads of the different branches of the department, just as the report of any other department is made up. Therefore the argument of my right hon. friend falls to the ground. This is not the ground that the Minister of Militia took last evening. The ground he took was that this was a confidential, private or secret report ; and he said the same thing last session. He gave as his reasons for not producing the second part of the report of 1902 that it was a secret and confidential report. I say that argument is not correct. The report itself not only was not marked private, but by its very nature it was intended for pub lication. My hon. friend founded the principal argument he made upon the fact that the covering letter by which the report was sent to the minister was marked private, and he quoted this letter to show that the report itself must also have been private. Let me read some of these extracts again in order to show that the ground falls from under the feet of my right hon. friend. This is what the General Officer Commanding said :

Creichton Lodge,
Ottawa, Jan. 29, 1903.

'Private.'

Dear Sir Frederick,—I am sending you with this my report for the year 1902. I only received the last of the sub-reports to me last Saturday—there has been, as you are aware, a great deal of work involved, first in becoming acquainted with the system, then in discovering its weakness, then in suggesting remedies for improvement.

Exactly what the statute enacts that he should do. He is bound to describe the condition of the militia at the time he makes his report. He goes on to say :

I hope that the recommendations I make will commend themselves to you. I think they will, as from our conversations I believe we agree on many essential points. I don't think the country can obtain a cheaper or more efficient system for money expended than the one outlined if only you can see your way to get it adopted and the proper funds voted.

I am still confined to the house but hope to get out to-morrow and shall look forward to seeing you Monday at latest if convenient to you.

This letter was marked 'private' because it was intended for Sir Frederick Borden alone and not for his department. But to argue that because this letter was marked 'private,' the report itself was private and confidential is presuming rather much on the lack of intelligence of this House. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia last evening tried to make us believe, from reading these letters, that the general had consented to the suppression of part 2nd of his report. After stating his case, he said :

Now that is the record. Does that record bear out the statement which this right hon. gentleman has seen fit to make in this address of his to the people of Canada ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Who says yes ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do.

I was bold enough to say that the record bore out the statement which Lord Dundonald had made in what my hon. friend calls his address to the people of Canada. Why, all through these letters, the general discusses the question of the publishing of his report. Here is a letter dated the 31st of January, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, in which he said :

Dear Lord Dundonald,—I have carefully read your very interesting and able report. I don't know whether you intend Part II to form part of the annual report of the Minister of Militia and Defence for this year (i.e. 1902), but I am afraid it would not do to put forward a scheme which has not yet been considered as a whole even by the minister and of which the other members of the cabinet have as yet had absolutely no opportunity of knowing anything. Besides, there is the very grave question of propriety of giving such a scheme to the world ; at any rate, in such detail. Furthermore, you are aware that a scheme was recommended by the Defence Committee of 1898, approved by the War Office and adopted by the Canadian government.

Then he goes on to say :

Then there is the financial question. It is absolutely necessary that I should have a carefully prepared estimate of the cost involved in your proposals before they can be considered by the government.

So that the House will see that what the Minister of Militia was trying to do was to convince the General Officer Commanding that this report should not be published. He did not refuse to publish it, but he reasoned with the general and tried to convince him that it should not be made public. What does Lord Dundonald say ? He writes as follows :—

Dear Sir Frederick,—Yes, I will let you have the report with slight amendments as suggested almost at once. Will you let me have the part you have, and I will let you have the whole back again in a few hours ?

Again the Minister of Militia writes :

Dear Lord Dundonald,—I would like to again call attention to my letter of the 31st ultimo dealing with your annual report. After very careful consideration of the matter since that letter was written I am more than ever convinced of the correctness of the views therein expressed.

It is quite outside the province of an annual departmental report to propound a scheme or policy of defence and therefore I must ask you to be good enough to omit Part II (so called) from your report, and to amend Part I accordingly.

I shall be quite ready, however, to approve of the insertion in your annual report of a clause stating that you have prepared for my information a scheme which you think would (to use the words of the heading to part 2) 'conduce to the greater efficiency of the militia as a fighting force.'

May I ask, therefore, that the annual report be amended as above suggested, and placed in my hands to-day so that it may go to the printer.

Did Lord Dundonald acquiesce in the request made to him by the hon. minister ? Here is what he says on the 28th of February :

Dear Sir Frederick,—I return the report divided as you wish. There was a difficulty in getting that work done Saturday owing to the day being a half holiday.

From one end of these letters to the other, you will see the discussion going on, and not once did Lord Dundonald acquiesce in the request made to him that part 2nd of his report should be suppressed. I ask if the argument which my hon. friend the Minister of Militia based upon the word 'private' on the first letter can stand. Is it not a fact that this report was recognized by the minister as essentially a report for publication ? If not, why was part 1st published. It was published because the statute enacts that these reports must be given to parliament and part 1st went in the same envelope as part 2nd. My hon. friend, the Minister of Militia, states that this probably involved a great change and that it did not commend itself to his judgment. But a few days after, my hon. friend delivered a eulogy upon the General Officer Comanding, and I think it is only right that I should read it because it is the best praise that probably could be given Lord Dundonald under the circumstances, coming as it does from the man who last evening passed such strictures on his conduct :

We might congratulate ourselves in this country on having at the head of the military side of the Militia Department a gentleman who understood the importance of all he (Sir Frederick) had said. (Cheers.) He was not only a great warrior, as he had proved in a dozen battles—(cheers)—but he was a man of sound sense and judgment.

And this was after he had given in his part 2nd of his report of 1902. He was still a man of sound sense and judgment according to the Minister of Militia :

Who was here for the purpose not of self-aggrandizement, not of playing to the gallery and having his name and praises sounded on every possible opportunity, but of developing the material he found into one of the best fighting forces on the earth.

I cannot understand how it is that after passing this eulogy on the General Officer Comanding, my hon. friend can come to the House and describe the general as a man absolutely inferior and not at all fit for the high position to which he had been called. What is the reason the report of 1903 was mutilated ? Here is the most extraordinary reason given for doing this which I have ever heard a minister give in this House. It is to be found on column 5441 of the revised 'Hansard :'

I did not object to the report so much as I objected to the publication of certain portions, and I wished him to amend it, and he, as I supposed, agreed to do so. Some of the objections which I made to it were that it referred to documents which had not been brought down to parliament, which there was no intention to bring to parliament. I informed him that the moment that report was laid on the table of the House, the members of the House would have the right to ask for the documents ; and, as we did not wish to bring the documents down, I did not wish these references put in the report.

It seems to me that this is a most extraordinary reason for the correcting or the mutilating of the report of 1903. I am not at all in favour of militarism or a standing army, but it seems to me that if we are to spend $2,000,000 a year on our militia, we ought to get some return in the shape of an efficient force and not have, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) described it last year, the shadow of a skeleton. The General Officer Commanding is an officer of the Militia Department. It was he who made this report, and I can quite understand that if it contained disclosures upon the condition of the defences of this country, which should be considered confidential, there might have been some reason for suppressing it. But this has not been alleged ; and the only reason given by my hon. friend last night was that it contained a new scheme for the defence of Canada. Sir, I do not wish to establish the people of this country as judge between the General

Officer Commanding and the Minister of Militia; but if there is nothing detrimental to the best interest of the country contained in that report the people who pay the General Officer Commanding, and who have the interest in the militia, have the right to see part 2 of the report of 1902, so as to be able to judge whether or not this parliament should vote more money, or less money, or make some change in the plans or system of the militia.

I shall not go over all the arrangements in the debate but let me come to the more contentious part of the amendment. My hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) alluded to a coincidence which I had intended to speak of. We know that in the latter part of 1903, there was a hotly contested election in the county of Brome for one of the seats in the legislature of Quebec. In the selection of a candidate, and in the carrying on of the campaign, the Minister of Agriculture took a prominent part. And when the treasurer of the province of Quebec was elected as member for Brome, his election was contested before the courts, and as stated by my hon. friend from Compton, the petition protesting the election was signed by the firm of Baker and Baker, which firm is composed of Senator Baker and his son. And in this petition the House will remark, the Minister of Agriculture was accused of illegal practices under the Election Act of Quebec. If this protest had gone to the courts, and if the facts had been proved, the hon, gentleman (Mr. Fisher) stood to be disqualified for any office in the province of Quebec and subject also to a heavy penalty. The case was so serious that, at the last session of the legislature of Quebec, a special Bill was introduced to relieve these gentlemen from the penalties to which they had subjected themselves by their conduct in that election. I am glad to say, for the honour of the province of Quebec and the dignity of its legislature that the Bill failed to pass. Still the effort was made. On whose behalf was it made? On behalf of the gentleman who had taken an active and illegal part in the election in Brome. The case was serious, and, of course, the men who had signed this petition were open to the vengeance of my right hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. A little while afterwards the organization of this regiment in the eastern townships was undertaken. And what does my hon. friend say?

> I must premise my explanation in regard to this matter by saying that Senator Baker, of Sweetsburg, is the acknowledged and active leader of the Conservatives of that district.

And the hon. gentleman should have added, 'and he signed a petition asking for my disqualification.'

> I found this list of proposed names for the staff for the neighbourhood of Sweetsburg. First, Mr. John M. Gibson, a nephew of Senator Baker, and talked of as a possible Conservative candidate in the constituency of Missisquoi, to be third in command of that regiment. Dr. Pickel, one of the strongest Conservative workers of the neighbourhood and a family connection of Senator Baker, to be major in command of the squadron which, though gazetted for Adamsville, was to be changed to Sweetsburg to suit his convenience. Mr. G. H. Baker, son of Senator Baker, to be senior captain of the said squadron. Mr. Thomas R. Pickel, son-in-law of Senator Baker to be the junior captain of the said squadron. Then, there were the names of two gentlemen, Messrs. Steacie and Reynolds, of Montreal, to be lieutenants.

So, while this petition was before the courts this terrible Baker family was known for its loyalty throughout the eastern townships and was ready to wear the uniform of His Majesty and fight the battles of his country; and immediately my hon. friend said: I will not have this, especially, I will not have Dr. Pickel, who is a son-in-law of Dr. Pickel—he must go or there will be no organization of this squadron in the eastern townships. Now, what is the statement made by Colonel Smart? Let me read from the documents that have been laid before the House:

> Dr. Pickel is a man of means, can ride fairly well, and was quite willing to take the necessary time to qualify himself for the position of major. Mr. Fisher objected to him for no other reason than that he was a strong political opponent of his and was quite determined to block the whole organization, unless Dr. Pickel's name was withdrawn.

I do not know Colonel Smart, and am not aware whether he is a Conservative or Liberal; but I must say that if he were a prominent Conservative, I would probably have heard of him and would have noted him before this. But I find him a man not afraid to give the exact version of what took place when he met the Minister of Agriculture. He says that Dr. Pickel was not then qualified, but he was a man of means, able to ride and ready to make the sacrifice of the time necessary to qualify himself for the position he was to hold in the regiment. But he was allied with the House of Baker, and the name of Baker was signed to a petition which contested the election of Brome. So, Dr. Pickel was to go, and, if not out, this regiment was not to be organized and the eastern townships would have to do without it. Is this statement of Colonel Smart controverted in this House? What does my hon. friend the Minister of Militia say? I quote from page 26 of the correspondence, a letter from the Minister of Agriculture to Colonel Whitley dated, Ottawa, 20th of May:

> I think you will appreciate that I have not asked nearly as much as impetuous friends in the county expected, but I think that what I have asked has been entirely reasonable.

Who were the 'impetuous friends'? Were they 'impetuous' in getting up this military organization. No. They were 'impetuous' political friends of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. This shows that the hon. Minister of Agriculture was taking counsel in the county not from those who were trying to get up the organization of a regiment of cavalry, but from those who were trying to foist upon the regiment men whom they thought it desirable to appoint to the positions in it. And the Minister of Agriculture says that he has not got so much as his 'impetuous' friends asked for, but that he had got a good deal. He confesses judgment—he says that he has tried his best to get all that his friends demanded, that he has got a good deal and that they must be satisfied. And what does Colonel Whitley say at page 27 of the same report? This was read by my hon. friend from Compton, (Mr. Pope) but it will bear repetition:

I think I told you, in Ottawa, my views re the drinking question. I dread an intemperate officer; they are useless, indeed of great harm wherever they appear, and, candidly, I would prefer political opponents to such.

The worst man would be an intemperate officer, but the next would be a political opponent. All through this correspondence, it is plain to be seen that the object these hon. gentlemen had was not to keep this regiment from being made a Tory preserve, but to make it a Liberal preserve. And what does Mr. Brenham say—page 29?

Now, if you do not get any applications from any of our fellows, rather than see it go to those fellows in Sweetsburg, I would take a commission and do the best I could, so will leave the matter in your hands and will be satisfied with the results.

Sir, these gentlemen were trying to get their 'fellows' into the regiment. Who were their 'fellows'? Their political friends. And they were trying to exclude as far as possible any member of the Baker family, exclude as far as common decency would permit, any Conservatives from the regiment and were trying to get their 'fellows' in if possible. Now, let me read further on from this same page, 29, a letter from the Minister of Agriculture to a Mr. Clinton:

He and Mr. Parmelee and I have been discussing matters here at length, and Mr. Parmelee and I are satisfied that he is honestly desirous of remedying these mistakes and doing anything he can to meet our views.

Here is Mr. Parmelee brought in now. For what purpose? Is Mr. Parmelee a military expert? Does he know anything about the requirements of the militia? Does he know anything about the military qualifications of these gentlemen? If he was consulted, he must have been consulted merely as to the political qualifications of 'our fellows' in the different places in which this regiment was being recruited.

It is impossible, however, to make all the changes that our friends would like.

'Our friends would like.' It was purely from a political standpoint and no other that these appointments were being made.

The most important ones, have, however, been made. Dr. Pickel is not to be given command of the squadron, and Tom. Pickel is to be made lieutenant instead of captain.

When they could not put him out they reduced him in rank.

Clifton Miltimore is to be given a captaincy. We have adopted the plan that men without any military experience as a rule should start as lieutenants. The squadron which was named for Adamsville is to be changed to Cowansville, not Sweetsburg.

No, they would not go into that Tory town of Sweetsburg, but they would go somewhere else—always the political motive at the foundation of everything in the organization of this regiment.

The squadron which was named for Mansonvile is to be changed to Knowlton.

Many hon. gentlemen may not know that Mansonville in the county of Brome is the place in which Mr. Manson resides, and that Mr. Manson was an opponent of Mr. McCorkill in the local fight of which I have just spoken. Of course they had to take the squadron out of Mansonville so that it would not be contaminated by Mr. Manson or any of those bad Tories, and put it in Knowlton which was not such a Tory locality as Mansonville. But is it not a fact that far from being disproved, the statement of Colonel Smart was carried out by all the letters which have been written by my hon. friend, and my hon. friend has stated before this House time and again that he was determined that this regiment would not be a Tory preserve. Here again we see that the political hand of my hon. friend was busy in meddling in this matter and in trying to keep as many Conservatives out as he could.

Now what are the consequences of all this? The consequences of this intermeddling will have a deterrent effect upon the minds of those who want to join the militia of this country. When men of means, capable of joining the militia force would like to do so, they will be deterred by the knowledge that if they are Conservatives they will have no advancement and no promotion, that they will be kept out of positions, and that they will get scant justice and even scant courtesy from the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now this country has to choose between the Minister of Agriculture and Lord Dundonald. My right hon. friend the leader of the House this evening said that he could not agreee with the last paragraph of the resolution moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. He went further, and he said that this last paragraph is not borne out by the facts laid before the House. Sir, it is true that Lord Dundonald, in his statement to the press, has given other instances of meddling and interference by the Minister of Agriculture. But what came to pass? This came to pass, that 'the last straw which broke the camel's back' as the hon. gentleman said last night, was the meddling of my hon. friend in the organization of this squadron in the eastern townships. It was his meddling and interference, when he had no right to do it, because he was interfering from purely political motives, and this is what Lord Dundonald resented. Now we see that the action of the hon. gentleman has culminated in the retirement of Lord Dundonald, in the dismissal of Lord Dundonald, in his being sent away from this country under a cloud, as it were, having his services dispensed with by this government. The country will have to choose between Lord Dundonald and the Minister of Agriculture. I never knew before that my hon. friend was so great an adept in military matters, and I am forcibly reminded of one of the letters of Mr. Dooley entitled 'In peace and in war.' Hon. gentlemen who have read this remarkable book will remember probably that the President of the United States is recruiting some officers to send them to the war, in Cuba against the Spanish, and one man comes up and the president said: 'What kind of pyjamas do you wear'? 'Silk pyjamas.' 'Well,' said the president, 'I will make a brigadier general of you.' Sir, I must apologize for having mentioned before this distinguished audience these unmentionables, and I must also apologize for having called to the mind of my listeners the spectacle of the Minister of Agriculture arrayed in his somewhat unmartial rig. Now this is the question before the House. The country will be called upon to decide, in a short time I hope, between the Minister of Agriculture and Lord Dundonald. We have put the case before the country. The people know the merits of the question, and I have no doubt that when the time comes to decide, Lord Dundonald will emerge from the discussion what he is now, and what he was when he came to this country, a most useful and experienced soldier, whose reputation the Minister of Agriculture has only endanced in the hearts and minds of every fair minded citizen of Canada.

Mr. ANDREW B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Though the hour is late I shall not apologize for taking up a few minutes in discussing this question. I shall try to make my remarks free from any partisan bias whatever, and aside from any political opinions I may hold. I have for years in this House taken some interest in military matters, not that I am a military man, but observing from session to session that though we have a membership in this House of 214, whenever a question came up affecting the militia of Canada, the discussion was conducted by but very few members. So I felt it my duty in my own humble way to take some part in the discussion of military questions when they came before this House, because the greater part of the members did not do so. Since I have been a member of this House I have noticed a vast difference in the military feeling among the members. A good many years ago when the Minister of Militia asked for a reasonable amount to promote the militia he received very little assistance in passing his estimates, although they were niggardly in amount. During the Conservative regime I always understood, at all events, I never noticed that any partisan feeling governed the action of the Militia Department in those days.

I would like to believe to-day that no political feeling is engendered by the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence in the administration of his department. I would like to believe that and on that line I am going to proceed with my argument though my remarks will be brief and to the point. It has been said in this discussion and said repeatedly by the hon. Minister of Agriculture that he had no desire to introduce party politics into the militia of this country, that what he did he did in the interest of the militia and that was his sole object and aim. I would like to believe that statement in the interest of the militia, but I do not think the hon. gentleman will pretend to believe that his conduct in this matter was purely non-partisan. His language has been such as to lead me to believe that his conduct was rather partisan, But, the point at issue in this case is simply this: The commander of the forces of Canada, by reason of certain interference, has, in a speech at Montreal, stated that the act of the hon. Minister of Agriculture was the last straw that broke the camel's back and that by reason of that act the commander of the forces was forced to speak out at the banquet in Montreal. Now, Sir, I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether he was acting improperly in doing that. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether the government are justified in dismissing him. That is not the point I am going to discuss. I have always been led to believe in this House that the military forces of this or any other country, I care not where it is, are the most successful that observe strict discipline. I have recognized that there is a head of the militia force. I have recognized that the Minister of Militia is the head of the militia force of this country and that next to him is the commander of the forces. I have looked over the report of the Department of Militia and Defence which was laid on the table of the House this session and I find that, notwithstanding the quotations of rules and regulations read by the right hon. Prime Minister and by my hon. friend from Montmorency to-night, this report states that :

The present organization of the department, so far as the branches under the control, or supervision, of the General Officer Commanding are concerned, is outlined in a Minute of Council, dated October 29, 1903, which was promulgated as General Order 159, 1903, as follows :

DISTRIBUTION OF DUTIES.

The General Officer Commanding.

1. The General Officer Commanding shall be charged with the military command and discipline of the militia, shall issue General Orders and hold periodical inspection of the militia.

He shall be the principal adviser of the Minister of Militia and Defence on all military questions and shall be charged with the control of the branches of the Adjutant General, the Director General of Military Intelligence and Military Secretary, and the general supervision of the other military branches.

He shall be charged with the general distribution and localization of the militia, and with the selection and proposal to the Minister of Militia and Defence of fit and proper persons to be recommended for commissions in the militia, of fit and proper officers for promotions, for staff and other military appointments, and for military honours and rewards.

Then this goes on to state the duties of the respective branches. It refers to the adjutant's general's branch, the intelligence branch, the military secretary's branch, the quartermaster general's branch, the engineer service branch, the ordnance branch and the medical services branch. It concludes:

All orders or regulations inconsistent with this Order in Council are hereby cancelled.

These are the duties of the various officers whose work is subject to the approval of the commanding officer, who, after he has approved of any matters affecting the forces, submits them to the minister for his approval. In this report I do not see that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has any duties to perform in connection with the militia, and I am giving to the hon. minister of Agriculture the same rights as the hon. Minister of Finance or any other cabinet minister has and what are they ? They are that when the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence takes his report to Council and these gentlemen sit around the council board, whenever that document is placed before them for their consideration, they are quite within their rights and they are doing their duty as I understand it when they undertake to discuss that document. We have heard a great deal about etiquette in the city of Ottawa. I take it when the commander of the forces referred to etiquette in the city of Ottawa he meant that the hon. Minister of Agriculture, without consulting the head of his department, without consulting the commander of the forces had undertaken to write to certain officers in the eastern townships asking them to accept commissions in the force in which it was no part of his duty, but interfering with the duties of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence and the Officer Commanding the forces of this country, thus committing a breach of military etiquette. It does not require a military man to go down to the camp which is now being held at Rockliffe to discover that a corporal is jealous of his authority and of his rights, that a lieutenant, a captain, a major, or a colonel is jealous of his authority and stands on his dignity in exercising his authority. So it is with the General Officer Commanding the forces. The hon. Minister of Agriculture stated that when the officer commanding the forces telephoned to him and asked him to make some arrangement by which he could discuss this question with him, he gave him to understand that he had an office down town and that if there was anything he desired to consult him about he knew where to find his office. I would have thought that if Lord Dundonald or the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence desired to consult the hon. Minister of Agriculture on matters affecting agriculture the least the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence or the commander of the forces could do would be to go to the office of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, but when the hon. Minister of Agriculture was asked to discuss some matters in which he was interfering and for that purpose to come to the office of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence it would not have been undignified on the part of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to have done so, and it certainly would have been more in line with the discipline of the militia of this country. He was dealing with a question affecting the militia of Canada in a department with which he had nothing to do other than any other Minister of the Crown has occasionally to deal with certain matters coming before the Privy Council of which he is a member. I do not deny him the right to deal with these matters at the Privy Council but the hon. Minister of Agriculture had a right to go and consult the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence and the commander of the forces, if he felt disposed to do so. I want to say that if this hon. gentleman had shown a disposition to make matters easy for the commander of the forces, if he had not desired to create dissensions amongst military men or put obstacles in the way of the commander of the forces, if his sole desire was to promote the welfare of the militia in the eastern townships the least he could have done would have been to have gone to the Department of Militia and Defence and there to have sat quietly down and discussed this matter with the commander of the forces. I am sure that Lord Dundonald would have quietly sat down with him and discussed this matter and that if he had suggested anything that Lord Dundonald deemed to be in the interest of the militia or in the interest of that portion of the force in the eastern townships he would have been only too glad to have accepted the suggestion.

That in my judgment would have been a proper course to pursue. A good deal has been said about Lord Dundonald in this House. I have watched closely and read extensively of the career of that gentleman in South Africa and it struck me that the language used was not justified by his career. The language was harsh and in my judgment uncalled for. Lord Dundonald is human like the rest of us, and he may have his faults. I heard the Prime Minister say let 'him who is without sin cast the first stone.' If he had erred in this case, I suppose he must suffer to the extent of his error, but whatever his error might have been I am quite within the mark when I say that his hearty wholesouled desire was for the welfare of the militia of this country and not for his own advancement. No man will charge him with being a political partisan. He has had a great deal of experience as an officer for many years, and now after one year in Canada we are told that he is unfit to command the militia of Canada.

We have heard a good deal about his report. Last year when the report of the Militia Department was laid on the table—and I take sufficient interest in the militia to read carefully every word submitted by that department for consideration—I discovered that there was a second report not published, and like two or three other members on this side—who take a lively interest in military matters, I was eager to know the contents of that report, because it occurred to me if we have an officer as capable as Lord Dundonald, capable enough to be sent by the British authorities to Canada, to take charge of our militia, any suggestions that he might have to offer to the people would be worthy of perusal and of consideration, and of examination in order to see whether the suggestions offered were such as the people of this country ought to adopt. I have here a report that was placed before the Privy Council, a document with the 13th Dragoons struck out on the 14th of May. That was done while it was before council. Why ? On account of certain interference by the Minister of Agriculture, certain objections he raised to certain persons on the list, in connection with the military organization in the eastern townships. Again on the 19th of May, the Minister of Agriculture struck out the name of Dr. Pickel, in the name of the Minister of Militia. If the Minister of Agriculture was requested to act in the place of the Minister of Militia on that particular occasion, the 19th instant, and if he on that morning had received a document from Colonel Smart to the effect that he wanted the name of Mr. Pickel struck out I would go so far as to say the Minister of Agriculture acting on behalf of the Minister of Militia, had a perfect right to strike it out, but when I go that far I call the attention to the fact, that he interfered previous to that, and had written letters in order to block Mr. Pickel in this matter when he was not acting as Minister of Militia. There is where the sin and the partisanship on the part of the Minister of Agriculture came in. He was not acting as the Minister of Militia, but was acting the part of a partisan. I would like to draw attention to a little matter in my own experience some few years ago and from this experience and the debate which is drawing to a close, I am bound to say that if the people of this country make a change from an officer who comes to this country from England and place the militia in the hands of a Canadian officer, we will have many instances of this kind occurring. On Wednesday, November 7th, 1900, we had a general election. In 1900 we had an estimate brought down in this House for a grant for an armoury, in the city of St. Thomas, of $8,000. The ground was bought on May 21, 1900. In 1901 we had placed in the estimates $24,000 in one case and $7,000 in another, a total in all of $39,000 for a drill hall and armoury in St. Thomas. The election took place on the 7th of November, but no contract was let, and no money was voted beyond the $8,000, but on November 3rd, four days previous to the general election although no contract had been let, the Minister of Public Works came to St. Thomas brought several soldiers there, and the Minister of Public Works went down and turned the first sod of an armoury for the building of which not one dollar had been voted by parliament. I think that comment is unnecessary; I shall simply place that on record and leave the House to judge whether there has been any partisan interference in this department. Last session I heard a gentleman make one of the best military speeches I have heard in this House for many years, a gentleman trusted by this government who filled a very important position in London, during the Jubillee. I refer to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson). I am bound to say that he spoke without any partisan feeling. His remarks were approved by members on both sides. After the hundreds of thousands of dollars which we had expended in this country for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the militia the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) rose and among other things said :

I have shown that we were called upon to furnish the skeleton of a skeleton. I now state that we have actually turned out the shadow of a skeleton of a skeleton. Can anything so ghost-like be longer called a militia force? . . . . I know the case of one company which this year had two officers and six non-commissioned officers to command two men, one of whom was the cook.

This is a statement made not by any partisan on this side, but by a government supporter in a non-partisan spirit. And in view of the fact of our having some 4,000 miles of boundary line, between this country and the United States, it is not too much to say that Lord Dundonald's remarks were quite justified, when he said that we are living in a fools paradise.

So we are; there is no question about it. If anything should occur between the United States and Canada, which God forbid, should we not in time of peace prepare for war? The very fact that we are preparing for war is the reason we shall have peace maintained in the country. If the recommendations of the General Officer Commanding are not to be considered, what is the use of having a man of that character come to this country? It is simply a waste of time and a waste of money. When this report is kept from the people of this country we are not in a position to judge of it. Some hon. gentlemen say, why should we be allowed to consider it? If hon. gentlemen will take the pains to go into the library and turn up the militia reports submitted to this House from year to year, they will find that certain recommendations are made in all those reports by the General Officer Commanding, the deputy minister and other officers, which are not carried out. Some are carried out and some are not carried out. In view of that fact, is there any harm in the commander of the forces having his suggestions embodied in the report? If parliament does not feel disposed to adopt any of them, well and good. The majority in parliament have that power. I think this unfortunate occurrence is greatly to be regretted, and nobody will regret it more than the militia of this country.

I am called on to-night to cast a vote for the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition. I have heard that amendment criticised. I have heard the question asked, why have you not moved a resolution condemning the government for dismissing Lord Dundonald? I suppose that when Lord Dundonald made his statement in Montreal, he knew what he was doing. I presume that in making that statement, he felt that the breach would be made so wide between the government and himself that it would be utterly impossible for him to remain in the service any longer. Therefore it is not for the leader of the opposition to move in respect to that. What has he moved? That:—

> The selection and appointment of officers in the militia should be made without regard to party political considerations which if permitted to exercise an influence will prove disastrous to the efficiency of the force.

Mr. INGRAM.

I am glad to support that part of this amendment.

> That while the Minister of Militia is charged with and responsible for the administration of militia affairs the General Officer Commanding is by law charged under the orders of His Majesty with the military command and discipline of the militia and with the duty of recommending to the Minister of Militia fit and proper persons for appointment to commissions therein.

Surely there can be no objection to that, because, if we are to believe the Minister of Agriculture, that is exactly his idea, though I am sorry to say that he has departed from it. Then we have this important part:

> That the conduct of the Honourable Sydney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture, in interfering with the commanding officer of the Thirteenth Scottish Light Dragoons while that officer was engaged in the duty of selecting his subordinate officers for the approval of and for recommendation by the General Officer Commanding; and the action of that minister in interposing party political influence between the General Officer Commanding and his officers and in requiring recommendations and appointments to be made or disallowed from party considerations, deserves and should receive the censure of this House.

I can support that because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) has himself admitted that he acted in a partisan manner in the formation of this corps in the eastern townships. Then, finally:

> The House regrets that this unwarrantable interference has been approved by the government, and that it not only has unduly delayed the organization of the regiment, but has culminated in depriving the militia of Canada of an experienced and distinguished commanding officer.

Sir, I regret the latter portion of this amendment exceedingly, in view of the treatment meted out to that distinguished gentleman by the Minister of Agriculture, who had no more right to interfere with the selection of those officers and with Colonel Smart, even in a non-partisan sense, than I or any other member of this House had. When he interfered without consulting the head of the Militia Department or the commander of the forces, he acted as this amendment says, in a partisan spirit, and in a way that cannot be justified by any one who has the welfare of the militia of this country at heart.

Mr. E. HACKETT (West Prince). Mr. Speaker, before you put the question, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who it appears is the Minister of Militia, has any trouble arisen in Prince Edward Island with regard to the militia camps?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot give the hon. gentleman any answer.

the government or to the head of any department by subordinates, unless they relate to mere questions of fact and routine and the every day transactions of the department—that all reports in which are implied questions of policy—are from their very nature confidential, and remain confidential until in the judgment of the minister they become the contrary. This is a broad statement to make, perhaps, but I make it on authority. I have already quoted Todd, who is acknowledged to be the best writer on this subject. Let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to what he says on this point:

The system of laying upon the table of the House reports from officers addressed to particular departments of the executive government is most objectionable. And the House ought not to insist 'upon the production of papers and correspondence which concerned the preparation and preliminary consideration of measures; they would thereby put a stop to that freedom of criticism which was always invited on such occasions, and which contributed so much to the perfection of public measures.' If the House were to insist upon the production of such documents, instead of the government getting what we get now, confidential reports, containing the most minute details of the opinion of officers, given frankly and freely, for the heads of departments, we shall have a system of reports framed for laying upon the table of the House of Commons, and those will be accompanied by 'confidential reports for the head of the department alone.' There have been cases in which reports of a confidential character from officers of the government have been laid upon the table of the House, to prepare the public mind, and also that of parliament, to consent to some large measure, or perhaps some considerable vote of public money; but, generally I think it is a course which the House ought not to sanction.'

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the right hon. gentleman say whether that is Todd in Canada?

Sir WILRID LAURIER. No, that is Todd in England. That is not simply the opinion of Todd. It is a series of quotations from speeches delivered in parliament by the great leaders who have brought the law of parliament from time to time up to its present perfection. The last quotation of all is from Mr. Disraeli, who says:

There have been cases in which reports of a confidential character from officers of the government have been laid upon the table of the House to prepare the public mind, and also that of parliament, to consent to some large measure, or perhaps some considerable vote of public money.

This would have been the case here. The report of Lord Dundonald, I understand, would have been a preparation for a large expenditure of public money; but Mr. Disraeli said:

But generally I think it is a course which the House ought not to sanction.

There is implied in this that such a report might be brought down at some time; but this is a matter of governmental responsibility, on which parliament is to depend, unless there is a vote of censure. But the minister is absolutely free to follow his own opinion in this respect, and not to follow the dictum of the gentleman who is appointed as his adviser.

I may be told that this is antiquated law. Well, there is something more recent than that, which I now give to the House. I have stated that though the question of supremacy as between the military and the civil power in England has been settled more than a hundred years ago, and settled in favour of the civil power, still every now and then there is an attempt made to revive the old rule and to bring back the military power in control. Not later than two years ago, there was at the head of the army in Great Britain a gentleman who has left a record dear to the hearts of Canadians—Lord Wolseley. He was the Commander in Chief; and strange to say—or perhaps I should say, natural to say—even such a soldier as Lord Wolseley, a man acknowledged to be prudent in his course and in his views, had a difference of opinion with the Secretary of State for war. He offered advice to the Secretary of State for War, and the Secretary of State for War, like my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, would not follow that advice. Then Lord Wolseley did what I think Lord Dundonald, if he had been better advised, should have done also: he placed his resignation in the hands of the government. If Lord Dundonald had followed that course—and he says he had the idea in his mind—if, instead of taking the violent, the extreme, the unpardonable course of committing a breach of discipline, he had resigned, and placed his resignation on paper, he could have brought before parliament everything he wanted to bring. It could not have been pigeon-holed, as he suggested, but it would have been brought before the House, and the House could have judged of it. Lord Wolseley took the better course of resigning, and some time afterwards on the floor of the House of Lords, he gave expression to his views. On the 4th March, 1901, he addressed the House of Lords and criticised the administration of the War Office, and the nature of the relationship between the Commander in Chief and Secretary of State for War. Lord Lansdowne, who was the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, replied in the House of Lords, and made use of the following language, which will be found in the Parliamentary Debates, 4th series, Vol. 90, page 356:—

In another part of the statement of the noble Viscount, he told the House that he thought it was extremely necessary in the interests of public safety, that when the Commander in Chief and the Secretary of State for war were unable to agree, the public should be taken into our confidence, and that we should leave the public, as it were, to choose between the two.

I am afraid that that is somewhat a council of perfection. Does the noble and gallant Viscount think that the government of this country would be possible, that the administration of the War Office would be practicable, if, whenever the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief were not at one, their arguments were to be publicly paraded and to form the subject of controversies in the press or on the platform. I cannot conceive a more fatal arrangement, than that there should be disputes of this kind in the eye of the public. The noble and gallant Viscount is a great supporter of a very popular institution called the Military Tournament. I should be very sorry if the Secretary of State were obliged to take part in a military tournament of the kind which the noble and gallant Viscount suggests.

Now I pause and ask the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite : Is not the language of Lord Lansdowne applicable, in every particular to the case we have in hand ? If you substitute for Lord Wolseley, Lord Dundonald, and for the Secretary of State for War, the Canadian Minister of Militia, you have our case in every particular. The following day the debate was participated in by Lord Salisbury, and I commend the language of Lord Salisbury as that of one who has always been noted for his Conservative tendencies and strong, rugged common-sense. This is what he said :

It is said of a certain class of correspondent that the important observation always comes at the end. I think that applies to the speech of the noble and gallant Viscount. He told us, not as one of the main points on which he was insisting, but as something which occurred to him at the end, and which ought to be mentioned before he sat down, what was his solution of any difficulties that might arise if the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State were not of the same mind. I think he puzzled the House. He said we were to take the people into our confidence, and to tell the press what we thought, and then the question at issue was to be discussed openly. How you were to decide which party was to be victorious, I do not know, but the result of the battle royal was to determine the particular decision on which the office was divided. I allude to this because I think it is a matter which is really at the bottom of our difficulty. I do not think the disputants, especially if they are military disputants, have entirely realized that the army is under parliament and that the minister who controls the army does it as one who is responsible to parliament and represents all the authority which parliament possesses. Unless you keep that steadily in mind, no doubt you will see many anomalies in our military system, and its relations to the civil power. But it is no use comparing our army with the army of France or of America, or of Germany or of Russia. They all differ in that one point, that the parliamentary system of governing the army does not exist among them. We must accommodate ourselves to the present state of things. Everybody knows historically how it has grown up, and everybody knows that it is intertwined too closely with all the fibres of our constitution to justify any one who forms his projects and bases his reasoning on the supposition that this relation can be modified. At the end we must have an army governed by parliament, governed by a minister who is responsible to parliament, and in any difference of opinion, whatever it may be, the Commander in Chief must be a subordinate of the Secretary of State.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (reading)—

Military men may not like that, but there it is. It is one of the bed rock circumstances of the situation, something from which you cannot depart ; and you must devote your hands to making it work and it has worked in the main hitherto very well.

Yes, I think it has worked very well in England.

And take care that it produces in the future, as it has produced in the past, results which it would have been impossible to produce in any foreign country. I feel that this debate will be lost upon us unless we take care to guide ourselves by that chief and predominant principle. In speech after speech from military men, men who know the language and spirit of the War Office, it is easy to detect a desire that military problems shall only be solved by military men ; but any attempt to take the opinion of the expert above the opinion of the politician must, in view of all the circumstances of our constitution, inevitably fail. It must not be supposed that in such contests the expert must win. In all these discussions there is an evident and growing desire to shake free of this necessity. I thought I traced it even in the peroration of the noble Earl, although I am sure he is too good and constitutional a statesman to entertain any idea that the existing system can be radically changed. That is where the shoe pinches—that the men who know, or who ought to know, namely, the experts, are not the men to decide the dispute in question ; but the decision, if it accords with their view at all, must be brought about by the concession of the civilian and the politician.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If this doctrine had been asserted by me, without saying from whom it came, there would have been a howl from the other side. But this is the true constitutional doctrine. I was told this afternoon that I was a separatist, that my heart was not with British institutions. Sir, I am proud to say once more, as I have said many times that from my boyhood I have been a true adherent of British institutions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I say more, I claim that I understand—and in saying this I do not think I am boasting—British institutions far better than many hon. gentlemen on the other side who try to assail me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When Viscount Wolseley had a difference with the War Office and wanted to bring that difference before parliament and the people, and allow the people to judge between the two, what did the War Office decide ? It decided that Viscount Wolseley, illustrious general as he is, was subordinate to the civil power, and that if the views he submitted to the civil power were not acceptable, there was no help for it and he had to submit. Sir, we assert nothing else in this matter. But I will say more. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia, in his anxiety to do the best he could for the militia, went further than anybody in his position would have gone in England. He submitted last year to the opposition a proposition both wise and patriotic. He stated to the opposition that he had received a plan which he did not endorse, and which, in his opinion, it would be a grevious mistake to make public. But as perhaps there might be some good in it, he offered to hon. gentlemen opposite to have a committee formed, on which they would be represented, so that both sides might examine into this plan, but because there were things in it which it would not be wise to divulge to the world, the proceedings of that committee should not be made public, but be kept secret. This offer was not accepted last year. but nobody then made it a grievance against my hon. friend that he did not parade before the whole world not only our resources, but our weaknesses as well, and under the circumstances it seems to me that the position taken by the government to-day is absolute unassailable. It also seems to me that the position taken by Lord Dundonald cannot be justified from the point of view of constitutional government. What Lord Dundonald wanted was to assert the supremacy of the military power over the civil ; but, as my hon. friend the Minister of Militia said yesterday, so long at all events as there is a Liberal government in Canada, the civil power shall rule over the military.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let me now pass to another subject which has been the proximate cause of all the difficulties between Lord Dundonald and the Minister of Militia. I refer to the recommendations which were sent to Council by the Department of Militia for the organization of the 13th Scottish Light Dragoons. On the 19th of May, Lord Dundonald signed a recommendation to Council. That recommendation came back from Council with a name erased by a member of the cabinet. This seems to have been in the eyes of Lord Dundonald a most grievous offence. I do not wish to say anything offensive; but, if I am to construe according to what seems to me the only sense possible, the speech which was delivered in Montreal some few days ago, Lord Dundonald regarded it as an offence that, he having put his pen to a document, anybody else should put his pen to that document afterwards ; he having stated that such and such appointments should be made, those appointments should stand whether they were good or whether they were bad. Now, some time ago I stated in the House that Lord Dundonald having so recently come to the country and never having been in the eastern townships could not know the men he was recommending. I speak under correction ; he may have known one or two, but I doubt if he knew more. I doubt, if he knew, for instance, Dr. Pickel. When the recommendation came to Council from Lord Dundonald, it was known to every man in the Council that Lord Dundonald had taken his information second hand, that he must have received from somebody recommendations as to these appointments. He tells us that he had got it from the gentleman whom he had entrusted with the recruiting of the regiment. So far so good. But, if there was at the Council a gentleman who could say : I come from the part of the country where this regiment is to be recruited ; I know the gentlemen whose names appear on the list and I approve of all of them except one ; this one, Dr. Pickel, in my estimation is not qualified for the position to which it is proposed to appoint him ; he has never taken an interest in the militia and I assert that it is not right, it is not conducive to the best interest of the regiment and of the militia that this gentleman, who has no military qualification, should be put in such an important post as major ;—if there were at the Council a gentleman able to speak such words with the authority of local knowledge, will any hon. gentleman on the other side say that it was an offence against the dignity of Lord Dundonald for the Council to be influenced by such representations? Will any hon. gentleman say that it was not, I will not say the right only, but the duty of that hon. gentleman to declare his honest convictions ? Yet the head and front of the Minister of Agriculture's offending had this extent, no more.

Sir, I will not go into the minute, petty question whether or not my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture had the right to sign that document for the Minister of Militia. I see before me my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) ; he is an old parliamentarian, and he knows that every day a colleague signs for a colleague and that the recommendation so signed goes before the Council and is dealt with by the Council. That ought to be a sufficient answer to such petty, miserable criticism. But, there is something more. Wonders will never cease,—the once proud Conservative party, in their downward career, have come to this—that yesterday we heard from one of the leaders of that party, my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) a declaration that the General Officer Commander should be given carte blanche. The General Officer Commanding, is appointed by this government and occupies a subordinate position. But, according to the hon. gentleman he should be given carte blanche and whatever he does should be accepted ; the minister and the cabinet should be simply recording clerks of his will. And this is the policy of the once great Conservative party. My reading of history has informed me—and no doubt my hon. friend from Victoria, N.S., who is an old veteran in the cause of reform, has the recollection that there was a time in Canada when we had militia authorities to govern us. Those were the old times of the Family Compact, when the military authorities were surrounded by a crowd of sycophants and minions, who could dispose of the public domain for their own benefit and that of their favourites. I do not know how the new doctrine will strike the whole province of Ontario. But if the names of Brown and Mackenzie have not been erased from the memory of the people there, I can imagine how the Grits of Ontario will receive it. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier went even further. Having stated that we should give carte blanche to the General Officer Commanding, he went on to the conclusion, which was inevitable from his premises, that we had acted very wrongly in relieving Lord Dundonald of his command. He went further still ; he told us that the treatment which we had meted out to Lord Dundonald was harsh and cruel. How harsh and cruel ? That it was painful to those who had to inflict it is undoubted ; but if it could have been avoided, I confess I do not see how. We were told to-day that we might have done in the case of Lord Dundonald what was done in the case of Lord Charles Beresford. Certainly we might, if the cases had been alike. If, like Lord Charles Beresford, Lord Dundonald had apologized for his conduct, certainly we would have treated him as Lord Charles Beresford was treated. Lord Charles Beresford had written a letter which was published without his consent and he so declared. But Lord Dundonald went to Montreal for the very purpose of bringing on this scandal. Therefore, there was nothing to do but what we did. For our course we have abundance of authority in the mother country. Only two years ago, just after the conclusion of the South African war, General Colville had a disagreement with some of his brother officers. He was charged with not having done his full duty under certain circumstances in South Africa, and with having left a certain portion of the army in great distress, whereas, if he had been more active and determined he might have relieved it. The War Office took a lenient view of the accusations against General Colville. They did not dismiss him ; they did not deprive him of his rank ; they gave him a command in Gibraltar. But when General Colville had been given this new command he made the great mistake of going before the public, of writing for publication in the press, commenting upon those who had brought the accusations against him. And what happened then ? He was at once relieved of his command. The debate upon the subject is instructive. The War Office had taken a lenient view of General Colville's case. But, when he sought to bring his complaint before the tribunal of public opinion, instead of laying it before the Commander in Chief, the measure of his offences was full. The matter was brought before parliament by Mr. Charles Douglas. I quote from the speech of that gentleman as reported in 'Hansard' page 1251 :

> A very considerable prejudice had been created against General Colville by the fact that he had published in the newspapers a statement of his treatment by the War Office. He did not defend that action of General Colville's. It was most desirable and necessary that they should uphold and fortify the great traditions of army reticence. Sometimes it led to hardship, but it was essential to discipline, and more than ever necessary now in view of the extreme activity displayed by the newspapers. He did not defend General Colville's action, but hoped the House would allow him to submit one or two considerations in regard to it. In the first place reticence could not be all on one side. If their generals were never to take means of vindicating themselves publicly, then he ventured to think that a little reticence should be observed by the War Office.
> When General Colville returned to this country the first thing he saw was a newspaper paragraph which was obviously inspired.

Now mark the answer which was made by Mr. Brodrick, Secretary of State for War:

> The question is whether a public stigma would have been put upon General Colville. That is what I wished to avoid. After that General Colville's action cannot be defended by any one. He left for England. He did not avail himself of his right of appeal to the Commander in Chief. He made no representations to the War Office. He immediately published what he called a justification, but which consisted rather of an attack upon the staff officers in the Transvaal ; and which also included, I regret to say, what appeared to be some ungenerous sneers against the cavalry whom he had found it impossible to relieve. And obviously it is impossible that officers, whether on the full paylist or the half paylist, should be allowed to make reflections on their superiors as General Colville did. He was placed on retired pay, and any officer who follows his example will necessarily share the same fate.

Sir, it seems to me this is conclusive, and is the fullest justification that can be offered to the House of the painful course we had to take against so distinguished an officer as Lord Dundonald. I am free to say, even at this moment, after all the painful explanations we have had, after the indiscretions committed by Lord Dundonald, that for my part I look back with extreme regret upon the lack of judgment which has impelled Lord Dundonald so far to forget himself, so far to forget his position, so far to forget what was due to him and to his command, as to take the course he did. But law must be maintained, law exists for everybody, military law as well as civil law; and military law ought to be observed above all others by the general who is at the head of the militia. Further upon this point I have no more to say.

Now I may be allowed perhaps to do what I very seldom do. I may be allowed to say a word about myself personally. Some days ago, speaking in this House, I made use of an expression which was not in my mind but which came to my lips. I corrected it immediately. The word which I had in my mind was the word 'stranger' but I used another word. Sir, in my experience of many years I have never heard it called in question until to-day that a man may not be allowed an opportunity to correct a slip of the tongue. I have heard slips of the tongue more than once, I have heard one to-day, I heard one yesterday, some gentlemen using the words 'Minister of Agriculture' when he wanted to say 'Minister of Militia,' another saying 'Minister of Militia' when he wanted to say 'Minister of Agriculture.' These mistakes will occur. A man may want to speak of the city of Toronto, and may say the city of Montreal. But according to the new code of ethics which I find on the other side of the House, no man is to be allowed to correct any slip of that kind. Sir, I bow to this new law—which I hope, however, will never be the law on this side of the House, a law which we will never apply to the other side. I bow to it, but I wish to say to these gentlemen on the other side of the House whom I see before me and who call me to account for having had the misfortune, nay, not the misfortune, but the mere accident of slip of the tongue. I say to them: Let he who is without sin cast the first stone. Sir, I have been told that my meaning was contemplated, was offensive and insulting. I have been in this House for many years, I have seen some of the veterans of former combats pass away, I have been engaged in combats with some of them, I have fought a good many hard struggles, but I am not conscious in all the years of my life, in all the struggles in which I have been engaged with gentlemen on the other side of the House, I am not conscious that I ever deliberately used an offensive word towards any man or towards any class. I never sought a fight, but I was never afraid of a fight. Whenever I had to fight, I think it will be admitted by friend and foe that I always fought with fair weapons. I have been told to-day on the floor of this House twice that when I used the word 'foreigner' there was in my heart a sinster motive, there was in my heart a feeling which found expression. Sir, I have only this to say. I disdain to make reply to such an insinuation. If sixty years of what I believe to be after all an honourable life, a life which has certainly been one of loyal devotion to British institutions, is not a sufficient answer to such an insinuation, I will not attempt to make an answer. I have been told in the press, not in this House, that the word which I substituted for the word I used, the word 'stranger' which I substituted, was just as offensive and insulting as the other. Well, Sir, I do not pretend to be a master of the English language, but I do claim, without I think undue boasting, to have some knowledge of it. When I saw in the press that the word 'stranger' which I had applied to Lord Dundonald was offensive and insulting, I must confess that I was surprised, and I proceeded to brush up my literature; I went to the sources, I went to the dictionary as the first source, I went to the latest dictionary, the Standard, to find the definition of the word 'stranger.' Like many other words in the English language, like many other words in the French language, like many other words in the Latin language, and probably in all the languages, this word has more than one signification. Here they are:

> Stranger. 1. One is not an acquaintance; a person unknown; as, I was accosted by a stranger.
> 2. One not a member of the household; a visitor; guest; as, children should not talk when strangers are at the table. 3. A person coming from another country or a distant region; a foreigner; also, a person coming from another place, though in the same country; as, he had the air of a stranger; a stranger in a strange land. 4. One unacquainted or unfamiliar with something specified; one not versed or experienced; one mentally or spiritually remote; with to; as, he is a stranger to learning and culture. 5. Law. Any person who is neither a party to a transaction nor privy to it.

The Standard Dictionary quotes General Grant, speaking of his appointment to the army of the Potomac in the spring of 1864, saying:

> I was a stranger to most of the army of the Potomac; I might say to all except the officers of the regular army who have served in the Mexican war.

Very few researches brought to me an abundance of precedents. In the 'Story of the Revolution' Henry Cabot Lodge, the author, speaking of a visit by Washington coming from Virginia to Massachusetts, says:

> The people were evidently with him. They looked upon him as he rode down the lines and were content. The popular movement had found its leader and the popular instinct recognized him. Yet, Washington came to the men of New England a 'stranger.'

But, I am accustomed to the loyalty of hon. gentleman on the other side of which we have had such evidence to-day. Perhaps they will not accept these American writers. Let us come back then to British authors, and if there is an opinion which ought to be apposite in a matter of this kind, since I am told that I have insulted my fellow countrymen of the Scottish race, let me quote from Sir Walter Scott. We find in his book 'The Pirate' that, speaking of a Mr. Mertoum, an Englishman who was visiting the Shetland Islands, he says :

No one asked him whence he came, where he was going, what was his purpose in visiting so remote a corner of the empire, or what was likely to be the term of his stay. He arrived a perfect stranger, yet was instantly overpowered by a succession of invitations.

But, that is not all. Let us come nearer home. I have here in my hands the life of Lord Lawrence by Sir Richard Temple. In one of the chapters Sir Richard Temple speaks of the difficulties of every new viceroy sent from England to India. He says :

Usually a new Viceroy and Governor General is, on landing in India, really new in every sense. The European officers, the Native princes, chiefs and people, are strangers to him as he is personally unknown to them.

Here we are very near home when we are in another portion of the British empire, but let us come to Canada itself. There have been commanding officers of the militia before Lord Dundonald. There was one in 1875. His name was Sir Selby Smith. He wrote a report to the Minister of Militia of that day which is to be found in a blue-book of 1875 and here it is :

Headquarters, Ottawa,
January, 1875.

The Hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence, &c., &c, &c.

Sir,—The Militia Reports which have been presented to parliament for several years past, have treated exhaustively the question of its organization and development.

It will therefore be my duty to confine myself to a few condensed remarks, as to the probable improvement of the Dominion forces.

I approach the subject with hesitation, having so recently arrived for the first time in Canada. I would hardly do so at all, but from the experience gained in my late journey through the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

To Nova Scotia and New Brunswick I am still a stranger.

Now, Sir, it seems to me that my vindication ought to be complete, but I know that to-morrow and the day after to-morrow and every day and every week and every month, so long as there are some of those instincts which are now prevalent, in order to defeat a fair opponent, I shall be traduced before my fellow countrymen as having tried to malign and insult them.

Mr. SPROULE. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, there is an echo.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame, shame.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let me say this to that hon. gentleman that I am familiar with these appeals to passion and prejudice. In my own province——

Mr. SPROULE. I want to tell the right hon. gentleman that I have never appealed to passion or prejudice——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. SPROULE—to race or religion and I defy him or any man to say that I have done so, I do not care who he is.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In my own province the allies of the hon. gentleman, those who fight with him, have traduced me for years as a traitor to my race and religion. But, the cry is getting stale and a new one has to be invented. I have no more fear of this one than I had of the other. My experience has convinced me, my experience has proved to me that in this good land of Canada, in all sections thereof, in all classes thereof, in all races thereof, in all creeds thereof appeals to prejudice may create a flurry of excitement but they will invariably end in producing nothing but contempt in the hearts and minds of an intelligent and honest people.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). The taunt has been thrown across the floor of the House several times by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that we have forsaken the cause of Lord Dundonald, that we have nothing to say in his defence. Let me say at the very outset of the few remarks which I am to offer to the House that Lord Dundonald needs no defence from me or from any member of this House especially from this side of the House. The name of Lord Dundonald today has become a household word in almost every house in the Dominion of Canada. His defence is in the mouth of every patriotic, loyal and unbiased citizen of this country. Sir, we are now in the times when our young men assemble in the camps, and I have no doubt that every evening around the camp fire the youth of this country are discussing this question and that there are very few if there are any at all of the members of the militia force so assembled in camp who have not the praises of Lord Dundonald on their lips. But, Sir, coming from the province of Quebec, not at all that I believe I represent the province of Quebec, but, I am sure I represent the vast majority of those from the province of Quebec who are members of the militia when I say that if Lord Dundonald's praise is in the mouth of everybody outside of the province of Quebec that same praise is in the mouths of those who form the portion of the militia in the province of Quebec. I have taken particular pains to question my fellow countrymen, not now, but ever since Dundonald has had anything to do with the militia of Canada and the reply which I have received from the French Canadian officers has been that he has been the best commander in chief of the forces that they ever had.

Sir, he has always made himself especially agreeable to the French Canadian officers, speaking their language to them and showing them every mark of confidence and courtesy which one gentleman could show to another. I was struck by one part of the speech made by the right hon. gentleman, the lesson he read to the Minister of Militia and Defence. Last evening the Minister of Militia and Defence spoke of Lord Dundonald but did not at all speak in those terms which the right hon. the leader of the House has employed this evening. On the contrary I must say that I was pained at the tone used by the Minister of Militia, and I can see no better campaign literature for this party than to distribute all through Canada the speech made last night by the Minister of Militia. If I had anything to do with the organization of the party I would have that speech printed by the thousand and distributed all over the Dominion. What do we find ? We find the Minister of Militia constantly contrasting the nobleman, the patrician, with the humble colonial and the plebeian. It seems to me that it comes with very bad grace from the mouth of the Minister of Militia and Defence who not long ago, received the decoration of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, and wears upon his breast the star of that order, and is entitled to be called to-day 'Sir Frederick Borden.' I do not see why these sneers are cast upon the British aristocracy and especially upon Lord Dundonald because the Minister of Militia must have remembered that while it is true that Lord Dundonald was born a nobleman, he has also carved with his sword a great name upon the annals of the empire. Sir, I am an admirer of the British aristocracy. Whilst in other countries the scions of great houses seem to have forgotten the role they are called upon to play in the different vocations in which they should be engaged, in Great Britain, on the contrary, the heirs of the great names have remained faithful to the traditions of their race, and whether it be in peace or war, we find these great men taking their share either in defending the country in time of war or conducting its councils in time of peace.

Another insinuation which my hon. friend threw across the floor of the House against Lord Dundonald was that probably the action which he had seen fit to take when he made his speech at Montreal, knowing that in consequence of that speech he would probably have to separate himself from the militia of Canada was due to the fact that there was a scheme shortly to be placed before parliament by which the office of Commander in Chief was to be abolished. As if Lord Dundonald was to be influenced in any of his actions by the paltry salary of $4,000 which the country had been paying him for his valuable services ! Then again I was pained to hear the Minister of Militia making another insinuation and a more serious one against the noble lord the late General Officer Commanding, when he insinuated, speaking of the ordnance department, in the two cases of Lieutenant-Colonel Roy and Lieutenant-Colonel Bélanger, that probably it was on account of their nationality, of their being French Canadians, that he complained of their elevation to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. I think this was an unworthy insinuation, unworthy of my hon. friend and of the position which he occupies. My hon. friend growing eloquent just now, in speaking of arousing race prejudices, accused this side of the House of having done that. I would like to know what the Minister of Militia had in mind, and what the editors of the government organs have in mind, when they incite these animosities and say that one of the motives of Lord Dundonald in this case was that he made a difference between a French Canadian officer and an officer of another origin. It seems to me that the strong point of the government on which they have rested their case, was that Lord Dundonald was guilty of a gross breach of discipline in making the speech he did. These are the regulations of the British army which govern the British forces. The minister when he quoted these regulations was quoting something absolutely outside the case of Lord Dundonald. The regulation says :

> The regulations of the British army, which govern the Canadian force in all matters not specially provided for, prohibit 'deliberations or discussion by officers of soldiers with the object of conveying praise, censure, or any mark of approbation towards their superiors or any others in His Majesty's service.'
> The regulations for the militia of Canada lay down the rule that 'it cannot be permitted that (officers) shall bring accusations against superior officers or comrades.

What is meant here by 'superior officers?' Not the Minister of Militia, not any minister, but a superior officer in military command, because this word is certainly limited by the next words 'or comrades' which means comrades in arms, and I would like to know whether the Minister of Agriculture was the superior officer of Lord Dundonald on that occasion. Let me read this part of the Order in Council again.

> The regulation for the militia of Canada lay down the rule that 'it cannot be permitted that (officers) shall bring accusations against superior officers or comrades before the tribunal of public opinion, either by speech or letters inserted in any newspaper ; such a proceeding would be in glaring violation of the rules of military discipline, and in contempt of authority.'

If these are the rules which are to govern this case, is it not a fact that at every military banquet which the minister attends where officers laud the minister for what he has done for the militia, they should be summarily dismissed by this government? It shows that these regulations quoted in the Order in Council and again to-night, are absolutely beside the mark and have absolutely nothing to do with the case in point. They have to rest their case on this flimsy argument which cannot stand the light of the least examination for one minute. My hon. friend has tried to define the duties and obligations of the officer commanding from English authority. No hon. member on this side enunciated the extreme doctrine which my hon. friend tried to put in the mouths of hon. gentlemen on this side this afternoon that the General Officer Commanding was delegated here from the British government to represent the British government in matters military. Nobody on this side ever heard of such a doctrine. No newspaper or organ on this side ever promulgated such a proposition before the patient people of this country. The duties of the General Officer Commanding are laid down in the statute which my hon. friend quoted this evening. The statute says:

There shall be appointed an officer who holds the rank of colonel or rank superior thereto in Her Majesty's regular army, who shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia, and who, while he holds such appointment, shall have the rank of major general in the militia, and shall be paid at the rate of four thousand dollars per annum in full of all pay and allowances.

Now, Sir, the ground I take is this, that the General Officer Commanding is an expert adviser whom this government appoints in order to get advice on military matters which concern this country—upon the defence of the country, and upon all matters which relate to the organization and maintenance of the military force of the country. He is not to be here simply as a machine to follow the dictates of this one or that one. He must have some discretion. He is not, as I stated before, an employee of the government. He is a high officer of this government, with functions which have always been recognized, and are recognized to-day. I think Lord Dundonald had an absolutely correct idea of his duties when he said in his statement:

In all of my work I have endeavoured to keep steadily in view the nature of my post. I have not sought to impose my policy upon the minister or upon the cabinet. I have sought to carry out the plans approved by the government. In the technical administration of the force I held that I should be given a fairly free hand.

Not the control, as the Minister of Militia said last night, but simply a fairly free hand in the technical administration of the affairs of the militia.

At the same time I was careful to ascertain and consider the views of all persons interested. I claimed a smaller measure of freedom than is accorded to the general managers of important commercial companies. To make a railway pay it is necessary to leave detail matters of administration largely to the expert official in charge of the system. The managing of a military force is expert work, and the safety of the country is surely as important as the success of a railway. My claim for freedom extended only to the technical side of my work. I had no desire to force my policy upon the ministry.

Now, Sir, was any fact given in this House yesterday or to-day which shows that Lord Dundonald went beyond what he conceived to be his duty, and what was laid down as his duty in plain words? In this statement which he issued to the press there is not a tittle of evidence that he ever did anything which could be classed among acts of insubordination or disobedience to his minister, or which clashed with the authority of the head of his department. A good deal has been said yesterday and to-day with regard to the suppression of the second part of his report of 1902, and the minister's dealings with the report of 1902 and 1903. The leader of the House gave an altogether different reason for holding that those reports should not be published. He did not take the ground which the hon. Minister of Militia took last evening; but he went to a good deal of pains to quote authorities to show that those reports were confidential documents, and could not be laid on the table of the House except with the permission of the minister in charge of the department, in this case the Minister of Militia and Defence. He quoted from page 442 of Todd on 'Parliamentary Government in England.' I will not make the whole quotation again, but I will quote this much:

The system of laying upon the table of the House reports from officers addressed to particular departments of the executive government is most objectionable.' And the House ought not to insist 'upon the production of papers and correspondence which concerned the preparation and preliminary consideration of measures; they would thereby put a stop to that freedom of criticism which was always invited on such occasions, and which contributed so much to the perfection of public measures.'

Again my right hon. friend is beside the mark. These remarks do not at all apply to departmental reports in the sense that they are in the blue-books and are each year put upon the table of the House. You have only to refer to two pages before to see that these remarks refer to 'the practice in regard to the granting or withholding by the executive of information desired by either House of parliament.' When a motion is made in the House for the production of a document, the government on certain occasions is authorized and empowered to withhold the document on the ground that it may contain confidential or secret information, or information which it would not be in the interest of the public to lay before the House. This does not apply to reports which the minister is obliged each year to lay before the House. Why, the very Militia Act, which enacts that a commander-in-chief shall be appointed, contains the following in section 126 :—

All regulations made under this Act, and an annual report of the state of the militia, shall be laid before parliament by the Minister of Militia and Defence, within the first thirty days of the then next session thereof.

My right hon. friend says that even before this report could be handed to the minister, it should be asked ; but the statute says the contrary. I take the right hon. gentleman's word on a great many occasions as laying down the correct law, but when I find him in direct contradiction to the statute, I say he must be wrong. It was the bounden duty of the Minister of Militia and Defence, within the first thirty days of the session, to lay the report of the department before parliament ; and how is this report made up ? It is made up of the report of the General Officer Commanding and the heads of the different branches of the department, just as the report of any other department is made up. Therefore the argument of my right hon. friend falls to the ground. This is not the ground that the Minister of Militia took last evening. The ground he took was that this was a confidential, private or secret report ; and he said the same thing last session. He gave as his reasons for not producing the second part of the report of 1902 that it was a secret and confidential report. I say that argument is not correct. The report itself not only was not marked private, but by its very nature it was intended for pub lication. My hon. friend founded the principal argument he made upon the fact that the covering letter by which the report was sent to the minister was marked private, and he quoted this letter to show that the report itself must also have been private. Let me read some of these extracts again in order to show that the ground falls from under the feet of my right hon. friend. This is what the General Officer Commanding said :

Creichton Lodge,
Ottawa, Jan. 29, 1903.

'Private.'

Dear Sir Frederick,—I am sending you with this my report for the year 1902. I only received the last of the sub-reports to me last Saturday—there has been, as you are aware, a great deal of work involved, first in becoming acquainted with the system, then in discovering its weakness, then in suggesting remedies for improvement.

Exactly what the statute enacts that he should do. He is bound to describe the condition of the militia at the time he makes his report. He goes on to say :

I hope that the recommendations I make will commend themselves to you. I think they will, as from our conversations I believe we agree on many essential points. I don't think the country can obtain a cheaper or more efficient system for money expended than the one outlined if only you can see your way to get it adopted and the proper funds voted.

I am still confined to the house but hope to get out to-morrow and shall look forward to seeing you Monday at latest if convenient to you.

This letter was marked 'private' because it was intended for Sir Frederick Borden alone and not for his department. But to argue that because this letter was marked 'private,' the report itself was private and confidential is presuming rather much on the lack of intelligence of this House. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia last evening tried to make us believe, from reading these letters, that the general had consented to the suppression of part 2nd of his report. After stating his case, he said :

Now that is the record. Does that record bear out the statement which this right hon. gentleman has seen fit to make in this address of his to the people of Canada ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Who says yes ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do.

I was bold enough to say that the record bore out the statement which Lord Dundonald had made in what my hon. friend calls his address to the people of Canada. Why, all through these letters, the general discusses the question of the publishing of his report. Here is a letter dated the 31st of January, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, in which he said :

Dear Lord Dundonald,—I have carefully read your very interesting and able report. I don't know whether you intend Part II to form part of the annual report of the Minister of Militia and Defence for this year (i.e. 1902), but I am afraid it would not do to put forward a scheme which has not yet been considered as a whole even by the minister and of which the other members of the cabinet have as yet had absolutely no opportunity of knowing anything. Besides, there is the very grave question of propriety of giving such a scheme to the world ; at any rate, in such detail. Furthermore, you are aware that a scheme was recommended by the Defence Committee of 1898, approved by the War Office and adopted by the Canadian government.

Then he goes on to say :

Then there is the financial question. It is absolutely necessary that I should have a carefully prepared estimate of the cost involved in your proposals before they can be considered by the government.

So that the House will see that what the Minister of Militia was trying to do was to convince the General Officer Commanding that this report should not be published. He did not refuse to publish it, but he reasoned with the general and tried to convince him that it should not be made public. What does Lord Dundonald say ? He writes as follows :—

Dear Sir Frederick,—Yes, I will let you have the report with slight amendments as suggested almost at once. Will you let me have the part you have, and I will let you have the whole back again in a few hours ?

Again the Minister of Militia writes :

Dear Lord Dundonald,—I would like to again call attention to my letter of the 31st ultimo dealing with your annual report. After very careful consideration of the matter since that letter was written I am more than ever convinced of the correctness of the views therein expressed.

It is quite outside the province of an annual departmental report to propound a scheme or policy of defence and therefore I must ask you to be good enough to omit Part II (so called) from your report, and to amend Part I accordingly.

I shall be quite ready, however, to approve of the insertion in your annual report of a clause stating that you have prepared for my information a scheme which you think would (to use the words of the heading to part 2) 'conduce to the greater efficiency of the militia as a fighting force.'

May I ask, therefore, that the annual report be amended as above suggested, and placed in my hands to-day so that it may go to the printer.

Did Lord Dundonald acquiesce in the request made to him by the hon. minister ? Here is what he says on the 28th of February :

Dear Sir Frederick,—I return the report divided as you wish. There was a difficulty in getting that work done Saturday owing to the day being a half holiday.

From one end of these letters to the other, you will see the discussion going on, and not once did Lord Dundonald acquiesce in the request made to him that part 2nd of his report should be suppressed. I ask if the argument which my hon. friend the Minister of Militia based upon the word 'private' on the first letter can stand. Is it not a fact that this report was recognized by the minister as essentially a report for publication ? If not, why was part 1st published. It was published because the statute enacts that these reports must be given to parliament and part 1st went in the same envelope as part 2nd. My hon. friend, the Minister of Militia, states that this probably involved a great change and that it did not commend itself to his judgment. But a few days after, my hon. friend delivered a eulogy upon the General Officer Comanding, and I think it is only right that I should read it because it is the best praise that probably could be given Lord Dundonald under the circumstances, coming as it does from the man who last evening passed such strictures on his conduct :

We might congratulate ourselves in this country on having at the head of the military side of the Militia Department a gentleman who understood the importance of all he (Sir Frederick) had said. (Cheers.) He was not only a great warrior, as he had proved in a dozen battles—(cheers)—but he was a man of sound sense and judgment.

And this was after he had given in his part 2nd of his report of 1902. He was still a man of sound sense and judgment according to the Minister of Militia :

Who was here for the purpose not of self-aggrandizement, not of playing to the gallery and having his name and praises sounded on every possible opportunity, but of developing the material he found into one of the best fighting forces on the earth.

I cannot understand how it is that after passing this eulogy on the General Officer Comanding, my hon. friend can come to the House and describe the general as a man absolutely inferior and not at all fit for the high position to which he had been called. What is the reason the report of 1903 was mutilated ? Here is the most extraordinary reason given for doing this which I have ever heard a minister give in this House. It is to be found on column 5441 of the revised 'Hansard :'

I did not object to the report so much as I objected to the publication of certain portions, and I wished him to amend it, and he, as I supposed, agreed to do so. Some of the objections which I made to it were that it referred to documents which had not been brought down to parliament, which there was no intention to bring to parliament. I informed him that the moment that report was laid on the table of the House, the members of the House would have the right to ask for the documents ; and, as we did not wish to bring the documents down, I did not wish these references put in the report.

It seems to me that this is a most extraordinary reason for the correcting or the mutilating of the report of 1903. I am not at all in favour of militarism or a standing army, but it seems to me that if we are to spend $2,000,000 a year on our militia, we ought to get some return in the shape of an efficient force and not have, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) described it last year, the shadow of a skeleton. The General Officer Commanding is an officer of the Militia Department. It was he who made this report, and I can quite understand that if it contained disclosures upon the condition of the defences of this country, which should be considered confidential, there might have been some reason for suppressing it. But this has not been alleged ; and the only reason given by my hon. friend last night was that it contained a new scheme for the defence of Canada. Sir, I do not wish to establish the people of this country as judge between the General

Officer Commanding and the Minister of Militia ; but if there is nothing detrimental to the best interest of the country contained in that report the people who pay the General Officer Commanding, and who have the interest in the militia, have the right to see part 2 of the report of 1902, so as to be able to judge whether or not this parliament should vote more money, or less money, or make some change in the plans or system of the militia.

I shall not go over all the arrangements in the debate but let me come to the more contentious part of the amendment. My hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Pope) alluded to a coincidence which I had intended to speak of. We know that in the latter part of 1903, there was a hotly contested election in the county of Brome for one of the seats in the legislature of Quebec. In the selection of a candidate, and in the carrying on of the campaign, the Minister of Agriculture took a prominent part. And when the treasurer of the province of Quebec was elected as member for Brome, his election was contested before the courts, and as stated by my hon. friend from Compton, the petition protesting the election was signed by the firm of Baker and Baker, which firm is composed of Senator Baker and his son. And in this petition the House will remark, the Minister of Agriculture was accused of illegal practices under the Election Act of Quebec. If this protest had gone to the courts, and if the facts had been proved, the hon, gentleman (Mr. Fisher) stood to be disqualified for any office in the province of Quebec and subject also to a heavy penalty. The case was so serious that, at the last session of the legislature of Quebec, a special Bill was introduced to relieve these gentlemen from the penalties to which they had subjected themselves by their conduct in that election. I am glad to say, for the honour of the province of Quebec and the dignity of its legislature that the Bill failed to pass. Still the effort was made. On whose behalf was it made ? On behalf of the gentleman who had taken an active and illegal part in the election in Brome. The case was serious, and, of course, the men who had signed this petition were open to the vengeance of my right hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. A little while afterwards the organization of this regiment in the eastern townships was undertaken. And what does my hon. friend say ?

> I must premise my explanation in regard to this matter by saying that Senator Baker, of Sweetsburg, is the acknowledged and active leader of the Conservatives of that district.

> And the hon. gentleman should have added, 'and he signed a petition asking for my disqualification.'

> I found this list of proposed names for the staff for the neighbourhood of Sweetsburg. First, Mr. John M. Gibson, a nephew of Senator Baker, and talked of as a possible Conservative candidate in the constituency of Missisquoi, to be third in command of that regiment. Dr. Pickel, one of the strongest Conservative workers of the neighbourhood and a family connection of Senator Baker, to be major in command of the squadron which, though gazetted for Adamsville, was to be changed to Sweetsburg to suit his convenience. Mr. G. H. Baker, son of Senator Baker, to be senior captain of the said squadron. Mr. Thomas R. Pickel, son-in-law of Senator Baker to be the junior captain of the said squadron. Then, there were the names of two gentlemen, Messrs. Steacie and Reynolds, of Montreal, to be lieutenants.

So, while this petition was before the courts this terrible Baker family was known for its loyalty throughout the eastern townships and was ready to wear the uniform of His Majesty and fight the battles of his country; and immediately my hon. friend said : I will not have this, especially, I will not have Dr. Pickel, who is a son-in-law of Dr. Pickel—he must go or there will be no organization of this squadron in the eastern townships. Now, what is the statement made by Colonel Smart ? Let me read from the documents that have been laid before the House :

> Dr. Pickel is a man of means, can ride fairly well, and was quite willing to take the necessary time to qualify himself for the position of major. Mr. Fisher objected to him for no other reason than that he was a strong political opponent of his and was quite determined to block the whole organization, unless Dr. Pickel's name was withdrawn.

I do not know Colonel Smart, and am not aware whether he is a Conservative or Liberal ; but I must say that if he were a prominent Conservative, I would probably have heard of him and would have noted him before this. But I find him a man not afraid to give the exact version of what took place when he met the Minister of Agriculture. He says that Dr. Pickel was not then qualified, but he was a man of means, able to ride and ready to make the sacrifice of the time necessary to qualify himself for the position he was to hold in the regiment. But he was allied with the House of Baker, and the name of Baker was signed to a petition which contested the election of Brome. So, Dr. Pickel was to go, and, if not out, this regiment was not to be organized and the eastern townships would have to do without it. Is this statement of Colonel Smart controverted in this House ? What does my hon. friend the Minister of Militia say ? I quote from page 26 of the correspondence, a letter from the Minister of Agriculture to Colonel Whitley dated, Ottawa, 20th of May :

> I think you will appreciate that I have not asked nearly as much as impetuous friends in the county expected, but I think that what I have asked has been entirely reasonable.

Who were the 'impetuous friends'? Were they 'impetuous' in getting up this military organization. No. They were 'impetuous' political friends of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. This shows that the hon. Minister of Agriculture was taking counsel in the county not from those who were trying to get up the organization of a regiment of cavalry, but from those who were trying to foist upon the regiment men whom they thought it desirable to appoint to the positions in it. And the Minister of Agriculture says that he has not got so much as his 'impetuous' friends asked for, but that he had got a good deal. He confesses judgment—he says that he has tried his best to get all that his friends demanded, that he has got a good deal and that they must be satisfied. And what does Colonel Whitley say at page 27 of the same report? This was read by my hon. friend from Compton, (Mr. Pope) but it will bear repetition:

I think I told you, in Ottawa, my views re the drinking question. I dread an intemperate officer; they are useless, indeed of great harm wherever they appear, and, candidly, I would prefer political opponents to such.

The worst man would be an intemperate officer, but the next would be a political opponent. All through this correspondence, it is plain to be seen that the object these hon. gentlemen had was not to keep this regiment from being made a Tory preserve, but to make it a Liberal preserve. And what does Mr. Brenham say—page 29?

Now, if you do not get any applications from any of our fellows, rather than see it go to those fellows in Sweetsburg, I would take a commission and do the best I could, so will leave the matter in your hands and will be satisfied with the results.

Sir, these gentlemen were trying to get their 'fellows' into the regiment. Who were their 'fellows'? Their political friends. And they were trying to exclude as far as possible any member of the Baker family, exclude as far as common decency would permit, any Conservatives from the regiment and were trying to get their 'fellows' in if possible. Now, let me read further on from this same page, 29, a letter from the Minister of Agriculture to a Mr. Clinton:

He and Mr. Parmelee and I have been discussing matters here at length, and Mr. Parmelee and I are satisfied that he is honestly desirous of remedying these mistakes and doing anything he can to meet our views.

Here is Mr. Parmelee brought in now. For what purpose? Is Mr. Parmelee a military expert? Does he know anything about the requirements of the militia? Does he know anything about the military qualifications of these gentlemen? If he was consulted, he must have been consulted merely as to the political qualifications of 'our fellows' in the different places in which this regiment was being recruited.

It is impossible, however, to make all the changes that our friends would like.

'Our friends would like.' It was purely from a political standpoint and no other that these appointments were being made.

The most important ones, have, however, been made. Dr. Pickel is not to be given command of the squadron, and Tom. Pickel is to be made lieutenant instead of captain.

When they could not put him out they reduced him in rank.

Clifton Miltimore is to be given a captaincy. We have adopted the plan that men without any military experience as a rule should start as lieutenants. The squadron which was named for Adamsville is to be changed to Cowansville, not Sweetsburg.

No, they would not go into that Tory town of Sweetsburg, but they would go somewhere else—always the political motive at the foundation of everything in the organization of this regiment.

The squadron which was named for Mansonvile is to be changed to Knowlton.

Many hon. gentlemen may not know that Mansonville in the county of Brome is the place in which Mr. Manson resides, and that Mr. Manson was an opponent of Mr. McCorkill in the local fight of which I have just spoken. Of course they had to take the squadron out of Mansonville so that it would not be contaminated by Mr. Manson or any of those bad Tories, and put it in Knowlton which was not such a Tory locality as Mansonville. But is it not a fact that far from being disproved, the statement of Colonel Smart was carried out by all the letters which have been written by my hon. friend, and my hon. friend has stated before this House time and again that he was determined that this regiment would not be a Tory preserve. Here again we see that the political hand of my hon. friend was busy in meddling in this matter and in trying to keep as many Conservatives out as he could.

Now what are the consequences of all this? The consequences of this intermeddling will have a deterrent effect upon the minds of those who want to join the militia of this country. When men of means, capable of joining the militia force would like to do so, they will be deterred by the knowledge that if they are Conservatives they will have no advancement and no promotion, that they will be kept out of positions, and that they will get scant justice and even scant courtesy from the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now this country has to choose between the Minister of Agriculture and Lord Dundonald. My right hon. friend the leader of the House this evening said that he could not agreee with the last paragraph of the resolution moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. He went further, and he said that this last paragraph is not borne out by the facts laid before the House. Sir, it is true that Lord Dundonald, in his statement to the press, has given other instances of meddling and interference by the Minister of Agriculture. But what came to pass ? This came to pass, that 'the last straw which broke the camel's back' as the hon. gentleman said last night, was the meddling of my hon. friend in the organization of this squadron in the eastern townships. It was his meddling and interference, when he had no right to do it, because he was interfering from purely political motives, and this is what Lord Dundonald resented. Now we see that the action of the hon. gentleman has culminated in the retirement of Lord Dundonald, in the dismissal of Lord Dundonald, in his being sent away from this country under a cloud, as it were, having his services dispensed with by this government. The country will have to choose between Lord Dundonald and the Minister of Agriculture. I never knew before that my hon. friend was so great an adept in military matters, and I am forcibly reminded of one of the letters of Mr. Dooley entitled 'In peace and in war.' Hon. gentlemen who have read this remarkable book will remember probably that the President of the United States is recruiting some officers to send them to the war, in Cuba against the Spanish, and one man comes up and the president said: 'What kind of pyjamas do you wear'? 'Silk pyjamas.' 'Well,' said the president, 'I will make a brigadier general of you.' Sir, I must apologize for having mentioned before this distinguished audience these unmentionables, and I must also apologize for having called to the mind of my listeners the spectacle of the Minister of Agriculture arrayed in his somewhat unmartial rig. Now this is the question before the House. The country will be called upon to decide, in a short time I hope, between the Minister of Agriculture and Lord Dundonald. We have put the case before the country. The people know the merits of the question, and I have no doubt that when the time comes to decide, Lord Dundonald will emerge from the discussion what he is now, and what he was when he came to this country, a most useful and experienced soldier, whose reputation the Minister of Agriculture has only endanced in the hearts and minds of every fair minded citizen of Canada.

Mr. ANDREW B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Though the hour is late I shall not apologize for taking up a few minutes in discussing this question. I shall try to make my remarks free from any partisan bias whatever, and aside from any political opinions I may hold. I have for years in this House taken some interest in military matters, not that I am a military man, but observing from session to session that though we have a membership in this House of 214, whenever a question came up affecting the militia of Canada, the discussion was conducted by but very few members. So I felt it my duty in my own humble way to take some part in the discussion of military questions when they came before this House, because the greater part of the members did not do so. Since I have been a member of this House I have noticed a vast difference in the military feeling among the members. A good many years ago when the Minister of Militia asked for a reasonable amount to promote the militia he received very little assistance in passing his estimates, although they were niggardly in amount. During the Conservative regime I always understood, at all events, I never noticed that any partisan feeling governed the action of the Militia Department in those days.

I would like to believe to-day that no political feeling is engendered by the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence in the administration of his department. I would like to believe that and on that line I am going to proceed with my argument though my remarks will be brief and to the point. It has been said in this discussion and said repeatedly by the hon. Minister of Agriculture that he had no desire to introduce party politics into the militia of this country, that what he did he did in the interest of the militia and that was his sole object and aim. I would like to believe that statement in the interest of the militia, but I do not think the hon. gentleman will pretend to believe that his conduct in this matter was purely non-partisan. His language has been such as to lead me to believe that his conduct was rather partisan, But, the point at issue in this case is simply this : The commander of the forces of Canada, by reason of certain interference, has, in a speech at Montreal, stated that the act of the hon. Minister of Agriculture was the last straw that broke the camel's back and that by reason of that act the commander of the forces was forced to speak out at the banquet in Montreal. Now, Sir, I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether he was acting improperly in doing that. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether the government are justified in dismissing him. That is not the point I am going to discuss. I have always been led to believe in this House that the military forces of this or any other country, I care not where it is, are the most successful that observe strict discipline. I have recognized that there is a head of the militia force. I have recognized that the Minister of Militia is the head of the militia force of this country and that next to him is the commander of the forces. I have looked over the report of the Department of Militia and Defence which was laid on the table of the House this session and I find that, notwithstanding the quotations of rules and regulations read by the right hon. Prime Minister and by my hon. friend from Montmorency to-night, this report states that :

The present organization of the department, so far as the branches under the control, or supervision, of the General Officer Commanding are concerned, is outlined in a Minute of Council, dated October 29, 1903, which was promulgated as General Order 159, 1903, as follows :

DISTRIBUTION OF DUTIES.

The General Officer Commanding.

1. The General Officer Commanding shall be charged with the military command and discipline of the militia, shall issue General Orders and hold periodical inspection of the militia.

He shall be the principal adviser of the Minister of Militia and Defence on all military questions and shall be charged with the control of the branches of the Adjutant General, the Director General of Military Intelligence and Military Secretary, and the general supervision of the other military branches.

He shall be charged with the general distribution and localization of the militia, and with the selection and proposal to the Minister of Militia and Defence of fit and proper persons to be recommended for commissions in the militia, of fit and proper officers for promotions, for staff and other military appointments, and for military honours and rewards.

Then this goes on to state the duties of the respective branches. It refers to the adjutant's general's branch, the intelligence branch, the military secretary's branch, the quartermaster general's branch, the engineer service branch, the ordnance branch and the medical services branch. It concludes:

All orders or regulations inconsistent with this Order in Council are hereby cancelled.

These are the duties of the various officers whose work is subject to the approval of the commanding officer, who, after he has approved of any matters affecting the forces, submits them to the minister for his approval. In this report I do not see that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has any duties to perform in connection with the militia, and I am giving to the hon. minister of Agriculture the same rights as the hon. Minister of Finance or any other cabinet minister has and what are they ? They are that when the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence takes his report to Council and these gentlemen sit around the council board, whenever that document is placed before them for their consideration, they are quite within their rights and they are doing their duty as I understand it when they undertake to discuss that document. We have heard a great deal about etiquette in the city of Ottawa. I take it when the commander of the forces referred to etiquette in the city of Ottawa he meant that the hon. Minister of Agriculture, without consulting the head of his department, without consulting the commander of the forces had undertaken to write to certain officers in the eastern townships asking them to accept commissions in the force in which it was no part of his duty, but interfering with the duties of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence and the Officer Commanding the forces of this country, thus committing a breach of military etiquette. It does not require a military man to go down to the camp which is now being held at Rockliffe to discover that a corporal is jealous of his authority and of his rights, that a lieutenant, a captain, a major, or a colonel is jealous of his authority and stands on his dignity in exercising his authority. So it is with the General Officer Commanding the forces. The hon. Minister of Agriculture stated that when the officer commanding the forces telephoned to him and asked him to make some arrangement by which he could discuss this question with him, he gave him to understand that he had an office down town and that if there was anything he desired to consult him about he knew where to find his office. I would have thought that if Lord Dundonald or the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence desired to consult the hon. Minister of Agriculture on matters affecting agriculture the least the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence or the commander of the forces could do would be to go to the office of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, but when the hon. Minister of Agriculture was asked to discuss some matters in which he was interfering and for that purpose to come to the office of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence it would not have been undignified on the part of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to have done so, and it certainly would have been more in line with the discipline of the militia of this country. He was dealing with a question affecting the militia of Canada in a department with which he had nothing to do other than any other Minister of the Crown has occasionally to deal with certain matters coming before the Privy Council of which he is a member. I do not deny him the right to deal with these matters at the Privy Council but the hon. Minister of Agriculture had a right to go and consult the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence and the commander of the forces, if he felt disposed to do so. I want to say that if this hon. gentleman had shown a disposition to make matters easy for the commander of the forces, if he had not desired to create dissensions amongst military men or put obstacles in the way of the commander of the forces, if his sole desire was to promote the welfare of the militia in the eastern townships the least he could have done would have been to have gone to the Department of Militia and Defence and there to have sat quietly down and discussed this matter with the commander of the forces. I am sure that Lord Dundonald would have quietly sat down with him and discussed this matter and that if he had suggested anything that Lord Dundonald deemed to be in the interest of the militia or in the interest of that portion of the force in the eastern townships he would have been only too glad to have accepted the suggestion.

That in my judgment would have been a proper course to pursue. A good deal has been said about Lord Dundonald in this House. I have watched closely and read extensively of the career of that gentleman in South Africa and it struck me that the language used was not justified by his career. The language was harsh and in my judgment uncalled for. Lord Dundonald is human like the rest of us, and he may have his faults. I heard the Prime Minister say let 'him who is without sin cast the first stone.' If he had erred in this case, I suppose he must suffer to the extent of his error, but whatever his error might have been I am quite within the mark when I say that his hearty wholesouled desire was for the welfare of the militia of this country and not for his own advancement. No man will charge him with being a political partisan. He has had a great deal of experience as an officer for many years, and now after one year in Canada we are told that he is unfit to command the militia of Canada.

We have heard a good deal about his report. Last year when the report of the Militia Department was laid on the table—and I take sufficient interest in the militia to read carefully every word submitted by that department for consideration—I discovered that there was a second report not published, and like two or three other members on this side—who take a lively interest in military matters, I was eager to know the contents of that report, because it occurred to me if we have an officer as capable as Lord Dundonald, capable enough to be sent by the British authorities to Canada, to take charge of our militia, any suggestions that he might have to offer to the people would be worthy of perusal and of consideration, and of examination in order to see whether the suggestions offered were such as the people of this country ought to adopt. I have here a report that was placed before the Privy Council, a document with the 13th Dragoons struck out on the 14th of May. That was done while it was before council. Why ? On account of certain interference by the Minister of Agriculture, certain objections he raised to certain persons on the list, in connection with the military organization in the eastern townships. Again on the 19th of May, the Minister of Agriculture struck out the name of Dr. Pickel, in the name of the Minister of Militia. If the Minister of Agriculture was requested to act in the place of the Minister of Militia on that particular occasion, the 19th instant, and if he on that morning had received a document from Colonel Smart to the effect that he wanted the name of Mr. Pickel struck out I would go so far as to say the Minister of Agriculture acting on behalf of the Minister of Militia, had a perfect right to strike it out, but when I go that far I call the attention to the fact, that he interfered previous to that, and had written letters in order to block Mr. Pickel in this matter when he was not acting as Minister of Militia. There is where the sin and the partisanship on the part of the Minister of Agriculture came in. He was not acting as the Minister of Militia, but was acting the part of a partisan. I would like to draw attention to a little matter in my own experience some few years ago and from this experience and the debate which is drawing to a close, I am bound to say that if the people of this country make a change from an officer who comes to this country from England and place the militia in the hands of a Canadian officer, we will have many instances of this kind occurring. On Wednesday, November 7th, 1900, we had a general election. In 1900 we had an estimate brought down in this House for a grant for an armoury, in the city of St. Thomas, of $8,000. The ground was bought on May 21, 1900. In 1901 we had placed in the estimates $24,000 in one case and $7,000 in another, a total in all of $39,000 for a drill hall and armoury in St. Thomas. The election took place on the 7th of November, but no contract was let, and no money was voted beyond the $8,000, but on November 3rd, four days previous to the general election although no contract had been let, the Minister of Public Works came to St. Thomas brought several soldiers there, and the Minister of Public Works went down and turned the first sod of an armoury for the building of which not one dollar had been voted by parliament. I think that comment is unnecessary; I shall simply place that on record and leave the House to judge whether there has been any partisan interference in this department. Last session I heard a gentleman make one of the best military speeches I have heard in this House for many years, a gentleman trusted by this government who filled a very important position in London, during the Jubillee. I refer to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson). I am bound to say that he spoke without any partisan feeling. His remarks were approved by members on both sides. After the hundreds of thousands of dollars which we had expended in this country for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the militia the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thompson) rose and among other things said :

I have shown that we were called upon to furnish the skeleton of a skeleton. I now state that we have actually turned out the shadow of a skeleton of a skeleton. Can anything so ghost-like be longer called a militia force? . . . . I know the case of one company which this year had two officers and six non-commissioned officers to command two men, one of whom was the cook.

This is a statement made not by any partisan on this side, but by a government supporter in a non-partisan spirit. And in view of the fact of our having some 4,000 miles of boundary line, between this country and the United States, it is not too much to say that Lord Dundonald's remarks were quite justified, when he said that we are living in a fools paradise.

So we are; there is no question about it. If anything should occur between the United States and Canada, which God forbid, should we not in time of peace prepare for war? The very fact that we are preparing for war is the reason we shall have peace maintained in the country. If the recommendations of the General Officer Commanding are not to be considered, what is the use of having a man of that character come to this country? It is simply a waste of time and a waste of money. When this report is kept from the people of this country we are not in a position to judge of it. Some hon. gentlemen say, why should we be allowed to consider it? If hon. gentlemen will take the pains to go into the library and turn up the militia reports submitted to this House from year to year, they will find that certain recommendations are made in all those reports by the General Officer Commanding, the deputy minister and other officers, which are not carried out. Some are carried out and some are not carried out. In view of that fact, is there any harm in the commander of the forces having his suggestions embodied in the report? If parliament does not feel disposed to adopt any of them, well and good. The majority in parliament have that power. I think this unfortunate occurrence is greatly to be regretted, and nobody will regret it more than the militia of this country.

I am called on to-night to cast a vote for the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition. I have heard that amendment criticised. I have heard the question asked, why have you not moved a resolution condemning the government for dismissing Lord Dundonald? I suppose that when Lord Dundonald made his statement in Montreal, he knew what he was doing. I presume that in making that statement, he felt that the breach would be made so wide between the government and himself that it would be utterly impossible for him to remain in the service any longer. Therefore it is not for the leader of the opposition to move in respect to that. What has he moved? That:—

> The selection and appointment of officers in the militia should be made without regard to party political considerations which if permitted to exercise an influence will prove disastrous to the efficiency of the force.

I am glad to support that part of this amendment,

> That while the Minister of Militia is charged with and responsible for the administration of militia affairs the General Officer Commanding is by law charged under the orders of His Majesty with the military command and discipline of the militia and with the duty of recommending to the Minister of Militia fit and proper persons for appointment to commissions therein.

Surely there can be no objection to that, because, if we are to believe the Minister of Agriculture, that is exactly his idea, though I am sorry to say that he has departed from it. Then we have this important part:

> That the conduct of the Honourable Sydney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture, in interfering with the commanding officer of the Thirteenth Scottish Light Dragoons while that officer was engaged in the duty of selecting his subordinate officers for the approval of and for recommendation by the General Officer Commanding; and the action of that minister in interposing party political influence between the General Officer Commanding and his officers and in requiring recommendations and appointments to be made or disallowed from party considerations, deserves and should receive the censure of this House.

I can support that because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) has himself admitted that he acted in a partisan manner in the formation of this corps in the eastern townships. Then, finally:

> The House regrets that this unwarrantable interference has been approved by the government, and that it not only has unduly delayed the organization of the regiment, but has culminated in depriving the militia of Canada of an experienced and distinguished commanding officer.

Sir, I regret the latter portion of this amendment exceedingly, in view of the treatment meted out to that distinguished gentleman by the Minister of Agriculture, who had no more right to interfere with the selection of those officers and with Colonel Smart, even in a non-partisan sense, than I or any other member of this House had. When he interfered without consulting the head of the Militia Department or the commander of the forces, he acted as this amendment says, in a partisan spirit, and in a way that cannot be justified by any one who has the welfare of the militia of this country at heart.

Mr. E. HACKETT (West Prince). Mr. Speaker, before you put the question, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who it appears is the Minister of Militia, has any trouble arisen in Prince Edward Island with regard to the militia camps?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot give the hon. gentleman any answer.

Mr. HACKETT. Well, where is the Minister of Militia ? Who is the Minister of Militia in this country ? I have here a clipping from the Charlotfetown 'Daily Patriot,' the organ of the government in the province of Prince Edward Island, published on the 24th of June, 1904, which says :

THE MILITIA CAMPS.

Militia orders were received in this city yesterday prohibiting the use of Victoria barrack grounds as formerly for militia camp. It had been represented to the department that the stores and buildings were in probable danger of fire in having such a large body of men encamped in the immediate vicinity. It had been also represented that the latrines were offensive to the families in the vicinity.

I need not read the whole of the document, but want some information from the government. The article goes on :

We might say, as far as the latrines are concerned, they are inspected daily by the medical officer, field officer and captain of the day and specially attended under the supervision of the quartermaster. Up to this date there has never been a single complaint on this matter.

On receipt of the communication from Ottawa, forbidding the holding of the camp, to Colonel Moore, D.O.C., Colonel Stewart immediately called a meeting of his officers, who, after learning the situation, wired as follows:

Charlottetown, June 21, 1904.

To Messrs. D. A. MacKinnon and H. Haszard, M.P.'s, Ottawa.

Letter dated June 16th from A.G. to-day, refused use of barrack square militia camp next Tuesday. Contracts already let for supplies, as orders were issued to encamp usual place. In camp there seventeen years. No other grounds available this late date. Building safe from fire. Latrines never offensive to families. Adjutant General visiting here last year said, 'Ideal place for camp.' Scenic grounds. See Militia Department. Very urgent; wire.

Last evening Colonel Stewart received the following reply :—

Ottawa, June 21, 1904.

To Lieut.-Colonel Stewart, Charlottetown.

Telegram received. Will see minister soon as can find him.

(Sgd.) D. A. MacKINNON.

Where was the minister that it was so difficult to find him ? Mr. D. A. MacKinnon, the member for East Queen's, telegraphed to Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart that as soon as he could find the minister he would let him know the facts. This paper, the Charlottetown 'Patriot' goes on to say :

This morning the Charlottetown Board of Trade sent the following telegram :—

To Messrs. MacKinnon and Haszard, M.P.'s, Ottawa.

Board of Trade strongly urge that business men and all citizens are particularly interested in having camp at Charlottetown.

N. RATTEBURY,
President,
J. A. MESSERVEY,
Vice President,
GEORGE E. HUGHES,
GEORGE E. AULD,
W. W. STANLEY,
F. L. HASZARD,
BENJAMIN ROGERS,
ALEXANDER HORNE,
T. B. RILEY,
W. F. TIDMARSH,
T. HANDRAHAN.

It will thus be seen that there is really nothing in the objections raised forbidding the holding of the camp in the barrack square. Further, the leading business men of Charlottetown, on both sides of politics, as well as the citizens generally are determined that the camps shall not be removed. We are at a loss to know who has dared to raise so many objections to our militia camps this season. We are convinced that it cannot be a friend of our people and a well wisher to our city. The militia is regarded, and rightly so, as an attraction and a financial benefit to the city and citizens. Charlottetown being the capital of Prince Edward Island, it and it alone is the proper place for military headquarters and annual camp. The grounds as Lord Aylmer said 'are ideal' and our people will not submit to have the camp removed and the militia to a certain extent disorganized on so flimsy an excuse.

Might I ask the Prime Minister what answer he has to give to this ? Our young men in Prince Edward Island—I speak as an old militiaman myself—turn out each year in camp to the number of four or five hundred. Our young men also have shed their blood on the yellow veldts of South Africa in defence of the empire, and I would ask what reason is there now why they should not be allowed to camp on the barrack square as they have been doing for the past seventeen years? Sir, we have had charges made this evening against Lord Dundonald. Well, I think that the hero of the relief of Ladysmith can take care of himself. We have also had charges made against the gallant Colonel (Mr. Sam. Hughes) who crossed the ocean to fight for his country. The man with a small mind and smaller brain, who expects to be made a judge in Nova Scotia, made a personal attack on this hon. gentleman who so gallantly fought for his country. Where was the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) when the hon. member for Victoria (Mr.

Sam. Hughes) was in South Africa upholding the cause of the empire ? Where was that little man at that time ? He was sitting down quietly by his fireside, drawing his pay as a professor at Dalhousie college and awaiting quietly until the time would come when, like the giant from Guysboro, he would receive a judgeship. It is evident that I cannot get any information from the government and at this late hour I do not wish to prolong discussion, but I desire to call the attention especially of the Minister of Agriculture to this fact, that a camp has not been allowed to be held this year on the barrack square at Charlottetown as it has been in the last seventeen years.

House divided on amendment of Mr. R. L. Borden.

Amendment (Mr. R. L. Borden) negatived.

Mr. CALVERT. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to call you attention to the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has not voted.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture(. Although, on such an occasion it would have been quite consonant with the practice of the House that I should vote, yet, as my name is mentioned in this motion I prefer not to participate in the division.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Progress reported.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). What business may we expect for Monday ?

The PRIME MINISTER. On Monday we will go into Supply, taking up the estimates of my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock).

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.40 a.m. Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, June 27, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. CHAS. FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 144) to amend the Act of the present session respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company.

Mr. INGRAM. Would the hon. gentleman kindly explain this Bill ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. This Bill is introduced at the request of the secretary of the Railway Committee of the House of Commons to supply an omission that occurred in connection with the Bill. The name of the Great Northern Railway Company was omitted in one of the paragraphs. The paragraph is intended to give power to the Temiscouata Railway Company to sell its charter to a certain company. The Bill as introduced originally contained the name of the Great Northern Railway Company, which has been omitted. Mr. Hartney writes me a letter which I will read to the House, and which is as follows :

Ottawa, 20th June, 1904.

Hon. C. Fitzpatrick, Minister of Justice.

Dear Sir,—Inclosed is a draft Bill to amend the Act of the present session respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company, the object of which is to correct an error made by myself. It will be quite in order if so desired to introduce this Bill without notice and to pass it through the several stages at one sitting.

Yours respectfully,
(Sgd.) E. P. HARTNEY.

I do not think it necessary to deal with the Bill in that way, but I simply introduce it to rectify this error committed by Mr. Hartney.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Probably it would be better to introduce the Bill, give it its first reading, and then to-morrow there would be no difficulty about passing it through all its stages.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is not printed, any way.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT, 1903—AMENDMENT.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 145) to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, 1903.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) kindly explain the purport of this Bill ?

Mr. FISHER. This is a very short Bill to add one disease to the list of diseases held to be contagious, and which is known as Maladie du coit, or equine syphilis, which has been found in the Northwest Territories, and which is brought in from the United States. We require to take drastic measures to try and stamp it out. The Bill also goes on to authorize us, within limits, to pay compensation in case of the slaughter of horses, the present Act only providing for compensation in case of the slaughter of cattle.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ALASKAN BOUNDARY—INQUIRY FOR PAPERS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to remind the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that the Alaskan boundary papers, which were promised last week, have not been brought down.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). They are in the hands of the printer now.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC—EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask also whether or not the report of Judge Winchester in regard to the matters which have been committed to him for investigation has been received or is likely to be received at an early date ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The report has not been received, nor am I in a position to state to-day how near the inquiry is to completion. I understand that Judge Winchester will be in Ottawa on Wednesday of this week. I received a letter from him this morning stating that he is at North Bay, and on Wednesday I will be in a position to ask him when we may expect his report.

YUKON—TREADGOLD COMMISSION.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like also to inquire whether or not the report of the commission to investigate certain matters connected with concessions in the Yukon has been received ; and, if not, whether we could have any more definite information than that already afforded as to the date when it will be received ?

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior). I have no information further than what I stated to the House when the hon. gentleman spoke about it before.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I might suggest that it would be desirable to expedite it as far as possible. The commission was issued nearly a year ago. Matters involved in this investigation were debated in the House, I think, quite a year ago, and as we hope the session will not last many weeks longer, it is desirable to have the report brought down as soon as possible. I understand that the investigation, as far as the taking of evidence is concerned, was concluded a great many months ago, and that some months have elapsed since a new commission was issued to Mr. Justice Britton. I would think that there is no reason why the report of the commission should not be in the hands of the government at the present time, but if the delay is due to the fact that Mr. Justice Britton is prevented from giving this matter his attention by reason of other public duties, it only affords an additional argument to indicate that these matters should not be committed to gentlemen who are so otherwise engaged.

SEIZURE OF BINDER TWINE—INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the government when we may expect the papers ordered in the early part of last week in relation to the seizure of binder twine ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry that I cannot give any information to-day to my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy). I will reserve it until to-morrow.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 143) respecting the New Brunswick Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Gibson.

Bill (No. 141) for the relief of Eliza Robertson.—Mr. Macdonald.

QUESTIONS.

I.C.R.—MESSRS. LAPLANTE AND BEAULIEU.

Mr. GAUVEREAU asked :

1. Is the Minister of Railways and Canals, or any of the officers of his department, aware that two employees in the Intercolonial Railway yards at Rivière du Loup—Messrs Laplante and Beaulieu—have undergone a first investigation before Mr. Brassard, chief train-despatcher at Rivière du Loup, on the order of Mr. Dubé, the superintendent, and that they were exonerated from all blame ; that Mr. Dubé, the superintendent, had them subjected to a second investigation, and that he found them guilty and suspended them from work, and that after a third investigation before Mr. J. E. Price, general manager, they were declared not guilty, and reinstated in their position ?

2. If not, is it the Minister of Railways and Canal's intention to procure a complete report of all that has taken place at Rivière du Loup, in order to discover which is at fault, Mr. Brassard, Mr. Dubé, or Mr. Price ?

3. In the affirmative, is it the intention of the department to give such orders as will in future prevent the recurrence of a like embroglio ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

Yes, the minister is aware that Messrs. Laplante and Beaulieu have undergone an investigation before Mr. Brassard, chief train despatcher, who reported to Superintendent Dubé, sending him the evidence, but making no recommendation. Mr. Dubé then reinvestigated the case, and suspended Laplante and Beaulieu for six days, and ordered them to the train service. A third investigation was held by Mr. Price, who endorsed the suspension, but reinstated the men to their former places in the yard.

RAILWAY PASSENGER RATES.

Mr. MACLEAN—by Mr. Bell—asked :

1. What railway companies have filed standard passenger tariffs, as required by section 264 of the Railway Act ?

2. Is any railway charging over three cents a mile pessenger rate in Ontario, Quebec, or the maritime provinces ?

3. If so, what are these companies ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). I will have to ask that this question stand, as I have not the information regarding the latter part of it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stands.

Mr. BELL. The answer to this question has a bearing upon Bill (No. 6) which is the first order of the Railway Committee to-morrow, and it would be important to get the information if possible before then.

Mr. EMMERSON. The first part of the question could be answered, but as to the rates charged by the different railways in all these provinces we will have to secure that information, as I am informed by the officers of the department. I will ask the deputy and if he can get it I will be happy to bring it down.

CHAMBLY CANAL—CONTRACT FOR STONE.

Mr. MONK—by Mr. Ingram—asked :

1. Has the contract for the quarry stone and field stone, required for the needs of the Chambly canal for the year 1904, been given ?

2. Is it the government's intention to call for tenders for the quantity of crushed stone required for the repairs to the pier of the Chambly canal, and when will such tenders be called for ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. The contract for quarry and field stone required on the Chambly canal for the present year has not yet been awarded.

2. It is not the intention of the department to call for tenders for crushed stone for repairs to pier on the Chambly canal, as repairs to pier are not required.

P.E.I.—WINTER MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LEFURGEY—by Mr. Hackett—asked :

1. How many special trains were run by the Prince Edward Island Railway, carrying mails in connection with the 'Stanley' and 'Minto,' during the winters of 1901-1902, 1902-1903, 1903-1904, stating each year separately ?

2. What rates were paid for carrying the mails by these trains ?

3. How many special trains were run by the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway, between Sackville and Cape Tormentine, carrying mails in connection with the steamer 'Stanley,' during the winters of 1901-1902, 1902-1903, 1903-1904, stating each year separately ?

4. What rates were paid for carrying the mails by these trains ?

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General) :

1. 1901-02, 119 special trains ; 1902-03, 31 special trains ; 1903-04, 142 special trains.

2. 1901-02, $1 per running mile ; 1902-03, rate not yet adjusted ; 1903-04, 50 cents per running mile.

3. 1901-02, 100 special trains ; 1902-03, 31 special trains ; 1903-04, 19 special trains.

4. The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway, in addition to the regular running mile rate paid for the conveyance of local mails, is paid $12 per round trip between Sackville and Cape Tormentine, N.B., for the conveyance of Prince Edward Island mails.

SALARY OF JOSEPH E. GOBEIL.

Mr. BRODER asked :

1. What was the salary paid to Joseph E. Gobeil, in the Department of Public Works, previous to the year 1897, and what were his duties ?

2. What salary has been paid to Joseph E. Gobeil since his appointment as private secretary to Mr. Charleson, in the Yukon, and what were his duties there and in Ottawa ?

3. Do persons doing similar duties to those performed by him receive an equal salary ; and under what regulation or statute does he qualify to receive such salary and advancement ?

Hon. CHARLES HYMAN (Acting Minister of Public Works) :

1. $900 as French and English stenographer.

2. $2,400 as secretary and general assistant.

3. Mr. Joseph E. Gobeil was selected by Mr. Charleson, in 1899, to accompany him on the construction of telegraph lines in the Yukon. Mr. Charleson was authorized by the then minister to arrange about assistance required and the salaries, which he did as authorized.

INLAND REVENUE LAW—VIOLATIONS.

Mr. MACPHERSON asked :

1. How many persons have been found guilty of violation of the Inland Revenue Law relating to the manufacturing of tobacco, in and for the district of Montreal, since the 1st of July, 1903, and have been condemned since such date for such violation by the courts of the said district ?

2. How many parties have been found guilty of such violation since the same date, and have been adjudged by the Department of Inland Revenue to pay fine ?

3. What are the names of those parties ?

4. What amount of fines has been paid in each case ?

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Inland Revenue):

1. None.
2. None.
3. None.
4. None.

PUBLIC WORKS—WAGES PAID TO LABOURERS.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What salary was paid per day to the day labourers who were employed by Mr. R. MacDonald, in virtue of his contract with the Department of Public Works, on the construction of the Three Rivers wharf ?

Hon. CHARLES HYMAN (Acting Minister of Public Works) :

$1.25 per day of ten hours.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What salary is paid per day to the day labourers in the employ of the Montreal Harbour Board ?

Hon. CHARLES HYMAN (Acting Minister of Public Works) :

In the absence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries I wish to say that the minimum wage paid to day labourers is $1.50 per day.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What salary is paid per day to the day labourers who work at the Cascades, on the Soulanges canal ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

$1.50 per day is paid day labourers on the work at Cascades on the Soulanges canal.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What salary was paid per day to the day labourers who worked last winter at the building of the ice-breakers at St. Anne de Sorel ?

Hon. CHARLES HYMAN :
$1.25 per day.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What salary was paid per day to the day labourers who worked on the repairs to the Ottawa Post Office ?

Hon. CHARLES HYMAN :
Labourers are paid at the rate of 19 4-9 cents per hour.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What salary was paid per day to the day labourers who worked at the construction of the booms and piles for the driving of timber on the St. Maurice River ?

Hon. CHARLES HYMAN :
$1.25 per day.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What was the salary paid per day to the day labourers who were employed by Messrs. Poupore & Company, in virtue of their contract with the Department of Public Works, on the construction of the Sorel wharf ?

Hon. CHARLES HYMAN :
$1 per day of ten hours.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What salary is paid per day to the day labourers employed on the Lachine canal ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :
$1.50 per day is paid day labourers on the Lachine canal.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

What salary is paid per day to the day labourers who work at the St. Ours lock ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON :
$1.50 per day is paid day labourers at the St. Ours lock.

SUPPLY—RESIGNATION OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the government, certain matters which are mentioned in the press in regard to the Auditor General. I observed in the Hamilton 'Times' the following paragraph :—

The Auditor General is not so anxious for superannuation that he is willing to unconditionally resign. He wants ten years added to his length of service. How does that square with his Spartan honesty and integrity in the matter of the public accounts ? Does he want pay without performing service ? Perhaps the next Auditor General would refuse to pass his accounts.

I observe a somewhat similar statement in the Toronto 'Globe' of Saturday last in its Ottawa correspondence. The paragraph is as follows :

The Auditor General makes his application for superannuation conditional upon adding ten years to his length of service. The government are doubtful whether this can be done.

Outside of the immediate officers of the House, the Auditor General is more than any public servant an officer of this parliament, and if there is any document in the possession of the government such as is referred to I would think it desirable that it should be laid on the table of the House. I rise now for the purpose of inquiring whether it is true that the Auditor General's resignation is made conditional in the manner mentioned in these journals which are supposed to be in the confidence of the government. I wish also to ask whether or not the government has any objection to laying on the table of the House a copy of the Auditor General's letter of resignation, if such a letter exists? Although the Auditor General is a servant of parliament, he, of course communicates with parliament only through the government, and it is only in this way that we can ask to have placed before us the information to which I think the House is entitled. While I am on my feet I may say that I do not think there is anything in the conduct of the Auditor General in the past which justifies the somewhat sneering remarks in one of the paragraphs which I have just read. Whatever else we may say about the Auditor General ; however much we may differ in our appreciation of the attitude which he takes ; I am sure all of us will agree that on all occasions he has endeavoured to do that which he thought right, and to do it regardless of consequences or persons.

I may also say that I believe I myself have come in for a little criticism in regard to this gentleman, because I understand that I as leader of the opposition, have been accused of not offering to the Auditor General that support to which he is undoubtedly entitled from the opposition. I do not regard that criticism as quite merited, because I think that on all occasions on which I have had occasion to discuss the work of the Auditor General in the House, I have been in a position to support him, and I have supported him. I may say that so far as this session is concerned I have taken even more pains than usual to have the work of the Auditor General appreciated by the opposition, because at the commencement of the session I did what I have never done before, viz. : I divided his report upon the various departments of the public service into about twelve different divisions and I allotted each one of these divisions to a gentleman on this side of the House who was to associate others with him, and in this way to form a committee which would have entrusted to it the duty of paying particular attention to special portions of the Auditor General's Report.

Probably that will be conceded on all sides of the House as no more than a reasonable precaution, because it is the duty of the opposition in performing its work of criticism to have regard to the report which the Auditor General makes upon the finances of the country as a basis for that criticism.

I may also mention in this connection the contract relating to the Cornwall canal, as I see that an animadversion has been made not only with regard to the conduct of those on the government side of the House, but also with regard to those on this side of the House. It seems to have been apprehended in some quarters, that there has been an indisposition to discuss that matter. So far as I am concerned that has been furthest from my thoughts, and, I believe, from the thoughts of every gentleman on this side of the House. However, I for one, believe that the proper time to discuss the matter which is involved in the Auditor General's Report with regard to this contract is when the estimates of the Departments of Railways and Canals are reached. It is a matter which cannot be properly and thoroughly discussed without that cross-examination which can only take place in Committee of the Whole House. When the Auditor General's Report was brought to my attention somewhat earlier in the session, I so informed gentlemen who were prepared to discuss it, and who are prepared to discuss it still. Nevertheless, when the matter seemed proper to be mentioned in connection with the resolution of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), and when he suggested to me his proposal to discuss that particular contract in connection with the observations which he desired to make with respect to the proposed amendment of the Audit Act, I suggested to him that while the main discussion could doubtless be more advantageously carried on in Committee of the Whole House, yet there was not in my view any reason why he should not also discuss it on that particular occasion, although I did not believe, as I then told him that that discussion could be as effective as it could be if carried on at a later stage upon the estimates. I would simply like to say further, that as we have been engaged very largely during the present session in discussing a very important matter relating to transportation in this country; a discussion which began shortly after the opening of parliament, and did not terminate until the 30th of May; and as during that time that particular subject stood first on government orders, there was not in my opinion any very advantageous opportunity of discussing the matter to which I have referred. For that reason it has not been discussed more elaborately than has already been the case on the motion of my hon. friend for South Simcoe. I would like also in this connection to suggest to the Prime Minister that, as the session is advancing—we hope at least that it is—to a termination, and as the estimates of the Minister of Railways and Canals have not yet been brought before the House, and as it is upon those estimates that we can best discuss that particular contract, and perhaps one or two other matters, it might not be out of place to ask that at the earliest convenient opportunity the government would be good enough to take up the estimates of the Minister of Railways and Canals, in order that this matter, about which a good deal has been said in the public press, might be discussed, and discussed in a way which I think will be found the most effective.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING. With regard to the latter part of my hon. friend's remarks, though we are not able to name a particular day, yet I agree with him that we may all regard the session as being pretty well advanced, and the estimates of the Minister of Railways and Canals will be taken up at a very early day. Beyond that, I presume that all he desires is an answer to his question in respect to the alleged resignation of the Auditor General. The Auditor General has tendered his resignation accompanied by an application for superannuation. He has asked that an additional term of years be added to his period of service, but I do not understand that he makes that conditional to the acceptance of his resignation. His resignation has not been accepted. There is no objection to bringing down his letter of resignation, and I will lay it on the table to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Post Office Department—salaries, $307,429.50; contingencies, $41,675.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General). It will be observed that there is an increase in the item of salaries of $9,603.50, and a reduction in the item of contingencies of $24,339.15. The increase in the item of salaries is made up as follows: one additional chief clerk, $1,900; increase in provisional allowance, $1,330; two increases of $78.25 each, $156.50; 274 increases of $50 each, $13,700; making a total increase of $17,086.50; from which are to be deducted the difference between salaries of clerkships which became vacant and salaries of persons promoted or appointed to vacancies, $1,494; and nine vacancies in the packer class, $5,989; total deductions, $7,483, making a net increase of $9,603.50. The committee will remember that last year an Act was passed enabling the department to transfer to the permanent list a number of temporary employees. Acting upon that power there were transferred a number of writers from the temporary class to the permanent class. This accounts for the reduction in the contingencies this year of $24,339.15. Nearly all the temporary writers were transferred from the temporary class to the position of third-class clerks, and therefore their pay is provided for in the item of salaries. Thus there is an increase in the salary outgoings and a reduction in the contingency outgoings.

Mr. BIRKETT. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if the bonus which was promised to the employees of the Ottawa post office soon after the building was destroyed by fire, is included in this item ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The amount has not yet been paid. It was found that there was no vote of last year that would cover it, and I would ask my hon. friend to reserve his inquiry until the supplementary estimates are brought down. These are the estimates for next year, and it is not improbable that an item to that effect will appear in the supplementary estimates for the current year.

Mr. BIRKETT—Is it a fact that it will appear ? The promise was made that it would be paid, and that promise obtained a good deal of notoriety.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Immediately after the fire, not being aware that the amount was not covered by the contingencies, I instructed the deputy minister to pay it. The men behaved splendidly. The fire took place in the evening, and although the building was in conflagration and was threatened with destruction, the mails went out at half past ten as usual. There was no interruption of the mail either that night or the next morning. The mails were delivered as if there had been no fire whatever. I felt that my colleagues would warrant me in making that small recognition of the services of the staff, and I instructed the deputy accordingly. A short time ago he informed me that on account of there being no item in the estimates to cover the payment, it would be necessary to provide for it in the supplementary estimates, and my hon. friend may depend upon it that there will be an item to that effect.

Mr. BIRKETT. I do not find any fault with it. I only find fault that the employees have not got it yet.

Sir WILLIAM MULICK. If we had made greater progress this session—I am not saying whose fault it is—the supplementary estimates would have been brought down and passed by this time.

Mr. J. D. REID. A new chief clerk is to be appointed. May I ask who is to receive this appointment ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. This is intended for E. H. Laschinger.

Mr. J. D. REID—I see that in the item for the superintendent of the Money Order branch there is a reduction from $2,600 to $1,950.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. $2,600 was the salary of the late superintendent. When he retired, Mr. Rowan was promoted to his place, but of course did not begin with the maximum salary.

Mr. CLANCY. How many temporary clerks have been put on the permanent list?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Fifty writers and twenty packers have been transferred from the temporary list to the position of third-class clerk.

Mr. CLANCY. Have they had any increase ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Their increases are provided by law and are ample, and they get what the law allows.

Mr. CLANCY. We are compelled to ask this question because the hon. gentleman has been in the habit of disregarding the law and it is gratifying to find that he has been finally induced to comply with it. It might be as well now to call attention to a campaign sheet which he, like his other colleagues, has embodied in his report. In a table giving the expenditure and revenue, he starts with what he is pleased to call a deficit in 1896 and shows a surplus for 1903 of $395,268. The hon. gentleman knows that he has no such surplus. He knows that the surplus he has is $292,664. Why did the hon. gentleman select 1896 as the year of comparison ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The report has been published in its present form for years. That form was adopted several years ago, in 1897. The late government went out of office before the report for that year had been signed by the then minister, and it was for me to sign it and present it to parliament. I did not sign it until the accounts had been audited and then I signed. The financial results set forth in that report, so certified, is the beginning of each annual tabulated statement. I am not discrediting previous annual statements, I am not making any comment on them one way or another, they may be correct or not, but the auditor did disclose an unsound system applicable I think to previous years. At all events they found a state of affairs applicable to the year 1895-6, on which they made their findings in a report which was presented to parliament. The report therefore of 1895-6 constituted the beginning of this sheet which contains most useful information and information which I venture to say no Postmaster General hereafter will withhold. The reform here inaugurated will be continued from session to session by succeeding Postmasters General, whether the facts are to the credit or discredit of the administration of the day, just as the public accounts, showing the revenues and expenditures, the deficits and surpluses of the governments, are set forth in a tabulated statement so that at a glance a person may obtain a correct idea as to the actual financial results of the operations of a department.

The report states that :

The total net revenue of the Post Office from all sources, excluding that from the Yukon and Atlin districts, shows an excess over the previous year of $478,001.65, and the total gross revenue exceeded that of the previous year by $523,339. The expenditure of the department, excluding that of the Yukon and Atlin districts, exceeded that of the previous year by $87,842.68.

Then at page A—4, my hon. friend will find that the total net revenue from all sources including that from the Yukon and Atlin districts shows an excess over the previous year of $478,001.65, and total gross revenue exceeds that of the previous year by $523,329. The expenses of the department, excluding that of the Yukon and Atlin districts exceeds that of the previous year by $87,842.68. The hon. gentlemen will see that the revenue from the post office in the Territories named is $31,704.76, and the expenditure from under the expenditure column is $134,318.84.

Deducting, therefore, the revenue of $31,704.76 from the expenditure of $134,318.84 leaves a deficit on the workings of the post office in the Yukon and Atlin districts of $102,614.08.

Last year my estimates were passed after the close of the fiscal year 1902-3, and I therefore gave these figures to parliament. I stated then that the financial results of the year were, speaking without giving the exact figures—they will all be found in the 'Hansard'—that we had balanced up our accounts for the year, and that including a loss on the Yukon of $102,000, the department left in the treasury for the Consolidated Revenue Fund, $292,000. That is a net clean surplus over and above all expenditures on the service, the Atlin and Yukon surpluses included ; leaving out the loss on the Yukon and Atlin services, the surplus for the year was in round numbers, $395,000. I have no doubt my hon. friend was in the House when I stated that and that he was as gratified then as he is today at this result. My hon. friend asks why we have, heretofore left out the Atlin and Yukon transactions. It is not excluded. It is as plain as it can be made on the face of the report itself, but for the purpose of comparison, service with service, it has heretofore been left out. The old government did not include it in the general summary because they had no Yukon and Atlin services and therefore had no Yukon and Atlin deficits.

Mr. CLANCY. They had the Yukon.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. They had no disbursements for the Yukon and Atlin services.

Mr. CLANCY. They had the Yukon.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The old post office department paid out nothing whatever for carrying it on. Any mail service they maintained was carried on without expense to the department, and therefore there could be no item in their accounts in respect to the Atlin and Yukon services. There were no post offices there and no people to speak of only a few scattered people. After the discovery of gold and the rush to the Yukon a short time after this government came into office, then for the first time it became necessary for the government to establish a service there. That service is a losing service, and to all appearances will so continue for many years to come. It was not deemed reasonable for purposes of comparison that that extra service should be included in the general account of the revenue and expenditure of the department, but for the purpose of comparing the results of the service throughout all Canada, as served under the old and the present administration, it was thought best that there should be a separate account kept for the financial results of the Atlin and Yukon services.

Mr. CLANCY. That was a party phase of it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend may have that view, but even now if we deduct the loss on the workings of the Yukon, or in other words amalgamate all the accounts the financial result will show a clean surplus in the treasury of $292,000 for the year ending 30th June, 1903, over all expenditure.

My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) asked about the increases in the salaries of officials in the department. I think we adopt a very proper procedure in dealing with these annual increases. They are not made automatically but upon the report of the officers that the persons in question are deserving of these increases, and I am pleased to say that the staff of the Post Office Department is so efficient that nearly all of that staff received their increases. I am not now speaking formally but speaking with all sincerity when I say that for efficiency, fitness and industry one could not desire a better staff than the Post Office Department now enjoys, and therefore on their merits and not as a matter of course, these officers have received their increases.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure the civil service will be gratified that the hon. gentleman has confidence in his own staff. He withheld their statutory increases ; he was suspicious, first as to their efficiency, next as to their fidelity. The hon. gentleman has had these doubts removed from his mind, and now he frankly states that he has a good staff. Well, they have not became suddenly efficient under the hon. gentleman. I scarcely think that he would care to arrogate so much to himself as that. I doubt that the hon. gentleman who is modest in the extreme almost would go so far as to say that. If they were efficient when he came in what is the relative position between the faithful service from which the hon. gentleman withheld the statutory increase and the service now because the hon. gentleman tells the country that he was mistaken when he thought they were not efficient or loyal to him ? What is the position of the hon. gentleman now ? I ask the hon. gentleman if he stands in an enviable position on that question to-day. I think not. I think the hon. gentleman should have treated them as honest men and as efficient men when he came into the department, and that he should have so treated them until he learned to the contrary. I should have expected the hon. gentleman to have done that. I could not have contemplated that the hon. gentleman would have placed his staff under a ban of suspicion and that he would have acquitted them only after they had proved by experience that they were not inefficient or untrustworthy. I am glad to learn that he has been convinced and that he is now prepared to do them justice. I think there is one thing that he owes them. He owes them the sum that he withheld from them. If they were an efficient staff they were entitled to their statutory increases. But, the hon. gentleman has not had the courage to come down to the House and be quite as frank as he has been this afternoon. He should now say : I have not treated you well, you are an efficient, capable and honest service and I think I ought to reward you. This it not a matter of grace, it is a matter of repairing a wrong that I have done you. There is just one thing more required. The hon. gentleman has made a full confession ; let him make full reparation. That kind of cheap repentance will not do the hon. gentleman very much good. The hon. gentleman ought now go before the country and say : I have withheld the statutory increases from my staff, they are a good staff and I think I shall come down to the House and ask them to justify me in making reparation although it is late. I hope the hon. gentleman will be able to grant the justice to his staff that he withheld in the past.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. This subject has been discussed ad nauseum in previous sessions. The question of statutory increases has been threshed out for several years and I do not suppose my hon. friend wants me to go back and discuss matters of five or six years ago. I think it would be better to confine ourselves to the estimate now before the committee.

Mr. CLANCY. I quit agree with the hon. gentleman. I know this is a very unpleasant subject. I admire the hon. gentleman's adroitness. He challenges the admiration of the committee when he refuses to discuss this unpleasant question. I shall excuse the hon. gentleman and allow these unpleasant things of the past to rest. But, I want to touch for a moment upon some of the boasts which hon. gentleman opposite are making in regard to the splendid achievements of the hon. Postmaster General and in regard to what he has done for the people. It is constantly being said, both by the hon. gentleman himself and his friends, that under his administration he has lightened the taxes of the people for the postal service. I do not think the hon. gentleman is entitled to very much credit on this score. The hon. gentleman boasts of a surplus, but let me say that if there is a department connected with the government of Canada in connection with which a minister should claim no credit for having a surplus it is the Post Office Department. In a country as sparsely settled as Canada is, where we should have an efficient service so as to reach the people who are the taxpayers, it ought to be the duty of the hon. Postmaster General to see that the masses of the people have some benefit from the service for which they pay rather than that he should be able to come down to this House with the empty boast that he has a surplus. It would be much more creditable to the hon. gentleman if he were to come down to the House and say : I have given an efficient service. This is a sparsely settled country. Our people have had a better and more frequent service. I believe I as Postmaster General am justified in coming down to this House and saying that I have served the people notwithstanding that there may be a deficit in my department. It would seem to me that there would be no discredit to the hon. gentleman to come down and say under those circumstances that he had a deficit. Why was there a deficit in the past and no surplus ?—simply because under the former government the service was not starved. It was then possible to get a post office established where it did not pay, but the hon. gentleman has his eye now on two sides of the ledger. When an application is made for a post office, the first question the hon. gentleman asks is : Will it pay ? If he thinks it is not likely to pay its way, although it will render good service, the hon. gentleman in most cases refuses the application. I say it is unfair to the ordinary taxpayer of this country to keep in view the possibility of having a surplus in the Post Office Department rather than to keep in view the desirability of giving a good service to the people. I say give a good service to this country. If you determine to give an efficient service you cannot always look for surpluses. The hon. gentleman has added to his service to some extent but he has done so out of the taxes put upon the people. The best evidence of the extent to which the people are taxed is to take the tax per head. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this for a moment because this is an important question and I would ask him to be good enough to answer it. When he took office in 1896, before there was any reduction in postage, the revenue per head was 79 cents, or in other words he collected from the people 79 cents per head. From 1889 to 1896, a period of years corresponding with the number of years during which the hon. gentleman has been administering the Post Office Department, we increased the number of post offices, in other words, we gave post offices to sparsely settled districts of a class that the hon. gentleman would not establish unless he were assured that they would be profitable thus insisting that the people who would be served by post offices of this class must pay without receiving any proportionate benefit. The number of post offices was increased from 7,838 in 1889 to 9,103 in 1896 or an increase of 1,265 post offices. Take the same number of years under the hon. gentleman's administration from 1896 to 1903 ; there was in increase of from 9,103 in the former year to 10,150 in the latter year or an increase of 1,047 as against 1,265 or a less number by the same ratio of proportion of 218 post offices. What does that mean on the face of it ? It means that the hon. gentleman starved the service, it means that you can only get post offices in this country that pay or are likely to pay in the near future and that during this period of great expansion that hon. gentlemen boast of the hon. gentleman looked at his ledger and nothing else. But, the hon. gentleman looked at his ledger in another sense by way of taxation. I said that the revenue in 1896 was 79 cents per head. The expenditure was 93 cents per head. Now, let us take the amount at which the hon. gentleman taxed the people in 1903. In 1903 instead of collecting 79 cents per head, the hon. gentleman increased the tax upon the people to $1.03 per head or in 1903 he took from the people 24 cents per head more than in 1896. Let the hon. gentleman now look to that large portion of the country that he is depriving of a postal service and see with what degree of pleasure it must look upon his administration. Now let us see where the hon. gentleman is in regard to his expenditure. The expenditure in 1896 as I have said was 93 cents per head. In 1903, seven years later the hon. gentleman only got it up 4 ecnts more, or to 97 cents per head thereby making it as clear as it is possible to be demonstrated that the hon. gentleman by increasing the postage took the money from the people and failed to give them the service to which they were entitled. It is beyond doubt that the hon. gentleman took 24 cents more per head from the people in 1903 than in 1896 and if he has only increased the expenditure with the money that he has taken from them by 4 cents a head it is not necessary to add anything to the mere statement of the fact. How did the hon. gentleman get that money from the people ? He first decreased the postage between Canada and other countries of the empire and he appeared so ridiculous before the country in charging a higher rate upon domestic postage, that when the absurdity was pointed out to him in this House, he then decreased the domestic rate from three cents to two cents. He did not, however, decrease the postage on post cards. What he did was to unload the postage from those who were entitled to pay it, and who were specially benefited, on to the shoulders of the people generally who were not benefited. The great counting houses ; the commercial concerns——

Mr. COCHRANE. The manufacturers.

Mr. CLANCY. I don't object to the counting houses, or the manufacturers getting a fair benefit, but I do not think they should get any special benefit.

An hon. MEMBER. Trust and loan companies.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes; he reduced the postage for the benefit of the trust and loan companies and the banks and other large institutions who were able to pay. They got the benefit but the people generally got no benefit from this reduction. On the other hand, the Postmaster General increased the postage on newspapers, and on books and packages. I notice also that he increased the rate of postage on packages of seeds, In doing that, I can scarcely imagine that the Postmaster General escaped without a sharp rebuke from the Minister of Agriculture. Then with regard to maps, and prints, drawings, music, photographs, deeds, wills, mortgages, insurance policies, assessment rolls, municipal rolls, and all these things, the rate of postage has been duplicated. What the Postmaster General did was to shift the burden from a class of people who ought to pay, to a class of people who were not benefited. The ordinany farmer of this country has been made a victim of this device of the Postmaster General. Were the country at a standstill the Postmaster General might have some defence, but we are told that there has been the most extraordinary increase of population that has ever taken place in Canada, and if that be true, then the post office revenue per head would accordingly be equalized. The Posmaster General has in one way or the other made the people pay the shot in order to secure his revenue.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) has undertaken quite a task when he endeavours to prove to a man who puts a letter in the post office and only pays two cents, that he is paying more than when he had to pay three cents.

Mr. CLANCY. No one said that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman said that the workingman has obtained no benefit, but if a workingman or a farmer or any one else, pays only two cents now when he formerly paid three cents, then in spite of all the sophistry which the hon. gentleman can use, that person will come to the conclusion that the rate of postal taxation on him has been reduced 33⅓ per cent. If the workingman or the farmer or any one else, has only to pay two cents to send a letter to some other part of the empire, when he had to pay five cents previously he will also come to the conclusion that he is saving a very substantial sum. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) says that I first of all reduced the rate of postage on letters to other parts of the empire, but that the matter looked so ridiculous when brought before this House, that I had to make matters straight by reducing the domestic rate. I would remind him that the Act permitting the reduction in the rate of postage was passed in the session of 1898.

Mr. CLANCY. 1899.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If my hon. friend says 1899, then the statutes are wrong, but as the statutes say that it was passed in 1898, that must guide us in this debate. That Act provided that the reduction in the postal rates should take effect on proclamation by the government.

Mr. CLANCY. Which took effect first ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The Act was passed first and the proclamation followed. The reduction in the imperial postage rate took place on Christmas day, 1898, and on the New Years' day following, just a week afterwards the other reduction took place. There was no session of parliament during that interval of a week, and therefore the debate which my hon. friend thinks took place never could have occurred.

Mr. CLANCY. The reduction in the domestic postage was not even hinted at until after the other had been arranged when the Postmaster General was in England.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I gave statistics in the session of 1898 showing the probable result of the reduction in postage. I quoted from the experience of the United Kingdom, of the United States, of Germany and of other countries when they reduced their postage, and I argued from those precedents that we would have correspondingly satisfactory results if we reduced the rates in Canada. I expressed the belief that within three years our revenue would recover its former volume. My anticipations were realized. That Act was not passed by this parliament for ornament; it was passed for the purpose of being made effective. Parliament had good reason to suppose when the Bill passed, that in due time, if the finances warranted it, a proclamation would issue and the reduction take place. The hon. gentleman says that he did not know that the proclamation was likely to issue.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not say that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I venture to say he was the only person in Canada who did not anticipate it. At all events the two reductions took place within one week of each other.

Mr. BELL. The system adopted by the Postmaster General for some years, of excluding the Atlin and Yukon service from his general accounts, places him in a rather favourable position as compared with previous occupants of the position of Postmaster General. It is undeniably a fact that the Atlin and Yukon postal services are far more expensive than in the more settled portions of Canada, and also that the revenue is correspondingly smaller. It should not be forgotten that although previous Postmaster Generals did not have to do with the Yukon and Atlin districts, yet for over twenty years they had to maintain a postal service throughout the Northwest Territories, Manitoba and New Ontario, where the service was very expensive and the revenue comparatively small.

No previous Postmaster General, so far as I know, has devised the excellent scheme, in order to make his accounts look particularly well, of excluding from the general account the accounts relating to those parts of Canada in which the service is more or less unprofitable ; and now that the Yukon is unquestionably a settled part of Canada, in which there is a large city organized, with all the municipal provisions, in which there is an established government, in which there is a settled population which is likely to remain, and in which the postal service is likely to continue to be a part of the regular postal service of Canada for all time. I think it would be as well for the Postmaster General to give up that distinction. Any one who looks through the report can easily see that no concealment is practised, The figures for the Yukon are given a little farther on in the volume from the general statement, which appears on the first page ; but it seems to me that that statement, which sets out by showing a surplus of $395,-268.11, may create a false impression in the mind of some person who from want of training or previous knowledge might not know that if he would look further in the volume he would find that that surplus would have to be reduced by $102,000. To my mind it would be fairer to put that statement on the first page, so that the taxpayer of Canada could see what is the actual surplus or deficit in the postal service. No matter into how many divisions that might be made, if the whole country were divided into provinces for the purpose of preparing the accounts for this report, some of which would show large surpluses, some large deficits, and some a condition where the accounts would almost balance, the gross result for the whole of Canada would be shown. In the postal service of the country as a whole there is either a surplus or a deficit. So that I think the time has come when it would perhaps be as well to do away with the practice which has prevailed of keeping these accounts separate. To some extent, I suppose, there was a warrant for it in the early period. The service, as I understand, was scarcely a part of the postal service, being carried on by the mounted police. But that is no longer the case. It is now as regularly and permanently a part of the postal service of this country as that of any other part of Canada, and in future I think it would be as well to absorb that account into the general account, so that we may see at once the position in which the postal service of Canada stands. I would like to say a word or two with regard to the deficit of 1896 which the hon. gentleman points out. To my mind that was not exactly the deficit for that year. If I am not mistaken, it included a constantly growing and accumulating deficit.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No.

Mr. BELL. That was excluded and kept entirely separate ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes, altogether.

Mr. BELL. I do not for a moment suggest that the Postmaster General under the present circumstances should be tempted to carry over any accounts, but I would like to ask him what amount of the service which is chargeable to 1903 might go over to 1904. I am aware that it is impossible to prevent all overlapping ; but I presume that the Postmaster General will be able to say, if there is a liability, whether it is any more than that which occurred in previous years, and which must necessarily occur ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I much appreciate the tenor of my hon. friend's remarks. With reference to the first point to which he alluded, the separation of the accounts, he spoke of the service in the Northwest Territories when that country was being brought under control. The committee has perhaps forgotten it, but I may say that a somewhat similar practice was pursued in that case. At the commencement, instead of keeping the accounts separate, as I have done, there was a special vote taken for Northwest account. That vote was resorted to for payment of a number of services. I do not remember them all, but they included the postal service, and the money voted in that special vote to carry on the postal service was not included in the expenditure of the Post Office Department.

Mr. COCHRANE. Was not the same principle applied when the hon. Postmaster General used the mounted police ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. We did not use them without paying for them.

Mr. COCHRANE. Neither did the other government.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes, they did. There was a bulk sum voted for a number of services, including the postal service, as it was not considered fair to charge the various departments with the total expenditure in connection with the carrying on of those services. So much as went for carrying on the postal service of the Territories was not charged as part of the disbursements of the Post Office Department. You will therefore see that there is a precedent for maintaining a separate account for the service in an unorganized territory—I mean a territory that is far from self-sustaining and in a more or less primitive state. As my hon. friend from Pictou says, the Yukon is coming to be looked on as part of old Canada, and the time is arriving if it has not arrived, when this distinction in the postal accounts may be discontinued, as the late government, in the course of a few years, discontinued voting a special sum for the various services in the Territories, and allowed the sum for the postal service to be defrayed out of the ordinary appropriations for the post office generally.

Mr. COCHRANE. When did that vote for the Northwest Territories cease to be taken ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I cannot say from memory.

Mr. COCHRANE. It did not continue until 1896, did it ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, it did not. The Northwest Territories were taken over in 1870 ; but I am speaking of a period much later than that, coming down to a comparatively recent date. With regard to the payment of the accounts for the year, my instructions to the department are that all accounts for carrying on the service for the year shall be included in the accounts for that year, so that when they are laid upon the table they shall truly represent the cost of maintaining the service for the year; and I am assured by the accountant that those instructions are lived up to, and that there is nothing owing. I asked him if there was a cent owing. He said he would not say to a cent, but there is not $100 of arrears so that practically speaking everything is included in the accounts represented in this return. The Auditor General gave us till the 15th of August, that is, six weeks after the accounts were due, and on the approach of the end of the fiscal year efforts were made to get in all the accounts before the end of the year ; so that in the early part of July we know pretty well the state of the accounts. My hon. friend may rely upon it that if any considerable unpaid account were not included in the year to which it belonged, it will, so long as I am at the head of the department, be reported to the House and included if possible in the printed report.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is the same system pursued now as in former years ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. In the Postmaster General's Report for 1895-6, there will be found a report signed by two auditors, which shows that when the late government went out of office there were unpaid accounts exceeding the appropriations by $680,000. The hon. gentleman will remember that the change of government took place just at the close of the fiscal year, and shortly afterwards I learned that the whole appropriation for the year was exhausted and there was this large amount of unpaid accounts. The Deputy Postmaster General, Mr. White, told me that the practice had been to pay these arrears out of the revenue voted for the current year. That practice had grown up from year to year. Under it the shortcoming each year of $50,000, $60,000 or $100,000, instead of being included in the supplementary estimates for the following year, was carried on as an ever-increasing balance. The first year the amount carried over was, say $50,000, then it increased to, say $100,000 and so on until the amount of unpaid debts not provided for, when we took office, was as high as $680,000. There was no money voted by parliament to pay this sum, but apart from that accumulation of unpaid accounts, there was an actual deficit for the year of $780,000. So that besides the deficit of $780,000 on the year's operations, the department owed $680,000 of accumulated unpaid accounts. I reported the matter to the Finance Department, and that department treated this $680,000 as a debt of the Crown and put an item for it in the estimates. It was thus voted as a special vote, and we were enabled to start with a clean sheet. That was in the second session of 1896, because it took us several months to ascertain the exact amount.

Mr. CLANCY. Was there a separate account kept of those payments ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That transaction did not enter into the accounts of the post office for the fiscal year 1896-7 at all. It will be found in the Finance Department the same as any debt due by the Crown. In the statutes of 1896-7 there will be found in the appropriation Bill an item to pay these arrears, and the amount was paid by the Finance Department. We then started with a clean sheet.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that an entire change has been made in the system. Under the former government, it was customary, at the end of each fiscal year, to pay out of the next year's appropriations whatever was short in the estimates of the previous year. As the Postmaster General has stated, one year it might be $50,000 another year $60,000 and another year $100,000. Consequently year after year there was a continuous increase of these unpaid balances or a continued overlapping from year to year. The first amount for example might be $50,000 and should there be a shortage the next year of $25,000, then in the succeeding year there would be $75,000 of an overlapping and the following year if there was again a shortage of $25,000 there would be an overlapping of $100,000. This went on over a long series of years. The Postmaster General of that period continuously paid the amount that was unpaid at the first of July out of the succeeding year's appropriations, and it appears that about 1896 when the hon. gentleman's predecessor went out of office that this overlapping had amounted to about $685,000 in round numbers, and according to the practice of former Postmasters General that would be charged up to the fiscal year 1896. At the end of 1894 we will say it would amount to $616,712 and that overlapping would be charged up to the year commencing July 1, 1895. It would go on for another year and at the end of 1896 there would be still this overlapping, but it would then have amounted to a larger sum. A change of government and a change of book-keeping took place and the incoming Postmaster General refused to charge up this large sum to the succeeding year's estimates. Now what was the result ? The overlaping of the previous year was charged to 1896 which makes this enormous sum of a shortage in revenue of which the Postmaster General has boasted all over this country.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. HENDERSON. It stands to reason that if the overlapping at the beginning of the year went to the next year's expenditure it would certainly make apparently a very large shortage in the revenue of the country.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is not what happened.

Mr. HENDERSON. I say to the Postmaster General that my conviction is that that is just what happened, and it has never been made plain to the people of this country that that is not what happened and consequently the Postmaster General has obtained a very large amount of credit in this country for having kept the expenditure within the revenue which he says his predecessors were unable to do. The whole matter requires to be thoroughly investigated, not by the accountants, the personal friends of the Postmaster General, whom he brought in from Toronto to make out an account to suit his own purposes, but by an independent commission that would show the actual condition of the account. My conviction is that that is just the way the thing happened and that the $685,447.03 as provided for by the Postmaster General by statute is a portion of the $781,152 shown as a deficit at the end of the year 1896, so that if you deduct the $685,447.03 which are shortages, the accumulations of some 18 or 20 years, and not of one year, you find that the deficit or shortage of revenue of the old government was a comparative trifle indeed. That is the way I have explained the whole matter. I feel pretty well satisfied, in fact I remember distinctly the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)—and if I could only lay my hands on the 'Hansard' I should cite them, but I have not been able to find the passage in the few moments of this discussion. I remember well the words of Sir Richard Cartwright (Minister of Trade and Commerce) in answer to a question put across the floor of the House by the Hon. Mr. Foster. He said that this large sum was made up of the accumulations of a great number of years, and I have never yet been convinced that this sum was not made up of these accumulations, and that the sum that was provided for by the Postmaster General by a special statute or by a special estimate—I think by an Act of Parliament—was not a portion of this $781,152, which the hon. the Postmaster General has been parading for the last seven or eight years as the shortage in the revenue of this country as compared with the expenditure. I have no doubt that if I am wrong the Postmaster General will be able to put me right, but I tell him that it would take a great deal more to do so than a special account prepared for the Postmaster General by his own personal friends, to accomplish a specific purpose.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have sent into the library for the report of that year and as soon as I receive it I shall deal with the hon. gentleman's contention. Perhaps the committee will allow me to reserve my remarks until that report comes. Meantime I would say, to correct my hon. friend at the beginning, that his suspicion, his imagination is entirely at fault and that the deficit of $781,000 in the revenue as compared with the expenditure for 1896 was for the actual workings of the department that year and was over and above all accumulated arrears of preceding years.

Mr. HENDERSON. What I intended to say was that for that specific year the overlapping at the beginning of the year was charged up as a portion of the expenditure of that year and at the end of that year the shortage for that year was charged up inasmuch as the succeeding Postmaster General refused to have it taken out of the appropriation of the succeeding year, so that you have the overlapping at the beginning of the year and the shortage for the year all charged in that year and it is no wonder if the accounts did in that way show the immense shortage claimed by the Postmaster General.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If the amount of $680,000 the accumulated arrears, had been added to the expenditure for the fiscal year 1895-96 instead of the auditors reporting a deficit of $781,000 they would have had to make it $781,000 plus $680,000 or something over $1,400,000.

Mr. COCHRANE. I have no objection to the Postmaster General reducing the postal rates, but I think he was a little unfair when he answered me as he did about the Northwest Territories. I think it would have been fairer if he had frankly stated to me and to the committee that the late government had the expense of post offices in that country to bear out of the ordinary revenue of the Post Office Department for several years before the hon. gentleman took office, and they did not keep a separate account. It would be a fairer statement if he would charge the expenditures of the Post Office Department in the Yukon and also credit it with the amount received in the Yukon, balance the two amounts and give us a fair balance of the statement. Would that not be fairer than to keep a separate account for the Yukon when he has a deficit there? There is no doubt in my mind, and I think there is no doubt in the mind of the Postmaster General, that if there had been a separate account kept for the Northwest Territories in reference to the post office expenditure and revenue in that country there would have been a large deficit in that territory when the late government was in power.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If there was a deficit in the working of the Post Office Department in the Territories in 1895-6, there would not be much difference, I presume, in 1896-7. We have never balanced it up. I do not know how it compares, but we carry on the service so that whatever deficit in 1895-6 existed would be taken into account.

Mr. COCHRANE. You are carrying on the service in the Yukon just the same as the late Postmaster General carried on the service in the Northwest Territories. But the difference is that the service in the Northwest Territories was then charged to the general account, while you separate the Yukon service now and have a surplus.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. We separate the two, but it all appears on the face of the report. The report shows a surplus, without the Yukon, of $395,000, and if you deduct the loss on the Yukon service, the surplus is reduced to $292,000. The previous administration voted the sum needed for the post office department in the Territories, but that amount was not charged against the Post Office Department.

Mr. COCHRANE. I understand that.

Mr. J. D. REID. As I understand it, there was a deficit of $600,000, which had accumulated for eighteen years.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not know for how many years.

Mr. J. D. REID. Well, for a great many years; and during that time the cost of the postal service in the Northwest Territories and Manitoba was included in the post office expenditure. During that time there must have been large deficits as between the revenue and expenditure in the Northwest Territories, Manitoba and British Columbia. So that if the amount were even small, say $20,000 a year, the deficit would have occurred in these new western territories, and it would really have accumulated to about $600,000 at the time the hon. gentleman took charge of the department. At the time the hon. gentleman took charge of the department I suppose the revenue and expenditure would almost meet?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, there was a deficit of $780,000.

Mr. J. D. REID. I mean that the expenditure and revenue of the western territories would probably almost meet; or, in other words, that the deficit that had been accumulating annually would probably have been decreasing.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, it was growing.

Mr. J. D. REID. Has the deficit in the western territories grown since?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The accumulated arrears were growing.

Mr. J. D. REID. Yes, up to the time that the hon. gentleman took charge of the department, but the amount would be growing very slightly.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, it was growing large. The mistake the government made was not in each year getting a large enough vote from parliament to pay the expenses of the service for that year. In any municipality or town they levy their taxes for the year. These taxes are supposed to pay the working expenses of the year, but when the year winds up the town, for instance, has paid out all the revenue and finds itself owing a thousand dollars. There is the same rate of taxation for the succeeding year, and the same thing happens again. There is another deficit of a thousand dollars, making $2,000 that it owes. That $2,000 the town borrows by mortgage, making an issue of debentures for the purpose. During that second year the town also has incurred liabilities in excess of the taxes to the extent of $1,000 more in addition to the $2,000 already owing. It chooses to pay this in another way. Thus it has a deficit of $3,000. It has not the power, as we have, to vote the sum in a general way, but as it has to carry on the service it would have to take the money straight out of the people. In the case I am trying to illustrate the accumulated accounts have nothing whatever to do with the finances of the year, except that portion thereof that was left over from that year. The $680,000 had been accumulating year after year, just as the accounts of a corporation that was getting behind hand would go on accumulating year after year, or as a business man who is anticipating his income is incurring liabilities to be met out of his income in the future. So it was in this department. When we took office in 1895-6 there was an appropriation by parliament out of the consolidated revenue fund to pay the cost of the service for that year, and there was against that to recoup the treasury the revenue from the department. The revenue from the department that year was $780,000 less than the expenditure for the year, so that the tax-payers had to pay $780,000 in addition to what was collected by way of postage in order to pay the current expenditure of the year. That still left this accumulated deficit of years which had to be paid. That is all made perfectly clear in the report I spoke of.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. I notice in this report which I hold in my hand that there was a deficit of $781,000 in 1896. The hon. Postmaster General says that this was brought about because the government had not asked for a sufficient vote of money to carry on the service, and he dwells upon that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I did not say that. My hon. friend misquotes me. I did not say that the deficit was caused by the fact that the government did not ask for sufficient money. That is another question altogether. I said the deficit was caused by reason of the fact that the revenue fell $780,000 below the expenditure.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. The hon. minister dealt altogether with the year 1896. I notice that in the following year, under his administration, there was a deficit of $586,000. I inferred from the remarks which he made that he has been squaring the accounts since he came into office, while the evidence shows to the contrary.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) stated that he could not be convinced by any report of auditors whom I had chosen, because they were my personal friends.

Mr. HENDERSON. Hear, hear.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. And he says 'hear, hear,' to that remark. I will tell him who the auditors were, and if he will make inquiries I think he will have reason to revise that statement. They were W. H. Cross and Wm. F. Munro.

Mr. HENDERSON. These were both your personal friends.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Mr. Munro I knew very well; Mr. Cross I had never seen in my life.

Mr. HENDERSON. I naturally supposed that, living in Toronto, Mr. Cross would be known to the hon. minister.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He was a perfect stranger to me. Mr. Cross was not my personal friend, I had never exchanged a word with him, but, on the contrary, he was a political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite. He was at the head of the Chartered Accountants' Association, and he is recognized as one of the foremost accountants in Canada. He went into this work as a pure matter of business, gave a great deal of his time to it, and no person who knows Mr. Cross would discredit anything he certifies to in his capacity as an auditor.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not going to question the honesty of Mr. Cross, but we must understand that Mr. Cross had his instructions from the hon. Postmaster General.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Then we will see what these instructions were. I have here the report of the Postmaster General presented to parliament in the session of 1897, setting forth this transaction. The statement is as follows:

REPORT OF AUDITORS UPON THE FINANCIAL AFFAIRS OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

At the close of the fiscal year 1895-96, it was found that the parliamentary appropriations for that year had been exhausted, and that large sums were still owing by the department..

With the idea of ascertaining the true financial position of the department, two accountants, Messrs. W. H. Cross and W. F. Munro, were appointed to make certain inquiries, the result of their investigations being set forth in the following annexed report:—

The Hon Wm. Mulock,
Postmaster General.

Sir,—We have the honour to submit the statements prepared in pursuance of your instructions expressed in the following terms:—

(1.) Ascertain the total cost of maintenance of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st of July, 1895, and terminating on the 30th of June, 1896, classifying such expenditures.

Does my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) say that that was a proper question to put?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes. I have no objection to the question. My contention is that in the sum which they arrived at, they included in the expenditure for that year the overlapping from the previous years.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will prove they did not. This is the instruction:

Ascertain the total cost of maintenance of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st of July, 1895.

Not arrears, but the cost for that year beginning on that date:

—and terminating on the 30th of June, 1896, classifying such expenditures.

2. Ascertain the cost of maintenance of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1896-7 on the scale of expenditure reached in the fiscal year 1895-6.

Now we come to an entirely independent transaction.

3. Ascertain the amount of any unpaid debts or liabilities of the department on the 1st of July, 1896, over and above the appropriation made by parliament for the fiscal year 1895-6, and classify the same.

They were instructed to do two things: To ascertain the cost of the maintenance of the department for the fiscal year beginning 1st of July, 1895, and terminating the 30th of June 1896; and also to ascertain the amount of any unpaid debts or liabilities of the department prior to the 1st of July, 1896. Then they go on to say:

Freed from outlays directly on behalf of the money order and savings bank branches, which outlays embrace a share of the cost of inspection, together with a proportion of several lesser general items, and charging those branches with postage at the ordinary rates; then the postal service for the fiscal year cost $902,625.62 over and above all revenue. The money order service and the savings bank service cost respectively $28,136.12 and $96,767.28, making a total of $1,027,529.02, which may be described either as the cost of maintenance over and above all receipts or as a deficit.

It must, however, be pointed out that the statement is incomplete in two ways. On the one hand the expenditures do not include the year's outlay for the maintenance of the public building used by the Post Office Department throughout the Dominion, nor is any allowance made either for interest upon the cost of such buildings or for such a yearly sum by way of sinking fund as would provide for the repayment of the capital invested in them.

On the other hand the receipts do not include any allowance for the services rendered by the department in respect of free transmission of newspapers, of free transmission enjoyed by members of the Dominion parliament or for services to other departments of the Dominion government, or to the local legislatures.

In order to determine the scale of expenditure of the entire department reached in the year 1895-6 the outlay for the month of June last was selected. The services for that month cost $419,304, equal to $5,031,650 for the year. A classified statement of the scale of expenditure is herewith submitted, in which, it must be pointed out, no allowance is made for the yearly expansion of the service of the department. Such expansion during the seven years ending 30th June, 1895, averaged four and one-sixth per cent per annum upon the gross expenditure. This percentage on the gross estimated expenditure for 1896-7, $5,031,650, would amount to $209,652.

In the preparation of the statement of the arrears of the department upon maintenance account on the 30th June last, the arrears at the beginning of that fiscal year had also to be determined. Statements of the arrears at both periods are submitted.

I skip over the pages containing the figures, and I now read the conclusions :

(a.) At the beginning of the fiscal year 1895-96, as a result of the deficits of previous years, there were outstanding liabilities of the department, in the shape of unpaid accounts, to the amount of $616,712.99.

(c.) Thus the liabilities had increased during the year 1895-96 to the extent of $68,734.04.

(d.) The actual cost of maintenance of the department in all its branches for the year 1895-96 was $4,985,327.53.

(e.) The revenue of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1896, amounted to the sum of $3,957,798.51 ; which deducted from the above-named gross cost of maintenance, namely, $4,985,327.53, leaves a deficit of $1,027,529.02.

That was the total cost of maintaining the department throughout that year.

Mr. CLANCY. What year is that ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The year 1895-6. The total cost of the service for that year was $4,985,327.53, and the revenue of the Post Office Department for the same year amounted to the sum of $3,957,798.51.

Mr. CLANCY. Was that the gross revenue ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I may say that it has been the practice in the department for postmasters to deduct their salaries out of the post office revenues in a certain way. What is called a salary warrant is issued to a postmaster and he is paid his percentage, and it is only the balance that goes into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. CLANCY. The Postmaster General does not seem to be right in either of these figures as regards the revenue and expenditure for that year.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow me to read the statement first.

Heretofore it has not been the practice to treat the amount expended under the head of civil government as a charge against the department, and were such practice adhered to the deficit of $1,027,529.02 would be reduced by $246,376.93, leaving the outside service shortage $781,152.19.

The other two paragraphs have no bearing upon that question. That report is signed by W. H. Cross and W. F. Munro. That report shows that the total cost of carrying on the service for that fiscal year amounted to $781,000 in excess of the revenue, and that is without taking any account whatever of any arrears that were owing ; the accumulation of previous years. I may further add, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) in that year, I think, in delivering his budget speech announced a shortage in the postal revenue of about $800,000. When Mr. Foster was urged to reduce the postage from three cents to two cents, he referred in his budget speech to the impossibility of doing so owing to the fact that there was a discrepancy between the revenue and the expenditure and he estimated the deficit to be something like $800,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have read this report several times myself, and I have listened to it carefully when read just now by the Postmaster General. I am not here to cast any reflection upon the honour of W. H. Cross or W. F. Munro. I stated they were personal friends of the Postmaster General ; as these gentlemen both being prominent accountants in the city of Toronto would no doubt be well acquainted with him. The Postmaster General had the opportunity of giving these gentlemen special instructions as to the manner in which he desired these accounts to be investigated, and only so far as that do I take exception to the finding of Messrs. Cross and Munro.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman say what exception he takes to the instructions given.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have read that report half a dozen times with the object of understanding it. I may be very obtuse, but I cannot for the life of me come to the conclusion that there have not been overlappings included, owing to the change in the system introduced by the Postmaster General on the 1st July, 1896. The overlappings from the previous years were paid in 1895-96, and counted as part of the expenditure.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is falsifying the Auditor General's Report to do that.

Mr. HENDERSON. That was the practice for many years, and when the appropriation was passed by this House to enable the Postmaster General to pay that $685,447.03, the Minister of Trade and Commerce admitted, that that sum was made up out of overlappings or shortages for eighteen or twenty years. I have always believed, and I am not convinced otherwise yet, that the overlapping, or the amount that came over at the end of the fiscal year 1895, was paid out of the revenue for 1895-6. Then, at the end of the year 1895-6 the Postmaster General changed this system, and instead of allowing this shortage, which was made into a large sum by means of this overlapping, to be paid out of the following year's appropriation, he said he would call a halt. Consequently the entire amount that was chargeable to that year's expenditure, which I admit was not paid on the 1st of July, 1896, was charged back to the year 1895-6, and thereby increased the apparent expenditure of the Post Office Department for that year by the amount overlapping at the end of the year. That is what I contend, and nothing that the Postmaster General has yet said has succeeded in changing my mind on that point. According to the Postmaster General's Report for the next year, we find that in 1897 the shortage was $685,539. The two-cent rate had not been introduced yet. The Postmaster General had not brought about any great reform to bring the revenue and the expenditure any nearer together. Not until the year 1898 is the shortage reduced to $47,602. I have read carefully time and again the report of Messrs. Cross & Munro; and while I am satisfied that they followed the instruction of the Postmaster General, I do not feel satisfied that these gentlemen had their attention drawn to that particular point. They regarded all the payments made in 1895 as payments on account of the expenditure of 1895, whereas between $600,000 and $700,000 of those payments did not belong to that year at all, but belonged to previous years, extending away back some eighteen or twenty years. I am not impugning the veracity, honour, integrity or ability of the accountants. These gentlemen are too well known in the city of Toronto for that; but I do say that the Postmaster General did not draw their attention to that fact, and that they did not receive the full instructions which they ought to have received in order to give them the basis on which they were to start this investigation. I hope the Postmaster General will be able some day for his own satisfaction to show me that he is right; but I recall well the discussion that took place on this matter in this House years ago, when Sir Richard Cartwright admitted frankly, in order apparently to shorten the discussion that this charge of $685,000 was simply the accumulation of eighteen or twenty years.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not expect to convince my hon. friend. I am glad he has removed all doubts as to the reliability of the auditors. That is a point in my favour. I am glad that he admits their ability and their professional qualifications. Now, if two able, honourable, faithful and honest auditors are instructed to ascertain certain figures and certain results; if they proceed to do so, and append their signatures to a report made after many months of going through vouchers and accounts with the officers in the department, as these men did; if we cannot impugn their report on the ground of incompetence or dishonesty on their part; and if the case submitted to them was such as to bring out the truth; then they brought out the truth. That must follow, or else they are not efficient and honest. There were two things left to them to ascertain—the cost of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year beginning the 1st of July, 1895, and terminating the 30th of June, 1896; the cost of the maintenance of the Post Office Department for the succeeding year. They were also to find out what the arrears of debt were; and they found in plain language that the revenue of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1896, was $3,957,798.51 and the expenditure $4,985,327.53. Deducting that revenue from that expenditure, you have a balance of $1,027,529.02. Deducting from that the cost of the inside service, which is never charged against the revenue of the Post Office Department, you have a net shortage, as they certified, of $781,152.19. They further certify that in addition to that shortage there are owing bills of previous years amounting to $685,447.03. Taking these two things together you have a shortage of $1,466,599.32 That $685,447.03 represents the accumulated shortages of previous years.

Mr. CLANCY. Unpaid up to that time?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. They had been paid out of our accounts, and we got a recoupment by vote of parliament.

Mr. CLANCY. Oh, no.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I say yes.

Mr. BLAIN. This is too large an amount of money for us to pass without having a thorough understanding of it. The Postmaster General makes the statement that there were unpaid accounts accumulated up to the time of the outgoing of the old government, to the amount of $685,447. He makes the further statement that for the year ending June 30th, 1896, there was a deficit of $781,152, or making in the two amounts a shortage of $1,466,599. If my hon. friend would produce before the committee evidence to show how the government of which he is a member paid these amounts, I think he would convince the committee that he is right. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman paid either of these shortages out of the usual annual appropriations made after he came into office. Therefore there must have been some special amount voted for this purpose. Would the hon. minister inform the committee how this government paid this large amount? Did they pay it in one amount in 1896, 1897 or 1898, or was it paid in two separate amounts?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I did not say that parliament had not voted the money. Parliament voted the money to carry on the service, irrespective of the revenue. That money is taken out of the consolidated revenue ; and if you take the amount voted by parliament for carrying on the service for the fiscal year 1895-6, you will find that the revenue for that year was less than that amount by $781,152.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the minister tell us where it appears in the post office accounts ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The post office accounts do not show the amount voted by parliament. They simply gave the receipts and expenditures of the Post Office Department.

Mr. HAGGART. If there was a vote taken by parliament for the purpose of covering the amount of these deficits, does it appear anywhere in the statement of the postal receipts and expenditures that that amount has been paid ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I said a few moments ago that the condition of the annual expenditure and receipts of the Post Office Department are announced by the Postmaster General. But in order to make good my statement, let me read from 'Hansard' of the 31st of January 1896.

Mr. HAGGART. No one disputes it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes, the hon. gentleman's friends do. Here is Mr. Foster's statement :

> In the post office we have an increased estimate of $240,780, which is a large increase. The demands for the opening up of new lines, and for greater frequency and greater thoroughness in the delivery and despatch of mails, are continually pressing upon the Post Office Department, and a large expenditure has necessarily to be made if we are to keep at all even with the requirements of the times, which we are bound to do. There is now a deficit of somewhere near $800,000 between the total receipts and total expenditures of our post office service.

Not that the revenue fails by $50,000 a year, but that it fails by $800,000 to meet the expenditure of that year. He was quite right. In fact he is a little over the mark because the auditors found the amount was $781,000. That is above and beyond the accumulated debts of former years which were still outstanding.

Mr. HEYD. I just happened to have the Postmaster General's Report giving the expenditure and revenue for the five years ending 1893, which may throw a little light upon the subject. Revenue, $12,517,000 : expenditure paid by cheque $15,954,000—deficit $3,437,000. Or $700,000 per year.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would state how it was paid.

Mr. BLAIN.

Mr. HEYD. It was paid by cheque.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend the Postmaster General will need a better accountant to come to his rescue. The hon. gentleman says that when they came into office there was a deficit of $3,000,000.

Mr. HEYD. I did not say that. There was no deficit, because it was paid.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like the hon. Postmaster General to correct my hon. friend

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Since my hon. friend will not accept the auditor's report as to the gross amount of expenditure for that year, let me give the details of the expenditure for 1895-6, as set forth in their own minister's report.

Mr. BELL. I want to call attention to what seems to be a discrepancy. On the first page of the hon. gentleman's report, he gives the deficit for 1896 as amounting to $781,156. That of 1897 he makes $586,539 ; and 1898 $47,607. According to the public accounts the expenditure in 1896 was $3,665,011.30 and the receipts were $2,964,014.23, leaving a deficit of $700,997.07. But this differs by about $80,000 from the amount entered in the Postmaster General's report and given as the finding of the auditor. In that report the deficit for the year 1896 is given as $781,000. But while that year does not agree with the financial statement, the following two years, 1897 and 1898, as shown in the Postmaster General's report, agree exactly with the public accounts. The expenditure and revenue in 1897 and 1898 were as follows :—

In 1897, expenditure	$3,789,478.34
In 1897, revenue	3,202,938.42
Deficit	$ 586,539.92
In 1898, expenditure.. ..	$3,575,809.69
In 1898, revenue	3,527,809.69
Deficit..	$47,602.30

Since the Postmaster General is addressing himself to this matter, will he explain how it is that while apparently in every other year the statement in his report agrees with that given in the public accounts, it does not in the year 1896 ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The accountant informs me that the Auditor General only includes the actual payments before the accounts of the year are closed. The Finance Department only takes note of the payments. If a debt is paid before the accounts are closed, it is included in that year.

Mr. HAGGART. Would not the difference be far greater if the Auditor General only took account of the amounts paid ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, it would not, for this reason, that he does not close his accounts on the 1st of July, but sometimes allows a couple of months to elapse before closing them. When the fiscal year is closed, we are notified to get in all accounts and pay them, as the accounts will be closed on a certain day. We are allowed usually until the 15th of August, and an appropriation does not lapse until the accounts are closed by the Finance Department. Anything paid up to that date is entered in the disbursements of the year.

Mr. HAGGART. That is a new system.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There was a good deal more latitude allowed formerly.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at 8 o'clock.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I was asked to show how the amount of the current expenditure had been paid and also how the $685,000 had been paid. My statement is that for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1896, the revenue failed by $780,000 to meet the expenditure. My further statement is that when we took office the department was in debt to the amount of about $680,000 for which there was no parliamentary appropriation. My statement is that parliament voted enough money to pay the expenditure for the fiscal year 1895-6, including the $780,000 and that parliament also voted in the succeeding year $685,000. I propose to prove that.

Mr. BELL. Was there also enough money voted for the year 1895-6 to include all the expenditure for the year including the deficit of $781,000.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Between the money voted that year and succeeding years there was, with some slight discrepancy which we have not been able to place, owing to the difference between the way in which the Post Office keeps its accounts and that in which the Finance Department keeps its accounts. It is a comparatively small item.

Mr. BELL. It is about $80,000.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes, about $80,000. The expenditure for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1896, was $3,665,011.30. The net revenue for that year was $2,964,014.23. The difference between that net revenue and the expenditure was $700,977.07. You have to add to that deficit the sum of $68,734.04, making in all $769,731.11 part of which amount is included in the $685,000. Parliament in 1897 not only voted that item of $685,477.03, but recouped by the vote of 1896-7 in these words:

To recoup the vote of 1896-7, the following expenditure made in 1896-7 in payment of liabilities incurred in previous fiscal years as under the same to be charged to consolidated fund:

Amount of deficit 1st July, 1895... ..	$616,712.99
Incurred in 1895-6..	68,734.04
Total	$685,447.03

which amount parliament voted. To that amount of $685,447.03 a portion of overdue debt in 1895-6 is to be added bringing the shortage to $763,713.13.

Mr. BELL. Why should that be added to the shortage?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have only given you the actual expenditure.

Mr. BELL. As I understand it that $60,000 odd represented the difference between the expenditure and the sum voted for that year, but it did not have any reference to the shortage for the year.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It does not seem to have been expended in the time. I am giving the expenditure. The expenditure up to June 30th which is included in the report of the Finance Department did not include that apparently. I am not going to argue upon that point, because I have only disposed for the $700,997, the difference by the books between the net revenue and the net expenditure. Parliament voted an expenditure of $3,665,000 and also this $685,000. Now I need not go into details to prove these figures which are in the statute.

Mr. CLANCY. Where do we find the payment of that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. You will find all the vouchers.

Mr. CLANCY. Turn to the account now and show where that was paid, the whole sum voted in 1897 covering what is called the deficit.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The $685,000?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The $685,000 was voted to recoup the amount which we had to expend to pay this balance.

Mr. CLANCY. What was it taken out of? The hon. gentleman knows we did not exceed the estimates.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is not necessary for the hon. gentleman to assert what I know or what I do not know. He need not give any evidence on my account. If he desires information I am here to give it.

Mr. CLANCY. I desire the hon. gentleman to be civil enough to give me an answer. I did not ask the hon. gentleman what he knew.

Sir WILIAM MULOCK. No, you said I did know.

Mr. CLANCY. He said it was to recoup the sum that had been paid.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. That would mean that if we had exceeded the estimates we would have had to draw on some other moneys. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that it is not the case, because in none of these years did we reach the estimates, let alone exceeding them, and we did not have to take a dollar from any other fund.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman persists in saying that I know things. He does not know what I know, that is clear. In the summer of 1896, we found liabilities for previous years and the year just closed, amounting to $685,000 for which there was no parliamentary appropriation. The total amount of that vote minus $68,734.04 represented the amount owing before the commencement of the fiscal year 1895-6. A portion of it, the $68,000 odd, represented a further addition to it during that fiscal year. That total amount of $685,000 had to be paid in the summer of 1896, and was temporarily borrowed from the appropriation for carrying on the service from July 1st, 1896 to July 1st 1897, and when parliament met the Finance Minister reported the transaction to parliament, and parliament voted $685,000 for the purpose of recouping the appropriation which was drawn upon to pay the arrears I spoke of.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not intend so far as I am concerned, to prolong this discussion very much further. However, I desire again to submit my position and if I fail to convince the Postmaster General that I am right it will not be for want of effort on my part. It is decided on all hands, that this $685,000 is the result of overlappings or overdrafts, for about 20 odd years. I read in 'Hansard' of 1897 at page 5264 the discussion that took place when the item came up for discussion. The discussion on it was very brief, and consisted of a short speech by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) the Postmaster General not being in his place at the time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> The Postmaster General is not here at the moment, but I can state briefly what this is. They are the accumulated deficits of the post office for the last twenty years. It appears that they have always been outrunning the constable in that department, and they have been constantly paying out of one year's appropriations, sums which were due in the last year, and adding thereto from time to time. They have finally run up to this large sum, and the Postmaster General thinks it is time that should stop.

I think we are all agreed that that is the way this sum was made up. I am not finding fault with the correctness of the summing up by the auditors, but I am very doubtful indeed as to whether they were given the proper basis on which to form a judgment. I should like to have the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite for a moment in order to show the loose way in which this $685,447.03 was made up by the auditors, and I will leave it to these hon. gentlemen to say if there is anything genuine about it. The auditors, I presume, acting under instructions, took the expenditure for the month of June, 1896. They could get that from the accounts in the Post Office Department. The amount was $419,304. They took that for one month of the fiscal year and multiplied it by 12 and ascertained in that way that the total expenditure for the year was $5,031,648.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Merely an estimate for the future.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the hon. Postmaster General if that is a very fair way to get at the correctness of the accounts?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. For what year?

Mr. HENDERSON. 1896.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. 1895-'96?

Mr. HENDERSON. June, 1896, just a month preceding the time the hon. gentlemen came into power.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am reading from the Postmaster General's report for 1897, p. XXVIII. I presume that $419,304 is the actual expenditure for the month of June, 1896. But, it may have been $50,000 more than the expenditure for the month of May or $50,000 more than the expenditure for some other month because I find the statement made by the auditors to be as follows:

> During the fiscal year 1895-6——

And we are now speaking of 1896.

> —there were increases of a permanent character to the cost of the service; such increases were not in existence throughout the whole of the fiscal year 1895-6.

And so on. So that in the latter part of the year there may have been material increases and this sum of $419,304, the expenditure for the month of June, might have been $50,000 more than the expenditure for some of the preceding months. Suppose that it did average $50,000 per month it would mean about $600,000 for the whole year. I say this is scarcely a fair way to bring down an audit of the accounts to show that the predecessors of the hon. gentleman had been extravagant in their expenditure, or that the expenditure of the late government was far in excess of their revenue. Amongst the conclusions arrived at by these auditors we find this statement:

> At the beginning of the fiscal year 1895-6, as a result of the deficits of previous years, there were outstanding liabilities of the department, in the shape of unpaid accounts, to the amount of $616,712.99.

We all agree upon that. We are not going to quarrel at present at any rate with the figures. I want to know out of what estimate that sum was paid? The Auditor General must have had some authority for paying it. It certainly could not have been paid unless there was money voted for that purpose. The information I have is that it was paid out of the estimate that was made for the post office service for 1895-'96. I believe the Auditor General considered that a legitimate payment and I am sure he does at the present time. At any rate he regarded that as a fair method of making a payment. Whatever was unpaid on account of the post office service at the beginning of 1895 could be paid and was actually paid out of the appropriation for the years 1895-96? We are satisfied of that. I believe that my hon. friend the Postmaster General will agree that this $616,712.99 was paid out of the estimate for the year 1895-96. If they paid it out of that sum it would certainly increase the expenditure as shown in the accounts of the department by $616,712.99. The expenditure would be increased by that amount over and above the actual expenditure for the year. Now then the audit comes on. The books are placed before the auditors. What do they do? They simply as far as I can learn—and I see no evidence given here to the contrary—take the expenditure according to the books of the Post Office Department for 1895-96 and they proceed to show the results. Well, the hon. gentlemen can readily understand that when the actual payments for the service of 1895-96 were increased by the overlapping from the previous years to the extent of $616,712.99, the expenditure of 1896, would be larger than it would have been if the $616,712.99 had not been charged up to that year's expenditure. Now, we come to the end of the year and the Postmaster General changes the method. Instead of allowing the overlappings of some twenty years, to be carried forward, he places a sum in the estimates, not only suficient to cover this sum that overlapped from 1895 and which belonged properly to 1895, but which was paid in 1896 and increased to that extent the expenditure of 1896, but included also the short estimate of $68,734 of the year 1895. I fail to see how I can make the matter any plainer. It is quite easily understood, at any rate it is quite apparent to my mind, that this is the basis on which these auditors proceeded and if they took the expenditure as they found it in the accounts of the Post Office Department, increased by the overlappings of some twenty years, they would certainly find a deficit of $700,000. It would not be surprising because nearly that sum would have been added to the expenditure for the year 1895-96 the year previous to the hon. gentleman coming in. I do not propose to follow this further. I have made it as plain as I possibly can, and unless the hon. Postmaster General can show that I have not started on the right basis I think he must admit that his predecessors were not so wasteful after all, and that the boasted deficit that we have heard so much about during the last eight years practically disappears. It has been nothing but a book-keeping deficit and it should properly disappear I think in order to remove this matter beyond any doubt some further investigation should be made, because, if the position which I have stated is a correct one, I think the people have been misled in connection with these accounts. I do not propose to pursue the discussion further. I have said all I can say. I have made my position as plain as I possibly can and I think perhaps the hon. Postmaster General will see that there is some force in it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am not able to agree with the hon. gentleman that he is in the slightest degree correct. On the contrary he is in error from beginning to end and I can hardly assume that a gentleman of his experience and familiarity with the unravelling of public accounts is not able to see the transaction in its true light. He says in regard to the findings of the auditors that they merely estimated the expenditure for the month of June, 1896, and multiplied it by twelve.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not say estimated, I said actual.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Well, he states that they took the actual expenditure for June, 1895, and estimated that the expenditure for the whole of the preceding year was at that rate. On what does the hon. gentleman base that view?

Mr. HENDERSON. On your own report.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. I will leave it to the member for Pictou (Mr. Bell); I will try to address myself to his intelligence. There were two things referred to the auditors; one: to ascertain the actual expenditure for the fiscal year ending 30th of June 1896, and the other, to ascertain for my own information the expenditure of the Post Office Department at the end of that year, so that I might base an estimate on which to ask parliament for an appropriation for the succeeding year. I did not wish to fall into the error of my predecessors by asking for an insufficient appropriation, I wished to know exactly what was required. The auditors took nobody's word for anything; they came into the department and spent months there; they took possession of the department as any auditors would take possession of a company whose affairs they were bound to audit honestly ; they took all the vouchers and contracts and liabilities for the year, and they ascertained the expenditure for that year ; not the estimated expenditure but the actual expenditure for the year. In the Post Office Department one month's expenditure is always greater than the month preceding because there are new services to be provided for and new obligations assumed for the future. I wanted to know the height to which the expenditure had attained at the close of the last fiscal year, and so the month of June was taken in order that I might form an intelligent estimate as to how much I should ask of parliament. That is the meaning of the last paragraph. Let me read it to the hon. gentleman and I know he is fair enough to appreciate it, when it is explained.

In order to determine the scale of expenditure of the entire department reached in the year 1895-96, the outlay for the month of June was ascertained.

They ascertained the exact amount it cost to run the service for the month of June, and assuming that it would not cost less for any month of the coming year, it was considered that twelve times that amount would be the appropriation required. That was done merely to aid me in forming my estimates for the coming year. The previous part of the report merely stated the exact cost for running the department for the past year.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Postmaster General is not answering the argument I advanced. I drew attention to the fact that the sum of $685,447 was arrived at by taking the actual expenditure for the month of June, 1896, and multiplying it by twelve.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is entirely wrong.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is what is said here.

Expenditure for June, 1896, $419,304.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Read the first part of the sentence.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am leaving out nothing.

The yearly expenditure attained on basis of month of June, 1896, $5,031,648.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is not the whole sentence. The sentence begins with the words :

In order to determine the scale of expenditure.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think I am quite fair. It gives a summary detail of the cost of maintenance of the post office for the month of June, 1896, and on that basis it would be $5,031,648 for twelve months, and the Postmaster General takes that as the expenditure for the year 1895-96.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not.

Mr. HENDERSON. The account goes on to give the figures for civil government ; departmental expenditure ; and so on, which amounts to $4,051,080, to which, if is added the deduction from the revenue, viz., $980,570, makes exactly $5,031,650.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is the estimate for the future year. It is entirely a different thing.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Postmaster General is right I will apologize.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Then you had better apologize.

Mr. HENDERSON. The apology will come from the other side of the House.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman nominates a competent person to interpret this I will accept him as an arbiter between us. I will leave it to the Auditor General.

Mr. HENDERSON. I take no exception to the Auditor General. He was in parliament long before I came here and I never had any reason to find fault with him. The report goes on and gives several details, and it strikes a balance that the total arrears would be $685,447.03, just exactly the amount the Postmaster General placed in the estimates in 1897 and had voted by parliament and charged up to the consolidated revenue of this country. That is the way the Postmaster General arrived at the amount of shortages for the twenty years. He did it by the mode of calculation which I have pointed out, as any hon. gentleman will agree with me when he reads the report of these auditors. The Postmaster General endeavoured to make it appear that this was done for a different purpose from what I say, and that is the reason why I interrupted him.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) is hopeless. He is possibly the only gentleman in this whole committee who will pledge his reputation to such an argument. I assure him that he is entirely in error. If he has the slightest desire to be informed on the subject, I would recommend him to go to the Auditor General and see if the Auditor General will support him in that contention. I again say for his information—and know what I am talking about—that the auditors came here and examined the vouchers for the year 1895-6. They did not estimate ; they ascertained the facts. They ascertained that the expenditure was so much and that the revenue was so much, and they found that the expenditure exceeded the revenue by $781,000 for the fiscal year 1895-6. The estimate my hon. friend mentioned was simply an estimate made for my future guidance, as I explained before.

Mr. HENDERSON. Was it just a peculiar coincidence that that estimate was exactly to one cent the amount which the hon. gentleman asked this House to vote to cover the overlapping for twenty years previous ? If it was it was a most remarkable coincidence.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not know what the hon. gentleman is talking about, and I do not think anybody else understands his figures. The expenditure for the year 1895-6 was $3,665,011.30. In addition to that there were arrears amounting to $685,437.03. These figures together make $4,350,448.33. Deducting from that total sum the net revenue for that year, $2,964,014.23, leaves a balance of $1,386,434.10 to be accounted for. I am not pretending to say that this whole shortage was to be charged against that fiscal year ; but a portion of it, according to the finding of the auditors $780,000, was to be charged against the year just closed and the balance against previous years. That is the transaction in a nutshell. Parliament voted in one form or another $1,386,434 in excess of the revenue of the fiscal year 1895-6. It would be very unfair if I should attempt in my accounts to charge the whole of that shortage against the fiscal year 1895-6. We did not do that : but the auditors found that a portion of that amount represented accumulations of arrears of previous years ; and those accumulations were made a special vote, leaving $780,000 as a clean deficit against the operation of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1896.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. The contention of our hon. friends opposite is that the deficit found in the accounts of the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th June, 1896, was an accumulation of deficits for some eighteen or twenty years previous.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is not the contention at all.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. What is the contention then ?

Mr. HENDERSON. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that we were contending that the $780,000, the deficit shown by the Postmaster General's report, was an accumulation of deficits. No hon. gentleman on this side of the House said so. The hon. gentleman is confusing the overlappings for twenty years, or deficits in the amount estimated to carry on the work of the department for that period, with the difference between revenue and expenditure, which is an entirely different thing.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I do not quite understand my hon. friend. However, I have gone into this matter a little, and I think that even with that little I shall be able possibly to throw some light on the question. I have gone back as far as the year 1887. The report of the Postmaster General for the year 1888 says :

The postal revenue of the year as shown by the statement was $2,966,397, but owing to the change in the system of accounting for the revenue, which commenced on 1st July, 1888, said revenue cannot be compared with the preceding year, without taking into consideration the fact that certain amounts belonging to the year, but not deposited in the bank until after the 30th June, 1888, were, contrary to the system which formerly prevailed, brought to account in this year. This analysis would give a revenue of $2,751,139 as against $2,603,255 for the preceding year ; and a deficit of $782,258, as against $854,845 for the preceding year.

This is signed by the then Postmaster General, John Haggart. Now, if the contention raised by our hon. friends opposite were correct, that the deficit of one year was carried into the next, you would find that the deficit for the year 1888 was $72,587 less than that of the previous year, or in other words, that there would be actually a surplus of that amount in the operations of the year 1888. I understand, however, that there has never been a surplus in the Post Office Department since confederation until a year or two ago. This fact itself will show that the deficits were not carried forward from year to year, but that each year was accounted for by itself.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman knows that when the estimates are voted for the Post Office Department, the question of what the revenue may be is never taken into consideration. The deficit, if there is any, must arise, not between the receipts and expenditures, but between the sum voted and the actual expenditure.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. This report for the year 1888 gives the actual figures. The revenue, the expenditure and the deficits for several years were as follows :—

Year.	Revenue.	Expenditure	Deficits.
1888.....	2,751,139	3,533,397	782,258
1889.....	2,220,503	2,982,321	761,818
1890.....	2,357,388	3,074,469	717,081
1891.....	2,515,823	3,161,675	645,852
1892.....	2,652,745	3,316,120	663,375
1893.....	2,773,507	3,421,203	747,696
1894.....	2,809,341	3,517,261	707,920
1895.....	2,792,789	3,593,647	800,858
1896.....	2,964,014	3,665,011	700,977
1897.....	3,202,638	3,789,478	586,540

In 1897 reduction had been made in the rate of postage and there were no changes in the department. But there were some reductions, I believe, in the cost of carrying the mails, yet notwithstanding these reductions the deficit in that year amounted to $586,54. Now according to the contention of our hon. friends opposite, the deficit was about $40,000 a year, extending over a period of some eighteen or twenty years, but how can they reconcile that statement with the fact that in 1897 it amounted to $586,540 ? In that year the Postmaster General started with a clean slate and in the name of common sense, how could the deficit amount in one year to $586,540, after some reductions had been made in the cost of carrying the mails, if the average deficit had been only $40,000 a year ?

Mr. BELL. According to your figures there was a decrease every year.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. No, there were increases and decreases.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. From 1895 there was a decrease.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Yes, but only a small decrease. 1896 was only $100,000 less in round figures than 1895. I have taken these figures from the reports of the Post Office Department, which are authentic and which consequently nobody will dispute. I have taken the figures from 1887 and have shown the deficit every year. It went up some years and down others, which proves that the contention of our hon. friends opposite cannot be correct.

Mr. BLAIN. How was that money paid ?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I am not explaining that, but am simply giving the actual figures of the departmental reports. In the year 1888, when Mr. Haggart was Postmaster General, he said positively that the deficit for 1887 was $854,845 and that the deficit for 1888 was $782,258. If the deficit of 1887 had been carried forward and charged in the expenditure of 1888, there would have been an actual surplus of $72,587 in the latter year, which no hon. gentleman will contend for a moment could have been the case. These figures prove conclusively that the deficit in the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1896, was not the accumulated deficit of the preceding years, but the actual deficit on that year's operations.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very grateful to the hon. gentleman because he has unwittingly furnished a very powerful argument to sustain the position I have taken. The hon. gentleman went back to 1887 and pointed out the difference between revenue and expenditure. Then he took the following year, and showed that the deficit was somewhat greater and followed it up from year to year.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. On the contrary, I have shown that the deficit for 1888 was somewhat less than it was in 1887, which shows that the deficit of 1888 was not the accumulated deficits of the preceding years.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES.

Mr. HENDERSON. Taking the figures on the whole, there was an increase from year to year.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. The deficit in 1887 was the greatest we have any record of. It amounted to $854,845, so that it is impossible that that deficit was carried forward into the accounts of the succeeding year.

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly did not understand the hon. gentleman to say that, but, however, that may be. I understood from him that for a period of some six or eight years, the difference between revenue and expenditure was gradually increasing until we came to the year 1895-6. The hon. gentleman has got the figures somewhat fixed. What we have been discussing is the matter of actual expenditure as compared with the amount estimated and not so much the difference between revenue and expenditure. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in 1897, stated, when this item of $685,447 was voted and charged up to the consolidated revenue of the country, that this sum was made up of the accumulated deficits for about twenty years.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. And what about the $780,000 ?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is an entirely different sum.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Hear, hear.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman is coming to my view. And that sum was larger in 1896 than it was in 1895.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. A different sum though.

Mr. HENDERSON. But it was gradually growing.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, there was no part of this in 1895-96.

Mr. HENDERSON. Because it was the shortage of the estimates, when there was a shortage as there was not every year—

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There was.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have the figures here to show that there was not a shortage every year. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not looked it up.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I know the statement of the auditors.

Mr. HENDERSON. I may mention a case. The estimates in 1895-96 were $3,664,831, and the expenses $3,593,647. I might take other years—but, as a rule, I agree, the expenditure did exceed the estimates, and there was an overlapping. Each year the account overlapped, of course, the amount was added to the deficits of previous years ; and hence, year after year, as there occurred this shortage between the estimates and the actual expenditure, this apparent deficiency in the expenditure was gradually getting larger. And, as I stated before—and I repeat it for the benefit of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hughes)—in 1895, at the beginning of the year there was an amount of $616,712.99 as a result of the deficits of previous years; not the deficits in revenue, but the deficits arising from the fact that the government were spending more money than they had estimated for; or, as Sir Richard Cartwright said they had been outrunning the constable. Now, the Postmaster General said, in 1896 there had been $68,734.04 more expended than was estimated for; consequently he adds that to the $616,712.99, and he makes a deficit of $685,447—not a deficit between the revenue and expenditure, but a shortage brought about during the course of twenty years by expending during the course of these years a larger sum than had been estimated for.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. If my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) will pardon me—I did not take estimates into account at all; I considered actual expenditure and actual revenue.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then, all I can say is that the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. J. Hughes) has been discussing a different subject altogether from that which came up this afternoon.

Mr. CLANCY. I listened with some interest to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. J. Hughes) had to say this afternoon because he came to the rescue of the Postmaster General. But the question discussed this afternoon was not how the post office account stood as between revenue and expenditure, but how it stood between the sums voted by parliament each year and the expenditure. For, as every hon. gentleman knows, no question has arisen in this House in any case as to the revenue from the Post Office and the expenditure on the service—the revenue is not even an incident in it. When the Postmaster General makes up his estimates for the year he does not consider what the revenue is going to be; he simply asks to carry on the service. If there has been an overlapping, as my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) has stated, that must arise as between the sum voted by parliament and the sum necessary to expend during the year. Let me take the year in which this overlapping of $68,000 is said to have arisen. I would not like to attempt to pass judgment upon able men like Mr. Cross and Mr. Munro, but there is something very wonderful about their statement:

Conclusions.—(a.) At the beginning of the fiscal year 1895-6, as a result of the deficits....

Mark the word, for this is a direct contradiction of the hon. gentleman from King's (Mr. J. J. Hughes).

—deficits of previous years, there were outstanding liabilities of the department, in the shape of unpaid accounts, to the amount of $616,712.99.

Now, before I go further let me consider what that meant. That meant that there were accounts outstanding and unpaid; that parliament would require, in order to clean the slate, to vote a sum equal to $616,712.99, and that sum aggregating this total would have to be paid to some person to square accounts outstanding and unpaid—I am using the words of the auditors. It did not mean that this was a book-keeping matter as between departments; it did not mean that one department had borrowed from another; or that we had borrowed from the banks to cover that amount; but that this total sum was owing to the individuals or corporations in the form of accounts outstanding and unpaid, and that, if the money was voted, the amount of the accounts would be seen afterwards and to whom the moneys were paid. I am sure that my hon. friend (Mr. J. J. Hughes) will agree that this is the case. If he were asked to point out the accounts he would be puzzled because there were no accounts in existence. Let me follow up the statements:

(c.) Thus the liabilities had increased during the year 1895-6 to the extent of $68,734.04.

Now, look at the parliamentary appropriation. The appropriation for the year 1895-96 was $3,664,831, and the expenditure for the year was $3,593,647, or an expenditure of $71,184 less than the appropriations. How does the hon. gentleman account for that? The trouble is that these gentlemen, able as they are, confused the statement by dragging in the revenue of the post office, which has absolutely no more to do with it than if it belonged to another service. Even if we did not get a dollar of revenue we should have to carry on the service. I would like some gentleman opposite, perhaps the member for King's (Mr. Hughes), to explain how it is that we find for that year a difference between the expenditure and the sum voted for the service of $71,000 which was unexpended during that year.

At the beginning of the fiscal year 1895-6, as the results of the deficits of previous years, there were outstanding liabilities of the department in the shape of unpaid accounts

These unpaid accounts must have been held by some one, and either this report must be discredited or the persons or corporations who held these unpaid accounts must be produced. There are no such accounts in existence and this is a mere fiction.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman continues to quote from this report to discredit these two auditors.

Mr. CLANCY. I have not said so.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He refuses to accept their figures. Let me give the figures of the auditors. These figures have been before the country for seven years without being challenged.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, no.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. They were never challenged before.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have challenged them lots of times in the country.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Never in this House. I do not know what he may have done in the country but he never challenged them in this House, and they cannot be successfully challenged on the floor of this House. The auditors in question found what ? The actual cost of maintenance of the department in all its branches for the year 1895-6 was $4,985,327.53. That is the actual gross cost of maintaining the department in all its branches inside and out for the year without any reference to arrears, from previous years. The actual cost of running the department for this one year was that amount. They also found that

> The revenue of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, amounted to the sum of $3,957,798.51 ; which, deducted from the above-named gross cost of maintenance, namely, $4,953,275.30, leaves a deficit of $1,027,529.02.

The auditors go on to say

> Heretofore it has not been the practice to treat the amount expended under the head of civil government as a charge against the department, and were such practice adhered to the deficit would be reduced . . . by $246,376.83, leaving the outside service shortage $781,152.19.

So they report that the cost of running the department for one fiscal year ending June 30th, 1896, without taking into account arrears accumulated prior to the commencement of that year, exceeded the revenue by $781,000 so that the taxpayers of Canada were obliged to pay $781,000 that year to made ends meet in addition to having to pay the $685,000 by special vote to cover up a lot of arrears. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Hughes) has given us the deficits of previous years. What do they mean ? He began in 1887, and without taking his figures in detail, we will assume they represented an average annual shortage of $750,000. That means that in 1887 the taxpayers of Canada voted $750,000 to supplement the revenues of the department in order to pay its working expenses for that year, and I suppose that the following year they voted another $750,000 to pay the shortage of running it that year and so on year by year, the taxpayer voted $750,000 each year to pay the shortage over and above the revenue. Even these payments did not meet the running expenses, they did not clean the slate, and they still allowed overdue debts to accumulate until they amounted in all to $685,000. That also had to be paid by the taxpayers, so that the year we came into office, the year 1896 the taxpayers of Canada paid $680,000 arrears of accounts.

Mr. CLANCY. To whom ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. To the persons who carried on the services of the post office, railways, carriers, clerks, and all and sundry who carried on the work of the post office for that year notwithstanding there was $685,000 to be paid, and that had to be borrowed by the people of Canada, added to the consolidated fund and there it is added to the debt of Canada. That is the meaning of a deficit in the Post Office Department as we are discussing it, how much it costs the taxpayer over and above the revenue of the office. That is what the taxpayer wishes to know. Instead of the taxpayers having put their hands in their pockets and pay out $780,000 a year over and above the revenues of the department last year we handed over to the treasurer of the country, the Minister of Finance, $292,000 and in addition to that we have not reduced the usefulness of the service in any way, but we have reduced the taxation on domestic letters from 3 to 2 cents. We have also reduced the charge on letters from Canada to the United States from 3 to 2 cents, and also the rate on letters from Canada to every part of the British empire, from 5 to 2 cents. So much less was paid by those who use the post office, that to-day, as was said by one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues some years ago, no less a person than the late Finance Minister, the Hon. Geo. Foster, who was endorsed by the late leader of the Conservative party (Sir Charles Tupper) the government in reducing the rate left $1,000,000 more in the pockets of the people who use the post office. Hon. gentlemen opposite must agree to the statement unless they repudiate Mr. Foster and Sir Charles Tupper. The people have had $1,000,000 left in their pockets because of the reduced rates and also $780,000 left in their pockets because they are not called upon to pay a deficit. In addition to these advantages we have put practically $292,000 into the treasury as the net profits for the operation of the year.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Postmaster General has presumed to make his stump speech intended to be followed by his followers in the country and I do not think it fair to allow this to go without being answered. He has boasted of his reduction of postage. He has a short memory. Can he recall the time under Conservative rule when the postage on domestic letters was 5 cents and the Conservative party reduced it to 3 cents, a greater reduction than he ever made ? Can he not recall the fact that the Conservative party still further reduced the postage to people in this country when they issued post cards and gave a one cent rate all over the country ?

Can he not recall the fact that about 1892 or 1893 the Postmaster General of Canada, a Conservative, practically cut the postage in two when he gave the people the same rate for a whole ounce as formerly had been given for a half ounce ? Can he not recall the fact that he has not reduced the postage of this country by $1,000,000 because he has only given a reduction in so far as postage is concerned on the three cent rate ? He has done nothing at all for the man who puts a drop letter in the post office and we know that a large number of letters sent through the mails are drop letters. If he had been fair to the people he would have reduced the drop letter rate by one half and the reason that he did not do it was because tariff for revenue was his policy. What about the people in the cities who are paying a two cent rate on drop letters just the same as they had been paying previously ? How can the hon. gentleman come here and say that he has reduced the postage by one third? What about the newspaper postage ? Formerly newspapers were passing free all over the country ; now the hon. gentleman has to tax knowledge in order to get revenue to reduce the deficit accruing from the fact that he has reduced the postage from three cents to two. What about the fact to-day that in hundreds and thousands of instances you will find men paying ten to twelve cents on a packet that formerly went for from two to four cents ? The farmers of this country are paying that. If the hon. gentleman were a lawyer in the country and if he had a client coming in to get him to draw a deed and if the client said that he wanted him to send that deed to Toronto for registration what would be the result ? He would have to inclose it in a closed packet and pay twelve to fourteen cents postage when it formerly went for two cents. That is the way the hon. gentleman makes up his deficit though he boasts that he has reduced the rate of postage. He reduced it in one direction but he took mighty good care to put it on in another. I will not say to an extent twice as much, but he has made large additions indeed. That is the phase of the question that I understood would be the subject of the hon. gentleman's stump oration, a stump oration to be repeated by his followers all over the country. Now, the hon. Postmaster General has drawn attention to a speech of the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes). He came to his support——

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. No, no.

Mr. HENDERSON——and he pointed out that in 1896 there was a deficit of $781,152.19, between the revenue and expenditure. I have been this afternoon hour after hour endeavouring to get into the brain of the hon. Postmaster General how that was brought about and I confess that I am sorry to say that I have not been more successful. I think I have been somewhat more successful with some other hon. gentlemen but I hope that when the hon. gentleman sleeps over the whole matter he will see that there is a great deal in my contention. The hon. member for King's P.E.I., gave us a statement of what the deficit was in 1887. Although it might have been larger in that year than in 1897, there is, I think, no question about this that on the whole, taking the average for the last twenty years, the deficit has been increasing. The hon. Postmaster General will not tell me that the difference between the revenue and expenditure was as large twenty years ago as in 1897. I believe there is only one year in the history of the Dominion when the revenue of the Post Office Department met the expenditure and that was under a Conservative regime, aside from what the hon. gentleman claims now when he leaves out Atlin and the Yukon.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Even including these.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well, we will give the hon. gentleman credit for everything he can properly claim. We do not wish to detract one iota from anything that is due him, but I say that during the twenty years preceding 1897 there was gradual increase in this apparent difference between revenue and expenditure. The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) explained that in 1897, when he, in the absence of the Postmaster General asked this House to put through an item of $685,447.03 to make up what he claimed was the amount of the shortage in the payments of the hon. Postmaster General's department. Now, in each of these years—I dislike, to repeat the matter so often, but I must repeat it again—there was a regular system as the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said. He said that the Conservative party had been outrunning the constable all that time and that they had been gradually paying out more money year after year—I do not say every year—than parliament had appropriated for the purpose. The result was that when the end of the year came there was a sum of money due by the department to somebody, perhaps to railway mail clerks, perhaps to postmasters, or to mail carriers that there was no provision for. But, these men had to be paid and what did the government do ? They simply had them paid out of the appropriation for the following year and that practice the Auditor General considered to be perfectly legitimate and allowable. I am not discussing the practice, whether it was a good or a bad one. I am not finding any fault with it because it is a thing of the past now. Perhaps it would have been better if some other system had been pursued. Nobody is finding any fault with what had been done at that time, because the country lost no money by it, but each year the apparent difference between the revenue and expenditure was increased by reason of this overlapping. The hon. Postmaster General may shake his head but he need not tell me that you can do that for twenty years and not find a difference of that kind. We have the statement of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce as to the way in which this was brought about. In 1897 it turned out that this amount had reached a total of $685,447.03. My contention is that the $781,152.19 included the $616,712.99 that overlapped from 1894 into 1895 that these auditors found unprovided for at the beginning of the year 1895. They found these accounts outstanding, and the hon. Postmaster General has failed to tell us any other way in which these accounts were paid unless they were taken out of the vote for 1895-96. The only conclusion we can come to is that they were taken out of the vote for that year, and that they were charged up to the department as part of the expenditure for 1895-96. When these two gentlemen came down from Toronto to audit these accounts they took the accounts outstanding, and they found a certain amount and that amount included the overlapping from the previous year just the same as you found that there were accounts overlapping from 1893 to 1894 ; hence the amount they set down as the expenditure for 1895-96 is too large by $616,712.99 just the same as previous years are in excess of what they ought to be by the amount of this overlapping from year to year. I think that is a fair statement of the case and I think the hon. Postmaster General is entirely wrong when he says that there was a difference that year of $750,000. Why, he is counting the same sum every year. It was this $616,712.99, or a similar sum a year previously, or a larger sum as the case might be that apparently increased the expenditure every year. Consequently, instead of being twenty times $750,000 it was the same $616,000 or a lesser sum all the time. That much was added to the expenditure each year. And that ought not to have been added if the other system had been adopted. Consequently this fabulous sum which the Postmaster General speaks of as having been paid by the country is a mere myth. I notice that the Postmaster General had a significant smile on his face when he made the statement, as though to say, this will be nice campaign literature, and it will give a very favourable impression of the present government. Well, if each member of this House spends as much time studying this question as I have, and if we are fortunate to meet here another year, we will all come to the conclusion that there has been a considerable mistake in the accounts of the Postmaster General, just as the Finance Minister admits that there is a difference of $3,000,000 between his statement of the public debt as it actually is, and what it is represented to be. There is the Minister of Customs looking straight at me. What does he do ? Six million bushels of corn pass in transit through Canada, and he calls that 'imports,' and exports and figures on it that the trade of the country has increased about $12,000,000. The fact is we can no longer accept as gospel everything that appears in a blue-book.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) takes exception to everything I do or have done, and one of his latest charges is that I have not reduced the rate on drop letters in cities from two cents to one cent or to half a cent. The hon. gentleman has suddenly become an advocate of the residents of the cities. Well, people in cities have their letters delivered at their houses, and I agree with the preceding government, that as the patrons of country and village post offices are obliged to go for their letters, the drop letter rate for them should be only one cent as against two cents in the cities where the residents have the greater convenience and advantage. But my hon. friend from Halton would take the burden off the residents of the cities and put it on the people in the country districts.

Mr. J. D. REID. He did not say that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Well, the burden has to be placed somewhere, and if you relieve the residents of cities, the tax will fall upon the unfortunate inhabitants of the country districts, about whom my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) is so deeply concerned at election times. I do not believe that any hon. gentleman in this House, will say with my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson), that this $685,000 is included in the deficit of $700,000. I do not think that even the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) will say that.

Mr. J. D. REID. I think he will.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will not call him as a witness because I am doubtful about him. Will my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) follow these figures. Parliament voted in 1896 for the service of 1896 : $3,664,831.49. Parliament also voted in that year $685,447.03 to pay the deficit. These two sums together amount to $4,350,278.52. That amount was paid out in payment of the expenditure for the year and in payment of the expenditure for previous years which remained unpaid, or which were taken out of the appropriation for the current year. The net revenue for that year was : $2,964,014.23 ; deduct that from the expenditure which parliament voted and you have a balance of $1,385,264.29. Parliament voted, and there was expended for these two purposes : maintenance for the current year and payments of the arrears of debt, a sum of money which reduced by the amount of the revenue for the year left, $1,386,264.29. That in one sense is a deficit ; that is the difference between the revenue and the expenditure. But, a portion of that $1,386,264.29 consists of $685,447.03, the accumulated arrears. It would not be fair to charge the whole of that accumulation against the fiscal year 1895-6 and it is not so charged in the books of the department ; but only so much thereof as belongs to 1895-6. Deducting therefore if you choose, the $685,447.03, it leaves a balance of $700,987.07 as the portion of the deficit properly chargeable according to these figures, against the revenue of 1895-6. In addition to that $700,000, there is some $80,000 also to be added, but which does not appear to be carried into that account; probably not having been disbursed before the account was closed. The hon. gentleman will see that the $685,000 is not included in the $700,000, but is an addition to it, making together the grand deficit $1,386,434.10. I have tried to be fair in apportioning that deficit against the years to which it belongs.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I understood the hon. member for Bothwell to say that the surplus in the Post Office Department, or the deficit, as the case might be, did not depend on the revenue and expenditure.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not say that. I said that the deficit between the revenue and expenditure was a matter by itself, and the deficit between the appropriations and the expenditure was another matter, and was the matter we were now discussing.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. The real deficit or surplus surely depends entirely and absolutely on the revenue and expenditure.

Mr. CLANCY. I will prove to the hon. gentleman that both he and the Postmaster General are utterly at variance with the auditors. If I understood the Postmaster General aright, he speaks of the deficit arising between the revenue and the expenditure. The hon. gentleman was accounting for a sum that was still unpaid and that had to be provided for.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I was explaining the amount that the tax-payers had to pay over and above what the office earned.

Mr. CLANCY. Let us see what the auditors say on that point. After stating that there was a balance in the year before of $616,712.99, they say :

> At the close of the fiscal year 1895-6, the revenues of the department in excess of the parliamentary appropriation available hitherto amounted to the sum of $685,447.

The hon. gentleman's own auditors declare that the deficit did not arise between the revenue and the expenditure of the department, but between the parliamentary appropriations and the actual expenditure of the department. Now, I will sit down until the hon. gentleman explains that away; because when we have settled that question, we will make the matter so clear that there will be no difficulty about it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I think I have made it quite clear to those who have given me their attention that the taxpayers were obliged to pay in 1896 $780,000 more than the office earned, and also $685,000 to pay some back accounts that had accumulated in the previous years. Technically, the amounts were paid out of the appropriations, which were obtained by the Minister of Finance, and went to be added to the public debt of Canada.

Mr. CLANCY. I ask the hon. gentleman to explain why he took one position, and the auditors took precisely the opposite ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, they did not. Read the whole of their report.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has refused to make that explanation. He must either repudiate the position taken by the auditors, namely, that the deficit arose between the parliamentary appropriations and the expenditures, or else his own statement.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman will have the frankness to read three sentences down, he will find that the auditors found a deficit of $780,000 on the operations of the year.

Mr. CLANCY. I will read the whole thing. I am not withholding anything. It is headed ' Conclusions ' :

> (a.) At the beginning of the fiscal year 1895-6, as the result of the deficits of previous years, there were outstanding liabilities of the department in the shape of unpaid accounts to the amount of $616,712.99.
> (b.) At the close of the fiscal year 1895-6, the liabilities of the department, in excess of all parliamentary appropriations available hitherto, amounted to the sum of $685,447.03. Thus the liabilities have increased during the year 1895-6 to the extent of $68,734.04.

Now, before reading further, I will ask the Postmaster General to reconcile his position in declaring that the deficits arose between the revenue of the post office and the expenditure, as against the statement of the auditors that it arose between the parliamentary appropriations and the actual expenditures of the post office.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Read the whole report, please.

Mr. CLANCY. I will read it further down:

> (d.) The actual cost of the maintenance of the Post Office Department in all its branches for the year 1895-6 was $4,985,327.

That is the gross. The actual expenditure of that year was $4,705,282.

The revenue of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1896, amounted to $3,957,798.51.

They give the net revenue and take that from the gross expenditure. Now, the net revenue of the Post Office Department for that year was $4,005,891. That statement is unworthy of two gentlemen of the reputation of the auditors.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Has the hon. gentleman any objection to reading the rest of the report ?

Mr. CLANCY—None whatever :

The revenue for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1896, amounted to $3,957,798.51, which, deducted from the above-named gross cost of maintenance, namely, $4,985,327.53, leaves a deficit of $1,027,-529.02.

That is not the deficit the hon. gentleman discussed at all, because he said the deficit in that year was, not $1,027,529.02 but $68,-734.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman read what is under his eyes ?

Mr. CLANCY. I am reading that. I can surely make it clear——

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Do not be afraid to read the report.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not afraid.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Why then do you not read it ?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman wants to slide over that thin ice and I am not disposed to allow him. His auditors declared that there was a deficit between the parliamentary appropriations and the expenditure of $68,000 in 1895-6. The same auditors declared that there was a deficit between the gross expenditure and net revenue of $1,-027,529. Which does the hon. gentleman take? Which position does he take in discussing this matter? Is he discussing it on the difference between the revenue and expenditure or between the parliamentary appropriations and the expenditure ? I venture to say he dares not make a choice.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My comparisons are between the actual expenditure and the actual revenue, and that is what the auditors took. The hon. gentleman will not read the rest of the report.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman is not so fair as he would like to appear. It is perfectly clear that the auditors declared that between the parliamentary appropriations and the expenditure for 1895-6, there was a difference of $68,734.04. Their report also declares that between the gross expenditure adn the net revenue there was a deficit of $1,027,529.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Why is the hon. gentleman afraid to read the whole of the report ?

Mr. CLANCY—I shall conclude reading it. I had read down to 'f.'

Heretofore it has not been the practice to treat the amount expended under the head of 'Civil Government' as a charge against the department, and were such practice adhered to, the deficit of $1,027,529.02 would be reduced to $246,376.83, leaving for the outside service a shortage of $781,152.19.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is right.

Mr. CLANCY. What comfort does the hon. gentleman get from that ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Might I put the same question to my hon. friend ?

Mr. CLANCY. It has nothing to do with what we are discussing at all. It is not the sum which the hon. gentleman claims should be voted by parliament as the deficit in the past.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It had been nearly all voted.

Mr. CLANCY. Because he claims that the deficit in the past was not that sum but $685,447. Therefore it does not mean that. I will conclude :

During the fiscal year 1895-6 there were increases of a permanent character to the cost of the service. Such increases were not in existence throughout the whole of the fiscal year 1895-6, but they will occasion an increase in the expenditure of the year 1896-7 over 1895-6.

I presume that part of the statement is what the hon. gentleman referred to as telling him what he would require for the next year. But it is not dealing with the former years at all. I think we have made it perfectly clear that the hon. gentleman has come down with a report by the auditors specially appointed for the purpose, and that the auditors declare one thing, whether it be true or not, and the hon. gentleman declares the very opposite. He declares he is discussing the question wholly upon the revenue and expenditure of his department, and the auditors have discussed it on the ground of finding whether there was any overlapping on any sum to be voted to cover the expenditure of the past year. They discussed it entirely upon the ground of the parliamentary appropriations.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. They discussed one item on that ground. Others they did not.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman asked $685,000. That is the sum the hon. gentleman said was not paid.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There was no appropriation for it.

Mr. CLANCY. We will see how we arrive at that.

Mr. SCOTT. What is the date of that report.

Mr. CLANCY. This is dealing with the accounts of 1895-6, the last year when the Conservative government was in power.

Mr. SCOTT. Has the hon. gentleman anything dealing with matters some fifty years older ? Or has he any information relating to matters say a dozen years earlier ?

Mr. CLANCY. I am taking the conclusions of the auditors referred to by the Postmaster General, and I am doing so in order to find out the true standing of the matter. This is what they say and how they arrive at the conclusion that $685,447 must be voted by parliament.

Mr. SCOTT. Is the matter which we have spent some hours in discussing now of the slightest interest to anybody in the country? How is anybody to be affected by it ?

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman had paid any attention to the discussion, he would know it is of some importance to the country to find that the Postmaster General makes a statement to the House which is at variance with the auditors' report.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have not done anything of the kind.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it of no importance that the hon. gentleman should make a statement at variance with the authorities he produces ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Let the hon. gentleman specify any statement which he says I made, which is at variance with the auditors' report.

Mr. CLANCY. He said that the sum to be voted to cover the deficit in the service arose out of a difference between the revenue and the expenditure of the Post Office Department.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I never made any such statement.

Mr. CLANCY. What statement did the hon. gentleman make ? How did it arise ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. How did what arise ?

Mr. CLANCY. How did the deficit arise, which he says he asked parliament to vote a sum to cover ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There are two transactions referred to in this report.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman is smiling because he is in a hole.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am smiling both at the simplicity of my hon. friend and his ingenuity in giving a distorted appearance to a very plain statement. The auditors had two things referred to them. One was how much it cost the taxpayers to carry on the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1895-6. That reference was wholly irrespective of any parliamentary vote. The most of that money had been voted the previous year—1894-5—and there was very little of the expenditure for 1895-6 actually unpaid, except that it had, in the bookkeeping sense been represented unpaid because the appropriation for that fiscal year had been drawn upon to pay the arrears of $616,000 odd. But all the auditors had to do for our information was to ascertain how near the department was to being self-sustaining. That did not depend upon the vote of parliament.

Mr. CLANCY. Mark the word 'self-sustaining.'

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I say they had to find the difference between the revenue and the expenditure, the difference between the cost of maintenance and the amount of earnings. They found, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1896 the revenue fell short $780,000.

Mr. CLANCY. That is the opposite of what they found.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is what they found. They found $780,000 more expended out of the general taxes than was collected——

Mr. CLANCY. Just the opposite.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) will please let me furnish my statement. I do not wish to bandy words about it,—the thing is too plain. As to the arrears of account they found that there were $685,000, this being in respect of the arrears of the years previous to 1st of July, 1895, except as to this amount of $68,000. Of this amount of $685,000, they found that $616,000 was represented by arrears of previous years, and it had been added to by $68,000 during the current year. For this there was no appropriation, and parliament paid, and the officers of the government disbursed in the payment of these two items—the arrears before 1896 and the cost of carrying on the service for 1895-96—$4,350,000. And there was paid into the revenue $2,964,000. So that the disbursements by the country in excess of the revenue were $1,386,264.29.

Mr. HEYD. That is plain enough.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The whole excess is not properly chargeable to the operation of the department for the fiscal year of 1895-96, but we charge against previous years $616,000, which was owing at the beginning of the fiscal year 1895-96, and the balance of $1,386,264.29 is chargeable as the shortage for the year 1895-96—the amount by which the revenue earned that year failed to pay the cost of earning that revenue for the year—and that shortage is the amount of some $780,000 odd that we have spoken of.

Mr. SCOTT. Were the accounts all paid ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. They have all been paid by a vote of parliament.

Mr. SCOTT. How many years ago ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The accounts were closed up in 1897.

Mr. SCOTT. Then why do not we bring the discussion down to present-day business ? What would be the sense of this committee discussing Roman history—discussing the doings of Julius Caesar ? Yet, it seems to me, there would be as much sense in that as in discussing matters settled six or eight years ago.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course, we have not as much sense as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott).

Mr. SCOTT. I have endeavoured to exercise as great patience as possible this afternoon and evening. I have a number of matters relating to the post office which I would like to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General and this committee. I do not know whether they would come up properly under the head of the item now before the committee, but, if I am allowed to bring them up I think the interest of the people will be as well conserved by their discussion as by the discussion of accounts that were closed eight or ten years ago.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let us finish this.

Mr. SCOTT. There are matters in connection with the postal service in which the people to-day are interested. I know that the people of the Northwest where I come from are vitally interested in matters of the postal service, and there are some things that I would like to bring to the attention of the committee and of the Postmaster General.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is everything satisfactory ?

Mr. SCOTT. It will not be worth while to take up time discussing matters that are satisfactory.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure that the House and the country will profit by the lofty lecture we have just heard. There is only one conclusion to be drawn, and that is that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) has something to say everybody else must be silent. Of course, there is nobody quite so important as the hon. gentleman, and no business quite so important as that which he wishes to discuss. He says he wants opportunity for discussion. He has had opportunities in this House, and he has used them in a manner not very greatly to his credit. The hon. gentleman discussed matters that were not exactly of the year in which his discussion was carried on, and I am ready to leave him in undisputed possession of any glory he has had from that discussion. I am going to ask the Postmaster General, not to explain what he has endeavoured but failed to explain, but I am going to ask him to turn to the account—Mr. Chairman. The hon. Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) seems to be occupied, and I would be glad if you would ask him to give me his attention when he gets through. I do not want all his time, but I would like to have a moment or two. I am going to read the whole statement :

I am going to ask the hon. gentleman, since these are the sums which make up this $685,-447.03, to whom that was paid, and where we shall find it in the public accounts. The hon. gentleman cannot turn to the accounts because he has stated—with perfect accuracy—that this sum does not appear in his expenditure for the following year. I would like to be told on what page of the public accounts it can be, showing the entries of payments made. Will he be good enough to enlighten us ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. This amount is owing simply because the appropriations for the fiscal year beginning 1st of July, 1895, have been drawn upon to pay these arrears. If these arrears had not been paid, then this amount would have been paid out to parties to whom accounts were owing. But these arrears were paid out of the appropriation, and that left this amount to be made up. Parliament recouped that appropriation in 1896-7 by that $685,000 and these items were paid during the fiscal year 1896-7, and all appeared under the proper accounts in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman stated that they did not appear there at all.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I never referred to them at all. I never referred to the transaction before this minute.

Mr. CLANCY. This side of the House are labouring under a strange delusion then.

Every hon. gentleman heard the Postmaster General make that statement.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is not of the slightest importance ; they were paid.

Mr. CLANCY. Then if they were paid, there was no sum to pay. That puts an end to that ; there was absolutely no sum to pay. If there was the overlapping that the hon. member for Halton says, carried forward from year to year——

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Mr. CLANCY. And an appropriation had to be taken to cover the services of the year. That was paid out of the year following, for which there was not a sufficient appropriation. I can understand that, and the Postmaster General has made the case presented by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) quite clear by his statement. I congratulate the Postmaster General on having, after a good deal of exertion, finally made the statement which bears out the contention of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson).

Mr. HENDERSON. I am also glad the Postmaster General has made the admission which he has just made. I understood him earlier in the evening to say that the $616,614 voted to pay accounts outstanding at the beginning of the year 1895 formed no part of the $781,000 as shown in the Postmaster General's report. I am glad now that he is veering round and giving us, at any rate by inference, the conclusion that our contention is right.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. You are absolutely wrong. There is not the slightest foundation for any such conclusion.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Postmaster General says the $616,712 was outstanding in unpaid accounts at the beginning of the year 1895. I ask him to tell me, without equivocation, where the balance of that money came from ? Was it not paid ? There is not an hon. gentleman in this House but believes it was paid, every dollar of it, and no man can tell me the source from which it was paid, except the one source I have mentioned ; that it was paid out of the money voted for the year 1895-6. That is the only source from which it could have been paid, and I say it was paid. It was not outstanding when the hon. gentleman came into power, and there was no other money available for the payment of that sum but the money voted for the expenditure of the Post Office Department for the year 1895-6. That is a settled question. I find—and I am reading from the Year-book. because it is collated in better form—that the expenditure for 1895-6 in the Post Office Department was $4,705,282. Now, assuming that the $616,712 was paid out of that—and I need not assume it, because I have demonstrated that it could not have been paid from any other source and that it was a part of that sum of $4,705,000, and assuming for a moment that there had been no overlapping, no sum in arrears at the beginning of the year, the expenditure of the department for the year would have been $4,089,677 instead of $4,705,282. The gross revenue for the year was $4,005,891, or an excess of expenditure over revenue of $82,679 instead of $781,000. I think our position is made so clear that he who runs may read, and I cannot for the life of me see how the Postmaster General will hold out and contend that these sums overlapping from year to year did not form a part of the difference between the revenue and expenditure as shown from year to year, and I hope that henceforth we will hear no more about this enormous deficit in the Post Office Department previous to the time the hon. gentlemen came into power. We have made the matter so clear that it must be recognized by any unprejudiced mind. The Postmaster General has discussed this matter and asserted his side of it so often from year to year that he has come to believe it. There is a great danger in taking other people's figures, and I think if the Postmaster General had investigated the matter himself, instead of calling in those not so familiar with the department, he would have come to a different conclusion, and I believe a different statement would have been made to-day. My mind is as clear as the light of day that this overlapping from year to year, formed a part of the amount set down in the accounts of the Post Office Department, and the expenditure has always been overstated by reason of the amount thus carried from year to year for the past twenty years. and which is referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1897. The only way to get a true statement of the difference between the revenue and the expenditure is to deduct the amount that is carried forward in that overlapping way from year to year from what is shown by the accounts of the Post Office Department, which will give the actual difference between the revenue and expenditure for each year.

Mr. BELL. I shall accept these figures as accurate. They show a deficit of $461,000 in 1900, but a surplus of some $292,000 for the past year. Is the hon. Postmaster General in a position to tell the House what portion of his increased revenue is due to the increased number of letters at the reduced rate, and what amount of his increased revenue is due to the increased rates upon parcels, documents, circulars, newspapers and other classes of postal matter upon which the rates have been increased ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am told that about ninety per cent of the revenue is derived from the letter rate. It would be impossible to have statistics showing how much is on postage and how much on parcels.

Mr. BELL. I see at page XIII of the report the number of letters is given, the number of parcels and the number of post cards and I thought possibly the hon. Postmaster General might be able to give us that information. Could he tell how much of his revenue is made up by the increase he has made in certain classes of mail matter ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I could not say. I think the increases are on circulars and printed matter and perhaps one or two other items. The rate on merchandise is the same as it always was. The rate is one cent per ounce.

Mr. BELL. Is there not a minimum rate of two cents ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No.

Mr. J. D. REID. In the year 1896, there was a deficit of $700,000 and at the present time there is a surplus. The hon. Postmaster General believes that that is due to his own management. I would like to know by what means he figures out the increase in the revenue resulting in a surplus instead of a deficit ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am afraid that I should open up a very controversial question if I were to proceed to answer my hon. friend. My hon. friend will see that the increase in the business of the department increases the revenue as well as the expenditure. It is an expanding service. In a young country like Canada the business must continue to increase every year and unless the revenue increases faster then the expenditure we will be getting more and more in arrears. But if the revenue increases more rapidly than the expenditure, we have the difference between profit and loss on the transactions of the year. We have the machinery to maintain whether the volume of business is large or small. The machinery is not worked up to its full capacity to-day. The department could do a great deal more work and the more we can do with the same plant and the same number of hands the greater will be the profit of the enterprise.

Mr. J. D. REID. Is not the real fact of the increase in the revenue due to the increased population that is coming into the country ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I had that in my mind but I did not wish to open up a controversial question. I think the increased prosperity of the country has something to do with it; in fact it has everything to do with it and I might go on and claim that the administration of the government has something to do with the increased prosperity of the country, but I do not wish to introduce any controversial subject at such a time as this. I might argue that the reduction in the rate of postage has encouraged people to use the post office more. That may or may not be the case. But my hon. friend will see that the increased growth of the country, the increased volume of trade and the increased population, all have a material bearing upon the revenues of the Post Office Department.

Mr. J. D. REID. The hon. Postmaster General has been trying to give us the impression that under his management the revenue of the department has been brought to such a state that it produces a surplus over the expenditure.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I never made any such claim as that. I will leave it to anybody to judge for himself as to what has caused these results.

Mr. J. D. REID. Within the last seven or eight years there is no question about it that there has been an increase in the population of the country, and if in 1896 the revenue amounted to $4,000,000 and if we have now a million people more is it not reasonable to expect that we will have an additional million of revenue ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes, a substantial increase.

Mr. J. D. REID. Therefore, what I was trying to find out was if the increase were not really due to the fact that the population of the country has been increasing ? We have not heard anything to-day to show that there has been any material change in the management of the department which has reduced the expenditure and yet I feel that the fact of us having probably a million more people in the country than we had in 1896 is the reason why we have this increased revenue, and the reason why we are able to show a surplus between revenue and expenditure.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. If my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) had been listening to the discussion that has taken place this afternoon and this evening he would have learned that this much talked of surplus was largely a matter of book-keeping. The Liberal government of Ontario for twenty years maintained that they had a surplus of over $6,000,000 and it was contended by the Conservative party that there was no surplus. After fighting the matter out on the platform and in parliament they appoint a commission and that commission found that they had no surplus. The hon. Postmaster General occupies much the same position. After seven years he finds there is a surplus but I dare say that in fifteen or twenty years when a commission is appointed to investigate this matter we will find that it is something like the surplus of the Liberal party in Ontario—a myth.

The postal service is not satisfactory to the country; it is not a modern service. I hear more complaints in my constituency about the postal service than about all other departments of the government. Here at Ottawa, thinking that I might get away from these complaints, I went sixty miles up the Gatineau, to Gracefield, thence to Fish Lake, over nine miles of heavy road, and there I found that the settlers in that district had to travel that nine miles to get their mail in the village of Gracefield. There is the same complaint about the postal service in Quebec as there is in Ontario. While in the United States they are establishing a daily rural mail delivery to the farmers, yet there are important agricultural districts in North Grey that only have a mail once a week.' Here is the district of Wolseley, six miles off the route of the mail service from Owen Sound to North Keppel, and it has only a weekly service. Imagine that in a civilized country. The Postmaster General may say that the revenue from this Post Office does not justifiy any better service, but the fact is that these people instead of posting their letters at Wolseley travel six miles to Kemble where there is a daily service. From Lindinwood to Presqu'isle, which is six miles distant, there is only one mail a week.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Did it ever have more ?

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. I think so.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. When ?

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. I think it formerly had a daily mail service, because the mail going to North Keppel passed through Presqu'isle, but now they have only one mail a week.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. When had it one mail a day ?

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. I see from the Postmaster General's report that there is one service a week from Linwood—

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman stated that Presqu'isle at one time had a daily service. It never had such a service since this government has been in office. Will the hon. gentleman contradict that ?

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. I am not contradicting it. I always understood that it had a daily service. Let me give another example. In the town of Owen Sound, Bay Ward is a large ward extending down to the eastern side of the sound, nearly three-quarters of a mile from the post office. The residents forwarded a petition to the town council, which the council by resolution forwarded to the Postmaster General, asking that a letter-box be placed in the lower part of the ward. A year ago I forwarded that petition to the Post Office Department, and after waiting a year I wrote to know what was the result of their deliberation, and I was informed that they had forwarded it to the inspector but had received no reply. That is two months ago, and I have not received any additional information. This letter-box would be a great convenience to the people of that ward, and after a year's waiting the department is unable to say whether they will install a letter-box for the convenience of the people or not. I am afraid that the Post Office Department is falling into the same political rut as the Militia Department, and that a good deal depends on the politics of the member who represents the constituency. Here is another case which will show how unbusinesslike is the management of the Post Office Department. I drew the attention of the House to this before, but the Postmaster General was not present and I will repeat it now. Owing to a snow blockade, we had no trains over the Canadian Pacific Railway from Orangeville, between the 29th day of February and the 14th of the following month, and Owen Sound was without a mail of any kind for not less than six days. At the end of six days they put on a stage at Orangeville to come through to Owen Sound, but owing to the bad state of the roads it was impossible to get that mail through in less than two days. Let me show you the business tact of the people in the Post Office Department. The Grand Trunk runs to Meaford which is 18 miles east of Owen Sound. The Grand Trunk was running its trains almost every day, and in fact the newspaper publishers sent their papers to Meaford and across by stage, so that we had our newspapers almost every day, but the people of Owen Sound with all their business interests could not get their letters, simply because the department had not sufficient business ability to send the letters by the same route as the publishers sent the newspapers.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. These complaints may as well be dealt with one by one. Of course I cannot carry all these details in my head, but I have just asked the controller of the railway mail service why Owen Sound was not served via Meatord during the snow blockade, and he informs me that the mails that went on the Toronto, Grey and Bruce were snow bound, but after the second day, Owen Sound was served via Meaford. Is that correct ?

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. That is not correct. The mails were brought to Owen Sound by stage from Orangeville.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman stated that a while ago a considerable length of time the department had not adopted the Meaford route to serve Owen Sound, but the controller of the railway mail service states that the service began from Meaford to Owen Sound after the second day (which, I suppose, would be the third day of the blockade), and that the accounts prove it.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. I wish to inform the hon. Postmaster General that he is entirely mistaken. I am a resident of the town of Owen Sound and I know what I am talking about. For six days we had no mail whatever. At the end of that time the mail was sent by stage from Orangeville and Shelburne. It was not sent around by Meaford.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The controller says the mail began on the third day, and was continued.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. I will appeal to the post office authorities of Owen Sound, and will bring this matter up again. I understand that the Post Office Department makes the statement that the mail was sent around by Meaford on the 3rd of March.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He says that after the second day of the blockade the department began to serve Owen Sound by Meaford, and continued to serve it during the snow blockade. Of course, the mails between Toronto and Owen Sound got caught in the snow and may have been delayed.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. I was in Owen Sound during all that period, and was looking for my letters as a business man. I know that we waited for our mails until the stage came. Our Toronto mails we did not get by Meaford, but by the stage from Shelburne. However, I will go into the matter again. I may say that of all the departments administered by this government the Post Office Department is the most unsatisfactory. The people get as little as the department can give them. It may be that the object is to create a surplus. There are splendid agricultural districts in Ontario which get a mail only one day a week, where the people are obliged to walk six miles to get a daily mail. If that is the way the surplus is brought about, it is not satisfactory to the people of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT. I find in these estimates provision for a chief clerk and assistant secretary at $1,900. Is that a new position ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is intended for Mr. Laschinger, my private secretary.

Mr. BENNETT. When was he appointed to the service, and what is his age ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He was appointed in 1896, when the present government came into office. I do not know his age. It appears in the civil service list.

Mr. BENNETT. I have looked in the report, and it is very strange that his age is not there. However, I am informed that he is about 25 years of age. Is that correct ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I should think he is over 30.

Mr. BENNETT. However, be that as it may, it appears that this young gentleman, who was placed in the service in 1896, is suddenly jumped to a position at $1,900 a year, and a new office is created for him, that of assistant secretary. On looking at the report, I find that there are some eight or ten first-class clerks, some of whom were appointed as far back as 1864, who are to receive a less salary than this young gentleman who was appointed only seven or eight years ago. Can the minister explain why he has been pitchforked over all these first-class clerks ? I also find over fifty second-class clerks and over one hundred junior second-class clerks, all of whom appear to have been in the service longer than Mr. Laschinger. Can the minister give an explanation why he has been put over the heads of all these others ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. On his merits.

Mr. BENNETT. Then I am to infer that all the other have demerits ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, but he has special merit.

Mr. BENNETT. I find that for William Smith B.A., chief clerk and secretary, the appropriation is only $1,950. I believe Mr. Smith has particular claims on the department. He was the author of Caron's cribbed correspondence, was he not ? I may say that these gentlemen are all unknown to me. There is only one in the whole list that I would know if I met him on the street. There is a gentleman named Throop, who came in in 1869, and receives $1,800 ; another named White, who came in in 1871, and only receives $1,750. S. S. Thorne came in in 1867, and receives $1,800 ; John Graham in 1864 , and receives $1,650 ; Charles Pope in 1873, and receives $1,600 ; Edwin Daubney, in 1876, and receives $1,600 ; Walter Rowan, in 1874, and receives $1,650 ; W. D. O'Brien, in 1862, and receives $1,600 ; W. E. Bennett, in 1871, and receives $1,800. I want to assure the minister that this man is no relation of mine. I say this in justice to Mr. Bennett, for fear his services might be dispensed with. George J. Binks came in in 1874, and receives $1,550 ; Frederick H. Smith, in 1882, and receives $1,700 ; B. M. Northrup, in 1883, and receives $1,500 ; William H. Eagleson, in 1870, and receives $1,450 ; F. G. Moon, in 1877, and receives $1,450 ; F. J. Rochester, in 1883, and receives $1,450. I might go on and read the names of the second-class clerks who receive from $1,200 to $1,400. Surely there must have been some gentlemen among all these who could have fulfilled the duties devolving on Mr. Laschinger. I know one of these gentlemen, Mr. Bennett, and I assure the minister that he is no relation of mine. This gentleman has been in the service for a long time; for many years he discharged the duties of the present controller, when he was assistant to the former head of the railway mail service. It seems very unfair that these gentlemen who have been in the service for many years should be compelled to see this young gentleman of tender years, who only came in six or seven years ago, promoted over their heads. There is only one inference. If this gentleman has merits, these gentlemen must have demerits. May I ask the hon. minister whether in his opinion Mr. Bennett would be unfit for this promotion which is given to Mr. Laschinger?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not think it would be convenient to canvass in public the merits and demerits of two hundred or three hundred members of the civil service in the Post Office Department. I take the responsibility of saying that Mr. Laschinger is a gentleman of very special merit, and the service is extremely fortunate in having a man of his ability and fidelity, and he is well deserving of the position which I am asking parliament to provide for him.

Mr. BENNETT. I may say in fairness to Mr. Bennett that he never mentioned this matter to me, and I have not seen him to speak to for a couple of years. In fact, he is supposed, like most civil servants, to be too terrified to be seen speaking to a Conservative member. He is the only one of the gentlemen that I know personally, and I am sure there is no man in the postal service today who is his superior as regards fitness in connection with the railway mail service. He has been doing that work I know for thirteen years, during many of which he practically conducted the whole railway mail service of the country.

Mr. T. I. THOMSON. Could the hon. minister give me an answer as regards the letter box in Bay Ward, Owen Sound?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The matter comes to me for the first time to-night, but I will make a note of it and give the information on the supplementary estimates.

Mr. J. D. REID. I would like to ask the hon. minister if he could not arrange with the Canadian Pacific Railway to make connections at Prescott with the down train? There is a train which leaves Prescott at 1.15 and arrives here at three o'clock—a passenger train. Formerly the Canadian Pacific Railway train used to back up at the Grand Trunk Railway station and wait the arrival of the train from the west.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It arrives about 2 o'clock.

Mr. J. D. REID. At present it arrives at 3.30. That would bring the Ottawa train in about 5.30 and would convenience the public very much. Passengers from the east and west on the Grand Trunk Railway would make connections coming to Ottawa.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not think there is any great desire on the part of some railways to make connections with others, nor is there at present any law to compel them. It would be fair to say that the railways deliberately plan to make connections, but we can think our own thoughts. I do not think that the state of affairs will ever be satisfactory until there is some method provided by law to compel close connections at points where it is reasonable there should be such connections.

Mr. J. D. REID. I am not making any complaint but am simply throwing out the suggestion.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. We will make an application.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman has told us that he is not to be held responsible for the details of his department, and I agree with him. That may be one reason why he did not feel called upon to canvass the qualification of all the clerks in the department, but it seems very hard on the many employees that the deputies and the other heads should allow without protest juniors to be promoted over the heads of their seniors. If it is going to be the rule that a man can be brought in from the outside and in a few years be placed over the heads of efficient clerks who have grown gray in the service, we ought to know it. What are the particular requirements that these older employees should have before they can secure promotion and would the minister tell the House what particular merits this Mr. Laschinger had to entitle him to promotion over the heads of the seniors?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He is a stenographer and typewriter, and for the last eight years has been the connecting link between the secretary and the Postmaster General. He is practically the assistant of the secretary at present. The secretary has to do with many parts of the whole service, and Mr. Laschinger has been in touch with him and me and is a most valuable public servant, faithful and industrious to a degree. There is no one who comes in contact with him who is not impressed with his zeal for the public interest. He is an exceptionally able, industrious and zealous officer, and the amount of money asked for him here is not at all beyond his merits.

Mr. BENNETT. Are not all these other gentlemen equally able, zealous and industrious? Surely it is not because he is a stenographer and typewriter that he is entitled to promotion over his seniors? I am sure that shorthand writers can be procured at less salaries than $1,900. It cannot be said that these other gentlemen were not equally zealous in the public service and have not equallly at heart the interests of the service. If it is the rule that length of service and merit are not to count, but that the minister may bring in an outsider and place him over the heads of all the others, it is well that all civil servants should know it.

Mr. BELL. In the Auditor General's Report Mr. Laschinger is entered as having nine months salary at $1,500 and twelve months as private secretary at $600. That would make his remuneration $2,100 a year. He is down in the estimates as chief clerk and assistant secretary at $1,900 a year. That is a reduction of $200. He was a first-class clerk last year, but he is entered as having received at the rate of $1,500 a year for the last nine months.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The maximum for a first-class clerk is $1,800, and the minimum for a chief clerk is $1,900, but he can go up to $2,400.

Mr. BELL. I understand that. But, according to the Auditor General's Report, Mr. Laschinger received at the rate of $2,100 a year and he is now entered in this year's estimates as receiving $1,900. That seems to be a discrepancy, and I would like the hon. minister to explain.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He will have the privilege of going up to $2,400.

Mr. BELL. But, apparently he is cut down $200.

Mr. J. D. REID. Does he receive $600 in addition ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes—that is temporary.

Mr. J. D. REID. Then he will receive $2,500 ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He will receive $1,900 as chief clerk.

Mr. J. D. REID. And $600 more ? Then, his salary will be $2,500.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. While he is private secretary. But the private secretary is not a permanent position.

Mr. J. D. REID. Then, this is an increase of $400.

Mr. BENNETT. This is a disclosure. I had no idea that the thing was so enormous as this. This young gentleman, who is the particular pet of the minister, is to receive as much as the controller of the railway mail service, Mr. Armstrong, who has been in the public service since 1867, and who, everybody admits, is well qualified for his duties. He receives a higher salary than the chief clerk and superintendent of printing and supplies, who came into the service in 1870. He receives within $100 of as much as the chief clerk and superintendent of the money order branch, Mr. Everett, who entered the service in 1875. There can hardly be in this department any idea of fair-play, or even of honest remuneration for services rendered. Take, for instance, Mr. Armstrong, who was in the Toronto Post Office for a great many years and who was always understood to be a most efficient officer. He was brought down from Toronto and installed as controller of the railway mail service. He entered the service in 1867, so that he has given up the best years of his life to the service. And he has to stand aside and see this young gentleman whisk into office ; only five or six years in the service and now only about twenty-five or twenty-six years of age, and yet he receives the same salary as Mr. Armstrong. It seems quite plain either that these older in the service are not adequately rewarded, or else that this young gentleman is receiving too much. There seems but little inducement to members of the civil service to be earnest in the performance of their duties when they see promotions made in this way, simply at the will of the minister.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. As for Mr. Armstrong, I agree with all that has been said about him—he is a man of great merit. When I came into office I found that his merit was recognized to the extent of $1,500 a year. I at once took steps to put him in a more important position, and got an Act of Parliament passed which at once increased his salary from $1,500 to $2,500 a year. I do not think, therefore, that it can be said that I have not treated him well. There is quite high authority for paying men according to their merit and I do not think that even years are the only test of what a man's services are worth. In this case I can only add to what I have already said that Mr. Laschinger is well deserving of what is proposed here. I know of no person in the public service who will give better value for what he will draw than Mr. Laschinger, if he is so fortunate as to enjoy the position which I desire to secure for him.

Mr. J. D. REID. This is another case similar to what I have objected to. I do not know Mr. Laschinger, nor am I aware of the nature of the duties expected of him. But what I say is that if he is appointed a chief clerk, he will find in that position plenty of work to employ all his time. Whether he is worth $1,900 or $2,500, he will find that he can earn all he is worth by performing the duties of one position, and it is unfair to give him the dual office. There is enough to do in the duties of private secretar to keep one man busy——

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) think that a private secretary could be engaged for $600 ?

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not say that that could be done. I do not believe that you can find a man capable of filling the position of private secretary who would be willing to work for $600 a year. But what I claim is that the duties of that position are enough for one man. To give the dual position to one man has the effect of concealing from the public what is actually paid for the services rendered. I believe that the country ought to pay a private secretary what he is worth, but, as his time must be fully taken up with the duties of private secretary, he should be paid for that position.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That has never been the practice.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not know anything about that ; but he should be appointed to one position and should be paid one salary, and that salary should be adequate to the duties he performs.

Mr. BENNETT. How many private secretaries are there in the hon. gentleman's department ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. One.

Mr. BENNETT. Besides Mr. Laschinger.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There is no other.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Laschinger of course, will take advantage of the $600 and will continue to act as private secretary ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes.

Mr. BELL. What did Mr. Laschinger receive when he came into the service in 1896 ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. $1,200.

Mr. BELL. In what year was he increased ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Year by year.

Mr. BELL. He must have received more than the ordinary increase.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not think he ever received more than the increase applicable to his class. He has been promoted.

Mr. BELL. Do I understand that he received $1,200 and also $600 as private secretary ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, he received $600 and also $600 as private secretary—a total of $1,200. His duties are very onerous. He is a most hard-working man. There is no one in the service, I think, who will take any exception to this vote. Mr. Laschinger is persona grata to the whole department and in touch with every officer in it. He is familiar with the working of the department and would be an invaluable man to whoever may fill the position of Postmaster General. It has never been the practice to have a man fill the position of private secretary only. The private secretary has always had a permanent position besides. The position of private secretary is one personal to the minister, and if there is a change of minister or a change from one department to the other, the private secretary may lose his position as private secretary. The private secretary to the minister must discharge important departmental duties, and these must increase as his connection with the department continues, and he remains in the department even after his minister leaves the department, goes to another department or leaves the public service. When that takes place that officer ceases to be a private secretary and becomes one of the regular staff.

Post office, outside service, salaries, and allowances, $1,548,870.50.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the dismissal of the postmaster in the village of Wilton, in my riding. I moved for papers, March 17, and they were brought down April 29. I complained then that the return was not complete and the Postmaster General, after inquiry, reported that all the letters had been brought down that were not marked 'confidential' but said that if he had authority to remove the word 'confidential' from the letters which were so marked he would be perfectly willing to bring them down. On May 26 I dropped a note to the Postmaster General inclosing in it a letter from Mr. Thomas Prest, in which he said he was willing to have the word 'confidential' struck off any correspondence he had sent. I asked the Postmaster General to be good enough to send me a copy of the correspondence or of the letter he had from Mr. Prest, and to this day I have received no answer to that note. The letter sent by Mr. Prest authorizes the removal of the word 'private' from his previous letter. The letter is as follows :

May 15, 1904.

To the Hon. the Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Dear sir,—I am willing and by this I consent to the word 'private' being removed from any correspondence I have had with you in reference to the Wilton post office.

Yours truly,

THOMAS PREST.

I inclosed that original to the Postmaster General, but as I have told you he did not see fit, I do not know for what reason, even to answer it. I called his attention to it in the House one day and also to the fact that Mr. Walker, I think Mr. Hiram Walker, had written three letters that were not marked 'private,' and that Mr. Walker was perfectly satisfied they should be brought down. At least that is the information I have.

Mr. Prest wrote another letter to Mr. Gallagher, which is as follows :

May 17.

To Mr. L. L. Gallagher.

Yours to hand. I am willing to have the word 'private' taken out. I think there never was a meaner piece of business done by any set of men and I do not think it will do Keach any good, but will hurt him, which I am sorry for, him being misled by Clide and others that ought to have known better. I hope Wilson will insist on the matter being brought down and sifted.

Yours always,

THOMAS PREST.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is pretty plain why, this letter has not been brought down. Mr. Thomas Prest is one of the most active Liberals in the township of Earnesttown in the riding of Lennox and Addington. He was it appears, a great friend of Mr. Gallagher, and a good politician. Mr. Gallagher being a popular postmaster, he knew that any interference with him as postmaster would injure very materially the chances of Mr. Keach, my opponent in Lennox and Addington. Therefore, he knew that it was a very foolish thing for them to interfere in this matter. But last year, during the session, I think early in June, the Postmaster General was good enough to let me see the papers ; I took only a very cursory look at them, but I came to the conclusion that there was not very much in them and I did not think that the Postmaster General would find enough in them to dismiss the postmaster at Wilton. I find in the correspondence that is brought down a letter from Mr. Herrington. Those who were here the other night will remember that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that this was the gentleman that tried to hold him up on a small job of 14 buoys. I would not accuse him of anything of that kind. The letter is signed by the firm of Herrington, Warner & Graham. Mr. Herrington is the head of the firm, a very active politician. Mr. Warner has been away from the country a good many years, and Mr. Graham is a Conservative, so I take it that although this letter is signed with the name of the firm, it is really a letter from the head of the firm only. It is as follows :

Napanee, May 7, 1903.

Hon. Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Re Wilton post office.

Hon. Sir,—We have been requested by a large number of the parties of Wilton post office to forward you the inclosed declarations containing grave complaints in respect to the neglect of duty and disrespectful conduct of the postmaster, Mr. Gallagher. We further understand that this is not the first time that complaints have been lodged against him. We are credibly informed that it is the popular belief that it is in the interest of the public that he should be dismissed and a more suitable and acceptable postmaster appointed in his stead.

This is a letter from Messrs. Herrington, Warner and Grange. The trouble is that they do not specify what charges against Mr. Gallagher have been in the past. The question as to what a man's politics were has never cut any ice in my riding heretofore. This post office was established seventy-four or seventy-five years ago. The first postmaster was Sidney Warner who held the office for over fifty years. He had been reeve of the municipality, warden of the united counties of Frontenac, Lennox and Addington, he had been spoken of as the probable Reform candidate and I have no doubt he could have had the nomination had he been willing to take it. Nobody thought that because he was a Liberal, or because he was in municipal politics, or because he was sufficiently prominent to be talked of as a member of parliament he should be dismissed from his office. I think you will find that the particular crime that Mr. Gallagher has been guilty of is that he opposed Mr. Clyde for the reeveship of his own township. He did not succeed although he beat Mr. Clyde in the part of the township in which they both resided. I think any hon. gentleman who has had experience in municipal politics will agree that party politics do not entirely govern in a case of this kind. I have had a good deal of experience in municipal politics and I have had the support of strong Liberals, but at the same time I have not always had the support of some strong Conservatives. Mr. Gallagher's answer is this :

One of the Reform workers told me he read one of Herrington's letters and he said he had told fifty lies to get rid of the gang and he would not do any more for them unless he was paid $50, and afterwards the fellow said Herrington got him $50 for doing the deed.

I may say that when these papers came down and when these affidavits were presented I sent them up to Mr. Gallagher saying that I wanted him to answer the charges made against him. I did not believe they were true then and I do not now. I will now give you a specimen of the kind of affidavits presented. The first one which I will read is from Isaac McEwen :

Dominion of Canada.
County of Lennox and Addington.

To wit:

In the matter of Wilton post office.

I, Isaac McEwen, of the township of Ernesttown, in the county of Lennox and Addington, farmer, do solemnly declare : That

1. I know Levi L. Gallagher, postmaster at Wilton.

2. That during the last Dominion election in the county of Lennox the said Levi L. Gallagher took an active part on behalf of the Conservative candidate, Uriah Wilson, and held committee meetings in his house to advance the interests of the Conservative candidate.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true.

Gallagher informs me that McEwen has told him that he never made that declaration, that if he did make it he must have been drunk at the time because he had no recollection of ever having signed any such document as the one I have just read. I may say to the committee that I was in Napanee on the 10th June. When I was talking with Mr. Henry Allen Baker, ex-warden of the county, McEwen came up and said : Mr. Wilson, I understand it has been reported in Ottawa that I have signed a declaration asking for the dismissal of Mr. Gallagher and that I made a statement that he had held committee mettings in the interest of the Conservative party in his house. I know nothing about his having held committee meetings. I never made that declaration and I have nothing to say against Mr. Gallagher. I believe he has made a good postmaster. He also said that Mr. Timmerman had said the same thing. I wrote to the hon. Postmaster General on June 22, 1903, a letter in which I pointed out to him that several of the parties who made the complaints had no dealings with the post office at Wilton, that they got their letters elsewhere. I also pointed out to him that if a charge was made against Mr. Gallagher it was only fair that a copy of the charges should be sent to him and that he should have an opportunity of having an investigation. The answer I got from the Postmaster General was that he had received the letter and would give it fair consideration. I think that had the Postmaster general taken the proper course he would have seen that Mr. Gallagher was given an opportunity of answering the charges made against him, because it is a principle of justice in every British country that a man charged with a crime should not be condemned without a hearing. There were only two charges that in my judgment amounted to anything and when you come to sift them down I do not think they amount to very much. One was that a letter which had been sent on Saturday from Wilton in time to catch the mail for Camden East to Mr. Timmerman asking him to be on hand on Monday to vote for Mr. Clyde for reeve of the township was delayed with the result that it did not reach Timmerman in time. Gallagher said that he did not know whether he made out the bill or not. In any event one of the gentlemen who wanted Mr. Timmerman to come and vote went over and met him on Sunday with the result that he was on hand Monday morning and polled his vote for the candidate of his choice. Here is what Mr. Clyde says about the registered letter : I shall not bother reading his affidavit because what he says in his letter and what he says in his affidavit amount to about the same thing. Then I shall read Mr. Gallagher's explanation. The hon. Postmaster General ought to deal fairly with Mr. Gallagher because he is a good business man, a popular man in his own section, and an active man. He certainly ought to think twice before dismissing him without a trial. Mr. Clyde says :

April 3rd, 1903.

This is to certify that a registered letter bearing the stamp of the Kingston post office, dated March 18th, was detained at Wilton or elsewhere from that date until the evening of the 27th March. My son asked for my mail five or six times between the dates mentioned and this letter was withheld.

This is not the only time that registered mail has been delayed which was addressed to me. I have already reported the above to post office inspector to be investigated.

(Sgd.) THOS. CLYDE.

Now, Mr. Gallagher's answer to that is this :

I may say that Mr. Clyde is mistaken. His son was here the night the letter came and went away before it was registered on book or that we knew that it was for Clyde. It came in a sealed wrapper and there was one for me same night. I can prove positively that his son did not call for letter and that Bush was the first man to call for his mail. We keep the registered matter in a desk and the common mail we put in his box. When I sent the registered letter up it was to oblige him. He told the inspector I was a very obliging postmaster and probably they never would get as good, but he was urged to use his influence against me by his party.

I think the hon. Postmaster General himself will see the reasonableness of Mr. Gallagher's explanation. He knows very well that when the mail comes into the office, the mail matter is first distributed around in the boxes, and, afterwards the registered letters, which they have to be so careful about are entered in their books. He further says :

The only thing Clyde has against me was that I opposed him for reeve and cost him about $75 to $100 to beat me thirty-two votes. My own ward that generally goes Reform, gave me nineteen majority and we are both in same ward. In short he has simply made himself a tool to accommodate about seven families and they nearly all related to each other. There was no object in me holding the letter. Tom Clyde told Miller it was a mistake to change the postmaster, but the party was bound to do it, and he had to act to please them for he wanted their votes next time.

I am sorry to say that this is not the only instance in which political pressure has been brought to bear in my riding. A few years ago a certain number of Liberals put their heads together and stated that if the caretaker of a public building were not removed before a general election took place they would not vote for the Liberal candidate. I fancy that if the Postmaster General had been quite sure that we would not have had a general election last winter, Mr.

Gallagher would not have been removed, because I am told that Mr. Gallagher was informed he would have to give up the office at a certain time, but afterwards the Postmaster General sent a telegram to the inspector in Kingston who wired to Mr. Gallagher to hold the office for a certain time longer. I think the Postmaster General will not deny that. With reference to Mr. Toomey another gentleman who made an affidavit; I know Mr. Toomey very well, and once when I met him I said to him: Why did you interfere in the matter, and he said: I never did; I didn't sign anything against Gallagher. These are the kind of affidavits this gentleman has been dismissed on. If he had an opportunity to defend himself, as he should have had, I do not think they could establish anything against him. For eighteen years he was postmaster of Wilton, and there was never a complaint against him except one made by a school teacher who wanted his salary raised, and Mr. Gallagher being a member of the school board refused to do so. So far as I know this is the only complaint that has ever been made against Mr. Gallagher. If it were left in the hands of the people to-day I believe they would restore Mr. Gallagher to the postmastership. I would like to ask the Postmaster General about these private letters. I am informed that a copy of one of these letters was sent to a Liberal committee in the riding of Lennox and they investigated, and they had the gentleman before them who wrote the letter, and they had a row amongst themselves. If these letters are not too private to be given to party friends, I think they might be laid before this House. I recollect that the Postmaster General once published a lot of private correspondence in a blue-book, and I had the good fortune to have a letter amongst them, but when I write letters I do not care who sees them. I wish to ask the Postmaster General, if he knows anything about the letter, reference to this matter having been sent to the friends—of the Liberal party in Lennox.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Do I know of a private letter of the department having been sent to any one?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, I do not think such a thing occurred.

Mr. WILSON. It is so reported.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. You cannot believe all you hear reported.

Mr. WILSON. Nor half of what you see either.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There is not the slightest foundation for such a statement.

Mr. WILSON. I am glad to hear that things had not got to such a pitch that private letters could be sent to party friends and refused to the House of Commons.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. WILSON. I hold in my hand a petition—signed by 24 Liberals who get their mail matter at the village of Wilton; men who are respectable, reliable and well-to-do, and who have much more to do with the post office than any other set of men in that locality. This is the petition:

Wilton, June 11th.

Hon. Sir William Mulock,
Ottawa.

Dear sir,—We, the undersigned mail receivers of the Wilton post office locality, beg leave by this petition to say that we are satisfied with the present postmaster and also satisfied with the place where it is kept, the place being most convenient to the general public, and we sincerely hope there will be no action taken to please a few who are either jealous or maliciously inclined to injure him. The moving of the post office would, we are inclined to think, injure our political strength.

We pray that you may give it your careful consideration and undoubtedly our sincere request will be granted. We remain, supporters of the present government.

That is signed by twenty-four leading Liberals who reside in that locality and who have principle enough, or shall I say common sense enough, to rise above party feeling, and to say that they would not do an injustice to a good and efficient officer. I have a letter here from Mr. Gallagher which sets out the whole case in pretty strong and plain language, and I shall read it to the House. When the return was brought down I sent it to Mr. Gallagher for the purpose of getting an explanation of the charges made against him and on May 2, 1904, he wrote as follows:

Wilton, Ont., May 2nd, 1904.

Uriah Wilson, Esq., M.P.

My dear sir,—Your letter to hand containing complaints about me as postmaster, and I will answer them in rotation, and attach slip to each one that you may more definitely understand it. All are true; they are a hard gang—not one of the crowd attends church, and there is out of the eight, I may say, I never saw more than three of them inside a church, unless for some special occasion, and of the eight, seven drink whisky, seven use tobacco, one in the poor-house now, four combined not worth $200, altogether that is $50 each, one with suspended sentence of theft hanging over him. It is of no use to say more, they are simply a gang. The Postmaster General got letters from Rev. Dr. D. C. Day, Methodist minister here for four years now in June; from Robert Miller, a man worth $40,000, a justice of the peace and commissioner, and issuer of marriage licenses, and ex-reeve of Ernestown by acclamation; Wellington Babcock, a well-to-do farmer, and ex-reeve, and a member of the township council for, I think, six years; James Lewis, J.P., and a resident for sixty years, and one of the real hard workers for the party; Ross Peters, owner of 200 acres of land, and a resident of the place for thirty-seven years ; Thomas Prest, owner of 150 acres of land, and a man about 55 to 60 years of age, one of Ernestown's hardest workers for their party ; H. Walker, aged 62 years, always a Reformer and always lived here, and worth about $5,000 to $8,000. I will put their names below and their worth—that is the six men that wrote the Postmaster General. They marked their letters private, and I saw the answers, but this was done to keep peace with the gang, and I kept it from the crowd also :

Name.	Worth.
Rev. D. C. Day..	Unknown.
R. Miller..	$40,000 or more.
J. Lewis	15,000 "
Ross Peters..	8,000 "
Tom. Prest..	9,000 "
H. Walker..	8,000 "
Total..	$80,000

The following is a list of the gentlemen who signed these declarations and their positions :

Name.	Worth.
B. Toomey	Nothing.
J. Carns..	"
Tom. Clyde..	$3,000
M. F. Parrott..	1,000
John Carr..	2,000
H. Timmerman..	100
J. McEwen..	Nothing.
G. Simmons..	$1,000
J. Simmons	Poor-house now.

Not one of the gang are churchmen ,unless Toomey may be ; he is a Roman Catholic.

The foregoing may be hard to understand, but I have put the thing as near as I can, and you can only show the gang up, and the government that took their petition into consideration, when thirty good honest people wrote and requested the post office to be not molested. I may say the post office was to be moved on the 21st December, and a telegram was sent to stay proceedings, and the Postmaster General telegraphed inspector, and he telephoned me to hold it ; this was sent to Postmaster General, I think, by the request of Keech. Dr. Leonard, Dr. Vrooman, Herrington, Keech, Haycock, and Shibley, and Farrell, the Reform organizer, were all in it. But the thing was and is rotten. One hundred and fourteen families get mails here and only seven want a change. The Postmaster General got petition and letters from thirty of the Grits and there are only fifty-one altogether and about sixty-three Conservatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have made out a pretty strong case against the action of the Postmaster General. If he had taken the pains to inquire into the character and the business capacity of the postmaster and the service he had done during the eighteen years that he held the office, he certainly would have made no change. I have another letter from Mr. Gallagher, dated the 7th of May, 1904, in which he says :

I saw B. Toomey, McEwen and Timmerman and those three claim they never signed nor authorized any one to sign for them, and say if they did they were drunk.

What about letters from Haycock, Shibley, Keech and Dr. Leonard, and probably from Sir Richard and their organizer Farrell ? Hiram Walker says he wants it thoroughly understood that the Postmaster General was asked by him in three letters to not molest the postmaser.

I would like to call the Postmaster General's attention to the fact that Joseph Haycock is a civil servant, and that Dr. Leonard is the postmaster in my town. I do not wish to make any complaint against either of these gentlemen ; but I wish to call the Postmaster General's attention to the fact that the First Minister said that if any civil servant interfered with politics, he would give him all his time to do so if be liked. I think it most unfair, after a man has run for parliament and been defeated, and has been given one of the best positions in the riding, that he should still be the consulting physician of the government in the riding, as Dr. Leonard I believe is. I believe that the Postmaster General has some letter from Dr. Leonard in reference to this matter. I know that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had one which he produced the other day from Dr. Leonard in reference to setting the buoys in the Napanee river. I would like the hon. Postmaster General to call the attention of the Prime Minister to this matter and see if he cannot stop it.

I do not know the gentleman who has been appointed postmaster, but I believe the government made a serious mistake. He may be as respectable a man as the other; I have nothing to say against him; but I have a good deal to say against a man taking the stand that the Postmaster General does. I understand that he has been urged strongly to take it, but I think he should have backbone enough to stand up for a man who has done good service for eighteen years. I think Mr. Gallagher's word is as good as that of Mr. Clyde with reference to the registered letters ; besides, the circumstancs are all in favour of Mr. Gallagher in that matter. I think the Postmaster General is to blame for not having given an investigation to see who was right. If he were as strict with all postmasters as he has been with Mr. Gallagher, I have no doubt there would be a good many vacancies to-morrow morning. I will listen patiently to hear what the Postmaster General has to say with regard to the dismissal which I have brought to his attention.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. A letter dated the 7th of May, 1903, was received by the department on the 8th of May from Messrs. Herrington, Warner and Grange, transmitting to the department a number of affidavits and statutory declarations containing charges against the postmaster at Wilton. In the ordinary course, these complaints, as set forth in these declarations, were transmitted to the inspector for investigation. On the 15th of May the inspector made a report in these words :

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Kingston, 15th May, 1903.

Sir,—In returning herewith sundry affidavits and correspondence received by you from Messrs. Herrington, Warner and Grange, barristers, of Napanee, making grave complaints regarding the management of the Wilton post office in the county of Addington, I have the honour to report that I visited the locality on the 11th inst., and made full inquiry into the several charges made : 1st, taking part in a political contest ; 2nd, delay and improper delivery of a registered letter ; 3rd, delay in sending forward ordinary correspondence in order to persoanlly gain a municipal advantage.

I have no reason to doubt or question the correctness of the affidavits made by John Carr, John Cairns, Isaac McEwen, Thos. Clyde, Gay Simmons and others, some of whom were personally interviewed, that Mr. Gallagher did take part in the last political contest, perhaps not as openly as heretofore, but an active part when opportunity offered—to what extent I was unable to definitely learn, although Mr. Gallagher admitted the fact stated in Mr. McEwen's affidavit, that Mr. Uriah Wilson and others were at his house the evening after Mr. Wilson's political meeting held at Wilton at the time of the last Dominion election contest, but denies that the meeting was political. Of course an accurate report of the business transacted or matters discussed cannot now be obtained, but I think the conclusion come to by Mr. McEwen is not unreasonable, and that a political meeting was held and matters in connection therewith discussed.

The second point, delay in a delivery of a registered letter. This fact was clearly established by reference to the registered letter book and the admission of the clerk in charge of the office, showing that the letter, although frequently asked for was not delievered for eight days.

Third charge, delay in sending forward correspondence in order to gain a municipal advantage. In January last Col. Clyde was a candidate for the reeveship of Ernestown township in opposition to Mr. Gallagher and of course no effort was spared by the friends of the respective rival candidates to win. Mr. Simmons a strong supporter of Col. Clyde, wrote a letter on January 3rd, posting it before 2.30 p.m. on that day, to Mr. Harry Timmerman, then at Camden East, urging him to come to Wilton and vote for Col. Clyde on Monday. Mr. Timmerman, who was known as a supporter of Col. Clyde, did not intend returning, having paired with another voter ; this was well known at Wilton and it was common gossip in the village that Mr. Simmons' letter was purposely delayed so that Mr. Timmerman would not cast his vote against Mr. Gallagher. I am unable to say that the public came to a correct conclusion, but the fact remains that the letter was posted at 2.30 p.m. on Saturday and that the mail for Camden East did not leave Wilton until 6 p.m., and that the letter for Mr. Timmerman did not go forward on that day, although posted in ample time, and did not reach Camden East until Monday p.m., too late to serve the purpose intended and suggests to my mind at least, that there was more reason than simply oversight for the delay in sending this letter forward. In my opinion the charges made have been in the main substantiated .

I am, sir,
Your most obedient servant,
(Signed) H. MERRICK,
P. O. Inspector.

My hon. friend alludes to private letters, and sent me a letter from Mr. Thomas Prest asking to have a private letter sent by him returned. When my hon. friend moved for their return, I said I would not bring down private letters except with the consent of the writers, and I think I acted unwisely, in offering to act on such consent. When people write private letters to any one engaged in public life we should not allow pressure to be brought upon them to make public what they intended to be private. However, on the receipt from the hon. gentleman of a letter from Mr. Prest, I instructed my secretary to write to those who had sent me private letters, asking whether they were willing to have them made public, and did not get any reply from one of them. I do not consider that I have any authority to make public any private communication.

An hon. MEMBER. A new doctrine.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is my opinion. Complaints of a serious character had been made against this man.

Mr. WILSON. How many complaints were made before the ones in question ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have no knowledge of the history of the office. A responsible firm of lawyers sent in a number of statutory declarations charging this postmaster with certain offences. They charged him with having been a political partisan in the last Dominion election, with having delayed delivering a registered letter, and with having withheld a letter concerning an election in which he was interested. Although to delay the delivery of a registered letter is a serious matter, I would not in this case have condemned the postmaster for that offence, as it might have been due to a mistake. But as regards the letter sent to Mr. Timmerman, here was a case in which the postmaster himself was interested. He was a candidate for the reeveship, and there was a man named Timmerman whom it was desired to get to Wilton.

Mr. WILSON. What evidence had the inspector that that letter had been called for and had not been delivered ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I only take the finding of the inspector.

Mr. WILSON. But the hon. gentleman refused to bring down the inspector's report in the return on the ground that it was private. And now he is making it public.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I was not aware it had not been produced in the return.

Mr. WILSON. The hon. gentleman must remember that he crossed the floor and told me it was unusual to allow the reports of inspectors to come down, and I thereupon consented to strike that part of my motion calling for that particular report struck out. Now, however, he has made it public. Was Mr. Gallagher furnished with a copy of the charges made against him, and was he given a chance to defend himself ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I remember the incident to which my hon. friend refers, but had forgotten about it and really thought that the inspector's report was in the return. I have not seen the return until this moment.

Mr. WILSON. Does the hon. gentleman remember a conversation he and I had when we talked of the meeting held at Mr. Gallagher's house ? I told him then, as I tell him now, that there was no political meeting held at Mr. Gallagher's house on that occasion, nor was I ever at a political meeting in Mr. Gallagher's house, though he is a friend of mine. Mr. Pruyn who was a candidate for the local house, went with me to Wilton to speak on that occasion. There is no hotel at Wilton, and after the meeting, Mr. Gallagher asked me to put up my horse in his stable and to have supper with him. This invitation Mr. Pruyn and I accepted. But I positively deny that there was any political meeting that evening while I was at Mr. Gallagher's house, nor do I think there was one afterwards. And Mr. McEwen denies ever having made this affidavit. If the Postmaster General will afford me an opportunity we will bring Mr. McEwen, Mr. Gallagher, Mr. Henry Allan Baker—who is ex-warden of the county of Lennox and Addington—and myself, and then let him put us in the box and take our evidence. That is what should have been done before taking so serious a step as dismissing a good official. It would be better than dismissing this man upon so flimsy a pretext. The Postmaster General has got it down finer than I thought—that this man was dismissed because one letter which possibly might have related to a vote in a municipal election was delayed.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilson) does not take the correct view of that transaction. I have not stated that that was the only transaction upon which an opinion against this official might be based. According to the report of the inspector he intentionally interfered with a letter passing through the mails. That is a criminal offence.

Mr. WILSON. Then I would ask the hon. gentleman to take proceedings on that ground.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilson) will please allow me to finish. I say this was a grave offence. In this case the postmaster is mixed up with municipal politics. There is nothing necessarily to prevent a postmaster taking part in municipal politics. At the same time, when asked, as I frequently have been by postmasters who desire to run for municipal office, whether there is any objection, I have invariably told them that the department would not lay down any rule, but that they were to consider from their own standpoint whether or not they should identify themselves with matters that might have the effect of bringing them into antagonism with a considerable number of the patrons of the office. I need not elaborate that point. Here is a postmaster who becomes a candidate for a municipal office. It is to his interest that a certain letter should not go forward. And, though it was posted at 2.30 p.m., and the mail did not leave until 6 p.m., the letter did not go forward until it was too late for the person to whom it was addressed to respond by coming to the place.

Mr. LANCASTER. How was the postmaster supposed to know what was in the letter ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He might not know what it contained, but it was addressed to an opponent of his. The inspector waited upon Mr. Gallagher, and I suppose got from him any explanation he could offer to any of these charges. There does not seem to be any explanation from the postmaster as to why that letter was detained. That in itself was an act of bad faith on the part of the postmaster that could not properly be overlooked. What right had he to detain a letter that might have brought to town a person to vote against himself ? Merely because he happened to be in the position, as postmaster, to control the sending of the letter, what right had he to make use of that position to interrupt the free passage of the mail ? Men have been removed from office for such transactions before, and will again. No man who puts himself in such a dual position may use his position as postmaster for his personal advantage.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think that anybody will say he had a right to stop a letter in its course through the mail. I would be the last man to justify that. But Mr. Gallagher says he had no knowledge of it. The Postmaster General will remember the letter I wrote him on June 2, 1903, in which I told him that it was only fair to Mr. Gallagher that he should have a copy of the charges laid against him. Everybody will say that that is only fair.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The inspector waited upon him and got his statement.

Mr. WILSON. I do not care to say much about the inspector. I think he is a man fonder of office than of justice. I know him and there are men in the House who know him. There are men who are willing to go a good way to save their necks or satisfy the party in power. I do not say that this applies to one set of men more than to another. But I am fully convinced that if Mr. Gallagher had had the charges sent to him, as he ought to have had, and had had an opportunity to have a full investigation, he would have been able to show that he was perfectly innocent of the charges against him.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The inspector waited upon him.

Mr. WILSON. The Postmaster General will remember that I told him about the meeting in Mr. Gallagher's house—that there had been no meeting—and I do not think the Postmaster General has found me equivocating in these things. I think my word is as good as that of a man who would make an affidavit—if he did make it, and he says he did not—and then withdraw it. But he told another man that if he did make the affidavit he must have been drunk when he made it, and he told me in the presence of another man that he had never made the affidavit or signed anything against Mr. Gallagher.

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps the Postmaster General will explain what form the investigation took ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The complaints and declarations were forwarded to the inspector and he made his investigation and submitted his report. As to the exact form of the investigation, I am not informed, but I judge, from my perusal of the report, that he communicated with Mr. Gallagher, waited upon him, heard his version of the story, drew his own conclusions and made his report. He found the charge substantiated that there was a detention of the letter with a motive.

Mr. LENNOX. It seems to me that, without further explanation, we can have a pretty good idea of what form the investigation took. I think it quite evident from the report as read by the Postmaster General that the investigation was pretty much a matter of general rumour—that the inspector was pleased to act to a large extent, if not wholly upon the gossip that was going in the neighbourhood. I think it was a most fortunate thing under the circumstances that the Postmaster General has departed from his usual custom and read to the committee the report of his official. If this is a fair sample of the investigations that have taken place, we can well understand how it happens that many honest postmasters have been dismissed for insufficient cause. What does the inspector say in regard to that alleged meeting ? He says that it was rumoured in the neighbourhood, but he has not taken precautions to have evidence as to whether this meeting that was supposed to have taken place was a political meeting or not. Yet, he thinks he may conclude, as a matter of surmise, that it was a political meeting. I would like to ask the Postmaster General, as a matter of reasonable fair-play, what right there is for the inspector to make a report against a man occupying a responsible position for many years, basing his conclusions upon the fact that there is a rumour in the neigbourhood that there was a political meeting, because, forsooth, it happens that a respectable man engaged in politics stayed there a few hours after a political meeting had taken place somewhere in the neighbourhood ?

It was denied by a gentleman to-night, denied by a gentleman of the House of Commons, and in the face of that this gentleman presumes to conclude that that was a political meeting. That is not all. He says there was a general rumour in the neighbourhood also in reference to this letter not being sent on, that it was common gossip in the neighbourhood that the letter had been delayed. Is that the kind of evidence upon which the Postmaster General of this country proposes to act and dismiss a man who has occupied a responsible position in the neighbourhood and a responsible position in reference to the Crown ? The Postmaster General says that the delay of the letter and the interference with the proper transmission of the mails is a criminal offence. Is that a reason for a less rigid examination or a greater reason for a thorough, efficient, searching and conclusive examination ? To my mind if there is any ground at all for a thorough and searching investigation in a matter of this kind it is the fact that the charge involves a criminal offence. Surely a man shall not be tried in regard to that which is a criminal offence without being called upon to make good his defence if he has any defence to offer. Surely it is not a case where he should be convicted on rumour or on suspicion, and surely it is not a case where with any regard to British justice, he should be convicted without being heard in his own defence. That is what was done in this case.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He seems to have been heard in his defence.

Mr. LENNOX. Has the inspector gone to the trouble of obtaining the evidence of any of the men who were there upon the occasion of the meeting in question, who could have given evidence ? There has been no investigation. The party who made the report has not been brought to confront the person accused and it is a principle of common justice that when a person is accused he shall be confronted by his accusers, and shall be afforded an opportunity of making good his defence in the presence of those who have accused him. I want to say that if this is a fair sample of the way in which men have been dismissed and of the kind of evidence on which they have been dismissed, and of the kind of report on which the Postmaster General has acted in the past, it is a very severe commentary on the administration of the office of Postmaster General. We have not had an opportunity of examining the reports of these inspectors, and the hon. gentleman who is bringing this matter up says that he does not care to say anything in regard to this particular inspector. I am not in that position and I can say that if this is the kind of investigation generally which results in the dismissal of a postmaster, it does not reflect much credit on the administration of the Postmaster General, and if this is the kind of inspector generally employed for the investigation of these difficulties, it reflects credit on neither the inspector nor the department.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I should be very sorry to allow any reflections on the inspector. I have a very slight acquaintance with him indeed. He is a man so far as I know, of eminent standing in the country. I have never heard his honesty impugned. He was in office when I took office, and I do not know how long he had been in office before that, but I think he is a very reliable man and he understands his duties. He understands human nature, and when he is given a question such as this to investigate, he is as competent to investigate it as any one else. He would have no reason for not making an honest report, and when these matters were sent to him for investigation he went down to the neighbourhood, as appeared from his report, he interviewed Mr. Gallagher who was the one man above all men who could give explanation if the circumstances admitted of any explanation of the detention of that letter. He had a motive in detaining that letter.

Mr. CLANCY. If he knew what was in it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. He knew it was addressed to a person who was not a friend of his, and it was detained so as to miss the mails. He knew it was addressed to a man who might come up to vote against him. People know a great deal about each other in the country and about who is going to vote at a municipal election even if he lives a good distance off. The postmaster had an opportunity to explain this charge, but so far as this report is concerned, he does not seem to even have attempted an explanation. The charge is made, he is interviewed by the inspector, and does not seem to have offered one word of explanation about the transaction.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am afraid that if this inspector is no more competent with the other part of his duties than with these investigations he is not a very competent officer. I am afraid people will believe that there has been some understanding other than what appears here to-night as to what was to be done with Gallagher. I imagine that although he was not an active politician, because they do not pretend to dismiss him on that ground, still he was a man who refused to become an active politician on the other side of politics to that which he originally belonged. The question of whether there was an investigation at all or not, is a serious one and might affect all post offices in this country. I doubt if one-half the postmasters in Canada could stand the application of the same rule. I get complaints in St. Catharines from clients from various parts of the province, stating that I should have got letters the day before I received them, but I would not think of coming down here to ask the dismissal of a postmaster, under these circumstances. Delays of this kind occur every day in Ontario and perhaps in the other provinces of the Dominion.

What is the case against this man according to the hon. minister's own statement?—that a letter was posted in his post office addressed to a man whom he knew to be not a friend of his in regard to some municipal election. It is suggested that he held that letter but the hon. Postmaster General cannot furnish any statement from his inspector to show that there was any evidence that that letter was withheld. He does not pretend to say that Gallagher knew that the letter did not go forward. How would Gallagher know unless he was guilty and how would he be able to say at what hour the letter went forward? If he did not admit that he had delayed it, how could the post office inspector be sure that he had delayed it? The letter was not registered. There is not a suggestion of the evidence that caused the inspector to come to the conclusion that the letter was delayed except the unfair, uncharitable suspicion that because the letter was addressed to somebody who might be supposed to vote against Gallagher in the municipal elections, therefore he was villain and scoundrel enough to delay that letter for fear of that paltry vote being cast against him. The post office inspector does not seem to have found out at the other end of the line when the letter reached that post office.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There does not seem to be any question about the fact that the letter did not get there in time.

Mr. LANCASTER. Who has shown that?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is shown by the addressee, I think.

Mr. LANCASTER. The inspector came to that conclusion.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is sworn to.

Mr. LANCASTER. The inspector does not say who proved that. The inspector should have brought the man who he pretends proves that face to face with Gallagher and if he had done so he might have found that Gallagher was entirely innocent. He seems to have been treated most unjustly. The person the letter was addressed to would not know when it arrived at his post office. There does not seem to have been any investigation into the matter at all. He was charged with having taken an interest in the political matters of my hon. friend from Lennox (Mr. Wilson) but they seem not to have been able to prove that and the hon. Postmaster General justifies his dismissal upon the delaying of this letter. I would like the hon. Postmaster General to tell the committee what he calls interference in election. I would like him to tell me whether the mere allowing use of his premises by a postmaster for a political committee, he not being present himself, would be held to be an interference in politics on the part of the postmaster and would justify his dismissal.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not know that I am called upon to pass opinions upon mere theoretical cases.

Mr. LANCASTER. Suppose the postmaster acts as a scrutineer in a parliamentary election will the hon. Postmaster General tell the committee whether he thinks that is an undue interference or not ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. When any case of the kind comes up it will be dealt with.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is the hon. Postmaster General going to shield himself behind that vague statement ? Will the hon. gentleman say whether acting as a scrutineer would be considered as interference or not ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is not the case we have before us at the present moment.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am able to understand that quite well. I know this is not the case that we have before us but we are dealing with the question of taking an active part in politics such as would justify the interference of the Postmaster General. I think it is only fair to the postmasters who at one time in their lives have belonged to one or both sides of politics that they should understand where they are in reference to these matters. On the general principle, applying it to both sides of politics, suppose that a postmaster acted as a scrutineer at a parliamentary election and did nothing else would that be considered as interference or not ? The hon. Postmaster General need not be afraid that I am going at this session to make a charge against any postmaster of having acted as a scrutineer. I know that postmasters in the country act as scrutineers, and it may be that they fear that the axe of the Postmaster General will fall upon their necks. Would the hon. Postmaster General be inclined to treat that as an interference in politics which would justify the dismissal of a postmaster ? I think the Postmaster General ought to tell us whether a postmaster who acts as a scrutineer, doing nothing illegal or dishonest but who assists in securing a proper counting of the votes and in the prevention of personation, acting in the interest of the people as a scrutineer for one side of politics or the other, is guilty of an undue interference with politics which would justify his dismissal.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If an opinion upon that point were at all necessary in order to deal with the present question I would be bound to give that opinion but I do not think it has the slightest bearing upon the subject. Obiter dicta are very unwise utterances. It is never expedient for any one to indulge in them and I think I cannot do better than adhere to that determination.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would suggest another case, and that is where a postmaster attends a court of revision to settle voters' lists. The postmaster is often the best informed man as to the age of people, as to where people were born and as to the qualifications generally of people in his neighbourhood. Would the hon. Postmaster General say that if a postmaster attended a Court of Revision, acting on one side or the other, acting honestly and giving correct information to the court it would be an improper interference in politics ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. After my former answer it is hardly fair to ask that question.

Mr. LENNOX. The Postmaster General says he is not very well acquainted with the inspector, but so far as he knows he is a respectable man. I am not at all acquainted with the inspector but I judge of his fitness for the office by what he has set down in writing, and by what the Postmaster General has inadvertently submitted for the consideration of this committee. On the rules of reasonable legal evidence with which the Postmaster General is so familiar, he will find it difficult to justify his action with regard to this postmaster. He will find it hard to sustain his decision, based upon idle rumour and upon mere tittle-tattle reported by his inspector, to dismiss an official who has been long in office. There was no ground for dismissing this postmaster, and whatever may have occurred in other cases it is abundantly clear that in this case the most flagrant injustice has been done. The inspector says :

I have no reason to doubt or question the correctness of the affidavits made by John Kerr, John Kearns, Isaac McEwan, Thos. Clyde, Gay Simmons and others, some of whom were personally interviewed.

The inspector was not asked to make a return that he had no reason to doubt these statements, but he was asked to investigate by proper evidence whether the statements were substantiated or not. He continues :

That Mr. Gallagher did take part in the last political contest ; perhaps not so openly as heretofore, but an active part when opportunity occurred.

We do not know what active part he took heretofore, or what active part he took in the last contest. If he voted I assume the inspector would find he took an active part. The Postmaster General can take whatever horn of the dilemma he likes ; either the inspector did not perform his duty or the Postmaster General acted upon the most shadowy suspicion which is not evidence at all. Does the Postmaster General claim that he was in any degree influenced by this report in dismissing Mr. Gallagher ? The inspector continues :

To what extent I was unable to definitely learn, although Mr. Gallagher admitted the facts stated in Mr. McEwan's affidavit, that Mr. Uriah Wilson and others were at his house the evening after Mr. Wilson's political meeting was held at Wilton, at the time of the last Dominion election contest, but denies that the meeting was political.

The admission of Mr. Gallagher was that Mr. Wilson and some others were in his House after the meeting was over, but he says there were no political matters discussed at all. Is that the reason the Postmaster General dismissed this man ? That is not evidence ; it is not even enough on which to base a suspicion. The inspector adds :

Of course an accurate report of the business transacted or matters discussed cannot now be obtained.

What the inspector wants his chief to understand is that this was a star chamber meeting, and although there is not a scintilla of evidence to show that there was anything political in the meeting, he regrets to find that an accurate report of what took place cannot be obtained and then he says :

But I think the conclusion come to by Mr. McEwan is not unreasonable, and that a political meeting was held and matters in connection therewith discussed.

Could anything more disgraceful be conceived than that the Postmaster General received that report from his official without protest. In any court of justice the lowest in the land ; in any magistrate's court ; in any division court, would any judge for one moment take such evidence as that from a witness ; would he not tell the inspector : you have no right to think ; your duty is to give facts to which you can depose. Is the duty less upon the Postmaster General ? I venture to say that the universal opinion of all thoughtful men, when this matter comes to be known, will be that a more contemptible manner of administering the affairs of a great department could not possibly be conceived. The Postmaster General not only does not reprove his official, but actually brings his report before this committee and puts it forward as a basis on which to support the dismissal of this man who has been dismissed without any investigation or any opportunity to defend himself. Now, he comes to the second point :

Delay in delivery of a registered letter. This fact was clearly established.

This is the gentleman that the Postmaster General says he will not have criticised ; he will not have any aspersions cast upon him ; he will uphold him. Well, I wish him joy of him. He says the fact was clearly established—how ?

The letter book will show when the letter was received and when it was delivered ; but it will be a peculiar kind of letter book if it will show that the letter was frequently asked for. I have not followed this matter with sufficient care to know what the evidence is on that point ; but I did not understand from the hon. member for Lennox that it is all admitted that the letter had been called for. I challenge the Postmaster General to show one tittle of evidence that it was ever called for. I notice that the Postmaster General said that he would not dismiss him on that ; but I propose to show the evidence in regard to that, and it is a gauge by which we can judge the evidence on other matters. The third charge is :

Delay in sending forward correspondence in order to gain a municipal advantage.

The animus of this independent inspector is pretty well shown in that very sentence. He is to investigate the matter, not to paint or colour it. He says further :

In January last, Col. Clyde was a candidate for the reeveship of Ernestown township in opposition to Mr. Gallagher, and of course no effort was spared by the friends of the respective rival candidates to win.

Again he enters into the political arena. What does he know about no effort being spared ? Has he any right to deal with that ? Is it not the most offensive political partisanship on the part of this inspector to put that into his report ? Was the Postmaster General ready to reprimand or dismiss him for that ? This gentleman, on no evidence at all; but on suspicion, is prepared to find that no effort was spared.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I suppose he could get such information in the community.

Mr. LENNOX. Of course, if he had nothing to do but learn gossip and take it in, and then pen it down for the Postmaster General to gloat over. But if he was to ascertain the facts he would have endeavoured to find those who knew them, and kept clear of those who knew nothing about them.

Mr. Simmons, a strong supporter of Col. Clyde, wrote a letter on January 3rd, posting it before 2.30 p.m. on that day, to Mr. Harry Timmerman, then at Camden East, urging him to come to Wilton and vote for Col. Clyde on Monday. Mr. Timmerman, who was known as a supporter of Col. Clyde, did not intend returning, having paired with another voter; this was well known at Wilton, and it was common gossip in the village that Mr. Simmons' letter was purposely delayed so that Mr. Timmerman would not cast his vote against Mr. Gallagher.

If this gentleman was paired, and if that was well known in Wilton, it would be in order to ask this zealous inspector how Mr. Gallagher was obtaining the political advantage with which he charges him by the delay of that letter. I suppose there is honour there as well as here, and if a man is paired, that is the end of it. With this knowledge in his mind, this official is so zealous that he actually charges him with a design to prevent the return of this man who if returned could serve no useful purpose and could do no harm to Mr. Gallagher if the other part of his statement was true.

I am unable to say that the public came to a correct conclusion——

I do not suppose he was to investigate that.

—but the fact remains that the letter was posted at 2.30 p.m. on Saturday——

He does not show where he got the evidence for that——

—and that the mail for Camden East did not leave Wilton until 6 p.m., and that the letter for Mr. Timmerman did not go forward on that day, although posted in ample time, and did not reach Camden East until Monday p.m., too late to serve the purpose intended.

Although I understood the hon. member for Lennox to say that the postmaster at Camden East did not say when the letter reached there, and this gentleman does not furnish any information that can tell us to the contrary. He goes on to say:

The letter did not reach the candidate until Monday afternoon, too late to serve the purpose intended.

But it could not, in any event have served any purpose because the man to whom it was written was paired. But we have here the fact stated that the idle rumour of the streets, the common gossip of the village, as he expresses it, suggested to his mind that there was some reason more than simple oversight which caused the delay in sending the letter forward, and he concludes:

In my opinion the charges made have been in the main substantiated.

It is suggested to me that the inspector had no right to form opinions or to render finding. All he had to do was to report the facts to the Postmaster General, and it would be for that gentleman to come to a conclusion. If he came to a wrong conclusion, we cannot help it; and no doubt this inspector was convinced that he would best meet the views of the Postmaster General and give evidence of the zeal that was expected of him if he based a finding on the flimsy suggestion which idle gossip brought to his mind. Under the circumstances, I submit that this is a case in which, as a matter of justice and principle, the Postmaster General should order an impartial investigation into all the circumstances; and if such an investigation should be held and acted upon, it would no doubt result in this postmaster being reinstated in his position.

Mr. ALCORN. This discussion has thrown a little light on a matter of general public interest, namely, as to what evidence should be required and what procedure should be taken to guide the government in coming to a conclusion with regard to the dismissal of any Conservative postmaster, a great many of whom have been dismissed by that hon. gentleman. This particular postmaster appears to have been signally honoured in the procedure adopted in his case. What is called an investigation appears to have taken place. An official of the government was sent to the neighbourhood, and he did gather some idle gossip from the streets of a country village which was excited over the dismissal of a postmaster and the issue of a local municipal election. This official does not even suggest that he took any evidence by any proceeding with which we are familiar, but simply that he gathered a certain impression from ordinary gossip, and on that impression he came to a conclusion which he thought would meet the views of the Postmaster General. I might here recall to the recollection of the hon. minister the case of one David Simpson, in the county I have the honour to represent, who was summarily dismissed without even having been honoured by an investigation of any description whatever. The office was sought by a large number of supporters of this government who failed during a number of months to agree among themselves as to which one of them should receive it. That was in fact the only question that was discussed. A great many meetings were held in the village of Wellington. where this particular postmaster held office to decide who should take his place. There was no effort made to obtain charges against him. none were ever made, except two to which I shall refer in a moment and no investigation was ever granted. But an hon. member, who represents a constituency some two hundred miles away, and who happened to be in the neighbourhood wrote to the Postmaster General a letter which contained two allegations of fact. One was that this postmaster had allowed certain cartoons, then being circulated in the last Dominion election, to be posted up in his office. But according to the best evidence we can obtain, he never allowed any such documents to be posted up in his office at all. The other charge was that the building in which he held the office, which he had caused to be erected himself for the convenience of those receiving mails, was too small to accommodate the public. Another allegation was that this same office, which was too small to accommodate the people who were coming for their mails, and who, I suppose, were thronging the office some ten or twelve feet deep, was ordinarily used by the postmaster as a public meeting room for the Conservative party. If one statement be contrasted with the other, we cannot fail but be struck with the absurdity of the situation. Yet without investigation that postmaster was summarily dismissed.

Mr. PUTTEE. Inasmuch as the Postmaster General has given notice of the introduction of two Bills to amend the Civil Service Act and the Post Office Act, will there be anything in these respecting the officers whose salaries are included in the items we are now discussing ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I hardly think I could anticipate the contents of a Bill at this stage. It will be introduced in a few days, and it would be irregular to explain it before it is brought down.

Mr. BELL. Is it understood that, while this item passes, all these items will be open for consideration ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Anything that pertains to the service may be discussed on the subsequent items.

Some resolutions reported.

Bill (No. 146) respecting the Northern Bank.—Mr. Scott.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BELL. What will be the business for to-morrow ?

Mr. FIELDING. The Railway Bill in charge of the Minister of Justice will probably be taken first, and, after that, supply, with the Postmaster General in charge.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There is an item to be taken up, if we reach it, which is part of the postal service. It is for the establishment of a pneumatic tube system. Technically it belongs to the Public Works Department, but it is a matter that I have been asked to explain to the House.

Mr. BELL. That is, if we get to supply ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.05 a.m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, June 28, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT, 1903—AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 132) to amend the Railway Act, 1903 (Mr. Fitzpatrick), was read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

1. In order to the ascertainment of the true net earnings of the eastern division of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway for the purposes of the scheduled agreements referred to in the Act of the present session intituled 'An Act to amend the National Transcontinental Railway Act,' the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada shall, upon the request of the Minister of Railways and Canals, inquire into, hear and determine any question as to the apportionment of any through rate or rates between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and any other transportation company, whether such company is or is not a railway company, or, if a railway company, whether it is or is not as such subject to the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, for the purpose of determining whether such apportionment is just and reasonable, having due regard to the interests of the government of Canada as owner of the said eastern division and of the Intercolonial Railway, and to the provisions of the National Transcontinental Railway Act, and of the said Act of the present session, and of the said scheduled agreements,—which Acts and agreements are hereby declared to be part of the special Act of or respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company within the meaning of paragraph (w.) of section 2 of the Railway Act, 1903 ; and in any such case the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has agreed to such apportionment shall be material evidence only and not conclusive ; and such net earnings shall then be ascertained upon the basis of the receipt by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company of such share of such through rate or rates as, in the opinion of the said board, that company should have received under a just and reasonable apportionment.

Hon. CHAS. FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice). This clause was introduced for the purpose of giving effect to an undertaking that was entered into by the government when the National Transcontinental Railway Act was under consideration. It was suggested that it would be possible for the Grand Trunk Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific to enter into an arrangement by which the Grand Trunk Railway might divert all the traffic of the Grand Trunk Pacific down by way of North Bay, and that it would be impossible for the Railway Commissioners to exercise any control over it. It was argued at the time that under the different sections of the Railway Act (263, 266, 267 and 309) the Railway Commissioners would have the power to control such an arrangement. It was thought that these sections did not go quite far enough and were not quite clear enough, and in that view this amendment is introduced for the purpose of carrying out the undertaking that the Railway Commissioners would be given absolute power and control to investigate any traffic arrangement that might be made between the two companies.

Mr. BARKER. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the limit he has placed upon the first section. It says it is only for the purpose of ascertaining the net earnings of the eastern division.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The apportionment.

Mr. BARKER. Yes, so far as it affects the net earnings of the eastern division. The government of Canada as guarantor of the bonds of the western division are equally interested, because if an undue proportion of the through rate is applied upon the Grand Trunk Railway proper, to the depletion of the earnings of the Grand Trunk Pacific, it may result that there will be default in the payment of the interest upon the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. It seems to me, therefore, that at the very inception of the clause there has been an oversight, and that the country is equally interested in the proper apportionment of the through rates, whether it affects the rental of the eastern division or the earnings that will be available to pay the bonds on the western division.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The question raised during the discussion was with respect to the apportionment of rates between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway, in so far as this apportionment of rates may result in a diversion of the traffic. My intention is to do what is necessary to give the Railway Commission absolute control over the through-traffic arrangements made between these two companies, and I am quite prepared to accept any amendment that will tend in that direction. If my hon. friend would suggest any amendment that he would think effective I would be glad to consider it between this and next Tuesday, when the Bill will be discussed again under an arrangement with my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. BARKER. The country are just as much interested in the proper apportionment of the rates so long as they remain guarantors of the bonds, as they are in regard to the rent of the eastern division. I will be very glad to do what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I would move that to that section be added the following amendment :

Provided, however, that either party shall have the right without leave, to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from any order or decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners under this section.

It may be prudent to reserve to the government the right to appeal to the Supreme Court, for it is a matter of so great importance that we should have it settled there. We can leave the clause in abeyance.

On section 2,—majority of directors of subsidized company to be British subjects.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to section 10 of the Act incorporating the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, which reads as follows :

The directors may annually appoint from among themselves an executive committee composed of at least three directors, for such purposes and with such duties as the directors by by-law determine ; and the president shall be ex-officio a member of such committee.

It seems to me evident that the amendment which my hon. friend is now proposing to the General Railway Act should have been proposed to the law which ratified the contract, and the subsequent amendments, with respect to the National Transcontinental Railway. Suppose the majority of this executive committee should not be British subjects, it seems to me that the amendment my hon. friend proposes would be nugatory so far as the Grand Trunk Pacific is concerned ; because the board of directors, although a majority of them may be British subjects, may appoint on this executive committee a majority who are not British subjects. They may even appoint the whole committee from gentlemen who are not British subjects. This safeguard is all the more important in regard to the National Transcontinental Railway, because, as was indicated before, the company may divert its traffic from Canadian ports to American ports, and the whole policy of the company may be in the hands of an executive committee of directors. Therefore it seems to me that some provision should be made in the Act, specifying that when an executive committee of the board of directors is appointed, the majority of the members of that executive committee should also be British subjects.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. This provision is general in its effect and it was intended to make it applicable to all railway companies in Canada. The only company in Canada to which such legislation is now applicable is the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is no reason why it should be applicable to the Grand Trunk Pacific alone. I think it is proper that it should be applicable to all railway companies in Canada which receive government aid. It seems to me that the executive committee must of necessity be subject to the control of the board of directors. I do not know whether there is anything in the Act which takes them out of the jurisdiction of the board of directors: but unless there is something exceptional, an executive committee would of necessity be under the control of the directors and could do nothing without the sanction of the board.

Mr. BARKER. The executive committee might accomplish many things before the board could have an opportunity of revising their proceedings. If there is any object in having a majority of the board British subjects surely there must be a like object in providing that those who actually execute their own resolutions should also be, at least a majority of them, British subjects. I cannot see why there should be any desire to have a majority of the board British subjects if the men on the spot who have actual control and put their plans into effect should not also be British subjects · a board in England or elsewhere could not always reverse their decisions if they desired. I do not see why these men, having such power of action, should not be themselves restricted in the same way as the board of directors are.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. In any event, the question arises whether or not this is a proper amendment to the General Railway Act. The other matter will require to have an amendment to the special Act respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MACLEAN. Would it not meet the case to make the clause read: 'A majority of the directors or any permanent executive committee of the directors?' I think we ought to have that provision in the Act, because we are trying to keep the control of this road in the hands of British subjects, and an executive committee composed of three members, not British subjects, might be the actual controlling influence on the board.

Mr. BLAIN. Why should not the Minister of Justice go further and provide that all the directors of a railway company which receives aid from the public treasury of Canada should be British subjects? While we may keep the control under British law, a board of twelve might have seven British subjects and five the subjects of some foreign nation. It seems to me that we have already had an indication of that in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The statement has been made that some of the best offices have gone already to United States people; and during the recent investigation, some of these have been compelled to go back and Canadians have taken their places, so that we may say that the thin edge of the wedge has been introduced. While we lie so close to the United States, it might be in the interest of Canada to have some American directors on the board; but I do not think it is in the interest of Canada to have such a large proportion of citizens of some other country.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I would not be prepared at first sight to agree to the suggestion made by my hon. friend. In Canada the majority of our railroads require foreign financial aid. In the United States and other foreign countries those who invest their money in our enterprises are anxious to have some sort of representation on the board of management, and I think while we ought to keep in our own hands the absolute control of the policy of the company, and its general management, it is equally fair that those who invest their money should have some representation on the board. For that reason, I would not be disposed to go so far as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There may be a great deal in what my hon. friend says; but I do not think there is much in his remark about the majority of the executive committee being British subjects.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. My difficulty with respect to that suggestion now is that I should not like to adopt it offhand, without ascertaining how far it would affect other corporations, for instance the Canadian Pacific Railway. I see the fairness of the remarks made by the hon. member for Montmorency and my hon. friend from Hamilton, and the desirability of meeting their wishes; but I do not like to agree to it without seeing what would be the effect of the legislation.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I was going to suggest that after the words 'majority of directors' we should add the words 'and of any executive committee of any company.' The directors of this company may be composed of gentlemen residing in the United States and also in England, and of course the executive committee will, to a great extent, control the policy of the company, because by section 10 of the Act incorporating the Grand Trunk Pacific, it is provided that the board of directors may vest the executive committee with such duties as the directors may by by-law determine. Suppose the directors, composed of a majority of British subjects, invested the executive committee with powers involving to a great extent the policy of the company, then it seems to me that the executive committee would have the right to carry out that policy, I quite understand that this policy will be subject to review by the board of directors, but in a great many instances this board would only meet very seldom and a great many things might happen between the meetings of the board by which the policy of the executive committee would be carried out notwithstanding the wishes of the board of directors.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. We could allow that section to stand also, as I have to add several other sections to the Bill. I beg to move that the following be inserted as clauses 1 and 2 of the Bill :—

1. Notwithstanding anything contained in the Railway Act, 1903, the Governor in Council shall have, and shall be deemed to have had since the date upon which the said last-mentioned Act came into force, power, authority and jurisdiction to sanction, confirm, rescind, change or vary, or to take other action upon any report, order or decision of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council made before the said date under the Railway Act of 1888, or any Act in amendment thereof, in as full and ample a manner as if the said Railway Act, 1903, had not been passed or had not come into force, and as if the said Railway Act of 1888 and the said Acts in amendment thereof had not been repealed ; and any order or decision so sanctioned or confirmed shall have the same validity, force and effect as if the said order or decision had been so sanctioned or confirmed prior to the issue thereof.

My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) will see at once the reason. As the result of the repeal of the Railway Act, the jurisdiction of the Governor in Council, with respect to sanctioning the orders of the old Railway Committee has departed, and in the case of Yonge street, the Governor General in Council is without jurisdiction to give effect to the ruling of the Railway Committee, and the Railway Commission is equally without jurisdiction. The next clause will read :

2. The said Railway Act, 1903, is amended by inserting after section 6 the following section :—

6a. Notwithstanding anything in this Act or in any other Act contained every railway, steam or electric street railway, and tramway wholly situate within one province of Canada, but which in its entirety or in part is declared by the parliament of Canada to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, and every person employed thereon, in respect of such employment, and every person, company, corporation or municipality owning, controlling or operating the same wholly or partly, in respect of such ownership, control or operation, shall notwithstanding such declaration be subject to any Act of the legislature of the province in which the same is situate prohibiting or regulating work, business or labour upon the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, which is in force at the time of the passing of this Act, and every such Act is hereby, in so far as the same is in other respects within the powers of the legislature, confirmed and ratified, and made as valid and effectual for the purposes of this section as if the same had been duly enacted by the parliament of Canada.

This last amendment is intended to leave railways, electric lines and others, which are situated wholly within a province, but which have been declared by the parliament of Canada to be works for the general advantage of Canada, subject to Sunday legislation within the provinces.

Mr. MACLEAN. If a road touches the international boundary or the boundary between two provinces, would that apply ?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It applies to works which are of a nature merely local concerns.

Mr. MACLEAN. There would be a good deal of discussion as to what road would come under it, but that would be for the courts to determine.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I beg also to move:

2. The Governor in Council may at any time and from time to time by proclamation confirm for the purposes of this section any Act of the legislature of any province passed after the passing of this Act for the prohibition or regulation of work, business or labour upon the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, and from and after the date of any such proclamation the Act thereby confirmed, in so far as the same is in other respects within the powers of the legislature, shall for the purposes of this section be confirmed and ratified and made as valid and effectual as if the same had been enacted by the parliament of Canada ; and notwithstanding anything in this Act or in any other Act contained every railway, steam or electric street railway, and tramway, wholly situate within such province, but declared by the parliament of Canada to be in its entirety or in part a work for the general advantage of Canada, and every person employed thereon, in respect of such employment, and every person, company, corporation or municipality owning, controlling or operating the same wholly or partly, in respect of such ownership, control or operation, shall thereafter notwithstanding such declaration be subject to the Act so confirmed in so far as the same is otherwise ' intra vires ' of the legislature.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I now move that the Bill be printed in its present shape and that the committee rise and report progress, so that on next Tuesday we may vote certain amendments to it.

Mr. MACLEAN. On that understanding I have no objection to the committee rising and reporting progress.

Progress reported.

PROVINCIAL ACCOUNTS AND THE AUDITOR GENERAL.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I beg to lay on the table a memorandum by the Deputy Minister of Finance on the subject of provincial accounts, and also a copy of the resignation of the Auditor General.

SUPPLY—EMPLOYMENT OF ALIEN ENGINEERS.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE. May I ask the hon. Minister of Labour (Sir William Mulock) if any further correspondence has been brought down respecting the employment of alien engineers on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway? There was an order of the House passed on the 30th of May and a subsequent order on the same subject. It is to the return to the subsequent order that I refer.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General). I have the return here. I beg to lay on the table a return to order of the House of Commons of 15th June, 1904 for copies of additional correspondence since the last order respecting the employment of alien engineers on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to ask the Minister of Labour whether it is likely that we shall have the report of Judge Winchester before the House closes, and also whether any arrangement has been made to print the evidence and lay it before the House?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am in hopes that we shall get the report. Judge Winchester is to come to Ottawa to-morrow on his way to Montreal, and he will stop over to report progress. He has been very actively engaged in the inquiry ever since his appointment; I am confident he has not lost a moment. The evidence is being taken down in shorthand with the view to laying it before the House. I do not know how far Judge Winchester has gone, but he has made excellent progress, and I think his work has already borne fruit.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think that judge Winchester has made admirable progress and it is for that very reason that I would like to have the evidence in the hands of the House, if possible.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Post Office—outside service—mail service, $2,561,700.

Mr. LANCASTER. While we are on this item, I would like to say a word or two on the general question of the service at the post offices in the country, and particularly at the post office of the incorporated village of Grimsby in the county of Lincoln. The Postmaster General may remember that complaints were made to him early in the year, and that these complaints are of considerable standing, and last session I spoke in regard to the scant accommodation for the public at that post office. The village of Grimsby is a centre where an efficient mail service is required more, perhaps, than in most parts of the country. It is most important that the residents should be given facilities to get their mail delivered and sent out promptly. Especially during the fruit season, they must get many reports and other matters by mail that especially affect the business they are carrying on of shipping perishable fruits. Complaints were made to the Postmaster General which, I am advised by my constituents, have not resulted in any improvement. I am not suggesting at present that the Postmaster General has not done all he can to get the postmaster at Grimsby to effect an improvement. I would draw the attention of the Postmaster General to a letter written to him by Mr. James Doran. Mr. Doran is a man of great prominence in the locality, and one very highly respected by everybody. And, if it is a testimonial of character in the eyes of the Postmaster General, I may say that Mr. Doran is a very prominent Liberal. He contested the county of Lincoln for the local legislature in 1898. He is one of a family that have been very staunch supporters of the Liberal party in the Dominion and provincial elections. His brother was an unsuccessful candidate in the city of Hamilton for this parliament a few years ago. Mr. Doran would not make these complaints to the Postmaster General, unless he felt that the interest of the village of which he is a prominent citizen required it:

Grimsby, Ont., January 14th, 1904.

Hon. Sir William Mulock,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—You are probably aware that when Mr. Wm. Forbes, the present postmaster here, was appointed it was urged as a reason for moving the post office from where it then was to Mr. Forbes' own premises that there would be much more accommodation for the public. We, residents of the village and locality, have waited patiently now more than four years for the accommodation and improvement, but instead of it coming we have no such accommodation as we had before, or are entitled to, or as any other place of the same importance enjoys. Over 2,000 people use this office for their mail, and the fruit growing and other business of the locality is of a kind that suffers very much by want of proper post office arrangements.

What we all complain of is as follows:

1. The whole space for the public in the office is a passage, with the street door at the end, about four and a half feet wide running past the letter boxes and ending at the postmaster's private quarters, and is utterly inadequate for the needs of the people, numbers of whom can be seen every day standing on the street because there is no room inside.

2. We cannot buy postage stamps or post cards, or get any mail handed out, until after eight in the morning, although a mail goes to the west at half past seven a.m., and in the evening although the mail from the east gets in at six o'clock it is not distributed until after the mail from the west, which is due one-half an hour later, but is generally an hour or more late, and although such lateness is at the time known to the postmaster, and people have to wait notwithstanding the want of accommodation because no matter at what hour the mail is distributed the wicket is finally closed for the night at 7.30 in any event, and only those having lock boxes can get mail until 8 p.m.

There are other complaints, but these are the principal ones.

I think your inspector ought to make a visit here on some Saturday evening about six o'clock and wait for an hour or two, and he would see how things are for himself, unless the postmaster, knowing he was expected made some special arrangements for the occasion.

There is so much complaining about these matters, and has been now for a long time, by the people that I have now been asked to write you about it, and have thought best to do so.

Hoping that a substantial improvement for the people will be brought about without much delay, and thus prevent any other action being necessary, I am,

Yours faithfully,

JAMES DORAN.

Mr. Doran informs me that that letter was acknowledged by the secretary of the department, and a promise was given that the inspector would make a visit and would look into the matter. I do not say that the first letter promised any more than that the matter would be investigated. He informs me that the inspector had been there and that he told Mr. Forbes that he must provide better accommodation for the public, and Mr. Forbes agreed to do so. But Mr. Doran says that nothing has been done.

It is now getting well into the fruit season in that part of the country. For some years the people have suffered for want of sufficient post office accommodation. They have to go down to the village to ship their fruit and other produce upon trains which nearly all start at the same hour, and they feel that they are entitled to get their mail matter in time to be of some use to them for that day's operation. The only accommodation for receiving the mail is a corridor 4½ feet by fifteen or twenty feet, for which the postmaster receives a rental of $120 a year, and very few people can get into that passage-way to receive their mail. They also complain that the post office is not open to the transaction of business, the sale of stamps, the registration of letters, &c., until 8 o'clock in the morning, although the mail for the west, for Toronto, Hamilton, &c., leaves the post office at 7.30. There is no other mail west until 6 in the evening, this late mail connecting with the late trains for Toronto, Montreal, Detroit, &c. The trouble seems to be that the postmaster, Mr. Forbes, thinks he can do as he likes. I called the attention of the Postmaster General to this matter last year, and during the winter Mr. Doran, acting in the public interest, wrote the letter to the Postmaster General, complaining of the inefficient service and insufficient accommodation, they are compelled to loiter about the streets to await their turn to receive their mail and in the cold weather this of course is a hardship. The Postmaster General acted on Mr. Doran's letter and sent his inspector to investigate the complaint. The inspector, I am informed, told Mr. Forbes, the postmaster, that he would have to provide better accommodation, and Mr. Forbes, I believe, promised to increase the accommodation but said that he could not do anything in the way of building until spring and the inspector took his word. However, the summer is well advanced but nothing has been done. Had this postmaster been treated with one-quarter of the discipline that was displayed in the case of Mr. Gallagher, postmaster of Wilton, which we discussed last night on the initiation of my friend from Lennox (Mr. Wilson), he would have been dismissed from his position.

I have culled some figures from the report of the Postmaster General and I find that the revenue from the Grimsby post office if $2,862, the postmaster gets in salary and commissions $876 besides commission on box rents and he gets a rental for the use of the post office of $120. Thus the postmaster at this point receives about $1,100 and there is a revenue of nearly three times that much. On comparing it with some of the county towns, I find that the town of Cayuga has a revenue of $1,631, the town of L'Original has a revenue of $1,042, and the town of Milton has a revenue of $2,648. All of these have less revenue than the village of Grimsby, which, although it is only a village, is a very important place, and a place where the people use a lot of mail matter. As I have said, the postmaster at Grimsby also gets a larger income than is received in any of these county towns.

He gets $876 with box rents and a rent allowance of $120 for which he gives the very scant accommodation that I have endeavoured to describe. The postmaster at Cayuga gets $620 a year and no rent, the postmaster at L'Original, $434 a year with box rents and $40 for rental allowance and the postmaster at Milton $860 a year with box rents and the same rent for premises as the postmaster at Grimsby, $120 a year. All these offices yield the Dominion a smaller revenue than Grimsby does and the postmasters get less salary than the postmaster at Grimsby. I trust that the hon. Postmaster General will be able to give me some assurance and through me the residents of this very important part of the very thriving county of Lincoln, the very heart of fruit growing and agriculture in its highest state of perfection, that we will be better treated by this postmaster and that he will be caused by some more stringent means to remove the complaints which have been made against him. Mr. Doran who makes these complaints knows what he is speaking about. There are no politics in the matter. The people of Grimsby on both sides of politics unite in stating that this postmaster is altogether too clever for his position. Notwithstanding the complaints made by public men and others he will not listen to them. He does not consider that he is a public servant at all. When the complaint is made to the hon. Postmaster General, the Postmaster General sends his inspector there, the inspector tells the postmaster that the complaint is well founded and requires a remedy and he trusts to the promise of the postmaster that he will provide a remedy, but, notwithstanding that, the complaint of the people is that this postmaster defies them and refuses to do anything in the hope that the agitation will die out or that probably the people will go somewhere else to mail their letters. The post office at Grimsby park is only two and a half miles away and I know that some of the fruit growers have very often gone there during the summer months because of the very satisfactory condition there in dealing with the postmaster as compared with the condition of the post office at Grimsby. The post office at Beamsville, which is the post office that my hon. friend had in his mind in speaking of the dismissal of a young man who was there, is four and a half miles east of Grimsby and the post office at Winona near which my hon. friend from South Wentworth (Mr. Smith) resides and where I have no doubt he gets far better accommodation than we do at Grimsby is only four and a half miles west of Grimsby. The people who patronize this post office feel that they have a right to ask the Postmaster General to see that this postmaster complies with the requirements of the public service and provides the accommodation that he ought to provide without any complaint being made. He should recognize the direction of the post office inspector sent by the Postmaster General to investigate these complaints or he should be obliged to give the accommodation which the people demand.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have just sent for the file of papers so as to understand something about the facts of this matter. I have just a moment ago received it, and perhaps while I am reading the papers over some other matter may be discussed.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will the Postmaster General answer later on ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN. There is a great deal of inconvenience all over the country on the same lines as those mentioned by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) but there is a solution of the trouble and that is by combining several businesses in one. If the government took over the telephone and telegraph business which would be combined with the post office in all the small towns and villages we would have one central office which would be open day and night no matter whether the community was a large or small one. With a combination of the telephone, telegraph and post office we would have one well paid official and we could afford to pay one man a good salary. The public service would be trebled or quadrupled in its usefulness to the people. The way to improve the post office is by combining it with the telephone and telegraph service, centralizing it and paying the officer in charge a half decent salary. Then, the public will get proper service.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) is not prepared to answer my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), I want to bring to his attention what I consider to be a very serious breach of duty on the part of the hon. gentleman and some of his postmasters. When the hon. Postmaster General was on this side of the House he made very serious complaints against the postmasters for acting as agents for political papers. When he assumed office he cut the heads off a great many postmasters throughout the country, their only offence being that they happened to vote for a Conservative candidate. There was no other complaint, no charge and no trial, but their heads were simply cut off because they voted for Conservative candidates.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I never dismissed anybody for such an act.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. Postmaster General dismissed the postmaster at Elgin, Mr. John Dargavel, for nothing more than that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. For voting ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Just simply for voting.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is incorrect.

Mr. TAYLOR. There was nothing more than that against him.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I met Mr. Dargavel on the platform myself.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman never met Mr. Dargavel on the platform, but he dismissed him simply for recording his vote.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am sure that is not correct.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have made the statement and the hon. gentleman cannot contradict it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I most emphatically do.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well then let him bring down the papers. Last winter I was driving through my county and at every post office I found this notice :

The 'TORONTO DAILY STAR.'

One year. One dollar. One year.
Toronto's best daily.

This is the hon. gentleman's personal organ.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, it is not.

Mr. TAYLOR. Surely the hon. gentleman would not say that this paper exceeds the 'Globe.' The notice goes on :

As good as money can make it.
Subscribe with the postmaster.

No matter whether that postmaster is a Grit or Tory he has to canvass subscriptions for the hon. gentleman's organ.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is quite untrue.

Mr. TAYLOR. How is it untrue ? Here is a document asking the postmaster to act as the agent of this paper.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Who asks him?

Mr. TAYLOR. The Toronto 'Daily Star,' a paper which is owned by the hon. Postmaster General and is his own organ.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman need not take my word for it, but I will say that his statement is wholly without foundation. I have no more interest in the 'Star' than the hon. gentleman has. I never had. I took an interest in seeing that it got into the right path, but as to the postmasters acting as agents for papers, that subject has been discussed ad nauseam. I never when in opposition, took exception to the postmasters acting as agents of newspapers. The hon. gentleman cannot show anything to that effect in the debates that I took part in. I stated last year when the subject was under discussion, and I say it now, that the postmasters all through Canada are at liberty to act as agents for newspapers. They can do so according to their own will and inclination without any interference from the government or from me ; they can act as agent for one paper just as well as for another. If this House reaches the conclusion that no postmaster should act as agent for a newspaper, I am prepared to give effect to that decision, but it will cut all around. At present the postmasters are free to act as agents for newspapers provided it does not interfere with the proper discharge of their duties.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman not only allows them to act as agents, but by this document sent out by his order, he asks them to take subscriptions for the Toronto 'Star.'

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That statement is absolutely without foundation. I will not allow the hon. gentleman to make such a statement without contradicting it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am speaking by the book.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is not true.

Mr. TAYLOR. Every postmaster in Canada knows that the 'Star' is identified with the Postmaster General.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No one knows it ; that statement is untrue.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is his organ.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is untrue.

Mr. TAYLOR. Every minister is supposed to have an organ and the Postmaster General is not going to be behind the others. He has the 'Star' to boom him. In this document he authorizes the postmasters, whether they are Tories or not, to collect subscriptions for the 'Star,' and he says : You are my postmaster ; you have to take subscriptions for the 'Star.'

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Perfect rubbish.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have no doubt that the Postmaster General is keeping a record of every postmaster in the country to know how many copies of the Toronto 'Star' he puts in circulation.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The statements of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) are absolutely untrue. I never had a communication direct or indirect with any postmaster in Canada as to what paper he should or should not represent, I ask the hon. gentleman to speak the truth.

Mr. TAYLOR. If I move for the correspondence between the Postmaster General and the different postmasters throughout the country with reference to the Toronto 'Star,' the Postmaster General will say that these documents are private and confidential.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, Sir. Let my hon. friend make his motion and I will see that it is complied with at once. Or, let him move for a committee and it will be at once shown that he is making misstatements.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have a distinct recollection that when this matter was discussed in the House some years ago, the Postmaster General then in opposition condemned postmasters for taking subscriptions for the Toronto 'Daily Mail.'

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I hope the hon. gentleman will be more correct in his statements in the future.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think the 'Hansard' will bear me out about that. This document is hanging in every post office throughout the country, and I want to know what authority the Postmaster General gave the 'Star' to send out these circulars as much as to say to the postmasters: You have to act as agent for that Grit organ rag at Toronto called the Toronto 'Star,' which says it is the best Toronto daily. Everybody knows that since the day it started, the Postmaster General is identified with the 'Star,' and it has the reputation of being his own personal organ; not that he owns it, but that he controls it and directs its policy. If the postmasters did not send in the proper number of subscriptions they feel that the Postmaster General would reprimand them. I want the Postmaster General to say if the postmasters throughout Canada have no authority for acting as his agents in canvassing subscriptions for the Toronto 'Star.' I want him to say so publicly.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have said so again and again, and the hon. gentleman knows it, but he continues repeating the misstatement, regardless of his position as a member of this House. I have denied it several times to-day, and yet the hon. gentleman persists in the misstatement that I have appointed these postmasters as agents. I say here in the most unqualified way, that I never in any manner directly or indirectly authorized or intimated any postmaster in Canada to act as agent to receive subscriptions for any paper, Grit or Tory. I never issued an order upon the subject, either authorizing or preventing their acting as such agents. They act as much agents for one paper just as well as for another. Probably this very postmaster of whom the hon. gentleman speaks is the agent for some other paper. I make that emphatic statement, but nevertheless my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) will get up again, as though I had not denied it in the presence of every hon. gentleman here, and as soon as I take my seat he will repeat the misstatement. The hon. gentleman must see that he is only aiding the circulation of that newspaper which he is trying to injure, because he is attempting to make the postmasters believe that they are under some kind of duress by me or by the government to aid in the circulation of the Toronto 'Star.' I do not know that the 'Star' requires any such aid to promote its cause. Have I now made myself quite distinct on the subject, and if I have not I shall do so more emphatically still, if that be possible. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) is supposed to have some regard for his own truthfulness and for his honour as a member of parliament, but if he does not take my word for it, I challange him to-morrow at three o'clock to move for a committee to inquire into the truth of what he says, and he shall have that committee and inquiry promptly, and he can produce all the evidence and all the documents —there happens to be nothing on the subject—but anyway there will be no privilege about a thing being supposed to be private. Whatever document or evidence there may be in existence, and there is none, he shall have it produced before the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am very glad to get this statement from the Postmaster General because the postmasters throughout the country, knowing that the 'Star' was supposed to be the Postmaster General's private organ, felt that if they did not secure subscriptions for that paper they would fall under the displeasure of the Postmaster General. We have now the statement from the Postmaster General that he has not authorized the circulation of this document. I can assure him that in place of this discussion increasing the circulation of the 'Star,' it will have the opposite effect, because the postmasters now know that they can act as they please. There is no Tory in the country who is acting in the position of postmaster, who would want to be a party to circulating any such literature as is published in the Toronto 'Daily Star.' The postmasters throughout the country felt that it was their duty to canvass for the Postmaster General's own organ, but the matter is now settled from this day forward.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will the Postmaster General give the information asked for?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The report is somewhat lengthy, and I have not read it all, but it appears that on the 19th of February the state of the accommodation at that office is reported on by the inspector who says:

> The office is kept in a good substantial frame building and is situated on the north side of South Main street. The width of the lobby, inside measurement, is four feet eight inches, the length being about forty-four feet eleven inches.

Did the hon. gentleman say eleven feet?

Mr. LANCASTER. I said fifteen or twenty feet; he must be taking in part of the private quarters of the postmaster. The postmaster has a private office behind where he does conveyancing and that sort of thing.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Perhaps so; I will read on;

> The inside measurement of the lobby is four feet eight inches in width, the length being about forty-four feet eleven inches. At the rear end of the lobby there is a desk adjoining the wall for the public accommodation so that letters can be addressed or business transacted by those who may require to do so. The compartment where the post office business is transacted is about the same length, forty-four feet eleven inches by about four feet eight inches in width, which is sufficient accommodation for carrying on the general work connected therewith. The postmaster has his office fitted in a very neat and commodious manner, and I have not found any country post office which has any better interior arrangement. I regret however to state that the public lobby is rather too narrow and that when the mails arrive late and a larger crowd is in attendance than usual, it is considerably cramped and there is occasionally a little discomfort I believe caused to the public. From inquiries, however, I find that there are very few who complain of the narrowness of the post office lobby.

He goes on to say :

The public lobby, although small, is well heated and is comfortable in every other respect, except that it is a little too narrow. As far as I could judge, seventy-five people could find standing room in the lobby. The difficulty this winter has been on account of the late arrival of the trains, chiefly the night trains, arriving at Grimsby, one at about 5.45 p.m. and the other about half-an-hour later, which caused the lobby to be crowded by those waiting on the distribution of the mails. In the summer season, when the trains are running regularly, I understand that little or no complaint is made of the smallness of the lobby. The postmaster at Grimsby admits that the lobby is a little too narrow, and he would like to make it larger if he could ; but on account of the other part of the building being used as a store, he could not increase the size of the lobby. He states also that it is only Mr. Doran and a few of his friends who are agitating the complaint against the size of his office. He informed me, however, that next summer he would see what he could do in the way of providing a larger space for the public. He said that as he only receives $120 a year rental, he could not afford to put up a post office building which would cost $2,000 or $3,000. Regarding the second complaint that Mr. Doran makes, that he cannot buy postage stamps or post cards until 8 o'clock in the morning, I may say that the morning mail is despatched at 7.30 a.m., and as there are two stamp vendors in the village, there is no difficulty whatever in getting postage stamps the night before, and it would be unreasonable to ask the postmaster to open his office at 7 o'clock in the morning just for the purpose of selling a few postage stamps. I think it would be unreasonable to compel the postmaster at this season of the year to take immediate action in the matter, and would recommend that he be allowed to continue the office as at present until the summer months, when he will make full inquiries as to what better accommodation he can provide, believing that the agitation which has been gotten up by Mr. Doran, largely emanates from him and a few of those people living in the place who are unfriendly to Mr. Forbes, who is a justice of the peace, a wealthy merchant, and otherwise is one of the more popular men in the community.

This is the report of the inspector. It does not disclose a very serious state of affairs. At the same time, if it is possible, in a reasonable way, to secure better accommodation, I will have the matter looked into with that object in view.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would like to know if there is any objection to my seeing that report ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, I will show it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANCASTER. The inspector seems to have allowed Mr. Forbes to tell him what he should say. I do not think anybody in the village except Mr. Forbes could say that this is a trumped-up matter. The people who have made this complaint are business people in the community, and are of the same political stripe as Mr. Forbes.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will make another suggestion to my hon. friend. I do not think Mr. Henderson would be deceived by Mr. Forbes or by any one else. He has been in the service twenty-five years. At the same time, if my hon. friend is not willing to accept his report, I am willing to send another officer in Ontario, or any other officer my hon. friend names, to make a further inquiry.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is not for me to name an officer. What I complain of is the manner in which the inspector does his work. He says that he is satisfied that these people are complaining without good cause. Whether that gentleman or any other goes there, what he ought to do is to hold an investigation face to face with Mr. Forbes, and hear these people and find out what is happening. It is quite clear that the inspector has been misled by somebody. I do not say anything against him other than that. The best judge in the world will make mistakes if he has not the actual facts before him. This inspector must have made a mistake in saying that there is no opportunity of providing better accommodation for the public. This postmaster before his appointment kept a grocery store there, and he has rented practically the whole of that store to another grocer, partitioning off a small portion of it for use as a post office. The post office and the grocery store together contain exactly the same number of square feet that the grocery store had before. So he is himself to blame if the walls are not in the right place to give accommodation to the public. The store was formerly 25 or 30 feet wide, and Mr. Forbes took so little of that for the post office that he could rent the store for practically as good a business as he had before. He deliberately made that lobby not more than 4 feet 8 inches wide—I said about 4 feet 6 inches before. He has plenty of accommodation in the interior, but that does not do the public any good. It is for the convenience of Mr. Forbes and those who assist him in the post office work behind the partition and away from the public. If the lobby which the hon. gentleman refers to is 40 feet long, some partition has been taken down since Mr. Doran wrote that letter, because it was not more than 15 or 20 feet long when I was there about last Christmas. A lobby 4½ feet wide is altogether too nar row. The people are entitled to more accommodation.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The only object of the department is to see that proper accommodation is given. If my hon. friend thinks that the inspector has not made an accurate report, if he thinks that the lobby is only twenty feet long when the inspector says it is forty-four feet long. I am quite willing to have the matter looked into again.

Mr. LANCASTER. I can only assume that, knowing that the inspector was coming, Mr. Forbes took down that partition, and added the space which was formerly used by him as a private office, to the post office, and the inspector saw it in that improved condition.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If a change was made, then the office is so much the better.

Mr. LANCASTER. In that respect, yes.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If the accommodation is not satisfactory, I am prepared to send the inspector there again and have him make another report. The inspector had no object but to discharge his duty, and I cannot understand how he made a mistake. Nevertheless, if my hon. friend would like him to go there again, I will send him and instruct him to make an examination of the premises in the presence of Mr. Doran, or, if he prefers it, I will send another officer.

Mr. LANCASTER. I have not seen the report and would like to look at it for a minute. I am not saying that the gentleman who went there was not a proper man to send. I would not say that of any officer, without knowledge of him, but he probably only had one side of the story. Here is what Mr. Doran writes me last month :

The inspector visited Mr. Forbes and advised that a new office be built. This Mr. Forbes agreed to do in the spring, but up to this date there is no sign of its being done. In a conversation with Mr. Forbes some time ago, he said to me that he would be glad if the matter was not pushed as he intended to do as the inspector had advised. However, as there is no apparent sign of this being done, it would be well to have the matter discussed when the estimates are up.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will send the report to my hon. friend and he will then tell me if he concurs in my suggestion.

Mr. LANCASTER. Has the hon. gentleman any objection to my sending Mr. Doran what the inspector says in his report ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There is some purely personal matter in it which need not be sent, but I will let the hon. gentleman send whatever portion of the report he thinks proper.

Mr. LANCASTER. I will only send what has to do with this matter.

Mr. MONK. I would like to call attention to the state of the Montreal post office. There is great need there of a complete reorganization, because the postal service in the city of Montreal and the surrounding suburbs is not satisfactory. The delivery is not what it should be, but I think that probably a great deal of the shortcoming depends upon the existence of a grievance to which I am about to refer. If that grievance were removed and the post office itself placed on a proper footing, the complaints regarding delivery might be removed. What I refer to principally is the insufficiency of the staff of letter carriers and other officials in the Montreal post office, and the unjust treatment to which they are subjected. I have received since the beginning of the session and previously, a very large number of communications—some signed and some unsigned—and the matter has been fully discussed in the public press of Montreal within the past few days. The statements contained in these communications harmonize with one another pretty exactly. I find that the substance of the grievances complained of is absolutely true, and in order to best lay the grievances before the Postmaster General, I will quote from a communication published some time ago in the press of Montreal. It is in French, but I will translate it for the benefit of my hon. friend :

We wish to be brief. We do not blame anybody. We do not accuse anybody. The administration of which we form part is a very extensive one and very much divided, and each head of the department is responsible only for the special function which has been assigned to him. Strict equity, therefore, forbids us from attributing any of the grievances to which we are about to refer to any particular head of department. We want to give a resume of the gravity of the evil which affects the administration of the post office in Montreal. At the same time we think we are able to indicate a proper remedy, but all we desire is to make an expose of our situation which may influence the minister. We are two classes of officials, each of which has a distinct work to perform, namely, the distributors and the letter-carriers. The distributors prepare the work of the carriers. Their occupation consists in separating the mails and giving to each letter-carrier what belongs to his division.

This work, easy in appearance, in reality requires a great deal of attention, a great deal of energy and the exercise of a very active memory. During several hours each day and several times a day. And, in spite of the strict observance of that double condition the poor employee remains still subject to a number of serious errors occasioned by the extreme rapidity which this work requires at the present moment and under the present organization. He may, therefore, find himself subject to many reports and, in consequence, condemned to many fines. This work, requiring intense application is wearing on the nerves, fatiguing to the temperament, ruinous to the organization, and, after twenty years have been spent in this service, it becomes necessary for the employee to take his retiring allowance. The government itself has realized the difficulty of this work and has prescribed a reasonable measure of the exercise of this difficult function. But, as will be seen, this measure determined upon by the government is, in practice, violated every day. These are the hours of work according to the official bulletin :

From 7 a.m until 11 a.m., 4 hours ; from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m., 4 hours ; total, 8 hours.

Extra work ordered by the Montreal office :

From 11 a.m. to 12 noon, 1 hour ; from 5 p.m. to 6 p.m., 1 hour (very frequently) ; from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m., 2 hours (about three times a week) ; total of extra work ordered by the office average 3 hours a day.

And not one cent of extra remuneration.

I mention this because in the United United States, throughout the civil service as I am informed, every official working extra time receives extra pay. The statement I have just made shows the extra work during the week. I asked the Postmaster General some time ago whether, when extra hours of work exacted from the employees there was any extra pay. The Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) at that time acting for the Postmaster General said there were no extra hours, and therefore, there was no extra pay. Now, let us take the Sunday :

On Sunday work ordered by the official bulletin, 4 hours once a month. A total in one month of four hours. Work ordered by the office for Sunday, 8 hours every Sunday. Say 4 Sundays a month, 3 with 8 hours extra and one with 4 hours extra. This makes 28 hours per month extra, or four days of ordinary work per month. And not one cent of extra remuneration.

Some time ago an answer was given in this House to a question put as to whether any Sunday work was exacted, and the answer was that there was nothing but strictly indispensable work called for on Sunday. Now, the memorandum says :

Let us now examine the work demanded of the greater number of letter-carriers, because, ordinarily, there are only five or six distributors employed. The work of letter carrying is hard work. Under ordinary circumstances, the letter carrier easily covers each day eighteen miles ; and it seems to us that this work every day during twenty or thirty years in all kinds of weather, the streets being in every imaginable condition, constitutes in itself remarkable work. Let us add to this the ascending and descending staircases, an exercise that is becoming quite extensive since the existence of flats and office buildings with many stories. Those who attend to these high buildings are obliged to walk up the stairs at least once or twice. If they can use the elevator, beginning their delivery in the top flat, they have not the advantage of waiting for the elevator from flat to flat, and they come down the staircase instead of using the elevator. If you added to this condition of things the fact that the letter-carrier carried from 40 to 100 pounds, the work becomes one of considerable difficulty. The government having in view these conditions, has fixed the day at eight hours. It will be seen by the table given below that the office has extended very considerably the official measure of work.

HOURS FROM THE OFFICIAL BULLETIN.

	Hour.
From 7 to 8 a.m., classing by streets and numbers the first mail	1
From 8 to 9 a.m., first mail	1
From 9 to 10 a.m., classing of the second mail	½
From 9.30 to 10.30 a.m., 2nd mail	1
From 10.30 to 11 a.m., classing of the 3rd mail	½
From 11 a.m. to 12 noon, 3rd mail	1
From 1.30 to 2 p.m., classing of the 4th mail	½
From 2 to 3 p.m., 4th mail	1
From 3 to 3.30 p.m., classing of the 5th mail	½
From 3.30 p.m. to 4.30 p.m., 5th mail	1
Total of days' work	8

EXTRA WORK ORDERED BY THE OFFICE.

From 11 to 11.30 a.m., 3rd mail	½
From 3.30 to 5 p.m., 5th mail	1½

Or, in all, 1½ to 2 hours' extra work.

The same observations are applicable to all the sub-offices in the Montreal district which do the extra work although they have not as many deliveries to perform. For all this extra work ordered by the office, and not contained in the official bulletin or calendar, not one cent of remuneration is paid.

Once more we state that our role is not to criticise the administration of which we form a part, but to expose the critical conditions in which we find ourselves and to give our opinion of the improvements absolutely essential. We wish to add a last remark in regard to the last delivery. This last delivery, which ought to take place at 3.30 p.m., is never ready before 5 o'clock. The mail from New York in the afternoon, which is awaited before that delivery is made, is the cause of unnecessary delay. This mail arrives at the station at 3.20 p.m. and reaches the office at 3.45. We do not understand why it is kept from the public until 5 o'clock, and why we are kept until that hour in order to make delivery thereof.

It is an important mail, contains the financial news and newspapers treating of important transactions. In that case why is the delivery retarded in the city of Montreal until financial men have left their offices ? The greater part of the time we are obliged to bring back this last important mail to the offices, because business men's offices are closed at that hour. Four distributors should be assigned for the newspapers and one distributor for the letters. On the contrary, four distributors should be appointed for the letters. These would be procured, that is to say, the most important part of the mail, at the very latest at 4.15 o'clock, and we could deliver them all before five o'clock without the newspapers, which might be distributed on the following morning. We understand that it is necessary no doubt to expedite the newspapers as well as the letters, but if that be the case why have we not in Montreal a larger number upon the staff of distributors ? As a general rule a greater number of letter carriers would be necessary as well as a greater number of distributors of mails, which are a little late in reaching correspondents because the staff is insufficient, and in spite of the ten hours' work which we give, sometimes of the twelve hours of daily occupation, every day there is an accumulation of newspapers in the post office, the delivery of which is indefinitely postponed. Thus, 'The Weekly Courier' reaches its destination two days late, the 'Journal of the Independent Foresters' three days late, and the 'Journal of the Catholic Foresters' the 'Journal of the Hibernians' and of that of the 'Workmen' are submitted to a similar delay. Nobody ought to be obliged to work in the post office longer than the hours set forth in the official bulletin. He should be obliged to conform himself to the official bulletin of the post office, but if it is necessary to furnish extra work upon the demand of the Montreal office, it seems to us but strict justice that those who work overtime should receive some additional remuneration proportionate to the time and the importance of the service they render to the post office. The interest of their families exacts it; as soon as they go beyond what the official bulletin exacts from them after due consideration by the higher authorities, they expose themselves to extra fatigue and to being incapacitated from work. It is no doubt difficult to foresee exactly in what degree their capacity for work will be abridged by these extra services. This total abridgement is necessarily proportionate to the physical strength of each one of those employees and to the quantity of extra work which they perform. Nevertheless many of these employees instead of taking their retiring allowance after thirty years of service, will be forced to shorten their terms of service to twenty-five or twenty years, if they continue in this manner giving extra work which is not exacted by the official bulletin, and which is thrust upon them from day to day by the local authorities. Their families will thus be deprived of the regular work which they might have performed during a much longer time, and yet this five or ten years extra work which they have performed without extra remuneration will be a profit to the government and will allow the government to economize by the salary of an additional employee during the full period of time.

To show the extent of this grievance, suppose that two hours of additional occupation are given every day for additional work. In five years what is the extent of the remuneration to which the extra worker is entitled at $2 a day? He would be entitled at the end of five years to some $3,650, which the government has economized and which has been taken out of the regular officers against the rules of the department. What we ask is the usual fruits of labour? What we ask is the opportunity to protect our physical health, which is the only asset which most of us possess? It seems to us that this demand is just and fair and that the government ought to accede to it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Is there any signature to that letter.

Mr. MONK. It is signed 'a number of the King's servants.'

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. In what papers was it published.

Mr. MONK. It was published in 'La Presse' and other French papers published at the time in Montreal. The statement of facts contained in that memorandum is corroborated on all sides. A very large amount of extra work is exacted from these employees and they are subjected to that extra work contrary to the regulation of the department and that appears to be the main cause why the service in Montreal is inefficient. The post office is a great deal too small and the delivery of letters is consequently not satisfactory. I have myself tested it in many cases during this session and have found an extraordinary delay in the delivery of letters from Ottawa to Montreal. This I do not attribute to carelessness on the part of the distributors or letter carriers. The staff of both classes is insufficient. My hon. friend is Postmaster General and he entertains the very high ambition of showing a satisfactory statement of post office expenses at the end of the year but he must not forget that he is at the same time Minister of Labour. That quality which he has he seems to lose sight of entirely, when there is a question of remunerating the employees of his own department. As I have stated this state of affairs in the city of Montreal is injurious. The imposition of fines, the working of extra hours, the insufficiency of the staff at headquarters and in the sub-offices, the extra work put upon the letter carriers, are all improper. It seems to me that the city of Montreal contributes a sufficient amount to the revenue of my hon. friend to enable him to maintain there a sufficient staff of employees, for the requirements of that large business centre, and to remunerate these employees in a proper manner. They are as a class honourable and trustworthy. They work very hard, they are courteous, and they do their best to fulfil the duties assigned them, but the staff is insufficient, the bureau requires to be re-organized and if they are called upon to work extra hours, they should receive extra pay. I am not quite sure, but from what I have heard I believe a similar state of affairs, prevails in the large city of Toronto at least to a certain extent, but as regards Montreal I know whereof I speak. These complaints are well founded and I think my hon. friend should remedy these grievances without any delay. This has been going on for two years.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman has read an anonymous letter from a newspaper containing statements and then proceeds to build an argument upon these statements. Let me say that I happen to know the writer of the letter in question. It was not written by a number of persons. The officer, I understand, who has written that letter is one of those unfortunate men in the service who are ever restless and discontented and constantly fomenting trouble.

Mr. MONK. If my hon. friend knows the name of the author of this communication will he give it to the committee ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No. I know the name, however, and I am extremely sorry for him. He has such a disordered mind that he is eternally endeavouring to make people think they have grievances.

Mr. MONK. Does my hon. friend deny the statement of fact as to extra work ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I deny it, of course. The letter is of course full of inaccuracies, and I shall proceed to dispose of it. It happened that last winter there was a good deal of irregularity in the running of the trains owing to the severity of the weather. During that period some of the staff had to remain on duty longer than usual. But, as to the clerks and letter carriers in Montreal I would say that there is no foundation whatever for the statement that they were obliged to work overtime unless it be some who are paid extra for any extra duties they perform.

Mr. MONK. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if when there is overtime there is extra pay.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If my hon. friend will listen to my whole statement I will answer his question. I am going to read for the hon. gentleman a statement and then he will be able to draw his own conclusions.

Mr. MONK. Does my hon. friend deny me the right to ask him if there is extra pay when there is extra time ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, I will read the document and I will give the answer the hon. gentleman wants.

Mr. MONK. I would rather have the answer of my hon. friend.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Well, my hon. friend will have it from me as well, but I would like to read this document first. Let me say that the late government organized the system as I found it on taking office. in the outlying districts of St. Henri, Westmount, Mile End and perhaps at some other points there was a system by which the letter-carriers at night had to collect the letters. That duty, I am told, involved an hour and a half of overtime. That system was inaugurated by the government of my hon. friend opposite. It was not brought to my attention until this year and as soon as it was I discontinued it. I will read a memorandum from one of my officers on this point which is as follows :

In the organization of the postal service in the outskirts of Montreal, namely at St. Henri, Westmount, Mile End and such points, the letter-carriers were called upon to make night and Sunday collections from street letter boxes. The time occupied in this work was from one and a half to two hours, the night collection averaging about one and a half hours. The system was organized many years ago and has been in operation continuously since the commencement and was looked upon as the regular duty of the letter-carriers in those districts. The attention of the department having been called to the matter by the letter-carriers the chief post office superintendent recommended that each letter-carrier should be allowed a full day's pay on Sundays for the one and a half hour's work performed and that in addition that he be allowed one half day off duty in the week in which the collection was made to compensate for the overtime worked each night during the week in the night collection. This went into effect in the month of May and has continued until within a few days when a regular system of collection by courier was organized and the men relieved from extra duty.

Does my hon. friend appreciate the point made here ? This is the answer which I desired to give him. I thought he would prefer to get it in the language of that memorandum rather than in my own language. If any letter-carrier worked on Sunday he was allowed a day's pay for overtime. But now even that has been done away with and the carriers are entirely relieved of the collecting that they had done for many years in consequence of the old system established by the Conservative government. This work is now entirely separated from them and done by contractors. My deputy informs me that even then they only had to perform this duty once in every sixth week as there were six carriers and each man took his turn. In reference to the statement that there is overtime in the city post office and that the men are generally downtrodden I have to read first of all a communication under date of 28th March, 1904, from the chief superintendent of the city post offices, Mr. George Ross, to the Deputy Postmaster General. When this matter was brought to my attention by that anonymous letter in the newspapers I took notice of it to the extent of inquiring as to the fact with the object of removing any grievance should it be found to exist. Mr. Ross accordingly was instructed to look into the matter and he writes as follows :

Immediately upon receipt of your inquiry, touching the question of overtime being worked by the clerks in the Montreal post office, I asked for a report from the postmaster by the office superintendent, Mr. Barcelo, and now I beg to inclose herewith a transcription of a report by the office superintendent.

Then he proceeds :

It will be observed from Mr. Barcelo's report that very little, if any, time has been worked by the clerks in the Montreal post office, and moreover, whatever extra time they have been called upon to perform was owing to the very irregular and erratic train service, in consequence of a tying up of the railroads through their being blocked with snow. It is also observed that the office superintendent purposes making provisions by which the men will be allowed 'off duty' to repay them for the time worked during the winter season, which, under the circumstances was unavoidable for the reason above stated.

You will also see that the office superintendent intended to ascertain the amount of overtime that any man had put in and to compensate them by allowing them off duty. He goes on to say :

I may say that the Montreal post office is sufficiently manned and if the train service is fully maintained there would be no necessity for any extra work being performed by the clerks. The nature of post office work, however, is such that from time to time the men are called upon to meet emergencies at Montreal, and the same conditions apply throughout the world.

Sincerely yours,
(Sgd.) GEORGE ROSS,
Chief Superintedent.

My hon. friend asserts that the office is undermanned, but Mr. George Ross declares that the Montreal post office is sufficiently manned.

Mr. MONK. He says they work overtime too.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. He says that the same emergencies have to be met at Montreal as are met throughout the whole world. The carrier system does not run with regularity, trains do not always arrive on time and if a train comes in late it is one of the incidents of the service that the men must remain and perform the service, but even that has its compensations. This is a letter from the superintendent, Mr. Barcelo, to the postmaster at Montreal, dated the 26th of March, 1904 :

Referring to Mr. Geo. Ross's letter re overtime worked by the clerks in this office, I have to state : In the delivery branch overtime was worked by some of the clerks in that branch averaging half an hour daily over eight hours.

That is, referring to the time when the trains were running irregularly because of the severity of the winter.

In the letter despatch branch, ten or fifteen minutes have been required over the eight hours average. In the newspaper despatch branch, the overtime work did not exceed the average of eight hours ; half an hour or one hour having been required from the clerks in that branch occasionally. The exceedingly late arrival of the mail since January was the cause of the overtime in question. Now that the trains are commencing to run on schedule time, it is the intention to repay the men who worked extra.

I may say, speaking of overtime, that this is a term of very recent application in the postal service. When I took office there was no such thing as eight hours fixed. I did not inaugurate the eight hour limit at once, but, by degrees, it came to be adopted and the government has adopted the eight hours as the extent of daily service in the post office, and by the letter-carriers as well. Therefore, when we speak about overtime of half an hour or fifteen minutes, it is not an excessive service, even if it were eight hours and a half, or eight hours and fifteen minutes. But when you remember that the men who work that little overtime, are compensated for it, I think it can be said that the time of service is a most reasonable one. The sanction of the eight hours by regulation is of very recent date, and was not in existence when we took office. Running through the Montreal Post Office, I may say the following schedule regulates the time of service, in the different branches.

In the registration branch the average time is seven and a half hours ; no clerk is called upon to put in any extra time over the average eight hours. In the money order branch no extra time over the average eight hours. In the international exchange branch, eight hours. In the delivery branch, seven hours and fifteen minutes. In the letter despatch branch, seven hours and a half ; newspaper despatch branch, seven hours forty-five minutes ; night despatch branch (eleven o'clock to seven o'clock, with half an hour for lunch), that is seven and a half hours. All overtime compensated for by allowance of extra leave during the less busy time of the week.

I do not think that the people of Canada will be willing to allow any easier time of service than this. It is reasonable to a degree, and I doubt if the employers of Canada as a rule are as moderate in their requirements from their staff as this department is.

With reference to the alleged insufficiency of the letter-carriers, I have to say that throughout the United States the rule is one letter-carrier for 2,500 people ; while in the city of Montreal, there is one letter-carrier for each unit of 1,660 people. As to the statement in that letter, that letter-carriers were required to walk six leagues a day, I think I may say that such is not the fact. I am surprised that my hon. friend would pin his reputation to an anonymous communication of that kind. It may be all right for him to read it and call attention to it, but without venturing to advise him, I would not recommend him to pledge himself to the accuracy of the statement. As to the statement that the New York mail, arriving at 3.30 in the afternoon was delayed until five o'clock, thus delaying the mail delivery to the people, and at the same time inconveniencing the letter-carriers ; it is a very extraordinary thing that if such an important mail as that, bringing to the people of Montreal financial news that they most anxiously desired, were delayed to that extent, that the department has never had a complaint from any person who is interested in the delivery of that mail matter. I am assured by my officers that never once has there been a complaint recorded by any person in Montreal that the mail due by that New York 3.30 train was delayed. If no person has complained, I think it is very strong evidence that the alleged delay does not take place. I am so satisfied with the efficiency of the work in Montreal in this respect, that. I can say, without of course absolutely knowing the facts, that that portion of the letter is wholly without foundation.

My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) proceeds to say, that the Post Office building in Montreal, is inadequate. He has now got on to a larger question, and is on ground where I can perhaps meet him. The post office building in Montreal does appear to have been very inconveniently constructed, and not to be in keeping with the proper requirements of the service. The department has been looking into that matter, and I hope we will be able before this session goes by, to bring the attention of parliament to the subject in connection with the estimates that will be laid before the House. I suppose that when it was built, the Montreal post office met the requirements of that day. The city, however, has grown and additional accommodation is required. Different views have presented themselves; some people have advocated the enlargement of the existing building, the acquisition of more land and the erection of an addition. Others have recommended the purchase of a new site and the erection of a new building altogether. Having looked into this matter, my officers have recommended an entirely different proceeding. This is not an age in post office management when concentration of work is considered the correct system. Instead, the modern policy is one rather of division of work, and it is considered better for the service. It is in contemplation to acquire a site somewhere in the vicinity of the great stations and to make use of the building on that site as an adjunct, and to distribute from it a certain portion of the mails which now congest the city post office. Further, a considerable portion of the mail matter that now passes through the Montreal post office, will, when this new system is inaugurated, be delivered at this new postal station, and go off by train, without ever having passed through the Montreal post office. It is also hoped to be able to connect that postal station, with the city post office by the pneumatic tube system, as is contemplated in the city of Toronto. I recently received a communication of a semi-confidential nature from the representative of a very large commercial body in Montreal, calling my attention to the state of the Montreal post office, and suggesting elaborate improvements. But when I explained the scheme we had in view, it commended itself to the representative as infinitely better than the old policy of simply having a grand structure, a pile of buildings, but not a practical work-shop such as the postal service of modern times seems to demand. I hope we shall be able to get over the congested state of affairs in the city post office before a great length of time.

Mr. MONK. It is a little surprising to hear my hon. friend, who is Minister of Labour, say that the extention or enlargement of the present post office is really a large and important matter, whereas the treatment of the staff employed there appears to him to be a very secondary matter. That is a strange assertion for the Minister of Labour to make. I should have thought that what would have been prominent in his mind would have been the treatment of what one might call the human slaves employed there by my hon. friend. But what is still more singular is this. The hon. gentleman takes the ground that I have given as my authority an anonymous letter. I did not give that communication as my authortiy at all. I said expressly that I was using it because it put in complete and concentrated form the grievances to which I referred. As a matter of fact, it is not an anonymous letter. It is a communication that was sent to the public press of Montreal generally by parties who knew whereof they were speaking, and I defy my hon. friend to attribute the authorship of that letter to any particular man. What I did state, and what my hon. friend has not denied, was that extra labour was exacted from these men. I said I knew it of my own knowledge, and I had a score of letters supporting that statement. My hon. friend has not denied it categorically, but he gave quotations from some officers of the department which practically admitted it. If these men are obliged to do extra work, how can my hon. friend maintain that the normal staff at the post office in Montreal is sufficient? My hon. friend has carefully refrained from denying my statement that they do not get any extra pay. I stated that in the United States for years the custom has been that post office employees are paid extra for extra time. My hon. friend will find that the postal official guide of the United States, published in 1896, at page 393, states that any postmaster who will exact extra work for more than eight hours from any employee after the first of May, 1893, will be liable to be dismissed from his functions.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is not a correct quotation.

Mr. MONK. It is a correct quotation. Does my hon. friend deny that in the United States post office employees who work extra are paid extra?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am informed that the only class of employees in the United States who are allowed overtime are letter-carriers.

Mr. MONK. Distributors also, I am informed ; and it seems natural. Why should a man be expected to give seven or eight hours a week more than his regular hours without receiving any extra pay ? Let my hon. friend go to Montreal and he will ascertain for himself the truthfulness of this memorandum which I have read.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is entirely in error.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend is mistaken I live there, and I know what is going on, and I defy my hon. friend to meet me there and institute an inquiry. If he does he will find that both sorters and distributors, as well as letter carriers, have to work extra time.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. We have a record of the time of every person in the service, and that record speaks for itself. My hon. friend is entirely in error.

Mr. MONK. It is in that record itself that my hon. friend will find out the truth of what I say. I understand that there is a book in the post office where the employee records the hour that he arrives and the hour that he leaves, and that book will show that the employees are constantly called upon to furnish extra time. They do not object to doing that, but they object to not receiving proportionate pay for it. That is a fair demand. Why should not my hon friend find out whether the statement I make is true or not ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have found out that it is untrue. The chief superintendent, Mr. Ross, was instructed to inquire into the matter, and he has made his report. It is no hardship to a clerk to work overtime occasionally when an emergency requires it.

Mr. MONK. I do not think my hon. friend has undergone the test, or he would not speak in that light way of a workman who sometimes works twelve hours in a day.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If a man works overtime one day, he has to work less time another day.

Mr. MONK. Does my hon. friend say that if a man is obliged to work extra time one day, that time is made up to him another day ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes ; my deputy informs me that it is allowed to him in the succeeding week.

Mr. MONK. I think the deputy is misinformed. My information is that when they work extra time, they do not get extra pay.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend is wrong there, too. I adopted a system of classification, or a grade system, by which men are paid by the day, and in these cases, where the scheme is possible, they are even paid extra time.

Mr. MONK. Could my hon. friend tell us how much has been allowed during the past year under the head mentioned ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It must be very trifling, because there has not been much extra time.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend is either in bad faith or badly informed.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am correctly informed and in good faith.

Mr. MONK. The facts are as I have stated. It would be very easy for my hon. friend to hold an inquiry. If he does, I will undertake to convince him that these men are obliged to give extra time for which they get no extra pay.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will make a proposition to my hon. friend if he wants to get at the facts. When that anonymous letter was published, I took notice of it by ascertaining whether the statements made in it were true or untrue. Mr. Ross, the chief superintendent, was instructed to inquire and report, and my statements are based on his report and on the report of Mr. Barcelo in the department. My hon. friend challenges the statements in Mr. Ross's report. My hon. friend challenges the accuracy of Mr. Ross's report. Well, I will have Mr. Ross go to Montreal and meet the hon. gentleman in the post office, and the hon. gentleman will then have an opportunity to produce what evidence he has, and we will see what Mr. Ross will report.

Mr. MONK. Will my hon. friend come to Montreal and meet me face to face and give me the opportunity of proving the truth of my allegations ? If he will do that, I am prepared to accept the result. There is no question of anonymous letters. I have a lot of correspondence signed by men whom I know but whose names I cannot give and I am able to substantiate the grievances I have stated.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, you are not.

Mr. MONK. The result is that we have a bad postal service in Montreal. The mails are not delivered in time and the root of all the evil is in the policy of my hon. friend to try and obtain a surplus at the expense of the working men.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend says we have a bad service and that the letters are not delivered in time. In saying this, he attacks the letter-carriers.

Mr. MONK. I do not.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is what it amounts to, because we have a staff of letter-carriers sufficient for the requirements of the service and there are no complaints from the general public. When he says that the mails are not delivered on time, that is a matter between him and the carriers, and they would probably bring him to account.

Mr. MONK. I would undertake to prove to my hon. friend, when he comes to Montreal, in a manner beyond doubt, that the delivery is not satisfactory and that it is due to his policy.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is desirable to have a surplus in the Post Office Department as well as any other department, but not by means of overpaying or overworking the officials. I do not pretend to know anything of the facts in controversy between the hon. gentleman and my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), but I could not very well gather from the Postmaster General whether he considers that these men should not be paid for over work or that no overwork is imposed on them. He was not very clear on that point. In the railway service I understand that a system is adopted under which a certain number of miles is regarded as a day's work of an engineer or conductor or other trainman, and any additional number of miles is paid for extra. If the problem which has been brought to our attention by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier could not be solved in any other way, perhaps it could be dealt with on some such system as that. If I am not interfering in the discussion which my hon. friend has raised, I would like to draw attention to the presentment of the grand jury of the county of Halifax, made in the term of last March. It is reported in the press as follows :

THE O'CONNELL CASE.

In the case of O'Connell, charged with stealing from the Postmaster General, the grand jury yesterday made the following presentment :—

As a result of investigations in the case of the King vs. O'Connell, charged with stealing registered packages from the bag of a letter-carrier, and from personal observations, the grand jury beg to call attention to the urgent need of largely increased facilities for the more prompt delivery of, and greater protection to, letters and other mail matter for the people of Halifax.

From the facts within the knowledge of the grand jury, it appears that though the amount of mail matter received at the Halifax post office has increased fivefold within a period of twenty-five or thirty years, the staff of letter-carriers, though increased from five to twenty-three, is not enough for the needs of the service now demanded ; while it is a very suggestive fact that the inside staff has actually decreased in number during that period.

The inevitable result follows, viz., that the men are not only overworked and the people do not obtain that prompt delivery of the mails enjoyed by much smaller cities all over the Dominion, but, because of insufficient staff, ordinary letters as well as registered matter are not accorded that protection from robbery that the public expect and demand.

The grand jury beg to recommend that, in order to insure the ample protection to all mail matter, and for more prompt delivery to the people of Halifax, the Post Office Department be urged to provide additional help both for the inside and outside service ; and that the postmaster should take the necessary steps to see that no carrier be permitted to leave the office with a heavier load and larger bundles than he can handle with despatch and safety from loss, as is now frequently the case.

If this statement is in accord with the facts, it discloses a somewhat serious condition of affairs. Men are described as overworked and the public is not receiving that accommodation from the public service to which it is entitled. No doubt this presentment has been brought to the attention of the Postmaster General. Has he made any investigation into its allegations and with what result ? The body which has made these presentments is an important one, selected from the most influential citizens of the city and county of Halifax, and I am sure they would not make statements without having the proofs of what they allege.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. This is the first I have heard of the presentment in question, but my deputy informs me that the chief city superintendent of post offices, Mr. Ross, visited Halifax a short time ago on his usual round, and reported the staff as up to par. There is no insufficiency in it. As to the general presentation itself, it has been referred to Mr. Ross for investigation, and he will investigate as soon as possible. It is very easy for people in the best of faith to be carried away with the idea that the remedy for any evil or misfortune is an increase in the staff. It is a chronic idea throughout the whole public service that if anything is wrong, the best way to right it is to engage additional hands. I do not want to reflect on the service, but whoever has charge of the transaction of business in any walk of life knows that an increase in the staff is always very popular among the employees. There is no intention of skimping the service anywhere, but I believe you could not do any greater injury to the service itself than to have it overmanned. The statement that the employees are overworked is without foundation. Of course there are emergency occasions in every post office when the clerks must work overtime, but that is inseparable from the duties of the office and is part of their engagement. But as to that being the normal condition, such a statement is altogether unfounded, and those who made it have been misled.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I shall not enter into any controversy on that point. The report of Mr. Ross seems singularly inconsistent with the statement of these gentlemen who had this matter investigated before them under oath. I have discharged my duty by bringing the matter to the attention of the Postmaster General. I should be inclined to think that men such as those of whom, to my own knowledge, the grand jury of Halifax, is composed, would not make a statement of that kind without very good foundation for it; and until I was more sure of the thoroughness of Mr. Ross's investigation, I would not be prepared to accept his statement rather than that which has been made by the grand jury.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General another matter as to which I have had some communication through the public press and otherwise—the salaries of the second-class clerks in the outside service in the post office at Halifax. I understand that some representation has been made to the Postmaster General on that point, and that those interested have put forward cogent reasons why their salaries should be taken into consideration, especially, I believe, some who have been in the service a long time and who have not received the consideration which has been extended to others of more recent appointment. I would like to ask the Postmaster General whether their representations have been taken into consideration, and whether it is likely that any change for the better will be made in their case, especially those of long service in the department?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) wishes to ask whether it is the intention of the government to deal with the second-class clerks of the outside service as a class, I would say that it is not in contemplation at the present time, to pass legislation altering their status. As to promotions or increases, these are matters relating to individuals. It is our effort to promote deserving men, and we are constantly ascertaining those deserving of such recognition, for nothing gives me greater pleasure, in connection with my work, than to recognize the merit of those who are deserving. It may be possible—but I doubt it very much—that there are one or more persons in the Halifax post office who are not being properly remunerated for their services. Length of service, in a sense, is a reason for promotion, but it is only one ground for such recognition. It is a consideration, and an important one; nevertheless the requirements of the service, the duties performed and the remuneration actually received, are all elements to be considered in each individual case. Mr. Ross makes it his business to consult with the city postmasters from time to time to see whether merit is being duly rewarded and whether there are any deserving men being underpaid. If, by any chance, there is an oversight, it is purely accidental, because, as I stated before it is a source of special pleasure to me, at all times, to recognize merit.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understand that what I am referring to relates both to a class and to individuals as well. I understand that the second-class clerks in the Halifax post office represent that the cost of living is greatly increased, that their opportunities of promotion to first-class rank are very small, and they are desirous, as I understand it that they be permitted to obtain a maximum salary of $1,500. I also alluded to others who might be entitled, without change in the law, to higher salaries than those which they enjoy at present and who consider themselves as much entitled to certain increases of salary as men of more recent appointment who have been accorded that increase. It is on behalf of the class, and on behalf of the individuals to whom I refer that I am making this representation. I hope the Postmaster General will not regard the matter as finally closed but will take the case of these men into consideration. It is possible, as he says, that some of these men may have been accidently overlooked. Of course, it is not the slightest consolation to them that they have been overlooked by accident——

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I did not refer to the matter in that sense.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I know that. But, if these gentlemen had been overlooked by accident, it is just as unfortunate for them as if they had been overlooked by design. Therefore, there may be some reason for further consideration of the matter, and I hope that consideration will be given.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware that the salary of a second-class clerk in the city post office of Halifax goes to $1,200, the minimum being $900. My hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) will know better than I what is the average salary paid to persons in Halifax performing services not calling for greater ability or more arduous labour than is required of a second-class clerk. Some little proportion must be maintained between the two things. At the same time, my view is that, in this age, the government should be, more or less, a model employer, and, where there is any doubt should lean in the direction of higher salaries. I endeavour to carry out that policy and to see to it that the staff are paid not less, but at least a shade more than is paid for similar services in private walks of life. I may say that it is the practice of the department now to overhaul the whole staff of the outside service yearly with a view to considering cases of promotion. The case of each individual is investigated. That examination has been going on throughout the whole of Canada for some little time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Of one thing you may be pretty sure and that is that within the last eight or ten years the cost of living has increased very considerably, as, also has the general scale of salaries paid in the city of Halifax, I think that corporations and other employers of labour have been obliged to put their scale of salaries considerably higher than that which prevailed eight or ten years ago; and it is largely on this ground that these men make their application. Further, I think, the applicants represent that the clerks of the second class of the inside service have a maximum salary of $1,500. I do not know whether that is correct or not.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is correct.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. They represent that those in the outside service should be placed on the same basis, because their expenses are equally great, and they suffer from the increased cost of living and they see no reason why, with the long service they have rendered, they should not be entitled to a maximum salary equal to that enjoyed by those in the inside service.

Mr. WM. ROCHE (Halifax). I wish to remind the Postmaster General that some time ago I made a recommendation to the effect that there are several officers in Halifax post office, who through their length of service and efficiency might well be advanced from junior clerkships to a higher grade. I would beg to again call his attention to that. There has been no surplus of clerks there and recently the work of the Post Office Department has been increased by the very large amount of literature which has been sent there for distribution to the various portions of the county of Halifax.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Some few weeks ago when my hon. friend (Mr. Wm. Roche) brought this matter to my notice it was referred to Mr. Ross, the inspector, for investigation, and there are now in the department reports from Mr. Ross upon the subject which my deputy is now going through.

Mr. CLARE. I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the necessity of repairs in the Galt post office. There is but one entrance to the building and when the mails are being distributed there is great crowding and in cold weather the doors are kept open by the crowd, so that it is very uncomfortable. If there was another door people could pass out that way, and avoid crushing. There should also be a private office for the postmaster himself and there is an insufficient number of post office boxes. These matters should be attended to at once, and improvements similar to those in the Berlin post office should be made there.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Communications were received some time ago upon this subject, the Galt post office was visited by the inspector and he made a recommendation which has been approved of by the Post Office Department and has been forwarded to the Public Works Department, so that I have very good reason to believe that the improvements suggested will be carried out.

Mr. CLARE. Then I suppose there will be in the supplementary estimates an amount for the necessary changes, so that the work will be done before the cold weather comes on.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I wish the Minister of Public Works was here so that he would feel the benefit of my hon. friend's appeal, but I shall call his attention to it again although as I say the Post Office Department has already communicated to the Public Works Department the necessity for the alterations referred to.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to again mention to the Postmaster General what I mentioned to him last year, that is that very serious complaints come to me every now and again with regard to the mail service at Vankleek Hill. I suppose that these complaints also come to the Postmaster General and that he has taken them into consideration. Is there to be any amelioration of the situation described in very glowing terms in some of these communications which I have received?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not like to speak from memory lest my memory be incorrect, but if my hon. friend will let me have the memorandum I shall inquire into this matter.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would also like to call attention to the raising of the rates of book postage from 4 to 8 cents per pound. Would the Postmaster General be good enough to inform me as to whether that is a recent change or not?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The rates of book postage in Canada have been brought into harmony with those in the United States and other countries within the postage union, that is, one cent for two ounces.

Mr. CLARKE. What was the rate before?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. One cent for four ounces.

Mr. CLARKE. The rate has been doubled by the hon. gentleman?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The present rate is one cent for two ounces, which is the postal union rate.

Mr. CLARKE. And the rate before was one cent for four ounces?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is what it was.

Mr. CLARKE. How much additional revenue does my hon. friend hope to get by that increase?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Practically nothing, very little I presume.

Mr. CLARKE. Can the minister not inform me within $5,000 or $10,000 what increase he expects in the revenue of the department ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have no way of forming an accurate estimate.

Mr. CLARKE. What is the idea in increasing the rate if the hon. gentleman has no idea of an increased revenue ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. We were the only country which had the low rate.

Mr. CLARKE. How much additional revenue does the minister hope to get ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. While it is quite impossible to give figures it is quite possible to show that the experience of other countries is of some assistance to us. We were the only country in the wide world carrying books at such a rate as one cent for four ounces and we have only fallen into line with the rest of the world by making the rate one cent for two ounces.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman has been claiming that we were leading the way in other respects but we are not leading the way in this very important respect. Why is it that we are receding ? Why is it that we are retrograding in this regard by adopting a system which must result in discouraging the circulation of good literature. Good books ought to be distributed amongst the people of the country, and why should you tax the people double the amount which they were formerly taxed for the transmission of books ? Is not that a somewhat serious consideration ? We have a very large country and a sparse population and it is desirable that the people should receive books as cheaply as possible. As we have been leading the way for so many years in the matter of book postage, why is it that we are retrograding, going back, and keeping the rate simply as the hon. Postmaster General says at what has prevailed in other countries ? I hardly regard the action of the Post Office Department in this respect as being up to the high standard which the Postmaster General has claimed for it in other regards.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The fact is that we have had to carry so much Tory dead-head literature through the mails that we must compensate ourselves in some way.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman admitted that he sent out a great deal more from his side of the House than from the opposition side and so he had better give himself credit for that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I did not admit it.

Hon. WM. ROSS. I do not think we should follow the example of the United States in this regard or in a great many other ways. I think that we should progress rather than go back. I had interviews with a number of gentlemen of different professions in Halifax before I left and they informed me that when they got books that were expensive and which belonged to the different professions with which they are connected they consider the postage a great burden. I think the Postmaster General has taken a step in this respect in the wrong direction.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CLARKE. At six o'clock the hon. member for Victoria, Nova Scotia (Mr. Ross) was expressing his regret that the hon. gentleman the Postmaster General had seen fit to double the postage rate on books sent through the mails, and we were trying to ascertain from the hon. gentleman what it was that prompted him to make the change. The only explanation was that he wanted to make the rate uniform with that which obtained in other countries in the Postal Union. We endeavoured to ascertain from the hon. gentleman how much he hoped to increase the revenue of the Post Office Department by that change but we have not yet been able to get that information. I have heard of no general demand for an increased rate on books on the part of the public. There was no petition sent in asking that the rate be increased. It must have been increased for the purpose of implementing the revenue of the department. I would ask the hon. minister how much he hopes to increase the revenue by doubling the rate.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I understand that the revenue from the book rate is comparatively trifling and therefore no very serious addition to the revenue would be made. Something would be made but I understand that the old rate did not anything like pay the cost of the service.

Mr. CLARKE. Is there no estimate of the revenue from newspapers, letters, parcels and books ? There must be some estimate in the department of the probable revenue from these sources. Surely we might expect the hon. Postmaster General to be able to give us some information as to how much he hopes to increase the revenue by the increased rate on books which he has imposed.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman stated that there was no estimate of the increased revenue derived from these various classes of mail matter, but if he did so he was in error. There are estimates as to the revenue from newspaper postage, but there are no data as to the revenue derived from other branches of the service. On reflection the hon. gentleman will see that it would be impossible to have definite data upon that subject. Take a post office like that of Toronto for instance; all classes of mail matter, letters, circulars, parcels and newspapers are rushed in at the last moment probably for the outgoing mail. The work of stamping sorting and despatching occupies the time until the close of the out-going mail and it would not be possible to keep tab on all the different classes of mail matter going through the office. I can conceive of no possibility of doing that.

Mr. CLANCY. There might be a large revenue for all the hon. gentleman knows by reason of the increased rate.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Any person who goes into a post office will see that the volume of books as compared with other classes of mail matter is comparatively trifling.

Mr. CLANCY. But, including parcels with books on which the hon. gentleman has increased the postage it would have been a matter of very great interest to the country if the hon. Postmaster General could have come down and stated the increase that the revenue had by reason of increasing the postage on that class of mail matter such as books, pamphlets and parcels, the transmission of which, the hon. gentleman knows, has immensly increased throughout the country.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. What has immensely increased ?

Mr. CLANCY. The business of the Post Office in handling that class of matter as the hon. Postmaster General's deputy will tell him has immensely increased. Having doubled the postage on that class of mail matter, he must expect to receive an immense addition to the revenue.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) speaks without information. The volume of parcel postal matter has not materially increased.

Mr. CLANCY. I want to say to the hon. the Postmaster General that if he is deriving his information from his deputy who is sitting beside him, it is at variance with such statements as one can put his hand upon and compile in one of the departments of the government. And I may tell the hon. gentleman that I will point that out later on to him.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Proceed.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know whether you mean by book-post simply books, but the volume of business in matter that is partly printed and can be filled up in writing, such as deeds and agreements and documents of that kind, has increased very much. I know from having to do with some work of that kind, that our postage has increased one-half or one-third since the change was made. The increased rate means quite an increased cost to loan companies, and insurance companies and institutions of that kind.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The law fixes the rate of postage on letters, and surely a person cannot take a blank form partly printed and fill up his ideas on that in writing, and have it regarded as a letter. I am not aware of any government that allows such an evasion of the law.

Mr. SPROULE. The question is not whether any one is trying to evade the law, but whether the people pay more now than formerly.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Formerly it was impossible for postmasters to tell what was the proper rate.

Mr. SPROULE. It is so yet.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No.

Mr. SPROULE. So at least one postmaster has told me.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend has allowed himself to be deceived; he is too readily loaded up against the government.

Mr. SPROULE. The friends of the government have told me so.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. They do not tell us that. Postmasters complained formerly that the rates on different classes of mailable matter were intricate. If I had the statute here, I could show that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to make out what was the proper rate to be charged on lithograph matter and printed matter, for example. Either the postmasters had to open the documents, or refer to the department at Ottawa, or take chances on collecting the proper postage, and often one person paid one rate and another person paid a different rate on the same class of matter. It was most inconvenient, and therefore we put many of these things into one class, so that all persons would be treated equally. It was not done so much for the sake of revenue as to put the business on a proper basis.

Mr. SPROULE. It may be better now than it was before, but it is ambiguous yet. I have been called on to discuss the matter with more than one postmaster.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. On what item ?

Mr. SPROULE. The Markdale postmaster, for instance.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I asked, on what item ?

Mr. SPROULE. Take blank certificates done up in the ordinary tube, which are all printed matter except the signature. What class would they be in ? I cannot tell the exact percentage of increase in the rates, but my experience is that the increase is at least one-third more than before.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is merely a simplification.

Mr. CLARKE. Friendly benevolent organizations, in sending out their reports, have to pay just double the postage they did previously. Surely the minister cannot assert that he has no knowledge as to how much the revenue has been increased as a result of this change, which must have been made for the purpose of getting more revenue. Would it be $150,000 or $200,000 ? Occasionally I see a statement issued as to the number of letters, postal cards and newspapers passing through the mails. Are these actually counted, or is there an estimate made ? If this can be done, I should think that the minister ought to be able to give us an idea as to how much he has increased the revenue by this additional tax. It is not a popular tax, and in view of the financial statement the minister has made. I rather astonished he did not take it off. The hon. gentleman says that those who complain are not friends of the government, but I would point out that in this evening's Montreal 'Star' there is a letter from a prominent Liberal, well known in the community, Mr. Norman Murray, a bookseller in Montreal, who draws attention to this very matter. Mr. Murray writes :

> At the close of the last financial year the Post Office Department had a surplus of nearly $300,000, yet they raised the book postage from 4 cents to 8 cents a pound. Now I call myself a real Liberal, but I fail to see what the Liberalism of the party in power consists of.

I am sure the Postmaster General must know Mr. Murray as a political friend. At all events, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would probably know him very well.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I know him.

Mr. CLARKE. If there were a surplus to the credit of the Post Office Department, why should the postal rate on books be doubled ? It must have been done for the purpose of increasing the revenue, and the Postmaster General must have some idea as to the extent of the increase of revenue by this additional taxation. Are we to have no answer ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have explained to the hon. gentleman twice, and I am quite willing to repeat, if that be deemed necessary. The hon. gentleman asks whether there are statistics upon which to base an estimate——

Mr. CLARKE. Not that ; I assumed, and I think fairly, that the object of doubling the rate on books was to increase the revenue, and I asked the Postmaster General if he could not give some approximate idea at least as to how much he hoped to increase the revenue by the imposition of this additional tax. I do not ask the hon. gentleman to give me the exact amount, but approximately. Would it be $50,000 or $100,000 ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is talking wildly. All governments have some regard to rates. The late government fixed one cent an ounce as the cost of carrying merchandise, regarding that rate as appropriate. That is still the rate. In fixing that rate, I suppose the government had some reference to the cost of transportation. Therefore half that rate does not seem unreasonable as the book rate. When the hon. gentleman asks for information as to the revenue derivable from book postage, I ask him to imagine himself in a post office when mail matter is coming in or going out, and see if he can form an intelligent idea of the amount of books compared with other mailable matter passing through the office. There are books, parcels, circulars, newspapers, letters and whatever else is mailable, all bundled off perhaps at the last moment. All the staff can do is to sort the matter and put the various parcels in the respective bags to which they belong, and out goes the whole volume of mail matter. How would it be possible under these circumstances to have statistics, or to form any intelligent idea of the volume of the different classes of mail matter posted at a particular post office ? It is a practical impossibility. It is not done anywhere, and it could not be done unless we chose to suspend the proper despatching of the mails in order to keep account.

Mr. CLARKE. I understand from the minister that he does not know anything as to the probable increase of revenue from this form of taxation ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It must be a comparative trifle.

Mr. CLARKE. I suppose it would not be more than $100,000 at any rate ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman knows full well that in suggesting $100,000 he is talking wildly.

Mr. CLARKE. Do not the country postmasters keep an account of the sale of postage stamps, postcards and money orders?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. A postmaster in the country, who is paid by commission, is paid upon the revenue of his office and the number of special services he performs. He is paid a commission upon the postage stamps and postcards sold, the volume of the money order business, the postal note business, and the savings bank business if it is a savings bank branch. He is also sometimes allowed something for night work, an allowance called a forwarding allowance, and an allowance for rent, fuel and light. These allowances are based upon the business done in the office. That is a very different thing from keeping the record of the different classes of mailable matter that go out.

Mr. BENNETT. Is there not a system in force of instructing the postmaster, say in a town office, for two weeks or a month to keep a strict account of all letters, postcards and other matter which pass out of the office, so that his salary may to a certain extent be based on the result ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. About twice each year an enumeration, as it is called, is made in the different post offices, of the different classes of mail matter and the revenue derived therefrom. That system prevails only where the postmasters are paid by percentages. But even in those cases, there is nothing in the enumeration list to distinguish books from any other class of mail matter in which they are included. The enumeration divides the mailable matter into four classes—letters and post cards, newspapers, merchandise, and miscellaneous, which is a very large class, and which includes books.

Mr. BENNETT. As the bulk of the offices are not paid by salaries, but by fees, the amount of mail matter that comes in and goes out of each post office could easily be arrived at; and it seems to me that books might be made a distinct class, like postcards and letters.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is in error in saying that nearly all the officers are on the percentage basis. Numerically he is right, but not so far as volume of business is concerned. I would say off-hand that quite one-third of the revenue is derived from offices where the staff is not paid by way of commissions.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister has stated that he could give the committee the amount of revenue derived from newspapers. Would he be good enough to give that ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I gave that two days ago, in answer to a question. It is in 'Hansard.'

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman reduced the rate, I think, from one-half to one-quarter cent per pound. Could he state how this change affected the revenue ? Another change which the hon. gentleman made was to permit a person wishing to mail say one hundred printed pamphlets, to send them by making a cash payment instead of using postage stamps. How much revenue has he derived from that change? It is important to have all this information in order that we may judge whether the changes made are in the interest of the country.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The hon. gentleman has asked what has been the effect of the revenue of the department of the reduction in the rate of postage on newspapers. I cannot give the figures, but the immediate effect was a very substantial loss of revenue. The newspapers however soon increased the volume of their output so as to bring the revenue up to almost where it was, and we are carrying a very much larger quantity of papers for the same money.

Mr. MACLEAN. When was the rate of ½ cent a pound put on ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I think about, 1898. One-quarter of a cent per pound was imposed on the 1st of July, 1898, and one-half a cent on the 1st of January, 1899. I understood my hon. friend to ask how much was paid by the publishers on mail matter in cash instead of in postage stamps. There is no account kept of that, but the reason of the change was this. The publishers found it inconvenient to affix a stamp to each separate piece of mail matter ; and in order to save them trouble, the department provided for payment in bulk whenever the quantity of mail matter involved the payment of $25 or upwards. Instead of affixing a stamp to each separate piece, the publishers paid cash, and then the goods are marked 'Paid for in bulk.'

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. minister has said that the decrease in the rate of postage on newspapers has resulted in an increase in circulation.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No, but I said there has been an increase in the quantity of newspapers sent through the mails.

Mr. BLAIN. I understood him to say that when his government made the postage one-half cent per pound on newspapers and afterwards reduced that to one-quarter of a cent, the immediate effect was a decrease in the revenue but shortly afterwards the revenue came up to its original amount. Therefore the effect of the increase in postage was an increase in the quantity of newspapers sent through the mails.

Mr. MACLEAN. A larger weight, not a larger number.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend says that the number of newspapers was not larger, but that the public got larger newspapers for the same money and therefore got the benefit. Would not the same effect follow a reduction in the postage on books ? My hon. friend has doubled the cost of sending books through the mails, and it is fair to assume that caused a decrease in the number of books going through and therefore caused great disadvantage to the public. He claims a great deal of credit for his management of the department, and I suppose that some considerable portion of the credit he claims is due him, but it would be only fair to say that the change in book postage was not in the interests of the public but was rather for the purpose of increasing the revenue.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Whatever may be said about the effect of the postage on newspapers, I think there is one thing on which we can all agree, and that is that this country is not suffering from a dearth of newspapers. As to the rate of postage on books, when the hon. gentleman tries to draw a comparison between books and newspapers, I would say that the postal service is as full of anomalies in the matter of rates as is the railway service. The rates charged on one class of matter are not any guide to what might be the rates proper to charge on another class.

Mr. CLARKE. Why does not the hon. gentleman straighten out the anomalies ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I must leave something for successors. Some day the hon. gentleman expects to be in my place, and I want to leave him something to do.

Mr. CLARKE. The tax upon the public in the matter of postage on newspapers amounted last year to $129,417 and for the ten months to the 30th of April this year to $100,071. That is the result of the decrease in the postal rate. If there is no perceptible increase as the result of doubling the postage on books, why not do away with the increased postage ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Would it not be better to begin by making letters free and let everybody have the benefit ?

Mr. CLARKE. If you would reduce the tax on drop letters in cities from two to one cent, you would be conferring a great benefit on the public.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend's colleague wants it reduced to one-half a cent.

Mr. CLARKE. You are doubling the rate on books and thus making it more difficult to disseminate information through the country. If you would reduce the drop letter rate from two cents to one cent, that reduction would be very much appreciated. There are, as the hon. gentleman admits, anomalies in the postal rates. The hon. gentleman will send out a circular, which weighs as much as four letters, and that will be distributed by the same letter-carrier for a cent whereas a thin letter is charged two cents. At the same time a postal card is delivered at one cent. It is hardly worth while to continue the government tax on books.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Before taking off the postage on books, if we are going to have free mail matter, why not begin with having free letters. If my hon. friend is in favour of free letters, let him say so. His colleague from Halton last night argued in favour of a reduction of the letter rate in cities from two cents per drop letter to one-half cent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I argued no such thing. I will explain later on what I did mean.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend explained that the rate on drop letters in cities was excessive. Instead of two cents it should be one-half cent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg the hon. minister's pardon. He was boasting about the large amount in postage he had saved to the people, and I simply remarked that in the cities he had saved nothing because the postage was two cents to-day as before. I made no complaint and did not ask him either to increase or decrease the rate. All I did was simply state the fact that the hon. gentleman had neither increased nor decreased the postage rate in cities.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend has quite forgotten what he told us. He used the term half-cent rate, and I took exception then, as I do now, to any such reduction. I took exception to his demand that the drop-letter rate in the cities should be reduced below two cents either to ½ cent or anything else and I took issue with the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) on the same proposition. If the hon. member (Mr. Henderson) will refer to 'Hansard' he will see what he said. The hon. gentleman asks that we reduce the drop-letter rate from 2 cents to 1 cent. I said then as I say now that, inasmuch as the inhabitants of cities have their mail matter brought to them in their houses or offices, it is reasonable that they should pay more on some classes of mail matter than is paid by persons living at points not served by free carrier delivery. People in towns where there is no free delivery must go to the post office for their mail matter. And the government of hon. gentlemen opposite —not this government—decided that, in order to equalize matters, a higher rate should be paid on drop-letters in localities enjoying the letter carrier system than in others. I think that has been the policy of this country even since the free letter carrier system was established, I adhere to that policy. It is one of the few legacies of the late administration which commend themselves to the fair-mindedness of the people. I object to giving to the city advantages not enjoyed by the rural population, and at the same time giving them equally low rates. If cities are to have free delivery they ought to contribute something for the extra advantage they enjoy over their less fortunate fellow citizens in outlying points. And so I say the country will not support the demand of the hon. member for Halton and the hon. member for West Toronto in this regard. Let the hon. gentleman go to his own constituency and tell the people of Oakville or Bronte that he suggested that the drop-letter rate in Toronto should be cut down from 2 cents to ½ cent while the drop-letter rate in Oakville, Bronte and Milton should remain at 1 cent. I would like to know whether he will have the endorsement of the electors of the county of Halton in that ? I cannot believe that, on mature consideration, he will adhere to that view. I can understand the hon. member for West Toronto advocating it. It is quite in harmony with the interests of his own people. Probably it is his duty to present all phases of the question, that it may be argued and debated and reasons given for making the change or withholding it. I can understand that hon. gentleman advocating this change, as it is his duty to do in the interest of his constituents. But I cannot understand a gentleman representing a rural constituency advocating it. However, my view is that the cities which get the advantage of free delivery should pay something for the privileges they enjoy over less favoured parts of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am afraid the Postmaster General (Sir William Mulock) has wasted a good deal of wind on the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) and has worried himself unnecessarily as to the views his constituents in Oakville, Milton or Bronte may have as to what he said with reference to drop-letters in the city of Toronto or elsewhere. To be brief, I will read from 'Hansard' what I did say. It fully corroborates the statement I made a moment ago—that I made no complaints about the Postmaster General not having reduced postage in the city of Toronto where there was free delivery. I did not ask him to do that ; I did not suggest that he should do it ; in fact I would not say that I would approve of his doing it. I was discussing the question of the reduction of postage. The hon. gentleman (Sir William Mulock) had boasted that he had done so much for the people and had reduced the postage by one-third. I simply pointed out that he had only reduced the postage in certain instances, not in all, and consequently the reduction did not amount to one-third. The statement I made with reference to the two-cent rate was as follows, as the hon. gentleman will find by referring to page 5822 of 'Hansard :'

> What about the people in the cities who are paying a two cent rate on drop letters just the same as they have been paying previously ? How can the hon. gentleman come here and say that he has reduced the postage by one third ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is not all the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) said.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is all I said with reference to the postage in cities. Now I will tell the hon. gentleman that I did suggest, and I will suggest again—and I think it is a very proper thing—that, in rural sections where there is no postal delivery it would be a very proper thing to reduce the postage on drop letters to ½ cent. I think that would be a very fair proposition. The government would not lose very much by it and it would be of material advantage to a great many people in the country. The hon. gentleman may know—because he is a business man—that merchants in the country towns and villages are taking advantage of the post office a great deal more than in former years for the purpose of advertising their wares. Instead of advertising so much in the newspapers, they draft a circular and send it to their customers or to the constituencies among which they do business. Possibly they do this three or four times a year. These letters are mostly drop-letters—letters addressed to persons at the post office at which the letters are posted. That is the kind of letter I referred to when I suggested that the postage might be reduced to ½ cent. I think that would only be in keeping with the privileges granted elsewhere. Why should I or any business man in my town put a one-cent stamp on a letter and drop it in the Acton post office to be delivered in that same post office without any expense to the government of carrying it through the mail ; when, for two cents, I can send a letter from Acton to Hong Kong? I do not think that that is reasonable, and I believe that the suggestion I make is only a fair one and one that is quite in harmony with the hon. gentleman's postal tariff. I trust the hon. gentleman now understands me fully, and that the severe strictures he made upon the argument he attributed to me that the rate on drop-letters where there is free delivery should be reduced to one-half cent will be withdrawn as being based upon a misapprehension. I am quite sure that it was a mere slip of the memory and that it was not done with the intention of arousing unnecessarily the indignation of my constituents in Oakville, Bronte and Milton. I remember that he was out there on one or two occasions and talked very largely about the deficit the Conservative party had—according to his statement—of $750,000 in the last year they were in power. The hon. gentleman paraded that deficit with all the volume of voice he was capable of spreading over the riding. But it all had no effect. The friend whom he took out from Toronto to supplant me returned shorn of his laurels. I fancy that the attack which he is going to make upon me in Oakville and Bronte and Milton on the matter of the unfairness that I suggest with reference to the postal rates as between these towns and Toronto will have just about the same effect and I hope the hon. gentleman when the time comes will pay us another visit and give us another opportunity of seeing how effectual his arguments are with the intelligent people of the county—I am speaking of the reasonable people of the county.

Mr. CLARKE. I am sorry that I riled the hon. gentleman in suggesting very respectfully—as I always address the hon. gentleman—that as he had doubled the tax on the people by the increase in the rate on books, he might take into consideration the advisability of giving them some relief in the matter of drop-letter rates. It is a fact that large firms in the city of Toronto, and I presume in Montreal, Ottawa and other large centres, deliver their letters themselves by messenger at a less cost than by the post and probably more speedily. For that reason I think the matter is one which should have the attention of the hon. gentleman, especially when he distributes circulars inclosed in envelopes weighing more than ordinary letters and postal cards for a cent. If my memory serves me, he did not always speak out as vigorously against the proposition to reduce the drop-letter rate as he has done to-night. When a deputation waited on him in Toronto I think he held out the hope that something might be done, and I am sure they will be grieved and pained to hear his vigorous denial to-night at the mere suggestion to reduce the drop-letter rate. Might I ask if he has any idea of the revenue derived in Toronto from drop-letters ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is very unfortunate that it is impossible to address a remark to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) without his at once assuming that some terrible attack has been made upon him. It is all right for the hon. gentleman to present an argument, or what is advanced as an argument, but when a reply is made to it, then the hon. gentleman is personally attacked. I was commending the hon. gentleman for the attention he was giving to the interests of his constituents, and was in fact pointing out to him that in his absence he had found an advocate in the person of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), but my hon. friend is ungrateful to him. He says I did not always speak the same voice as to-night. I have never otherwise expressed myself than as I have done to-night. It is true that a deputation from Toronto waited upon me two or three years ago and pressed this subject upon me. I held out no inducement to them at the time that I had any policy on the subject different from what I have laid down to-night. I pointed out to them on that occasion the advantages that the cities were enjoying over their country fellow-citizens outside the cities, and I gave them this hint : I said it had occurred to me that if the cities desired to have the rate on drop-letters reduced to one cent, the same as it is in places outside the cities, it would perhaps be reasonable that the cities should pay for the advantage, and I think so to-day.

Mr. CLARKE. Has the hon. gentleman worked that idea out, or has it lain dormant since ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have not worked it out, but I dare say it would be possible to formulate a system by which we could keep track of the revenue collected in that way. It might be possible, but I fear it would be a very difficult task to keep an account of the volume of drop-letters posted in a city and to commute that in a certain sum payable by the city as a whole. That was the idea I suggested on that occasion, but as to saying that I had at any time favoured the reduction of the rate on drop-letters to that prevailing outside the cities, where the people do not enjoy the same advantages as in the cities, is an error ; I never so expressed myself, I never had such an idea.

Mr. CLARKE. At any rate, you have no idea of that kind now.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have not any idea of the kind now ; I do not think it is just ; I do not think the great cities would press for such an unjust measure. They enjoy great advantages.

Mr. LAVELL. I do not want to enter into a discussion as to which of these rates should be lowered, but the minister a short time ago referred to the increased postage on books, and said that the revenue derived from that source would be trifling. I am aware that it is difficult for the minister or the officers of his department to find out just what that revenue is, but I cannot help thinking that if he had looked into the matter he would have found that the increase is so large as to amount to a very heavy tax.

Mr. CLARKE. Enormous.

Mr. LAVELL. It is not a matter in regard to which I have made inquiries outside my own business, but even in the business with which I am connected it makes a difference of several hundred dollars a year, and I would like to mention that. I am not complaining, as we are getting it out of our customers, but it amounts to several hundred dollars a year, and I know it has increased our postal rate by between 30 and 35 per cent.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. What class of books ?

Mr. LAVELL. Catalogues and books of that kind. I presume every manufacturing house in the country will have a somewhat similar experience, and I mention it now to call the attention of the minister to it, because I cannot help thinking he is in error in believing that the amount is trivial. If it amounts to several hundred dollars in a comparatively small business, I think that in the larger businesses it must amount to a very large sum indeed. As I said, I do not know that it is a cause of complaint. I have never felt inclined to complain myself, as we charge it up to expense and add it to the price of the goods, but if there is a revenue sufficient to justify a reduction in the postal rates, it seems to me it would be relieving a large number of people of rather a heavy tax if he could see his way clear to reduce the book rate to the old rate. The minister has said that the change was undoubtedly made because of the desire to bring the rate for the carriage of books and similar matter into fair proportion of the cost to the department of that carriage. That is what I understood the minister to say. I may say then that our experience has been that the book rate now is so high on catalogues and such matter that wherever we can send by the express company to within a good many hundreds of miles, it pays us to send by express. It is materially cheaper to send by express than by post, simply because the express companies have a special rate of 15 cents on such classes of goods, and 15 cents will carry a greater weight of catalogues by express than by postage. I mention that as a matter of information; it is not a matter that I feel inclined to criticise one way or another. It is an open question as to whether the rates should be reduced, but I think that the amount of revenue is not trifling.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the Postmaster General has any excess of revenue to expend on improving the service, my idea is to expend it in improving the parcel post system. We in Canada have a parcel post system somewhat better than that in the United States, but not to be compared with the parcel post systems in Europe, especially in Germany, Hungary and Great Britain. They have a much improved parcel post system there; their rates are simply fractional as compared with ours.

Mr. CLARKE. Have our parcel post rates been increased?

Mr. MACLEAN. I do not know that they have been increased. The size of parcels has not been increased and the facilities offered to the public have not been increased, for the reason, I believe, that prevents these benefits from being conferred upon the people in the United States, and that is that the express companies in the United States are so powerful that they have prevented the extension of the parcel postal system in that country as I believe they have prevented it in this country. The business men of Canada would like us to use the parcel post system and they want the rates reduced and the size of the parcels increased. This has taken place in Europe. It has stimulated trade in every branch there and certainly we could bring about the same results here. Another way in which the post office could facilitate trade would be to still further simplify the transmission of small amounts of money whether by postal notes or otherwise. We are making progress in that direction but in no way is our system for the carriage of small sums of money and parcels to be compared with the facilities in those directions afforded in Europe. The facilities afforded in Europe in that regard have stimulated trade in every direction and have enabled small tradesmen and people who wish to market their own products to get the best price possible for them. If the hon. the Postmaster General has any surplus and if he wishes to serve the Canadian people I would recommend to him that he study particularly the system of these European countries and use the money at his disposal in carrying it out as far as possible.

Mr. CLARKE. What is the difference in the price of postal orders here and in the old country?

Mr. MACLEAN. The price in the old country is only a fraction of what we pay here.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. For what?

Mr. MACLEAN. Postal notes, and parcel post rates.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No.

Mr. MACLEAN. I can give the hon. gentleman some instances of it. I would also suggest to the hon. gentleman that he might greatly simplify the law. The law might be greatly simplified if we improved the parcel post system in this country. It is well worthy of consideration and that is in line with a matter that I have brought up before in this House in regard to express companies. They are too powerful. They have too much influence. They fight against any extension of the parcel post system and they are trying to keep up the rates. Let the Post Office Department in this country have the courage of the Post Office Department of Great Britain, Germany and Austria and greatly improve the parcel postal system. In that way the hon. Postmaster General can do a great deal for the people and greatly simplify the present system.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General if he has looked into the question of the rural delivery system which has been quite a success on the other side.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Perhaps the committee will allow my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to intervene with a matter that he desires to bring to the attention of the House and then we can resume.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. Postmaster General can answer the question of my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) later.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes, in a few minutes.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I would be obliged if the committee would agree to suspend proceedings in supply for a few minutes in order that I may be permitted, with the Speaker in the chair, to place some papers on the table of the House with the understanding that we may return to the committee immediately after the explanation which I may be able to give to the House. I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Some resolutions reported.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

The Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows :

MINTO :

The Governor in Council transmits to the House of Commons further supplementary estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1904, and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, the Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, 28th June, 1904.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the Message of His Excellency and the estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FIELDING. If the House will permit me without a formal motion I would avail myself of the opportunity of placing on the table of the House some changes which we desire to make in the tariff resolutions as follows :

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend 'The Customs Tariff, 1897,' to the following effect :—

That the following provision be substituted for subsection (f) of section 1 of the said Act :

(f) The expression 'gauge,' when applied to metal sheets or plates or to wire, means the thickness as determined by the 'Imperial Standard gauge.'

2. Resolved, that whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Minister of Customs or of any officer of customs authorized to collect customs duties, that the export price or the actual selling price to the importer in Canada of any imported dutiable article, of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, is less than the fair market value thereof (as determined according to the basis of value for duty provided in the Customs Act in respect of imported goods subject to an ad valorem duty), such article shall, in addition to the duty otherwise established, be subject to a special duty of customs equal to the difference between such fair market value and said selling price ; provided, however, that the special customs duty on any article shall not exceed one-half of the customs duty otherwise established in respect of the article, except in regard to the articles mentioned in items 224, 226, 228 and 231 of schedule A, the special duty of customs on which shall not exceed fifteen per cent ad valorem, nor more than the difference between the selling price and the fair market value of the article as aforesaid.

The expression 'export price or 'selling price' herein shall be held to mean and include the exporter's price for the goods, exclusive of all charges thereon after their shipment from the place whence exported directly to Canada.

The foregoing provisions respecting a special duty of customs shall apply to imported round rolled wire rods not over three-eighths of an inch in diameter, notwithstanding that such rods are on the customs free list; provided, however, that the special duty of customs on such wire rods shall not exceed fifteen per cent ad valorem.

If at any time it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council, on a report from the Minister of Customs, that the payment of the special duty herein provided for is being evaded by the shipment of goods on consignment without sale prior to such shipment, or otherwise, the Governor in Council may in any case or class of cases authorize such action as is deemed necessary to collect on such goods or any of them the same special duty as if the goods had been sold to an importer in Canada prior to their shipment to Canada.

If the full amount of any special duty of customs be not paid on goods imported, the customs entry thereof shall be amended and the deficiency paid upon the demand of the collector of customs.

The Minister of Customs may make such regulations as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of the foregoing sections and for the enforcement thereof.

Such regulations may also provide for the temporary exemption from special duty of any article or class of articles, when it is established to the satisfaction of the Minister of Customs that such articles are not made in Canada in substantial quantities and offered for sale to all purchasers on equal terms.

The special duty aforementioned shall not apply to goods of a class subject to excise duty in Canada.

3. Resolved that in schedule A the words 'common and colourless window glass,' and in item 201, and the words 'pails and tubs of wood' in item 330, shall be omitted and that items 22, 151, 170, 171, 172, 173, 175, 178 and 20 of schedule A shall be repealed, and the following provisions added to schedule A, viz. :—

After item 7 (a) : Provided that bottles, flasks and packages of gin, rum, whisky and brandy of all kinds, and imitations thereof shall be held to contain the following quantities (subject to the provisions for addition or deduction in respect to the degree of strength), viz. :—

Bottles, flasks and packages containing not more than three-fourths of a gallon, per dozen, as three-fourths of a gallon per dozen;

Bottles, flasks and packages containing more than three-fourths of a gallon, but not more than one gallon per dozen, as one gallon per dozen ;,

Bottles, flasks and packages containing more than one gallon, but not more than one and one-half gallons, per dozen, as one and one-half gallons per dozen ;

Bottles, flasks and packages containing more than one and one-half gallons, but not more than two gallons per dozen, as two gallons per dozen ;

Bottles, flasks and packages containing more than two gallons, but not more than two and four-fifths gallons per dozen, as two and four-fifths gallons per dozen ;

Bottles, flasks and packages containing more than two and four-fifths gallons, but not more than three gallons per dozen, as three gallons per dozen ;

Bottles, flasks and packages containing more than three gallons, but not more than three and one-fifth gallons per dozen, as three and one-fifth gallons per dozen.

22. Paraffine wax candles, 25 per cent ad valorem.

151. Paraffine wax, 25 per cent ad valorem.

170. Illuminating oils, composed wholly or in part of the products of petroleum, coal, shale or lignite, costing more than thirty cents per gallon, 20 per cent ad valorem.

171. Lubricating oils, composed wholly or in part of petroleum, costing less than 25 cents per gallon, 2½ cents per gallon.

172. Crude petroleum, gas oils (other than naphtha, benzine and gasoline), lighter than ·8235 but not less than ·775 specific gravity, at 60 degrees temperature, 1½ cents per gallon.

173. Oils, coal and kerosene distilled, purified or refined, naphtha and petroleum, and products of petroleum, n.e.s., 2½ cents per gallon.

175. Lubricating oils, n.e.s., and axle grease 20 per cent ad valorem.

178. Vaseline and all similar preparations of petroleum for toilet, medicinal or other purposes, 25 per cent ad valorem.

201 (a). Common and colourless window glass, 15 per cent ad valorem.

203. Plate glass not bevelled, in sheets or panes not exceeding seven square feet each, n.o.p., 10 per cent ad valorem.

203 (a). Plate glass not bevelled, in sheets or panes exceeding seven square feet each and not exceeding twenty-five square feet each, n.o.p., 25 per cent ad valorem.

After item 323 : provided that for duty purposes the minimum value of an open buggy shall be forty dollars, and the minimum value of a covered buggy shall be fifty dollars.

368 (a). Silk fabrics when imported by manufacturers of neckties for use exclusively in the manufacture of neckties in their own factories, under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs, 10 per cent ad valorem.

447 (a). Artificial teeth, until April 1, 1905, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Notwithstanding anything contained in schedule D, the maximum duty on the undermentioned articles when imported under the British Preferential Tariff shall be as follows :

185 (a). Tableware of china, porcelain or other white clay, 15 per cent ad valorem.

201 (b). Common and colourless window glass, 7½ per cent ad valorem.

Notwithstanding anything contained in schedule D, the minimum duty on the undermentioned articles when imported under the British Preferential Tariff shall be as follows :

394 (a). Manufacturers as described in item 394 of schedule A (excepting blankets, flannels, bed comforters and counterpanes) composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the Alpaca goat or other like animal, 30 per cent ad valorem.

431 (a). Twine and cordage of all kinds, n.e.s., 20 per cent ad valorem.

4. Resolved, that in schedule B, item 46 shall be repealed and all the words in item 608 after the words 'United Kingdom' in the third line, shall be struck out, and that the following articles shall be added to the free list (schedule B) :—

462. Philosophical and scientific apparatus, utensils, instruments, and preparations, including boxes and bottles containing the same, of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada, when specially imported in good faith for the use and by order of any society or institution incorporated or established solely for religious, philosophical, educational, scientific, or literary purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in Canada, and not for sale, subject to such regulations as the Minister of Customs shall prescribe.

555 (a). Machinery of every kind and structural iron and steel, when imported under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs, for use in the construction and equipment of factories for the manufacture of sugar from beet root, until the first day of April, 1905.

555 (c). Machinery and appliances of a kind not made in Canada for use exclusively in alluvial gold mining, until July 1, 1905 ;

Artificial teeth, after 31st March, 1905 ;,

Crude petroleum, fuel and gas oils, ·8235 specific gravity or heavier at 60° temperature ;

Ferment cultures, to be used in butter making ;

Glass cut to size for manufacture of dry plates for photographic purposes, when imported by the manufacturers of such dry plates for use exclusively in the manufacture thereof in their own factories :

Goats for the improvement of stock, under such regulations as may be made by the Minister of Customs ;

Hydro-fluo-silicic acid ;

Machinery of a class or kind not made in Canada for the manufacture of linen ;

Machinery of a class or kind not made in Canada for the manufacture of brass goods such as are mentioned in item 492, schedule B ;

Molasses, the produce of any British country entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff, when produced from sugar-cane and imported direct by vessel from the country of production in the original package in which it was placed at the point of production and not afterwards subjected to any process of treating or mixing ; the package also to be free : provided, however, that this shall not apply to molasses to be used for the purpose of distillation ;

Plain basic photographic paper, baryta coated, when imported by manufacturers of sensitized paper for use exclusively in manufacturing albumenized or sensitized photographic paper in their own factories ;

Printing presses, rotary, of a class or kind not made in Canada ;

Quassia juice ;

Well drilling machinery and apparatus of a class or kind not made in Canada for drilling for water and oil, not to include motive power ;

Whale oil soap.

5. Resolved, that schedule C (prohibited goods) shall be amended by adding the following :—

642. Stallions and mares of less value than fifty dollars each.

6. Resolved, that the foregoing provisions shall be held to have come into force on the 8th day of June, 1904, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day, except as otherwise provided in the foregoing resolutions : Provided, that all goods actually purchased on or before the 7th day of June, 1904, at any place out of Canada, for importation into Canada, on evidence to the satisfaction of the Minister of Customs of the purchase having been so made, and all goods in warehouse in Canada on such day, may be entered for duty at the rate of duty in force immediately before the said day (without special duty), notwithstanding any increase in customs duties under the said resolutions, but this proviso shall cease to have force and effect after the thirty-first day of August in the present year.

I might, of course, simply have placed the amended resolutions on the notice paper but I thought the House would prefer that I should call attention to several points in regard to which changes are to be made. In most respects these changes are in form rather than in substance, and do not affect the rates of duty, but there are one or two items of some importance and I will crave the indulgence of the House for a brief space while I call attention to the facts, so that hon. gentlemen who may be interested particularly in any of these may understand them at once without having to read through the resolutions. I desire to introduce into the resolution a clause dealing with the gauge which determines the classification of metal plates and wire. Hitherto the Customs Department have used what is called Stubb's Gauge and it is proposed to use what is known as the Imperial Standard Gauge, which I am advised is better adapted to the purposes of the department. In what is commonly called the dumping clause, it is proposed to insert words which will empower the Minister of Customs in his regulations to make a temporary exemption as respects the operation of that clause in cases where the goods referred to are not manufactured in Canada in large quantity and in open competition. It would be possible that an article might be made in Canada to a very small extent, or it would perhaps be in the hands of some one producer and not open to the trade. It is felt that if such a condition should arise it might not be a proper case for the application of the dumping clause. The amendment will therefore provide that the Minister of Customs may, in his regulations, temporarily exempt from the operation of the special duty—that is the technical phrase I use, or the dumping clause—articles of a class where the minister is satisfied that the articles are not made in Canada in a substantially large quantity and open to sale on even terms to all applicants. Though an article may be made in Canada ordinarily exceptional circumstances may arise such as a strike which would stop the manufacture in Canada and in that case the Minister of Customs ought to have some discretion to meet a condition that might arise. That is the object of the amendment. In the resolutions as laid on the table reference is made to the computation of the duties as respects spirits in flasks and bottles. This is rather a matter of customs regulation than anything else, and that clause to which I refer is being enlarged in the amended resolution. It does not however affect the rates of duty. In the duties on coal oil a change is made in the phraseology but no change in the rates of duty. In the case of window glass we made provision in the resolutions as tabled that British window glass should be reduced to 7½ per cent. We made no reduction in the duty on window glass from other countries. It has been represented to us that the British window glass trade is in the hands of a very few people, indeed, that the export trade is practically in the hands of one concern, and that their methods of sale are such as to debar the general trade from that free competition on which is desirable.

It has been represented that in order to allow the trade in Canada a reasonable opportunity to benefit by competition in their purchases, we should make at the same time some reduction in the foreign glass. While retaining the duty of seven and a half per cent as stated in the resolution on British window glass, we propose therefore to reduce the duty on the foreign glass from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. The net result will be that foreign window glass will stand at 15 per cent and British window glass at 7½ per cent. The proportion of British preference will in that case be 50 per cent hereafter, instead of 33⅓ per cent as in the tariff for some years past.

We have an item for :

Silk fabrics to be used exclusively in the manufacture of men's neckware.

After very careful consideration we have come to the conclusion to alter the form of that, so that the privilege of the reduced duties should apply not strictly to men's neckwear, but to the manufacture of neckties, using the word 'neckties' instead of 'neckwear,' and not confining it to men's neckties. It will apply to the manufacture of all neckties whether they be used for men's wear or for women's wear.

We have an item respecting the duty on artificial teeth which was the cause of some humorous observations. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will be surprised to know that it is an item which created a great deal of interest, and much importance is attached to it. We have reached the conclusion that the placing of artificial teeth on the free list should be deferred to a date to be mentioned, and the date we fix is the 1st day of April next. In the interim we propose to reduce the duty from 20 per cent to 10 per cent. It is represented to us that there are very large stocks of artificial teeth held in Canada, and indeed it is somewhat surprising to know the extent to which this is the case. We knew it was a considerable item, but it is even larger than we anticipated and it is represented that the sudden placing of artificial teeth on the free list would have a very disturbing and unfair influence on merchants who hold large stocks. We therefore propose to bring about the change gradually, while adhering to the essence of the policy. There is another item which reads :

Table ware of porcelain, china, or other clay.

For the purpose of more clearly defining it, we insert the word 'white' so that it will read :

Table ware of china, porcelain or other white clay.

This will prevent confusing the item with some others which were not intended.

There is a provision in the tariff of a year ago for the admission free of duty of machinery for the manufacture of sugar from beet root. That provision has expired, and we propose to renew it for the term of another year up to April next.

In the item of 'molasses,' which is placed on the free list when imported from countries entitled to the British preference, we wish to insert words which will stipulate that it must be a direct importation. The object of the government is to guard against molasses being landed abroad and mixed with other ingredients which people in the trade assure us is a practice which we ought very carefully to guard against.

We have placed on the free list the item of printing presses, and it has been deemed desirable that that should be more clearly defined. We propose that the item shall read :

Printing presses, rotary.

This will make it clear that other classes of printing presses which we did not contemplate, shall not be included in the item, and are not transferred to the free list.

There is one other matter which is of importance, and that is the date on which these various changes in the way of increased duties shall take effect. As a rule, under the practice in Canada, whenever the budget speech is delivered such changes of tariff as may be made take effect at once ; and as the resolution now stands without any qualification, that would be the result. However, there are precedents for taking a different course. Some years ago, for good reasons no doubt, the operation of the new resolutions was delayed for a period, and in the case of the German surtax we adopted the same policy. Following these precedents, we now propose to provide : that in the case of all goods actually ordered before the date of the budget—and confining it entirely to goods so actually ordered—if they be entered in Canada on or before the last day of August next, they shall be admitted under the old rate of duty, and the new rate of duty shall only apply to cases in which the goods have not been ordered as provided. The reason for this is, that it has been represented that in some lines, notably woollen goods, large quantities were sold in advance at fixed prices on the basis of the existing duties. The goods in some cases were on their way and the orders could not be cancelled. After very careful consideration, we have come to the conclusion that no injury will be done the woollen industry, for which the benefit was intended, because the goods are ordered and have to come in any how. The only question is whether we should exact the higher duty. After full consideration we believe that in the case of all duties which have been increased by these resolutions—this will apply to the special duty as well as to the various items which are set forth—where the goods have been actually ordered on or before the 7th day of June, they shall come in at the old rate, provided they are entered in Canada on or before the last day of August. These, Mr. Speaker, are all the changes. The Votes and Proceedings will contain all the resolutions in their amended form, but, gentlemen who have read the resolutions as previously submitted, if they read them now in conjunction with this explanation, will be able to determine exactly the nature and purpose of the changes. In most cases the changes are very trivial, but as regards the date on which the increased duties take effect, that is an important change, and I desired this opportunity to make it known amongst the trade all over the country which has been so anxious for a definite announcement upon the subject. I am obliged to the House for having kindly consented to allow me to put the matter in this form. There will be in connection with this, some necessary amendments to the Customs Act. The tariff is dealt with by an Act called the Customs Tariff, 1897 ; apart from that there is the Customs Act which deals with the general management of the Customs Department. The Minister of Customs will have to make some amendments to that Act. My hon. friend will give notice of these amendments, but they are not of sufficient importance to justify me in detaining the House at this moment.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG. May I say a few words with reference to the industry in which I am particularly interested. I am sure it is not the intention of the Minister of Finance to do any particular damage to the oil industry. Though I do not believe in the bounty system, yet as that has been decided upon I would like to call the attention of the minister to a few remarks I have to make with reference to the necessity of putting on a greater bounty than the minister proposes. As I said on a former occasion, the crude oil which comes from the Ohio fields is of a superior quality to ours. I have worked out 100 gallons of the imported crude oil through a refinery, and the result is that I got $1.03 in value more from Ohio oil than from 100 gallons of our own oil, showing it to be worth about one cent a gallon more than our oil, or say 35 cents per barrel. The oil is sold in Ohio at $1.08 per barrel, to which if you add the transportation charges for delivery at Sarnia of 23 cents it will make $1.31. If you add the 52 cents bounty as suggested, that comes to $1.83. At the time this change was made the difference between $1.83 and $2.09, left the balance in favour of the Ohio oil as compared with our own oil of 26 cents per barrel. Add to that 26 cents per barrel the 35 cents I referred to a moment ago being the extra value of the Ohio crude, and that makes a total preference for the Ohio oil of 61 cents per barrel. I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact, that not only is that giving an advantage of 61 cents to the Ohio oil, but it must be remembered that in Essex, Kent, Lambton and Elgin counties, the oil is gathered at a considerable distance from the Standard refinery, and that it costs a good deal to deliver it in the Standard tanks. Previous to this I have computed the values as if our oil were delivered in the Standard tanks at Sarnia. I have made a calculation with reference to the cost of gathering the oil in the Pretolea field and delivering it to the Standard refinery seventeen miles distant, and I have come to the conclusion that this costs ten cents per barrel. Therefore, as between the Ohio oil and our own oil it makes a difference against us of 71 cents per barrel. To the people in the outside districts, such as Bothwell, Dutton and the other oil fields from which the oil has to be sent to Sarnia by train it is a more serious matter, and I feel like drawing the attention of the Finance Minister to the importance of giving the producers of Canada sufficient protection against Ohio crude.

Mr. BIRKETT. I desire to ask the Minister of Finance if there will be a rebate of duty allowed on goods which have been passed through the customs since the 7th of June, and on which the higher duty has been paid ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, if there be evidence that the goods were ordered prior to that date, as of course they would have been, or I presume they would not be delivered. The goods actually ordered before the date of the 8th of June and entered before the end of August will not be subject to the higher duties, and if the duties in the meantime have been paid, they will be entitled to a rebate.

Mr. BIRKETT. Then, I would like to point out how difficult it is going to be to carry out the anti-dumping clause. I have received four circulars from manufacturers in the United States intimating that they would invoice goods into Canada at American prices, and would pay to Canadian dealers the same salary for handling their goods that they pay to American dealers. That will defeat the anti-dumping clause altogether.

Mr. FIELDING. This is not the time for debating that question. All I can say is that I have no doubt the Minister of Customs will find the means of meeting a case of that kind. We shall be only too glad to have such cases brought to our notice in order that we may look into them.

Mr. BIRKETT. As an importer, I would like to know what would be the effect, provided we import goods at United States prices. Can they be passed through our customs at those prices when the manufacturer pays the importer a salary for disposing of the goods ?

Mr. FIELDING. I am afraid I cannot answer that question. In the administration of the customs laws a great many questions of that kind are brought up, and have to be dealt with as they arise from time to time.

Mr. HAGGART. Another question I would like to ask the Finance Minister. In the case of articles which formerly paid a duty, but are now imported free, on what date will they be entitled to come in free ? In other words, when does the law take effect—on the 7th or the 8th of June ?

Mr. FIELDING. I am afraid I had better not answer my hon. friend lest I get into trouble. We shall have all these questions discussed in due course.

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg to ask an easy question. Perhaps the hon. minister can tell us on what day he will take up these resolutions. Will he take them up this week or next week ?

Mr. FIELDING. I can give my hon. friend the assurance that they will not be taken up this week. They will come into effect at once, and therefore I desire to make the announcement now; but the discussion will take place later.

Mr. HENDERSON. It makes no difference to me when they take effect. I want simply to know when we shall have an opportunity of discussing them, so that I may be present.

Mr. GOURLEY. All this quibbling about the tariff shows the bad policy Canada is pursuing. I have no doubt those people in the United States will find the most ample opportunity of defeating the clause in the tariff that is proposed. My hon. friend the Finance Minister says the Minister of Customs will look after that. I have not the same faith in the Minister of Customs; I think we shall have to have a new Minister of Customs if he is to possess ingenuity enough to prevent those people cheating the revenue of Canada. What we want in Canada is a tariff of the same height as the American tariff. Then there will be no question of quibbling with the tariff such as we have had to-night. For my part, I stand here as a maritime province man. Formerly the people of the maritime provinces were supposed to be in favour of free commercial relations with the United States. I stand here to say that the maritime provinces do not want any relations whatever with the United States. What we want is a high tariff to exclude the manufacturers of the United States from this country. In the county of Colchester we have a great iron industry and the great complaint of the people connected with that industry is that $30,000,000 of manufactured iron comes into this country. We are prevented from building up our own industries because hon. gentlemen opposite, while professing to protect them, are allowing $30,000,000 of iron goods to come into this country and are offering these people a bonus. The bonus is only applicable to one or two lines of manufactured materials. Unfortunately they went to those parties in Cape Breton who are now face to face with financial embarrassment. The hon. gentlemen are killing their friends as well as their enemies—thank God.

DOCUMENTS WITHHELD FROM PARLIAMENT.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I wish to give notice that to-morrow, on the motion for the House to go into Committee of Supply, I will move this resolution:

This House regrets that the government has seen fit to withhold from parliament documents of a public character to which parliament was entitled for the proper consideration of matters to which such documents relate.

Mr. FIELDING.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Post Office—Outside service—Mail service, $2,561,700.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Before the committee rose an hon. member referred to the transmission of money by post in Great Britain. He mentioned that the parcel rate in Canada was greater than the parcel rate in European countries. That may be the case, but the distances in Canada are very much greater. It would be impossible, with any regard to business, to carry parcels throughout Canada at the same rate that is charged in Great Britain. I suppose they are carried in Canada ten times the distance that they are in Great Britain. With reference to the rates on postal notes and the development of the postal note system, I have made a little comparison and I think it will be found that we are quite as reasonable in Canada as they are in England. The rate charged in England on a postal note up to 1s. 6d., is a half-penny. In Canada the charge is one-half penny or a cent up to forty cents. In England the rate charged on a postal note from one shilling and six pence up to ten and six pence is a penny or two cents. In Canada the rate is two cents from fifty cents to two dollars and a half. In England the rate on postal notes exceeding ten and six and going up to twenty shillings is one and a half penny or three cents. In Canada it is three cents on a sum from three to five dollars. In England the postal note system stops at one pound, but in Canada we have got beyond that limit and our postal notes are issued for amounts as high as ten dollars, on which the rate is five cents. I do not think that the comparison of rates is to our disadvantage.

Mr. MACLEAN. What I pointed out was that especially in Germany and Austria, they have even a cheaper rate for postal notes than we have. As regards the postal parcel post system, the hon. gentleman might divide the country into zones, or if he cannot do that, some other means might be provided. But as a matter of fact, he is carrying parcels from the English parcel post system to any place in Canada for the rate that obtains in England, and he does this because of the postal convention. So that while he may object to doing that in connection with parcels originating in Canada, he must do it for parcels originating in Great Britain. In that way the English parcel post system applies in Canada to packages coming from England, and it is much cheaper than what we charge here and the parcels are much larger.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think they give you larger weight in England than here. I am not complaining of the present system and willingly give the hon. gentleman credit for the improvement in the postal note service; but if there is a department in connection with the Post Office service which is subject to improvement, it is, as far as I can gather from business men, the parcel post and postal note system.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like the hon. minister to answer this question. In 1890 the number of post offices in Canada was 7,930 and in 1896 that number had increased to 9,103, being an increase of 1,190 in the six years. From 1896 to 1902 the increase was 855 or 335 less than in the previous six years. Would the hon. gentleman explain how that comes about ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not wish to make any reflection, but post offices were opened with very great liberality in days gone by, and a considerable number of them became closed through lack of business. But the post offices in existence to-day are all live, working offices, and there is far more business being done in those in existence to-day than there was in the greater comparative number in existence when we took office. The country is not being starved for lack of post offices. My daily task is to open up new post offices, and the case has to be a pretty bad one which does not appeal to me favourably. I think there will be found in the records very few applications for a post office, recommended by the inspector, which have not been granted. In the year now closing, we have opened 310 new post offices throughout the Dominion and there are 83 now authorized but not yet opened.

Mr. BLAIN. In what part of Canada ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon. friend is probably aware that every application for a post office is referred to the inspector of the district, who makes a report describing the neighbourhood, the number of people to be served, the distance from another post office, the estimated cost, &c. In most cases the inspector gives his views and recommends whether or not the post office should be opened. I doubt whether during the current year five applications have been refused, which have been recommended by the inspectors. These new offices have been opened chiefly in the Territories, particularly in Saskatchewan. I recognize the importance of giving postal facilities to the settlers. When a man comes out to settle in this country and finds himself distant from railway communication, it is very important that he should be provided with postal facilities, and we have been very liberal, but not too much so, in providing such facilities.

Mr. MACLEAN. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to tell us whether he has made any progress in nationalizing the telegraph and telephone system in connection with his department ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is a large question and I would like my hon. friend to ask me an easier one. I cannot say that I have made any great progress in the way of having anything to offer to parliament, but I hope that the educational movement is going on. I would hail with great pleasure the time when the telephone system would be taken under the wing of the government. My own opinion is in favour of some such course. I stated a year ago that I had been studying the subject, and so I have been.

Mr. CLARKE. Are you still studying it?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I cannot say that I am at this moment. I have formed some views and have some figures, but I am not in a position now to give them to the House. I trust however the time will come when I shall be free to do so.

Mr. BELL. I would ask for information from the Postmaster General with reference to mail contracts, and I will introduce the subject now so that he may make the necessary inquiries. I refer to the mail between River John and the post office, and between River John and Hodson. I would like to know who the mail carrier is, what he is receiving, and whether the contract was let after tenders called for or by private arrangement. For the item respecting the River John and the railway station I would refer him to page B—78 of his report, and for the other to B—71.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. As to the former, the name given here is W. Gammon.

Mr. BELL. I think he has been replaced.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will ascertain that point and also the others the hon. gentleman wished information about. The remuneration in the case I have just referred to appears to be $58 a year. The Act allows the Postmaster General, where the remuneration for carrying the mail is less than $200, to make a contract without calling for tenders. Probably in so small a matter tenders would not be called for. But I will get the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. BELL. When ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. To-morrow, if he will remind me.

Mr. INGRAM. I desire to ask a question with regard to the St. Thomas post office. The deputy postmaster there died some two weeks ago. What progress is the hon. minister making with respect to filling that position ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am sorry to say that the assistant postmaster of St.

Thomas died a few days ago. I hope to be able to fill the place by promotion from that office.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to say also that in my opinion the staff is not adequate for the business of the office. It should be increased.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That may follow. But I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) was particularly concerned to know who was to be given this particular position. As to that, I will look into the staff and if there is one among them whom it would be proper to promote to the assistant postmastership, I would rather fill the office in that way. It may be necessary also to add to the staff.

Mr. INGRAM. During the summer months the clerks in the office take their holidays, and the effect of that is to leave them one clerk short for some months. I think the Postmaster General should give this matter his serious attention, and provide an ample staff for the requirements of the office.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I had occasion last year to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the unfair treatment meted out to Charlottetown in the matter of free mail delivery. While smaller towns throughout Ontario were having the benefit of delivery by letter-carriers, Charlottetown was denied that advantage. I think that when this matter was before the committee last year the Postmaster General gave us the assurance that he would take the matter up and favourably consider it. I would like to know if he has made any progress in that matter.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not know to what towns in Ontario the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lefurgey) refers.

Mr. LEFURGEY. We had them up last year. I cannot call them off now, but no question was raised about it then.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I am afraid that our friends from Ontario would rather take issue with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lefurgey) on that point. There is no town in Ontario as small as that of Charlottetown that enjoys free delivery. The towns that have the benefit of that system now are Ottawa, Kingston, Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford and London. I think that, on reference to the postal returns, the hon. gentleman will find that every one of these places has a revenue larger than that of Charlottetown. Speaking from memory, the revenue from Charlottetown does not exceed $19,000, while I think that the revenue from Brantford is nearly $35,000. Probably the next revenue is that of Kingston, but it is some thousands in excess of Charlottetown. However, Charlottetown is growing and the place is improving, and I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Lefurgey) in the hope that it will continue to make rapid progress until its claims for free delivery will be unanswerable.

Mr. LEFURGEY. That is very plausible talk, but not just what we want. We want free delivery. When I brought this matter up last year the hon. Postmaster General seemed to be favourably impressed with the claims of Charlottetown for free delivery. I cannot recall the names of places brought to his attention that had a smaller population than Charlottetown and yet enjoyed this free delivery system. This system should not be given on the basis of revenue only; population should be considered. Where you have the people you are bound to give the service. And, as the coffers of the hon. minister are, apparently overflowing, I think he could fairly do justice to places of the population of Charlottetown.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. What is its population?

Mr. LEFURGEY. Upwards of from 12,000 to 15,000 people, and growing, growing all the time.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is always a good sign.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Joking aside, the people down there I think deserve a free delivery by letter-carriers, and a great deal better treatment than they are getting at the present time. I would like to know from the minister if the post office inspector for the island has been appointed and if so, what salary he is getting. Is the arrangement the same as with the old inspector?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes. Mr. Weir was appointed in the place of the late postmaster and inspector, Mr. Brecken, at I think the same salary.

Mr. LEFURGEY. No changes were made in the office?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. No change in the duties or salary.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I would like to know from the Postmaster General if he had any petitions in regard to a daily service at lot 14 post office, and whether anything has been done for the people in that locality?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will make a note of my hon. friend's inquiry and give him the information to-morrow.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I would like also to inquire about a post office for North Enmore. This is a small village three or four miles from any post office, and have on two occasions made applications for a post office and promises have been made, possibly by the inspector of post offices, in Prince Edward Island but nothing has been done. There is quite a large settlement that should be served by a post office. I would like also to know what arrangements were made for the carriage of mails from Cape Tormentine to Sackville, and if the contract has been carried out and payment made to the persons who had that contract. I asked a question some time ago about this, and the reply then was that no arrangement had been made with the people who were carrying the mails from Cape Tormentine to Sackville. I thought it was a very strange proceeding that a contract should have been entered into by the government whereby these people were to go ahead and carry the mails without any agreement at all. I would like to know what the arrangement was.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Was that arrangement made during the winter season last year ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. Yes.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There was I think some special difficulty in the service on account of ice.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I believe there was a block on the railway system.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is a special service growing out of the storm, is it not ?

Mr. LEFURGEY. I presume so, there is always some difficulty there about getting the mails across the strait.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It has puzzled more than one person. I shall have all this information gathered up and shall give it to my hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. MORIN. The Postmaster General said a while ago that post offices were granted on the recommendation of the inspector of post offices. Will the hon gentleman be kind enough to tell the committee what recommendation the Quebec inspector made with regard to the proposed post office at Detroit, in the county of Dorchester ? Has he recommended it or condemned it ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I think the hon. gentleman saw the report, he will remember, I do not know from memory.

Mr. MORIN. I did not see it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I shall examine the report and let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow.

Mr. MORIN. Thank you.

Mr. LAVELL. Some time ago I inquired about the post office at Wolford centre. I believe that the difficulty in connection with the office there is practically causing the post office to be closed. That would be a tremendous inconvenience to a body of farmers not now served by any other convenient office. I would ask the minister to look into that with the idea of restoring the service as it was. I think since 1896 there has been a better service, but on account of some change in mail carriage a proposal was made to change it to a twice-a-week service, which would produce an annual saving of $20.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I think I remember having seen a report of the inspector on that matter. I think it is rather a tangled affair and that there are some differences of opinion on the subject among the people. I shall be glad to discuss the subject with my hon. friend to see whether it is possible to meet all interests.

Mr. LAVELL. There was some difficulty about a year or two ago, but I think they all recognize now what an inconvenience the closing of the office will mean, and they are absolutely united now in regard to seeing the post office kept open as it was.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I shall go through the papers with my hon. friend and get the benefit of his advice.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Might I ask the minister what has been done with reference to rural free delivery in our country. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman is aware that rural free delivery in the United States is wonderfully successful. It has become so through continued efforts and I should like to know what has been done in this country.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not know what my hon. friend means when he says that rural delivery in the United States has been successful. It may be that there is no difficulty in delivering the mail matter but there are more things than the mere delivery of mail matter required in order to make a system a success. The United States people were rather dragooned into the establishment of rural mail delivery and it has raised very serious problems in the United States. I venture to say that in the very near future there will be a feeling in the United States that they were rather rash in rushing into that system. In fact that feeling has already arisen. My own opinion is that Canada is not ripe for the establishment of rural mail delivery at the present time. It is only a few years since the United States entered that scheme.

Mr. CLARKE. How were the United States dragooned into this system ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is only a few years since the United States started that system and now the expenditure has risen to about $12,000,000 and is going in the near future to be many times that amount. For some time the officers throughout the country engaged in working the system represented it as a huge success, and succeeded in having those views certified to in the official reports of the Postmaster General of the United States. I think that more recent information has shown that there were many inaccuracies in the returns made to the Postmaster General of the United States and that the system has not been that success which those who were engaged in developing it and who profited by its development represented.

Nevertheless, it has acquired a footing to-day throughout the United States. Practically every candidate for congress pledges himself to get rural delivery in his constituency, and when the successful ones meet at Washington they are all engaged in demanding rural delivery. The unfortunate administration is evidently at its wits end to know what to do with this monster that has been raised up, and has apparently no way of controlling the thing. I believe that those who are concerned with the affairs of the government at Washington find a serious condition of affairs growing up in the United States in reference to rural delivery. Moreover, there is evidence that in many parts of the country it is not now as popular as it was originally. It sounds very taking to say that a man is going to have his mail brought to his farm gate, but when you come to work it out there is another side to the picture. For example, supposing a mail route commences half a mile from the village or town, goes ten miles into the country in one direction, crosses a concession, goes down in another direction and covers a distance of twenty-five miles. The courier commences at one end and terminates his journey at the other. He starts off at a reasonable hour, about the time that those who are nearest to the town could have gone to the post office and got their mail. Those at the commencement of the route are all right, but those situated farther along the route do not get their mail until perhaps late in the night. Many who go to the post office once or twice in the day or in the week, as the mails come in, find themselves inconvenienced when their letters are taken off by the courier, thus showing that the inconvenience to one man off-sets the advantage to another. The question of rural delivery in a country of the vast size of the United States is giving serious concern to the public men of that enormously wealthy country. Imagine the Post Office Department undertaking to serve the people of this young country, with an area equal to that of the United States, in the same way as is done in smaller countries, such as England and in Europe. Fancy the establishment of a rural delivery system within an area the size of all Europe. That is what is involved in proposing to adopt rural delivery in Canada, and the first step of the Postmaster General would be to ask the House to vote $5,000,000 or $10,000,000, perhaps not the first year, but in a very short time. The first year perhaps $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 would be sufficient, but it would go on so that in five years the Postmaster General would have to ask the House to give $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 to establish rural delivery. Parliament would not be in favour of voting that sum of money. I doubt if the country could afford that amount of money. It might be that in a few years we would be called upon to vote an item of probably not less than $25,000,000. The figures are alarming and disturbing, and therefore I do not think the country is prepared to adopt this system at the present moment.

Mr. BELL. How much did the hon. gentleman say ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. In a few years the cost might be $25,000,000.

Mr. CLARKE. What is the total vote now ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. $4,500,000. I think the amount the United States congress voted last year was $12,000,000 and odd. To show you how they have miscalculated, their figures were based on the theory that a courier could be found to carry these mails on a route from 20 to 25 miles in length, supply his own horse and vehicle, and do it for $500 a year. Their figures are based on $500 to each man. The couriers said, after they got the system started, that they could not afford to carry on the system at that rate, and they wanted an increase. But they had to deal with a man who is even more hard-hearted than the Postmaster General of Canada, and they were denied the increase. Thereupon they undertook to supplement their salaries by carrying merchandise and doing an express and passenger traffic. Then persons engaged in the express and passenger traffic protested against this, and the authorities, in the endeavour to prevent the carriage of passengers and express parcels, granted the request of the couriers and raised their fees from $500 to $750 a year. Immediately a dislocation of their calculations by 50 per cent took place. Now, the couriers are not satisfied and they are agitating to have their salary increased to $1,000 a year. If this demand is granted, the calculations upon which they based the whole proposal originally given to congress will be upset to the extent of 100 per cent. They have taken hold of a problem which is alarming, and one which no prudent government would think of adopting in Canada at the present time. My deputy informs me that the vote they are asking this year from congress is $17,000,000.

Mr. CLARKE. They started with a vote of how much ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Less than $1,000,000.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. Postmaster General, in reply to a statement made by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) this afternoon, said that in the Montreal post office letter-carriers are not required to work more than eight hours a day, and that if they do work more than eight hours the extra time is allowed on the following day or on some succeeding day. Is that correct ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is correct.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the same rule apply in Toronto ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The letter-carriers in Toronto, I am told, do not do any extra work.

Mr. CLARKE. How many hours do they work ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Eight hours.

Mr. CLARKE. If they work more than eight hours, what then ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My deputy informs me that the question has never arisen. Eight hours is the time. Until a recent date there was no limit to the hours of their service ; they were required to work as long as there was work to do, whether it was nine or ten hours a day. I thought it was only right to fix a limit to a day's work, and I have fixed eight hours as the extent of a day's work.

Mr. CLARKE. What does a day's work include ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. A day's work means the eight hours that they are on duty.

Mr. CLARKE. Sorting letters and all that ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. I understand they work eight hours a day, and if they are obliged to work a longer period they will be allowed that time or get paid for it ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes. The question has not arisen in Toronto, because they are not required to work over eight hours. They are paid by the day and if the men were called upon to do any extra work exceeding eight hours, that time would be credited to them in the near future.

Mr. CLARKE. I am glad to hear that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The aim is to have eight hour service.

Mr. CLARKE. There is no doubt about it that if they work more than eight hours they will be allowed the time, or get extra pay for it ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is the spirit in which we are dealing with it.

Mr. CLARKE. And that rule will be carried out in the spirit in which the minister has presented it to us ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes. In a service like the post office it is of course impossible to adhere to fixed hours at all times.

Mr. CLARKE. The working time of these men is limited to eight hours per day ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. These are my instructions.

Mr. CLARKE. That is the rule now ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is the rule.

Mr. CLARKE. And if there is any violation of that rule the minister will see that the men are compensated, or allowed time ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It will be compensation if they are allowed time.

Mr. CLARKE. How many letter-carriers have accepted the new scheme which the minister has evolved, and abandoned the old plan under which they entered the service ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Under the extension of time granted by parliament last year, sixty-eight letter-carriers throughout the Dominion came in.

Mr. CLARKE. How many declined to come in ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It is not a matter of declining ; it is an option. I will bring down the information to the hon. gentleman with reference to the city of Toronto, and if he wishes in regard to the rest of Canada.

Mr. CLARKE. It would be interesting to know that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to state the precise information he needs, and I will have it furnished ?

Mr. CLARKE. I am much obliged to the Postmaster General. There were some superior officers of the department going around amongst these men and pointing out that they should come in——

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is a mistake.

Mr. CLARKE. The minister may not be personally aware of it, but it is a fact all the same. If these men prefer to remain under the old system they should be allowed to do so. Might I ask the minister if any petitions have been received by him from the men who are in this new scheme, as well as from the old men, for an increased wage, and what was done with the request ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My hon friend is entirely in error in supposing that there is the slightest pressure on the part of the government, the Postmaster General or any officer, to induce any letter-carriers to avail themselves of this privilege. I told the hon. gentleman so last session ; I tell him so again and he ought be assured. This is a measure that some people would think for the advantage of the letter-carriers, and it is entirely in their discretion to avail of it or not. It is no great advantage to the government to have to pay a letter-carrier $125 more than he is now drawing. I am not gaining anything by his coming under the system ; it was designed for their benefit and while some have stood out others have come to the conclusion that it is to their benefit to come in.

Mr. CLARKE. Quite a number do not see it in that light.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. They may not, and it is not necessary that they should see it in that light, so far as we are concerned. Some of them are now asking to avail of the privilege. My hon. friend does an injustice to some of the officers in the Toronto post office, when he suggests that any of them are busying themselves to advise the letter-carriers. I am aware that there are some people engaged in always trying to make mischief amongst the letter-carriers in the city of Toronto, and misleading them and making them feel they are down-trodden and abused. I heard this story that someone was endeavouring to coerce them, and I made it my business to make inquiries myself, and I went to the city post office. I called upon the chief superintendent, Mr. Lemon—I do not know that I need mention names. I asked him if he were aware of any person trying to induce the letter-carriers to come in under the new system, and he said : no ; that many of them had come in under it and that others were considering it, and that some who did not come in were seeking advice as to what was in their interests and they had asked some other officials to give them advice. I asked him the name of any persons who had been giving him opinions, and he gave me the name of a very worthy officer in the post office who had been consulted by some of the letter-carriers and to whom he gave his opinion. I sent for that gentleman and asked him to explain to me what occurred and he said that some of the letter-carriers asked him his opinion and he felt it his duty to tell them frankly that if he were in their position he would consider the Act an advantage to him and he would avail himself of its privilege. That is the extent to which he gave them advice, and he gave it to them at their request. It was a matter of perfect indifference to him whether they acted upon it or not. Some of them have asked to have an Act now passed extending the time so that they may come in under it. They are intelligent men, but it is just a question to my mind whether or not we should again open the Act and let them in. Some of them have been wanting me to do it, and I am inclined to do it, but I have not reached a conclusion. I am informed that there are requests from eighteen letter-carriers in Toronto and from twenty-two in Montreal asking that the Act be amended so as to enable them to avail themselves of the privilege.

Mr. CLARKE. Is the document containing these requests a confidential one ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I should not think so.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the minister bring it down when he is bringing the balance of the correspondence ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes. I shall do so on my supplementaries.

Mr. CLARKE. I understood the minister to say that he would bring it down tomorrow ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I expect to get through these estimates to-night.

Mr. CLARKE. Of course, I do not know about that.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Well, I think it is only reasonable, and there will be supplementataries.

Mr. CLARKE. The minister will bear testimony to the fact that I have been assisting him all evening to get his estimates through.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I would like to be saved from such assistance.

Mr. CLARKE. Has the minister received any memorials for increased remuneration from those letter-carriers who are in this new scheme ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I really do not know ; certainly I would not grant it.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the hon. gentleman bring down that correspondence along with the other communications he received, and the replies he sent to these communications ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not remember whether there is any correspondence on that point or not. If there are any applications I will bring them down ; I will bring the whole Post Office Department down.

Mr. BELL. There is a large item, amounting to about $30,000, for the supply and repair of mail bags. Is that work done by contract ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The mail bags are manufactured under contract. The contractor is a man named Carson, on Rideau street. The contract is for four years.

Mr. BELL. How are the repairs effected ?

Sir WILLAM MULOCK. An allowance per bag is made. Some bags are damaged more than others, and the allowance has to be averaged.

Mr. BOYD. Has the Postmaster General received a petition from the railway mail clerks of Manitoba and the Territories, asking for an increase in their allowances? I have a copy of a petition which I understand was presented to him. These men claim that increases have been made to postmasters and others, and they think they are entitled to some consideration in that respect. They are a body of men scattered all over Manitoba and the Territories, and possibly they have not the influence that others may have; but they are a most important body, and take the greatest risks in regard to their lives. Their petition, I think, should receive the earnest consideration of the minister. I would like to ask him what he has to say in regard to it?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. My deputy informs me that no such petition has been received.

Mr. BOYD. I have received a letter, dated Winnipeg, January 15, 1904, which says that at a largely attended meeting of the railway mail clerks it was unanimously decided to petition the Postmaster General for an increase. It is not very likely that such a letter would be sent to me if the petition had not been forwarded. I think the memory of the deputy minister is at fault.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have not only the evidence of the deputy, but that of the controller also. If such a petition had been received by the department, the secretary would have at once transmitted it to the controller. I certainly am not prepared to increase the allowances to the railway mail clerks at the present time. They are liberally treated, and they fully appreciate it. Some busybody amongst them may have agitated for something more, but I am not prepared to yield to demands of that kind at the present time.

Mr. BOYD. I do not know who these people may be, but here is the letter. I have not busied myself about the matter at all.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not allude to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BOYD. The railway mail clerks will know now what the answer of the minister is if they have not received it before. It is strange that this should be sent to me and no petition forwarded to the minister. I had probably better read the letter, so that it will go on 'Hansard':

Winnipeg, Man., Jan. 15, 1904.

Sir,—At a largely attended meeting of the Railway Mail Clerks Association of the Manitoba and Northwest Territories district, it was unanimously decided to petition the honourable the Postmaster General asking that he be pleased to increase the provisional allowance of the railway mail clerks of this district from $10 or 10 per cent as now given, to $15 per month.

As you are well aware, no doubt, the increase in the cost of living in this country has been very marked in the last year or two, so much so, that the clerks feel justified in asking for this increase.

The honourable the Postmaster General has been pleased to grant a like increase to the clerks in city post offices in Manitoba and British Columbia, and the railway mail clerks consider that if the post office clerks are entitled to an increased allowance, they are equally, if not more so, to the same increase owing to the greater cost of living on account of being absent from their homes so much.

We are taking the liberty of asking all the members of parliament in our district to give us their aid and support in this matter and trust that you may be pleased to use your influence with the Postmaster General in our behalf.

We are, sir,
Your humble servants,
The Railway Mail Clerks Association,
Manitoba and N.W.T. district.
J. G. NORRIS, President. CHAS. A. HISLOP, Secretary.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The reason I am not prepared to accede to any demands of the railway mail clerks at the present time is this. Last year parliament passed an Act very greatly benefiting the state of the railway mail clerks, and they fully understand and appreciate it. At the present time a railway mail clerk in Manitoba or the Northwest can go up to $1,200 a year, his mileage averages $500 a year, and he gets, in addition, an extra allowance of $120 a year, so that when he reaches the maximum he receives about $1,800 a year. The taxpayers have something to say on these questions, and I am not prepared to encourage every unreasonable demand for an increase. If it were shown that the men were not fairly remunerated, that would be another matter. The railway mail clerks are well remunerated, and they are I trust satisfied. There was one man who was a busybody, and made himself officious in trying to induce them to make further demands; but he was repudiated by the well-thinking men, some of whom published in the press their repudiation of his agitation. He came down here and called on me, and I pointed out to him what I thought was the unwise part he was playing. There was no desire on the part of the great body of the mail clerks for what he was trying to force upon them, and, in view of what had been done for them, his agitation for a further increase was very unseemly. I dare say he may have met some of these people and tried to organize them to pass some such resolution, and that letter was sent to my hon. friend; but, on reflection, they may have thought better of it. At any rate, their views on that occasion were never communicated to the department.

Mr. CLARKE. Has the minister not called in the services of the fair-wage officer to settle disputes of this kind?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have the parliament of Canada to aid me in that matter.

and I think we may depend on parliament being as wise as the fair-wage officer.

Mr. CLARKE. Then the services of that officer have not been called in ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not think parliament appointed him the adviser of this House.

Mr. CLARKE. I thought he might advise the hon. gentleman as to the rate of wages. Might I ask the Postmaster General what became of those automobiles which we used to see touring the streets of Toronto some years ago ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Some are worn out and some are still in use.

Mr. CLARKE. Are they abandoned altogether ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. We are going to abandon the system of automobiles when those in use become unfit for service.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What business will be taken up to-morrow ?

Mr. FIELDING. Supplementary estimates of this year for the Post Office Department and then the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understood last week from the Prime Minister that the papers in connection with the Alaskan boundary would be brought down or possibly he may have said they were in the hands of the printer.

Mr. FIELDING. That is my recollection.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Several weeks ago I inquired if there would be any objection to bringing down the instructions which were given the Joint High Commissioners as to their power to negotiate, and I understood from the First Minister that there would be no objection. Would my hon. friend remind the right hon. gentleman of his promise to bring these down ?

Mr. FIELDING. I shall remind the First Minister.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, June 29, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

DISMISSAL OF LORD DUNDONALD—ADDITIONAL PAPERS.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I beg to lay on the table of the House certain papers that were asked for by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), also my letter to Colonel Whitley, which was asked for by the leader of the opposition. It is a private letter, but I have obtained the consent of Colonel Whitley to lay it on the table.

QUESTIONS.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENSES ON GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Mr. POPE—by Mr. Monk—asked :

1. What were the receipts on the government system of railways for the current year up to the 31st of May last ?

2. What were the expenses of operation of the government system of railways for the current year up to the 31st of May last ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. The receipts on the government system of railways for the current year up to the 31st of May, 1904, were $6,009,766.15.

2. The expenses of operation on the government system of railways for the current year up to the 31st of May, 1904, were $6,665,071.26.

STANDARD PASSENGER TARIFFS.

Mr. MACLEAN—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. What railway companies have filed standard passenger tariffs, as required by section 264 of the Railway Act ?

2. Is any railway charging over three cents a mile passenger rate in Ontario, Quebec, or the maritime provinces ?

3. If so, what are these companies ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. I am informed by the Board of Railway Commissioners that the Dominion Atlantic Railway, the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway, the British Yukon Railway, the Klondyke Mines Railway, and the Tilsonburg, Lake Erie and Pacific Railway have filed standard passenger tariffs, as required by section 264 of the Railway Act. The board made an order, under section 311 of the Railway Act, extending the time for the filing of these tariffs until the 1st of November next.

2. There is no record or data in the possession of, or available to, the board or the Department of Railways and Canals which will enable the department to furnish the desired information.

3. No. 2 answers No. 3.

RATES OF PAY ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

1, What salary is paid per day to the day labourers who work on the Intercolonial Railway, between Metapedia and Montreal ?

2. Has their salary been increased ?

3. If so, when, and to what amount ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. Day labourers in the mechanical department of the Intercolonial Railway between Metapedia and Montreal are paid 13 cents an hour. Day labourers in the stores' department at Drummondville, Hadlow, Lévis, St. Charles and Rivière du Loup are paid $1.20 per day. Freight porters at Lévis, Rivière du Loup and Chaudière Junction are paid $1.40 per day. Porters at other stations are paid $1.30 per day and $1.35 per day. Regular line sectionmen are paid $1.40 a day. Yard sectionmen at Ste. Flavie, Rivière du Loup and Chaudière Junction are paid $1.50 per day. Extra trackmen and labourers in the track department are paid $1.20 per day and $1.30 per day. Extra labourers at Lévis, Hadlow, Chaudière Junction and on the Drummond line are paid from $1.30 to $1.40 and $1.50 per day.

2. Yes.

3. The wages of day labourers in the mechanical department were 12 and 13 cents an hour ; but since January last all have been paid 13 cents an hour. Previous to October, 1900, day labourers in the stores' department at Drummondville, Hadlow, Lévis and St. Charles were paid $1 per day, and at Rivière du Loup $1.05 a day. These have been increased to $1.20 per day. In May last the wages of freight porters at Lévis, Rivière du Loup and Chaudière Junction were increased from $1.20, $1.25 and $1.30 to $1.40 per day. The wages of porters at other stations were increased in May, 1903, from $1.20 and $1.25 to $1.30 and $1.35. The wages of regular line sectionmen were increased in November, 1903, from $1.30 to $1.40 per day. In the same month the wages of yard sectionmen were increased from $1.30 to $1.50 per day. The wages of extra trackmen and labourers in the track department were increased in October, 1900, from $1, $1.10 and $1.15 to $1.20 and some to $1.30 (since July, 1902). During February and March last the wages of the extra labourers at Lévis, Hadlow, Chaudière Junction and on the Drummond line were increased from $1.20 and $1.30 to $1.40 and $1.50.

THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION—PAPERS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition some time ago asked for the instructions to the Joint High Commission. I am sorry to say that the matter escaped my attention until it was brought to my attention this morning by the Minister of Finance. I beg to lay on the table now, protocol of the conferences at Washington in May, 1898, preliminary to the appointment of a joint commission for the adjustment of questions at issue between the United States and Great Britain in respect to the relations of the former with the Dominion of Canada.

DOMINION DAY ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. A. C. BELL. Is it the intention to adjourn to-morrow at six or sit up to later ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is a question as to which the government is in the hands of the House. If we could make reasonable progress, we might be induced to adjourn at six.

Mr. BELL. We made very good progress last night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, and if my hon. friends are in the same frame of mind, I do not know but that we might adjourn to-morrow at six.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY. Would the Prime Minister be able to say now when the correspondence in relation to the seizure of binder twine will be brought down ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and after my hon. friend put the question on a previous occasion, I wrote the department, and I understood that the papers were being prepared and would be brought down at an early day. I shall mention the matter again to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

TREADGOLD CONCESSION.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN. Is the rumour circulated in the press as to the cancellation of the Treadgold Concesion well founded ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is one result of our efforts last session.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If it pleases my hon. friend, he may think so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the right hon. gentleman have a copy of the Order in Council put on the table ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot see any objection and will state the request to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior.

SUPPLY—PUBLIC DOCUMENTS WITHHELD FROM PARLIAMENT.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move the following resolution :—

That this House regrets that the government has seen fit to withhold from parliament documents of a public character to which parliament was entitled for the proper consideration of the matters to which such documents relate.

In support of this resolution, it may be necessary for me to deal with several questions which have come before this House within the last couple of years. The first matter with which I shall deal, is a certain memorandum prepared last session by a gentleman who was then a member of the cabinet, but which was not given to parliament on the plea that it was a confidential document intended for the sole information of the government. A question then had come up, perhaps the most important this country has had to deal with for many years, the question of building a railway from the Pacific to the Atlantic. One of the members of the cabinet at the time differed from his colleagues with regard to the policy which ought to be adopted on that question. He prepared a document in which he set forth his views and gave that document to his colleagues. That document his colleagues treated as confidential, solely intended for themselves. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when a minister of the Crown resigns office because he cannot agree with his colleagues, on a question of policy this House is entitled to everything of a documentary character relating to that resignation. But my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, speaking on behalf of the government, took an entirely different view. He said that the document, in which his former colleague had stated his reasons for resigning, was confidential, intended only for the members of the government, and that any one who would make use of it so long as the seal of confidence was not removed, was just as guilty as the receiver of stolen goods. You all know the reference which the hon. gentleman then made to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I hope that the Finance Minister has learned better since then. I hope he has learned that a document of that kind—no matter what term you may apply to it, private or secret or anything else—is one which the people are entitled to have and which the government were bound to disclose to the people, irrespective of the consent of the sender. In a matter of that kind, the resignation of a minister of the Crown, the people have the right to be put in possession of all the reasons which led him to leave the cabinet. To speak of such a document as confidential is an abuse of the term. Why, Mr. Speaker, take any document which goes to the Privy Council and is printed solely for the members of that council, no matter whether the word 'confidential' be written on it or not, the secretary of the Privy Council marks it 'confidential' before sending it down to the printer, and that is done simply because there is a staff in that office, one of whose duties is to see that nothing leaks out of a confidential nature, and this precaution is simply taken in order to make sure that nothing will get to the public which ought not to be disclosed. The document in question, which was sent to the council by the minister who had resigned, and which contained his reasons for resigning, we are told forsooth had to be treated as confidential. Sir, it never was so treated. The evidence produced by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, when he discussed the matter before the House, proved conclusively that other parties had seen that document besides the members of the Privy Council—other parties who are supporters of the right hon. gentleman and his government. We had in the argument of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the ipsissima verba of the communication which was treated by the government as confidential. However, I shall deal again with that matter in my summing up.

The next document of any importance which was kept back from the House was the most peculiar one I have read for a long time, and I may be pardoned if I dwell a little upon it. This is the document. The letter is headed 'confidential,' and begins as follows :—

Montreal, Que., Nov. 3rd, 1902.

To the Right Honourable
Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G., P.C.,
Premier of the Dominion of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—Your petitioners desire to memorialize your government——

Hon. gentlemen will notice the peculiarity of this beginning. These gentlemen who are administering the affairs of the government assume powers belonging to the Governor General, Every petition relating to the government should be addressed to the Governor General ; and this petition shows that it is intended to be a petition to His Excellency and is sent for the consideration of his government.

—memorialize your government in regard to the construction of a first-class line of railway——

And so on. And it urges the desirability of this construction. And it proceeds :

2nd. That your petitioners propose, as soon as authorized by your government——

Fancy a petition addressed to the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in which the petitioners say that they propose to do certain things as soon as authorized by 'your' government.

—to undertake the construction of a line from North Bay, Ontario (or some other point north thereof, to be defined)——

And so on.

3rd. That your petitioners, therefore, ask that their application for authority to construct such a line of railway, to be called the 'Grand Trunk Pacific Railway' shall be granted.

4th. That your petitioners will be prepared immediately an agreement is entered into by the government——

And it goes on with the explanation and ends :

Your petitioners ask that your government will give the prayer of this petition their early and most earnest consideration.

It is no longer the government of His Majesty the King or of His Excellency the Governor General—the government of the present day it appears, is the government of the present leader. This House was considering perhaps the most important question that ever came before it, and had considered it at considerable length for two sessions, and it was the most important for the House to be in possession of this petition. It was rumoured that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had sent in a petition to the government for power to build a road for the usual subsidy. It was alleged in the House that that petition might be in existence. The government were asked again and again in this House if any documents of any kind relating to the subject were in possession of the government and not yet brought down, and the statement of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was that, without equivocation, every document had been brought down to the House. Why, did the hon. gentleman say so, when, for eighteen months, he and his government had been in possession of this document and must have considered it and forwarded it to His Excellency the Governor General with their observations upon it. An important state document such as this, a document such as, in any country in the world would not have been treated as private, secret or confidential, was withheld from the knowledge of this House and the statement was made that, without equivocation, all the papers on the subject had been brought down to the House. If there is a private, confidential or secret letter in the possession of the government, the duty of the government is to admit that fact to the House and give reasons why it should not be brought down. But, in view of the bold denial that any document of the kind existed, we can understand the astonishment of the House when the document itself was read, especially when it was read by the Finance Minister for the purpose of contradicting a statement that had been made by certain hon. members as to the Grand Trunk Railway, and still more when it was seen that this petition must have been communicated to some supporters of the government before it was communicated to the House, because those gentlemen could not have spoken so authoritatively on the subject unless they had been aware of the contents of this document.

Now, there is another document which is said to be of a secret and confidential character. We see by some remarks of Lord Dundonald and the statement he has published in the papers that there is an addendum to his first report, or a second report, which he wished to have published, The Minister of Militia states that the document is a private or confidential or secret one. In the House the other evening—and, perhaps, to this extent I may be permitted to refer to a past debate in support of the motion I am making—the Minister of Militia declared this to be a private document because the letter addressed to the General Officer Commanding to the minister and inclosing the report was marked 'private.' The hon. minister gave reasons for not bringing down the document when asked by my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) and also by my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). He said that the contents of this second report were of such a character that they should be kept secret. He said also that he had two or more reports on the same subject which differed from one another. He had a report from the Defence Committee as to how the country should be defended, and he had a report of the gentleman who preceded the late General Officer Commanding in that office, presenting another scheme. And, in the interest of the country, he said, these should be considered secret and confidential. Now, what are the duties of the General Officer Commanding? As he is an officer, one would suppose at first thought that it would be for him to judge whether the communication to the minister should be made public or not, and whether the discussion of the subject and the publication of his report would be an injury to this country or not. The General Officer Commanding requests the publication of the report and this the Minister of Militia refuses to allow. What right has the Minister of Militia to do that? If we were to judge from the discussion the other evening we must conclude the General Officer Commanding had no business to report and had no business to have a policy—that it was well enough for him to report when asked to do so, but that for him to have a policy would be sheer presumption. What are the powers of the General Officer Commanding? Those powers are defined by statute just as much as those of the Minister of Militia. And I wish to deal with that particularly as my view with regard to it differs from those of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The statutes of Canada provide for the appointment of the General Officer Commanding and assign his duties.

Remember that. The duties of the Commander in Chief are what? He is to look after the efficiency of the militia, he has charge of the distribution of the forces and everything of that kind, he had to look after the arms, stores, and everything else until the different branches, which were recently appointed, took charge of them. Even yet he is the superintendent of all of that work. The duties of the Minister of Militia are limited simply to the civil portion of the administration. There is the distinction which is drawn by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the same distinction as that which exists between the Commander in Chief in England and the Secretary of State for War. Every one who has studied constitutional history knows that before 1800 all power was vested in the King, as Commander in Chief, of distributing the militia, of seeing to its efficiency, of its control and equipment, of its sanitary arrangements, of providing barracks, providing ammunition, and everything pertaining to the militia force. All of that was in the hands of the King. Shortly before 1800, I believe, in 1799, the King divested himself of those powers and gave them to the Commander in Chief. From then up to 1870 there was a dual power in England. The civil portion of the military administration was managed by the Secretary of State for War, and the military department, including the equipment, discipline, and distribution of the forces, was left in the hands of the Commander in Chief. The Commander in Chief of the army in Canada has the same power as was possessed by the Commander in Chief in England at that date. The right hon. gentleman quotes Todd in support of his contention. He is perfectly right, but the error into which the Minister of Militia—I shall not say that the right hon. gentleman fell into it—is this ; he quoted some remarks of Lord Cardwell and some others as to the power above the military authorities. He forgot to say that by the Act of 1870 in England, the powers of the military were circumscribed and fixed at what they are at present, while there has been no alteration in our statute circumscribing the powers of the Commander in Chief. The Commander in Chief then had a right to report, and had a right to have a policy. No question of supremacy between the civil and military power is involved. Why should such a question arise ? The people of this country have all the power they like ; they can abolish the military altogether, and have no colonels, generals or anything else, but they chose to pass an Act of parliament which gives to the Commander in Chief certain powers and assigns certain powers to the Minister of Militia. The Commander in Chief was well within his powers when he made a report to his minister and when he assumed the sole direction and control of the appointment of officers to the militia, its discipline and everything pertaining to it. The Minister of Militia says that the powers of the Commander in Chief are subject to the approval of the Governor General in Council. His powers are not subject to the approval of the minister at all. The minister has no powers given him under the constitution or statute to interfere in any manner. When a General Officer Commanding makes a report to a Minister of the Crown, the General Officer of all men being in a position to judge whether the publication of that report would be injurious to the defence of the country and believing in fact that it would be to the benefit of the country's defence, he may justly complain at having his report suppressed by the minister. The minister refused to bring that report down to this House, to allow the House to judge between him and the Commander in Chief as to which of them is right. What has this House descended to ? It is worse than the description given by the right hon. leader of the government, of the downward trend of the Conservative party ; it has gone down, down, down. There is no longer a consultative body. It is no use submitting anything to parliament with such a government as we now have. If a petition is addressed to parliament for the purpose of righting a wrong, for the purpose of getting any benefit such for instance, as the building of a railway or a wharf, it is not necessary now to go to the fountain head for the initiation of the distribution of favours. The whole power is vested in the right hon. gentleman who leads the government. We have had an example of this in the petition of the Grand Trunk Railway.

However, in reference to the powers of the Commander in Chief let me read the authorities upon the subject. This is from the 'Law and Custom of the Constitution' by Anson.

This is in reference to England.

—a fourth Secretary of State was appointed for War, and to him were shortly assigned the duties of all the departments with which I have just dealt. In 1855 he was made Secretary at War as well as Secretary of State. Then the commissariat was transferred to the War Office then the Board of Ordnance disappeared and its duties were handed to the same department. . . . Thus the Secretary of State for War, assisted by a parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and a permanent staff, became directly responsible for the entire civil administration of the army. The commander in Chief still exercised an independent military control, but the Secretary of State was responsible to parliament for the exercise of this control.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAGGART. These are the whole duties of the minister.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAGGART. The whole of the power of the Minister of Militia, because our Act was passed and as Todd says, although there is no such limitation as is here stated, the King is made Commander in Chief of the army under the statute, the Governor General is made Commander in Chief under him, the duties of the Commander in Chief are assigned to him and the duties of the Minister of Militia are also enumerated. Upon that point let me tell the Minister of Militia to what the statute limits his duties.

There shall be a Minister of Militia and Defence who shall be charged with and be responsible for the administration of militia affairs, including all matters involving expenditure, and of the fortifications, gunboats, ordnance, ammunition, arms, armouries, stores, munitions and habilliments of war belonging to Canada.

The Minister of Militia and Defence shall have the initiative in all militia affairs involving the expenditure of money.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the last few words 'involving the expenditure of money' limits the powers of the Minister of Militia to the control of matters involving the expenditure of money or with regard to the expenditure of money ?

Mr. HAGGART. It is as plain as the English language can make it that you have no power except the initiative in all military affairs, involving the expenditure of money. It cannot be made plainer ; the words of the statute are as plain as it is possible to make them.

The Governor in Council shall, from time to time, make such orders as are necessary respecting the duties to be performed by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Here is another clause :

The Minister of Militia and Defence shall have the control and management and shall be charged with the maintenance and repair of military buildings, forts and fortifications.

Now I will read the powers of the Commander in Chief.

There shall be appointed an officer who holds the rank of colonel or a rank superior thereto in Her Majesty's regular army, who shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia, and who, while he holds such appointment, shall have the rank of major general in the militia.

His other powers are defined by the regulations which were passed on the 29th October, 1903, and which are as follows :

1. The General Officer Commanding shall be charged with the military command and discipline of the militia, shall issue general orders and hold periodical inspection of the militia

He shall be the principal adviser of the Minister of Militia and Defence on all military questions and shall be charged with the control of the branches of the adjutant general, the director general of military intelligence and military secretary, and the general supervision of the other military branches.

He shall be charged with the general distribution and localization of the militia, and with the selection and proposal to the Minister of Militia and Defence of fit and proper persons to be recommended for commissions in the militia, of fit and proper officers for promotion, for staff and other military appointments, and for military honours and rewards.

He shall be charged with the preparation and maintenance of plans for defence and for the organization and mobilization of the militia.

These are his powers as defined under the heading of 'Distribution of Duties.' I doubt very much if any regulation can limit the powers given under the statute. His powers are defined by the statute, and any regulations passed must be in line with the statute and simply for the purpose of elucidating his powers. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence and the right hon. Prime Minister fell into an error in regard to the position of the Commander in Chief. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence read some remarks of the right hon. Lord Cardwell in reference to the powers of the Secretary of State for War in relation to the Commander in Chief of the forces, and who was quoted as stating that the powers of the Commander in Chief and of all officers holding commissions in the army were subservient to the Secretary of State for War or the Secretary of State who was at the time in control of the army.

That is perfectly true in regard to the army in England at the present day, but the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence and the right hon. Prime Minister were in error in asserting that that is the law in this country at the present time. We have passed no such Act in this country as that which the British parliament passed in 1870. We have passed no Act limiting the powers of the Crown as to the command of the forces, or the powers of the Commander in Chief or altering the powers of the Minister of Militia and Defence. In England the civil power took control of the military power. We have not conceded anything in that direction in this country. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence also quoted some observations by the right hon. H. C. Childers who in 1870 was speaking in reference to an Act which had been passed some years before but whose remarks had no bearing on the situation in this country because we had not altered or amended our Act in this regard in Canada. We are in a position to alter or amend the Militia Act at any time. The people of Canada have all the necessary powers to do away with the militia altogether and discharge all the officers. The governing powers in this country are limited by the statute which we have passed. The Minister of Militia has his duties, the Commander in Chief has his duties and the Commander in Chief has the right to have a policy, has the right to make a report to the Minister of Militia and to this House and when he states that that report is intended for publication and invites honest criticism of it by the electors of the country its publication will surely tend more to the accomplishment of the object in view, the improvement of the defences of the country, than the suppression of the report which the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence says contemplates a scheme of defence which ought to be kept secret. Who is to judge of that ? The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence who has only a knowledge of civil affairs and who is the civil head of the department. Is the soldier who has passed all his life in learning what is necessary for the defence of the country not to be allowed to judge as to whether it should be published or not, or as to whether it should be secret or not ? The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence as the civil head of the department, refuses to let the people of this country judge as to who is right or who is wrong or as to what are the best means to adopt to improve the defences of the country. Has the parliament of Canada sunk to such a position that we are to be governed by the Governor in Council with secret and confidential communications ? Are we not to have these documents ? The principle is laid down as clearly as possible as to what is a private and confidential paper and I intend to deal with that question in a short time. Is it a private and confidential document that the Commander in Chief sends to his minister with the request to publish it ? Is the minister to be the sole judge of that ? Is the minister to be superior to the military authority in reference to that particular part of it ? Unfortunately the statute does not make the minister superior. The Governor General is superior, the Governor General may refuse to publish it but the minister has no power to suppress a report of that kind. Even upon consulting council the Governor General may refuse to carry out the wishes of the minister. The question arose the other day as to what authority is necessary to bring the subject for discussion before the Privy Council, as to whether it is necessary at all or not to have the signature of the minister. If the minister is absent from the town I do not think it is necessary that another minister shall act for him because I believe the deputy head may do it. Authority is very seldom given by Order in Council to a minister to act for another minister. I never knew of it. It may be done but I doubt very much if it is ever done. I think under the powers of appointing a deputy head, and the Commander in Chief may come within that category, he is given the power, in the absence of his minister to communicate directly with council in reference to any matter. The question I am coming to is this : The Commander in Chief makes a report. The minister states, for reasons which he thinks are best in the interest of the country, that the report should be suppressed. There is never a reason assigned except that a portion of the scheme of defence proposed by the Commander in Chief differed from the scheme of defence proposed by a commission of defence which was appointed some time ago.

If I understood the minister right, there was another proposition for defence submitted to him by a former General Officer Commanding, so that virtually he had three such plans before him. I can understand that the Defence Commission suggested the building of fortifications in certain portions of the country, and that they drew the attention of the government to the fact that certain parts of Canada were vulnerable ; that it would require so many men for defence and so on. Such information as that is of a secret and confidential character which should not be published, and whenever it is in the interests of the country that communications of that kind should be kept secret, the parliament of Canada never insists upon their publication. But, Sir, is the communication by Mr. Blair to his colleagues ' confidential ' ? is the petition of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for a subsidy to build a railroad a confidential document ? is the report of Lord Dundonald which he asks his minister to make public, a secret or confidential document ? No, Sir, these documents belong to the tax-payers of Canada. The principle that underlies secret and confidential documents is : no document from a public official to another public official shall be considered private and confidential, except under certain circumstances. The British ambassador representing the Court of St. James at St. Petersburg, or at any other foreign court communicates to his minister in the ordinary way an official report which is made public ; but these ambassadors also send secret and confidential reports which are not divulged. The reason is that if these latter were made public the representatives of Great Britain could not get the information which they contain. Time is often an essence in the quality of secretness ; a document which may be secret to-day may to-morrow be published without any breach of etiquette or confidence. The Governor General here communicates to the home authorities, and he no doubt also sends communications to the Secretary of the Colonies in which he writes private and confidential memoranda ; perhaps a description of the right hon. gentleman and his ability to govern this country, or a reference to the Minister of Finance, or to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sure he gives for the information of the home authorities his opinion upon all those gentlemen. To say the least, it would be inconvenient to publish in this connection what are rightfully and properly secret and confidential documents. When motions have been made in the parliament of Great Britain to produce confidential documents there never has been a denial that such papers existed ; it is admitted that such documents are in the possession of the government, but it is stated that they are private and confidential and cannot be brought down. And, Sir, if the motion were for papers, or extracts from papers, which could be brought down without doing injury to private individuals who furnished the information, or without affording comfort to the enemies of the nation, such a motion is always complied with. But in Canada all you have to do is to mark 'private' and 'confidential' upon a piece of paper, and then it suits the government to say it is secret. The document itself is an evidence as to whether it is private or confidential. In England, documents which have been marked 'secret,' 'private' or 'confidential' in reference to certain transactions, have been put upon the table of the Imperial House of Commons without the consent of the sender. No man has a right to send a document referring to the public business of the country to any minister, or to any public official and mark it 'private and confidential' expecting that it shall be treated as such if the minister and the government think differently. The receiver of such a document has the right to decide whether in the interests of the country it should or should not be given to the public. In the Post Office Department for instance, an inspector is sent around to report upon the qualifications, the honesty and the integrity of other officials, and his report to the head of the department should not be communicated to the public, because otherwise it would interfere with the proper discharge of the inspectors duty. But when a document marked 'confidential or private, bears upon its face the evidence that the public should know its contents, then the government should at once lay such a document before parliament. Again, where a letter marked 'private' or 'confidential' is published or made use of by a minister, and it refers to other letters also marked 'private' or 'confidential' the rule in Great Britain is, and it is the rule that should prevail here, that parliament is entitled to have all these letters produced. Let me quote from this published corespondence with reference to the dismissal of Lord Dundonald. Under date of May 19th, I find the following report to His Excellency the Governor in Council:

> The undersigned has the honour to recommend for your Excellency's approval the attached draft of a general order containing appointments and promotions, 13th Scotch Light Dragoons, the same having been recommended by the General Officer Commanding.

Mark you; that is dated May 19th. We have the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that that letter was put upon his desk upon the 20th and that he did not receive it until then. Here is the letter:

> Ottawa, 1 p.m., May 19, 1904.
> Dear Mr. Fisher,—As arranged with you this morning, a new list of recommendations has been made out and is now in the hands of the Deputy Minister of Militia, and I trust you will see it goes through Council to-day.
> The recommendation re Dr. Pickel is included, to be dealt with by you.
> The papers re quartermaster, paymaster and Mr. C. Miltimore will go to Council later, the recommendations being in the hands of District Officer Commanding No. 6, in the case of the two former, and the latter I handed personally to the adjutant-general.
> I return herein, memo. you gave me this a.m., as you may require it.
> Will meet you at 3 p.m., at the House, as agreed.

You will notice that this letter is dated on May 19, and that on May 19 at 3 o'clock he is to meet his minister at the House of Commons. The afternoon train for Montreal starts, I suppose, at 4.10. Colonel Smart goes to Montreal that afternoon, arriving there, I suppose, at 7 o'clock. Fortunately he is able to meet Colonel Whitley there. They telephone to Dr. Pickel the same evening and get his consent to withdraw from this regiment. The consent is sent in a letter, which reaches Mr. Fisher before the document was placed on his desk which he says was sent to him on the 19th and did not reach him until the 20th. He is enabled then to go to Council with the consent of Dr. Pickel to have his name removed. What are the facts? The Minister of Agriculture admits that on the 19th he met Colonel Smart and that Colonel Smart consented to the withdrawal of Dr. Pickel. He started that evening by train for Montreal, and by a lot of fortuitous circumstances he met Colonel Whitley. The presumption is that he telegraphed to Colonel Whitley to meet him on his arrival. They telephoned to Dr. Pickel to get his consent, they wrote a letter that night and it reached the minister the next morning, to assist the minister in passing the Order in Council. To say the least of it, the agility displayed by the Minister of Agriculture, and the smartness, quickness and celerity of his motions, fully fit him for an office in the light cavalry of the 13th Dragoons.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Colonel Smart was helping him, so that there was a good deal of smartness about it.

Mr. HAGGART. Look at the gravity of the whole affair. The Commander in Chief signed an order on the 18th. The minister sends it back to him and says the whole list is passed except that part of it which refers to the 13th Dragoons. He is asked to make out another. He signs another on the 19th. Poor, innocent Commander in Chief—he thought he had the authority of the minister behind him; at least he says so. He thought his minister was a consenting party to it. In the meantime Colonel Smart is up here on a visit to the Minister of Agriculture. Is he conspiring with the Commander in Chief for the purpose of getting a change in the officers of the 13th Light Dragoons? No, he conspires with the Minister of Agriculture. He promises to get authority from Dr. Pickel to remove his name; he goes down to Montreal and gets Dr. Pickel's consent. Consider the whole matter. The Minister of Militia found fault with Colonel Waugh, the commander of the district. He is the only officer besides the Commander in Chief who comes respectably out of this affair. Fancy an officer under the Commander in Chief sending a recommendation to him and then coming up to the Minister of Agriculture for the purpose of arranging a different set of officers. Where is there an officer or a gentleman worthy of the name who would consent to any such actions as that—two of his inferior officers conspiring with a man who had no business at all to take any part in the matter, but who was the actual power in the country, for the purpose of changing his recommendations without his knowledge. A more disgraceful affair never occurred in military matters, except the one we mentioned here the other day with reference to Colonel Gregory. Colonel Gregory an officer of the force, comes down and sees the Commander in Chief and gets his consent to the extension of his term for a couple of years. He speaks to him with regard to the appointment of Major Glasgow. The Commander in Chief agrees with him in reference to Major Glasgow not having the qualifications at the time, but that he may get the qualifications and get the appointment—an officer sent from where? Colonel Otter, the officer commanding the district, is sent to Colonel Gregory and tells him: For your own peace and in the interest of the regiment you ought to appoint Major Glasgow to the position. Colonel Gregory alleges that he had Colonel Otter's statement that Major Glasgow was not qualified and that he ought not to appoint him. Colonel Gregory could not understand it. He said: Why, I have been talking to the Commander in Chief, and he says my time shall be extended for two years; and he approves of my conduct with reference to the appointment of the major. But I have been, says Colonel Otter, in communication with a party who has more power than the Commander in Chief. Fancy an officer commanding a district doing that.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Will my hon. friend give the evidence of that?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes. I saw the published statement of Colonel Gregory.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Oh.

Mr. HAGGART. Do you deny it?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The published statement that Colonel Otter made use of in the remarks you say?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. You are both talking at once. We cannot hear you.

Mr. HAGGART.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I was not talking to the hon. gentleman. I was talking to his superior.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I want to tell the minister that he is talking to the House of Commons, not to any individual. I do not want any of his impudence.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I know that my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) does not wish to misrepresent. I do not believe that Colonel Otter could have made any such statement. I would like to see the evidence of it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Might I ask the government a question? As Colonel Gregory's case will undoubtedly be discussed in the House of Commons before the end of this session, and as the government has the power to put on the table of this House all the correspondence between Colonel Otter and Colonel Gregory as well as between the department and those officers, will the government at the earliest possible moment see that that correspondence is placed on the table of the House?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. There is no objection to that whatever.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. And might I ask further that all verbal or oral directions given to Colonel Otter by the Minister of Militia be placed on the table?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. They were not taken down by phonograph, so far as I know.

Mr. HAGGART. All I can say is that these are the statements in the letter purported to have been written by Colonel Gregory. I hope they are not true. I hope, for the honour of the militia officers of this country, that no militia officer would ever be found to have done what is alleged to have been done by these gentlemen with reference to their Commander in Chief. Sir, there is no superior military officer in this country to the Commander in Chief. Those regulations regarding public letters and public criticisms of superior officers, which were read in the House the other day, are regulations of military discipline which apply to the relations of military men among themselves, and have nothing to do with the civil service of the country. There is no civil servant in this country who outranks any military officer, because each branch is separate and distinct from the other, and there is no military officer who is bound by the regulations of the civil service. But just fancy two officers wearing His Majesty's uniform—one commanding a district, Colonel Whitley, and the other expecting to command a cavalry corps—coming to the Minister of Agriculture and making arrangements with him—without the knowledge and behind the back of the Commander in Chief—for the appointing of officers to the force. No gentleman occupying the position of Commander in Chief would submit to any such slight. He would not be fit for the position if he did not take the first opportunity to resent it. And what are we to think of the conduct of the Minister of Agriculture ? I am not denying him the right to advise his colleague the Minister of Militia regarding the appointments in any manner he likes. I am not denying his right to discuss these appointments in Council in any way he likes. But I am discussing the position of the Commander in Chief, who saw an important order—an order for the formation of a cavalry corps—held up for two or three months by the Minister of Agriculture in order that he might have opportunity to use his political influence and have some two or three appointments made in that corps to suit himself. Such a thing never occurred in this country before, and I hope never will again. I say let that officer be dismissed who would go to the Minister of Militia, or any other member of the government, without the knowledge of his Commander in Chief, and for the purpose of setting at naught the instructions or orders which the commander deemed necessary for the discipline and good government of this country's militia. What justification was there for the interference of the Minister of Agriculture ? The First Minister pleads that he was acquainted with that section of the country and that the Commander in Chief ought to have been glad to get his assistance. But, Sir, he never spoke to the Commander in Chief. He went instead to his subordinates. He hung up the 'Gazette,' and kept it hung up a couple of months, in order that he might cabal with Colonels Smart and Whitley for the purpose of having his own nominees appointed.

We have a new doctrine expounded in the Order in Council dismissing Lord Dundonald. We have the doctrine laid down that each district in the country should be under the direction of the particular minister who hails from it. I am not denying that the minister of any department has the right to consult any one of his colleagues from any particular section of the country, which may be affected by any particular measure. But that is quite another thing from laying down the principle in an Order in Council that the minister who represents any particular district should have the control of everything affecting that district, no matter whether it has to do with his own department or not. Just see the absurdity of the thing. Here we have the Minister of Agriculture acting likewise as Minister of Militia for the district from which he comes. He is also, no doubt, to be Minister of Public Works, and Minister of Railways, and Minister of Justice for that section of country. And in like manner every other minister in the cabinet is to be Minister of Agriculture for the particular section to which he belongs. What an anomaly ! Here is a new definition of the rights and powers of the ministers laid down in this famous Order in Council. Let us push this doctrine to its logical conclusion. A portion of Nova Scotia is represented by the Minister of Militia and another portion by the Minister of Finance. Then the Minister of Militia can only have control of his department in that particular part of Nova Scotia which he represents. In the other portion, represented by the Minister of Finance, all militia matters must come under the jurisdiction of that hon. gentleman. And so on, with every other province and district in the country. It may be all very well for hon. gentlemen to make an argument of that kind in the House when they find themselves in a desperate strait and do not know how to escape, but to lay it down in an Order in Council is something I cannot understand.

However, let us come down to particular facts. Here is a letter which I shall read :

> Dear Colonel Whitley,—I have not had an opportunity to reply to your letters of the 14th and 15th May earlier, but yesterday I had an interview with Colonel Smart, at which I think all arrangements were satisfactorily made to push along the establishment of the 13th Hussars.

But where are the two letters of the 14th and 15th May, to which this purports to be a reply ? These the minister deliberately refused to bring down. He says that they were marked 'private' and 'confidential,' and that he sent them back to Colonel Whitley to do with them what he pleased. We have the reply, but the hon. minister refuses to give to the House the letters which brought forth that reply. I submit that these letters, which were written by a colonel commanding a district to a member of the government, are essentially public documents. I suppose the Commander in Chief never saw them. But, from whatever point of view they are considered, these letters must be regarded as official letters, and, that being so, the House is entitled to them. If we are refused them, the government must bear the responsibility of that refusal. On that subject let me read a remark of Mr. Disraeli, as reported at page 1182 of the Parliamentary Debates of 1860 :

> What I said was this, that no minister should lay papers on the table of the House referring to private letters without producing them, if they relate, of course, to public affairs.

This is the limitation. Here are two letters that, from the tone of the reply evidently relate to the appointment of some officers of the 13th Light Dragoons. And the government refuses to lay them on the table of the House. The rule is laid down clearly in Todd :

> The rule which forbids any encroachment by parliament upon the executive authority of the Crown has a further application, to which our attention must now be directed. It is imperative that parliament shall be duly informed of everything that may be necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government in any part of the empire ; and the fullest information is communicated by government to both Houses, from time to time, upon all matters of public concern. For it is in parliament that authoritative statements are made, or information given by ministers, upon public questions ; and no action in parliament should be based upon declarations of policy made elsewhere. Sometimes a statement, by the minister who is specially responsible, is made in one House and not repeated in the other.

Considerations of public policy and a due regard to the interests of the state, occasionally demand, however, that information sought for by members of the legislature should be withheld at the discretion and upon the general responsibility of ministers. This principle is systematically recognized in all parliamentary transactions : were it otherwise, it would be impossible to carry on the government with safety and honour. Whenever it is declared by the responsible servants of the Crown, that any information sought for in parliament could not be supplied without inconvenience to the public service, or for other sufficient reasons, the House refrains from insisting upon its production.

And if the government object to produce any documents, on the ground that they are of a private and confidential description, it is not usual to insist upon their being furnished, except under peculiar and imperative circumstances.

But it must always be remembered that all public transactions of state are necessarily official ; and that no public officer would be justified in withholding from official record and access, any document, emanating from himself in his official capacity, in relation to public affairs.

So, it is as clear as possible what should be considered as a private, confidential and secret document. No document printed by a minister of the Crown who parts from his colleagues explaining why he differed from them on so important a question as the construction of a main line of transportation across the country can be considered a secret document. Nor can there be any justification for refusing to put the House in possession of a petition which is evidently intended for the Governor General, and which proposes a method of building a railway concerning which the people are exercised to a greater extent than they ever were before by the proposed construction of a public work. Yet these hon. gentlemen opposite concealed from the House for eighteen months the fact that this document was in existence, a document in the form of a petition, and formally praying in two or three places, and especially in the concluding part of it, that the government will take their petition into serious and favourable consideration. This, we are told, is to be treated as a confidential document, as one concerning which the people must not be informed, when they are considering the most important question that has been before then for years. According to any reasonable theory of responsible government, the government is a committee of parliament, with parliament as a consultative body. And, on every occasion parliament should be given the fullest information on everything that they are called upon to decide. But now, we, who at one time were 'democrats to the hilt' have adopted what was alleged to be the old Tory practice of government by council, and keeping from the people information which they are entitled to—everything to be done under the cloak of 'private' and 'confidential,' and parliament to be given, for assistance of its deliberations, not such information as is necessary to the interest of the country but such as is deemed advisable in the interest of the government. We are told that the Conservative party, the great party of the past, is on the downward grade at the present day. How do you dare to accuse the Conservative party of taking a downward course ? And does not such an accusation come well from the party that never yet in power kept a pledge that it had made in opposition ? What charge of that kind can be made against the Conservative party ? None ; they have at least retained their honour. And better it would be to remain in opposition for centuries than to obtain power by false promises and retain it without carrying out a single promise made in opposition. These gentlemen accuse us of being on the downward course. It reminds me of the famous answer of Cicero : Clodius me accusat. This accusation that the Conservative party is moving downward comes from a party steeped in degradation—for there is no greater degradation than that of the man who says one thing and does another, who promises one thing and performs another, charging us with going downwards ! You may strain the English language, you may get the hon. member for Hants to give a meaning to a word which it does not bear and immediately after listening to it state that you did not intend to do it, that you intended to use another word. The hon. gentleman may refer to authority after authority in support of it but his argument reached its sublimity when he told us of the Englishman going up to Scotland and being called a stranger on his arrival. The right hon. gentleman quoted Sir Walter Scott in support of his version of the meaning of 'stranger.' He little understands Sir Walter Scott, he little understood what Sir Walter Scott was writing about in reference to the Highlands of Scotland. Sir Walter Scott knew the Highland character well. An Englishman although newly arrived there, was an Englishman, a foreigner, an enemy, a Sassenach. The most contemptuous manner in which he could speak of an Englishman on his arrival there was to call him a stranger. I thought when the right hon. gentleman quoted Sir Walter Scott that he was going to cite to us the lines which we all remember learning when we were boys, the description of the battle of the Saxon and the Gael where the Highlandman concludes by presenting his sword to Fitz James, clasping it to his breast and saying :

Stranger, I am Roderick Dhu.

The right hon. gentleman may be right in the meaning he attaches to the word, and in quoting Sir Walter Scott. We do not win elections by matters of that kind, but the right hon. gentleman must remember that on a celebrated occasion when Sir Charles Tupper made a slip in reference to the right hon. gentleman in a speech delivered, I think in Winnipeg, and which he afterwards tried to explain, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) held him firmly to the words which he uttered at that time. If the right hon. gentleman holds others to their words——

Mr. McCOLL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Is he not mistaken in his reference to Fitz James and Roderick Dhu. Are not the closing words :

These are Clan Alpine's warriors true ;
And,—Saxon,—I am Roderick Dhu.

Not 'stranger.'

Mr. FOWLER. It is all the same.

Mr. HAGGART. It is all the same. It is 'stranger' in my edition. I was dealing with the question with which the hon. gentleman was dealing the other evening. We will give him all the hope he wants in reference to that expression. I suppose we must take it for granted that the right hon. gentleman was thinking in one language and speaking in another and that he had difficulty in expressing his thoughts, and we are willing to accept his explanation that he did not mean the word he used. Both of them were offensive enough, goodness knows. As I said he must expect very little quarter ; we are at war with the right hon. gentleman and it is not war to let him out of his difficulties as easily as he expects to be let out. He did not let us out whenever an opportunity presented itself, and when Sir Charles Tupper made a slip you heard of it from Quebec to the Pacific ocean. Sir Charles Tupper on one occasion called the right hon. gentleman, a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic and said 'can you not expect more from me, a Protestant, in dealing with separate schools, than from a gentleman who is French and a Roman Catholic.' We caught it for that, from one end of the country to the other. The right hon. gentleman made the best use of it he could and he must expect in the war which we are carrying on with him that we will take every means to remove him from power. Instead of the Conservative party going down, down, down, the right hon. gentleman and his party are going down, down, downwards. A few weeks from now there will not be the cheering that we heard from the seats behind the hon. gentleman ; there will be a different tone. I much mistake the sentiment of this country at the present moment, or the time has come when these gentlemen who have been false and recreant to every promise they made to the people of this country when they had an opportunity of carrying out these promises will be repudiated by the people of the country who will become sick and tired of their extravagance, the false promises and the neglect to avail themselves of opportunities which presented themselves. When the opportunity arrives for an expression of public opinion I much mistake the sentiment of the country, I much mistake the sentiment of my countrymen who are the backbone of the country which party the hon. gentleman leads, I mean the Scotchmen of the country if they do not repudiate the hon. gentleman. Above all things the Scotchmen are true to the empire, above all things they are true to a man of honour ; they are true to the man who they think has stood up for their rights and who has been unjustly deprived of a position from no neglect or indifference on his part but simply on a question of etiquette between himself and the Minister of Agriculture.

I have been a member of this House for a number of years and I have never seen such treatment given to the House by the government in reference to the production of papers as we have had for the last two or three years. I regret the tone of this debate, I regret it because the ministers who manage the affairs of the country are responsible for it. I regret the tone of the debates in this House and I should like to see a higher standard. The ministry should keep the debates strictly within reasonable bounds ; they are responsible for the good conduct and honour of the House. I regret the cheapening effects which have ensued since these hon. gentlemen came into power and I hope for a better state of affairs.

I shall conclude my remarks by saying that I think I have proved up to the hilt that this House has been denied papers to which it has been entitled and which were necessary for the proper consideration of the subjects under discussion, and which do not come under the category of private, secret and confidential. These were papers to which the House is entitled, and it is our duty—because the privileges and rights of this House are the foundations of the liberties of the people of this country, to speak up and insist on every right which they possess. Where the publication of a document does no injury to the individual privately, where it exposes no one to contumely, does no injury to the country by exposing some of its weakness in defence, but on the contrary would furnish information which might be to the benefit of the country, it then is the duty of the government to ask a grand inquest of the people, to trust in them, to consult with them and to give them all the information which is necessary for the proper consideration of the subject in hand.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) upon many of the questions which he has brought to the attention of—not to the attention of—but before the House, which have little if any relevancy to his motion. The subject might be a tempting one, but on the whole, I think it better, in view of the hope that he has expressed that the tone of this debate shall be higher than it has been in some debates of the past, that I should not attempt to follow everything that he has said. I will confine myself strictly to the object of this motion. Let me make one remark now to my hon. friend. He says that I cannot expect any quarter from his side of the House. Let me tell him that I never asked for any quarter, nor do I ask for any now. Provided the war is carried on, as it must be carried on, in the political sense, I mean, by honourable methods, I have nothing to complain of.

I will come at once to what is the object of the motion of my hon. friend. It is that the House shall censure the government for not having communicated to it certain information which was in its archives. My hon. friend confined his ground of attack to three different documents, that is to say, to the memorandum which Mr. Blair prepared upon the transportation question when he was a member of the government, to a certain letter addressed by Mr. Hays to the government upon the subject of the building of a transcontinental railway, and to the report of Lord Dundonald addressed by him to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden). In regard to the first one of these documents the memo. prepared by Mr. Blair some two years ago, while he was a member of the government, upon the question of transportation generally, if I understood my hon. friend aright, he stated that this document should have been placed in the hands of the House. First of all since my hon. friend has referred to the fact that the tone of the debate is not as high as it was at one time, let me ask him : How does he know that Mr. Blair ever prepared any such document as that ? If he knows of it, it is not because he has had any information from us.

Mr. HAGGART. Because the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and other members of your own government have admitted it.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) is wrong. The Minister of Finance made no such admission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As far as my memory serves me, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance never alluded to that document at all, but that document found its way into this House in a manner which still remains unexplained ; at all events it did not come to the knowledge of the House in a manner that is consistent with the honour or forms of parliamentary debate, if we are able to keep up the dignity of debate which my hon. friend appears so anxious to do. The fact has gone abroad, it is a matter of public knowledge that Mr. Blair, when a member of this government offered to his colleagues a memo. on the subject of transportation. My hon. friend is an old parliamentarian, he has been many years in this House, he has been for several years a member of the government, and adviser of the Crown, and he knows that all communications of that character are strictly secret and confidential and that it is not in the power of any member of the administration to give out or discuss the contents of that document outside of the cabinet itself. It is true that Mr. Blair differed from his colleagues on the question of transportation. As a result of the dissent of Mr. Blair upon that question, he thought it advisable to withdraw from the government, and to place his resignation in the hands of His Excellency the Governor General. When he had placed his resignation in the hands of the Governor General, it was not only his duty, but it was his right and his privilege to give to the House all the information which he thought himself entitled to give in regard to the disagreement that had taken place between himself and his colleagues. He could not do so until he had obtained the permission and leave of the Governor General, leave which, under such circumstances is always given as a matter of course. When Mr. Blair took the view which he finally carried out of withdrawing from the government, he obtained from the Governor General permission to state to the House the causes of his disagreement which had led to the severing of his connection with his colleagues. He obtained upon that occasion leave to communicate to the House all the information which in his judgment was necessary and advisable to place the House in possession of the points of difference between him and his colleagues. Mr. Blair made his statement before the House, but Mr. Blair did not think it advisable to ask the Governor General for permission to lay that document before the House. If Mr. Blair had thought it advisable for his own protection and for the proper understanding of his position before the country to ask His Excellency the Governor General for permission to place that document before the House, there is no doubt whatever that His Excellency would have given that permission, since, in justification to Mr. Blair himself who was the best judge of that matter, he thought the production of such a document to be essential to his defence. But Mr. Blair did not think it advisable; he thought this communication which he had laid before his colleagues should remain what it was then and what it has been since—purely confidential, and under such circumstances, I say that I am still at a loss to understand upon what ground the House can ask for the production of that document as a public one. There can be no possible doubt as to that and upon this point, I think it is sufficient to make these observations to satisfy the House that the position of my hon. friend is absolutely untenable.

My hon. friend has mentioned another document—the letter of Mr. Hays, addressed to me personally as the head of the government, upon the question of building another transcontinental railway. We had a discussion upon this subject some time ago, and if my hon. friend will permit me to say so without offence, I think he will agree with me that he has not added anything to the light which was thrown upon the subject by the observations he has made to-day.

Therefore, as my hon. friend has adduced no new argument upon this point, I will pass away from it without any further comment.

Then, my hon. friend came to the report of Lord Dundonald. I followed my hon. friend very closely upon that, especially when he made the statement in the early part of his remarks that he would give chapter and book which would conclusively show that a document of that character was in its nature a document which should have been made public immediately it had been placed in the hands of the Minister of Militia. My hon. friend spoke with greater emphasis as to the knowledge which he had upon this point, than the speech which he delivered warranted. I followed him very closely. I claim to have some little familiarity with the subject. I thought I had read all the books that it was possible to read upon it. I thought perhaps something had escaped my attention, and I was anxious to know what new authority my hon. friend could give to the House. But the only quotation which the hon. gentleman made was from Todd, a quotation with which we have been made familiar during the present session. If my hon. friend however will study Todd a little further, he will find that he has omitted from his speech the reference in which Todd applies directly to the case in hand. The question is, whether reports of this character are confidential or not. I have looked into the statutes to find what ought be the character of the reports which the heads of departments should present to parliament. The language of the statute with regard to the Minister of Militia is the least satisfactory of all, because it simply says in section 126 of the Militia Act.

> All regulations made under this Act, and an annual report of the state of the militia, shall be laid before parliament by the Minister of Militia and Defence within the first thirty days of the then next session thereof.

Mr. HAGGART. I intended to quote that: I forgot it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am very glad to be able to complete the speech of my hon. friend, but if he had quoted it, I suppose he would have sat down immediately, because there would be no further reason to go on with his speech. Since we agree on this point, let me read it again for the information of my hon. friend, and in order to refresh my own memory.

> All regulations made under this Act and an annual report of the state of the militia shall be laid before parliament by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

The minister is bound to make a report upon the actual state of the militia, and nothing else. If he receives a plan from the Commander in Chief, or if he receives any proposed or suggested policy, there is no injunction on him to bring such before the House. The law says that his report must be confined strictly to what is the actual state of the militia. Let us see what information the other ministers are obliged to impart to the House. Section 6 of the Act with regard to the Department of the Interior says:

> The Minister of the Interior shall annually lay before parliament within fifteen days after the meeting thereof, a report of the proceedings, transactions and affairs of the department, during the year then next preceding.

There also, the Minister of the Interior is enjoined;—not to place before parliament what he contemplates; not to place before parliament a statement as to what he may have in view for the future, but simply a statement of the transactions which have taken place during the year. Section 7 of the Act dealing with the Department of Marine and Fisheries says:

> The minister shall make and submit to the Governor General an annual report on all the works under his control, to be laid before both Houses of parliament within fifteen days from the commencement of each session, showing the state of each work, and the amount received and expended in respect thereof, with such further information as is requisite.

Here again the minister is enjoined only to acquaint parliament as to what he has done during the year. Section 6 of the Act dealing with the Secretary of State's Department says:

The Secretary of State shall annually lay before parliament within ten days of the meeting thereof a report of the proceedings, transactions and affairs of the department during the year then next preceding.

Dealing with the Department of Inland Revenue, the Act says :

The Minister of Inland Revenue shall annually make to the Governor General, to be laid before parliament within fifteen days after the meeting thereof, a report and statement of the transactions and the affairs of the department during the year then next preceding.

Probably the most minute of all the departmental reports is that of the Post Office Department, and under the Act the Postmaster General is directed that he :

Shall annually make to the Governor General so that they may be laid before parliament within ten days after the meeting thereof, in each section the following reports which shall be made up to the 30th day of June then next preceding ; that is to say : general accounts current, what to contain and show : payments for mail transport in detail ; salaries, &c., in detail ; incidental expenditure in detail ; cases of loss or abstraction of money letters ; money order offices ; cost of money order system ; losses under money order system ; dead letters ; post office savings bank transactions, &c.

I have merely read the summarized side lines as to what is to be done by the Postmaster General under these different headings.

It will therefore be seen that the only injunction laid upon the heads of the different departments, is that they are directed to make a report for the information of parliament as to what has been the transactions of their departments for the past year. But, my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) goes further and he says, that we should not only have information on what has been done, but that even the intentions of the ministers, the policy which they contemplate, the views they may entertain, and the views and the policy as to which they may have been advised, should all be laid before parliament. Well, if the suggestion of my hon. friend were followed, it would be a great calamity in the management of the public affairs of this country. For instance, it would not be conducive to the best interest of the country to have the plans submitted to the Minister of Militia for the defence of the country, laid before parliament. I saw it stated somewhere recently, that parliament should be placed in possession of even the report prepared some years ago with regard to the defences of Canada. Of course, no one would pretend seriously that a secret report as to what ought be done for the defence of Canada should be made public. If that were done we might just as well give away the whole of our preparations in that direction. There is no more reason why we should make public any plan suggested by the General Officer Commanding even if we did not approve of it. If such documents were made public, they would become the subject of wrangle between party and party—wrangle is not the proper word to use—but they would become a matter of dispute and contention between parties holding views on one side and the other. That would not be conducive to the best interests of Canada. It is far better that such a matter should be left between the minister and his military officer, and that when a policy has been agreed upon then it should be discussed by parliament. If the policy suggested to the minister by his adviser should be made public so that it might become the bone of contention between contending parties, then in my opinion the value of our militia force would be greatly impaired. My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) was good enough to state, that such documents as the reports of ambassadors from foreign courts should not be presented to parliament. I agree with him that the diplomatic reports from ambassadors at Paris, St. Petersburg, Berlin, Washington, or other foreign court, should be kept secret. The reason for that is obvious ? All the authorities agree that such reports should be kept secret, until such time has elapsed that they have no value except as a matter of history ; but so long as the question to which they relate are live issues, they must be kept sacredly guarded in the archives of the government to which they are addressed. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) admits that diplomatic correspondence should be kept secret, is not the reason at least just as strong, why military correspondence should be kept secret and sacred in the archives of the department to which it is addressed ?

My hon. friend stated otherwise, however. As to that, it is a matter of opinion which I have only to leave to the appreciation of the House. All the authorities—I need not repeat those which I gave to the House the other day—are exactly contrary to the views entertained by my hon. friend. But my hon. friend went further to-day. He said that private letters should be laid on the table of the House and given to the public. Well, Sir, upon this point, let me for the information of my hon. friend, quote the standard book on this subject—'May on Parliamentary Practice.'

Returns may be moved for, either by order or address, relating to any public matters, in which the House or the Crown has jurisdiction. They may be obtained from all public offices, and from corporations, bodies, or officers constituted for public purposes, by Acts of parliament or otherwise ; but not from private associations, such as Lloyd's, for example, nor from individuals not exercising public functions. The papers and correspondence sought from government departments should be of a public and official character, and not private or confidential. The opinions of the law officers of the Crown, given for the guidance of ministers, in any question of diplomacy or state policy, being included in the latter class, have generally been withheld from parliament.

If the opinions given by the law officers of the Crown for the guidance of the government have generally been withheld from parliament, and regarded as privileged and confidential, with what greater reason should not this same rule apply to the opinions of the military experts and advisers of the Crown ? May goes on to say :

In 1858, however, this rule was, under peculiar and exceptional circumstances, departed from, and the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, in regard to the case of the Cagliari, were laid before parliament. In 1871, in the select committee on the Thames Embankment, a case submitted to the law officers being required, it was objected that the production of such a document was unusual ; but as it appeared that their opinion upon the case had already been laid before the House, the objection was withdrawn, and the case was produced before the committee.

But however ample the power of each House to enforce the production of papers, a sufficient cause must be shown for the exercise of that power ; and if considerations of public policy can be urged against a motion for papers, it is either withdrawn, or otherwise dealt with according to the judgment of the House.

That is to say, it should not be simply an arbitrary request for the gratification of an idle curiosity, or a curiosity of any kind; but a sufficient reason must be given to the House why the papers in the archives of the government should be given to the public, and the public interest must be shown. My hon. friend has brought to the attention of the House such extraordinary theories to-day that I am not surprised that on minor points he should have erred as he has. If I understood the speech of my hon. friend aright, he has laid down the doctrine that under the law as it is to-day there are in the Militia Department two authorities, the civil authority and the military authority ; that the civil authority has certain functions to perform, and the military authority certain functions ; that the military authority is quite independent of the civil authority—that it is not dependent upon it. Well, I take the most complete issue with my hon. friend on this point. I say that the law of Canada to-day is the same as the law of England on this subject, that is, that the military authority is subject to the civil authority. The point is no longer debatable ; I will not for my part debate it, but will leave it to the judgment of the House. But I understand from the assent which was given to the words I used a moment ago that I have stated correctly the views of my hon. friend. I say I will not discuss that question. We are not called on to-day, in the year 1904, to discuss a question like that before the Canadian people. The position of this government on that point was laid down more than three years ago—because this is not the first time we have had a disagreement with our military expert. In 1900, Colonel Prior, then a member of this House, put the following question in this House with regard to the utterances of the gentleman who was then commander of the forces :

Has the attention of the government been called to the following words made use of by Major-General Hutton in a speech delivered by him at a farewell dinner tendered to him on the 14th inst., by the officers of the Ottawa brigade :—

'I have used my utmost endeavour to create a national militia army worthy of the responsibilities which are peculiarly its own, and which, to ensure success, must be placed upon a plane above all possibility of party political interference as regards its discipline, its personnel and its military machinery.

I should, however, feel more hopeful of the future of Canada if the government had even shown active interest in our recent efforts, for a higher efficiency, or indicated their approval of the principles upon which our efforts are based. I would ask you, however, in all due seriousness not to suppose that the severance of my ties with you is due to petty misunderstandings with the Minister of Militia upon minor issues of appointments or disciplinary matters, but that it is due to broader, wider and vastly more important issues.'

Is it true that the government have not approved of the policy of the Major General Commanding, as set forth above ? Can the government inform this House what was the cause of the disagreement between them and the Major General ?

The answer I gave, speaking for the government, was as follows :

Yes, the attention of the government has been drawn to that portion of Major General Hutton's speech mentioned in the question, and to other portions also, equally reprehensible. There have been differences of opinion between the government and General Hutton. The government were disposed, now that he has been recalled for service in Africa, to let these differences pass without any comment. The government had reason to believe that this was in accordance with General Hutton's views, and therefore when the subject was brought up in the House a few days ago, the government refrained from making any statement on the subject. There is now no reason to follow that course any further. General Hutton in his speech has insinuated that his differences with the government are due to a desire on the part of the latter to exercise improper political influence on the militia organization of the country. I desire, on the part of the government, to say that there is absolutely no foundation for such a statement. The causes of difference between the government and General Hutton were not over any broad questions of general policy ; the causes of difference were that General Hutton was insubordinate and indiscreet, and deliberately ignored the authority of the minister in the administration of the department. The government desire to state that while they will, at all times, be prepared to give the most careful consideration to any representations which may be made by the officer commanding the militia, it must be distinctly understood that any such officer, on accepting the position in question becomes from that time, an officer in the employment of and subject in all respects to the government of Canada, and that he is to be regarded as the adviser, but not as entitled to control the Department of Militia. The government are responsible to the parliament and people of Canada for the due administration of each and every branch of the public service, and they would be derelict to their duty if they were to permit any subordinate official, under any circumstances, to take upon himself to disregard the instructions he may receive from the constitutional head of his department.

I have nothing to add to what was stated on that occasion by me as the head of the government. This was the position we took, and this is the position by which we are to be judged by this House and this country.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has introduced a subject which those supporting the government are very anxious to introduce on occasions of this kind. That is the question of the subordination of the military to the civil power in this country. That is not the question which is before the House, but as my right hon. friend has said a few words about it, I shall do likewise. There is no doubt under the statute as to who is responsible to parliament for the administration of the militia:

> There shall be a Minister of Militia and Defence who shall be charged with and responsible for the administration of the militia force, including all matters involving expenditure and of fortifications, gunboats, ordnance, arms, armouries, stores, munitions and habiliments of war belonging to Canada.

When the Prime Minister undertakes to argue that that statute means what he says, he is simply setting up a man of straw which no one but himself has any regard for. The argument of my hon. friend for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) was this. He argued that in this country, owing to the difference in legislation, the Commander in Chief has certain larger powers than those he possesses in Great Britain at present, but he never argued that the Commander in Chief was not subordinate to the Minister of Militia in this sense, that the Minister of Militia is ultimately responsible to parliament and the country. There is no use in arguing a matter which is not in controversy and which is simply introduced for the purpose of taking away the attention of the public from that which is really in question. But let us remember that although the Minister of Militia is ultimately responsible and that the Commander in Chief holds his position under the government of this country, the latter officer has under the statute certain responsibilities as well. And they are these:

> 1. The General Officer Commanding is charged by statute, under the orders of Her Majesty, with the military command and discipline of the militia.
> 2. He is the principal adviser of the Minister of Militia and Defence on all military questions; is charged with the general supervision of the military branch of the department; issues general orders; and holds periodical inspections of the militia.
> 3. He is charged with the distribution, quartering, and localization of the militia; with the preparation and maintenance of detailed plans for mobilization; with the preparation of schemes for offensive and defensive operations; and with the collection and compilation of military information.
> 4. He recommends to the Minister of Militia and Defence fit and proper persons for appointment to commissions in the militia; and proposes fit and proper officers for promotion, for staff and other military appointments, and for military honours and rewards.
> 5. He is charged with the military education and training of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the active militia, including the supervision of the Royal Military College of Canada, and the several Royal Schools of Military Instruction throughout the Dominion.

He is charged with these things because parliament has seen fit to entrust them to him by that which is equivalent to an Act of parliament; and when the right hon. gentleman says that the General Officer Commanding is to be a mere automaton and is not to have the power of thinking for himself or of having any policy with regard to military affairs, he takes a position which cannot be supported by any one who is capable of understanding the language I have just read and bestows upon it one moment's thought or reflection. Is it pretended for one moment that the Minister of Militia is an expert in military affairs? Is it not often the case that the gentleman filling the political position of Minister of Militia is absolutely unacquainted with military affairs? Is such a gentleman to judge of all these things, and is the General Officer Commanding, invested with all these powers, responsible under the statute, to be a man without a policy, without the power to recommend? And if he does have the temerity to recommend, is the political officer above him to be at liberty to use his own discretion in suppressing the report? The Prime Minister takes the position that he is, and if I am doing him an injustice in that regard, will he be good enough to correct me?

Let me now deal with the question of this report which has been furnished to the House. But before doing so let me remark that certain newspapers in this country, which are supposed to be absolutely in the confidence of the government, profess to have a remarkable acquaintance with the contents of that report. I do not know whether that has shocked my right hon. friend. He has been sometimes shocked at revelations of that kind in the House, but I have not observed him to manifest any indignation at the fact that a document of that kind, which is not proper to be submitted to parliament, is considered apparently proper to submit to his political friends outside the House. How is it that this was done ? Was it for the purpose of discrediting Lord Dundonald by conveying to the public what I venture to think will be found a misleading statement of his report, while at the same time denying to Lord Dundonald the right to put himself properly before the country by the production of that report, as he handed it in in the first instance ? I ask that question because it is a question that naturally occurs to one, under the very peculiar circumstances of the present time, when a ministry declines to place a document on the table of the House and allows their organs throughout the country to inform the people of its contents. This document, according to the Prime Minister, should be suppressed. It seems to me his argument went a little too far. Does my hon. friend take the position that every one of these reports to which he has referred to-day, including the report of the Department of Militia and Defence, could be suppressed by the minister in charge of the department, and that that minister would discharge his duty under the law to the House and the country by simply saying : I have had reports of the officers of my department, but in my discretion I did not see fit to publish them, and place them upon the table of the House as the report of his department ? My hon. friend says that the Minister of Militia was justified in withholding this report and for this reason. He referred to section 126 of the Militia Act, which says :

> All regulations made under this Act and the annual report of the state of the militia shall be laid before parliament by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Who is to give the Minister of Militia that report upon the state of the militia? Who is his proper adviser under the statute ? I have read the statute which says that the General Officer Commanding is the proper adviser of the Minister of Militia and that he is charged with the conduct and discipline of the militia. Then if the Minister of Militia is to give a report to parliament upon the state of the militia, upon whose advice must he act, and whose report must he receive? He must receive and publish to parliament and the country the report of the General Officer Commanding. But my right hon. friend ventures to say that this report of Lord Dundonald was not a report on the state of the militia. Am I correct in that ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think the report of Lord Dundonald, so far as it went, as regards the state of the militia, was published. It was as regards his policy, that it was not published.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to have something more than the thought of my right hon. friend. I would like to have an absolute statement. He has founded an argument upon it. He said that the Minister of Militia had a right to suppress this report because it did not come within the terms of this statute. That is what I understood him to say, if he said anything. Does he adhere to that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) cannot understand what I say, I am sorry for it. I stated that the Minister of Militia had put in his report that part of the document prepared by the General Officer Commanding which related to the state of the militia, but he refused to publish the part which suggested a policy.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I will try to understand my right hon. friend. That portion of the report which dealt with the state of the militia has been published and that part which dealt with the policy and a scheme of the defence has not been published.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Lord Dundonald does not so understand it and there is a direct issue between him and the government in that regard. I will read from Lord Dundonald's statement :

> One extremely serious case of interference was the suppression of the important parts of my first annual report on the militia. After studying the situation with great care, I came to certain conclusions and thought out a certain plan. For convenience of reference I divided my report for the year 1902 into two halves. Part I. was a simple diary of events. Part II. contained my description of the condition of the militia and an outline of a comprehensive scheme for reorganizing the force upon lines suitable to the country.

It contained, it will be observed, a comprehensive description of the condition of the militia. Now, the statute prescribes the minister to place before parliament annually a report of the state of the militia. And it appears from the statement of Lord Dundonald that that which the minister is required to place before parliament was placed in his hands by Lord Dundonald. Yet, the government, for some reason best known to themselves have seen fit to suppress it. There have been a great many reasons given for the suppression of this report. I have just dealt for a moment with one of them. And does not my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and do not hon. gentlemen in this House think that there was some reason for receiving a report from the principal adviser of the government in that regard, when an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, an expert in military affairs, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. A. T. Thomson) from his place in this House, last year described, in terms, I will venture to say, more scathing than any than Lord Dundonald had used, the condition of the militia in Canada. He said that the militia called out for annual training were intended to be a skeleton, but that from that they had diminished to a skeleton of a skeleton and now they had to come down to the condition where they could only be described as the shadow of a skeleton of a skeleton. When this is the condition, and when we have a report of the General Officer Commanding suppressed, and when we find that gentleman stating, as a man who has occupied high rank in the army and who has held a high position in Canada, that this report contained a description of the militia in Canada, and when we find that that very report required by law to be published is in fact suppressed, is there not some room, in the view of my right hon. friend for criticism in this House and in the country concerning the action of the government in that regard. Another reason advanced for the suppression of this document was that put forward by the Minister of Militia the other day—that the part suppressed had been marked 'private.' He intended to state by that remark,—as he explained later on, that it was inclosed in a letter marked 'private.' And it eventually transpired that, so far from the report being marked 'private,' Lord Dundonald did not so mark it and expressly desired that it should be published. The Minister of Militia made the argument, as he is entitled to do, if it is worth anything, that because this part of the report was included in a letter marked 'private' he was not at liberty to publish it. But, so far as that is concerned, he had Lord Dundonald's permission to publish it, even Lord Dundonald's request to publish it. And, further than that this very curious aspect of the matter is presented that the part of the report that was published was inclosed in the same letter as the other. So that if the reason given by the minister was a good one, then, according to his own argument he has committed a breach of confidence by publishing part I of that report. If this report described the condition of the militia as unsatisfactory in some respects, it might be inconvenient for the government to publish it. But is it not a proper thing that matters of this kind should be brought to the attention of parliament? As I have already said, can every report put in by a deputy head of a department be suppressed or set aside by the government simply for the reason that it may happen to contain something that is regarded as not advantageous, politically, to the gentlemen who happen to sit on the treasury benches. Suppose the Auditor General's Report contained something not exactly gratifying to the administration, would it be a proper thing for the administration to say that the suppression of publication of that report was a matter absolutely within their discretion? My right hon. friend referred to matters that are absolutely distinct, and yet, in his argument he has mixed those two things together. There is no doubt that there are documents which may properly be withheld from parliament. And with respect to these documents hon. gentlemen, whether on the government side or on the opposition side must always entrust a certain discretion to the government, must trust the good faith of the government in declaring to the House or parliament as a whole that reasons of public policy make it necesssary that information should be withheld for the present. That is the position that I am prepared to stand by as absolutely as my right hon. friend. But it is another thing for the government to arrogate to themselves the right, when they are not able to place before the House any reasons of public policy, to withhold from parliament documents such as those mentioned by my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) to-day—for instance, a report prescribed by statute and conveying certain information, or a petition addressed to the Prime Minister praying the government to grant aid for an enterprise to be undertaken by a private corporation. These are not to be withheld from parliament, because there is no consideration of public policy which demands that they should be so withheld. Therefore, I say that, so far as the argument is concerned, the right hon. gentleman has based his argument not upon the considerations which apply to that, but absolutely on other matters and on other considerations. Then, we have the statement of Lord Dundonald that a portion of another report was suppressed, that portions of it were eliminated. I would like to ask my right hon. friend whether he thinks that the report of another officer, or any other document should be laid before this House in a mutilated condition without making it known to the House that certain portions of it had been eliminated? For example, is it the proper thing for the Minister of Inland Revenue to eliminate from the reports of his officers certain portions of those reports and then bring down these documents as if they were complete. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) took the ground—and it is one with which I would not coincide—in regard to a matter already debated in this House, that if documents of an official character were in possession of the government, the government were justified in denying that those documents existed. They are not justified in denying that they exist, but they are justified in stating that they exist and also in stating their reasons of public policy why the documents are not brought down or brought down only in part. That is the course followed in the mother country. That is the course the government of this country followed in regard to the documents relating to the Alaska Boundary question. Because in that case we had it indicated by stars, in despatch after despatch, that certain portions were regarded as confidential and were therefore eliminated from the despatches as a whole.

That is the course which should have been pursued in regard to this report, if any portion of it was eliminated. Of course, if the General Officer Commanding took the report back and altered it himself that would not apply, but the General Officer Commanding states, whether rightly or wrongly I do not know, that not only did he do that, not only did he modify the report in accordance with the wishes of the Minister of Militia, but that after he had done that, whole paragraphs, and even whole pages, were withdrawn from the report without consultation with him, and the report, to the best of my knowledge, was brought down without stating those omissions.

My hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) dealt with some other documents, about one or two of which I desire to say a word. He referred to what is known as the Blair memorandum. When Mr. Blair placed his resignation in the hands of His Excellency, and when the Prime Minister and Mr. Blair came down to make their explanations in parliament, I think, not merely in courtesy to the House, but in fairness to the House, that the full reasons for Mr. Blair's resignation should have been placed before the House. I took the opportunity of asking the Prime Minister several weeks ago whether or not there was any correspondence between this government and Mr. Blair other than that which was disclosed to this House at the time these explanations were given. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on that occasion said that he did not know of any other correspondence, but would make inquiries and would inform me, but from that time up to the present I have not had the pleasure of receiving any intimation from the right hon. gentleman on that point, and I am inclined to think the letters themselves which have been brought down contain certain intrinsic evidences that they are not the only correspondence which took place between Mr. Blair and the government on that occasion. Let me say that it would have been a proper thing on that occasion for the Prime Minister to have informed the House, even if Mr. Blair did not see fit to do so, that the difficulty between Mr. Blair and the government was not only with regard to Mr. Blair's opposition to the policy proposed by the government, but was also due to the fact that Mr. Blair himself thought it necessary that the proposed National Transcontinental Railway should be built as a government undertaking. The document, to which reference has been made, set out Mr. Blair's views on that most fully. I concede at once that while that matter was being debated in Council the government were perfectly justified in holding that document from the country. It is not for the government, when matters are being discussed in Council, to disclose differences in the cabinet, differences which must always arise in any government and which must be settled as best they may. But when these differences have culminated in the resignation of a minister, and when the government and the minister resigning purport to convey to the House and the country the reasons for his resignation, I submit to my right hon. friend in all fairness that they were not treating the House and the country properly or in a constitutional way in stating to the House and the country only a portion of the reasons for that resignation and in withholding one of the principal reasons on account of which that resignation has taken place. There was no difficulty about bringing down Mr. Blair's memorandum. The formality of asking the Governor General might have been necessary, but that formality was just as easy with regard to this so-called memorandum as with regard to the letters which were produced and the explanations which were made in this House, and I venture to say, in terms of as mild criticism as I can use, that the government seem to me to have acted in a disingenuous way in withholding that document at the time when these explanations were made.

I shall not take up much time in reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific petition, which, as my right hon. friend has said, has already been dealt with in a previous debate. Let me, however, make just four statements with regard to it. First, it related to a public matter; secondly, it petitioned for public aid; thirdly, it was acted on; and fourthly, it was obviously disclosed to a gentleman who was put up to answer Mr. Blair in the debate on the Grand Trunk Pacific. There can be no doubt about that. My right hon. friend has stated in this House that he did not disclose that petition to the hon. member for North Norfolk. I stated then, and I state now, that I accept his assurance in that regard, but I tell him that if he wishes me to believe that some member of his cabinet did not disclose that document to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), if he wishes me to believe that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was not made acquainted with the terms of that petition, then he asks me to believe something which my understanding absolutely forbids me to believe, because it is impossible that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), speaking as he did on this subject, could have quoted elaborately and exactly the very terms of that document, if he had not been made acquainted with them at the time. We must not forget that this was a gentleman put up to speak as the government expert, pronounced by the Prime Minister to be the greatest authority on transportation in this parliament, and let me say that if that document was submitted to the hon. member for North Norfolk, however confidential it might have been in the first instance, the government, so long as it proposed to follow ordinary constitutional usage, was absolutely bound to place in the possession of every member of this House just as much information on that subject as was in the possession of the hon. member for North Norfolk. Otherwise, the government was treating this parliament with contempt, and did treat this parliament with contempt when it placed in the possession of that hon. gentleman, who was speaking for this government in that regard, information which they did not see fit to disclose to this House until at the end of a very long debate this year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) saw fit, for party purposes, and for party purposes alone, to read the whole document to this House. That is the constitutional usage with regard to it; and I am studiously avoiding any language that could possibly be regarded as too severe; I want to speak moderately, and to deal with the matter in the light of what I regard as the proper constitutional usage.

Let me here advert to another matter. A practice which is becoming very common with this government, the practice, while parliament is in session, of communicating to the public press, days before communication is made to parliament, documents respecting matters that have been discussed in parliament and that are of the greatest possible public interest. I stand as strongly as any one in this House for giving to the press the earliest possible information with regard to public matters, but I say it is a contempt of parliament to do as this government has repeatedly done, to give information to the government organs of this country, and to allow day after day to pass withholding that information from parliament, although it ought to be of the greatest possible interest to those who sit in this House. I refer to the matter of the Treadgold concession as an instance. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will remember that we spent one or two days last year discussing that matter. We on this side contended that that concession should have been repealed, that it was an improper concession. A commission was eventually appointed, although its scope was not as full as we thought it should have been, yet when the government, acting upon some intimation from the commission, upon some information at least, first communicated to the organs of the government the fact that they had taken action, and had not even the courtesy to lay upon the table of this House a copy of the Order in Council cancelling this concession. The information that the government has so acted is communicated to the organs of the government, and the government has not even the courtesy to lay upon the table of this House a copy of the Order in Council. I do not think that is treating parliament with proper courtesy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I must say to my hon. friend that in so far as his criticism goes, if his statement were a fact, I would agree with him altogether. Very often, I am sorry to say, information goes to the press and it is impossible to say how it goes to the press. In reference to this matter I saw in the press that this Order in Council had been cancelled but I cannot trace it up to any source. I may say, however, that it does not come from any authorized source.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I accept the assurance of my right. hon. friend. I naturally supposed that as this had been published the intimation had been given to the press by the government. My remarks in so far as that is concerned have no application in view of the right hon. gentleman's statement. But I may say here that if I searched my memory carefully I could find other occasions when the fault to which I have just adverted has been committed, by the government. There is just one other matter to which I wish to refer in connection with public documents and that is to the letters of Colonel Whitley to the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I suggested the other day that Colonel Whitley's request that these letters should be regarded as confidential might have been instigated by the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture has not contradicted that suggestion, I have every reason to believe that if Colonel Whitley did make that request to the hon. Minister of Agriculture there was the previous request of the hon. minister to Colonel Whitley that such communications should be made to him. But what had Colonel Whitley to do with it after all? Is not Colonel Whitley an officer of this government, paid by this country for the discharge of the duty which involved the writing of those letters and are those letters to be withheld from parliament simply because it suits the convenience of the hon. Minister of Agriculture and of Colonel Whitley to have them so withheld? They are from a subordinate officer of the government to the Minister of Agriculture who claims the right to Act as a public man, as a minister of the Crown in reference to a public matter. In what respect can they be confidential? They relate to the appointment of officers in the regiment referred to. Further than that my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) produces an argument which was made only the other day in the House by the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden). He states what is very true that these letters are referred to in the letter brought down. One of the arguments of the hon. Minister of Militia the other day was that he had the right to ask Lord Dundonald to withdraw certain paragraphs from his report because those paragraphs related to documents not brought down, and he said to Lord Dundonald that if the report containing these allusions is placed before the House then the House will have absolute right to call for these documents. If that is a good argument in the mouth of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, is it not a good argument in the mouth of any other hon. gentleman in this House ? There are letters brought down containing an allusion to the letters from Colonel Whitley and if the argument of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, supported as it was to-day by the argument of my hon. friend from South Lanark, is correct then the production of these letters is in itself the best justification why this House can call for the documents referred to in these letters. Yet they are withheld from this Houes upon the mere pretense that they can be confidential.

Mr. Speaker, some reference has been made to-day by those who have spoken to the subordination of the military power to the civil power in this country and in fact the line of argument which is taken in a certain portion of the press has been followed, namely, that there was some attempt on the part of Lord Dundonald to impose what is called militarism on this country. That is the red herring if I may term it so. Let me say that I have found no evidence in any document that has been published or in any communication that has been made that shows Lord Dundonald in any such light. I am not dealing now with the question of his alleged insubordination at the banquet. If the argument which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister made a day or two ago were correct,—I do not think it is correct—every officer at the Dominion Rifle meeting this year for example who spoke in terms of commendation of the hon. Minister of Militia would be liable to immediate dismissal for so doing. That is what the argument of my hon. friend leads to. He quoted the regulation which only has reference to military discipline and to military officers and he applied that to the relations existing between the General Officer Commanding and the Minister of Militia and Defence. That regulation makes it just as much an offence for any officer to refer to his superior officer in terms of commendation as in terms of disapprobation ; therefore, hundreds of officers all over this country who have spoken flatteringly of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence will be subject to dismissal if my right hon. friend's argument be correct. But, there is nothing in it. Those gentlemen were perfectly proper in uttering their commendations. They were not violating any military rule or regulation which had any application to the case. Indeed my right hon. friend has extended his argument a little farther than what I was suggesting, because his argument, if it means anything, means that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is the military superior officer of the General Officer Commanding and that the General Officer Commanding by reason of referring to the Minister of Agriculture is guilty of a breach of discipline toward his military superior officer and for that reason may be disciplined and dismissed. Well, I think that the argument need only be stated to refute itself and I will not deal further with it.

Lord Dundonald, as I understand it, has never sought to place the military power over the civil power. What he has sought to do is to prevent the interposition of the hon. Minister of Agriculture between himself and his subordinate officers and in doing that he is upholding the civil power itself, because it is the civil power of this country exercised through parliament which has declared that Lord Dundonald shall have certain duties and that his subordinate officers shall have certain duties. If the hon. Minister of Agriculture interferes with these subordinate officers in the performance of their duty it is he who is guilty of violating the constitutional rights of the people, and when Lord Dundonald protested against that interference of the hon. Minister of Agriculture it was Lord Dundonald who upheld the constitutional rights of the people of this country. My right hon. friend has been somewhat sensitive about the criticism made upon certain words which he used in this House in speaking them. I did not think them worth upon this subject. I have never alluded to alluding to and I was ready then as I am ready on all occasions to accept the right hon. gentleman's statement as to the word he intended to use and the manner in which he intended to use it. This is a courtesy which we owe to each other according to the rules of the House. But, my right hon. friend must not forget perhaps that he is not always so ready to extend a courtesy of that kind to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. When I stood up in my place during this session and stated that a certain word, reported by 'Hansard' as having been used by me, had not been used by me and gave my word to the House as the fact, did I find my right hon. friend accepting that statement ?

No, I did not. I found my right hon. friend speaking in—well, in language that might be regarded as meaning that he was rather doubtful—in rather a discourteous way with regard to the incident ; so that I was compelled to write a letter to the chief of the 'Hansard' staff, and to produce evidence from the original notes of the shorthand writer in support of that word of mine which I thought might be accepted by my right hon. friend. Let not my right hon. friend be too sensitive unless he is prepared to be uniformly courteous himself. I said not one word about the expression which he used the other day. I do not propose to say anything about it except to make the allusion which I am now making. The right hon. gentleman must remember that he told us that he is not at all sensitive to criticism, when I called him in question for some words which he had used with regard to the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler). He practically said then: I will use any language I see fit, and I will not shrink from criticism. But at the first breath of any strong criticism we find my right hon. friend a little excited, and we find him using very strong and very—well, very militant language towards those who may venture to criticise him. My right hon. friend has a perfect right to use any language he sees fit within the rules of this House, and others in the House and without the House have also the right to use such moderate criticism with regard to his language as they may deem proper. The right hon. gentleman referred only the other day to a great many illustrations of the use of the words 'stranger' and 'foreigner,' and indeed in speaking on the subject he said that he regarded Lord Dundonald as a stranger only to the eastern townships. It was only necessary to remind the House that Lord Dundonald was not himself doing this work in the eastern townships; it was the officers under Lord Dundonald who were doing the work there and they should have been left uninterfered with by the Minister of Agriculture. Lord Dundonald himself was not going to the eastern townships to make a selection of officers; he left that as the law directed to the officers whose duty it was to perform that service. I do not for one moment question my right hon. friend's assurance as to the sense in which he intended these words, and I for my part am always ready on this or any other occasion to accept his assurance on such a matter. Let me however quote to him, from that well of pure and undefiled English, a few words which may be of service in interpreting what the ordinary sense of such words is:

> Now, therefore, ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints. —Ephesians II., 19.

That is perhaps a pretty good illustration in which the three expressions 'strangers,' and 'foreigners' and 'fellow citizens' may be used. I am willing to accept the right hon. gentleman's assurance that he meant no suggestion to the contrary, but I do declare that notwithstanding any assurance to the contrary from any quarter, a man of the race and the birth of the Earl of Dundonald will always be regarded in Canada, not as a foreigner or a stranger, but as a fellow-citizen.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Amendment (Mr. Haggart) negatived, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Lighthouse and coast service—agencies, rents and contingencies, $25,000.

Hon. RAYMOND PREFONTAINE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). This estimate includes the salaries, rent and expenses of the new agency recently established in Montreal. It is proposed to increase the salaries of the agents in British Columbia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The salary of the British Columbia agent is to be increased from $1,600 to $1,800. The agent, in addition to his ordinary duties, performs the duties of inspector of lighthouses and examines masters and mates for certificates, for which he is allowed $200 a year. The St. John agent receives $1,600, while his predecessor received $2,000; and it is proposed to increase his salary to $1,800. In Nova Scotia the agent's salary is $1,600. He is provided with a staff of assistants, and it is not proposed to increase his salary. The agent in Prince Edward Island receives $1,400. Besides his duty as agent, he inspects all the lighthouses. In Quebec the agent's salary is $2,200 a year, and he has a competent and efficient staff to assit him.

Mr. BLAIN. How many agencies are there altogether?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. One in Quebec, one in New Brunswick, one in Nova Scotia, one in Prince Edward Island, one in British Columbia, and a sub-marine agency at Montreal, established a year ago.

Mr. BLAIN. What amounts are paid for rent?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I am informed that they are all government properties except the Montreal office, which is rented from a private estate and the rent is $2,000.

Mr. BLAIN. Has the same rent been paid for some years?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. In Montreal it is a new agency which was established a year ago, but we have aggregated into that office the pilots, the cabin space inspectors and the steamboat inspectors.

Maintenance and repairs to lighthouses, including the wages of the crews and maintenance of the Lurcher Shoal, and East Point, Anticosti lightships, $425,000.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The increase is due to the extensive buoying of the St. Lawrence route and the maintenance of the gas plants established at Quebec, Parry Sound and Halifax. There are 963 lighthouses, some of which require expensive repairs. Some are in such shape that practically new lighthouses have to be built. The average cost of the 963 lighthouses and fog alarms does not exceed $350 for maintenance and repairs. In British Columbia there has been a large addition to the number of aids to navigation. Provision is required for a number of new lights and fog alarms which are now under construction and aids to navigation recommended by the light-house board. Lately several light stations were destroyed by fire and have been rebuilt; and to prevent the possibility of destruction by fire, it is desirable that fire extinguishers of the latest pattern be placed in the different lighthouses and also that these houses be protected against lightning by the most improved lightening rods. This lighthouse service is increasing very fast. The shipping interests, since a number of years, have taken greater care to make the necessary presentation to the department and we have formed what is called a lighthouse board, which is composed of a certain number of officers of my department along with a couple of outsiders interested in shipping, who advise on the necessity of establishing certain lights and improved aids to navigation. The government thought that this was the best way of arriving at practical results and satisfying the public that our St. Lawrence route has become considerably improved. But all this costs a good deal of money.

Mr. SPROULE. Are the 963 lighthouses and fog alarms in the St. Lawrence or over the country as a whole ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. From the Pacific to the Atlantic.

Mr. SPROULE. How many new lights established last year ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Above Montreal about half a dozen, below Montreal about ten, in the maritime provinces twenty-two, five in British Columbia and one in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DANIEL. Are many changes contemplated in the lighthouse service for the Bay of Fundy ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I may as well give the complete list :

SUMMARY OF ESTIMATES FOR SYSTEM OF AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

1. New machinery required for existing fog-alarms	$175 00
2. Improvements in the powers and character of the lighthouses in the Dominion not specifically provided for the head of coast lights	100 00
3. Dominion lighthouse depot, Prescott, basin for government steamers, machine shop and tools	60 00
4. New optical apparatus and lanterns for coast lights	150 00
5. Gas pumping stations	50 00
6. Gas buoys, &c., St. Lawrence channel	100 00
7. Submarine bell signals	250 00
Total	$885 00

Mr. ALCORN. May I ask whether, in the case of lighthouses put up or re-built, the work has been done by tender ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. By tender, except in certain cases where our officials did the work themselves.

Mr. ALCORN. With regard to the work on the lights on False Ducks, Lake Ontario, was that done by tender ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes.

Mr. ALCORN. Who were the tenderers, and for what sum ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I am not able to give the details at the moment, but I know that it was let by tender.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the hon. gentleman get the information and let me have it ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. With pleasure.

Mr. ALCORN. And may I be permitted to refer to an item for a moment that has been passed—a portion of item 191, examination of masters and mates ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. There is no objection.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We surely cannot consider items that have been reported ; but the discussion can take place under item 192, with the consent of the committee.

Mr. ALCORN. Can the minister state what fees examiners of masters and mates are allowed to charge candidates who appear before them for examination ? I ask this because these candidates are put to considerable expense in advance to attend these examinations, and I am aware that fees varying largely in amount have in several instances been demanded of these candidates.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The examination fee paid examiners by the department is $4 for each candidate examined. Candidates pay a fee which goes into the government chest according to the character of the certificate they require. For a certificate of competency as master $15 ; for a certificate of competency as mate of a sea going ship $8 ; for a certificate of competency as mate of a ship trading on inland or on minor waters, or on coasting vessels, $6. For a certificate of service as master, $8. For a certificate of service as mate of a sea-going ship, $5. For a certificate of service as mate for a ship on inland waters or Great Lakes, $4.

Mr. ALCORN. These candidates in many instances have to travel long distances to present themselves for examination, and they are also under expense through loss of time. Are there any instructions issued to examiners with respect to the conduct of examinations ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. They get precise instructions as regards the examinations.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the hon. minister state the nature of the instructions ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. It is the chairman of the board of examiners of masters and mates, Captain Salmon, who sends out the instructions or printed rules which are supplied to every examiner for circulation. Of course, I have not the instructions under my hand at the moment to lay before the House.

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Alcorn) to say that these fees varied in amount. Is that the case ? Is there not a regular fee established by statute or by Order in Council ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The fees vary in amount as already stated. They are fixed by statute.

Mr. ALCORN. I am aware that fees of $12, $14 and $16 have been demanded and paid.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I am not aware of anything of that kind. If the matter is brought to my notice I will look into it, and if there is anything wrong I will see that it is put right. No other fees should be charged than those I have mentioned as being fixed by statute.

Mr. FOWLER. How is this fee established, by Order in Council or by statute ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. By statute.

Mr. ALCORN. Is there any official source where one can find these fees laid down ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I have not them here, but they can be produced, they are public. But speaking from memory I think they will be found in 57-58 Vic., Chap. 42.

Mr. ALCORN. Are these examiners paid by salary in addition to the fees by the department ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Some of them are paid by salary and others by fees, $4 for each candidate, but we are gradually coming to the rule of yearly salaries. Where an examiner is paid by salary he does not receive any fees.

Mr. FOWLER. When the examiner is paid a salary, the fees which he receives from candidates, I presume, go entirely to the receiver general ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. But when he is paid only by fees he puts in his own pocket the fee which he receives.

Mr. ALCORN. Do the instructions require that any specific time and place shall be assigned for the examination ? I ask this because my information is that certain of these examinations have been conducted most irregularly, in fact have been conducted in the most singular manner. I have heard of some of them taking place in bar-rooms, and others by way of conversation between the examiner and the candidate, while walking up and down between drinks. It is a most extraordinary state of affairs. I would suppose that there would be a certain time and place appointed that the candidates would be notified, and a formal examination of some kind held. My information is that in some places at all events, that is not done.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. This is the first intimation I have had of anything of this kind. I would be surprised if Capt. Salmon who is at the head of that department, should allow examinations to be held in that manner. If the hon. gentleman will make a specific charge or give me information that things of that kind have been done at a certain place, and date, I shall look into it. I have not been informed of anything of that kind having been done. I have never heard of any complaint of examinations being held in that manner.

Mr. FOWLER. Are there written as well as oral examinations ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes, both written and oral.

Mr. FOWLER. By whom are these examination papers read ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. They are all read in the department.

Mr. FOWLER. Are they passed upon by a board or simply by one examiner, that is the written examinations ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. In all cases first by one examiner, and then sent to the department and closely examined by the chairman of the board.

Mr. FOWLER. Where there is a board of examiners are these written answers to the questions passed upon by the whole board ? In the case of an examination for master especially, as it is important that these masters should be thoroughly conversant with their duties, it seems to me that it would be a safeguard if the papers were passed upon by more than one person.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the minister let me have a copy of the instructions issued to these examiners ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Oh, yes, we have printed instructions.

Mr. ALCORN. Do the examiners make any, and if so, what return to the department of the result of the examiners and the fees which they receive ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The examinations are held by the examiners, and of course, are reported to the chairman, Captain Salmon. Captain Salmon examines the papers and no certificates are issued until he goes over the papers and returns are sent in monthly by the examiners.

Mr. ALCORN. In what form is the return to the department made ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. All the papers are sent to the chairman, who files them on record ?

Mr. FOWLER. Does he make a return of the fees ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Of course at stated periods, say once every quarter the department sends to the Auditor General a statement in detail of certificates issued by the department since the last report sent him, and he is also referred to the deposit receipts sent him to cover the amount of revenue derived from the certificates.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I am correct in understanding that he makes a return of the fees, and the number examined, and if so, where can the information be seen ? If he makes a report of it the information must be somewhere in the department available for inspection.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Oh, yes, there is no difficulty about that ; every certificate is numbered consecutively and they are all examined by the Auditor General when the account is rendered of the amount of fees received.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not what I meant at all. Is there any report we can pick up and find how many were examined and the fees that were paid ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. In the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, Marine volume, you will find at page 109, appendix No. 7 :

Report of the chairman of the Board of Examiners of masters and mates.

There you will find a complete report of what has taken place during the season. It is signed by the chairman. At page 110 you will find a list of those who have been examined and the names of the different places at which they have been examined.

Mr. ALCORN. Are the fees remitted in case the candidate fails to pass his examination ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The money is not refunded ; it remains in the government chest.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the fee of the examiner the same whether the candidate is a master or a mate—$4 in each case ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. In this report I do not see anything about the fees paid.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. If the hon. gentleman will look at page 109 he will see that the following statement is given :

The total amount collected in fees from applicants for certificates, during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1903, was $5,790.50, and the amount expended on account of the service, as will be seen by Appendix No. 1 to this report, was $4,996.06, leaving a balance to this service of $794.44. The vote for this service was $5,000, and the sum expended to June 30, 1903, $4,996.06, leaving an unexpended balance of $3.94.

During the year, 468 certificates have been issued ; and 50 candidates have failed on examination to procure certificates.

Mr. ALCORN. Is this sum of $7,000 paid to the examiners in addition to the aggregate given by the report to which the hon. minister has just referred ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. There are expenses connected with the examination of candidates. The examiners have to travel from one point to another. Besides the $4 which they get for the examination of each candidate they get their travelling expenses and the chairman's salary and travelling expenses are also included.

Mr. ALCORN. How many examiners are there in Ontario ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. At Ottawa there is Captain R. C. W. MacCuaig, Captain McElhinney and Captain Magee ; Kingston, Captain Thos. Donnelly ; St. Catharines, Captain William McIlwaine and Captain G. T. Phillips.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the hon. minister give us an explanation as to the condition of the St. Lawrence river between Montreal and Quebec, and will he state whether he regards it as being well lighted now ? He made a general statement last year in connection with this subject saying that he hoped that by the 1st of November of last year to have the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec so well lighted that it would be as safe by night as by day.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman will wait until the next item is reached this question will be in order.

Mr. FOWLER. The item before the committee is 'maintenance and repairs to lighthouses.'

Mr. PREFONTAINE. No, we are at 'agencies, rent and contingencies.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The item before the committee is :

Maintenance and repairs to lighthouses, including the wages of crews, and maintenance of the Lurcher shoal, and East Point, Anticosti, lightships, $425,000.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like an explanation as to these rents.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I think I have given an explanation of that. There is only one rent that we pay in Montreal, and that is for the new agency which was established there a year ago. The other agencies occupy government property.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the rent at Montreal ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. $2,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there no building in Montreal belonging to the government ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. None available.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to inquire if the light at Lindoe Island on the St. Lawrence at Fiddler's Elbow has been changed from an oil light to acetylene and when the new system was put in operation ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I am informed that it has been changed from oil to acetylene gas.

Mr. TAYLOR. Are you using acetylene gas there now ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I am so informed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to read a letter to the hon. minister which I received to-day. It is addressed to Mr. John G. Wallace, lightkeeper at Lindoe Island and reads as follows :

Ottawa, 23rd June, 1904.

Sir,—I have to inform you that because of the light on Lindoe island, under your charge, being changed from a light burning oil to an automatic acetylene gas light, your services as lightkeeper are no longer required, and that owing to abolition of your office the Minister of Marine and Fisheries recommended to Council that you be placed on the retired list from the 1st July, 1904, with an annual allowance of $138, based on a service of twenty-three years and a salary of $300 per annum.

I have, therefore, to request you to so arrange matters as to be in a position to vacate the light station and give up possession thereof and of all government property under your charge to the department on the 1st proximo.

I am, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) F. GOURDEAU,
Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. John G. Wallace,
Lightkeeper
Lindoe Island,
Ivy Lea P.O., Ont.

On the 23rd June a servant who has given twenty-three years service to the department gets eight days notice to get out and is superannuated at the rate of $138 a year. I turned up the Act in reference to superannuation to see what provision it makes in such a case as this. This man has been paying into the superannuation fund for twenty-three years while he was in the service and is entitled to superannuation if his services are dispensed with. This is what the Act says :

If any person to whom this Act applies is removed from office in consequence of the abolition of his office for the purpose of improving the organization of the department to which he belongs, or is removed, or retired from office to promote efficiency or economy in the civil service, the Governor in Council may grant him such gratuity or superannuation allowance as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office, not exceeding such as he would have been entitled to if he had retired in consequence of permanent infirmity of body or mind, after adding ten years to his actual term of service.

I want to inquire of the hon. minister if he has complied with the Act? This man has been in the service for twenty-three years and the hon. minister must have removed him for economy or efficiency, and if so has he recommended that ten years be added to his term of service for superannuation purposes as it was the intention of the Act when the government cruelly forced a man out as they have done in this case? I would like to appeal to the government on behalf of this man and to point out that he is entitled to the consideration which the Act intends he shall receive and that he should have ten years added to the service he has performed for superannuation purposes. I would ask if it is the intention of the hon. minister to do this?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I did not look into that point yet, but I am willing to do so. I do not think there has been any cruelty about the matter. I am informed that the man is quite able to do any work he may be called upon to do. I have had no report against him, but of course when we changed the system of lighting his office was abolished. He gets his pension, and if he is entitled to ten years addition to the time he has served I will certainly be favourable to looking into the matter and see that justice will be done.

Mr. TAYLOR. I certainly think he is entitled to it. It is true he is an able bodied man, but he should have more than eight days notice after being in the service of the government for so many years.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. We are not pushing him at all. He occupies forty acres of land, and we have not informed him that he had to give up the occupation of it. He has made no complaint to us.

Mr. TAYLOR. He got notice that his services are both dispensed with and that his salary would cease on the first of July. He was also told by letter to hand over the government property in his possession to Captain of the 'Scout.' I think that is taking him by the throat. I do not think that there is a man in this House or outside of it who if he had a faithful servant for 23 years would discharge him on eight days notice. I do not think it is the intention of that Act that such a thing should be done.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I am informed by my officers that this gentleman got notice last summer, that a change was contemplated, and that he should be prepared for it.

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. He has never complained, in any way until now.

Mr. TAYLOR. He knew the change was coming, but seeing that he was on the superannuation list, and that he was able to perform his duties, he thought if any one were retained he would be. He never suspected that he would be dismissed and a man put in his place to look after half a dozen lights. I can tell the minister now, that if he does not employ more than one man to look after these lights among The Thousand Islands, there will be a serious accident some day. In the fly season the flies are attracted by the lights, and formerly the lighthouse keeper would have to clear them off half a dozen times a night. With one man in charge of half a dozen lights, 15 miles apart, he cannot attend to each of them. In the morning when you go to these lights you will find dead flies an inch deep fastened to the glass and practically obscuring the light. When I was in Prescott the other day the flies were as thick as a cloud. I can tell the minister that he will have to appoint another man to clear these lights as was done under the old system, and it would be much better in the public interest to retain the services of Mr. Wallace. I will accept the minister's statement in reference to Mr. Wallace. If any man ever was entitled to have ten years added to his superannuation Mr. Wallace is entitled to it. Then again, Mr. Acton was dismissed after fifteen years service; he is not on the superannuation list and he should be entitled to a better retiring allowance than he has received. It is the same with the other man who was there for three or four years.

Inspection of lighthouses and aids to navigation, $502,000.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The extensive improvements authorized in the lighting of the Upper St. Lawrence, comprises the introduction of compressed acetylene instead of oil in lighthouses, and the use of acetylene for the buoy service instead of oil or Pintsch gas, and also the use, as far as possible, of range lights instead of single lights and gas buoys. The rearrangement of the existing system of lights will be considered as soon as possible by the lighthouse board which has been established. Last session, an estimate was given of the cost of converting the lighting of the river, and the apparatus needed procured from the Safety Car Heating and Lighting Company, of New York, as it was not made in Canada. Also provision was made for a suitable buoy depot at a central point on the river, between Dickinson's Landing and Prescott, where there should be ample store room space, dock room for steamers, and land for storage gas, can and spar buoys. The selection of a suitable depot was made at Prescott, and the department obtained an option on the property owned by John Labatt, of London, Ont. The price paid for the property including wharfs, buildings and land, $26,500. This location is an ideal place for a buoy depot, is centrally situated and will be the headquarters for assembling apparatus for the lighthouse service of the Dominion, and provision is being made for the manufacture of apparatus now purchased abroad. $35,000 was the sum estimated for the depot, but the department was able to make the purchase for $26,500. Last year $80,000 was placed in the estimates to provide for the construction of a lightship to be placed on Lurcher Shoal at the entrance of the Bay of Fundy. It was also found necessary in the interests of navigation that a lightship should be placed at the East Point of Anticosti. A contract was entered into with the Polson Iron Works of Toronto, to construct the two lightships for the sum of $179,500. I may say that at the time this amount of $502,000 was placed in the estimates, being the same amount as voted last year, the department had not at that time completed its policy in respect to aids to navigation for the next fiscal year. The lighthouse board is now passing upon a number of applications before the department which have been held over awaiting the organization of the board. These will comprise new lighthouses, fog alarms and buoys, but until the board completes its labours, it will not be possible to give an estimate of the amount that will be required for these new aids. The amount required for these aids together with the balance mentioned above, will appear in the supplementary estimates. The fog alarms of the Dominion comprise a very important class of aids to navigation and those in the St. Lawrence are especially important in view of the increase in number and tonnage of the ships utilizing the route. Provision will be made for the installation of the best machinery obtainable which will make the system second to none. The cost is estimated at $175,000. Complaints have been made in the past about the lighting of the St. Lawrence route, and the estimates provide for a sum of $50,000 which will be sufficient to install the most modern apparatus that can be obtained. When the improvements provided by this vote are carried out no further complaints should be made concerning the lighting of this important trade artery. As indicated above, the department had purchased a depot at Prescott, which will be utilized for the assembly and manufacture of lighthouse apparatus for the Dominion. It is necessary that a basin should be provided for the government steamers, and that a machine shop should be erected for the manufacture of certain classes of apparatus not made in Canada. This will keep the larger proportion of the vote for this purpose within the country. The sum of $60,000 is required for this purpose, many of the lights in the lighthouses of the Dominion are neither powerful enough nor are their lights sufficiently charateristic, and it is necessary to take steps to remedy this state of affairs. This will be done by the substitution of gas for oil as the illuminant, thereby increasing the power of the lights and also permitting them to be made more characteristic. The sum of $100,000 is asked for this purpose, and it is estimated that it will provide for the conversion of about 300 lighthouses. The apparatus will be designed by the engineers of the department. The extension of the gas buoy system in the Quebec, Nova Scotia and Georgian Bay districts calls for the erection of three gas pumping stations. These will be located at Quebec, Halifax and Parry Sound, respectively. $50,000 was asked for this purpose. It is desirable to continue the lighting of the channel from Quebec to Sorel, which was commenced last year by the opening up of the Sorel-Montreal division, and which permitted night navigation between these two points. The arrangement has been of great benefit to the shipping interests, and has been appreciated by them. I may say, as regards the inauguration of the new lights between Montreal and Sorel, that they have been so successful that steamers have been able to leave Montreal during the night and navigate the whole distance of forty-five miles with perfect safety.

Mr. FOWLER. How much, in addition to this $502,000, does the hon. gentleman propose to ask for ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. There will be a supplementary estimate of over $300,000 besides this.

Mr. FOWLER. Making nearly a million dollars. What portion of that is for the changing of the lights from oil to acetylene gas ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. About $100,000 on the whole.

Mr. FOWLER. Before the department decided to make the change from oil to gas, what examination was made as to the relative value of the two lights ? Was there a commission or a board of competent persons to take the matter into consideration and report ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. As I stated before, the study of this question was begun before I was in the department. The question was studied for two years. The value of the light was public property. It was known that it would be better if we could find the apparatus to work it properly. It has been adopted in France and in England, so that as regards the light itself there was no question. But as regards the apparatus, owing to our climatic conditions, we had to study and experiment. That was done by the officers of the department, the chief engineer and his assistants, and the result has been found to be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. FOWLER. Has the report of these officers been presented to the department, so that it can be got at by any person who desires to see it ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. There was no need of a special written report. The facts were there. The lights were being worked day by day, week by week and month by month, and the improvements were being put in operation according as the experiments were satisfactory or not.

Mr. FOWLER. It was only a question, then, of experimenting with the apparatus ? Where were these experiments conducted, and by whom, and was there any report in the department before the change was decided upon ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Some were conducted where the lights were placed and some in the stores at Ottawa.

Mr. FOWLER. I cannot understand why there should be a different apparatus required in this country from what there would be in England, for instance.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. If the hon. gentleman would come to the department and have a little conversation with some of the engineers he would be convinced very quickly why the experiment took such a long time. Some of these apparatus have to be tested at different temperatures. We were offered I do not know how many different patents and different sorts of machinery that would work satisfactorily at a certain temperature, but would not at another temperature. So we had to make a choice of the best equipment, and that is what the officers of the department did.

Mr. FOWLER. But the temperature of this country varies in the different seasons of the year. Do you change the apparatus with the season, as we change our clothing ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Some of these apparatus would work at 10 degrees below zero and some would not work at 25 degrees above zero, so that we had to take into consideration all these conditions and take the best apparatus. The generator which we are using works at 30 below zero.

Mr. FOWLER. Our temperature is sometimes lower than 30 below zero. Suppose it was 40 below, the apparatus would have to go out of business. It seems to me that before so very large an expenditure is entered into as is necessitated by the change from oil to acetylene gas, there should be some authentic written report before the department and brought down by the minister to show the members of this committee what these experiments were and whether they cover the ground.

Mr. BLAIN. It seems to me that the hon. minister should give us a statement of the condition of the lighting on the River St. Lawrence. His predecessors some three years ago declared that with the money which was then voted the lighting system would be perfect, particularly between Quebec and Montreal. My hon. friend last year said he proposed to put the lighting system in the hands of a commission to report upon it. He pointed out what changes he proposed and what advantage these would be to the public. He proposed to have forty-two store holders constructed at a cost of $35,000, and forty gas automatic gas buoys at a cost of $12,000 and certain other improvements, making a total of $56,000. Has that work been gone on with, and was the estimate given last year sufficient to complete it ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. These improvements have been made gradually. I have here a map showing which were made in 1903 and those proposed for 1904. The work completed in 1903 is in black, the work under construction is in green, and the work proposed is in red.

Mr. BLAIN. When will this be through ? It is the same old statement. My hon. friend has repeated almost word for word this year what he said last year with respect to lighting the St. Lawrence river. We should have an estimate of the total cost of relighting the St. Lawrence, if it is to be relighted. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is adopting a piecemeal system of lighting. It would be very much more in the interests of the country if he would prepare a statement of the whole system and submit that to the committee.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I said last year that we intended to perfect the aids to navigation as much as possible between Montreal and Sorel, some forty-five miles. The gas holders and gas buoys and the other improvements I mentioned have been done, and the shipping interests are perfectly satisfied that this portion of the St. Lawrence is perfectly equipped. I mentioned last year also that I proposed to improve aids to navigation from St. Francis to Le Platon, but I could not undertake to improve the balance before the channel was completed. We began this spring to improve these thirty-five miles. As regards the balance, it cannot be done for a year or two, because the work of dredging the channel and widening it and straightening the curves will not be finished before three or four years. It would be useless to install costly apparatus in a channel which is too narrow and which could not be used at night in safety. The result of the improvements we have made is that steamers can sail from Montreal to Sorel and from Sorel to Montreal at night in perfect safety, which they never thought of doing before. These gas holders and automatic gas buoys cannot be procured in this country at present, but we are trying to get manufacturers to make them. At present we are obliged to import them from Germany and they have to be ordered six or seven months in advance. When my hon. friend asks me to state when the St. Lawrence route will be in perfect condition as regards aids to navigation, he cannot be serious. Improvements are going on every day and will have to go on as long as that river is navigable. The first work on the channel between Montreal and Quebec was begun in 1850 or 1855. At that time the water on the St. Peters flats was from nine to ten feet deep. Now the depth is thirty feet and it is contemplated to have thirty-two at low water and a channel five hundred feet wide or at least four hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the present width ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Five hundred in some places and in others three hundred and fifty, and we are going on increasing the depth so as to afford the shipping interests the necesssary facilities to navigate between the two ports. This work has been going on the last twenty-five or thirty years, but within the last ten years a good deal more has been accomplished than formerly. We are constantly in communication with the shipping interests, and I do not think that any board of shippers could find fault with what we have done. The only fault they might find is that we are not going fast enough, but others say we are going too fast. I myself think we are not going fast enough, but we are working according to our means and circumstances. As for the dredging, heavy expenses have been incurred by the Public Works Department to provide dredges. The Department of Public Works had antiquated dredges, dredges that could not go deeper than twenty-five feet, and that worked very slowly. All these difficulties could not be overcome in a year. The first point was the establishment of the shipyards at Sorel. For the proper working of these an efficient staff is required, and this cannot be provided at once for men have to be chosen and fitted for the special work they have to do. Though we are going faster and faster every year, we may not do all that the people expect of us. But I think that we have been doing the best that could be done under the circumstances.

Mr. FOWLER. So far as the expenditure of money on the St. Lawrence route is concerned, I do not think that any hon. gentleman on this side will object, so long as we can see a reasonable prospect of securing good results from that expenditure. I do, however, find reason to criticise the manner in which the minister has expended some of the money placed at his disposal. For my part, I think before he incurred the expenditure necessary for a change of lights so as to use acetylene gas, he should have had a report from competent persons as to the advisability of this step and as to the amount that would be required, so that he could give to the committee some idea of cost and the advantages to be gained by incurring that cost. For my part, I would not care if the vote were $2,000,000 instead of $1,000,000, if the corresponding benefit is to be had ; because one of the most important things we have to do in this country in connection with our transportation system is to improve the St. Lawrence route. The frequent occurrence of accidents imposes a very heavy tax on our shipping in the way of high insurance rates, and this is a great injury to our commerce. So far as we have evidence before us, I think it is far from clear that the expenditure under the hon. gentleman has always been made in the best interest of the country. If the experiments of which he has spoken have taken place there should be some report before this committee, so that we may be able to form some idea of their value.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Have the improvements on the St. Lawrence had any appreciable effect in reducing the rates of insurance, or, if not, is there any present prospect of a reduction ? This seems to be one of the heaviest burdens upon our commerce. It might be a matter of importance for the government to look into this question and see whether the insurance rates are based upon the actual statistics of the losses on the route or not. It may be worthy the consideration of the government whether the country should continue to submit to exorbitant insurance rates or whether we should take some step to form a Lloyd's Association for Canada.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. For the information of the hon. gentleman, I may repeat what I have stated here, that the improvements made and contemplated have had the effect of securing for the Canadian Pacific Railway Steamers—or Elder-Dempster Line —quite a reduction in the rate of insurance. Of course, there was probably not only that reason given at the time, but the reason that the Canadian Pacific Railway offered so much guarantee as regards the organization of their service. But the better precautions taken for the safety of vessels has had its effect in this direction. If I wanted to take the time of the committee, I could produce hundreds of letters from captains of steamers, resolutions from boards of trade, resolutions from shipping conference, and so on, endorsing everything done by the department, and even going in advance of the department and making suggestions for other improvements, I could read also an extract from the 'Shipping Gazette' and 'Lloyd's List' of the 15th January, 1904, stating in the plainest manner that the aids to navigation and the work going on were bringing about such good results that the time is not far distant when the reputation of the St. Lawrence route will be as good as the reputation of any other. The shipping interests have taken the matter in hand, and the suggestions they have made to the department have been accepted and we are trying to do the best we can under the circumstances.

As regards, what the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) has said to the effect that there is no report before the committee of experiments made, I can only say that when I became head of the department these experiments in the direction of substituting acetylene gas for coal oil were going on. I put myself in communication with the officials who were conducting these experiments and, from day to day, I kept myself informed. I do not see what necessity there was for getting a report. The facts are there ; I have visited the places and examined into what was being done ; and, although I do not pretend to be an expert, the result has satisfied me that the experiments made have been successful and that the new system should be adopted in the public interest. And, as I have stated, the shipping interests are entirely in favour of these improvements, and demand their extension as rapidly as possible.

Mr. FOWLER. I may have been misinformed, but I understood that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company carried their own insurance on their ships. I remember that it was stated in the newspapers, when one of their vessels was lost, that it would be a total loss to the company.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I think my hon. friend is talking about the Allan Line. The Allan Line does not insure.

Mr. FOWLER. No, this was the Canadian Pacific Railway. I believe that one of their boats became a total loss on her first trip under the new management and it was stated in the papers that it was an entire loss to the company because they carried the insurance themselves. In that way it would seem that the improvements in the St. Lawrence route have not succeeded in reducing the number of casualties. Judging from the newspaper reports I should say that there had been a larger number of accidents last year than in the three preceding years.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The number of casualties has increased proportionately to the increase of trade. The hon. gentleman has referred to the accident to the 'Montery' at St. Pierre and Miquelon. This was not in our waters ; it is on the St. Lawrence route, and is charged against that route, but the cause of the accident is well known. It was not at all owing to deficient aids to navigation as the accident occurred within the light of one of the largest lighthouses on the French shore, and their lights were quite superior to those which we have installed at the present time, although we expect in time to be in a position to have the best. The increase in the tonnage and in trade has caused these accidents. It stands to reason that with the competition that exists accidents will happen but these accidents are not due to want of aids to navigation.

Mr. SPROULE. They are due to bad pilotage in some instances.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Sometimes to bad pilotage but sometimes the accidents occur outside of pilotage ground. We are in constant communication with the shipping interests on the other side and with shipping companies, and it has been shown that the reproaches to the St. Lawrence route were in many cases not well founded. We have been trying to re-establish the reputation of the St. Lawrence route, and the article which I cited from the 'Shipping Gazette' and 'Lloyd's List' is in that line. The article dated January 15, 1904, and is as follows :

Canada has gone ahead very rapidly during the past year, and Montreal, as the export centre of the Dominion, has unquestionably had its full share of the enhanced activity. In the 'Annual Review' which is issued by the Montreal 'Gazette,' it is stated that in the great staple products, the export business from Montreal during the season of navigation was larger than from any other port on the American continent, not excepting New York. 'No stronger evidence,' it is argued, 'of the cheapness, convenience, and advantage of the St. Lawrence route than this fact affords could well be given, nor can the end of the period of prosperity be yet discerned.' Notwithstanding, the year was not considered to be quite satisfactory by shipping men, and high rates of insurance on cargoes and hulls are mentioned as one of the causes. We are told, however, that it is possible to attach too much importance to this matter, and that, if insurance is the drawback it is represented to be, it is surprising that the established lines increase the traffic and that new ones spring up to compete with them. The real difficulty, it is suggested, is that keen competition has reduced the rates at Amercian ports to an abnormally low figure. On the other hand, it is frankly acknowledged that when freights are low the insurance question becomes of greater consequence. It would appear that the accidents on the St. Lawrence route were slightly heavier in 1903 than in the preceding year. Among the most serious were the total wreck of the 'Monterey,' and the disasters to the 'Norwegian' and the 'Manchester Trader.' But it is put forward that these accidents can hardly be ascribed to the danger of the route, since they have all been proved to be due to error in judgment or incompetency on the part of the navigators. It is claimed that, while the St. Lawrence route is a little more dangerous than any other, yet 'with a certain amount of care and alertness, all accidents might easily be avoided.' That is, perhaps, putting it rather high. No doubt carelessness has played a rather prominent part in certain St. Lawrence disasters, but insurance rates to a certain extent speak for themselves. Human judgment is probably no more fallible in the St. Lawrence than elsewhere, but aids to human judgment may possibly be numerous or less effective than in some other waters. Casualty, however, has happily not prevented Montreal's shipping from forging ahead. The total number of boats which arrived in the port was 797 last year, as against 758 in 1902. The net registered tonnage of 1,541,000 then recorded was last year exceeded by about 450,000 tons, the increase being largely due to the growth in size of the regular liners now engaged in Canadian trade. One of the main features of the year has, of course, been the acquisition of the Elder-Dempster and Beaver lines by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. By the service now established it is possible to convey passengers and goods from English ports to Chinese ports without their quitting the company's property. It is recorded that the Canadian Pacific Company have so far come up to the requirements, inasmuch as they made little change from the Elder-Dempster policy. The Finska-Lloyd, running monthly from La Pallice-Rochelle to Montreal, is also described as a successful venture, and so, likewise, is the enterprise of the Canadian Ocean and Inland Company, which gives a service between inland ports of Canada and Europe. The older lines all show an advance, both in the number of voyages and in tonnage.

Mr. FOWLER. The minister stated that there were more accidents last year than the year before. He has also stated that the number of casualties has kept pace with the increased tonnage. That being the case, it would seem that all of these improvements have not brought about the desired end, which is that the St. Lawrence route shall be more safe by reason of these improvements than it has been in the past. The minister has also said that the number of accidents was occasioned not by any dangers of the route but by carelessness or lack of judgment on the part of those navigating the route. Does it not stand to reason that the same conditions of carelessness prevailed in previous years ? The minister has not stated that the men navigating the St. Lawrence route last year were less competent than the men who navigated it in 1902, 1901 or 1900. Therefore we must take it for granted that the accidents caused by carelessness or bad judgment on the part of those navigators was as great in those years as in 1903. That being the case it seems to me that all the money we have expended in connection with the St. Lawrence route has not done away with the dangers of the route. I would like the minister to address himself to that phase of the question for a moment. We are anxious that a sufficient amount shall be expended to make the St. Lawrence route as safe as any route in the world. I would be glad if the hon. minister were in a position to convince the committee that the policy that his predecessor adopted before him is the right one and that it will bring about the end which we have in view; that is the real, bona fide improvement of the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have been wondering after listening to the discussion for three-quarters of an hour whether there is any other navigable water in the Dominion of Canada than the St. Lawrence river, especially that part of it between Montreal and Sorel. We are asked to vote $500,000 for the erection of lighthouses and aids to navigation, but we have not heard a word about any expenditure that is to be made outside of the little preserve of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman should have given us some information as to why all this money is to be dumped into the St. Lawrence river, which seems to me to be simply a dumping ground for the cash of this country, and has been for a great many years without producing very many results. I am sorry to hear the minister say that it may be four or five years yet before he or those who may succeed him will be able to announce that the St. Lawrence river would be at all fit for navigation. We know at the present time that practically it is not, because only very recently a serious accident occurred just in the neighbourhood of where the hon. gentleman is spending this very large sum of money.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. What accident does the hon. gentleman allude to?

Mr. HENDERSON. I allude to the accident on the St. Lawrence about four weeks ago, where one vessel ran into another.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. That was a collision.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not in the light of day, but in the light of the illumination, I should say, that the hon. gentleman has been endeavouring to spread over the St. Lawrence for the purpose of protecting the lives and property of the people of Canada. Yet, in face of this occurrence, we are told that we have to wait some four or five years more before we will be able to escape catastrophies of that kind. But I desire to speak seriously upon this matter. I hope the hon. gentleman is not going to spend all his money in the upper St. Lawrence, between Montreal and Sorel, because there are other parts of the country that are entitled to receive some little consideration from the hon. gentleman. I am not going to ask very much of him, but I hope he will grant the little I do ask, and I trust at the same time that he will extend beyond even what I ask and give his careful attention to the regions to the west of Montreal, because there must be many parts of the country where lighthouses will be required. I believe that on the upper lakes, Lake Superior especially, he will find ample opportunity for spending money and improving the system to assist the enormous amount of navigation that is coursing through those waters. I presume the hon. minister has visited the St. Clair river at some time in his life. If he has not visited Sarnia within the last five or ten years, I would counsel him to pay a flying visit to that district and to sit down for about half an hour and watch the number of vessels which pass during that time. I am quite sure he would be astonished. I have heard it said that on that river, and I have not the slightest doubt but what it is quite true, there are more vessels passing through than there are practically crossing the Atlantic ocean. There is an enormous amount of navigation on the upper lakes and rivers, and yet it seems that all these waters are to be neglected for the sake of the improvement of the St. Lawrence river. I draw the hon. minister's attention to the fact that the navigation of the St. Lawrence is a mere trifle. It is a very small thing compared with the navigation of the upper lakes and the rivers connecting these lakes. I do not suppose it amounts to a tenth part—perhaps I may not be far astray when I say the twentieth part—of the navigation of these inland waters, and surely the hon. gentleman will be able to spare some of this $500,000 to give some attention to the lighting up of the rivers and lakes west of Montreal. But the particular item to which I desire to draw the attention of the hon. minister is one in which I am rather personally interested, and I think I need only mention it to bring it to the recollection of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I say Minister of Marine and Fisheries, because the matter I refer to has more reference to fisheries than to marine. One year ago, after the hon. gentleman came into office, I drew his attention to the case in my own county of the little town of Bronte, where the government had been constructing a wharf and dredging out the mouth of the creek for the purpose of improving the harbour. I desire to remind him that in that neighbourhood, in Lake Ontario, adjacent to the town of Bronte, a very considerable amount of fishing is going on. It is the home of the Cisco herring. The fishery extends out ten or fifteen miles, and a very large amount of fishing is being done. Very frequently, in the late autumn, storms blow up on the lake and the fishermen, as on the Atlantic coast, are subjected to very great danger. Sometimes the men are caught out in a storm while setting or taking in their nets, and on a dark night it is difficult for them to find their way back to port. I have asked the minister—and I am sorry to say that no action has been taken—if he could not take, say, $200 or $300—I do not think it would cost more than $200—to erect a skeleton lighthouse sufficiently high to place a light that will be seen for ten or fifteen miles out by the fishermen on a dark night. It need only be lighted for a comparatively small portion of the year, but it would be a guide to the fishermen in the darkness to a port of safety, and perhaps be the means of saving valuable lives. The expenditure would be small compared with the advantages that would be gained, and I am quite sure that the minister would not only confer a favour on these people, but that he would receive their hearty approbation and thanks if he would not allow this matter to drift along year after year, but if he would put somebody to work on this small job, and during the current summer, before the rough weather of the fall sets in, have a light erected there in order to give to these people the advantage which I have suggested.

I presume the minister will tell me that he does not want to erect a lighthouse until the pier is built. I think I can remove that difficulty. The minister can erect a light at the end of the pier so far as it has been completed, and if that be found an unsuitable location, and I do not think it will, it can be changed afterwards to the end of the pier when completed. Heretofore lights have been built upon the bank of the lake or the people have placed lights in their windows hoping that the fishermen would see them, so that I am sure a lighthouse erected at the present end of the pier would be an improvement. The construction of this wharf seems to be one of these interminable jobs that have a beginning and never have an end. It has been going on for four years, whereas if ordinary business sense had been applied the whole work including the lighthouse would have been constructed in one or two seasons, so that in the dark and stormy nights of the fall, the fishermen would be able to return thanks to him for the consideration shown for their welfare by providing this necessary essential to their operations. I appeal to the minister to be good enough to give this matter his immediate attention, and if he does I am sure it will be appreciated in that section of the country.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I have given this matter all the attention it deserves. After the hon. gentleman spoke to me on this matter last session, the chief engineer of the department was sent up there in September and this is his report :

Report :

I have to report that in accordance with instructions I visited Bronte on the 19th inst., and put myself in communication with Mr. W. H. Speers, and in company with Mr. Speers, Dr. Bucke, ex-reeve of the township, the contractor for the breakwater, and other residents, I inspected the harbour, which is an artificial one, formed by building two cribwork breakwaters out into the lake from the mouth of Bronte creek. This small harbour is the headquarters of a large trade in ciscoes, but this year the fish have not struck in and consequently very little fishing has been done out of Bronte.

The breakwaters are not completed, and I find the feeling general that the work of establishing a lighthouse should be postponed until the completion of the breakwaters.

I consider this work can be allowed to stand over without any detriment to the interest of navigation.

WM. P. ANDERSON,
Chief engineer.

In the face of this report of the chief engineer I do not see what I could do, but of course I would be disposed to look into it again. I can put the matter before the lighthouse board, and if they decide that this light is more needed than others I will abide by their decision and erect it with great pleasure.

Mr. HENDERSON. When I represented the matter to the minister last year, he thought I had made out a very good case and he practically assured me that the light would be erected. I quite understand the purpose of these delays. The elections are coming on——

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Surely the hon. gentleman does not suspect the intention of the chief engineer ; surely he does not cast a doubt on the chief engineer's honesty and integrity.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say nothing about the chief engineer, but so far as the minister is concerned I have not the slightest suspicion, because I am quite satisfied without suspecting. This lighthouse was promised in 1890 by the gentleman who opposed me in the riding——

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That would be under the Conservative government.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should have said in 1900, I am obliged to the Postmaster General for correcting me. I believe the Postmaster General spoke to these fishermen in Bronte, and while I do not know that he promised the light, his friend whom he took there did.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I think I never had the honour of meeting the gentlemen of Bronte.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Postmaster General must have forgotten, and judging from his remarks yesterday he seeems to be very familiar with the question. There is no doubt that it was promised and promised for a purpose——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. For the purpose of giving light.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not so much for the purpose of throwing light upon Bronte, as throwing light upon something else, and I may tell the minister that the purpose was accomplished. The people took the Liberal candidate at his word, and gave him their votes so that instead of having a majority of possibly fourteen, which the Liberal candidate formerly had he raised the majority to fifty. The people did their part, but I will not promise the Minister of Marine, that if he does not do his part the people will continue to do as they did before. I believe they will get out of patience and come to the conclusion that once or twice is often enough to be fooled in that way. I do not think the engineer has said that it would not be advisable to erect this light, but whether or not, I am satisfied that it is a very desirable thing to do. I have been in the village of Bronte on a dark stormy night, and I know that the utmost concern was felt for the safety of the poor men out in the lake who had no means of guiding themselves back to harbour. We are making provision here for lights on the Atlantic coast and other places, for their protection, and there is no reason why the important fishing station of Bronte should not be provided for too. I do not believe in making fish of one and flesh of another. This fishing industry at Bronte, spoken of so lightly by the engineer, is very much more extensive than he perhaps has knowledge of. I am not aware that it is decreasing. I agree that it varies from year to year, but at any rate a great number of people are fishermen, and they have their money invested in boats and nets. They make their livelihood out of fishing and they should be facilitated in their industry just as well as the fishermen on the Atlantic coast and down on the Bay of Fundy.

These fishermen do not get any bounty; they do not ask it; I do not say that they are entitled to it. But they contribute their share to the taxation of this country, and why should they not get something back in the shape of improvements which are very desirable and necessary? I was led to understand by the minister last year that this was something that was to be accomplished and I regret very much to hear the minister to-night throwing cold water on it, and bringing at this late date a report from his engineer discrediting the erection of this lighthouse. I do not ask for anything extravagant. I do not think it would cost a private individual over $200, and I do not think it would cost the government over $300. I invite the minister to look into the matter again, and I trust he will change his mind and give these people a little more kindly consideration than he has meted out to them in the past.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. There are some additional lights on the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec, but very few additional stations. Will the minister explain how this is? What is the extra cost of putting additional lights at a station? Does it entail any extra men or any extra expense?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. There are different kinds of stations. There are lighthouses and fog or signal stations. There are no light stations between Montreal and Sorel, but there are forty-five additional gas buoys and some range lights and other lights that have been re-arranged in order to make the navigation perfectly safe during the night.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Is the navigation so safe now that a vessel can go at night at full speed all the way through?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I notice that in the report of some investigations into shipwrecks it is said that in one case the vessel was only going at the rate of four knots an hour, I take it in the day time. I notice in the pamphlet which the minister circulates, and which is very much like a campaign document, all the comparisons being between the year 1896 and the year 1903, that there has been an increase in the number of lights of 46, while there has only been an increase of four stations. There has been a decrease in the number of lightships of two. No increase in bomb signals, nine in 1903, the same as in 1896. Steam fog whistles two in each case, steam fog horns nine in each year, gas buoys ten in 1896—increased to twelve in 1903. Wooden buoys increase from 140 to 170, day beacons unchanged 59 in each case. Surely if the St. Lawrence was in such a bad shape seven years ago, the additional thirty wooden buoys and forty-six additional lights at the stations that were already there have not made very much improvement. I think this route requires a great deal more attention from the hon. minister than it has received. It is the outlet for more than half the goods exported from this country. Last year no less than $132,000,000 of goods passed down that route. It should be made so safe that there would be none of these casualties. The minister in his annual report shows that there were investigations into nine casualties along that route, while there were at least an equal number that were not investigated. In view of these facts, there must be something wrong with the route—not a sufficient number of lights or buoys properly placed. In one of the casualties it was stated that the buoys were out of place. What method does the minster take to see that the buoys are kept in place?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Special officers are appointed to look after the buoys and keep them in place, and they are patrolling the St. Lawrence all the time. Sometimes it happens that a buoy gets out of place. It may be dragged by a boat that may have stranded near the buoy. As soon as this is brought to the notice of the official in charge, if he is not himself on the spot, it is remedied. Such things will happen, and cannot be prevented. We have completed the lighting of the channel on both sides between Montreal and Sorel, and we are completing the balance. We are attending not only to the ocean route of the St. Lawrence, but also to the upper St. Lawrence, doing everything that has been asked by the Marine Association on the lakes. We are making these improvements as fast as we can get the apparatus and the material.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I would like to ask the minister what power he exercises with regard to the southern points of Newfoundland.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. We have no power. All we can do in these foreign waters is draw the attention of the Home government to anything that is wrong. There are accidents charged to the St. Lawrence route which do not belong to it. Take the accident to the 'Monterey' on the coast of St. Pierre and Miquelon. Those islands are in the gulf of the St. Lawrence, but the accident took place within the range of one of the best lighthouses in the world. Could we be held responsible for that? Other accidents have happened for which the aids to navigation should not be blamed, but which were due to mistakes on the part of mariners and pilots.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. No doubt there are shipwrecks which are not due to the lack of aids to navigation, but the St. Lawrence route must compare unfavourably with that of New York, since the insurance rates are so much higher. I am of the opinion that our St. Lawrence route can be made almost, if not quite, as safe as the New York route, and the government would be justified in going to any reasonable expense to bring about that result. Has the minister investigated thoroughly the question of submarine signals? There are appliances which are claimed to be very effective for finding out the approach of other vessels or ice floes. What is the result of the investigation which the minister made on the coast of the United States?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. At present we are installing four stations of wireless telegraphy down in the gulf—the Marconi system. We have investigated on the sound between New York and Boston a new invention which is called the submarine bell signal. Examinations have been made from time to time for over three years of this invention. It has been recommended specially by the lighthouse board and all the shippping interests, but we have not yet adopted it. The question may come up later in the supplementaries if we can come to some satisfactory arrangement with the inventors. Besides these wireless stations we are providing new fog alarms to replace those which have become obsolete.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. What has the hon. gentleman done with regard to the pilots? Two, if not three of them were blamed entirely for certain accidents. I understand that the pilotage system on the St. Lawrence, has not been for years what it should be, and steps should be taken to make it perfect. No pilot should be allowed to take charge of a vessel unless he has a certificate.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The hon. gentleman must know that the pilots are obliged to submit to an examination every year and they cannot get a branch before they have served a certain number of years as apprentice—seven years, I think. It is well known that during the past few years the present government have been trying to improve the pilotage system. An investigation into the whole system was made in 1897, and the recommendations of the commissioners were embodied in laws adopted by parliament from time to time since that date. I certainly am not open to any reproach for any neglect in that respect. When I took charge of the department, I put myself in communication with the pilots, and I had special means of knowing the conditions as I had been a harbour commissioner in Montreal during many years. I convinced the pilots that they could improve their methods and inspire greater confidence by organizing differently, and I induced them to renounce their allegiance to the harbour commissioners of Montreal, and accept entirely the direction and control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, under certain rules and regulations which were approved by them. Since the opening of navigation, there has only been one accident on the St. Lawrence route, which could be attributable to the fault of the pilots, and that is the extraordinary accident which occurred three weeks ago, when a steamer of the Richelieu Company, the 'Canada' came into collision with the 'Cape Breton.' The investigation into this accident will begin Monday, and the responsibility be placed where it belongs. There were two accidents last year on the Saguenay river due to the fault of the pilots. A boat was stranded on the rocks in broad daylight, and this was not due to any lack of aids to navigation, but to the fault of the pilot, who did not know the Saguenay route.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. What sort of an examination did he pass?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I do not control the examinations to which these pilots are submitted by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners. This particular pilot had served seven years apprenticeship and had been a pllot for quite a number of years. Unfortunately, the harbour commissioners of Quebec did not provide pilots for the Sa-guenay that knew the river as they should know it. I have now taken over control of the pilotage for the Saguenay river, and hope to be able to provide pilots that have passed a special examination for that river. The fact is, we have been working on these improvements for every quarter where they have been found necessary, and we have been doing our best to inspire the confidence of the shipping interest. The result is that any improvement that we have made is received with nothing but praise by the shipping people.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the hon. minister explain the expenditure in connection with the lighting system in the harbour of Halifax ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I take it that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) refers to the lightship. A lightship had been contracted for my predecessor, to be delivered, I think, in August. The ship was delivered a little late, but still it was installed last fall. This lightship was called the Lurcher, and was installed on the Lurcher shoal, always a difficult point and one for which this improvement has been asked for years and years. The installation of this lightship has given great satisfaction to the shipping interest.

Mr. BLAIN. I understand that there had also been the purchase of a wharf there ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. We purchased a wharf at Dartmouth on the other side of the harbour from Halifax. It was purchased from Mr. George J. Troop. We wanted the property as a place to keep the oil, gas buoys and other things of that kind necessary in connection with the appliances for the safety of navigation in the waters of that section. We have not yet expended any money on the property itself, but, in the supplementary estimates we shall ask a little money to put the property in such a condition as to make it useful to the department.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman did not state the price.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I think it was $15,000. It was considered a very low price. The department was told that we could not get a property at that figure, but we managed to do it.

Mr. SPROULE. Have any of these gas lights been established in Georgian bay ? If not, how many is it contemplated to establish during the present year, and where are they to be ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Eight gas and one gas beacon.

Mr. SPROULE. Where ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. On Kill Bear Point.

Mr. SPROULE. As I understand the minister's explanation this afternoon, the intention is to do away with the series of light keepers and establish acetylene gas lights.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. That is the intention. But we can only make these improvements as we get the necessary appliances. In order to carry on the work extensively on Georgian bay, we shall require a station somewhere about Parry Sound I do not know exactly where we shall choose the site—to keep apparatus, to prepare the gas buoys and gas, and keep the holders and carry on the work of changing them.

Mr. BLAIN. I suppose the hon. gentleman has estimated the cost of maintenance of the acetylene system as against the old system.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I gave the figures the other night. They showed, I think, that the lights would be about thirty per cent cheaper and about five or six times more penetrating and with greater illuminating power.

Mr. DANIEL. What is the illuminant on the Lurcher lightship ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Electricity.

Mr. DANIEL. She has a dynamo aboard?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. In reading the reports of the commissioner in charge of the investigations into casualties, I find it indicated that the pilots were not well posted at all. For instance, in the investigation into the wreck of the 'Iberian,' Captain Salmon the commissioner says :

> The court is of the opinion that pilots should have a better knowledge of the compass and charts and steer by compass when the buoys are so far apart as to be invisible one from the other, instead of trusting entirely to shore marks, which in the present instance were ill-defined.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. E. D. Smith) surely will not hold me responsible for pilots who were examined fifteen or twenty years ago. I am trying to improve the system as I have already had the honour to state. It is true that this is one of the points to which attention has been drawn by Captain Salmon, and we are trying to improve the examinations for pilots. For instance, this year the examination we have given the pilots to pass is most severe, so as to make sure that only those are appointed who are able to render the services we expect from them, and to inspire the confidence of the people. But surely I cannot be held responsible for pilots passed under insufficient examination by the harbour commissioners of Quebec or of Montreal or of Halifax. They were not under my control as those at Montreal and the Saguenay are at the present time. The others are not directly under my control and I cannot reach them except by amending the law. And surely hon. gentlemen opposite will grant me the necessary time to have these laws passed. This year I have had a couple of amendments put through, and I have others to propose. But these things must be done gradually. You have to deal with a body of people who have been left, to a certain extent, independent and, of course, there is always a good deal of difficulty in reaching them, and it is impossible to reach them at once—it takes time. Formerly, for instance, candidates were not examined as regards their sight or hearing, and in other respects the examination was very poor. We have changed that as regards the pilots of Montreal and we are trying to do the same thing with regard to the rest of the Dominion wherever we can arrive at an improvement.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I would suggest that the authority seems to be very much divided. The Minister of Marine has under his care only a portion of the pilots. The harbour commissioners of Quebec seem to have control of some of them. I think this parliament would be very glad to allow the minister opportunity to bring in amendments of the law so as to take under his care the whole of these pilots.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I suppose the hon gentleman will consult my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) in the matter because he is the defender of the pilots and will have to take care of them. I am going as fast as I can, and some think I am going too fast, but I am doing the best I can.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. In case the minister amends the Act, would he suggest that these old pilots, who were examined fifteen years ago, will have to pass a new examination ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. By all means.

Salaries of temporary officers, engineers and draughtsmen at Ottawa, at rates exceeding $400 per annum, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $12,000.

Mr. SPROULE. There is an increase over last year of $2,500.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. On account of the expansion of the department and the construction of new lights, the department has had to employ additional draughtsmen, and for that reason the amount is increased.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the minister give us the details ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. This increase goes to temporary clerks, draughtsmen, &c. This was as follows :

	Per annum.
H. E. Fosbery, draughtsmen	$ 850
J. W. C. Roberts "	840
W. C. Surtees "	800
J. F. Murphy "	750
F. J. Alexander, engineer and draughtsman	1,200
E. C. Larose, engineer and draughtsman	$ 1,200
Esther Edmonds, stenographer and clerk	500
Agnes O'Connor, stenographer and clerk	500
J. L. Burnand, stenographer and clerk	550
Mildred LaFleur, stenographer and clerk	500
Bessie Blount, stenographer and clerk	500
L. F. Gorman, stenographer and clerk	600
Ido Têtu, stenographer and clerk	550
H. Tremblay " "	700
R. Frechette " "	720
	$10,760

Then there is Mr. J. R. Boudreau, $1,200 ; and Mr. J. Rochon, $500, which brings the amount up to $12,460.

Mr. TAYLOR. How many of these are new men last year ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. They change to some extent. Sometimes they think that they will improve their situation and they leave the department and we replace them by others, and do the best we can under the circumstances. I think there are four new ones.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is a heavy increase for one year.

To provide for wireless stations at Point Amour, Heath Point, Anticosti, Fame Point, Cape Race, Belle Isle and Sable island, $25,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. Has this money been spent ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. No, part of it is being spent at the present time. I think that by the 15th of August the four stations will be installed.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is the total cost of one of these stations ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. About $5,000. We have to provide a boat with a crew to carry the material and workmen.

Mr. TAYLOR. $25,000 was voted last year. Was that spent ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. No, that was returned. The operation of the Fame Point station began on June 9th. The test has proven that it is a complete success. Communication was maintained at a distance of 65 miles up and down with the 'Parisian.' It takes about fourteen days to establish a station, and the work is now going on. The contract made with the Marconi Company is that if it is a success they are to be paid, if it is not we pay nothing except the expenditure which we incur in carrying material and men to the different stations.

Mr. SPROULE. How many stations are there now ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. We have only one established at the present time, but the contract is for four stations. However, we intend to establish more. We intend to establish a station on Sable island, one at Sydney, one at Fame Point, one at Cape Race and one at Belle Isle.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. Are most of the ocean liners coming into Montreal fitted with wireless telegraphy apparatus, so that they can communicate with these stations ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Three of the lines, the Allan Line, the Elder-Dempster Line and the Beaver Line are fitted with the apparatus, the other lines are coming in and installing the apparatus.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the minister intend to establish a station at each of these points ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. There are seven stations then, not four.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. We have contracted only for four, but we intend to establish more.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I am correct in understanding that $25,000 is sufficient to provide for the seven stations ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. No, not for the seven. I do not think we will have time to establish that number before the vote lapses. We will have to provide in the supplementary estimates for a further sum, deducting whatever has not been expended out of this sum.

To provide for the expenses of the Montreal Pilot Commissioner's Court, $2,000.

Mr. BLAIN. How many cases were tried by this court last year ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I think there have been two or three cases tried by this commissioner.

Mr. BLAIN. What is the nature of the cases ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. $18,000 was expended last year for investigations which took place through this commissioner in Montreal.

Mr. DANIEL. Would the minister state the number of casualties and wrecks that took place in Canadian waters ? The report gives the details of those that occurred in the Gulf of St. Lawrence only, and simply gives the total number of those that occurred in Canadian waters. Where can one ascertain the particulars of those wrecks that occurred in Canadian waters, but not in the Gulf of St. Lawrence ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Every wreck that was investigated is mentioned in the report, but those that take place outside of Canadian waters are not investigated.

Mr. DANIEL. I am speaking of those that did occur in Canadian waters, but not in the Gulf of St. Lawrence or the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. On pages 86 to 93 of the report of the department the hon. gentleman will find a complete report of the investigations into wrecks.

Mr. DANIEL. Those investigations, I take it, refer to those casualties that occurred in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and from that out.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Every place where there is a casualty.

Mr. DANIEL. This refers to the investigations that were held ; was an investigation held into every wreck that occurred ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. An investigation was held into every wreck where we had jurisdiction. That was the demand made by the different boards of trade throughout the country.

Repairs to wharfs, $3,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Where are these wharfs located ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Small sums are spent by the department in repairing wharfs situated in different parts of the country which are under the control of the department not exceeding $15.

Scientific institutions and hydrographic surveys, magnetic observatory, $2,700.

Mr. SPROULE. Where is that ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. At Agincourt, near Toronto.

Hydrographic surveys, $35,000.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the hydrographic survey being continued on Lake Superior ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. How long do you expect it will take the department to complete the work up there ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. It is pretty hard for me to say. I am taking over the hydrographic survey work of the Department of Railways and Canals and Department of Public Works. I am organizing these surveys in such a way as to be in a position within the next five or six months to know exactly how long it will take to complete what has been undertaken. There is work that has been done for the last five years on certain rivers and lakes but the charts have not been published. This is a service that will have to be completely organized. I suppose the work in the Lake Superior region will be completed in a year from now. I do not say that the charts will be completed but we will be able to have them published as soon as their preparation is completed. We have been asked to survey large lakes in different parts of the country. Of course we will do that gradually as the expansion of the country goes on. We will take the Ottawa river this year because a hydrographic survey of the Ottawa river has never been properly made. The navigators on the Ottawa river are very anxious to get a chart of that river.

Mr. SPROULE. Where were you operating last year ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. On Lake Superior.

Mr. SPROULE. Lake Superior is a large lake.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Near Port Arthur.

Mr. SPROULE. Do you intend to start another party to survey the St. Lawrence and allow the work to go on on Lake Superior as you have been doing for some years past ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Oh, of course.

Marine hospitals—care of sick seamen in the marine hospitals in the maritime provinces and repairs to marine hospitals, $50,000.

Mr. SPROULE. Are these confined to the maritime provinces ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. No, in other places we make arrangements with the local hospitals by which seamen are taken care of at a certain price.

Mr. SPROULE. You pay so much per capita ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. What is the expense entailed for attending sick mariners in the harbour of St. John and how are they attended ? I notice that the department have collected in sick mariner's dues over $6,000 at that port and I would like to know how much was expended in looking after the sick mariners ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. There was collected at St. John, $6,466 and in the province of New Brunswick 428 sick seamen were treated. I have not the figures showing how much it cost. If they are treated at the hospital they are charged at ninety cents per day. We collect a good deal more than we pay and that is a very live question. It was brought up last year but there was no decision arrived at. Surely we will have to come to some understanding with the shipping people so that they may take care of their own seamen as is done in other countries. It is my opinion that they should, although I do not know whether that opinion will be endorsed by the government.

Mr. DANIEL. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether the amount paid to the hospital for each sick sailor per day has been increased from ninety cents per day ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. We are going to put it at the same rate as in Montreal, where it is $1.20 per day.

Mr. DANIEL. When will that increase commence ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. On the 1st July.

Steamboat inspection—inspector of Dominion steamers and fog-alarms, $1,700.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. I would like to ask the hon. minister how long this gentleman has been in this position as inspector of Dominion steamers and fog alarms ?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. About twenty years.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. It would seem from the report of the investigations into the shipwrecks that he has not been looking very carefully after the requirements of the route. With regard to the stranding of the barque 'Sardhana' the report states with reference to the aids to navigation :

The fog system at Pointe des Monts is insufficient ; the evidence of various witnesses goes to show that it was impossible to hear the fog signal even after the vessel stranded.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. It is on the recommendation of Mr. Stephens and the chief engineer that we have decided to incur this heavy expenditure to improve the fog alarms. The old machinery was good, but it was not strong enough, and as the changing involved a large expenditure, and as other things were more pressing, the department did not go on with the expenditure but we have decided to do so now.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. The minister cannot spend money on any service in the Dominion where it is more needed.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Give me a chance ; I am well disposed.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. The department is spending a great deal more money now than formerly, and I regret that there has not been a corresponding increase in the efficiency of the service. I would urge on the minister to devote all his energies to perfecting the route and making it as safe as possible.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. You may be sure I will.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up to-morrow ?

Mr. FIELDING. I understand the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will be absent.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I have a few small supplementary items, which will not take much time, but I would like to dispose of them to-morrow, as it is the end of the year.

Mr. FIELDING. I think the Minister of the Interior will follow the Postmaster General.

Mr. TAYLOR. It was promised that we would not sit after six o'clock to-morrow, if we made progress and we have made excellent progress to-night.

Mr. FIELDING. There was some impression of that kind in the mind of the Prime Minister, but we will leave it until to-morrrow. I do not say nay, to the proposal.

Mr. TAYLOR. It would be convenient for many members to know if they could get away by the seven o'clock train.

Mr. FIELDING. I think that is the way the matter will eventuate, but I would prefer the Prime Minister to make the statement when the House opens.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.12 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, June 30, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

NORTHERN BANK.

Mr. SCOTT moved that Bill (No. 146) respecting the Northern Bank be placed on the Orders of the Day for the second reading on Monday next, the 4th of July.

Motion agreed to.

THOROLD AND LAKE ERIE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. GERMAN moved for leave to present a petition for the passing of an Act to amend Bill (No. 61), passed this session to incorporate the Thorold and Lake Erie Railway Company. He said: There were two or three mistakes in the Bill in the names of the incorporators, and the word 'navigation' is printed 'transportation.' This Bill is to correct these clerical errors.

Mr. SPROULE. Could not the Bill be amended without introducing a new one?

Mr. GERMAN. I mentioned the matter to the Clerk of the House, and he suggested that this would be the proper way to make the corrections.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Send the petition to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. GERMAN. I beg leave to move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK.

NATURALIZATION AND ALIENS.

Hon. CHAS. FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice) moved first reading of Bill (No. 147) to amend the Acts relating to Naturalization of Aliens. He said: This Bill will apply exclusively to the province of Quebec, and is designed to meet a difficulty which exists there. In that province applications for naturalization must be made to a judge of the circuit court of the district in which the alien resides. But the circuit court of a district travels from place to place, and the question has arisen whether or not the applications must be made to the court sitting in the chief place of the county. It is a trifling matter, and I cannot understand how the difficulty has arisen, but probably some clerk of the court wants to avoid difficulty, and I am asked to make the point clear.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. KENDALL—by Mr. Calvert—asked:

1. What are the names of the employees on the Intercolonial Railway, including the Prince Edward Island Railway, who have been killed during the last ten years?

2. What are the names of the employees on the Intercolonial Railway who have lost limbs, or who have been otherwise permanently incapacitated, by accident, during the last ten years?

3. Whose relatives, if any, of the above have received compensation for death; and what amount in each case?

4. Who have received compensation for injury resulting in permanent disability; and what amount in each case?

5. What amounts have been paid by the government to representatives of persons killed on duty in the postal service?

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General):

1, 2, 3 and 4 relate to the Department of Railways and Canals.

5. A. C. Edgecombe, employed on the Intercolonial Railway, killed 26th January, 1897, at Palmer's Pond. Payment of $2,000 to family granted in 1897.

J. O'Connor, employed on Grand Trunk Railway, injured in collison near Thornhill, Ontario, 25th January, 1886; superannuated 1st September, 1895, never having fully recovered. Died shortly afterwards. Payment of $2,000 made in 1899.

J. Campbell, employed on Canadian Pacific Railway, killed 23rd February, 1899, at Boyd's Mills, Maine Central Railway. Payment made in 1900.

W. Starkie killed at Moosehead Lake, Maine Central Railway, July 2nd, 1894. Payment made in 1901.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals. That portion of the question relating to the Railway Department. cannot be answered except in the shape of a return as it would take quires of paper to cover the information.

IRON AND STEEL BOUNTIES.

Mr. KENDALL—by Mr. Calvert—asked :

What amounts in the form of bounties have been paid by the government month by month to the Dominion Iron and Steel Company since it began the manufacture of iron and steel.

POSTMASTER AT MAYNOOTH.

Mr. PORTER asked :

1. Has the postmaster at Maynooth, county of Hastings, been dismissed.

2. If so, has his successor been appointed ? What is his name, and upon what recommendawas he so appointed ?

3. What was the cause of the dismissal? Was there any investigation ? And if so, upon whose complaint ; and when, where, and by whom was such investigation held ; and what was the report, if any, made thereon, and when was it made ?

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General). The management of the Maynooth post office under the late postmaster was extremely unsatisfactory owing to continuous carelessness in the handling of mail matter and in the general management of the office. Not only was this the case in respect of unregistered but also of registered letters, serious delays occurring in their delivery. Numerous complaints because of such irregularities were made on behalf of patrons, but nevertheless the irregularities instead of being remedied were allowed to continue without any abatement. The postmaster himself gave little or no attention to the office leaving its management to the clerks, who were constantly changing, and who continued to make mistakes, frequently delivering mail matter to the wrong persons and making other mistakes. An official investigation was held which showed the management to be as above mentioned and in consequence a change was made in the postmastership, Mr. James Haryett being appointed postmaster.

DOMINION DAY ADJOURNMENT.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) moved :

That when the House is adjourned this day, Thursday, it stand adjourned until Monday next at Eleven o'clock a.m.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE. I would suggest to the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that the resolution should be amended so as to read three o'clock on Monday. Monday being the first working day of the week there will be very few members in attendance in the forenoon, and those who will be absent would naturally desire to be here when the work of the House goes on. It has been suggested to me by several that if we commence the morning sittings on Tuesday, it will be quite satisfactory, but to commence them on Monday would hardly be so, as they cannot be here in time. The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) himself will not be here until the afternoon.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will ask leave to amend my motion in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule).

Motion as amended agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—MORNING SITTINGS.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). As will be seen by the order paper, I have given notice of motion for morning sittings commencing on Monday next, but, in accordance with the resolution just passed, I must ask leave to amend that so as to read Tuesday next. I move :

That commencing with Tuesday next, and until the end of the session, the House shall meet on that day, and on each subsequent sitting day, at eleven o'clock in the morning. That, in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p. m., there shall be also an intermission every day from one to three o'clock p.m.; and that government orders shall have precedence at all such sittings, members having still the right to ask questions on Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON. I have no desire to prolong the session more than is necessary, but I must enter my protest against the commencement of morning sittings at this time. Possibly, the right hon. First Minister has not taken into consideration the important committee work that is yet to be done. We have important questions before the Railway Committee, and the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and there is at least one special committee, of which I have the honour of being a member, a committee which is sitting, I might almost say, day by day and endeavouring to get into shape the very important Bill respecting the inspection of grain. The committee has not yet finished with that Bill, and we shall require to have, at any rate, one more sitting if not more. I, for one, do not like the idea of being obliged to absent myself from meetings of the House to attend to committee work, nor do I like to absent myself from any important committee on which I am placed—and the First Minister knows that even a member of parliament cannot be in two places at the same time. I think that nothing will be lost if the right hon. gentleman will agree to postpone the morning sittings until the beginning of the week after next, thus allowing the committees to complete their work. If this resolution is carried either the committee work must be neglected, or the work of the House must be neglected, and I am sure the right hon. gentleman does not wish to place the members in such a position that they must desert their duties in either one place or the other.

Hon. WM. ROSS (Victoria). I hope the suggestion of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) will not be accepted. The trouble is that there is too much delay by members absenting themselves from the House to go away pleasure seeking. If there is any difficulty arising through the adoption of the Prime Minister's resolution, it can be got over by having the committees meet earlier in the morning at 9 or 9.30, instead of 11 o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Make it seven.

Hon. WM. ROSS (Victoria). I know that as to any committees I have to attend—and I am a member of four—I will be there at nine o'clock, if it should be so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—COMMITTEE MEETINGS.

Mr. M. K. COWAN moved :

That the Select Standing Committees of this House have leave to sit during the time of this session.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON. I protest against that motion, for I think it would establish a very bad precedent and would encourage members to leave their duties in this House to attend to the work of committees. I would rather adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Wm. Ross) and have these committees meet at an earlier hour. If necessary, let the committees meet at nine o'clock, but by no means let the work of the committees interfere with our duties in this House. For my part I decline to be called away from the meetings of the House to a committee, even if it is an important committee, and I shall be obliged, perhaps, to take the position of neglecting altogether the committee work if it is to go on during the sittings of the House. I think this is altogether an improper motion.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I would not say that the motion of my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Cowan) is an improper one, but I think it is, perhaps, a premature one. I would suggest to him not to press his motion to-day. If any committee cannot do its work without sitting during the time the House is in session, leave can be moved for later on.

Mr. SPEAKER. On the report of the committee.

Motion withdrawn.

HON. SYDNEY FISHER—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a personal explanation. I find the following in this morning's 'Citizen' on the first editorial page :

Of what does Hon. Sydney Fisher's military experience consist ? Has he ever taken a rifle to defend his country ? No, this does not suit his book. What he prefers is that some one else should do the fighting and he should draw the pay. Mr. Rufus Pope, M.P., made a statement recently in the House of Commons to the effect that the Hon. Sydney Fisher, M.P., for Brome and Minister of Agriculture in the government of Canada, once lent a horse to a trooper in a cavalry corps who was entitled to and received from government the sum of $12 for the horse during the twelve days of camp. Was Mr. Fisher satisfied with this horse-hire? It was the amount allowed by this government of which he was then a member to enable a trooper to provide himself with a horse and was thus fixed as a fair equivalent. No, this did not suit our modern Shylock. 'The responsible minister for the district,' demands from the trooper not only the amount allowed for the services of the horse but in addition the poor fellow's hard-earned and paltry pittance of fifty cents a day !

Having looked up 'Hansard,' I find that the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) did make some such statement in the House as is here referred to. I was not paying any attention to the hon. gentleman, and therefore did not deny his statement at the time. I have only this to say : It is true that, a few years ago, I was keeping a horse in a livery stable in Ottawa. It was the duty of the livery stable keeper to exercise the horse when I was away. On one occasion during my absence, the livery stable keeper let the horse to a trooper of the Princess Louise Dragoon Guards. No charge was made for the use of the horse; I did not receive any money for the use of the horse either from the trooper who used it or from anybody else. The statements made in this editorial are absolutely false and have no foundation in fact. I find that some hon. gentleman think that what the hon. member for Compton said was in regard to a horse in the eastern townships. I have only to say that I never let a horse to anybody or received any pay for any horse, either in the eastern townships or here or anywhere else, that was to be used in the militia of Canada.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY. May I again repeat the question I put to the government yesterday as to when we may expect the papers to be brought down with respect to the seizures of binder twine?

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (Minister of Trade and Commerce). I made inquiry about that. I do not know when the order was made, but it was only delivered to my department two days ago. The papers are being prepared.

Mr. CLANCY. A slow order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was slow in reaching me.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Post Office Department—provisional allowance to employees in the branches of the dead letter office at Winnipeg and Vancouver, $305.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General). There are five clerks entitled to the benefit of this provisional allowance, one at $20, three at $60, and one at $105.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister promised to bring down some correspondence between the letter-carriers and the Postmaster General.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes, I have something here in relation to that matter. I find that out of a total number of 656 letter carriers, 251 elected to come in under the new Act, 146 were appointed under the new Act, leaving 259 who have not elected to come in under the Act. Referring to this item, provisional allowances have been granted to these clerks for many years, in Manitoba, the Territories and British Columbia, over and above the pay they would receive in the east, on account of the greater cost of living in the west, and we have recently increased that allowance from $10 to $15 a month. These clerks are engaged in the dead-letter branch. As hon. gentlemen may remember, this branch, which is in the inside service at Ottawa, has been distributed throughout Canada. Recently we obtained power from parliament to carry on that work in different parts of the Dominion, and we are distributing the staff, though they still belong to the inside service.

To pay M. W. Sloan, railway mail clerk, who sustained injuries while on duty which prevented his performing the work of a railway mail clerk, the mileage allowance that he would have earned had he been so employed for the period between November 15th 1898, and January 31, 1904, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or the Post Office Act, $2,224.51.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Mr. Sloan was injured in a railway accident at Murray Hill, on the Grand Trunk Railway, on the 15th of November, 1898, in consequence of which he was unable to resume the duties of a railway mail clerk. He was receiving a salary of $800 a year, and a mileage of $430. He is fifty-three years of age, and was appointed on the 19th of September, 1885. He was transferred to the superintendent's office at Toronto on the 1st of February, 1904. We think his case a very meritorious one. Although he does not appear to be physically disabled, yet, as a result of the accident, his nerves have been shattered. We gave him leave of absence to enable him to lead an outdoor life for some time, with the hope that he would become stronger. We have transferred him to a position in the inside office work in Toronto. On the whole, he will be earning about as much under the new conditions as he was under the old.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not take exception to this vote, because I think it may be justifiable. But I would like to suggest to the minister, as we are discussing matters relating to the Toronto Post Office, that he would be good enough to let any one of these items remain over so that we may avail ourselves later on of an opportunity of discussing the Toronto items.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I would suggest something else still better. I will have some supplementaries for the next year. These are for the current year, and I would like to dispose of them because we want to pay these moneys. On the supplementaries I will consider everything open in the service.

Mr. CLANCY. With regard to this gratuity to Mr. Sloan, I would ask the minister if there have been other cases somewhat similar, which he has been called upon to deal with, and if so, how he dealt with them.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The controller of the railway mail clerks informs me that there are no railway mail clerks in the position of Mr. Sloan who have not been compensated for any loss of mileage, either by the department or by the railway company. In some instances the railway companies have made good the loss where the clerk injured had a legal claim against them, and some clerks have brought action.

Mr. CLANCY. Did Mr. Sloan get anything from the railway company in this case ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. At the time of the accident Mr. Sloan did not think he was seriously injured. He returned to his duties within a week, and the railway company was astute enough to get a settlement with him. When he returned he thought he was quite well. They paid him $400. But a short time afterwards he found that his spine was affected, and he suffered great pain and was incapacitated for work of all kinds.

Mr. BLAIN. Are we to understand that his salary was going on at the same time and that he received mileage as well ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. I am not complaining about that. There was an accident somewhere along the line near the city of Guelph a year or two ago where some other men in the employ of the Post Office Department were injured. May I ask if these men were paid their salary and mileage as well ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The case of Mr. Cheney is perhaps the one my hon. friend has in mind. Mr. Cheney was injured and the Grand Trunk Railway Company compensated him for his losses, the controller thinks, to the amount of $1,700. The department transferred him to the inside service at London at an increased rate of salary so as to make up the increase of salary which he was losing by the loss of mileage.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman if there are not cases other than that of Mr. Sloan not provided for by the department ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The officers are not aware of any other case. It is a rule I inaugurated when I came into office to take into account injuries to or deaths occasioned by railway accidents of, railway mail clerks. If my hon. friend is aware of any case that is entitled to consideration I would be very grateful to him if he would bring it to the attention of the department.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General as a matter of information if any provision is made in his department for paying some portion if not the whole of a reasonable life insurance for employees who are occupying hazardous positions such as those of mail clerks and who are liable to lose their lives or be injured ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not think there has been any provision in the law of the character to which my hon. friend alludes.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to what seems to be a very common practice in the departments ; that is paying for life insurance policies for men who go out of this city on government business. If there is any justification for this practice—I do not say whether there is or not—it seems to me that those persons like railway mail clerks who are forced in to hazardous positions should be considered and that it would be only a just thing to contribute a portion if not the whole of the premiums on insurance policies upon the lives of these persons so engaged. I cannot imagine that I could have anything but the approval of the hon. gentleman for the course which I propose in view of what seems to be a very common practice of the departments of paying the premiums upon the insurance policies of persons who are temporarily travelling on government business. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman is prepared to consider that matter?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The policy that the Post Office Department has adopted seems to me to be better than the one which my hon. friend suggests. Whenever a railway mail clerk is killed it is our policy to vote the sum of $2,000 as a gratuity to his dependents, so that practically we are not only paying the premium but we are undertaking that the amount is paid in case an accident happens.

Mr. CLANCY. In case of disablement ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. There is always a compassionate consideration for disablement. My hon. friend does not know anything about the working of the department. He cannot point to a single case since I have been in charge of the department where there has been no consideration given to a railway mail clerk who has met with an accident. I think we are doing very well for the clerks in living up to this policy. There is nothing in the law about it, but I trust it will be always adhered to. I am told there is a practise in some of the departments like this : A civil servant who has occasion to travel on a railway and who travels free, as a good many employees of the government are allowed to do, has no cause of action against the railway company in case of accident ; therefore in such a case the employee is allowed to take out an accident policy and to charge the premium in his travelling expenses. That, I am told by my deputy, is the extent to which the departments recognize responsibility for acidents occurring to employees. If, of course, a man were paying his way and had a cause of action against the railway company in case of accident it might be different.

Mr. SPROULE. Has there been any test case in regard to employees of the government travelling on the railway establishing the fact that in the event of injury they are without redress under the law, though the accident may have been due to the culpable negligence of some of the railway employees ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I do not know whether it has been determined as a matter of law but I think the companies, in connection with any free transportation, add the stipulation that a person travelling under these conditions shall have no recourse against the company, he giving no consideration for the service rendered by the railway company. It is treated as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That stipulation is on our own passes.

Mr. SPROULE. I admit that but I do not think that many of us believe that it could be sustained in a court of law.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. We cannot give a free opinion on that point.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the hon. Postmaster General to say that this was the practice of the railway companies and I supposed it had been tested by some decision of a court that would give strength to it. But I have heard that contention disputed over and over again by legal authorities who have claimed that it was not optional for any company to put any provision on a pass or on a shipping Bill of that kind and to say that provided you accept so and so you accept it on conditions. Insurance companies do the same thing but when you go into a court of law the court determines whether the conditions are proper and reasonable and if they are unreasonable the court will not hold you as bound by these conditions notwithstanding that you sent your goods under the conditions of that Shipping Bill or that you accepted a pass on those terms.

Mr. BLAIN. I understand that the Postmasters give no bonds to the government or rather that the government guarantee the fulfilment of the duties of the postmasters. I understand that the postmasters pay into a fund and that when there is a loss sustained by any postmaster it is repaid out of the fund which is accumulated by the government.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The practice in the department now is to assess the employees instead of having guarantee bonds for their fidelity, but it is not enforced in the case of postmasters at offices having a revenue of less than $100. The rate charged is 40 cents for each $100 of insurance. That is the rate which I understand prevails throughout Canada. The fund is deposited in the savings bank account to the credit of the guarantee fund. If a loss occurs it is then chargeable against it and an application is made to the government for an Order in Council allowing the withdrawal of the fund. We have been very fortunate so far although running many risks. We recently had a loss of $10,000 which occurred through the misconduct or robbery of a mail clerk in the west. Part of that money has been recovered. That would have made a bad hole in our fund but we have not been called upon to make it good. I suppose we will have to make some of it good. Altogether it is a more satisfactory system than having a bond for each officer. In the latter case there is the danger of the bond expiring, and there is trouble in seeing to the renewal of it, and the payment of premiums, and in the event of loss we are not always able to recover, although there is no moral doubt as to the liability of the company. For instance, some time ago $367 disappeared, and there was no doubt that it disappeared by the fault of one of three of our officers, but which one it was impossible to state. In that case we could not tell which officer was responsible and we could not have recovered from the insurance company. The three men were insured under our own system and we were able to make good the loss. There are many advantages in the system ; having tried it for seven years I think it is infinitely better than the old system.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the old system ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Each postmaster gave an insurance company bond or a private bond. In the latter case, all sorts of obstacles were put in the way of recovering. The minister was told that it would be a great hardship to seek to recover against some bondsman who had not the money. It was a perfect nuisance, and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) who has had experience will agree with me in that. I must say that defaults in the postal service are not frequent, and that on the whole we have a most efficient and honest staff throughout the country, but unfortunately occasionally some one will lapse.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not complain of the new system. Could the minister state how much was paid into the fund last year and how much was paid out of it.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. If my hon. friend wishes I will bring that down on the supplementary estimates. It is a special trust fund and the premiums do not go into the consolidated revenue at all. By an Act passed in 1898 the money assessed upon the officers is treated as independently as if it were a private insurance company.

Mr. FOWLER. Do I understand that instead of these officers paying to a guarantee company, they pay so much to the government and the government guarantees ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is practically it ; we do our own insuring. We take the premiums and put them in this trust fund, out of which any loss is paid.

Mr. FOWLER. How has it worked out ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Satisfactorily. If the few years' experience we have had furnishes reliable data for all time, then it would be most satisfactory. However, there might be a serious loss any day, and I do not think we should debate the extent to which money passes through the post office.

Mr. SPROULE. Does each official get a guarantee bond in the regular way ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Instead of an official giving a guarantee bond or getting neighbours to act as his bondsmen, in a case where an employee would be bonded for say $500, he pays a premium to this fund of 40 cents on the dollar or $2 a year. That is deducted from his salary and goes to the trust fund.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to be cheaper than the other system.

Mr. BLAIN. I would suggest to the Postmaster General that this would be interesting information to put in his annual report. How does that matter of the loss of $10,000 in the Northwest now stand ?

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Nothing has been adjusted yet. The total amount stolen was $10,000, and we have recovered nearly $7,000.

Compassionate allowance for Mrs. John A. W. Innes, widow of the late railway mail clerk John A. W. Innes, who sustained injuries while on duty on January 23, 1904, from which he died on January 27, 1904, $2,000.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Mr. Innes fell from the train when leaving the postal car at Winnipeg on the 23rd of January, 1904, and died three days later. He was appointed railway mail clerk in December, 1893, and at the time of his death his salary and mileage allowance amounted to about $900 a year.

Mr. TAYLOR. Carried.

To provide for the increasing of the salary of Mr. George Ross, chief post office superintendent, to $3,500 from July 1, 1903, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or the Post Office Act, $500.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Mr. George Ross entered the service as a fourth-class clerk in the Hamilton office on the first of July, 1875, and he has been continually in the service since. He has been appointed chief superintendent of city post offices, and his duties necessitate his travelling from ocean to ocean throughout the Dominion of Canada. Everybody knows that however accurate a man may be in keeping accounts of travelling expenses it is absolutely impossible for him, if he is an honest man, to protect himself from loss. Mr. Ross is a most worthy officer ; one of the best officers in Canada, and we are most fortunate in having such a man in this position. He is affable, able, honest, industrious, never spares himself, and I do not imagine that this $500 will add much to his real salary, but that it will rather enable him to travel without having to skimp himself.

Mr. SPROULE. This only applies to one year.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. It only applies to the present year, but it will be in the supplementary estimates for the succeeding year.

Medical attendance, hospital and other expenses in caring for railway mail clerk J. W. H. Cameron, who met with a serious accident on December 19, 1903, while on duty, $213.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Mr. Cameron fell from the Dominion Atlantic train near South Uniacke, about twenty-four miles from Halifax, on the 19th of December last. He was not missed by his fellow-clerks until the train reached Halifax. The search party found him in the cottage of Mrs. Coglin, who had heard his cries and rescued him. He was in his bare head, without a coat, and the temperature was below zero. He sustained a compound fracture of the right leg, between the ankle and the knee. This amount will cover his hospital and medical attendance and other expenses.

To complete payments for post office service to June 30, 1904, $130,000.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. This increase is due to the general expense of the service, and for the increased price asked for contracts put up to tender.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the service was more than self-sustaining.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. So it is, but the money we collect goes into the revenue.

Mr. SPROULE. You are this much short of what you estimated last year you would require.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I suppose my hon. friend means that the cost is that much greater than in the previous year, but it is never possible at the beginning of the year to know how much it is going to cost to carry on the service. We cannot refuse new services because the money has not been voted, and therefore while the appropriation may perhaps carry the service through eleven months, at the end of the year we find a shortage. For instance, suppose our gross expenditure to be about $100,000 a week, when you get to the last month, you can pretty well tell how much you require to meet all demands, but every year you will require more money at the end of the year. If the plan I have adopted of asking parliament at the close of the fiscal year to vote sufficient money to close up the accounts had always been followed, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) and myself would not have had that squabble about the $780,000. My policy is to state to parliament what is wanted and get it voted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish to continue that controversial question, but in as much as the hon. minister has to a certain extent corroborated the position I took—

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. I will admit anything my hon. friend chooses to assume this afternoon, because it is too hot for discussion.

Mr. HENDERSON. But that is not the matter to which I desire to refer. I understand that before another session there may be very considerable changes in the House of Commons Post Office, and I think there is one which the Postmaster General should keep in mind. Every member should be provided with a lock box.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. The House of Commons Post Office is under the control of the House of Commons itself, and I have nothing to do with it.

Mr. HENDERSON. At any rate, whoever is in authority, if he is within the sound of my voice, I would ask him to take that matter into consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. Another thing which might be dealt with is the hour at which the mails close on Sunday in the House. No letters leave here that are posted after six o'clock, and I do not see any reason why the mails should not leave this House at nine o'clock instead of six.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. That is not under control of my department.

Mr. SPROULE. Last year I understood from the hon. minister that he was going to clean out the whole House of Commons staff unless things were managed differently, but I am glad he has awakened to the sense of his own imitation.

The undermentioned letter carriers and porters to be promoted to clerkships from the dates and with the salaries mentioned, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or the Post Office Act :

R. Wilkinson, letter-carrier, to junior third class from June 25, 1904, at a salary of $705 a year.

J. Emond, letter-carrier, to fourth class from October 1, 1903, at a salary of $626 a year.

L. J. Filion, letter-carrier, to fourth class from September 1, 1903, at a salary of $600 a year.

J. Wilson, letter-carrier, to junior third class from February 1, 1904, at a salary of $700 a year.

W. J. Gow, letter-carrier, to junior second class from December 1, 1903, at a salary of $900 a year.

E. D. Moore, porter, to fourth class from July 1, 1903, at a salary of $600 a year, and to junior third class from December 1, 1903, at a salary of $700 a year.

F. Graham, porter, to stamper and sorter class from October 1, 1903, at a salary of $540, and to fourth class from December 1, 1903, at a salary of $540 a year.

G. W. Oliver, letter-carrier, to stamper and sorter class from December 1, 1903, at a salary of $470, and to the fourth class from March 1, 1904, at a salary of $470, $158.32.

Mr. TAYLOR. There are some members who wish to speak on this question of the letter-carriers, but we will allow this item to pass on the understanding that the matter may be discussed on any other item.

Sir WILLIAM MULOCK. Certainly, I have not the slightest objection.

Department of Indian Affairs, salaries, $61,395.

Hon. CLIFFORD SIFTON (Minister of the Interior). The increase is due to forty-six statutory increases at $50 each, making $2,300, and the $62.50 is due to some trifling difference caused by the new Civil Service Act.

Department of Indian Affairs—contingencies, $14,075.

Mr. TAYLOR. There is an increase here of $660.

Mr. SIFTON. That increase is caused by increases in salaries to clerks who are paid out of contingencies.

Indians—Ontario and Quebec—relief, medical attendance and medicines, Ont., $3,300.

Mr. SPROULE. There is an increase here of $1,000. How is that accounted for ?

Mr. SIFTON. This is for sick and destitute Indians in Ontario belonging to bands which have no funds in the hands of the department. It includes the salaries of medical officers amounting to $1,119. The balance is for medicines, supplies, &c. The money is mainly for the benefit of the Indians on the north shore of Lake Superior. The demands for relief are becoming larger, and the expenditure is gradually growing.

Mr. SPROULE. How many medical men has the department employed on salary in Ontario ?

Mr. SIFTON. The medical men to whom I have referred are the only ones paid out of money voted by parliament. On many Indian reserves are medical men who are paid out of the band funds. The names of those to whom I referred and their salaries are as follows :

Dr. J. W. McIntosh, Manitoulin Island...	$184
Dr. J. H. Arthur, Spanish River..	75
Dr. F. H. Mitchell, Oneida Reserve.. ..	300
Dr. J. F. James, Munsee Reserve..	60
Dr. J. A. McNeil, Pogowasing and White Rivers..	100
Dr. E. Bedard, Mattawa..	200
Dr. Channonhouse, Golden Lake..	200
	$1,119

As I understand, it is the desire of hon. members that we should adjourn as early as possible. I may say that I am quite willing that the adjournment should take place when this vote is passed.

Mr. TAYLOR. Some of our friends who are not now present have something to say on the items of which this vote is made up. One item might be reserved.

Mr. SPROULE. Pass all but one item and allow the discussion generally to take place on that item.

Indians—payment of Robinson treaty annuities, $12,450.

Mr. CLANCY. There is a reduction here of $4,356. How is that accounted for ?

Mr. SIFTON. We make an estimate every year on the amount of annuities that will be necessary. Of course, it is impossible to make an exact estimate because we cannot know exactly how many Indians will be alive and entitled to these annuities. We think we are safe with this reduced estimate. Also in making calculations for this year we must take into account moneys placed at the credit of the Indian Fund as a result of the settlement of accounts between the old province of Canada and the Dominion, and this tends to reduce the vote.

Indians—survey of Indian reserves, $500.

Mr. CLANCY. In what state are the surveys that were commenced some time ago on Walpole Island ? I understood that they had commenced but it is reported to me that they had been stopped or delayed for some reason, but I do not know just what the reason was.

Mr. SIFTON. I am informed that instructions have been given to have this survey made. But it has not been possible to get it done. It is extremely difficult to get survey work done at present, because the enormous amount of surveying that we are doing in the west takes up practically all the available men.

Mr. CLANCY. Is there any objection on the part of the Indians, or any of them, to the survey being made ?

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. SIFTON. Some objections were made, but after considering them we decided to go on, nevertheless.

Mr. CLANCY. Did the department decide to go on, notwithstanding the objection of the Indians, as a matter of policy, or did the Indians finally consent ?

Mr. SIFTON. It is a matter of which I have no personal knowledge. I think the objections were made in connection with the holdings of the Indians.

Mr. SPROULE. You are carrying on surveys on the islands in the Georgian bay. Are there not a number of islands there under the Indian Department ?

Mr. SIFTON. We had surveys made some years ago, I am not aware that any have been made since then. There are some islands that are now in dispute between the Ontario government and the Dominion government, and it is only when the consent of the Ontario government has first been secured that we make any sales. The sales are of an unimportant character, the islands are small and of no great value.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the minister considered that difficulty will arise in a place like Walpole Island where improvements were made without any regard to surveys? How does he propose working out the question of the settlement of holdings ? Or has he a system of making of uniform size the lots Indians may hold ?

Mr. SIFTON. The policy is to survey the land where it is actually occupied by the Indians, that is the purpose in view.

Mr. CLANCY. I have some acquaintance with the condition of things there where the lands are held by the Indians. I think when the hon. gentleman surveys the holdings of what the Indians claim to occupy now, he will have some strangely shaped lots left that are not claimed by the Indians, unless he has some system.

Mr. SIFTON. It is a question either of surveying the lots as they are or of not surveying them at all, and leaving the boundaries altogether undefined. It is a delicate question, and all we can do is to act on the best information we can obtain, and survey the lots according to actual location. I have not myself personal knowledge of the particular matter to which the hon. gentleman has called my attention.

Mr. CLANCY. I have not understood that the Indians made any demand. I may say that the gentleman who is employed by the government, Mr. McGeorge, is as good a man as can be found. I have understood, I do not know whether the information is accurate, that the Indians were somewhat opposed to this, and made no demand for a subdivision survey.

Mr. SIFTON. I cannot give a positive answer whether any demands from the Indians came, but I will give my hon. friend a full statement with regard to the whole matter.

Mr. SPROULE. What method does the department adopt in the sale of timber on the islands belonging to the Indians in Georgian bay, or elsewhere ?

Mr. SIFTON. No timber is sold by the Indian Department except under the regulations providing for the sale of timber generally. Applications have been made for sale of timber on these islands, but I have refused to sell.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood you sold some timber not very long ago on the Georgian bay, not very far from Midland.

Mr. SIFTON. In one case, some years ago, I found, some time after it had been done, that the officials of the department had sold some land on Batchewana bay which had some hardwood on it. They sold the land including the wood. The persons to whom it was sold had made applications for the land, the land was sold in the regular way and no reservation of the timber was made. The timber was not of any special value, but if the matter had been brought to my attention I would have directed that the timber be sold separately, in accordance with the regulations. I do not imagine that this is the case to which my hon. friend refers. With that one exception, there has been absolutely no sale of timber lands, except in accordance with the regulations.

Mr. SPROULE. How long is it since the regulation was made requiring that Indian lands must be sold by public auction ?

Mr. SIFTON. The regulation was made before I came into office, and there has been no change.

Mr. SPROULE. We had a discussion here only a few nights ago in regard to this very question, when it was stated that Indian lands had been sold without competition to a party living in Orillia.

Mr. SIFTON. Those were not Indian lands.

Mr. SPROULE. This department has no authority to sell any other land there. It either belongs to the Indians and is controlled here, or belongs to the province of Ontario and is controlled at Toronto.

Mr. SIFTON. What the House was discussing the other night was not sold by the Indian Department.

Mr. SPROULE. What department sold it, then ?

Mr. SIFTON. I presume it was sold by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. That department may have had the land for the purposes of the department, and then sold it.

Mr. SPROULE. That may be.

Mr. SIFTON. All Indian land is required by Order in Council, passed some years ago, to be sold by public competition, and, as I say, with that one exception, there has been none sold without reference to that regulation.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. minister is perhaps right, because I understood that this land was transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. SIFTON. That must be Hope island.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Grant to assist Indian fund account No. 310, prevention of liquor traffic, $1,500.

Mr. SPROULE. You have a large increase here. How do you account for that ?

Mr. SIFTON. During last year we initiated a number of prosecutions for the purpose of preventing the sale of liquor to Indians, and, as my hon. friend knows, it is very difficult and very expensive to successfully carry on these prosecutions. If we start a prosecution against three or four men in a town, we must undertake an expenditure of $500 or $600. We have always to send a special detective to get the evidence. I have lately made a change in connection with these prosecutions in this way, that whereas, formerly half of the fine went to the fund of the band, now half of the fine goes to the prosecution fund. I hope next year it will not be necessary to vote any money at all, that in a year or two we will have sufficient funds to carry on these prosecutions and that the work will be self-sustaining. I did not see why half of the fine should go to the fund of the band and parliament be called upon to vote the money to carry on these prosecutions.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any return of these fines ?

Mr. SIFTON. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any report giving a return of the fines as well as the names of the parties imposing the fines ?

Mr. SIFTON. I am told that the details are not in the report of the department, but if my hon. friend desires it I can bring down a statement covering the prosecutions for the last two years. It would be very easy to have a statement made out.

Mr. SPROULE. Can you go beyond two years ?

Mr. SIFTON. We can go back as far as you wish.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say that I applied to your department before, and I was told that you had no information on the subject.

Mr. SIFTON. About what ?

Mr. SPROULE. About the fines that were imposed.

Mr. SIFTON. There may be something in that point, inasmuch as fines may be imposed by a provincial constable or justice of the peace without the knowledge or intervention of the officers of the department, and, of course, if that were done, there would be no return made to us and the department would have no information, but if prosecutions are undertaken at the instance of the inspector of our department, then returns are regularly made. I do not fancy there are many cases in which prosecutions take place except at the instance of the Indian Department, so that the information must be pretty full. I have never heard of any other body prosecuting.

Mr. CLANCY. Oh, yes ; I have known of some cases in which other persons have prosecuted, and I have known of no case where the action has been brought by the agent of the department. It has been reported that these fines have not been returned.

Mr. SIFTON. It would be a very difficult matter to manage except we got a return from the justices of the peace of the province. The only way that it could be reached would be to ask the provincial government to have a special record kept, but I think my hon. friend will find that when there is a prosecution it is instituted at the instance of the Indian Department under the Indian Act.

Mr. LEONARD. Who was paid that $11,325 for squatters' improvements, Doncaster Reserve, which was voted last year ?

Mr. SIFTON. I cannot give the item offhand, but will furnish my hon. friend with a detailed statement giving the names and the amounts to each person.

Some resolutions reported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up on Monday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that Mr. Emmerson will take up the railway estimates.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 5 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, July 4, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SITTING OF RAILWAY COMMITTEE.

Hon. CHARLES S. HYMAN moved :

That the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines have leave to sit during the time the House is in session.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last I entered my protest against this procedure. The First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed with me that I was right, because he asked the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) to withdraw the motion he had made. I think that the conclusion come to then was that it was quite time enough to ask that the committees should have leave to sit during the sessions of the House when the committees made representation that they required such permission. There has been no meeting of the Railway Committee since then, and consequently no resolution passed asking permission to sit during the sittings of the House. The hon. member for Victoria, Nova Scotia (Mr. Wm. Ross) made the suggestion that the committees meet at nine o'clock. I assented to that. I am quite willing that that suggestion should be acted upon. But I do protest against standing committees meeting while the business of the House is in progress. We want to be here while the House is conducting its business ; and, since the government has thought fit to commence the morning sittings—to-morrow morning they begin, I believe—some provision should be made by which members can attend to their duties. I, for one, do not propose to absent myself from the House in order to attend the meetings of the Railway Committee, nor shall I willingly absent myself from the work of the Railway Committee. There are other important committees besides the Railway Committee, and, if you insist on these committees meeting while the House is in session, no doubt the government will expect to get their estimates through in our absence in a very short time. This motion is contrary to precedent—at any rate, it is contrary to common sense. The hon. minister (Mr. Hyman), I trust, will pardon me if I say that his motion is not in accordance with common sense. It is not reasonable to suppose that we can be in two places at the same time, or that we are to desert our duties here in order to attend to the duties of the Railway Committee, particularly when the difficulty may be overcome by having the committee meet at nine o'clock and sit until eleven if necessary. I must again enter my solemn protest against this proceeding.

Mr. HYMAN. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding that the Railway Committee—as, I think, all will agree—have laboured very assiduously during the session, there still remain some important matters to be dealt with by that committee. It is true that this motion is not recommended by the committee, but, as the committee has been called to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock, I took it upon myself to bring in this motion. To-morrow the committee could not meet at nine o'clock, the time having already been fixed and notices sent out. But I have no objection to changing the motion so as to confine it to the meeting of the committee to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why not have the committee meet at nine o'clock ?

Mr. HYMAN. Unfortunately, the committee has already been called for eleven o'clock, and announcements to that effect have been made. Important matters are to come before the committee, and a number of people are coming from a distance expecting to attend the meeting at that time. This was done in accordance with the wishes of the committee. As I say, I have no objection to changing the motion so as to confine it to the meeting of the committee to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, the whole difficulty can be got over in this way, Mr. Speaker—when the House meets to-morrow you can simply call it one o'clock, and leave the chair.

Mr. HYMAN. I think I must press the motion, at least as regards the meeting of the committee to-morrow. Because, as I say, engagements have been made for the committee at eleven o'clock, and a number of gentlemen expect to be present who will not be in town before that hour. Under the circumstances, I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) should not object to the motion so far as it relates to the meeting of the committee to-morrow.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). The motion of my hon. friend from London (Mr. Hyman) seems reasonable. But it should be limited to the meeting to-morrow. Then the matter can be brought before the committee and discussed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is a very serious objection, of course, to having important committees of the House proceeding with their business while the House is sitting. I understood, when this motion was first suggested that the important committees of the House had finished their business.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mostly—not quite.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Perhaps it would be in order for us to be informed how much more business there is to bring before the Railway Committee. Will it all be cleared off to-morrow ? There are not too many members of the House in their places attending to business under the best conditions; and, if, in addition to other reasons which induce absence, an important committee such as the Railway Committee, which comprises, I think, about three-fifths of the membership of the House, is sitting, then, either there will be a very inadequate attendance at the Railway Committee, or there will be a very small attendance in this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The matter came up the other day in the absence of my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden). I am within the judgment of the House when I say that the consensus of opinion then was that the morning sittings of the House should commence to-morrow and that the committees might be requested to sit from nine o'clock until eleven. I think it will be found that all committees are ready, with a view to accelerating the business, to sit at nine o'clock. But to-morrow, as suggested by the hon. member for London, the Railway Committee has been called for eleven o'clock, and the members have been notified and expect to be present at that hour. So that, I think, for to-morrow, the Railway Committee ought to be allowed to meet while the House is in session.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is amended to read that the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines have leave to sit to-morrow during the time the House is in session. Shall the motion be agreed to ?

Mr. HENDERSON. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. Carried. On division ?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT, 1900, AMENDMENT.

Hon. CHARLES FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 148) to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Perhaps the Minister of Justice will explain the provisions of the Bill for the benefit of gentlemen on this side.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The Representation Act of last year has made changes in the constitution of the electoral districts which necessitate the amendment of those sections of the Elections Act, 1900, in which special and exceptional provision is made with respect to the dates for the returning officer's proclamation and the nomination and polling, in certain extensive and sparsely inhabited districts. The sections in question are sections 24, 27 and 29 of the Act, and the districts to which they now apply are Algoma, in the province of Ontario, Gaspé, and Chicoutimi and Saguenay, in the province of Quebec, and Burrard, and Yale and Cariboo, in the province of British Columbia. The District of Algoma has been divided into two ridings, the east and the west riding, and it is thought that each of these requires exceptional treatment. In that province it is considered expedient also that Nipissing should be placed in this class, partly on account of its great extent of territory and partly because it may be necessary, under section 9 of the Franchise Act, 1898, as amended, to prepare voters' lists for the purposes of an election there. No change is proposed in the province of Quebec, the constituencies of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, and Gaspé being still the only electoral districts requiring to be thus provided for. In British Columbia the present electoral district of Burrard will be divided between the new districts of Comox-Atlin and Kootenay, and it is proposed that each of these districts, as well as Yale-Cariboo, shall be included in this special class. The Act, of course, like the Representation Act, will take effect only upon the dissolution of the present parliament.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPRESENTATION ACT, 1903—AMENDMENT.

Hon. CHARLES FITZPATRICK (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 149) to amend the Representation Act, 1903. He said: The object of this Bill is to correct two or three errors which, through inadvertence or oversight, crept into the Representation Act of last session. Sections 7 and 8 of the Representation Act slipped into their present position in the body of the Act through error. They are taken from the Quebec Act, Revised Statutes of Quebec, chapter 2, sections 67 and 68, which defines the provincial electoral districts. The intention was to insert these particular sections 6 and 7 where they ought to be, in the Quebec schedule. They have been incorporated in the body of the Act, which would make them applicable to the whole Dominion. Of course this is absolutely impossible under the system of dividing constituencies, as they exist elsewhere.

There are other changes that refer to Ontario. When the Bill of last session was prepared, an Ontario Act of 1901 was overlooked. This is one of the Acts which are passed yearly by the legislature of that province, entitled 'Acts to amend the Statute Law.' It contains amendments to a great variety of statutes, and amongst them one which amends the Ontario Territorial Divisions Act, chapter 3 of the Revised Statutes, by shifting the boundary between the provisional judicial districts of Algoma and Thunder Bay, twenty minutes westward from eighty-five degrees west longtitude to eighty-five degrees, twenty minutes. This necessitates a change in the description of the electoral districts of Thunder Bay and Rainy River, and the two ridings of Algoma. That amendment is of trifling importance, and is merely for the purpose of giving effect to a provincial Act which provides for the description of the boundaries of the electoral district I have just mentioned.

A mistake was also made in the New Brunswick schedule, it having been overlooked that the old county of Victoria had been divided by a provincial Act into the two counties of Victoria and Madawaska, and that these two counties have since that date formed the electorial district of Victoria. At the time the schedule was prepared with respect to New Brunswick, this fact was overlooked. It will be seen that under the schedule as it now stands, there would, on account of this mistake, appear to be fourteen electoral districts in the province, each entitled to return one member, whereas the province is only entitled to thirteen members. Clause 4 of the Bill is intended to correct this mistake.

It is proposed to complete the schedule by adding to it the electoral district of Yukon.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to inquire again concerning those papers relating to the seizures of binder twine. I need scarcely remind the government that in the present state of the business of the House, we require those papers to be brought down expeditiously if they are to be of any service to us this session, and unless they are so brought down, we shall have to renew the discussion that has taken place as to whether we should have morning sittings before the committees get through with their work. This is a purely departmental matter, as the right hon. gentleman must know, and one can scarcely account for the delay that has occurred, not long in itself, but long in view of the fact that we are now in the closing days of the session.

Right Hon Sir WILFRID LAURIER. (Prime Minister). In the absence of my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), I communicated with his department and received the information that the papers were in course of preparation and would be ready at an early date. Since the return of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I have not communicated with him but will do so immediately, and give an answer to my hon. friend.

PRIVATE BILLS.

WEST CANADIAN COLLIERIES, LIMITED.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 80) respecting the West Canadian Collieries, Limited—Mr. Oliver.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this Bill was held over some time ago for some reason—I forget what it was. I think we ought to have some explanation of this Bill from the promoter or, if the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) is acquainted himself, with the nature of the Bill, we should have some statement as to whether he considers it proper legislation, because, if I can judge at all of the character of the Bill from the title, I would suppose that it has to do with collieries in our western country, and it is very important, surely, that the public interest in coal lands should be protected. I would not like to see legislation passed through the House without any explanation or without some knowledge as to the character of the Bill, because otherwise we might be doing something that we would have occasion to regret hereafter.

Mr. SCOTT. If there is any question raised, I would propose that the committee rise and report progress in the absence of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) in whose name the Bill stands. I therefore beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, that is better.

Progress reported.

RIO DE JANEIRO TRAMWAY, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 142) respecting the Rio de Janeiro Light and Power Company, Limited, and to change its name to the Rio de Janeiro Tramway, Light and Power Company, Limited.—Mr. Calvert.

Mr. HENDERSON. My recollection is that this Bill passed its second reading before it was printed, and as there is not a copy of it on my file I do not know if it has since been printed. I do not know anything about the Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have a printed copy of the Bill and the clerk informs me that it has been printed.

Mr. HENDERSON. We had better have some pretty full explanation as to what this South American legislation consists of.

Mr. CALVERT. When I introduced the petition for the Bill I explained that this company was being formed in Canada for the purpose of building railroads and supplying light and power in Brazil. This company was incorporated under the Companies Act early in June, but that incorporation did not give them power to build railways, and hence they have come to parliament for a charter which will be subject, of course, to the laws of Brazil. Some years ago a similar company called the Sao Paulo Company was incorporated under charter by this parliament. The promoters of the Sao Paulo are nearly all Canadians doing business in South America. The company now under consideration is to be formed partly of the same people, in addition to some other Canadians. They simply want a charter to carry on their undertaking. It does not affect any other person or incorporation in Canada.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am obliged to say that the enterprise seems to be very commendable, and I think the explanation of the hon. gentleman quite satisfactory.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 137) respecting certain Patents of the Canadian Office and School Furniture Company, Limited.—Mr. Clare.

Bill (No. 138) for the relief of Andrew William Mann.—Mr. Macdonald—on division.

Bill (No. 139) for the relief of Jennie Davison Moore.—Mr. Macdonald—on division.

Bill (No. 141) for the relief of Eliza Robertson.—Mr. Holmes.

Bill (No. 89) to incorporate the Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company.—Mr. Geoffrion.

Bill (No. 136) respecting the Similkameen and Keremeos Railway Company.—Mr. Morrison.

Bill (No. 58) respecting the Imperial Loan and Investment Company of Canada.—Mr. A. T. Thompson.

Bill (No. 140) respecting the Alliance Bank of Canada.—Mr. Russell.

THE NORTHERN BANK.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 146) respecting the Northern Bank.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would ask the promoter of this Bill to explain why this bank is asking for an extension of time to organize.

Mr. SCOTT. This Bill has been passed by the Senate. I have no direct or definite information in regard to it, but I have no doubt the action of the promoters will be explained when it comes before the select standing committee to which it will be referred.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

QUESTIONS.

THE FAIR-WAGE RESOLUTION.

Mr. KENDALL asked:

1. Does the fair-wage resolution, passed by the Canadian parliament in 1900, apply to the Dominion Iron and Steel Company?
2. Has this resolution the force of an Act of parliament?

Hon. Sir WILLIAM MULOCK (Postmaster General). The resolution applies to works under contract, but it does not apply to enterprises aided by bounty. The second part of the question is a question of law which my hon. friend is probably able to answer himself.

LT.-COL. H. H. McLEAN.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES asked :

1. Did the District Officer Commanding of No. 8 military district recommend Lieutenant-Colonel Jones, of St. John, for position of brigadier at Camp Sussex ?

2. If so, was his recommendation set aside, and Lieutenant-Colonel H. H. McLean appointed instead of Lieutenant-Colonel Jones ?

3. Was Lieutenant-Colonel H. H. McLean absent from Canada lately, and did he procure leave of absence ?

4. Was Lieutenant-Colonel McLean in Ottawa at the time he was in orders for Camp Sussex, viz., 11th June, or when ?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence) :

1. The district officer commanding recommended Lieutenant-Colonels McLean and Jones as brigade commanders.

2. As there was only one brigade, Lieutenant-Colonel McLean being the senior was appointed to the command of it.

3. (a.) He was absent for three weeks prior to the 28th May last. (b.) It is not customary for officers on the reserve to apply for leave of absence.

4. The department is not aware.

SUPPLY — INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY. —ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. HENRY R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair it is my purpose, following the precedent of recent years, to make a statement with respect to the financial affairs of the Intercolonial for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and at the same time to take into consideration the fiscal condition of the Intercolonial Railway during the year which has just closed. It will not be expected that I shall make more than a brief and concise statement of the financial affairs of the Intercolonial Railway, as I was not associated with the affairs of the Railway during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and have been in office for only four months of the year just closed.

The gross earnings and the working expenses for the year ending June 30, 1903 compare as follows :

Gross earnings	$6,324,323 72
Working expenses	6,196,653 19
Surplus..	$ 127,670 53

It has been usual to make comparisons with the fiscal year preceding that under review and, indeed, with other years. I shall not take up the time of the House by making comparisons between the fiscal year 1903 and any previous years except the one just preceding, that is the year ending June 30, 1902.

A comparison with 1902 gives the following results:

EARNINGS.

1903..	$6,324,323
1902..	5,671,385
Increase..	$ 652,938

WORKING EXPENSES.

1903..	$6,196,653
1902..	5,574,563
Increase	$ 622,090

A comparison of earnings shows the following results:

—	1902.	1903.	Increase.
Passengers... ...	$1,770,941	$1,927,916	$156,975
Freight	3,644,513	4,128,255	483,742
Mails and express..	255,931	268,151	12,220
Total	$5,671,385	$6,324,323	$652,937

These statements should be supplemented by an explanation of the increase in the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway. It will not be necessary, and indeed I would not be expected to go into an explanation as to the increase in the freight or passenger returns. So far as ordinary business is concerned, the year 1903 did not show a very large excess over 1902, but there had been a very material expansion in the freight traffic and also a very creditable increase in the passenger traffic of the road. This House and, I am sure, the country as well, will be anxious to have an explanation as to the increase in the working expenses of the Intercolonial. If the railway had enjoyed the benefit of an increased freight traffic and had at the same time been able to conduct its affairs with the same expenditure as for the year previous, then there would have been instead of a surplus of $127,000, a surplus of upwards of $500,000.

We shall now inquire as to the comparison of the working expenses in the locomotive department, an important department in which there is usually a very large expenditure. It will be interesting to compare the expenditure of that department in the two years.

COMPARISON OF WORKING EXPENSES.
LOCOMOTIVE DEPARTMENT.

—	1902.	1903.	Increase.
Wages of engineers and firemen.	486,926	513,160	26,184
Fuel	1,044,047	1,111,725	67,678
Oil, waste, tallow	27,150	29,881	2,731
Repairs, locomotives	374,699	407,861	33,162
Water	40,166	44,149	3,983
Miscellaneous	35,743	52,320	16,577
Superintendent's office	22,144	17,061
Total	2,030,928	2,176,160	150,315

Mr. CLANCY. Was there about the same number of men employed as engineers and firemen in each of these years ?

Mr. EMMERSON. About the same number. I am informed that there is practically no difference in the number employed. The increase in the item of wages of the engineers and firemen in 1903 was due to the increase in wages allowed to these men. There was a partial increase made before the year 1903 had expired. But, for practically the same number of men this amount is swollen by $26,184. The cost of fuel, as all hon. members from the maritime provinces will know, was somewhat increased in the winter of 1903, which readily explains the increase of $67,678 shown in the table. And as there were more locomotives in 1903, there was naturally more spent in small repairs and so on.

Mr. BELL. Does that item include other rolling stock ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No, simply the locomotives. The superintendent's office shows a decrease. This is explained by the fact that there was no superintendent of motive power during at least the greater part of 1903, so that the department was saved the salary of that officer. With regard to car expenses, the following are the figures :—

CAR EXPENSES.

—	1902.	1903.	Increase.
	$	$	$
Repairs to—
Passenger cars.	117,332	152,672	35,340
Postal, express, baggage cars.	31,193	33,022	1,829
Freight cars	304,035	412,612	108,577
Snow ploughs.	7,510	13,250	5,740
Wages, conductors, baggagemen and brakemen	472,227	497,753	20,526
Oil and waste	6,992	9,211	2,219
Small stores and fuel	125,851	151,411	25,560
Miscellaneous	54,318	68,943	14,625
Total	1,119,461	1,338,857	214,416

Explanatory of these items it may be said that, as the condition of the equipment of the Intercolonial has been kept up to the standard the increased expenditure meant a better condition of the railway. Money could have been saved in this department by allowing repairs to be kept down to the lowest point ; but instead of that, in all departments, attention has been given to the maintenance of the rolling stock at the high standard of efficiency to which it had, admitttedly, been brought. The wages paid to conductors, baggage men and brakemen had been considerably increased. They had been increased somewhat previous to June 30, 1903.

Mr. DANIEL. The minister says that the rolling stock is being kept up in a very good condition. Will he say whether that is being provided for out of revenue alone, or out of revenue and capital ?

Mr. EMMERSON: I am referring to repairs, which are provided for entirely out of revenue. I am explaining by these statements the expenditures on the revenue side of the account, and these items for repairs are paid out of the revenue of the Intercolonial. I will refer later on in my statement to the item of capital expenditure. I have shown that in 1903 there has been a general increase in wages of the conductors, baggagemen and brakemen ; later on I will show a very material increase in that respect occurring within the past eleven months, and affecting the affairs of the Intercolonial during the fiscal year which ended last Thursday.

Now, a very large item of expenditure in connection with the management of the railway is that referring to the maintenance of way expenses. That has to do with repairs to rails and buildings, renewal of ties, in fact the condition of the track generally. All the expenditure on the track of the Intercolonial is dealt with under this item of maintenance of way expenses. I think it will be shown by this statement that the excellent condition of that road has been maintained during that period. I have here a statement showing a comparison of the various items of expenditure under this head between 1902 and 1903 :

MAINTENANCE OF WAY EXPENSES.

—	1902.	1903.	Increase.
Salaries	$ 6,847	$ 6,796
Wages	491,693	591,742	$ 100,049
Rails	69,441	185,746	116,305
Ties	192,566	193,333	767
Timber & Lumber	180,911	179,557
Repairs, wharfs	12,075	17,967	5,892
" buildings	100,122	97,894
" tools	17,612	19,785	2,373
Snow cleaning	80,982	89,480	8,894
Miscellaneous	3,638	3,846	208
Total	1,155,891	1,386,350	230,459

The House will see that in the item of wages alone there is an increased expenditure of $100,000. That means that to the section men and others working along the line of the Intercolonial during the year, in order to keep the road in its excellent condition, and that it might not be allowed to deteriorate in any way, there was paid out of the receipts of the railway over $100,000 more in 1903 than in 1902. In several items of expenditure required to keep the road in a state of efficiency, it will be seen that there has been an increase over the previous year. In relaying rails there has been an increased expenditure of over $116,000. Inasmuch as the cost of maintenance of way affects very largely the annual results, it will be seen that no attempt was made to lower the high standard, the very high standard, I may say, of the road by neglecting needful work. It will be noticed that the two chief items of increase are wages and rails.

A comparison of 1903 with 1896 shows some important increases in this department. I should mention in making this comparison that the Intercolonial in 1896 stopped at Lévis, whereas it now extends to Ste. Rosalie, or to the city of Montreal; consequently, certain items of expenditure are made now in connection with the maintenance of terminals at Montreal, which were not found in the same item in 1896. But it will be a matter of some interest, though not in any way reflecting upon the expenditure of 1896, but simply showing the growth of the Intercolonial and its expansion. A comparison of the two years shows the following important increases in this department :

Wages	$238,055
Rails	131,705
Ties	105,413
Total	$475,173

The total cost of maintenance of way was greater in 1903 than 1896 by $611,794.

It is also to be noted that there has been an increase of mileage in 1903 over 1896, of about 15 per cent, and that percentage will have to be taken into consideration in reaching a fair conclusion as respects a comparison made between those two years.

Now, I am coming to an item which shows quite a large increase, and yet it is an increase that is very largely due to the increase in the salaries and wages paid to the employees in that department. I refer to the station expenses which were as follows :—

STATION EXPENSES.

——	1902.	1903.	Increase.
Salaries and wages.	$567,462	$644,939	$77,477
Fuel, oil and light.	132,325	144,406	12,071
Total	$699,797	$789,346	$89,548

I think that in November, 1902, or in December, perhaps at the beginning of the session or some time during that year, the Telegraphers' Union, as will be remembered, approached the Minister of Railways and Canals, a long conference was held, and I think at that time an increase was agreed upon. That increase has swelled this item to the extent of $77,477. During the past season it has been my privilege to confer with the representatives of that union in regard to an additional increase. The expenditure made in 1902-3 was not up to the standard of the remuneration paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway in Canada for like services. That matter was under consideration during this present session and some action was taken to which I will make reference later on.

The general expenses of the offices at Moncton, including printing and agencies, amounted in 1903 to $477,373 as against $445,227 in 1902 and $199,985 in 1896. I give these items as showing wherein the increases in the expenditure are to be found. The work at the office at Moncton has very largely increased. A great deal of the work that at one time was done in Ottawa is done there now, and it shows an increase in the expenses.

Fuel is one of the principal items in operating a railway, and the cost to the Intercolonial Railway, in 1903 was $1,111,725,as against $1,044,047 in 1902 and $408,861 in 1896. It is interesting to note the very great increase in the expenditure for fuel as between the last, or recent years, and the year 1896. The amount has more than doubled. I do not know whether the larger class of locomotives has anything to do with it, or the increased number, but I assume that the expansion in the business of the railway has justified and will explain this increased expenditure. The increase in the cost of coal in Nova Scotia where the fuel is largely purchased, would be explanatory in a measure of the increase. It is important to notice how large have been the increases in wages and the cost of fuel since 1896 :

——	1896.	1903.	Increase.
Wages.....	$ 873,703	$1,603,105	$ 729,402
Fuel.....	408,861	1,111,725	702,864
Total	$1,282,564	$2,714,830	$1,432,266

These items are worthy of some study. They are explanatory of the conditions which prevailed on the Intercolonial Railway during the year ended June 30, 1903, as far as its fiscal aspect was concerned. I have referred to the several increases, but I will more fully discuss them at a later stage, after I have taken into consideration the financial situation of the Intercolonial Railway during the fiscal year which ended on the 30th of June last. I have not a full statement of the expenditures up to the 30th of June. That would not be expected. I have not a detailed statement as to these expenditures and receipts later than the 30th of April. I have a general statement in respect to the month of May, but as regards a detailed statement for the ten months ended on the 30th of April, I will be able to make a comparison with like expenditures during those ten months of the present fiscal year. I am bound to say that I cannot paint a very glowing picture as to the financial conditions during the past year.

The House will anticipate this, because the other day in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) it was my misfortune to have to admit that the expenditure was very largely in excess of the receipts. However, I think I will be able to explain, to the satisfaction of the House, wherein the discrepancy lies, and when the explanation is given hon. gentlemen can form their own judgment. The total receipts for the month of April, 1904, were $577,959.50 and the expenses for the month of April, 1904, were $482,653.83, showing a profit of $95,305.67 for that one month. The expenses for the month of April, 1903, were $483,899.47, while the receipts were $547,845.44, showing a profit during the month of April, 1903, of $63,945.97, as against $95,305.67 for the corresponding month of 1904.

The receipts for the ten months of 1903, up to the 30th of April, were $5,288,763.56, and the receipts for the same ten months in 1904 had grown to $5,835,294.07, showing an increase in the expenses for the ten months of 1904 over the ten months of 1903 amounting to $546,530.51.

The receipts for the ten months of 1903, up to the 30th of April, were $5,292,639.69, and the receipts for the same ten months in 1904 were $5,287,521.14, showing a decrease for the ten months of 1904, as compared with the ten months of 1903, of $5,118.55.

Mr. BLAIN. Was there any change in the freight or passenger rates ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There was no change in the freight or passenger rates. The receipts for the ten months ending April 30th, 1903, were $5,292,639.69, and the expenditure for the same ten months amounted to $5,288,763.56, showing a surplus of $3,876.13.

The receipts for the ten months ending 30th of April, 1904, were $5,287,521.14, and the expenses for the same ten months, $5,835,294.07, showing a deficit of $547,772.93. I shall place facts before the House which will, I think, show the reasons for this condition of things.

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. gentleman has compared the receipts and expenditures in 1902-3-4 with the receipts and expenditures for the same period in 1895-6 ; will the hon. gentleman compare the receipts and expenditures for the year ending 30th June, 1904, with the receipts and the expenditures for the year ending 30th of June, 1895-6 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I will do that later.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the hon. gentleman recollect what the deficit was in 1896 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was $55,000.

Mr. CLARKE. And what is it this year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have been trying to tell my hon. friend that up to the 30th of April it was over half a million dollars.

Mr. CLARKE. You are doing very nicely.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a growing time, and there are very good reasons for the increased expenditure. My hon. friend will not be able to derive very much comfort from it, because he assumes to be a friend of the labouring men, and the financial condition of the Intercolonial to-day is largely due to the increased wages which we have paid to the employees of the Intercolonial. I am sure my hon. friend will not cry over that.

Mr. CLARKE. I presume the hon. gentleman will give us the figures to carry on the comparison ? That is all we ask for. I am delighted to hear of the increased wage.

Mr. EMMERSON. I will give the figures.

Mr. DANIEL. The hon. gentleman said the deficit was largely due to the increased wages paid on the Intercolonial Railway. Could the hon. gentleman give us the amount of the increase, so that we could see for ourselves how near it was to the deficit ?

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend seems to be impatient. I made the comparison between the years 1902 and 1903. I am now approaching the consideration of the financial condition of the Intercolonial Railway during the ten months ending April 30, 1904, as compared with the ten months ending April 30, 1903 ; and it will be my privilege to show wherein there has been an increase in the wages paid all over the line, in all branches and all departments of the Intercolonial—an increase which was justifiable in my judgment, by reason of the industrial activity and the requirements of the present time as compared with previous years. I will first give a comparative statement of the earnings and the working expenses for the month of April, 1904, as compared with the month of April, 1903 :

——	April, 1903.	April, 1904.
Earnings	$ 547,845.44	$ 577,959.50
Working expenses	483,899.47	482,653.83
Profit	63,945.97	95,305.67

——	10 months to April 30, 1903.	10 months to April 30, 1904.
Earnings	$ 5,292,639.69	$ 5,287,521.14
Working expenses	5,288,763.56	5,835,294.07
Profit	3,876.13	Loss 547,772.93

Showing that the month of April, 1904, so far as the earning power of the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, was a very much more favourable month than the month of April, 1903, and also that in April, 1904, we expended less, although we earned more, than we did in April, 1903. That is only a little bright spot indicating what I am hoping for during the remainder of this season.

I will now give a comparative statement for the ten months ending April 30, 1904, and the ten months ending April 30, 1903 :

One very material feature to be considered in connection with the financial condition of a road is the amount expended annually in betterments. We all recognize the fact that in addition to the ordinary expenses required to maintain a road, if the ordinary depreciation is to be arrested and the value of the property is to be in any way kept up, there must be in all departments—on the track, in connection with the cars, and on the equipment generally—an annual expenditure even more than sufficient to keep the road up to its normal condition. Now, I would invite the attention of the House to a statement which I will read with respect to the betterments made during the ten months ending April 30, 1903, in comparison with the ten months ending April 30, 1904 :

BETTERMENTS.

		2,156,043 80
Increase in 1904		121,254 23

Mr. BELL. That item of 'water' will not include rental for water or money paid for water ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No.

Mr. BELL. That is just for permanent structures, &c ? That is to say the total disbursement expenditure for betterments for the ten months ending April 30th, 1902 amounted to $2,156,043.80. And for the like period of 1904 to $2,277,298.03. An increase for the first ten months of 1904 of $121,254.23. That is the net increase in the expenditure for betterments.

Mr. DANIEL. Would my hon friend state exactly what these batterments consist of.

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have explained that that means the maintaining of the line, ballasting, new ties, and all expenditures which go to improve the condition of the road. It will be seen from this that during this period of 10 months for 1904, the condition of the road has been looked after to the tune of $121,254 better than it was in the corresponding 10 months in the year 1903.

I could give to the House, if it is desired, a detailed statement as to the expenses for the ten months of 1904 as compared with the expenses of the corresponding period of 1903. The expenses for the 10 months ending April 30th, 1904, and April 30th, 1903, compare as follows :—

	5,835,294 07	5,288,763 56	546,530 51

The decrease of $2,261.62 in the first item under the head of locomotive power—the item of mechanical superintendent's salary, clerks, and office and travelling expenses—was due to the fact that we had no superintendent of motive power this year. The salary of that official, during recent years, has never been less than $4,000, and the fact that no such official has been employed this year will explain that reduction in the expenses in connection with that office.

Mr. DANIEL. Is that official still in the employ of the government?

Mr. EMMERSON. We had no mechanical superintendent during the year, and it is only lately that we have secured the services of one. That explains why there was a less expenditure in connection with the mechanical superintendent's office in 1904 than there was in 1903. I may also mention that the increase in the item for advertising arises from the expenditure in connection with the St. Louis Exhibition.

Now we must deduct car mileage from these items. For 1904. we must deduct $94,949.24, and for 1903 we must deduct $84.363.69, an increase in the latter year of $10,585.55. That is to say you deduct from this increased car mileage on the Intercolonial the sum of $10,585.55, leaving the total increase at $546,530.51. Then you add the rental of the leased lines, if you will, during that period, amounting to $116,666.68 in each year. The total figures then stand as follows: For 1904, $5,835,294.07; for 1903, $5,288,763.56, showing a total increase of $546,530.51.

Now before leaving that branch of the subject, I have had a statement prepared summarizing the various increases, and giving the reason why the expenditure during ten months of the present fiscal year is so largely in excess of the expenditure of 1903, the excess amounting to no less than $546,631.51. Now how is that money expended? Why was it that during the first ten months of the present financial year we were called upon to expend so large a sum in excess of the expenditure made during the same period of 1903?

Now, I am going to show the House the gradual increase in wages from year to year and point out that there was a very large step forward in that direction during the year 1904. There was an increase, taking the same number of men, from 1896 to 1902, of $240,000; that is to say to the same number of employees in 1902 we were paying $240,000 more than we were paying to a like number of men in 1896. With the same number of employees we paid in the year 1903 $224,236 more than we paid in 1902.

Mr. CLARKE. How many employees were there in each year?

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. EMMERSON. Practically the same number. I have not the figures as to the exact number but I can furnish them.

Mr. CLARKE. Would it not be well to have the figures showing the number of employees in each year?

Mr. EMMERSON. I will be very glad to furnish that.

Mr. CLARKE. The number and the different classes of employees?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes. For ten months of 1904——

Mr. BELL. You are giving the statement for ten months all along are you not?

Mr. EMMERSON. In the first two items I give a comparison of the full years 1896 with 1902 and also a comparison of 1902 with 1903. Now, I come to the ten months of 1904——

Mr. KAULBACH. Why do you lop two months off?

Mr. EMMERSON. Because I cannot make comparison with the two last months of 1904 and I have to take the first ten months of the previous year, 1903, and compare them with ten months of 1904 for which we have detailed statements. For the ten months of 1904 we paid out $344,395 in wages more than we paid out in the like ten months of 1903. There was a total increase in wages to the same number of employees practically between 1896 and 1904, of $808,631. The division of increased wages since 1902 has been as follows: Engineers and firemen, $122,640; conductors and trainmen, $144,504; trackmen, $143,682; station agents and operators, $151,805; making a total increase of $568,631. That does not take into consideration any increase in wages between 1896 and 1902.

Mr. CLARKE. May I ask the hon. gentleman how the engineers, firemen, brakemen and conductors are paid?

Mr. EMMERSON. Do you mean by the month?

Mr. CLARKE. Or by the day?

Mr. EMMERSON. A certain run figures out so much. It may be a day, or a day and a half, or a day and a third. I think that is the practice.

Mr. CLARKE. Are these figures for exactly the same number of runs or are the increases accounted for because these men have had to do additional duty and make longer runs?

Mr. EMMERSON. Not at all. These figures arose by reason of the representations which were made to the department and to the minister then in charge that the enginemen, conductors and trainmen on other railways in Canada were receiving larger compensation than the government railway was paying and the principle was recognized, measurably at least, if not to its full extent, that the government railway should pay as high a standard of wages as is paid by other corporations throughout Canada. Recently, when the Telegrahers Union were heard by myself, it was shown conclusively, especially in respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway on their eastern division, that they were paying a larger wage and larger salaries than were being paid by the Intercolonial Railway. I ventured to recognize the justice of the claim and there has been and will be found to be an increase in the expenditure of the department because of the action taken by myself at the time they were here. The same is true in respect to the section men, the conductors, the brakemen, the locomotive drivers and firemen, and in fact in all branches of the service. In the stores department, even, among the freight checkers, and the freight handlers at all points along the Intercolonial Railway there have been large increases. In some instances the increases have ranged from twenty to twenty-five, and even there have been increases within the last two or three years of fifty-per cent in the wages paid to the employees of the Intercolonial Railway for the purpose of recognizing the right of these men to be paid a wage equal to the amount paid for like services by other roads. In addition to that the industrial life of the country is such that men can receive from private corporations larger wages than have been paid by the Intercolonial Railway. Take it down in the maritime provinces, at Moncton, at Amherst, anywhere along the line where there is great activity in the industrial life of the country, private corporations, foundries, machine shops, in fact in all branches of industrial life, they are paying a larger wage than that which was being paid to the men by the Intercolonial Railway. Therefore, it was found necessary, just and equitable, that there should be this increase. By reason of such an increase, by reason of the recognition of the claims of labour, I am forced to-day as representing the Railway Department to acknowledge before parliament and to present to the country a financial condition that is not as we would like it to be.

Mr. CLARKE. What was the wage bill in 1903 as compared with 1896 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I will give it to you in this way : In 1902 the increase over 1896 was $240,000, and in 1903 the increase over 1902 was $224,236.

Mr. CLARKE. How many men were affected in each case in that wage circulation ? That is the entire staff of the Intercolonial Railway whose wages are being compared with the entire staff of the Intercolonial Railway in 1896 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. That is the point I want to make. It is utterly impossible to make any comparison unless we are furnished with the number of employees. This statement which we are listening to this afternoon is a statement for the ten months ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. Has it been the practice to bring down a statement for a period of ten months ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have found by reference to 'Hansard' that the statement is usually made in May, and it commences with an analysis of the preceding year, and is followed by an analysis of accounts for the current year which usually can only be brought up to the 30th of April. I am following the usage. I feel it my duty to lay before parliament the details of the increased expenditure, so that it may be apparent how it was caused.

Mr. DANIEL. Could not the minister include the figures for the month of May, and give us the statement for eleven months?

Mr. EMMERSON. I gave that statement the other day in answer to a question and it appears in 'Hansard.' I wish to place in concentrated form this increased expenditure, and the items which occasioned it, and so I have had prepared the following table :

Increased expenses for 10 months of 1904 :—
Wages	$344,394
Fuel	128,937
Repairs to engines	26,427
Repairs to postal, express and baggage cars	13,025
Repairs to bridges	22,000
Repairs to wharfs	13,054
Head offices	17,440
District agencies	8,620
Snow clearing	40,083
	$613,981

Mr. CLARKE. What is the cause of the increased expenditure for fuel ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think it is largely due to the fact that the price of coal has been increased.

Mr. CLARKE. What is the average price of the last ten months compared with the ten months of the previous year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We have larger locomotives, and we have been doing more business.

Mr. CLARKE. Are there more men employed ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not think so.

Mr. CLARKE. Are the men doing more work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I would suppose that the larger locomotives are using more coal. One of these large locomotives will do the work of two or three of the smaller locomotives while it only requires the same number of men to work it. It will be noticed that the cost of snow cleaning has been increased over the previous ten months by $40,083, and this was of course due to the extremely severe weather of last winter, and it is a condition which I think you will find prevails on other railways. Adding together the increased cost of wages and fuel since 1896, the result is as follows :

Wages..	$1,047,259
Fuel..	831,701
Total..	$1,878,960

We have thus paid for wages and fuel $1,878,960 more during the ten months than we paid in 1896, and that notwithstanding the fact that the railway has only increased fifteen per cent in mileage.

Mr. CLARKE. What has been the increase in traffic in that time ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There has been a very large increase in traffic, but I have not the figures at hand.

Mr. CLARKE. Surely these figures must be available ?

Mr. EMMERSON. They are, and my hon. friend can turn them up very readily. I did not think it was necessary, for the purpose of making my explanation, to have that information here ; but if my hon. friend wishes the information, and will turn to 'Hansard' of May, 1903, it is there given very fully by the Minister of Railways of that day, Mr. Blair.

Mr. CLARKE. Is not the hon. gentleman making a comparison of ten months of 1904 with ten months of 1896 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No ; I have told my hon. friend that for the ten months of 1904 we have paid out in wages and fuel $1,878,960 more than was paid in the whole year 1896.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ? Having given us that statement, iterated and reiterated again and again, can he tell us what was the traffic for the ten months of 1904 and the corresponding ten months of 1896 ? The hon. gentleman refers me to 'Hansard.' How could I obtain there the traffic returns up to May 1st ? Surely the hon. gentleman has those under his hand and could give them to us?

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend asked for the traffic returns of 1896. I have given the traffic returns for the ten months ending April 30, 1904, but I have not the figures with respect to 1896, and therefore I cannot make these comparisons. My hon. friend can do that at his leisure, and will have the opportunity of presenting that feature of the case, if he wishes to do so, at a later stage.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very kind.

Mr. EMMERSON. Well, I would not be outdone in kindness by my hon. friend. Now, I wish to give a statement of the items of capital expenditure for each of the following years :

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Capital expenditure for each of the following years.

For the year ending 30th June, 1896	$ 259,105 23
For the year ending 30th June, 1897..	149,112 52
For the year ending 30th June, 1898..	252,756 80
For the year ending 30th June, 1899..	1,081,929 94
For the year ending 30th June, 1900	1,796,348 29
For the year ending 30th June, 1901..	3,652,313 46
For the year ending 30th June, 1902..	4,670,590 80
For the year ending 30th June, 1903..	2,216,744 88

Mr. DANIEL. What about 1904 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not that.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the comparison which I made between the years 1896 and 1902 as regards the increase of wages on the Intercolonial Railway, I would like it distinctly understood that the meaning which I wished to convey to my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) was that in 1902 we paid $240,000 more to the same number and the same classes of employees. I would refer hon. members to a statement made by Hon. Mr. Blair, ex-Minister of Railways and Canals in his presentation of railway conditions during the session of 1903. His remarks will be found at page 3643 of 'Hansard.' He is there dealing with the increase of wages as between those two periods for an equal number of employees. Mr. Blair then said :

I show you a surplus for the year ending 1902 of about $96,000, and I am able to do this notwithstanding the fact that we paid in wages last year on the Intercolonial Railway $240,000 more money than was paid in 1896 in respect of precisely the same number and class of employees. I am not seeking to make an unfair comparison, but am comparing the wages of exactly the same number and the same class of employees as the hon. gentleman had in 1896 ; and I tell this House that, in respect of that same number and that same class we took out of earnings in 1902, $240,000 more than he did in 1896 and distributed it among the employees. If we had not shown better results than my hon. friend was able to show—and this is the point I wish to make—we would have had a deficit of about $140,000 instead of any surplus whatever. The wages we pay are not excessive; no man will say that we pay more than we ought to pay or more than other railways are paying. But, if we paid $240,000 more in 1902 than the hon. gentleman paid for the same number and class of employees in 1896, I am entitled to claim that our showing for last year is $240,000 better than his would have been under the same conditions.

In the summary which I read to the House I showed how these increased wages and items had amounted to upwards of $600,000. I also showed that the wages paid to the same classes of employees and to practically the same number of men in the ten months of 1903. I know that the number of men has not been increased in 1904, nor in 1903; there has been no increase in the number of employees all along the line. As vacancies occur we of course supply new men, but there has been no general increase in the number of employees. I want to emphasize this fact to the House as I think it is a very material fact. I have already given to the House the apportionment of this total increase of wages of $568,631 since 1902, it was as follows:

Engineers and firemen	$122,640
Conductors and trainmen	144,504
Trackmen	143,682
Station agents and operators	151,805
Total	$568,631

I have not given there—nor have I sought the information—the increases to the machinists, the carpenters, and men of that class, the trackmen, the freight handlers, freight checkers, and the employees generally around the shops at Moncton, at Richmond, at St. John, at Rivière du Loup, at Lévis, at Port Tupper. All of these increases might be given in addition to that item of $567,631. They come to a large amount, and although I have not the exact figures, I can say that they will largely increase this total, because on the 1st of January a general increase was given to every machinist and every skilled workman along the line of the Intercolonial Railway no matter what his employment. In the fall of 1902 a schedule was established whereby the men received what was practically a statutory increase, which was automatic in its character, so that length of each man's service, the hours that he had worked during the year and the attention he had given to his work entitled him to an increase. Thus in addition to this amount there is a large sum which might fairly be taken into consideration in judging as to the amount of wages paid in 1904, as compared with 1903, and also the amount paid in 1903, as compared with 1902.

Mr. Blair showed that $240,000 more wages were paid in 1902 than in 1896. I have shown in my statement this afternoon an increase of $244,232 for wages in 1902, to the same class and number of employees and I have also shown an increase of $344,395 in wages to the same classes of employees and to practically the same number for the ten months of the current fiscal year, 1904 over the ten months of the fiscal year 1903. I have shown the classes of employees who have received these increases and I promise my hon. friend from West Toronto an exact statement as to the number of employees at the commencement of 1902 and at the close of April last. I have not that information in detail but I will furnish it. As the hon. gentleman desires a comparison of the scale of wages in 1896 and in 1904, I promise him ample details, but I warn him what to expect. It is not so many years since the trackmen on the Intercolonial Railway were being paid $1.00 a day and this was increased in 1896 to $1.10 or $1.15; but in 1898 the rate was increased to $1.20 and within the current year, that is the year ending June 30th, 1904, this rate was increased to $1.40 and $1.50 per day and these same trackmen are to-day receiving that wage. Then also, in 1900 the labourers along the Intercolonial Railway were getting $1.10 to $1.15. I do not here refer to trackmen, because to some extent at least you would refer to them as skilled workmen; I am now referring to labourers who would not be recognized in any way as requiring any skill in the performance of their work other than strength and health and physique. These men in the year 1900 received an increase from $1.10 to $1.20 and since that time, during the current year they received a further increase to $1.30 and in many instances to $1.40 a day. So that with such a large number of men distributed along the line of the Intercolonial from Sydney to Montreal and from Halifax to St. John, the amount has grown very considerably. I have not shown the exact details with respect to the men in the shops, but I have shown them with respect to the trainmen, the enginemen, the telegraphers, the station agents and the trackmen. And I have shown that the total increase of wages for 1904—and that only takes into consideration the first ten months of the year—means an increase of upwards of $808,000 as compared with the amount paid in 1896.

I mentioned that I have not a detailed statement with respect to the month of May last. But we have a statement of the receipts and expenses for that month.

Statement of receipts and expenses, Intercolonial Railway for 11 months ending May 31, 1904, and same period, 1903 :—

	Receipts.	Expenses.
1904	$5,796,494 09	$6,381,876 48
1903	5,790,876 93	5,720,550 30

This shows a profit for the eleven months ending May 31, 1903 of $70,317.63, as against a loss during the eleven months of 1904, of $585,382.39. It shows also that the receipts for the eleven months ending May 31, 1904, were $5,621.16 in excess of the same period for the previous year, while the expenses for the eleven months ending May 31, 1904, were $61,326.18 in excess of the similar eleven months of the year preceding.

Mr. HAGGART. Has the hon. minister the estimates for the month of June ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not made an estimate for June.

Mr. HAGGART. I mean the ordinary estimate furnished the minister at the beginning of every month as to the probable receipts and expenditures ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not that with me. Now, the figures which I have presented to-day, particularly as respects the current year ending 30th of June last, rather cause one to reflect as to the conditions surrounding the Intercolonial Railway. In presenting the figures, I have no apology to make. I bear in mind this fact—that the Intercolonial was built, not as a commercial railroad, but as a railroad necessary in the interest of the Dominion with a view to cementing the separated provinces. I recognize the fact that the business element did not enter very largely into consideration in the choice of routes. I recognize, more than that, that there was, at the inception of this Dominion, a condition of things that led the framers of confederation to take all these elements into consideration. And, finally I recognize that these conditions have not very materially changed. The long route was chosen. That portion of the Intercolonial which, speaking generally, may be described as the line to connect the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is to-day a paying portion of the line. The portion which has not paid is that long route around the northern section of New Brunswick to the St. Lawrence river, and so along its shore. Now, what were the conditions which prevailed at that time ? The people of the maritime provinces had free use of a very cheap means of transportation from the markets of the world to practically every community throughout those provinces—they had the Atlantic sea-board. Their importations were very largely by water. The whole southern coast of Nova Scotia was within a stone's throw of Boston. The Chignecto bay and Minas basin sections of the Bay of Fundy were in close touch with the American sea-board and carried on their commerce of export and import day by day throughout the whole season—not merely during the time of summer navigation but throughout the winter months as well. That was not, it will be acknowledged, in the interest of the Dominion, it was not in harmony with the idea of a confederation of the provinces. It was necessary that some attempt should be made to bring about an interchange of products between the people of Quebec and Ontario and the people of the maritime provinces. A great many people say that the route was chosen and the road was built for the benefit of the people of the maritime provinces. I take issue at once upon any such statement. It was specially in the interest of Ontario, of the wheat-growing sections, the flour producing sections of our Dominion that there should be rail transportation between those sections and the maritime provinces. And, in order that that rail transportation might be practically effective, it was necessary to establish rates which would enable interchange to take place.

The Intercolonial must be recognized as bound on two sides by great waterways. During the summer months it must compete with the navigation in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and in addition in the Straits of Northumberland, where sea-going vessels can reach every section of the north shores of New Brunswick, every section of Prince Edward Island and of Cape Breton, and many sections of Nova Scotia ; while on the other hand the Intercolonial must compete with the water-ways of the Atlantic sea-board, it must compete with the Portland traffic from Ontario by rail, if necessary, or with the traffic to Boston, and thence by water to different sections of the maritime provinces. Necessarily the rates had to be low, they had to be trimmed with a view to meeting this very serious competition. We are told to-day that the lakes are competing with railway transportation. If there is any force in that argument with respect to inland trade, there is ten-fold force in it with respect to the competition with which the Intercolonial is met by the Atlantic sea-going vessels during all seasons of the year, and during the summer months by navigation on the St. Lawrence. Now those conditions prevailed, and it was necessary to establish freight rates which, I grant you, might from one standpoint be considered as conventional, but which are a necessity if you are to cement these provinces together and bring about the interchange of trade which is so necessary for the well-being of the Dominion. To-day we are suffering in a measure because of that. While it is true that the traffic on the Intercolonial has grown, while it is true that trade has grown, there has not been one per cent of an increase in the rates during all that period; and the people of the east particularly, and the people of the west as well, the merchants of Montreal, of Toronto, of Hamilton, of Guelph, of all the manufacturing centres of Ontario and Quebec, the very moment there was the slightest intimation of an increase in the freight rates along the line of the Intercolonial, would enter a protest, and the government, I care not what government might be in power and administering the affairs of the Intercolonial, would be powerless to make such increases along the line of the Intercolonial. I do not believe it would be in the interest of the trade of the Dominion to do so. I believe that the Intercolonial is destined to be one of the greatest and most valuable assets of the Dominion. Although you cannot measure its benefits by dollars and cents, I believe that in the past it has been one of the best assets of the Dominion of Canada in cementing the provinces together, in making the people of the various provinces acquainted with each other; and in that way it has been rendering a service to the Dominion which no other agency could perform.

Now, Sir, the problem which confronts the Department of Railways at this moment, and which confronts me as responsible for the administration of the government system of railways, is this: We have recognized the requirements of labour, we have recognized that because of the conditions which prevail in all sections covered by the Intercolonial, it is necessary to pay the employees of that road a better wage than has hitherto been paid. We have recognized that in all departments. We shall be obliged further to recognize that because of the industrial growth of the country, because of the conditions which prevail to-day. Everywhere there is activity. The employees in the industrial establishments along the line of the Intercolonial are receiving a much higher rate of wage than they were receiving a few years ago. To-day the Canadian Pacific Railway is paying a higher rate of wage to its employees, and I am sure I am within the judgment of this House when I say that the government of Canada cannot afford to pay a less rate of wage to its employees than does the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. True, you may say that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a dividend paying corporation, that large sums are being distributed year by year among its shareholders. Still I say that although the Intercolonial cannot show as favourable a balance sheet, although it cannot make the same distribution of its earnings, yet in many other ways it is making a return to the people of the Dominion, not merely to the people of Quebec and the maritime provinces, but to those of Ontario and the west, which cannot be measured in dollars and cents but which has a value above all pecuniary considerations. Therefore we must recognize that we cannot enjoy this advantage without paying a fair and just equivalent to the men who are engaged in the management and operation of that railway. This will be admitted, I am sure. Moreover, we must recognize that these wages are a fixed charge upon the Intercolonial. You cannot reduce them. Nor are you in the same position as a private corporation, who, when they increase the wages, can at the same time increase the rates. Not many weeks ago we saw in the newspapers a statement to the effect that some railway corporations that were obliged to pay higher wages to their employees were at the same time turning the screws upon their patrons and charging them a higher freight rate. The Intercolonial cannot do that. If it is not found in written words in the compact of confederation, there is a conventional understanding recognized by all, that the rates on the Intercolonial shall not be increased, and that the people shall enjoy the benefits of that road at the lowest rates compatible with its maintenance. These benefits are equally accessible to the manufacturing industries of western Canada and to the merchants and distributors. The good resulting is not confined to any one section of Canada. Therefore it is a problem to which, while I have the honour to hold the position I now occupy, I must address my every energy. I shall act with zeal and activity to see if something cannot be done whereby the financial conditions of the Intercolonial can be improved. I believe that can be done in a measurable degree by the modernization of the road. It is true, we have started out to remedy many defects with respect to curves and gradients. I believe that work should continue. We are endeavouring to secure the very best and most modern equipment, improvements in the class of locomotives, in the class of cars, making stronger bridges, and other betterments to harmonize therewith. You cannot have heavy engines without having heavier bridges, you cannot have large trains passing over the road without removing the defects in its curves and in its gradients. Modernize the road and I feel assured that you can minimize the expense in carrying the traffic over it. The question of passenger traffic, as far as it relates to the whole line, must be recognized in this light, that we carry passengers from Montreal to St. John for the same rate as is paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and yet there is a very great discrimination against us in the matter of distance. The same is true in respect to the carrying of our freight. We can only charge the same rates as are charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway and yet we have the longer haul. We have additional employees to be paid. We cannot certainly do it at the same rate. Our expenses upon the whole must be necessarily larger. We have a longer mileage and yet we are paid according to the minimum mileage. Under these circumstances I am sure this House and the country must recognize the difficulties in the way of making the Intercolonial Railway the success that we all hope and desire it may be. I shall have to address myself to the solution of these problems. I do not know how successful I may be, but in so far as the modernizing of the road is concerned, if that can be accomplished and if parliament will aid in the accomplishment of that by generous and substantial votes, we will have accomplished some good in that direction and in the maintenance of the road. I do not pledge myself that we shall skimp the employees, that we shall starve them or that the pay that is given to them shall in any way show a shrinkage because of the conditions with which we have to deal. The men of the Intercolonial Railway must be paid equal to men anywhere in Canada. That is their due, it is their right, and I do not think that there is any spirit in this parliament or out of it anywhere in Canada which would favour a proposal that these men shall be underpaid or paid less than is paid by private corporations in employment of a like character. There is, I think, reason for very great hope in the matter of the traffic in the eastern section of our Dominion and along the line of the Intercolonial Railway. It is true that in respect to the Sydney trade we are obliged to give very reasonable rates in competition with the water rates. It is true that in bringing our coal from the Nova Scotia collieries to Montreal—and we can get very little above that city—we are obliged to give the very lowest possible rates in competition with the water rates. It is true we cannot load these coal cars on their return with the ordinary merchandise that goes from the western section of the country to the eastern districts. It is true that all these are disadvantages under which we labour, but there is growing up along the line of the Intercolonial Railway in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia industries which will contribute year after year, which are contributing to-day, which have contributed the last year very materially to the freight traffic of the Intercolonial Railway. I have endeavoured to deal with the financial conditions in a frank and candid manner. I do not wish to withhold one single feature from this House or from the country in respect to the management of the road. I believe that the road, although it shows a deficit, more than makes up its equivalent in another way, and I believe that the Intercolonial Railway should be and will be sustained and maintained by the people of Canada.

Mr. HAGGART. Before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Emmerson) sits down I would be obliged to him if he would be kind enough to answer a question or two which I now desire to ask him. He gave the receipts and expenditure of the Intercolonial Railway up to the 31st May last. Did he give the same in reference to the Prince Edward Island Railway and would he be kind enough to give the capital expenditure on both of them up to the 31st May last?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not dealt with the affairs of the Prince Edward Island Railway at all. I have simply followed the practice in this House of dealing with the Intercolonial Railway proper. My attention had not been directed particularly to the Prince Edward Island Railway. I have given the capital expenditure down to the 30th June, 1903. I have not presented the figures for the ten months to the 30th April, 1904. They are not wholly made up. None of the details are given me in respect to even the current revenue and expenditure down to the 31st May. I have given the totals in respect to that month, but I will be very happy to furnish the capital expenditure, giving the details down to the 30th April, and if we have the information here down to the 31st May.

Mr. HAGGART. On capital account?

Mr. EMMERSON. On capital account.

Mr. HAGGART. Would you just please state the amount?

Mr. EMMERSON. I say I will give it later on. I have not the information now.

Mr. HAGGART. As I had not the pleasure of hearing the hon. gentleman before six o'clock and only a small portion of his speech since eight o'clock I will take an opportunity at a later time of replying to the hon. gentleman's remarks when I read them.

Motion agreed, to and House went into Committee of Supply.

Department of Railways and Canals—salaries, including C. W. Ross at $1,700, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, $48,975.

Mr. HAGGART. Why is this increase given to Mr. Ross?

Mr. EMMERSON. He did not receive the increase in previous years. It seemed to be just that he should receive it.

Mr. HAGGART. Your statement is that he has not been getting his annual increases for three years, and you are making it up to him?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. That is not satisfactory. If Mr. Ross was entitled to an annual increase of $50, and he did not get it there should be some reason for not giving it to him.

Mr. LENNOX. This granting of increases in this form looks very suspicious. If the department is in default it should be admitted.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not think any annual increases were given for a certain time. It was brought to my notice that Mr. Ross was a very efficient officer and had been for a great many years in the service. The deputy minister recommended this and I recognized the justice of his claim and concurred in the recommendation.

Mr. LENNOX. Was an application previously made and refused ; if it was refused on what ground ? If it was refused, why is it allowed now ? Are there others in the department in the same position, and if so why have they not been recommended for this payment of arrears ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am not aware that any application had been previously made. This was recommended to me by the deputy minister and I concurred.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not think any of us believe that if an official knows that he is entitled to an annual increase he would allow the matter to go by without mentioning it. Are we to understand from the minister this official did not ask for his increase from year to year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I never heard that there was any application or refusal.

Mr. LENNOX. Before we consent to evade the Civil Service Act in this way we should have a complete explanation.

Mr. EMMERSON. It would appear that for two years he did not get his statutory increase, and he is getting it now.

Mr. HAGGART. I presume that all these other gentlemen in the department were recommended for statutory increases for two years past, and they did not get the increase ? Why is the exception made in the case of Mr. Ross ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No other applications came before me ; there are some others in the supplementaries.

Mr. HAGGART. I have not the slightest doubt, but that the deputy minister recommended the annual increase but his recommendation has not been acted upon except in this case. Why is an exception made in Mr. Ross's favour ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I can only repeat that there have been other recommendations, and no other applications brought to my notice.

Mr. HAGGART. I think the deputy minister will tell the hon. gentleman that last year and the year before he recommended statutory increases, and if he did they were not given to those entitled to them. The statutory increases are given to the others for this year only, and why is it that Mr. Ross is made an exception and gets an increase for three years ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have no doubt my hon. friend would concur with me as to the efficiency of Mr. Ross. I think he was an appointee of my hon. friend.

Mr. HAGGART. I am not at all doubting his efficiency.

Mr. EMMERSON. I quite expect to have my hon. friend's concurrence in the proposition. At the time this matter came under my notice, when these estimates were being prepared, there were no other applications. I understand that no action had been taken for two years.

Mr. HAGGART. Oh, yes, there was. There were increases last year and the year before.

Mr. EMMERSON. My attention was called to this particular officer, and I concurred in the recommendation. My attention had not then been called to any of the others.

Mr. J. D. REID. Who drew the hon. minister's attention to this particular man ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The deputy minister.

Mr. J. D. REID. And he was the only one in the whole department to whom the hon. minister's attention was drawn ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The only one.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the minister say that his deputy did not last year draw attention to the fact that this official was entitled to a statutory increase last year and the year before ?

Mr. EMMERSON. He got it last year.

Mr. LENNOX. Did he get it the year before ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No.

Mr. LENNOX. How many arrears are there ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There are two years of arrears.

Mr. LENNOX. What years do they refer to ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The deputy minister cannot tell me what years they refer to.

Mr. LENNOX. This is surely a most absurd condition of things. Last year we paid what was asked of us. For some years long gone by, for some reason known only to the minister, we are asked to go back on a record and hunt up some imaginary case like Mark Twain's great American beef contract, I suppose, and pass this item. I think the minister will have to let the item stand until he can give us some information about it.

Mr. BARKER. What class was Mr. Ross in last year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The first class, so I am informed by the deputy. I am not familiar with the classification of the men in the office.

Mr. BARKER. There were four increases last year of men in the first class. Mr. Ross was in the first class last year and was passed over, there must have been some reason for it. What has happened since ?

Mr. EMMERSON. He received an increase last year, I am informed.

Mr. BARKER. For the preceding two years there must have been an opinion that he was not entitled to it. Why are you coming this year and going back on two years ago ? I think we ought to have definite and clear information on this point before we pass the item.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would like very much to give the information, but I am not familiar with the years myself, the deputy cannot tell me the exact years, and I do not see the materiality of the exact years. This is after all simply a question as to whether justice should be done to Mr. Ross. He has been a long time in the department, he is an efficient officer, and I am acting on the deputy's recommendation.

Mr. HAGGART. Here is a clerk in the department singled out from the whole department and given two years' increases of $50 eash, while no other clerk gets any. Nothing demoralizes the service more than the selection of one particular man for an increase unless he has some peculiar qualifications. If he has, let us know it, and the House will grant with pleasure whatever is right to a deserving officer.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not been long enough in the department to have a personal knowledge as to the relative merits of the different officials, but I was informed by the deputy minister that Mr. Ross was a very efficient officer and was entitled to this increase.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not see the relevancy of the minister's remarks that he has been such a short time in the department that he does not know. We have no means of knowing anything about it except through the minister. Perhaps two or three minutes or half an hour would acquaint us with all the details we require We do not want to vote this money in the dark, and if the minister has not had time up to the present to ascertain the facts, he should let the item stand until he can ascertain them and communicate them to the committee.

Mr. EMMERSON. I stated that there were two years. The deputy informs me that he does not remember the exact years, but he thinks they were 1897 and 1898. I do not think it is material what the particular years were. It did not seem to me to be material, and I have not searched the records of the department in order to secure the information. I would be prepared to bring the information later on, but I think my hon. friend would not wish the matter to stand until then.

Mr. BARKER. I would like to call the attention of the minister to another feature of this item. Last year there were four first-class clerks at $1,800 each. This year there are three first-class clerks at $1,900 each, so that each of them has apparently got an increase of $100, one at $1,850 and one at $1,700. If I understand the minister the statutory increase is $50.

Mr. EMMERSON. There are three of $50, statutory increases.

Mr. BARKER. How can that be when three of these four last year received $1,800 each and this year received $1,900.

Mr. EMMERSON. Last year they were getting $1,850.

Mr. BARKER. I have the estimates here as they were introduced last year and there were four first-class clerks at $1,800. You have now three at $1,900 and one at $1,850. That one seems to have got the regular increase but three of them seem to have got $100 each. While the minister is looking into the other questions he might also look into this.

Mr. EMMERSON. The three first-class clerks referred to received $1,850. Some provision must have been made in the supplementary estimates, and they are now increased to $1,900. I can give the names if they are desired.

Mr. BARKER. I do not expect the minister to reply now but I would like to know the explanation of this matter. Last year there was one first-class clerk at $1,400, but that gentleman seems to get $1,550 this year.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was a first-class clerk who was getting $1,450.

Mr. BARKER. He is down in the printed estimates submitted to the House as a first-class clerk at $1,400.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think that was changed in the supplementary estimates. The records of the department show $1,450, and he gets the statutory increase now to $1,500.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister pleads ignorance of his department so far as this is concerned. During the whole Grand Trunk Pacific debate the Prime Minister stated that the Minister of Railways was absent from the House because he was getting up the work of his department, and studying the manner of running it. After having two or three months of good hard work learning his department it is rather an awkward position for him to come before the House to-night and say that he does not understand anything about the department. He states that this increase to a civil servant was recommended by the deputy minister. I believe, and I think it is the opinion of every member in this House, that the deputy minister is first instructed to make any recommendations that are made and that this is done so that the minister can fall back on the deputy if necessary. We have here one gentleman getting an increase and the minister has not shown to my satisfaction why the increase is given to him. There are a good many other civil servants in that department who I believe are entitled to increases. I am not objecting to Mr. Ross getting an increase if he is entitled to it, but I want to know why others are not getting increases who are as well entitled to them as he is. If we cannot get an explanation of this I am prepared to stay here until the minister can go to his department and get the information.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would gladly give all the information required with respect to the matter, but I think that my hon. friend is perhaps going a little far when he says, because I say I do not know in which of two years an increase was granted, that therefore I make the admission that I know nothing whatever about the department. I do not expect to grasp the whole details of the department at once, but I think the information which I have afforded the committee at this stage is ample to satisfy any reasonable expectation as to why it was proposed to give this increase. As I have stated, he is an old official. At the time the recommendation was made I did not know anything about him. My information came direct from the deputy minister and I would have expected my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) to have supported me in reference to this official as he appointed him.

Mr. COCHRANE. Do not get off on some highfallutin' talk like that.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend will surely permit me to express an expectation.

Mr. COCHRANE. You have expressed that so many times that it has got old and stale. Is it a usual course to withhold the increases for two or three years and then give them in a lump sum ? The minister thinks that we are a little harsh in wanting to get the information and says that he cannot be expected to have it all in his head. Well, I do not know why he should not ; there is plenty of room for some information. This is an unusual course and I think it is the minister's duty to have the information. While the minister may smile it is not a joke with me at all, because it is the money of the people we are asked to vote here, the people who are working hard to earn the money that the minister is expending. This is an injustice to the other first-class clerks. I have not as much sympathy for these gentlemen as some people have. I think they are paid as well as most people in this country, but I say it is a cruel thing to all first-class clerks in that department who are perhaps working as well as this gentleman, but who do not get increases, that we should vote an increase to this one man. It does not matter whether this gentleman was appointed by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) or not, the fact remains, that he did not get his increase when he should have got it, and the question is why he should get his increases now, when other officials in the same department are not getting them.

Mr. J. D. REID. As I understand this gentleman got $1,500 this year.

Mr. EMMERSON. $1,550.

Mr. J. D. REID. And now he is increased to $1,700. It is an increase of $150 practically from his previous salary.

Mr. EMMERSON. With the statutory increase he would have got $1,600 any way. In addition it was proposed that he should get two years upon which action had not been taken. I should be very sorry to hurt the feelings of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) in voting the people's money. But it struck me that the item was fair and just as represented by the deputy minister.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister will notice that the secretary of the department is increased only $50 and the same with the accountant, the chief clerk and the correspondence clerk, while the law clerk is decreased $125. There is another anomaly. I see it stated here ' salaries, including C. W. Ross, $1,700, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.' The minister intends that to apply only to Mr. Ross ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. Then, how can he pay the salaries to the first-class clerk, three at $1,900, one at $1,750, and one at $1,700, when each of these is increased $100 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No ; we have given them only the statutory increase ; they were getting $1,850 last year.

Mr. BARKER. I cannot find that increase in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. EMMERSON. I can give the names of the three. The record I have here, shows Mr. Stewart, Mr. Filteau, and Mr. Currier.

They were getting during 1903-4, $1,850, and this vote proposes to give them the statutory increase. With respect to the law clerk, Mr. Ruel, he had been law clerk, and his salary had reached $2,100. In the change, and promoting a new man to that position, it was deemed wise that the new law clerk should not get the same salary, as he had not had equal experience.

Mr. HAGGART. What was his predecessor appointed at as law clerk ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think that Mr. Ruel began at $1,400.

Mr. HAGGART. Why do you give this man $1,925 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was recognized that the salary at which Mr. Ruel began was out of proportion to the amount of work required, and to the professional skill required for the duties.

Mr. LENNOX. As we are beginning the estimates of the Minister of Railways, and as he himself is beginning those estimates, it is important that we should begin on a right basis. The minister says he has given us all the information he has. I admit it. But that is not the issue. We may have all the information that the minister has, and yet not have all that the committee and the country should be put in possession of. All we know is that last year this official got an increase of $50, and the deputy minister recommends the minister to give him, in addition to the statutory increase for the present year, certain arrears amounting to $100. But the minister does not know in respect of what years this $100 is to be allowed. It seems extraordinary to me that the minister should be in that position, unless, like some other people, he wishes to close his eyes to certain things, because, I should think that a minister so alert as the hon. gentleman, when a proposal of this kind was brought before him, would at once ask how it could be justified, and a few questions asked at the proper time would give him all the necessary information. And I think we should commence properly and insist that the minister should give us not only such information as he has but such information as the people ought to have. And I think I am saying only what will be accepted by hon. gentlemen on both sides that we have not the information to judge of this matter.

Mr. EMMERSON. I appreciate the desire of my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) to start me right. But, it seems to me that the question as to the particular years is not very material. The points that suggested themselves to my mind were that Mr. Ross is in charge of a branch in the department, and in view of the important work he has to do and the efficiency with which he does it, he should have a salary of at least $1,700. I cannot be expected to have personal knowledge of these matters. I must depend upon the deputy for that information ; and the deputy has made the recommendation and in that recommendation I concur. I do not think there is any information withheld or that I am exhibiting any very great ignorance——

Mr. HAGGART. What is Mr. Ross doing?

Mr. EMMERSON. He has charge of the correspondence in connection with the engineer's office.

Mr. LENNOX. It is not material, as the hon. minister says, whether it was for one year or for another that these arrears occurred, if we have such information as will enable us to judge of the justice of the claim itself. But when we know nothing about even the years in which these arrears are said to have occurred, we have nothing to enable us to form an opinion as to whether the item is reasonable or not. I do not care particularly with respect to what year, but I do want such information as will enable us to form an opinion. But we have simply the statement of the minister that he does not know anything whatever about the matter.

Mr. EMMERSON. You are making a very comprehensive statement.

Mr. LENNOX. I think I am making a correct summary of what the hon. gentleman has said, and if I am not, he can set me right. I understand him to say in effect that he knows nothing whatever about this matter beyond the fact that there were arrears occurring in some years, whether recently or remotely he does not know ; that he knows nothing personally of the merits of Mr. Ross ; all he does know is that the deputy minister says it is a case deserving of recognition. Now, I repeat, it is most material to us to know when these arrears occurred. We know that last year we gave the statutory allowance without allowing any arrears. That is significant in itself. But if, for a number of years, we have been granting a regular statutory increase, and now this item is brought up at the present time—it is a most suspicious and peculiar circumstance in itself, and the full facts should be disclosed before we deal with the matter. I do not understand why the minister should object to letting the matter stand until this reasonable information is furnished to the House, or why we should substitute the statement of the deputy minister, much as I respect him, for the judgment of this committee.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am sorry there should seem to be any suspicious circumstance connected with this proposed vote of $100 additional to this man's salary. I would not like to have it put on a par with the celebrated ejaculation of Sergeant Buzfuz with respect to chops and tomato sauce. The statement of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lennox) is a very comprehensive one. He says I know nothing about the hon. gentleman. I stated, and it must be borne in mind, that these estimates were prepared in February, when I first entered the department, and that before that time I had not a personal knowledge either of Mr. Ross or of any other official in the department. But since then I have met that gentleman in the department, and I know something of the working of the department, of the work that he does and the place he fills in the department, and I think he is fairly entitled to $1,700 a year. I cannot, for the life of me, see why there should be any serious objection. I have stated that the information given me by the deputy minister leads me to conclude that it was in the years 1897 and 1898 that the lapse occurred in the payment of the statutory increase to this gentleman. But apart from that, whether the lapse occurred or not, it seemed to me, from the statement of the deputy minister and from the knowledge I now possess, that Mr. Ross is fairly entitled to $1,700 a year, as salaries go in these departments, and having regard to the work he does and the efficiency with which he performs it.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister evidently does not understand what the prerequisite is for granting a salary. First of all you form the skeleton of the sum that is required for the purpose of administering the department. You pay every man in it according to his supposed departmental value. Then you apply to Council and you state the number of clerks you require for the purpose of carrying on your business. You state the value of the particular service that each man is expected to perform, not the value of the man, but the value of the service that he performs. You fix the salary of each official. Then the law provides that when the deputy minister, with the concurrence of the minister, recommends the statutory increase, it has to be approved by Council, and after that you put the amount in the estimates. But it is not the value of the man you consider, it is the value of the service he renders to the country. You make an estimate of so many clerks at $1,500, so many at $1,200, so many at $1,000, and so on. It is a curious anomaly to say: We have so many deserving clerks. Here is a man who fills a particular office. Suppose you want a superior officer, the service he performs to the country is only worth $1,500 a year, though the man may be worth $10,000. Then according to the value of the man you increase his salary. The salaries are fixed for your departmental staff, and then the Civil Service law gives them an increase per annum. When vacancies occur by death, or absence, or superannuation, you fill them up; but the amount that is paid ought to be always the same unless the duties of the office are increased, or unless you require a larger staff to carry on the business. In that case the additions have to be approved by Council and reasons assigned before the vote is put in the estimates. In this case the minister must remember that it is not simply a question of paying a man $100 a year additional, what we are discussing is the principle. If the minister had been in the House as long as I have been, and a member of a government as well as a member of the opposition, he would have heard the tirades that used to be made week after week and year after year on a single item occurring in the estimates asking for a grant to an officer notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act. Mr. McMullen, formerly a member of this House and now a distinguished senator, used to enlarge for hours upon the enormity of paying sums notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act. What is the use of having such an Act, he used to say, what is the use of having a law on the statute-book if it is being constantly evaded? That is the reason we are questioning this vote. I would not have any objection to it in itself. This man may be an appointment of mine, he may be a deserving officer, a man too big for the position at $1,400 a year. It may be a shame to employ a man of his ability to perform work that is only worth to the country $1,400 a year. But that is no reason why he should get anything in excess of what he is entitled to under the law. It is the principle that we object to, we object to this constant enlargement of the expenditure in the various departments. You form a department here, for instance, the Department of Trade and Commerce, which is only to cost a few thousand a year, and then to give importance to the minister, the staff increases from year to year until each minister is jealous of the other if there is a larger expenditure in one department than the other. What is the effect? The country is burdened with a lot of officials who are not perhaps required for the proper discharge of their duties and to which enormous salaries are being paid.

Mr. EMMERSON. If this gentleman continued in the same office and gave the same return to the country for two years longer he would be entitled under the law to $1,700. I recognize the value of the work he is doing. I recognize the recommendation made by the deputy in that regard and I say that justice should be done now to this gentleman and not wait for two years. That is the whole story in a nutshell without regard to 1897, 1898, or 1899. It seems to me that my hon. friend would not wish to deny justice to a very deserving official by withholding from him the proper return for the work which he is performing in the department for the benefit of the country.

Mr. BARKER. We have made a perfectly reasonable request. We have asked the hon. minister to let this matter stand until he can give us a reasonable explanation of what he is asking for. He has had pointed out to him that several items in the estimates now before us are increases beyond what appear in the regular yearly increases. His answer is that there were supplementary estimates last year. If the hon. gentleman will now show us the supplementary estimates covering these it will perhaps remove our difficulty, but it is not sufficient for the hon. gentleman simply to say that they were supplementary estimates last year. I have taken the statute of last year and they are open to the hon. gentleman. I would like him to point out in the Act passed last year granting money to the government to provide for these expenditures where these items can be found. If he points that out perhaps we will see our way to getting over some of the difficulties that we are now in.

Mr. EMMERSON. At page 19 of the estimates of 1903-4 you will see the sum of $16,700 for first-class clerks.

Mr. BARKER. For railways and canals ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Railways, civil government, page 19. These are the estimates we have now under consideration.

Mr. BARKER. I asked where these details in the estimates of last year were ?

Mr. EMMERSON. $16,700 for 1903-4.

Mr. BARKER. That is not in the estimates of last year.

Mr. EMMERSON. If my hon. friend will have a little patience I will explain. In 1904-5 the vote under the same head is $17,300, which is an increase of $300. Provision is made for three first-class clerks at $1,900 each. They were getting last year $1,850 each. They are now increased to $1,900 each. That makes $150 of that $600. Then, another one was getting $1,800 and he is increased to $1,850.

Mr. BARKER. What is the hon. gentleman reading from ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am reading from the estimates of this year.

Mr. BARKER. What I am asking the hon. gentleman is where his authority is for the increases that were given last year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. If my hon. friend would turn to the estimates of last year he would find an item under the head of civil government of $16,700 for first-class clerks.

Mr. BARKER. At what page ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the page.

Mr. LENNOX. At page 20 of last year's estimates.

Mr. EMMERSON. If you will refer to the estimates of last year you will see an item of $16,700 for first-class clerks.

Mr. BARKER. I do not see anything of the kind.

Mr. EMMERSON. At page 20 of last year's estimates.

Mr. BARKER. At page 20 of last year's estimates the amount is given as $16,450.

Mr. EMMERSON. Has my hon. friend looked at the supplementary estimates ?

Mr. BARKER. I am asking the hon. gentleman to tell us where these supplementaries are. I cannot find them in the statutes. If he will point them out I can look them up and the whole matter will be settled in a moment.

Mr. FIELDING. Mr. Ross's salary is set forth in the civil service list of a year ago at $1,550. Now, he would have $50 more by the ordinary process of the statutory increase which would make his salary $1,600 and my hon. friend is asking for an addition of $100 so as to make it $1,700. These figures seem to compare.

Mr. LENNOX. That is not the point.

Mr. EMMERSON. There are three first-class clerks who were getting $1,850 under the estimates of last year. That appropriation was voted, these salaries have been paid to them, the record shows it and I can give the names of the three clerks. We propose in this vote to give them their statutory increases of $50, making their salaries $1,900. That does not violate the Civil Service Act in any way.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all, but you mistake the meaning of my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker). He says that in the main estimates instead of their salaries being given as $1,850 they are $1,800. He says the amount of the vote last year was $16,450 and you say it was $16,700. Where does the $250 difference come in ? You say it is in the supplementary estimates. My hon. friend says he cannot find any Act of parliament or supplementary estimates authorizing those salaries.

Mr. EMMERSON. I say that the appropriation last year was to pay each of these first-class clerks $1,850.

Mr. HAGGART. That is quite clear but where is the hon. gentleman's authority for the statement ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have sent for it, but I can assure my hon. friend that it is correct and according to the record.

Mr. HAGGART. It is very likely correct because these estimates show $16,700. But, my hon. friend (Mr. Barker) cannot find it in the statutes.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have sent for it.

Mr. BARKER. I think it quite possible that the hon. gentleman is making these things up out of that very convenient word 'contingencies.'

Mr. HAGGART. He dare not do that. It is extraordinary if the deputy and the Auditor General are both wrong, but it is just possible.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman tells us now that he will have supplementary estimates for these salaries.

Mr. EMMERSON. I said there might be.

Mr. BARKER. Then we should consider all these matters together; that would be the businesslike way.

Mr. J. D. REID. Why not let this item stand over and consider it with the other increases?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am always anxious to be reasonable but that does not seem a fair proposition. What I said was that possibly there might be others in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. J. D. REID. You have a pretty shrewd idea.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have an idea that quite a number have applied and are under consideration.

Mr. J. D. REID. Which proves that there are others entitled to increases

Mr. EMMERSON. That does not follow.

Mr. J. D. REID. When the minister grants this increase he is reflecting on his predecessors who refused them.

Mr. EMMERSON. Don't feel hurt about that; I know they won't.

Mr. J. D. REID. Personally I would like to see all the clerks who are entitled to increases getting increases. I do not object to this increase for Mr. Ross, but I object to the manner in which it is presented to the House. It seems to me there must be some underlying influence to cause this special case to be dealt with. The item should stand until we get information.

Mr. FIELDING. There is really no other information the minister can give. The ordinary statutory increase is $50, but occasionally the minister believes that there is an officer who for special reasons is entitled to more and he submits that vote to parliament.

Mr. LENNOX. There was no special reason given in this case.

Mr. FIELDING. The special reason is that in the judgment of the minister, based on the report of his deputy, this officer is entitled on account of special merit to this increase.

Mr. LENNOX. He said he had no report.

Mr. FIELDING. The minister said that the recommendation was made by his deputy. Are we to understand that no increase is to be given to any official unless the minister is perfectly familiar with that official? The principal officers are brought in touch with the minister, but the minister cannot know all the others, and he has to rely on the report of his deputy. What more information can we have than that this officer is recommended by the deputy and that the minister concurred?

Mr. LENNOX. The Minister of Finance is very fond of answering arguments that were not presented. We believe it is quite proper to have the recommendation of the deputy, but we also believe that we should have the information which enables the deputy, or even the minister to come to that conclusion. The minister of railways did not say that Mr. Ross was entitled to this increase because of special merit; his argument was that he did not get his statutory increase for two years, and that by this vote he is paying up for the arrears. We are perfectly prepared in any case to vote $100 for special service, or for special fitness, if the facts are placed before us; but the Minister of Finance need not think for one moment that he is going to crowd it down our throats by trying to make out that we used an argument we never used. We make a perfectly reasonable proposition that this vote should stand over until we get an explanation. If we get a reasonable explanation, when the House again meets, we will pass this vote without further delay.

Mr. EMMERSON. I stated very fairly that I acted upon the recommendation of the deputy minister in this case as to the efficiency of Mr. Ross and the responsibility of his work. When this recommendation was made, I concurred in it. It was done at a time when I did not know the official and had not seen him. But the facts were given to me by the deputy.

Hon. WILLIAM ROSS. There is not a minister, however brilliant, who has not to rely upon his deputy for information of this kind. Here is a deputy who has grown gray, I was almost going to say grown bald, in the service of this country, and who states that this man is entitled to receive this increase, and the minister relies on that information. That is all that any minister can do, because it is impossible for ministers to have information as to the merits or demerits of all the clerks under them.

Mr. BIRKETT. Has Mr. Ross any greater responsibility now than he had a year ago?

Mr. EMMERSON. I cannot say that he has, and I add that two years hence he will not probably have any greater responsibility but will be entitled to the $1,700.

Mr. BIRKETT. I have no objection to Mr. Ross getting the $1,700, I am satisfied that if he were not worth it, the deputy would not recommend it. But I will remind the minister that last year, when the government were amending the Civil Service Act, if they had accepted the proposition I made that all first-class clerks should be given a yearly increase of $100, Mr. Ross would have had the $1,700 this year without any trouble, and without being under any compliment. Is it the intention of the minister, in the case of officials who have not received their statutory increases, to make them up to them ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not know whether there are any who have not had their statutory increases. If there are any they have not been brought to my notice.

Mr. BIRKETT. But if there are any ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I will certainly give them the same consideration that I am giving to Mr. Ross.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the minister also state where he got the authority to give the statutory increase of last year ? I cannot find it in his estimates.

Mr. FIELDING. I think perhaps I can explain that. Last year, it will be remembered, after the estimates were dealt with, the Civil Service Act was amended, and provision was made by a general vote that increases might be paid to any clerks entitled to receive them. I think it is likely that this gentleman came under the terms of that general clause, which would explain why the item did not appear in the estimates.

Mr. BARKER. I think we are entitled to have that explanation clearly from the minister in charge of the department. The Minister of Finance does not tell us as a fact that this is so ; he says he supposes that it is so.

Mr. EMMERSON. My deputy informs me that these three first-class clerks for whom it was proposed to have an appropriation of $1,900 each this year, received $1,850 during the fiscal year 1903-4. That was paid, and it was paid necessarily with the concurrence of the Auditor General. It is proposed in the item under discussion to give the statutory increases to all these different clerks, with the exception of Mr. Ross, and his case I think I have very fully explained to the committee.

Mr. CLARKE. I understand that several organizations of workingmen in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway have made application to the minister for further increases in the wages paid to them. Might I ask whether the hon. gentleman has reached any conclusion ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have stated in my general statement that other increases would be necessary in connection with the employees of the Intercolonial.

Mr. CLARKE. Is the hon. gentleman going to consider favourably the application made ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am under arrangements to meet the men at Moncton immediately at the close of the session, and go over the whole schedule.

Mr. CLARKE. Will provision be made in the supplementary estimates for increased remuneration ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is contained in the general vote for the Intercolonial.

Mr. CLARKE. And that is being taken ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is being provided for.

Mr. HAGGART. I see that the Minister of Finance is right and the Minister of Railways wrong, in stating that there was a supplementary vote. It says at the end of the Civil Service Act :

> And during the financial year ending on the 30th day of June, 1904, there may be paid from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada such sums of money as may not have been voted by parliament but are required for payment of such salaries and increases of salaries as are authorized by this Act.

If we had obtained that information some time ago we would have made better progress.

Mr. LENNOX. In reference to the item for a law clerk, the minister has explained that the reason for the reduction of the salary from $2,100 to $1,925 is that the gentleman who formerly occupied this position has left the service and a new man has come in. Is he an entirely new man ?

Mr. EMMERSON. He was promoted. He had been the assistant law clerk and was promoted to the position of law clerk.

Mr. HAGGART. Is he a barrister ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, he is a barrister.

Mr. LENNOX. How long had he been in the service and what salary had he received previously ?

Mr. EMMERSON. He has been in the service about three years. He began as assistant law clerk with a salary of $1,200, but this was subsequently increased to $1,400.

Mr. LENNOX. Then we are to understand that a clerk who has been in the service for three years arrived at a salary of $1,200 and was subsequently increased to $1,400. What is the initial salary in this office ?

Mr. FIELDING. I think that $1,900 was the original salary for the position of law clerk. The last occupant of the position was getting $2,100 or $2,200. Mr. Hansard's salary was increased while he was assistant law clerk and when his superior officer retired he was promoted to the position of law clerk at a salary, I think, of $1,900.

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Hansard last year received $1,500.

Mr. LENNOX. I am not in favour of cutting salaries too low, particularly, as some one suggests, in the case of a lawyer, but what I point out is that I understood the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) to so say some little time ago that $1,400 was the initial salary for this service. In that case I think it is unreasonable to start this gentleman at $1,925 ; if his predecessor was receiving $2,100, the difference of $175 seems to be very slight. I am not in a position to say it is wrong, but I call the attention of the minister to it.

Mr. BOYD. I want to know if the minister has received any communications from the maintenance of way employees on other roads, that is the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Men, in regard to the rates paid to that class of men on the Intercolonial Railway. I understand that the rate paid on the Intercolonial Railway is less than that paid on the other roads. I want to know if the minister has received any resolutions or applications for an increase so as to bring the rate of wages up to that paid to the same class of employees on other roads. This is a very important class of work and I think these men are possibly quite as much entitled to an increase as some of those whom the hon. minister is looking after at the present time.

Mr. EMMERSON. The information received by my hon. friend is certainly very inaccurate. The facts are exactly the reverse. The Intercolonial Railway is paying more to trackmen than any other road in eastern Canada—I do not speak of the west, because there is a higher standard there ; a dollar means more in the east than in the west. I have received no communications from any organization but if I did receive any they could only represent what is the fact ; that the petitioners were not receiving as much pay as those on the Intercolonial Railway doing similar service.

Mr. BOYD. I wish to read some resolutions that have been sent to me in regard to the matter, so that the minister will be able to see the reason I have in bringing the matter to his attention :

To the government of the Dominion of Canada.

The following resolution was put and carried unanimously :—

That we, the members of subordinate Lodge No. 145 of the International Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way employees (employees on the central division of the Canadian Pacific Railway), do heartily favour an increase of wages to all the maintenance of way employees on our government railways so that the purchasing power of their wages will be equal to what it was a few years ago.

And that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to our Dominion government through our representative, Mr. N. Boyd, M.P.

Mr. EMMERSON. When is that dated.

Mr. BOYD. One of these resolutions is dated September 21, 1903.

Mr. FIELDING. This subject has been dealt with, I think, about that time.

Mr. BOYD. I have another one here which I shall also read, so that it may be on record for the minister to see.

Moved by Brother Woolsey, seconded by Brother J. Wilson, that we, the members of Minnedosa Division No. 163 of Maintenance of Way Employees of America, assembled, do by unanimous vote desire to place on record that we strongly disapprove of the low scale of wages paid by the government roads of Canada to the maintenance of way employees, such wages being below the wages paid by other Canadian roads for same class of labour, and we wish as voters to enlist your aid both in the House and out of it towards rectifying this injustice.

I have a letter very strongly urging me to bring this matter to the attention of the government, and, if necessary to urge it in the House. If the matter has been attended to, it will remove the necessity for my doing so. But I would ask the minister to tell me what the wages are, so that I may make a comparison.

Mr. FIELDING. The Minister of Railways has stated that he did not receive these communications. But I may explain that while I was acting minister of that department, I received probably these very communications, certainly some communication of the same tenor. This was some months ago. The matter was then under consideration. In fact, it had been referred to in the discussions of last session and intimation had been given that it would be inquired into at the close of the session. It was inquired into and the wages of the maintenance of way employees, trackmen as they are usually called, were increased.

Mr. BOYD. What was the increase ?

Mr. FIELDING. The ordinary trackmen were receiving $1.30, and this was increased to $1.40, and the section foremen received a corresponding increase. I think this is above the wages paid by any of the great railways of Canada. In case of other branches of the railway service I was willing to take the expenditure of other railways where the men were getting paid at a more advanced figure than those on the government road.

But, I thought that in the case of the trackmen who were lowest in the scale of pay in the service, we need not take the scale of the other railways, but that $1.30, the amount we were then giving, was rather low, and, irrespective of what other railways paid we should advance it to $1.40. That was done some months ago. And, as I am reminded by an hon. friend, in some sections, I believe the amount was made $1.50, a distinction being made with regard to the various grades of stations, so that, under certain conditions, there was an increase to $1.50.

Civil Government—Department of Railways and Canals—contingencies :—

Printing and stationery.	$5,000
Contingencies..	3,000
	$8,000

Mr. LENNOX. We should have some explanation of this.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is the same vote as last year—the usual vote.

Mr. LENNOX. That is not sufficient. Is all last year's vote expended ? In these cases, I think we had better go back to the practice of some years ago and get an explanation from the minister of what the money is for. It can hardly be taken for granted that because $8,000 was required last year therefore $8,000 will be required this year.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is the usual vote. For the year ending 30th June 1903, the amount spent on printing and stationery was $6,061.98 and on contingencies $2,439.37. So, the amount of the vote was exceeded and I think that a supplementary vote has been asked for to meet the expenditure.

Mr. LENNOX. This shows the utility of asking for information. It is very clear and very satisfactory. We have had $6,000 odd spent on printing and stationery—no separation made between the items of printing and stationery—and $2,000 odd for something else making a total of $8,000. Now, what could be more satisfactory ? And, if we had not asked we would not have received this information.

Mr. MONK. What proportion of this printing is done outside of the Printing Bureau ? I see that last year a considerable amount was done for the department by newspaper offices in different parts of the country.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is all done in the Printing Bureau.

Mr. MONK. Was the report of the department this year done in the Printing Bureau ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, so I am informed.

Mr. MONK. This vote, I take it, applies to the office here. But the printing on the Intercolonial such as folders and all the other printing——

Mr. EMMERSON. That is not in this vote.

Mr. MONK. But is the minister able to say what proportion of the general printing required for the Intercolonial is done outside the Printing Bureau ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The folders, &c., have to be done in offices that are in touch with the central offices at Moncton.

Mr. MONK. Would it not be possible for the printing, of which, as I see by the Auditor General's Report, there is a large amount, to be done in the Printing Bureau ? Why is not the printing done here ? I see that it is spread over most of the newspaper organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the maritime provinces, sometimes under contract and sometimes without any contract. In consequence of this, a difficulty arose last year between the Auditor General and the employees of my hon. friend's (Mr. Emmerson's) department.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not think it would be possible to have this printing done here. But I shall be prepared to discuss that question under the proper item. I do not think the subject properly arises under this item.

Mr. MONK. It seems to me that discussion might properly arise under this item as this relates to printing for the department. However, my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) may desire to get information on the subject. I will raise the question again on another item. There is another point I wish to speak about, though it does not exactly concern printing. The minister will remember that we had some correspondence in regard to the abandonment to the town of Lachine of the use of the old canal bank there. The bank is not now used by the government. As I explained in the correspondence that I had with the minister on behalf of the municipality, this canal bank has become an eyesore, and, now that the summer holidays are beginning, the authorities of Lachine are extremely anxious to obtain the use—during pleasure, of course—of that canal bank, in order to give it a more creditable appearance. I made a similar application a few years, ago, but, at that time there was an obstacle in the way in the shape of a projected railway to pass through. That obstacle has been removed, and, as the minister knows, there is no reason at all why the authorities of Lachine should not have a favourable answer to their repeated representations. I merely wish to inquire, as we are now getting into July, whether it would not be possible to grant their request.

Mr. EMMERSON. That lease could only be entered into by an Order in Council approved by His Excellency. The matter is now under consideration, and I hope it will be concluded before long. Besides, that matter does not come under the present vote.

Mr. MONK. I know that. But in a matter of this kind I do not think we are obliged, in discussing the estimates, to confine ourselves absolutely to the item under discussion. I think we have a right to urge any grievance we have, or any complaint, before we vote the amount. I have not bothered my hon. friend unduly with regard to that question. It seems to me such a simple question that there must be some extraordinary reason for not concluding it when the town at present is so urgent. When the matter was taken up three or four years ago there was some objection, I think there was a line of railway projected through there, but that objection has been removed. From the correspondence I had with my hon. friend I understood that it was merely a matter of routine, of getting the Order in Council through, and giving the town of Lachine the intimation and passing that lease, as my hon. friend stated a moment ago. I would like to know if there is any cause for this delay, beyond the usual cause that a certain time is required to pass it through Council, because the town of Lachine desires to improve, embellish and arrange that whole canal bank before the summer is finished.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think we had better not pursue this discussion further, as it is outside the item before the committee.

Mr. MONK. I would like to have your ruling on that point.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. My ruling is this, that when a resolution is before the committee, the committee can, if they choose, discuss the whole resolution in a general way, but when they have taken up a particular item, relevancy is one of the rules that govern the discussion, and when the item is passed it cannot be referred to any more. We cannot discuss any question outside the proposition before the committee unless the committee is willing to allow an irrelevant discussion to go on.

Mr. MONK. If you rule that, upon an item in the minister's department, I am not entitled to ascertain the cause of the delay in this instance, I shall have to bow to your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There will probably be some other item under which the hon. gentleman can bring this subject up.

Mr. MONK. I merely wanted to know on behalf of my constituency if this matter will be concluded before it is too late.

Mr. EMMERSON. We have had some correspondence on the matter, it is now being considered in the department, and I think we will reach finality with respect to it within a very short time. I am endeavouring to dispose of it as speedily as possible. There has been a great deal of work in the department in its relation to the executive council, but as soon as this matter can be disposed of, I will answer my hon. friend, and I hope it will be very soon.

Mr. BIRKETT. I see there is an item here for contingencies, although the amount is very small, and I would like to take occassion to call the attention of the minister to the condition of the bridges across the Rideau canal between upper and lower town. The Sappers' bridge particularly is in a deplorable condition.

Mr. EMMERSON. They are in the Public Works Department.

Mr. BIRKETT. But these bridges cross the Rideau canal, and the hon. gentleman's department has charge of canals. It is possible that the Improvement Commissioners have them in charge. But they are government property, and I thought well to bring the matter before the attention of the government. The bridges are certainly in a deplorable condition, they are not safe so far as the sidewalks are concerned.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am informed that these bridges are under the charge of the Public Works Department.

Mr. HAGGART. The Sappers' bridge used to be under the control of the Rideau canal, it was built by the Rideau canal authorities, and was under their control. It may have passed over to the Public Works Department, but I do not know how.

Intercolonial Railway—to increase accommodation at Sydney, $86,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is a revote of $72,000. There was an appropriation for 1903-4 of $97,000. The estimated expenditure out of that sum up to the 30th June is $25,000 requiring therefore, a revote of $72,000. Then there is an extra amount which will be required for moving certain buildings, grading the station grounds, rearranging the tracks and for certain land and legal expenses in connection therewith totalling $14,000. This makes $86,000 which we will require for the purpose of increasing the accommodation at Sydney.

Mr. LENNOX. What is the total estimated expenditure necessary to complete the work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total expenditure for improved and increased accommodation at Sydney beginning with 1896 down to June 30, 1903, is $387,771.73. Then the expenditure from June 30, 1903, to May 1, 1904, was $11,107.37, making a total of $398,879.10, so that the total estimated cost of improved and increased accommodation at Sydney will be $498,771.73.

Mr. LENNOX. That will leave $100,000 yet to be expended ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. What is the reason that so very little of the money appropriated last year was spent ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was so late in the season it was found inexpedient to have the work carried on. The work involves the construction of a new station and general improvements around and about it and the work could not be carried on at that time of the year.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the hon. minister will be able to give the expenditure on capital account for last year. In this whole item of the Intercolonial Railway there is a revote of $636,485, appropriations not required for 1894-5 amounting to $2,034,084.84 and a total appropriation of $3,717,284.84. Deducting $2,034,084.84 the total amount chargeable to capital account with Intercolonial Railway alone was over a million dollars. Is that not so ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to ask what the total expenditure on the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway was up to the end of last year ?

Mr. HAGGART. Up to the end of 1903-4. You say that you only have the returns up to the 31st May.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not the total expenditure but I have promised to furnish it. I could not very well get it this evening as the clerks were not in the office but I will give the hon. gentleman the total expenditure up to June 30, 1903, chargeable to capital account.

Mr. HAGGART. We have that but we want the expenditure for 1903-4, the amount voted last year.

Mr. EMMERSON. That is for the current year ending the 30th June, 1904 ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. EMMERSON. I will furnish that information to-morrow.

Mr. HAGGART. But the hon. gentleman has given us one item of expenditure up to the 31st May, the expenditure at Sydney. The total amount of the revote is $636,485 and the appropriations not required for 1904-5, $2,034,084.84. Deduct this amount from the appropriations for 1903-4 and it leaves over $1,000,000 chargeable to capital account alone, that the Intercolonial Railway have expended up to 31st May or up to the 1st July. That is correct, is it not ?

Mr. EMMERSON. If I follow the hon. gentleman I think that would be it. I can give him the total up to the end of April of the actual expenditure on capital account. It it $1,362,070.38.

Mr. HAGGART. On capital account for ten months ?

Mr. EMMERSON. On capital account for ten months.

Mr. HAGGART. On the Intercolonial Railway ?

Mr. EMMERSON. On the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, then you have nothing to expend for May and June. You see that there is an amount at your disposal of about a million dollars.

Mr. BARKER. $1,046,000.

Mr. HAGGART. This $1,046,000 you have expended in ten months and you must have something to expend in the next two months.

Mr. EMMERSON. The total amount appropriated on capital account to the Intercolonial Railway for 1903-4 was $3,717,284.84.

Mr. HAGGART. That is right.

Mr. EMMERSON. We have expended up to the end of April of that sum $1,362,070.38.

Mr. HAGGART. But does not the hon. minister see this ? You ask for a revote of $663,485. You say that you do not require of last year's appropriations, $2,034,084.84.

Mr. FIELDING. That does not apply to the past year. That does not mean that that amount is not required for the year for which it is voted. It means that similar works are not required for the coming year. The amount is not required for 1904-5.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not required for 1904-5 but it is not expended under the vote of 1903-4.

Mr. BARKER. This is the part of the vote that is not required.

Mr. FIELDING. These words do not put any limitation on the expenditures of the past year. They only make a comparison between the two years. There are various sums which were not required to be repeated and which total up to the amount stated, but these words do not put any limitation on the minister's expenditure for the past year.

Mr. HAGGART. You took a vote for 1903-4 on capital account of $3,717,284.84 for railways and canals. You state that of that $3,717,284.84 you do not require $2,034,084.84.

Mr. FIELDING. No, we do not say anything of the kind.

Mr. HAGGART. It says: 'appropriations not required for 1904-5.'

Mr. FIELDING. Exactly; similar votes are not required for the coming year.

Mr. HAGGART. Any way the minister will give me at the next meeting of the committee the expenditure to the 31st of May, and the estimated expenditure on capital account for the next month both on the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island railways and all the other works that will be under discussion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Has the minister had his attention directed to a resolution passed by the Sydney Board of Trade and endorsed by the Halifax Board of Trade, with respect to a night train between Halifax, Sydney and North Sydney? The resolution of the Halifax Board of Trade passed last March, is as follows:—

That the Halifax Board of Trade approves the resolution of the Sydney Board of Trade regarding the immediate need of a night train between Halifax, Sydney and North Sydney, and that it urges the Intercolonial Railway authorities to grant the demand for the same as soon as they are able to do so.

Has this matter been under consideration and if so with what result?

Mr. EMMERSON. I received a copy of this resolution from the Halifax and Sydney Board of Trade. The question has been very carefully considered both by the Intercolonial Railway management and myself. There are now two daily trains from Sydney; one in the early morning and the other at mid-day, and these trains are found very convenient for the people on the intermediate stations all along the line. There are many good reasons why we should have a night train; it would convenience a limited few so far as I could judge from the facts, but the present traffic would not justify three trains daily, and taking into consideration the convenience to the greatest number it was thought that it would not be advisable to substitute a night train for one of the day trains.

Mr. KENDALL. I entirely endorse the decision of the department in this matter. It would be very inconvenient for the travelling public generally if one of these day trains was taken off and run at night. I would remind the minister that there is a fast freight running between Halifax and Sydney, and probably without any great additional expense, a sleeping car could be attached to that train. This, for some time at least would meet the requirements of night travel.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does the freight train leave at night?

Mr. KENDALL. No; the hour would have to be changed.

Mr. EMMERSON. One difficulty in running a night train is the additional expense of crossing the Straits. We hope the traffic will grow so that it will justify the putting on of a night train, but at present that is not the case.

Intercoolnial Railway—to strengthen bridges, $385,000.

Mr. BARKER. We should have some explanation of this. Will this vote close the whole item for strengthening bridges, or is this to be continued from year to year?

Mr. EMMERSON. This vote does not complete the transformation.

Mr. BARKER. How much is there to come?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total expenditure under this head from the commencement of the work in June, 1899, down to the 30th of June, 1903, was $867,101.64, and the expenditure from the 30th of June to the 1st of May was $161,683.93. In addition to that, there is a superstructure for the southwest portion of the Miramichi bridge, $55,303.20; and a new superstructure across the Restigouche river, $93,965.68, making a total to the 1st of May of $310,932.81, and a total expenditure of $1,178,084.45.

Mr. BARKER. I asked how much the hon. minister would require to complete the strengthening of all these bridges?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total estimated cost of strengthening the bridges, exclusive of the Oxford and New Glasgow and Cape Breton Railway is $1,759,000. The larger class of engines are not in use on these railways at present, and it will not be immediately necessary to make the change in the bridges.

Mr. BARKER. Will the hon. gentleman now tell us how much of this appropriation of $385,000 there will be yet required to complete this expenditure of $1,759,000?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is estimated that the amount required for 1904-5 will be $280,000.

Mr. BARKER. There was an attempt made last year to find out where we were going to wind up with this expenditure for the strengthening of bridges. This is what was said:

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Then there is the vote of $165,000 to be added to that, and the hon. gentleman says that will complete the repairs on those bridges.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I stated that this appropriation for the year will probably finish the work, but the general manager says it will take another year. There will be something further to be done.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You do not know what the amount is?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not the estimates at hand.

Mr. INGRAM. For the total repairs of bridges ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. For strengthening the bridges.

I think the committee last year understood that they were getting some idea from the Minister of Finance of where we were going to wind up in this expenditure on capital account for strengthening bridges ; but I find that although that $165,000 has been spent, the hon. gentleman now asks us for $385,000 for this year and tells us that we shall have $280,000 afterwards. The Finance Minister may have had something in his mind different from what we had, but certainly I think the House was led to believe that we were approaching the end of this expenditure. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways if he will state the names of the particular bridges that are yet to be strengthened and the amount that will be required for each bridge. It is necessary to get that, I think, otherwise there will never apparently be an end to this.

Mr. EMMERSON. To save time I will furnish my hon. friend with a statement of that.

Mr. BARKER. My object is to get it on 'Hansard,' if it is not too long, because that is the only way we can keep trace of it.

Mr. EMMERSON. I will give a list of forty bridges for which the Dominion Bridge Company has a contract. I can give the names of the bridges, but not the exact amount required for each bridge. I could probably furnish that later.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister will not expect us to pass the item until we get the fullest information.

Mr. BARKER. The Finance Minister will see how necessary it is that we should have the figures.

Mr. FIELDING. That is fair ; I do not object to that.

Mr. EMMERSON. I could not give the cost with respect to each particular bridge at this time, and it may be necessary to allow the item to stand, or, if my hon. friends will pass the item, I will furnish the particular information and place it on 'Hansard.'

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister is a little innocent. We have had promises of that kind before. I have no doubt he intends to fulfil his promise, and give a new example, but I do not think we can trust him.

Mr. BARKER. We have discussed the strengthening of these bridges for two or three years. Last year a certain bridge was said not to be worn out, but was transferred to the Prince Edward Island Railway. We were not able to ascertain last year what credit was given to the Intercolonial Railway for that bridge taken to the Prince Edward Island Railway or to get any information as to what was done when an old bridge was taken into stores and afterwards sold. The Finance Minister was quite certain that when it was taken into stores and sold that amount was credited to capital account, but he was unable then to give us his assurance that that had been done in any previous case although he was quite sure that it was going to be done in the particular case he was speaking of. But the time had not yet come for him to do it and he could not show the credit. Perhaps some of these bridges were dealt with last year and the present minister will be able to tell the committee when it is up again exactly what was done with any bridges that were taken into stores last year or sent over to the Prince Edward Island Railway and placed there. Was the value of those bridges credited to capital account ? Although the Minister of Finance said that was the practice, to charge the new bridge to capital and to credit capital with the value of the old bridge, I do not wish to be understood as conceding for a moment that that is the proper way to deal with it. I think it is just as objectionable to deal with the bridges in that way as to deal with rails in the way this government has been dealing with them since 1896. It is cheating capital account for the benefit of revenue. What the Finance Minister thought was going to be done last year in some instances would have had the effect of increasing the revenue and adding to the capital debt of the road. Supposing an old bridge cost originally $100,000 and that the hon. gentleman, when renewing it, had to put up a better bridge in order to carry the heavier locomotives, erected a bridge costing $120,000 and sold the old bridge for $50,000. Now as I understand, the hon. gentleman charges the $120,000 to capital and credits capital with $50,000 but the hon. gentleman must see that if he were not increasing the weight of the bridge but simply substituting another $100,000 bridge he would have to charge the whole $100,000 to revenue and credit revenue with the $50,000 and, therefore, his revenue account would have lost $50,000 by the renewal of that bridge. By his method he escapes such a charge altogether and this practice makes a difference of hundreds of thousands of dollars every year. In fact, he has kept his account with reference to steel rails and old bridges in such a way that it is absolutely impossible to find out the amount of the deficit of each year which should take the place of the small profits he has been claiming. There is no doubt that in the case I am speaking of, a betterment of $20,000, that amount should be dealt with as a betterment, the $20,000 being charged to capital account, and the remainder, or $100,000 dealt with as a renewal of the old bridge, chargeable against revenue account, less the value of the old material or bridge taken out. The hon. gentleman did not seem last year to consider this worthy of his consideration.

To increase accommodation at Lévis, $17,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. The amount asked this year is $17,000 of which $12,000 is a revote. It is for completing the concrete platforms and curves and tank and some electric wiring which with the engineering will bring the whole amount to $17,000.

Mr. LENNOX. Will that complete it?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the total expenditure on the station at Point Lévis.

Mr. EMMERSON. The total expenditure for increased accommodation for the commencement of the work June 30th, 1897, down to the 1st of May, 1904, is $360,380.44, and the total estimated cost in connection with the increased accommodation at Lévis was $393,000.

Mr. HAGGART. What was the total expenditure in that statement?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have given the total, $360,380.44.

Mr. HAGGART. That is for increased accommodation; I wanted to know the total expenditure at Point Lévis.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is impossible to give that because it was all voted in the sum for the purchase of the St. Charles branch and does not appear in the accounts as the Lévis terminals.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It seems a very large sum. How much does the station, for example, cost?

Mr. EMMERSON. I cannot give the exact cost of the station; it is not so much the expenditure on the station as in connection with the restricted area at Lévis. As we all know the space between the bluff and the water's edge is very narrow and the arrangement of the tracks and the making of the changes has been very expensive. The expenditure in connection with the station has not been so very large although it is a very efficient and convenient station.

Mr. HAGGART. 'Enormous' is the proper word.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The area may be restricted but the expenditure certainly is not.

Mr. EMMERSON. The more restricted the area, the more difficult it is to restrict the expenditure.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Could the minister not give us some idea as to the expenditure upon the building itself?

Mr. EMMERSON. I could not give it to-night, but I will to-morrow.

Air-brakes to freight cars, $25,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How many freight cars will that furnish?

Mr. EMMERSON. 500 cars at an average cost of $50 a car.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How many are equipped with air-brakes now?

Mr. EMMERSON. Box cars, 5,279; all classes of cars, 9,782. Equipped with air brakes to 30th June, 1903, 6,030; total then to be equipped, 3,752. We estimate to be equipped during the year 1903-4, 500.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When new cars are bought are they equipped with the air brakes, or does the railway equip them afterwards?

Mr. EMMERSON. They are all equipped with air brakes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How many more are there to be equipped?

Mr. EMMERSON. As estimated, 3,752. We take about 500 each year.

Mr. BARKER. How many were equipped last year?

Mr. EMMERSON. Five hundred.

Mr. BARKER. According to 'Hansard' of last year, at June 30th, 1903, you had 3,672 to be equipped. If you equipped 500 last year that would leave 3,172.

Mr. EMMERSON. It was 3,752 at the 30th June, 1903.

Mr. BARKER. According to 'Hansard' it was 3,672.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Never mind.

Mr. BARKER. This was the Finance Minister's statement, and surely we should take that. Did the minister buy any cars during 1904?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. BARKER. How many freight cars?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am informed that there were 207 box cars, but I have not the figures as to the others, but I can get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BARKER. I should be glad if the minister would furnish a statement showing how many new freight cars have been purchased with the brake equipment, and also how many cars out of service have been rebuilt and equipped. I want to see, in fact, how he used this $25,000 voted last year for this purpose. The same question would apply to the next item, that of draw-bars on freight cars; and, perhaps, these two items had better stand until we get that information.

To exchange draw-bars of freight cars, $45,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. The cost per car for the draw-bars is about $40. We are asking this year for $45,000 to provide draw-bars for 1,125 cars. The total expenditure for exchanging draw-bars from the commencement of the work to 30th June, 1903, is $105,000, and for the eleven months ending 31st May, 1904, $32,643.31.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is a draw-bar?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is the arrangement by which the cars are attached together—the coupler. There is a standard draw-bar used all over the continent. It is necessary to have your cars equipped with that standard draw-bar, in order that the cars may be transferred to other roads.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How many cars are furnished with the standard draw-bar, and how many are still to be equipped ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The work has been going on for some time, and each year there is a vote to equip cars with the standard draw-bar.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is important to know the number, in view of future expenditure.

Mr. EMMERSON. Up to the 30th of June we have changed 6,876, we have a balance to change after June, 1903, of 2,906. It was estimated that up to the 30th of June last there were to be changed 1,150. That work will probably have been completed. The estimate to be charged to June 30 this year, is 1,756, and we provide by this vote to change 1,125.

Mr. HAGGART. Who has the contract for these draw-bars ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The draw-bars are furnished by tender and competition, and the work of changing is done in the shops at Moncton. We purchase the draw-bars and do the rest of the work in the shops.

Mr. HAGGART. Who is the successful tenderer ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I could not tell that. Perhaps Mr. Pottinger would know.

Mr. HAGGART. Is the hon. gentleman quite sure they were purchased by tender ?

Mr. EMMERSON. My deputy says so, and that has been the usual course since I came into the department.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the hon. gentleman add this to the list of items on which he is to furnish information, and ask the proper officer ?

Mr. MONK. In connection with this item, could the hon. gentleman inform us as to the amount we have paid for increased terminal facilities to the Grand Trunk Railway at Montreal ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is an annual sum, paid yearly.

Mr. MONK. It increases when the facilities are increased ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not think any increased sum has been paid this year. No claims of that character have come under my observation yet. Replying to the leader of the opposition, I will give the name of the successful tenderer to-morrow.

Mr. KENDALL. I would also like the minister to be able to tell us to-morrow to what extent side ladders instead of end ladders have been put upon his freight cars; also, if it is to his knowledge that other railway companies in Canada are making a similar provision.

Mr. HAGGART. We want the item respecting draw-bars to stand, that we may ascertain who got the contract and when.

New machinery for locomotive and car shops, $31,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the total contemplated expenditure ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total estimated cost for new machinery for the locomotives in the car shops, to the 30th of June, 1905, is $181,247.33. The amount required to keep the shops up to date is estimated to be about $25,000 a year.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the total expenditure on tools and machinery used in these shops ?

Mr. EMMERSON. About $132,000. Since 1888 the total cost of machinery and tools, up to the 1st of May, 1904, has been $131,845.40. Machinery is being placed in all the shops. In regard to new shops, we have to modernize the machinery and make the tools up to date. It is supposed that the expenditure will average about $25,000 each year for that purpose.

Mr. HAGGART. I think the minister must be mistaken. From 1888 to 1904 is sixteen years, and he said the total expenditure for machinery in the shops and the extension of the shops was only $131,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. That does not include the shops themselves, only the tools and machinery.

Mr. HAGGART. I thought the expenditure was largely in excess of that.

Mr. EMMERSON. It appears not.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What business will we take up to-morrow ?

Mr. FIELDING. We will take up the Railway Bill followed by the motion for supply and my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals will resume his estimates.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, July 5th, 1904.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

THE TREADGOLD CONCESSIONS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the government when we may expect the report of the committee appointed to investigate the Treadgold concessions in the Yukon. There is some rumour in the press that instructions have been given to Mr. Justice Britton not to make any report at all. I assume that is inaccurate. At the same time, it is desirable that the report, if it is to be forthcoming at all during the present session, should be before us at an early date. If I recollect correctly the statement of the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) about four or five weeks ago, it was that the report was expected early in July.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I may say to my hon. friend that my attention was called some time ago to a statement that was made in another place with regard to this report. I have not had an opportunity to speak to my colleague who made that statement, but perhaps to-morrow I may be able to give the information to my hon. friend.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY. Now that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is in his place, I would ask him when we may expect the papers that I have been compelled to call for very often with regard to the seizures of binder twine.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister. I may say to my hon. friend that in the absence of my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce I wrote yesterday to his department for this report, and I received an answer stating that they were working at it, but they wanted to get some more information on the subject which was in the Department of Justice. That is the best answer that I can give.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) stated yesterday that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) would take up his Bill to-day to amend the Railway Act. But I understand the Minister of Justice is busy in the Railway Committee, and if agreeable to the other side, we will go into Committee of Supply and take the Railway estimates.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The difficulty about that is that several gentlemen who are desirous of criticising the railway estimates are in attendance on the Railway Committee.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That difficulty can be provided for by taking up those items that are non-contentious. We will not close the railway estimates to-day, and they can be discussed latter on.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is very awkward.

Mr. CLANCY. It is unfortunate that the House should be sitting when some very important Bills are now being dealt with in the Railway Committee. It is utterly impossible for members of the House to give that attention they are bound to give to the business of the House when the Railway Committee is sitting at the same time. For my part while I desire to be in the House I am compelled to go to the Railway Committee.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The resolution under consideration is number 89, the Intercolonial Railway, and the item is 'To equip four passenger cars with Pintsch gas apparatus, $3,500.'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We have not passed the item 'Air brakes to freight cars, $25,000.'

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). The $385,000 item and the $45,000 item were allowed to stand until Mr. Pottinger furnished us information.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When did we pass the $25,000 item?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That was passed, then the item 'To exchange draw-bars of freight cars' stood over. Then the item 'New machinery for locomotive and car shops' was passed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was not aware that the $25,000 item was passed. It does not make any difference, except that the chairman should not mark an item passed without letting the committee understand what is being done. Information was asked with regard to that, and two or three gentlemen said: 'stand,' and I supposed it stood. I notice that sometimes these items are marked passed without the committee clearly understanding it. There should be a thorough understanding between the chairman and the committee at all times as to what is being passed.

Mr. EMMERSON. I understood that the item respecting 'New machinery for locomotive and car shops' and 'Air brakes to freight cars' were to stand for certain information.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There was information asked for with regard to both. I can look up the 'Hansard' and find out what it is.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I never mark an item passed unless the committee are agreeable.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The information can be brought down on another item.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. My clerk certifies that that item was passed. Some questions were asked in regard to it, but it was allowed to pass.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When an item is to be passed the question should be distinctly put to the committee so that every one may hear it, and that every one who has any objection to its passing or desires it to stand, may then speak. But that is not always done.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I always ask 'Shall the item be adopted?' Then I pause for a moment or two to see if any person objects, and if there is no response, then I declare it passed. Sometimes I may make a mistake.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are we then to leave the items 'To strengthen bridges, $385,000' and 'To exchange draw-bars of freight cars, $45,000' to stand until we get information?

Mr. EMMERSON. Until we get information.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think the Minister will find that some information was to be obtained about the item of $25,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have asked Mr. Pottinger for information. This present item 'to equip four passenger cars with Pintsch gas apparatus, $3,500,' is a revote. Last year $8,000 was appropriated for the purpose. The total estimated cost for equipping the passenger cars with this apparatus is $22,400. We are asking for $3,500 in order to equip four passenger cars this year. The total number to be equipped is twenty-six. Up to the 30th June, 1903, fourteen had been equipped, and it is estimated that there will have been six equipped to the 30th June last. Therefore, the estimated number that will have been equipped to the 30th June, 1904, is twenty and the balance to be equipped after the 30th June is six. The estimated number to be done in 1904-5 is four, and after the 30th June, 1905, there will be two to be equipped.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How many cars are at present equipped?

Mr. EMMERSON. There are twenty-six altogether to be equipped. We have equipped twenty. That leaves six. We propose to equip four this year and two after June 30, 1905.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You do not propose to equip all your cars but only twenty-six?

Mr. EMMERSON. Twenty-six.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How are the other cars lighted?

Mr. EMMERSON. Very largely by oil.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. American or Canadian?

Mr. EMMERSON. I could not tell the hon. gentleman; I think very largely by Canadian oil. The Imperial Oil Company have the contract for furnishing it, and as it is a Canadian concern, I presume they are furnishing good Canadian goods.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Good Standard Oil goods.

Mr. EMMERSON. Perhaps we will have New Brunswick oil supplied before long.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman will be endeavouring to get the contract himself in that case. Are there no cars lighted with electricity?

Mr. EMMERSON. No.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. At one time there were. Was that abandoned altogether, and if so, why?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am told by the general manager that lighting by electricity proved to be entirely too expensive and that they required to use the storage battery, which had to be charged at certain points. The Pintsch gas was found to be much cheaper.

Mr. CLARE. How many cars did you light with electricity?

Mr. EMMERSON. We have none lighted by electricity now.

Mr. CLARE. I understand you tested it. How many cars did you test it with?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think about ten or more were equipped and lighted with electricity, but that has all been removed.

Mr. CLARE. You say ten or more. It seems to be a remarkable thing to throw away money in testing so many cars, when with one or two you could have tested it thoroughly.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was the method of ligthing cars that was generally used. The Intercolonial Railway in common with other railways went into the lighting of their cars with electricity. It made a very excellent light, and was a very great success, but the only drawback was the expense of it, and after it had been used for some years it was taken out. The system was removed five or six years ago. Ordinary oil was used and is being used as a substitute for electricity, but oil is being replaced as far as possible in all these cars which I have mentioned by Pintsch gas.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Might I ask the hon. gentleman to state the relative cost of oil, Pintsch gas and electricity per car ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The general manager tells me that he has that information somewhere, but it is not available at the present moment. I can get it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not want an absolutely correct answer. Could we have it stated approximately ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The cost of electric light is about four times as great as that of Pintsch gas, with the storage battery light that was used on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And as between gas and oil, what is the difference ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Pintsch gas would cost about double as much as oil. One additional reason for using Pintsch gas is on account of the safety. The oil is very unsafe, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. When the minister says double the cost, I presume he means the initial cost, or does he mean the cost of maintenance ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I mean the operating cost.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The system of electric lighting used on the Canadian Pacific Railway and a great many American roads is a combination of axle and storage battery together. They sometimes have the dynamo in the baggage car. Has this system been tried ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The system of generating electricity from the car itself was tried in one of the cars on the Intercolonial Railway. That was tried very generally on the Canadian Pacific Railway, but they found it to be not in the interest of the road and they discarded it almost wholly, as I am informed. Certainly they have discarded its general use in the lighting of their cars.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Do they use Pintsch gas all through ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Pintsch gas on some and on very many of their cars they use oil. I understand from the general manager that they have adopted acetylene gas with the Pintsch gas apparatus.

Mr. CLARE. How many cars were equipped last year with Pintsch gas ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Six up to the 30th June of the present year.

Mr. CLARE. What is the cost per car?

Mr. EMMERSON. The cost per car is about $800.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Have you to pay a royalty on the apparatus or what is it that makes it so expensive ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There is a contract with the Pintsch Gas Company and the apparatus is purchased from them in New York.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. May I ask what the hon. minister pays per gallon for the oil used on the road, and if the contract is let by tender ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The contract is let by tender, but I do not know the exact figures. Tenders were called for all through Canada.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. That is for illuminating oil ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes. The lubricating oil would be in the mechanical department and the illuminating oil would be classified in the maintenance of way department.

Mr. HACKETT. How are the cars lighted on the P. E. I. Railway ?

Mr. EMMERSON. By oil lamps.

Mr. HACKETT. Is it the intention to introduce the Pintsch system, which the minister says is so cheap and efficient ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It would be very desirable to do so and it would contribute to safety.

Mr. HACKETT. We have a large number of tourists coming to Prince Edward Island in the summer season ; they take the train at Summerside generally in the evening and travel to Charlottetown, and they should be afforded modern accommodation on that railway. I find it very difficult myself to read a newspaper by the present lighting system. Why not introduce the Pintsch system on this evening train between Summerside and Charlottetown ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We have the Pintsch system only on a limited number of cars on the main line of the Intercolonial Railroad, but now that the hon. gentleman has called my attention to this matter I shall be very glad if I can, to introduce the Pintsch system on at least one train on the Prince Edward Island Railway.

Mr. CLARE. $800 per car seems a large price for introducing the Pintsch system; one would think to look at it that it was not worth more than $150.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is open for you to tender and I will give you a show.

Mr. CLARE. I suppose there is a patent and all that. If it costs $800 a car why does the minster take $3,500 for four cars.

Mr. EMMERSON. There are certain incidental expenses. I think the utmost care is exercised in the expenditure.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What is your policy about introducing the Pintsch system in new coaches; I assume that it could be more cheaply done when the car is being originally constructed?

Mr. EMMERSON. New cars are fitted with the Pintsch system, but the expense is very largely in the cylinder and because of the length of the route of the Intercolonial Railway we have to use large cylinders to store a sufficient quantity of gas.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The minister might have a stronger tank and give the gas greater pressure.

Mr. EMMERSON. That is also a question of cost and is as broad as it is long. We do the same as the other great railways and it costs us no more.

Mr. CLARE. Last year you took $8,000 to fit up ten cars; how is it that you take more than $800 a car this year; are you paying more than last year?

Mr. EMMERSON. The cost is the same this year; the difference must be due to the fact that the work on the six cars was incomplete and the revote of $3,500 is to complete the ten cars as was contemplated.

Mr. HACKETT. The minister stated that they are now using the acetylene apparatus for the Pintsch gas. What is the difference between the two kinds of gas?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think my hon. friend misunderstood me. I said that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was using acetylene gas with a Pintsch gas apparatus, and that the Intercolonial was using Pintsch gas, with Pintsch gas apparatus. There was no question of acetylene gas on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the object of using acetylene gas with Pintsch gas apparatus? Has it been demonstrated to be better in any way?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am informed that they tried it in a small way, and are now trying it in a larger way. It is a matter of experiment very largely, but the results seem to be on the side of Pintsch gas.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Which would be the more injurious, in the event of gas escaping?

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have heard that the Pintsch gas is the safer and less unpleasant.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the material from which Pintsch gas is generated?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is an oil specially prepared from petroleum.

Mr. CLANCY. Where do you get the oil for that purpose?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is purchased from the Imperial Oil Company under contract, after tender.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. The Imperial Oil Company is the Canadian name of the Standard Oil Company, is it not?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a Canadian company said to have some affiliation with the Standard Oil Company. I believe it is the Canadian Standard.

Mr. CLANCY. That is generally imported oil?

Mr. EMMERSON. No, they have their refinery at Sarnia, I think. They import a certain class of crude petroleum which is not produced in Canada and which they blend with Canadian oils. I know they do that with respect to their lubricants.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman must admit that the Imperial Oil Company is a branch of the Standard Oil Company?

Mr. EMMERSON. The Standard Oil Company has a great many divisions. It is recognized in Canada as the Standard Oil Company of Canada, but I understand that it has a great many Canadian shareholders. In fact, it was a Canadian company consisting of Canadian capitalists, and it affiliated with the Standard. That is my information. I have no personal knowledge of the matter.

Mr. CLARE. The hon. minister asks for $35,000 for installing this system of lighting the cars and charges it to capital account. He has already charged to capital account the system which was used before. This is not fair or right.

Mr. EMMERSON. Most of the cars which have been changed in that way were lighted by the ordinary oil lamps. It is a good many years since the Intercolonial had in use electric lighting. Most of the cars in which that was used have since departed and have been replaced by modern cars. For instance, those used on the Maritime express and on the new Ocean Limited train, which was initiated this week, are all equipped as they are purchased from the manufacturers. So that it is only with respect to the cars which have been lighted with ordinary oil lamps and on which the Pintsch gas system is being installed, that we are charging the cost to capital account.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Where are the cars made ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Some are made at Amherst and some at Cobourg.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Are any imported ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, the sleepers have heretofore been almost wholly imported. I am in hopes, however, that with the completion of certain works in Canada, we shall hereafter be in a position to secure our pullmans in Canada.

Mr. CLARE. I do not think the answer which the minister has given covers the matter satisfactorily. The electric lighting system, which was formerly in a large number of cars, was charged to capital account; and he is throwing that out and putting in this new system and charging the whole expense to capital account. This item should be struck out.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am sorry not to be able to satisfy my hon. friend. I am trying to give him the information as it is. When the electric lighting system was tried some years ago, it was merely an experiment. As it did not prove advantageous or economical, the department decided to change it. As the electric system cost four times as much as the Pintsch gas system, it is certainly in the interest of the country that the change should be made; and the other being an experiment, and this being an improvement, whereby a great saving will be effected, it seems to me that this should be charged to capital account.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister has mistaken the argument entirely. What he says and what the hon. minister says is that some of these cars were lighted by electricity before. That was charged to capital account. My hon. friend has no objection to substituting a better light, but what he is objecting to is that having charged the other to capital account you substitute another and perhaps a better light and charge it to capital account. He has no objection to the change whatever, but he asks why you charge it to capital account.

Mr. EMMERSON. If it were tried as an experiment at the expense of capital account and it proved to be a failure and not in the interest of the road surely the revenue account should not suffer thereby. It has proved to be such a failure that it is practially worthless and it should be a capital expenditure now in substituting Pintsch gas.

Mr. ROSAMOND. Will the hon. gentleman tell me the difference in the capital account between the 1st of July this year and the 1st July last year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I presume my hon. friend (Mr. Rosamond) is familiar with the capital expenditure up to the 30th June, 1902. The information I gave to the House last evening was that the total capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway up to the 30th June, 1903 was $70,523,360.43. If he will deduct $2,216,744.88 from these figures he will have the total capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway up to the 30th June, 1902.

Mr. ROSAMOND. What I want to get at is the increase in the expenditure on capital account since the 30th June, 1903 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not those figures. I will get that information as soon as I possibly can.

Mr. ROSAMOND. The capital account is going on increasing from year to year while the value of the road is not increasing proportionately. A great deal of the expenditure, such as that which has been referred to by my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Clancy), ought to be charged to the ordinary expenditure for the regular running expenses of the road. But, the hon. minister, following the practice of previous ministers, has tried to make his deficit less by charging to capital expenditure what ought to go to ordinary current account. This is a deception on the public which ought not to be continued any longer.

Mr. CLANCY. The committee is somewhat anxious to be enlightened as to where the hon. minister draws the line, if he has any line to draw, between capital and consolidated expenditure. First of all I understand these cars are fitted with oil lamps. Next follows an electric apparatus and that is followed by lamps. I say lamps because the hon. gentleman says that it is some years ago since the experiment was tried. This has been followed by the Pintsch gas apparatus and he charges all of it to capital account. Where is the hon. gentleman going to end and where does he commence ? What constitutes the proper working expenses of the road if that be the case ? The hon. gentleman said that it was an experiment. Are capital expenditures to be based absolutely on the merits of the experiment, on what it may turn out to be afterwards? That seems to be the hon. gentleman's main excuse, for taking that course. I am sure that the committee is anxious, especially as the hon. gentleman has come newly into that department, that the country may know that the deception that my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) has pointed out consists in this: that the hon. gentleman is charging everything to capital account which has absolutely no value. If a failure, it is charged to capital account, when it should represent some value in the road afterwards. I am not going so far as to say that such a thing is possible always but that should be one of the main objects. The hon. gentleman unloads every expenditure for trifling changes upon capital account when the fact is that it should be charged to working expenses. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain the multiplicity of transitions from one state of things to another wherein he is unloading all these expenditures on capital account.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a much disputed question as to what should be charged to capital account and what to revenue, but I think I should take issue with my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) when he states that the capital account has been increased and that the road is not increasing in value. I think it must be recognized that the Intercolonial Railway is very much more valuable this year than it was last.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. To the country or to the party ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, to the country and to the railway itself—a very much more valuable railway. When my hon. friend from North Lanark states that it is lessened in value I am sure he is simply making an argument which will not hold water.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I do not think I said 'lessened in value.'

Mr. EMMERSON. I understood my hon. friend to say that. At all events he said that it had not increased in value. Perhaps those were the words he used.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I said it had not increased in value in proportion to the extra expenditure charged to capital account.

Mr. EMMERSON. I understood him to make no qualification in respect to it. I dispute the statement. I say it has been increasing in value.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why do you dispute a statement which has not been made ?

Mr. EMMERSON. One at a time, please.

Mr. COCHRANE. I want to ask the hon. minister, if he will allow me, why he challenges a statement that my hon. friend from North Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) said he never made ? It is very ingenious but there is not much sense in it.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not challenged the statement of my hon. friend from North Lanark when he says 'increased' instead of 'lessened.' I accept that statement ; I am not disputing the thing ; I am simply pointing out that in my judgment the road has very materially improved by reason of these capital expenditures, because we have better equipment, we have larger engines and we have heavier rails. But in determining the question as to whether we should charge an appliance of this kind to capital account or not, I would ask my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) this question : Suppose that the road had been originally equipped with a certain cattle-guard, that that cattle-guard was becoming inoperative because of use, without being worn out or destroyed, that it was found to be not in the interest of the railway, that it had to be entirely discarded, that within a year after the construction of the road you substitute a modern cattle-guard, one that would be accepted, —would you charge the substituted appliance to capital or to current account ? I hold that if you charge the original cattle-guard to capital account the substituted article should be so charged also, because the cattle-guard is not replaced because of wear and tear, it is not replaced because of destruction by accident, but it is replaced because it has proved a failure, it having been an experiment, true at the expense of capital account, but the substituted article should also be charged to the same account. These are my views. I understand that this is a much debated question, not merely in this House, but in private corporations. Some hold one view and others hold another.

(Intercolonial Railway—To equip passenger cars with vestibules, $4,000.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has selected a very extreme case.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a parallel case.

Mr. CLANCY. I will, however, take the case of cattle-guards which he has suggested. I imagine if cattle-guards were to be changed under existing conditions on the Intercolonial they would not all be changed in one year. They have been in use many years, and they have served a certain purpose during that period ; and what would follow in a business of that kind, as in all others, is that they would be changed when they were worn out. There is a life in the use of a cattle-guard, and it must be changed at some time, even if it is not remodelled. Now, if you put in new cattle-guards, the most that would be charged to capital account would be the difference between the new kind and what the old ones would cost. Let me ask the hon. gentleman this question : If a cattle-guard had reached the stage in its history when it became dangerous to the road and needed to be repaired in the public interest, and when he proposed to put in a new sort of cattle-guard that had not been in use before, would he charge the whole of that sum to capital account, or merely the difference between the cost of the old cattle-guard and the cost of the new one ? To what account would he charge the expenditure in that case ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is an entirely different case to the one under discussion. I make a distinction as between a cattle-guard that became inoperative or worn out and another one introduced as an experiment. But I would call the attention of the committee that the item under discussion is for furnishing four passenger cars with Pintsch gas apparatus. These four cars today are equipped with ordinary oil lamps ; there is no electric lighting equipment. We propose putting in each of these four cars an appliance to use Pintsch gas. That is the question in this item. It does not involve a substitution of Pintsch gas for electric light, but it simply involves putting an additional appliance on that car to enable us to operate it with greater safety and advantage to the travelling public.

Mr. SPROULE. Are you not substituting one kind of light by another ?

Mr. EMMERSON. True, but you would not say that it should be charged to current account when you are only improving the character of the car. The question is whether you would deduct from that charge the cost of the oil lamp.

To equip passenger cars with vestibules, $4,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is a revote. Last year $10,000 was asked for this purpose, and six cars were equipped. It costs about $1,000 to equip a car with a vestibule. We now propose to equip four cars, and four more in 1905. That makes a total of twenty cars, all that we contemplate equipping now.

Mr. LENNOX. Is that done by day labour ?

Mr. EMMERSON. By day labour in the shops at Moncton.

Mr. LENNOX. Then how do you get the $4,000, when it is done by day labour.

Mr. EMMERSON. The labour done in connection with this is charged up against this particular item.

Mr. LENNOX. An estimate of the labour and the material used.

Mr. EMMERSON. They keep a very accurate account of the labour. A certain number of men are put on this particular work and their wages are charged up against the appropriation for that particular item.

Intercolonial Railway—Additional sidings along the line, $118,000.

Mr. LENNOX. I would ask the minister to explain this item. Last year there was a good deal of discussion about a similar item and the next item, for increased accommodation and facilities along the line.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not think that this committee would want all these particular items set forth in the estimates.

Mr. LENNOX. Speaking for myself I do.

Mr. EMMERSON. It takes all kinds of people to make up the world and I presume all kinds of people to make up the committee.

Mr. LENNOX. I appreciate that and that is why I asked the question.

Mr. EMMERSON. We are asking for $118,000. There is a siding one half mile east of Christmas Island. This proposed siding is to hold 40 cars. It is a crossing-siding where trains can meet, and it is estimated that it will cost $4,000. Christmas Island is in Cape Breton.

Mr. WM. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) It is just beyond the Strait of Canso, within three miles of the Grand Narrows, after crossing the bridge.

Mr. EMMERSON. At Alba there is a proposed extension of a siding and it is estimated the cost will be $2,000.

Mr. WM. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) That is in Inverness county.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the minister give an estimate of the amount in each case and why it is charged to capital account ?

Mr. EMMERSON. All of these sidings are proposed on account of the larger engines now in use ; on account of the greater number of cars that we are enabled to haul the sidings have been found to be entirely too short for safety of the road, and for convenience in the moving of trains and it is found necessary to have these extensions.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister said yesterday that he did not use the heavy locomotives and long trains in Cape Breton at all.

Mr. EMMERSON. We are not using the heaviest but we are using heavier engines.

Mr. HAGGART. You told the House yesterday that on the New Glasgow and Cape Breton branches of the road you did not intend to make any changes because you were not using the heavy locomotives.

Mr. EMMERSON. I meant that the heaviest class of locomotives such as are on the trunk line between Halifax and Montreal are not in use there, but there is a heavier class than has been in use and longer trains are being hauled on the New Glasgow branch and the Cape Breton section than has been the case heretofore, necessitating extended sidings.

At Brierly's Brook, in Antigonish, it is estimated that the extension of the siding will cost $1,500. At Merigomish, in Pictou county, there is required an extension of a siding of 250 feet which is estimated to cost $600. Between Glengarry and Hopewell they want a crossing siding to hold 50 cars and it is estimated to cost $4,000. At Lansdowne they require a siding to hold 20 cars which is estimated to cost $1,500. At Riversdale, in Colchester county, there is an extension of the siding, 20 car lengths, which is estimated to cost $1,600. At Stewiacke, also in Colchester county, they require an extension of a siding which it is estimated will cost $360. At Brookfield, in the same county, there is required an addition to the siding, 3,000 feet long, which it is estimated will cost $6,000. At Hilden, further down the line, a loading siding is required of 14 car lengths. This is estimated to cost $1,200. At Debert, in Colchester, there is an extension of the siding 1,000 feet long and an additional siding of 1,500 feet. One is estimated to cost $2,500 and the other $3,000. At Wentworth, Cumberland county, extension of siding estimated cost, $1,000 ; Oxford Junction, same county, extension of siding, $2,000 ; Salt Springs, same county, additional siding, $4,500 ; Spring Hill Junction, same county, additional siding, $5,000 ; Athol, same county, additional siding, $800 ; Memramcook, Westmoreland county, additional siding, $3,600 ; Petitcodiac, Westmoreland, extension of siding, $1,600 ; Quispamsis, King's county, extension of siding, $800 ; Shediac, additional siding, $2,500 ; Point du Chêne siding, $2,500 ; Catamount siding, $500 ; Coal Branch siding, $500 ; Adamsville siding, $800 ; Barnaby river siding, $1,000 ; Newcastle, rearrangement of yard and additional siding, $5,000 ; Gloucester Junction, extension of siding, $2,000. I have given the estimate cost in each case.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. There is a junction at Gloucester.

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Does the minister intend buying out all these branch lines ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I should hope that my hon. friend would favour such a proposition, but these sidings are not particularly designed for that purpose.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. If we justify the purchase of the one which the minister already contemplates, we would justify anything.

Mr. EMMERSON. We will deal with that when it comes.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. You may be sure we will deal with it.

Mr. EMMERSON. At Beresford, Gloucester county, extension of siding, $300 ; Belledune, Gloucester county, siding, $3,600; Jacquet river, Restigouche county, siding $3,600; New Mills, Restigouche county, siding $2,600. The Prescott Brothers are doing a larger business there and a new siding is required.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Is there a large vote in the neighbourhood ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I don't know.

Mr. ROSAMOND. Are these sidings to be paid for by the government or by the private parties ?

Mr. EMMERSON. These are government sidings. When sidings are for private individuals, the private individuals pay for them.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I understand from the Minister that some person was doing a large business there, and would require a larger siding. Does that some person pay for any portion of the siding which is put up for his benefit ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The siding is not for that individual firm, but I know that the Prescott Brothers are doing a very large business there and I assume that there are also others in the lumber trade. If it went to their mill it would be paid for as a private siding.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. These are all railway sidings in the ordinary sense ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman said that the government never built private sidings, but I can tell him that last year we built a siding, or a branch line, for one of the members here to his mill in the province of Quebec.

Mr. EMMERSON. I presume that would be to get the traffic for the benefit of the road. At Campbellton we require additional sidings estimated to cost $3,000.

Mr. BLAIN. How much was expended at Campbellton last year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Nothing. There was a vote last year but it was for the purchase of certain lands at Campbellton.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman is mistaken ; last year we voted $10,000 for a siding at Campbellton.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was for the purchase of land for the siding.

Mr. BLAIN. That is not what the minister said last year. He said it was for the purpose of putting in a siding at Campbellton, and that the engineer's estimate was $10,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. That vote was used to purchase land for the extension of the yard and siding at Campbellton.

Mr. BLAIN. Are we to understand that when we vote money for a siding and the minister states that the engineer estimates that it will cost $10,000, that you can apply that money to the purchase of a site ?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. To whom was this money paid for the purchase of the land and how many acres were purchased ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There was a quantity of land owned by the William Richards Estate, represented by David Richards ; they were very independent decent people. A man named Duncan had a portion and Richards another portion.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why cannot the minister give us the details ? When this money is being voted to build sidings, the minister tells us that it is to be used to purchase land ; and when he is asked how much land he wants to purchase, he turns around and asks the manager of the railway, 'It is a hundred feet long, isn't it ?' But nobody knows how wide it is. When the Minister of Railways and Canals or any other minister comes and asks for an appropriation, he should be prepared to give us the necessary information so that we can vote intelligently on the question.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am afraid my hon. friend is laying out a very large contract for me.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes, to get much into your head, I suppose.

Mr. EMMERSON. The item I was trying to bring to the notice of the committee was for additional sidings at Campbelltown. it is estimated that we shall require for that work this year $3,000. As to the size of the land, that not being involved in this vote, I did not anticipate that any such information would be necessary. However, we shall have that later on.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. But surely the minister must remember that he came down last year and wanted $10,000 to build a siding, and he himself on that occasion arose and made a very important speech, showing that he knew as little then about Campbellton as he does now. Surely he knows how large or how wide this land is, and whether it is worth $10,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have just stated that I will have that information brought down in detail.

Mr. BLAIN. What is this $3,000 to be expended for ?

Mr. EMMERSON. This is for the grading and the rails and the land which has been purchased. I will continue to give the list of sidings. Assametquaghan, siding to hold six cars, $700 ; Beau Rivage, siding to hold eight cars, $700 ; Causapscal, additional sidings, $1,600 ; St. Moise, siding to hold ten cars, $800 ; Ste. Luce, extension of siding, 700 feet, $1,500 ; St. Anaclet, additional sidings, $3,000 ; Rimouski, additional siding, $600 ; Bic, extension of siding, $1,400 ; St. Fabien, extension of siding, $4,800 ; St. Simon, extension of siding, $1,600 ; Trois Pistoles, extension of siding, $1,400 ; St. Eloi, extension of siding, $2,000; St. Arsène, extension of siding, $1,200 ; Ste. Hèlene, extension of siding, $4,000 ; Cacouna, extension of siding, $350 ; St. Phillippe de Neri, extension of siding, $3,000 ; St. Pacome, extension of siding, $600 ; Ste. Anne, additional siding, $4,000 ; Ste. Louise, extension of siding, $300 ; St. Jean Port Joli, extension of siding, $1,200 ; Trois Saumons, extension of siding, $300 ; Cap St. Ignace, extension of siding, $4,000 ; St. Francis, extension of siding, $300 ; Chaudière Curve, additional siding, $400 ; St. Jean Chrysostome, extension of siding, $400. This completes the list.

Mr. BELL. Has there not been some agitation for increased siding accommodation at New Glasgow, N.S. ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is up in another way.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Are there other sidings coming up in another way ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Not in the way of sidings but in the way of terminal improvements at that point.

Mr. LOUIS LAVERGNE. I would ask the minister if there is any appropriation for sidings in Drummondville, Quebec ?

Mr. EMMERSON. This list contains nothing for Drummondville.

Mr. LOUIS LAVERGNE. There is another appropriation.

Mr. CLARE. I do not know whether there are other stations on the Intercolonial Railway or not. The minister might give us a list of the stations that are not in this vote.

Mr. EMMERSON. There are just a few.

Mr. CLARE. I would like to know how the $6,350 voted last year was expended.

Mr. EMMERSON. The year only closed on June 30th and I have not that statement.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the minister mean that he cannot give the information ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Not at this time.

Mr. LENNOX. We will have to ask the minister to give it. It would economize the time of the committee and decrease the cost to the country if the minister, when bringing down the estimates in each case, would read a concise statement to the committee and not have to have the information dragged out of him by a slow process of urging by members of the committee.

Mr. EMMERSON. It would be a matter of physical impossibility to secure this information this afternoon as the details would have to be obtained from Moncton. Bear in mind that this vote was made last fall and that none of this work was done until this spring so that this work has been carried on during May and June. The details are kept in Moncton. I could give my hon. friend the total up to the last of May. We had then expended some $29,000 of that appropriation.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Does the minister mean that these works are going on and that the department at Moncton prepares for the building of sidings and does not at once submit the estimates and plans to the department at Otttawa ? Does he mean to reflect on his officers at Moncton to that extent ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There is no reflection on my officers. The expenditure up to June 30th is not in Ottawa. The officials have that information at Moncton where the books are kept but the details will be reported here at the proper time, when we will have the information.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. How does the minister get the figures for the estimate if he has not the figures for the work completed last year? Does he pretend to say that he has not the details of the expenditure of this $635,000?

Mr. EMMERSON. I pretend to say that we have not.

Mr. LENNOX. This is a most extraordinary situation. The minister tells us that he wants an additional appropriation of $118,000 but he does not know how this $63,500 voted last year was expended. The estimates were brought down months ago and this information should be forthcoming. I am waiting for the attention of the minister.

Mr. EMMERSON. I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I was listening to him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. LENNOX. I want those hon. gentlemen to understand that they have got quite enough to carry when they come to face the electorate, without trying to carry any additional burden. I want to call the attention of the minister to this fact, that the excuse he made that the accounts could not have been returned from Moncton to Ottawa for his inspection, cannot be sustained, because we have here the estimates brought down months ago and at that time it was known that every dollar of this appropriation of $63,500 had been expended. Therefore it is a ridiculous proposition for the minister to say that he has not been asked.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the items which I have read over in this list have been expended?

Mr. LENNOX. The minister has no reason to understand me in that way.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does he mean to say that the items which I read over have been expended, and that therefore I should have a statement of them?

Mr. LENNOX. The minister must not suppose that I am discussing the question of appropriations for the coming year. I am dealing with what has gone by, and I am dealing with what the minister spoke about. I am dealing with the fact that he tells us, that there has not been any opportunity that it is mentally and physicially impossible for him to give us the information we ask because forsooth it is a local expenditure. It is not a recent expenditure; it may have been a rapid expenditure, as he says, it may have been a reckless expenditure, and we think it may have been an unjustifiable expenditure. We want to know when that money was expended, and where it was expended, before we can vote an additional sum of $118,000. That is a reasonable proposition, and a committee which would allow an item of that kind to pass without any information would not be justified in asking the people to support them.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I think my hon. friend is asking a very proper question. We asked last year for a return of the places where these moneys were to be expended, we ask now to know where they have have been expended. I think the minister is bound to furnish the information.

Mr. EMMERSON. I thought I had made myself clear. I stated that there had been voted last year $63,500 for sidings on the Intercolonial, and that we had expended of that sum up to the end of May, $29,000, the details of which I have not here in the department, but which could be procured from Moncton. Let me say that we will not receive the details of the expenditure from Moncton during the month of June until towards the close of the present month of July. If hon. gentlemen opposite insist upon holding up this item until I can procure that information, why then, we shall have to wait for it. It is simply the routine of the department, it is the system that has been going on for years. The management of these affairs is all at Moncton. They keep the details, they keep the books, and the returns are made some time during the last of the month.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. When this $63,000 was asked for last year it was asked for on a certain estimate, was it not?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is ancient history now.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman will probably view it otherwise before the session closes. We have been lenient to the minister, otherwise we would hold him up. When this $63,000 was voted last year on an estimate, the minister's department certainly knew where these sidings were that this money was to pay for. We want that statement now, we want to know where the money was estimated to be spent last year and how much has been spent at those places.

Mr. BLAIN. That ought not to be difficult to tell, because, of this $63,000 voted last year, the minister states, if I understand him correctly, that only $29,000 has been expended.

Mr. EMMERSON. Up to the 31st of May. I said there was a subsequent expenditure during the month of June of which I have neither the details nor the amount.

Mr. BLAIN. Up to the time the $29,000 was expended it would not be difficult for the hon. gentleman to submit a statement of the details to the committee. He has already a statement that $10,000 of that amount was expended for the purchase of a piece of land.

Mr. LENNOX. Perhaps if the minister will bring down at three o'clock whatever he can get, we may be able to go on.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have stated that I am told by the officials of my department that the information is at Moncton.

Mr. LENNOX. So far as the minister has any information, let him bring it down.

At one o'clock, committee took recess.

Committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What item are we on ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The item is :

Intercolonial Railway—Additional sidings along line, $118,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. I promised some information. I am now waiting for the officers to come up from the department. Perhaps we can go on with another item.

Intercolonial Railway—Increased accommodation and facilities along line, $65,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. A portion of this is a revote. The amount voted last year was $88,000 and the estimated expenditure was $68,000. That left, not required for 1904-5, out of that $88,000, $20,000, and we will require in addition for 1904-5 of $45,000, making $65,000 in all. Of that $88,000 voted last year $68,000 was required or will be expended.

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give us an explanation of how the amount was expended last year.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not the details. The accounts are not made up for the whole year, and most of this work was done this spring, so that it is practically in the same position as the other. I do not think, as far as I have been able to glean from the records of this House, that it has been the custom of parliament to go into the details of the expenditure for the then current year when voting moneys for the ensuing year.

Mr. BARKER. There is one thing which has not been the custom of the committee which ought to have been the custom, and that is to ask the minister for the details of the expenditure he proposes for next year. We have become rather accustomed to general allowances or appropriations of this character, and it has been left to the department to spend the money as they please. I have no doubt the hon. minister, before he authorized this appropriation to be asked for, obtained from his general manager a statement of every improvement and facility which he intends to make during the coming year and the probable cost at each point. I think we are entitled to have that, and it is very important in the interest of the taxpayer that we should insist upon having it, because if we grant an appropriation for this purpose in these general words, there is nothing whatever to prevent the department from spending the money at any place they please. I have no doubt the hon. minister at this moment knows exactly where he proposes to expend the $20,000 remaining over from last year and the extra $45,000 he is now asking for. He must have had that from his manager before he authorized the application for this appropriation. I think we should have that from him, so that when the year's accounts come later on to be scrutinized by the Public Accounts Committee we will see whether the hon. gentleman has been spending the money for the purpose for which he asked it and for which we are in fact voting it. I would therefore ask the hon. gentleman to give us the various points at which he proposes to make this expenditure and the amounts he proposes to expend at each point. These are not items of ordinary repair or ordinary maintenance at various points. They are substantial items of expenditure for improved facilities upon the line. The hon. gentleman knows the stations where he is going to make improvements, how much he proposes to expend at the different stations, and that information we are entitled to.

Mr. EMMERSON. The expenditures that are proposed to be covered by this $45,000 will be made at the following places : George's River, Boisdale, Shubenacadie, Iona, McKinnon's Harbour, Alba, Mines Road, Mulgrave, Afton, South River, Antigonish, Brierly's Brook, Marshy Hope, Barney's River, Piedmont, West Merigomish, Woodburn Station, New Glasgow, Glengarry, Lansdowne, Lawrencetown, West River, Riversdale, Union Station, Valley, Hilden, Brookfield, Alton, Stewiacke, Shubenacadie, Lakeview, Fairview, River John, Wallace Bridge, Belmont, Nauwigewauk, Folliegh, Westchester, Oxford Junction, Brown's Crossing, Boundary Creek, Salisbury, River Glade, Petitcodiac, Sussex, Canaan, Rogersville, Millerton, Gloucester Junction, Bathurst, Nash's Creek, Charlo, Dalhousie, Campbellton, Thomson, Flat Lands, Assametquaghan, Ste. Flavie, St. Pacome, St. Romuald, Mitchell, Rimouski, Charlotte, St. Edouard, St. George, Quebec.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman does not say how much he is going to spend at each of these points.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is pretty difficult to give the expenditure at each particular point, but the amount estimated by the engineers of the department has been fixed at $45,000.

Mr. BARKER. But how did the hon. gentleman know, when he was going over these figures, that he was authorizing an application for a proper amount if he did not know what was going to be spent at these various places? We want to know that.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am asking for this appropriation on the advice of the engineers of the department, through the general manager, who have stated that they would require that sum of money to meet these requirements at the different points. I did not personally study it out in each particular case.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman must see that with the information he gives the committee he might as well take a blanket vote of $45,000 to do as he pleases with. Under the information the hon. gentleman has given us, he can expend three times as much at one place as has been asked for and a third as much at another. We are entitled to know what the hon. gentleman wants to do with this money. He has mentioned twenty different places. I ask him how much his general manager has told him he wants for each of these places. I do so for these reasons: A few years ago we raised in this House and before the Public Accounts Committee the question of the departments spending money that was not authorized to be spent. The Auditor General then said that he would see that it would not be allowed to occur again, but if we pass these general votes the Auditor General has no more control over it than have the members of this committee. The general manager should state to the minister how much he wants for each of these places, and then when we come to settle the question upon the accounts as reported by the Auditor General we will know whether the money was used for the purpose for which it is granted.

Mr. WM. ROSS (Victoria). Suppose the expenditure should exceed the estimates by $4,000 or $5,000, what would be the result?

Mr. BAKER. If the Auditor General did his duty, as he desires always to do his duty, that account would not be paid.

Mr. WM. ROSS (Victoria). Then the repairs could not be made.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman has not been listening. We are not speaking of repairs at all, these are betterments to the line. The repairs are paid out of the working expenses, but I think it is exceedingly probable that a great many repairs are done out of items like this, when proper particulars have not been given.

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. LENNOX. In connection with the vote for sidings the minister gave us an estimate of what was to be spent at each siding, and that is what we want in this case.

Mr. EMMERSON. I can give the estimate of the engineer for each of these places. Of course this is only an estimate, and as it necessarily would be subject to some variations I would not wish the department to be bound to the actual dollar. These estimates are mostly for extensions of platforms and in some cases for new stations, and repairs to stations. The general manager hands me a memorandum which shows the following estimates: George's River, $75; Boisdale, $75; Shubenacadie, $75; Iona, $75; McKinnon's Harbour, $1,200; Alba, $200; Mines Roads, $100; Mulgrave, $200; Afton, $75; South River, $75; Antigonish, $210; Briely's Brook, $75; Marshy Hope, $150; Barney's River, $100; Piedmont, $75; West Merigomish, $100; Woodburn Station, $2,500; New Glasgow, $200.

Mr. BELL. Is there anything more for New Glasgow?

Mr. EMMERSON. Not in this.

Mr. BELL. Is there a dwelling house at Woodburn?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes; there is a telegraph operator at that point. Glengarry, $175; Lansdowne, $175; West River, $275; Riversdale, $275; Union (Station), $2,500; Valley, $275; Hilden, $975; Brookfield, $215; Alton (platform and station), $2,400; Stewiacke (station) $1,600; Shubenacadie, $900; Lake View, $275; Rockingham, $250; Fairview, $275; River John, $600; Wallace Bridge, $200; Belmont, $225; Nauwigewauk, $725; Folleigh, $75; Westchester, $380; Oxford Junction, $150; Brown's Crossing, $200; Boundary Creek, $150; Salisbury, $300; River Glade, $150; Petitcodiac, $150; Sussex, $950; Canaan, $1,500; Rogersville, $800; Millerton, $300; Gloucester Junction, $90; Bathurst, $1,000; Nash's Creek, $390; Charlo, $1,000; Dalhousie, $1,500 Campbellton, $500; Flat Lands, $100; Assametquaghan, $2,800; St. Flavie, $250; Rimouski, $500; St. Pacome, $1,175; St. Romuald, $250; Mitchel, $1,000; Charlotte, $500; St. Edward, $500 St. George, $500 and $5,520 in connection with advertising, inspection and engineering.

Intercolonial Railway—New superstructure, Restigouche bridge, $46,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. The appropriation last year was $123,000. This includes a revote of $36,000. We require $10,000 more to provide for the floor, a sidewalk, and painting, and also the inspection and engineering.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the total cost?

Mr. EMMERSON. $133,000 would be the total cost.

Mr. BLAIN. A year ago $183,000 was stated as the estimated cost. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us wherein the decreased expenditure comes in.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is just for the superstructure. I think the estimated cost stated by my hon. friend included some enlargement of the sub-structure.

Mr. BLAIN. The Finance Minister last year said :

> The estimated cost of the steel superstructure is $163,000 ; for flooring, $6,000 ; for handling and storing, $5,000 ; for painting, $2,500 ; for inspection, $500 ; for engineering and other expenses, $6,000 ; in all making the total cost of this work $183,000.

Will the hon. gentleman state to the committee how the money was expended last year, under the different headings ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I find that I made an error in stating that the amount was $133,000. I did not take into consideration the expenditure in 1902-3, which will account for the discrepancy pointed out by my hon. friend. I think the amount expended has been less than the estimate of $183,000. There was an expenditure in 1902-3 of $40,817.43, and an estimated expenditure in 1903-4 of $87,000 ; and the $10,000 and the other items make up the whole sum—a little under the amount stated by my hon. friend.

Mr. BARKER. I desire to call the minister's attention to the fact that he told us a few minutes ago that the extra $10,000 asked for this year was to cover painting, flooring and inspection. Now, according to his own statement, every one of these items was included in last year's estimates. How is it that last year, with this work nearly completed, we were informed that a certain sum would be sufficient, and now the hon. gentleman wants another $10,000 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I may say to my hon. friend that the work was not nearly completed last year. There were only two of the spans in recently, and the other three were under contract with the Canadian Bridge Company. But the total estimated cost of the bridge is correctly stated at $183,000.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman has just told us that the estimates of last year covered the painting, the inspection, the flooring and everything else for which he is now asking the extra $10,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend misunderstood me. I said that we wanted a revote of last year's appropriation of $36,000, and $10,000 in addition, to provide for these several items which the hon. gentleman has detailed.

Mr. BARKER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he did not tell us a few minutes ago that last year's estimates did not include these items ? I would like to know whether last year's estimates did include painting or not ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total estimated cost was $183,000. $41,000 had been expended in 1902-3, which leaves $142,000. According to the estimate, it required $142,000 to build that bridge when parliament voted the money last fall, but instead of voting $143,000, parliament only voted $123,000. That would leave nearly $20,000 of the estimated amount to be expended. It seems that we will not require that, but only $10,000 in addition to the $123,000.

Mr. BARKER. Does the hon. gentleman say that the $123,000 voted last year included painting, flooring and inspection ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I did not intend making any such statement, because it is not in accordance with the record. What I said was that $123,000 was appropriated last year. Of that $87,000 had been expended, or it was expected that $87,000 would be expended up to the 30th of June. That left $36,000, and in addition we are asking $10,000.

Mr. BARKER. Will the hon. gentleman now tell us distinctly whether or not the estimates of last year included painting ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The estimate did but not the appropriation. The estimate was for $182,000, but the $123,000 voted was not sufficient to cover those items.

Mr. BARKER. In making up the estimate of $123,000 last year, did the minister not then include the painting and the flooring ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I would not think so. I would gather this, that the department estimated the total cost at $183,000, which included these items, but the $123,000 which was voted was not sufficient to pay for all the items. That entailed a revote of $36,000 and in addition we require $10,000.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend is certainly wrong if we are to judge by 'Hansard.' In last year's debates I find that the sum voted for Intercolonial Railway new superstructure for Restigouche, was $123,000. The Minister of Finance said (see page 8304) :

> $42,000 of this is a revote. The estimated cost of the steel superstructure is $163,000 ; for flooring, $6,000 ; for handling and storing, $5,000 ; for painting, $2,500, for inspection, $500 ; for engineering and other expenses, $6,000 ; making the total cost of this work $183,000.

When the Minister of Finance was asking for an appropriation of $123,000 last year, he enumerated the items on which it was to be expended, and gave the items I have here.

Mr. EMMERSON. That is not what the extract conveyed.

Mr. BLAIN. If it does not, it must mean something different from what it says.

Mr. EMMERSON. I may call attention to this fact. The item of cost of steel superstructure was $163,000. Then the Minister of Finance went on to state $6,000 as estimated cost of flooring; handling and storing, $5,000; painting, $2,500; inspection, $500; engineering and other expenses, $6,000; making a total cost of $183,000. That does not mean that the estimated cost of these items is included in the $123,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would call attention to the condition of the station at Lévis. The platform is in a very bad shape. It consists really of three or four boards and many persons have to walk in the mud. The whole station appears unfinished. Is there anything in the appropriation to remedy this?

Mr. EMMERSON. Had my hon. friend been here, he would have seen that we have provided for all that in the estimates.

Intercolonial Railway—To dredging and blasting rock at deep water terminus, Halifax, $30,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. The vote last year was $21,000 and the estimated expenditure to the 30th of June was $10,000. That left $15,000 to be revoted and then we asked for $15,000 additional appropriation. These estimates were prepared in February last, or early in March. The officers had to estimate what was to be expended out of the sum placed at their disposal before the 30th of June. Their estimate at that time with respect to this particular item was $10,000 of the $25,000, and $15,000 in addition is now required.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When this vote was before the House last year and also on a previous occasion I suggested to the then Minister of Railways and Canals that it would be desirable, if the traffic at Halifax develops as I hope it will develop, to acquire the property south of North street along Water street extending as far south as Cornwallis street. I would like to ask the minister whether or not that matter has been under the consideration of the officers of his department? I see an item further down 'to increase accommodation at Halifax $135,000;' possibly that may relate to this purpose. If it does not I would like to discuss the question on this item.

Mr. EMMERSON. The question which my hon. friend has raised is having and has had the consideration of the officials and also of the department. I have had the details of the matter under consideration for some little time and I can say to my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) that he will have an opportunity of discussing this particular item at a later stage. It is not included in this item and this has no reference to it, nor has the other item to which he refers. He will, however, have an opportunity later on of discussing the matter. This is simply for the purpose of dredging rock between piers 3 and 4 so as to give a depth of 30 feet of water. This is an important matter and the vote is required.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I may say that the present condition is not at all satisfactory as no doubt the minister knows. In the first place a portion of the highway is occupied by the track. That has reduced the width of the highway very much, has rendered the street much less suitable for business purposes than it was before, and has very greatly depreciated, as I am informed, the value of the property on the west side of the street. The owners of this property some years ago commenced legal proceedings in the Exchequer Court of Canada for the purpose of recovering against the Crown the damages resulting from that depreciation of their property. Under the law they were unable to recover anything, probably for two reasons, certainly for one. The Statute of Limitations was invoked against them as they did not bring their action until six years after the damage had occurred and in the next place they probably would have failed as a strict matter of law because none of their property had been taken, and therefore, under familiar decisions, they could not recover damages against the Crown for depreciation. Nevertheless it is beyond doubt that the extension of the railway has caused some depreciation, at least, of their property. I do not know whether all the depreciation which the property has suffered is due to that cause but some of it at least is so due and when the property is taken over or expropriated, if that should be the policy of the department, I think that the government should in all fairness take into consideration the value of the property of these people as it was at the time when the railway was first constructed along the eastern side of the highway, otherwise these people will not be placed in the same position, so far as compensation for their property is concerned, as they would have occupied if their property had been taken at that time undoubtedly that value was reduced by the location of the railway immediately opposite their property and in this way taking up a considerable portion of the street. I do not think, as I said before, that proper accommodation can ever be obtained at Halifax until that property, or a portion of it, is expropriated, and I should be very glad indeed if the minister would include in his supplementary estimates some item which will indicate that that is the policy of the department.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the total amount which will be required to dredge out this rock and how much has been expended?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total amount that will be required is $70,000. Last year $25,000 was voted and $10,000 was expended. We are asking $15,000 more and when this is expended we will have expended $40,000 odd, leaving $30,000 to be provided for in 1904-5.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will this expenditure increase the accommodation at the deep water terminus or will it merely improve the accommodation which we have at present? That is to say, is it designed to give greater depth of water or is it intended by means of this expenditure to accommodate a greater number of steamers than can be accommodated at present?

Mr. EMMERSON. It does not increase the area of the wharf accommodation; it deepens the water and affords accommodation for a greater number of vessels to lie at the pier.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What depth of water does it give?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is to provide for 30 feet.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Throughout the dock limits?

Mr. EMMERSON. Within the dock limits.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How much tonnage can be accommodated there at present?

Mr. EMMERSON. One of the piers there is not in good condition, but this dredging will give 30 feet of water over an area within which five of the largest ships can lie at low tide.

Intercolonial Railway—Improvements at Little Métis station and diverting public road, $4,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. Everybody knows that Little Metis is a favourite summer resort. The situation of the station was such that tourists getting off there, day or night, were compelled to cross the track, go away around, and then go over another level crossing, thereby increasing the distance to their destination and at the same time exposing them to a certain amount of danger. I am not personally familiar with the place, except by having seen it in passing on the train. But to afford proper accommodation for the station, and convenience to the travelling public, passengers as well as freight, we propose to purchase some land near the main highway, and build a station on the same side, thereby enabling tourists and others frequenting that resort to get to that point with less travel and greater safety to themselves.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Why was not this amount expended last year? The minister says now this expenditure was greatly needed. At the same time he might tell us what the $15 was expended for.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not know that I am familiar with the expenditure of the $15. But my hon. friend is probably aware of the fact that the people who frequent that resort live on the shore in one parish, and that the people residing near the station, or on the land where the station is situated, are in another parish. It was proposed by the railway officials that the municipality at the station should give a right of way, recognizing as the officials did that this would be of advantage to the place and an advantage to that municipality as well. But the municipality did not see it in that light, and therefore negotiations took place between the department and the representatives of the municipality, with the result that we could not agree. The matter was finally referred to myself, and I decided that it should not be delayed any longer, that it should be determined, and that if these people would not provide the right of way the railway should provide it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Can my hon. friend give some details of the negotiations that were carried on between the municipal councils and the Railway Department? I think that the municipality where the strangers go in summer is St. Octave, and the station is called Little Métis. Now with which municipal council was the department negotiating with, and what steps were taken to reach a solution of the difficulty?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think the land which the road traverses is in St. Octave and the other is Little Métis. A dispute arose between the officials of St. Octave and the Railway Department, and not with the people of Little Métis. The latter were very anxious to have it, but they felt that the St. Octave people should provide the right of way.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Would my hon. friend give some details of the negotiations that were carried on with the municipal council of St. Octave? Where did they break off?

Mr. EMMERSON. The negotiations with St. Octave were carried on through the mayor of Little Métis, Mr. Ferguson, I think his name is. The negotiations were carried on through him, with the result that certain resolutions were passed by the municipalities respectively. These came before the officials, but with no result. Nothing having been done, the matter was recently referred to me, and we concluded that we had better end the strife and change the road in the interest of the travelling public and of the railway.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I suppose that if there are no elections held this year we will revote this sum next year.

Intercolonial Railway—New station at Windsor, N.S., &c., $10,000.

Mr. LENNOX. We want an explanation of this. Last year the item for this station read as follows:

New station at Windsor, N.S., provided that the railway companies using the station make arrangements satisfactory to the Governor in Council for payment by way of interest or rental of a reasonable proportion of the cost, $10,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is simply a re-vote. There was some questions as to the company entering into a suitable arrangement with respect to the use of the station. But in the meantime the necessity for a station at Windsor is very great.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Who occupies this station ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There are only two roads that occupy it, the Dominion Atlantic and the Midland. The Intercolonial owns the Windsor branch, but it is under lease to the Dominion Atlantic.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When the vote is not accompanied with the qualification which is to be observed in the estimate of last year, that would seem to indicate either that the qualification has been abandoned, or that satisfactory arrangements have been made. Which alternative does the minister present to us ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not wish to have it understood that the Intercolonial abandons the position it has taken with respect to this matter. But I think it is fair to place the railway management in a position whereby, if the conditions absolutely require it, they may provide station accommodation there without being subjected to any hindrance from any other quarter. But so far as the attitude of the Intercolonial is concerned in relation to this matter, and with regard to the Dominion Atlantic, the Intercolonial does not recede one iota from the attitude which it has held heretofore.

Mr. LENNOX. Although the vote is not accompanied with any condition such as we had last year, we understand that the policy of the department appears to be in the same position as it was last year. Is that right ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is the view which the department feels called upon to take.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Absolutely the whole amount is being revoted this year. Would the hon. minister state why a portion of it has not been expended and also give us an idea of the total cost of the proposed work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There are two reasons why this work was not commenced. One was the lateness of the season at which the vote was passed. It was not desirable that the work should be commenced late last fall. Another was that no arrangement had been made with the Dominion Atlantic, and Intercolonial Railway was not disposed to recede from its position. As to the total cost it is supposed that $10,000 will provide a suitable station at that place.

Mr. LENNOX.

Mr. BELL. What do the Midland Railway Company pay for the use of that station ?

Mr. EMMERSON. They do not pay the Intercolonial Railway anything. They pay the Dominion Atlantic.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The length of the session last year has been put forward by the hon. minister as a reason for not proceeding with some of these works which were described as very urgent and necessary. For example we were told last year that the present station at Windsor was so absolutely inadequate that it should not be taken into consideration in determining whether or not this expenditure should all be charged to capital account. If that be the correct position it must be a very poor station indeed. My recollection is that in August or early in September, we voted one fifth of every item in the estimates without discussion in order that the business of the country might not be hindered and that the construction of these public works might not be delayed. Yet we are told by the hon. minister that the length of the session has prevented anything whatever from being done. I would like some explanation of that.

Mr. EMMERSON. While it is true there was a vote of a certain percentage, it was for the purposes of the financial department rather than for the purposes of any of the special departments of government and not having reference to the arrangement of work. While that is true, several departments of the government could not very well understand what should be done until these special votes went through parliament. The Intercolonial officials acted upon that principle. Unfortunately the general manager was obliged to be here the greater portion of the year until the latter end of October, and some of the engineers were here also in connection with the estimates before parliament. Then it was about the 1st of November before any of this work could be mapped out and arrangements made for it, and they found that to be entirely too late. The enhanced cost of doing work at that season of the year justifies delay where possible. But, a very strong element in respect to this Windsor Station I am bound to say was what was deemed to be the unfair position—perhaps I should not use that word—certainly what was deemed to be a position that was not in harmony with what the Intercolonial Railway wanted—taken by the Dominion Atlantic Company. The negotiations have not been satisfactory. I do not speak personally in respect to the matter never having been drawn into it, but the general manager has felt that they were not willing to meet the Intercolonial Railway in the way they should.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Dominion Atlantic has a lease from the government of the line from Windsor Junction to Windsor and also a lease of running powers from Windsor Junction to Halifax, as I understand it, and the rental is based on a certain proportion of the gross earnings. As a part of the terms of the lease the government is required to maintain the road. I suppose the maintenance of the road will involve the keeping up of the station. I do not know in what way the Dominion Atlantic is brought into the question as far as that station at Windsor is concerned. Of course, I recognize that at Windsor the line owned by the Dominion Atlantic joins the line owned by the Crown and which is leased to the Dominion Atlantic. Possibly that may bring the Dominion Atlantic into the question of the erection of a station. Nevertheless, if the station is to be constructed on the land of the Crown, and is to remain the property of the Crown and is to be included in the lease of the Crown to the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company, it seems difficult to understand why there should be any delay on account of the action or want of action of the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a question of the interpretation of the contract or lease. The department has held heretofore that there was a difference between maintenance and improvements. The position taken by the Railway Department during a number of years passed, as I am informed by the general manager, is that the terms of the lease do not require the Intercolonial Railway to make improvements. The department has felt that the Dominion Atlantic should contribute or enter into some arrangement, whereby, if an additional amount were expended, it should contribute in some way to that expenditure.

Intercolonial Railway—To increase accommodation, Amherst, $15,000.

Mr. LENNOX. This is a new item. Would the hon. minister give us some explanation of that?

Mr. EMMERSON. This is for general work, enlarging the yard and providing additional sidings. As any one who is familiar at all with Amherst knows the railway accommodation there is confined to a very restricted area. Rhodes, Curry & Co., have their works right on the margin of the road and there is a congestion of sidings, freight sheds and passenger accommodation. It is difficult to even properly utilize the land which is there now, but it is absolutely necessary that some arrangement should be made in respect to the sidings. The growth of traffic at Amherst during the past few years has been phenomenal and it behooves the railway to provide suitable accommodation.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the scheme—to acquire more land or utilize the land you already have?

Mr. EMMERSON. To utilize the land we already have. The total cost of this particular work is $15,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This vote will complete the whole work?

Mr. EMMERSON. This will complete the work on hand, but it is estimated that it will require about $70,000 altogether before the general and necessary improvements are made at Amherst.

Mr. LENNOX. What is to be done with this $15,000?

Mr. EMMERSON. To enlarge the yard and provide additional sidings; improve and level lumber yards; grade the grounds; enlarge cattle pens; provide two additional standpipes including waterpipes and connections, and to improve and enlarge the station.

Mr. HAGGART. Surely there must be an end to this enormous expenditure. Has the minister no pity for the poor ratepayers of Canada—asking $1,651,000 on capital account this year; a deficit on the running account of the Intercolonial Railway for ten months of last year of $545,000; a charge on capital account for ten months of $1,000,000; a charge on capital account on the Prince Edward Island road of $6,000 or $7,000, and we do not know what the deficit on the Prince Edward Island road is? Here is a total deficit including capital account on these two railways of nearly $2,500,000; this notwithstanding that $23,000,000 has been spent on the road since 1896, and the minister coolly comes down and asks for a further expenditure on capital account of $1,651,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We don't want any more government roads.

Mr. HAGGART. Not if they are managed as the Intercolonial Railway is. Why are you asking for this enormous expenditure? You should ask for nothing this year except for what is absolutely necessary for the road. Is the House going to submit to this; is the country going to submit to it; and especially as I am reminded by an hon. friend that you are going to build another line from the Atlantic to the Pacific?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not carried. I want to know from the minister if this is the smallest amount necessary for the purpose of carrying on the road this year? What justification is there for this?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am sorry to have harrowed the feelings of my hon. friend. There is one way we can obviate this expenditure and that is to leave the Intercolonial Railway in the conditon in which it was in 1895-6. We could allow the road to run down; we could allow its cars to rattle along and the trains to run in a go-as-you-please-manner ; and we could permit the road-bed to get into a condition which would not be creditable to us. But in order to keep it up to its present efficiency ; and in order to provide accommodation all along the road and to meet the demands of the traffic ; we have to make this expenditure. For instance there is no more thriving town in this Dominion than the town of Amherst. There is no place where the manufacturers are progressing and advancing to a greater extent. I do not happen to have the honour of representing the town ; it is very worthily represented by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) whose modesty will not permit him to mention his own name.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Or come back to the House.

Mr. EMMERSON. Don't be alarmed about that. My hon. friend (Mr. Logan) will come back to the House and continue to worthily represent the county of Cumberland.

Mr. HENDERSON. Where is Amherst ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Just outside of Halton. Halton covers most of the earth and Amherst is included in what is left on the fringe. The trade of the Intercolonial Railway demands this vote, and I do not think there is any occasion for the outburst of my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart), but probably he was not as serious as he looked. I trust he will feel that we are doing our best for the Intercolonial Railway

Mr. HAGGART : The Minister of Railways seems to think that this is quite a light affair. Here you have an annual loss of $2,300,000 on the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railroad, an expenditure of $23,000,000 since 1896 for the purpose of making it a paying concern, and instead of that it is falling back each year. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that it was not a rattletrap road in 1896. The road was kept in excellent condition in 1896. Every dollar that was required to be spent was spent on it ; the instructions were to keep it in first class order, and it was delivered over to the Liberal government in first class condition. We built this road for the benefit of the maritime provinces, and I hope for our own benefit. We do not expect to make any profit out of it ; we look upon it, as the minister said, as a free gift to the people. But, we do not want to see this extravagant and useless expenditure made on it. And notwithstanding the $23,000,000 which the road has cost since 1896, and all the deficits on its working, we have the minister coming here with a glib tongue and asking for $1,900,000 this year on capital account, just after there has been a deficit of $1,700,000.

Mr. LOGAN. It is delicious to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) speaking in this manner about the Intercolonial Railway. We will be coming pretty soon to the estimates for canal expenditure, and let me tell the hon. gentleman that we in the maritime provinces not only paid our share for these canals, but we have cheerfully and willingly agreed that the canals of this country should be as free to navigation as is the ocean itself. Now, the hon. minister is endeavouring to improve the Intercolonial Railway. Everybody who has travelled in the maritime provinces knows that in 1896 the railway was almost producing grass on its roadbed. To-day it is being made an up-to-date road. The item under discussion is for increased accommodation for the town of Amherst. I may say that the freight receipts of the town of Amherst, when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) was Minister of Railways, amounted to less than $75,000, whereas this year they have amounted to $247,000. Are we to mark time ? Are the accommodations for freight that only brings $75,000 to be equal to the accommodations for freight that brings a quarter of a million ? The industries of the town of Amherst have developed with remarkable strides under the present administration and the present tariff. Take one industry alone, in the vicinity of the station. The firm of Rhodes, Curry & Co. in 1896 was doing a business of only $425,000 a year, and employed less than 300 men. Last year the same firm did a business of $2,700,000 and employed 900 men in their home manufactory, and 400 or 500 in other places. The country is growing, as the hon. gentleman should realize, and the accommodation at Amherst is absolutely inadequate to the needs of the manufacturers, shippers and merchants of that town. Our freight has been lying on the sidewalks for want of room in the freight sheds ; our sidings have been jammed full of cars, with insufficient means for shunting ; and the hon. minister is doing only the proper thing, which should have been done three years ago, in providing this increased accommodation. I am glad to hear the statement that the scheme is maturing for expending $70,000 for the accommodation for a place which, if it keeps on growing, as it is now, will be a city in four or five years.

Mr. HAGGART. The remarks I made had reference, not to Amherst, but to the whole vote.

Mr. EMMERSON. The greater includes the less.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, the greater includes the less. I am delighted, as everyone else must be, at the increased business at Amherst. We wish the whole business of the Intercolonial Railway would increase at a like rate, and that there would be an end to the deficits. The hon. minister will not increase the rates on the road; he says the people of the country will not submit to any increase. We have, then, to submit patiently to a loss of between $2,000,000 and $2,500,000 a year for the purpose of keeping the Intercolonial Railway running. That railway could be run without any loss whatever, and kept up to its present standard. These expenditures for sidings, deep water termini, and many other things are interminable, and are not justifiable at all. The whole surplus earnings of the Dominion government up to last year were expended on the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, and the payment of the deficits. The fact of the matter is that between $22,000,000 and $23,000,000 has been expended from 1896 up to last year on the Intercolonial Railway. Nearly all the surpluses of the government up to last year were dropped into that sinkhole. Last year the amount on the Intercolonial alone was $2,300,000, and this year it is $1,800,000. I do not know what it is on the other roads.

Mr. BROCK. The remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) discredited the management of that road more than anything that has been said on this side of the House. He speaks of the enormous increase that has taken place in the receipts at the town of Amherst. If there is anything like that increase in the earnings of the road, that fact is a great condemnation of its management generally. There must be something radically wrong with it. Either they are carrying freight and passengers at altogether too little, or it is costing a great deal too much to carry them. Hon. gentlemen must take either horn of the dilemma. They cannot keep on bragging that they are increasing the traffic of that road unless they show that they are getting a little nearer to making it self-supporting. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has often stated in this House that that road could be made self-sustaining. If the same rates were charged on the Intercolonial that are charged on other roads in this country, we would not have the tremendous deficits which we are confronted with from year to year. If the hon. member for Cumberland would try to help the government instead of criticising them so severely as he has done to-day, he might do some good. The statement that that road was in a ramshacle condition in 1895-96 is not in accordance with the facts. Compared with other roads at that time, it was pronounced by eminent engineers to be the best road in the country.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the hon. gentleman name the eminent engineers ?

Mr. BROCK. It is not necessary. The deputy minister will know very well who the eminent engineers are. I state as a fact that that road, in its roadbed and its equipment, was the best road in the country at that time; and in that shape it was handed over to the present government. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were on this side of the House, condemned the late government for their expenditures on the road. There is a grave suspicion that the Intercolonial Railway is doing business largely for the benefit of the local traffic, at a very low rate, and that that low rate is the reason for the very serious deficits which occur year after year. Now that the present Minister of Railways and Canals has taken charge, we have a right to expect much better things from his great experience in these matters. If he will see that proper rates are charged, some of these deficits might be saved to the country.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So far as this particular item is concerned, I regard it as perhaps less subject to criticism than any other item among those we are discussing. The town of Amherst undoubtedly has made very great progress during the last ten years. I would not be inclined to attribute that progress exactly to the causes mentioned by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan). I would attribute it rather to the business enterprise of the people, and their great capacity in developing their industries. I believe the town of Amherst has almost doubled its population, perhaps quite doubled it, within the time I have mentioned. Undoubtedly the output of the manufacturing establishments of the town has enormously increased during that period; but that is owing to the general prosperous conditions which have prevailed throughout the world, and more especially to the remarkable ability and enterprise of the people who are engaged in those enterprises in that particular town. I believe the accommodation at Amherst is inadequate at the present time, and I for one am very glad indeed to support the vote of $15,000 for giving better accommodation. Not only is there the great manufacturing establishment of Rhodes, Curry & Co., but half a dozen others which might be named. There are the Robb Manufacturing Company, which manufactures engines of all kinds, the Amherst Boot and Shoe Company, and a number of other enterprising and prosperous concerns, which are continually turning in very large amounts of freight to the Intercolonial Railway.

Undoubtedly if the traffic along the whole route of the Intercolonial had developed in anything like the proportion shown in the town of Amherst, there would be a very different condition of affairs presented from that which the hon. minister submits to us. I believe that the road should be kept up to a very high standard, and when my hon. friend from Cumberland says it was not so kept up in days gone by, he probably forgets that when we purchased the Drummond County Railway, some two years after the present government came into power, the Intercolonial was held up as a standard of the highest excellence, and the argument used was that the Drummond County road, with a comparatively small expenditure, could be brought up to the standard of the Intercolonial.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the standard of the roadbed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is of that I was speaking. Improvements undoubtedly have been made in the car service, and we on this side have supported the government in making those improvements.

Mr. KENDALL. I would like to point out the fact that the Intercolonial is seriously discriminated against in the purchase of its coal. The Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway purchase their coal delivered in Montreal cheaper than the Intercolonial can purchase its coal in Sydney, Pictou and Cumberland. The local consumers in eastern Canada are likewise discriminated against. There is certainly a remedy which could be applied. If certain large and valuable coal areas were taken hold of and worked by the government, we could get coal as cheap as other railways and the eastern consuming population would get it at a price probably 50 cents per ton cheaper than now.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot allow the statement of my hon. friend to go unchallenged. On certain occasions I have had the opportunity of going very carefully into the coal sales of the different large coal corporations in Nova Scotia, and I can prove that the average price charged the Intercolonial is less than the price charged private consumers in the maritime provinces or anywhere else. The coal companies of Nova Scotia have been able to increase the rate paid the miners of that province the last few years by over twenty per cent, and they cannot be expected to sell coal as cheaply as in days gone by. If they were to lower their prices, they would have also to lower the wages of the men. My hon. friend says that coal is sold cheaper at Montreal to the Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk Railway than to the Intercolonial in Cape Breton. That is easily explained. Everybody knows that there are certain competitive points at which coal, as well as other commodities, has necessarily to be sold cheaper than elsewhere. Montreal is a competitive point for the American coal mines, and the mines of the maritime provinces, and that is the only reason why coal is sold there at an exceedingly low rate, but it does not follow that the government should go outside of Canada to buy coal from foreign companies. Even if we do pay a few cents more per ton on the Intercolonial, we are buying from our own coal mines which are worked by our own workmen.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Could the hon. member give the House the increase in pay to the miners in Cape Breton compared with what is paid in Pennsylvania? I understand that in Pennsylvania the miners are paid some twenty-five or thirty per cent more than the miners in Cape Breton.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This is out of order.

Mr. LOGAN. No doubt it is, but as a representative of a coal mining constituency, I could not allow the remarks of my hon. friend to pass unchallenged. I may tell the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) that the wages paid our Canadian miners are higher than those paid the miners of the United States.

Intercolonial Railway—To increase water supply, $12,500.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is that a general item?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is a general item. There are several points at which the supply is to be increased. This is to increase the water supply at St. Michel, Aston Junction Springhill Junction, St. Fabien, Ste. Anne, Trois Pistoles, L'Islet, Drummondville, and it is also for the purpose of procuring a well-boring machine. The total asked for this year is $12,500.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is to be the total expenditure?

Mr. EMMERSON. Including the expenditure of last year, $165,000.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the well-boring machine been purchased, and is this to be a Canadian well-boring machine?

Mr. EMMERSON. We ask for tenders; I presume it will be a Canadian machine.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Did you advertise for tenders?

Mr. EMMERSON. We advertised for tenders.

Intercolonial Railway—Increased accommodation, Amqui, $7,000.

Mr. LENNOX. Will the minister give an explanation of this?

Mr. EMMERSON. Last year $5,000 was asked for a station at that point. $3,000 was the estimated expenditure up to June 30th, 1904, and we now ask for a revote of $2,000. We ask for a new vote in addition to that of $5,000 to cover the moving of the old station and converting it into a freight shed, the enlarging of the shed and an additional siding. I might state that an amount of about $3,000 will be required later to allow for the cost of the station, which will be greater than the estimated cost, and also for a platform and other work in connection with the station. The total expenditure on improvements at Amqui since June 30, 1900, has been $1,395.46, and the expenditure from June 30, 1903, to May 1, 1904, has been $355.66, a total of $1,751.12.

Mr. LENNOX. How much will it take to complete the railway station and dwelling ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It will take all of that to finish the station and dwelling, and there will be an amount of about $3,000 more.

Mr. LENNOX. How much will it take to make the shed and accommodation the minister speaks of ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The freight shed will cost about $500, and about $4,500 will be required for the additional accommodation and additional sidings.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister says that the tenders exceeded the estimate. Did they also exceed the appropriation ? How much were the tenders ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The first tenders were deemed too high and we asked for tenders a second time, but the result of the second call was not more favourable than the first. We accepted the lowest tender, which was put in by a man named Huarde. I think it was somewhere about $5,000.

Mr. LENNOX. That was for the station and dwelling alone ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not think that is carrying out the terms upon which the appropriation was made last year. We were asked last year for increased accommodation, $4,000. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) asked what the vote was for, and the minister said :

> It is to furnish a new station and dwelling which will cost $3,700, an extension of the freight sheds and other accommodation.

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. We were led certainly to understand last year that all the expenditure within view at that point was $4,000 for the railway station, the dwelling, the shed accommodation and the other accommodation that was required. Now the minister admits that the tenders put in were at least $1,000 beyond the appropriation. I think it will be hard for the minister to explain on what principle he justifies the action of the department. I do not speak of this because it is a large item ; it is only a small extravagance in this case, and only a small departure from what we authorized. It is substituting an expenditure of about $10,000 where we only expected to spend $4,000. At all events, it is committing us to a definite expenditure of $1,000 in excess of the appropriation, and not including all the work that that appropriation was intended to cover. I do not care about the amount, it is the principle that is involved which concerns me.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am willing to answer my hon. friend as respects the item. I find the Minister of Finance stated :

> This is to furnish a new station and dwelling, which will cost $3,700, and an extension of the freight sheds and other accommodation.

That was the estimated cost of the new station, but he did not mention what was the estimated cost of the extension of the freight sheds and other accommodation. He asked for a vote of $5,000. It was expected that the station would cost only $3,700 ; instead of that, although we asked for tenders twice, we were not able to get anywhere near those figures, and in order that the work might go on we finally let the contract and had to exceed that estimate. But I find nowhere here a statement from the Minister of Finance that that was all the money he was going to require for the increased accommodation at Amqui. There is nothing to lead one to conclude that such was the fact ; in making the appropriation he did not appear to know what was expected to be the total expenditure at that point. I do not think the department has acted strangely or unfairly. We have endeavoured to meet the requirements of the railway at Amqui. They are getting a station which is costing more than the estimate, they are getting it in the best possible way, that is, by tenders from all quarters along the line. Surely the department is not to be condemned in this matter. These things were not contemplated in the appropriation for 1904. While they expect a certain expenditure is necessary, they do not make provision for it all in any one year, they make an appropriation on account from year to year until complete facilities are obtained.

Mr. BARKER. I object decidedly to the position taken by the minister. Every year we have applications made to us for money to increase accommodation at particular stations, and invariably the minister says, we want so much money. When he is asked what it is for, he says it is for such and such buildings, extension of sidings, improvement of yards. Now the hon. gentleman says that does not mean that the sum asked for is going to do the work, it is only on account. But the minister when he asks the appropriation does not say it is on account, he leads this House to understand that the money he is asking for will do the work. That is one reason why a great deal of time is occupied in discussing these matters in the House. It is almost impossible to get a straightforward answer from hon. gentlemen on these subjects. I speak out plainly, I say just what I mean, and if the Minister of Finance were here, or his predecessors were here, I would say the same thing.

Mr. EMMERSON. That is very unkind.

Mr. BARKER. On occasion there is an avoidance of telling the whole truth—that is the plain English of it. The hon. gentleman says that when the money was asked for last year nothing was said about its being in full. Surely the minister last year ought to have told us that more would be required. If he throws the responsibility on the officers of the department, what are we to think of the officers who ask money for an improvement at a station and next year tell us they want more for the same station. Either the minister does not take the trouble to tell the House what he is going to do at the station, or the officials are very careless in what they tell the minister—I don't care what way the hon. gentleman puts it. He is responsible for his officials, and it is his duty to get the facts from them and tell the House the whole facs.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister wants us to understand that when that vote was asked for last year it was for the purpose of building a station and dwelling only. If the minister is correct in that statement, what have we then ? We have this fact, that an appropriation was made for $4,000 last year and a contract was let for that work at $5,000. Now it is not a question of big or little, it is a question of principle. When parliament makes an appropriation of $4,000 for a work which is stated to cost $3,700, it is hard to understand why they can exceed the estimate by $1,300 and exceed the appropriation by a thousand dollars. Now the minister says that the appropriation was made for the purpose of building a railway station and a dwelling. I want to say it was for nothing of the kind. The item in the last year's estimate said 'Increased accommodation at Amqui, $4,000.' The member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) asked what that vote was for, and the Minister of Finance said :

> This is to furnish a new station and dwelling, which will cost $3,700, and an extension of the freight sheds and other accommodation.

Will the minister contend that that does not include anything beyond the station and dwelling ? Surely it was represented to the House last year that $4,000 was for the purpose, not only of the station and dwelling, but of a freight shed. Is not that plain ? Not only was it for the purpose of the house and dwelling combined, but of a freight shed and for other accommodation which was not specified. I am not arguing whether it included the yard extension that the minister speaks of to-day, but I am contending that it included the station and dwelling combined, and an extension of the freight sheds and some other accommodation. Without any freight accommodation, the freight shed alone, would cost $500, and for what was to cost $3,200, taking the $500 off the $3,700, they let the contract at $5,000. If that line is to be pursued in reference to these appropriations we ought to know it.

Mr. EMMERSON. Perhaps this is a case in which are both right. I think my hon. friend is forgetting the blanket vote of one-fifth because there was $1,000 provided by the blanket vote. I think my hon. friend is forgetting that.

Mr. LENNOX. No, I am not. If that were the case there would be one-fifth added to the item we have in these estimates.

Mr. EMMERSON. We had appropriated in 1903-4 $5,000. That was the amount provided by the appropriation Bill. One thousand dollars of it was appropriated previous to the final vote when the blanket vote of one-fifth of the total was given.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not think my hon. friend will get much consolation out of that. I refer my hon. friend to page 12601 of 'Hansard' of last year. The vote for this purpose was $4,000 and the amount stated was $3,700 in the estimates I am speaking of.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have read that.

Mr. LENNOX. That does not help my hon. friend in the slightest degree no matter whether what he suggests, that the vote had been increased, is correct or not.

Mr. EMMERSON. There had previously been a $1,000 vote and the remarks of my hon. friend the Finance Minister had reference not only to the $4,000 item but to the one-fifth of the total.

Mr. LENNOX. They could not have reference to that $1,000 because we were speaking of the $4,000 which was then before the committee and for the additional reason that he specifies the cost of the structure he was about to erect. It is not possible for my hon. friend, if he thinks of the matter, to explain it in that way. Granting that there is some ground for my hon. friend's contention that we should add $1,000 to that $4,000 and make it $5,000 the hon. minister of Finance undertook that with that $5,000 he would complete the building, freight sheds and other improvements. According to my hon. friend's statement to-day the freight sheds are to cost $500. Take that off and you have only $4,500 for the building to be erected ; yet, he has let a contract for $5,000, although I do not understand that that will complete it.

Mr. EMMERSON. Surely the committee is satisfied with my explanation.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What is the annual freight return from Amqui ? Does the hon. minister know where that station is ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I think it is only fair, where these large expenditures are asked for these stations, that we should have some statement as to the traffic and revenue at these places. There was a very satisfactory explanation made by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) as to why the accommodation should be increased at Amherst and I think it is only fair that we should have an explanation as to why the accommodation should be increased at Amqui. What is the traffic carried on at this place ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The revenue at Amqui is upward of $35,000.

Intercolonial Railway—Increased accommodation, Stellarton, $41,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. The amount voted last year was $32,000. It was estimated that the expenditure up to the 30th June would be $13,000. We require a revote of $19,000. In addition to that we want $22,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that no portion of it is inserted in these estimates as a revote.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a clerical error because it is a revote.

Mr. BELL. When is the work of construction on the new building to be commenced ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Tenders are being called for now.

Mr. BELL. What is the station to cost ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The estimated cost of the station building is $16,000.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Is that all ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I cannot satisfy you.

Mr. BELL. This is a very important point. Really this is a terminal point. The road to Oxford starts at this point. It is a railway centre and I am well aware from my knowledge of the locality that the expenditure of a large amount of money will be necessary.

Mr. EMMERSON. I may say we are providing covered platforms and that they will cost $7,000 perhaps. In addition to that we are providing a number of additional tracks.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. That is not included in this $41,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, that is all included in this $41,000.

Mr. BELL. This work has been in hand a very long time. It was commenced last fall. I would like an explanation why it has been progressing so slowly ? It is very necessary. Almost every person who travels through Nova Scotia has to change there. I would like some explanation as to the cause of the delay which has apparently taken place in carrying on this work.

Mr. EMMERSON. There was a large amount of work. There was a machine shop, an engine house, a car repair shop, a building for the storage of wrecking plant, a building for other stores, offices, and a baggage building all included in this expenditure. The work has been going on. The station building, it is true, has not been erected ; but that was not of such urgent necessity as were the other works. It cannot be said the department has delayed in the matter. The machine shop and the car repair shops were very urgent.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Has the minister a general plan for stations along the line of the Intercolonial Railway ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We have for the small stations along the line a general uniform plan, but in respect to the larger stations there have to be special plans prepared.

Mr. BELL. What is the material of which this station is being built ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Brick.

Mr. LENNOX. I would ask the hon. minister to give the items that go to make up the increased vote beyond what is represented by the revote.

Mr. EMMERSON. The estimate is as follows : land and legal expenses, $4,300 ; baggage building, extension freight shed, moving buildings, extension to coal trestle, $5,000 ; covered platform between $6,000 and $7,000 ; track engineering and inspection, $5,700.

Mr. BLAIN. Is the engineering and inspecting done by local men ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There will be a local inspector.

Mr. BLAIN. Last year there was $2,500 for engineering and inspecting.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was the inspection on the proposed vote of $32,000 ; this is for new works including the $22,000 of a new vote.

Mr. BLAIN. Last year the minister of Finance stated that $32,000 was all the expenditure that was contemplated at that point. It seems strange that an increased amount should be asked for now.

Mr. EMMERSON. I hardly think the Minister of Finance made that statement. I do not think any minister would be justified in placing a limit on the expenditure that may become necessary at Stellarton. It is a great coal and railway centre and in my judgment the probabilities for the future will demand very great improvements even beyond those now contemplated. The Minister of Finance must be under a misapprehension if he said that.

Mr. BLAIN. Possibly so; it is these indefinite statements that make it impossible for us to understand.

Mr. EMMERSON. You see how definite I am.

Mr. BLAIN. Oh, yes. The minister stated last year, as reported in 'Hansard.'

The present appropriation will finish all that is contemplated.

That language was clear enough.

Mr. EMMERSON. Last year the minister gave a list of special works for which $32,000 would be required, and what he said was that this sum would complete those special works. We are not asking any more now to complete these works but we are asking a further sum for the other special works which I have mentioned. You cannot foretell what may be necessary at a place like this. It is only as the town grows and by the process of evolution that you can make provision for the requirements. The minister did not say last year, and I do not say now, that if you vote this $22,000 it will cover for ever the improvements at Stellarton. I could not say that and be just to the town or the railway, or to myself. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance did not mislead the House last year, and I am sure he would not wish to.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister is altogether wrong in saying that we propose to bind him down to this expenditure for ever.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would not bind myself even for a year; there may be new conditions.

Mr. BLAIN. When the minister asks the expenditure of money at a small town like this—

Mr. EMMERSON. It is no small potatoe town.

Mr. BLAIN. I did not say anything about it being a small potato town; it is not a city.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a large industrial centre.

Mr. BLAIN. I suppose so, and I hope it will grow more prosperous, but I do say that when the minister comes down and asks for a vote, and then asks for a further vote before that money is expended it is not a businesslike way of proceeding. The department should have known all the improvements that would be required within the next couple of years, and they should lay plans, and specifications, and estimates before the committee of the total probable cost. Then if be necessary, the minister could state that he was not asking for the full vote this year. What I am objecting to is the small piecemeal policy of the department in such matters. I have no doubt that the sending of engineers back and forward to inspect these works year after year must add to the cost. I am quite sure it adds to the cost of the country and is not in the interest of the people.

Mr. BLAIN.

Intercolonial Railway—Engine-house, machine shop, &c., Rivière du Loup, $88,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. The total expenditure is $138,000, of which $50,000 was appropriated last year and the balance this year. We require an extension to the machine shop, some additional land, some drain and water service, some sidings in connection with these works, additional freight and ice houses, and a new coal-handling plant.

Mr. BLAIN. I understand that tenders were asked for the construction of this machine shop?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes. The contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer, Mr. Emile Dubé.

Mr. BLAIN. At what price?

Mr. EMMERSON. Between $61,000 and $62,000.

Mr. BLAIN. Will that complete the work?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is estimated that this $88,000 will complete the works which I have mentioned.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the minister anticipate any enlargements next year?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have none in mind now.

Mr. BARKER. Has the minister inquired from the general manager whether any other works beyond what are here provided for are likely to be needed within the next three or four years? Surely that is a business-like question for him to put to his manager.

Mr. EMMERSON. The general manager states that he thinks of nothing at present. It is within the knowledge of the committee that Rivière du Loup is the principal repair point for the Intercolonial in the province of Quebec. It is a divisional point, and it requires a machine shop and all the equipment necessary for the divisional point of a railway. It is a place destined to grow, I believe, and new requirements will necessarily present themselves in the future, but the general manager states that he has not anything within his knowledge at present.

Mr. LENNOX. There has been nothing new added to this matter this year?

Mr. EMMERSON. The freight and ice houses and the coal-handling plant are items which were not included last year. They amount to about $10,000.

Mr. BLAIN. When is the work to be completed under the tenders which have been invited?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is proposed to have them all completed within the present fiscal year. I cannot give the exact date.

Mr. LENNOX. Has the building site been got?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. What did it cost ?

Mr. EMMERSON. A little over $11,000. The cost did not exceed the estimate.

Intercolonial Railway—Engine-house, &c., Chaudière Junction, $45,500.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is simply a revote. Of the $83,500 voted last year some $40,000 has been expended. There is nothing new in this vote. The details are the same as those given last year.

Intercolonial Railway—Increased accommodation, St. John, $73,000.

Mr. DANIEL. Would the minister explain whether this large amount is appropriated to finish the works that are being carried on at the new round-house, or for what purpose this vote is asked ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The vote last year was $111,000. That included a large, 18-stall engine-house and other works, a coal shed and quite a number of items, the details of which were given, showing the whole amount to be $111,000. There was estimated to be expended down to June 30th last $63,000, leaving a balance of $48,000. We are asking for a revote of $48,000.

Mr. LENNOX. It does not say so here.

Mr. EMMERSON. There must be some clerical error, because that error was not made in the department. In addition to that, we want an addition to the freight shed at St. John and also an addition to the baggage room and an extension to the covered platform.

Mr. DANIEL. What was the cost of the new round-house, or is that the building to which the minister refers as a new engine-house ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is an 18-stall engine-house. Last year we paid on this $41,355. The contract price was $71,900, and part of it was paid in the fiscal year 1902.

Mr. DANIEL. Has it been built within the contract price ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Last year the minister said that the estimated cost of the round-house was $13,800.

Mr. EMMERSON. That must be a mistake. We asked for a vote of $111,000, and the sum total of all these items was given. It was a balance then due, which included the balance due on a contract of 1902, which was for $71,900. The total cost was about that sum.

Intercolonial Railway—To increase accommodation, Halifax, $135,000.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the minister explain that ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We are asking for a revote of $135,000. Last year the details were given, the total expenditure being $229,500. The estimated expenditure up to June 30, was $94,500, which leaves an amount to be revoted of $135,000. The matter having been discussed last year, I do not suppose that we need take up time discussing it now.

Mr. BARKER. I would like to ask the minister to explain generally as to these items. Large votes were taken last year for increased accommodation at Halifax, Pictou, North Sydney, Moncton and two other points. Very large votes were taken and very large sums carried over. There must have been some reason for that, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain.

Mr. EMMERSON. With regard to Pictou, the delay there occurred in consequence of the difficulty in settling the question of the site of the new station. That has been settled recently.

Mr. BARKER. Was that difficulty not known last year as well as since the vote was taken ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was thought that it could be settled, but new questions arose.

Mr. BARKER. Of what nature ?

Mr. EMMERSON. In matters relating to a government road, you cannot simply look at matters on one side of the sheet entirely as a company can do. They can simply study the matter from their standpoint and from no other. The Intercolonial must be studied from the standpoint of the general public.

Mr. BARKER. Or a general election, perhaps.

Mr. EMMERSON. No ; I do not think, when a petition comes in signed by a very large number of residents of an intelligent community like Pictou, that it is always connected with some election, or that there is something wrong about it. A petition came in signed by a very large number of residents and citizens of Pictou. That petition arrested the attention of the department, the matter had to be inquired into, and I know that since I came into the department myself I gave the matter a very great deal of study, and it was finally concluded, perhaps not to the satisfaction of everybody, but I think for the convenience of the general public of Pictou and of the travelling public who pass through Pictou on their way to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. BARKER. I suppose the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to do the most good possible ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Precisely ; I try to be a public benefactor.

Mr. BELL. Can the minister tell me what properties have been taken in for this station ?

Mr. EMMERSON. A very small portion of the Primrose property has been taken.

Mr. BELL. I would like a list of the properties.

Mr. EMMERSON. There is no other property; the station will be so placed that it will not be necessary to take in anything but a small portion of the Primrose property.

Mr. BELL. Will the new station be east or west of the custom-house?

Mr. EMMERSON. East of the custom-house.

Mr. BELL. And what is the total expenditure for the land?

Mr. EMMERSON. About $1,000.

Mr. BELL. That is purchased, I suppose, by negotiation, not by tenders?

Mr. EMMERSON. By negotiation. There are only $1,000 expended for land.

Mr. BELL. Are the plans completed for the station building and for the yard improvements and changes?

Mr. EMMERSON. They are working at them now, but they are not quite completed.

Mr. BELL. Was not some land taken in addition to widen the entrance at the western end of the river?

Mr. EMMERSON. That was taken into consideration and a valuation made, but we find we can get on without it.

Mr. BELL. Am I to understand that no land was taken for the purpose of track laying?

Mr. EMMERSON. No.

Mr. BELL. Have the tenders been let for the construction of the station?

Mr. EMMERSON. They will be immediately.

Mr. BELL. What is the cost of the station house?

Mr. EMMERSON. About $90,000.

Mr. BELL. Will there be a covered platform?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. WM. ROSS (Victoria). Finding that the Minister of Railways is a public benefactor, I want to appeal to him for a small siding in my county. There is a small village in my county, the village of Jamesville, where they gather a lot of pit timber for the mines, and they want a siding there so as to load the freight cars at that place. The whole expenditure would not amount to more than $500 or $1,000, and I hope the hon. minister will take that matter into his favourable consideration. I am a very modest man, and that is the only improvement I asked for in my county.

Mr. BELL.

Intercolonial Railway—Improvements at North Sydney, $25,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. Out of last year's vote of $33,000 we spent $8,000, which leaves $25,000 to be revoted.

Mr. BLAIN. How was the $8,000 expended?

Mr. EMMERSON. There was dredging and the extension of the freight sheds and improvements to the wharf, additional sidings, and work generally in connection with the proposed improvements.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I did not observe that the item of increased accommodation at Halifax had passed and intended to say a word or two with regard to it. When will that increased accommodation be provided, and to what does this item particularly relate?

Mr. EMMERSON. It relates to land for engine house and yard—some land on Cornwallis street. Also for some expenditure in connection with the proposed engine house and some improvements at the station. Then it includes the construction of a quay wall or crib wall, paved with stone, and for a wharf and freight shed—the whole to cost $229,500. We expended on that up to the 30th of June, 1904, $94,500, leaving $135,000 to be revoted. Reid & Archibald have the contract for the wharf and are going on with the work.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When is it to be completed under the contract?

Mr. EMMERSON. This fall. The chairman of the Board of Trade was here the other day in connection with the matter.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is anticipated the work will be finished this autumn?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Is the construction of that freight shed at North Sydney, estimated to cost $5,000, to be done under contract after calling for tenders?

Mr. EMMERSON. That has not been let, but we propose to call for tenders.

Intercolonial Railway—Increased accommodation at Ste. Flavie, $83,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. This includes a revote of $70,000. Last year $95,000 was voted and only $25,000 expended up to the 30th of June, leaving $70,000 to be revoted. We are asking for a new vote for heating the engine house. That was not provided for in the original estimate, and we want piping for the engine also and good boilers. The total estimated cost is $13,000 which, added to the $70,000, makes $83,000.

Intercolonial Railway—Towards improving the ferry service, Straits of Canso, $45,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We should have some detailed information on this. We have spent a great deal of money in improving that ferry service. How much has been put into the new steamer, and has it been found satisfactory ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I can assure my hon. friend that the steamer 'Scotia' has proved a most wonderful success and the approaches are working very satisfactorily indeed. The vote last year was $77,400. $32,400 is the expenditure down to the 30th of June, 1904, and we are asking a revote of $45,000. This item of $77,400 was to provide electric plant at Mulgrave and Point Tupper. By building an extension it is believed that the ice will be prevented entering and interfering with the entrance of the ferry to Point Tupper. This extension, it is believed, will divert the tidal current and the ice from the north, and the ice will be carried past the harbour instead of into it. It will also have the effect of reducing the current close to the entrance of the dock, which will make it easier for a steamer to enter. This crib work will have to resist heavy shocks from the ice, and it must be built especially strong. This, of course, requires shifting the piling, you have to complete the tracks, re-arrange them, and the whole is estimated to cost $77,400. The work done thus far has been very satisfactory. The crossing between Mulgrave and Point Tupper has been carried on throughout last winter very satisfactorily indeed, and is commonly commended by the travelling public.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the service is so satisfactory as the minister states, why spend so much money on improving the approaches ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Because of the floating ice. Occasionally the ice, coming in from the north particularly, gets into the ferry slips with the result that it makes it difficult to handle the boat. We require some protection of that kind for the boat. While you may say perhaps that the floating ice did not make the crossing a failure, it interfered with it materially. It will be a great advantage to the crossing there to have this protection.

Mr. KENDALL. It is essential that this provision should be made. While the boat does her work most satisfactorily, still, very frequently when the floating ice is running there, the ice jams the boat into the dock, and it sometimes takes several minutes or several hours to get her out of the ice.

Mr. EMMERSON. The trouble, I am informed, is on the Cape Breton side entirely ; there is no trouble at Mulgrave. The situation of the slip or dock is at right angles to the current on the Cape Breton side, therefore it requires this protection.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are these works which are now being constructed in addition to those which were first proposed ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, to protect the docks from the floating ice which comes down from the north and is carried by the current to the Point Tupper side. The current does not carry the ice in to the Mulgrave side. therefore no such protection is necessary there.

Intercolonial Railway—Protection to Grand Narrows bridge, $70,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is a railway bridge on the line between Point Tupper and Sydney. It separates the two arms of the Bras d'Or lake. This is a draw bridge, and vessels pass through it carrying large quantities of marble and lime stone for the Sydney works. Barges also carry this material through this drawbridge. The current is so swift and it strikes the bridge at such a peculiar angle that it is with great danger not only to vessels but to the bridge itself that the passage is attempted. Now an attempt has been made to direct that current, and in order that the vessels may pass through there with safety not only to themselves but to the bridge, this became essential. Some men who have studied these matters were sent there with the engineers and they have suggested a remedy. It is proposed to have an extension of the crib 200 feet long, 24 feet wide at the top, 15 wide at the bottom and 72 feet high. The water is very deep there. It was at first suggested that we might have piling anchored at the bottom to serve as a buffer, but that was decided not to be feasible. It was felt that it would not answer the purpose, so this cribwork was decided upon, the whole cost of which is $79.556. There was an appropriation last year of $10,000, that leaves a balance to be voted this year of $70,000. I can only say from the study which I have given to this matter that it is absolutely necessary, it is an unavoidable expenditure if that bridge is to be utilized at all as a drawbridge, and it is in the interest of the railway as well as of the vessels navigating the Bras d'Or lake.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the object of directing the current under the drawbridge away from the pier ?

Mr. EMMERSON. So that the current will go through more directly. Instead of going at an angle and striking against the abutments of the bridge or striking the centre pier, we desire to direct and straighten that current as far as possible, so that vessels will go through with safety, without being carried against either the abutment on the one hand or the centre pier on the other.

Mr. BLAIN. Is the work let by tender ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is let by tender. We are buying the timber by tender, and a contract will be advertised for shortly for the construction. We make them separate, because we had to have a peculiar kind of timber. We had a bill of the material made out and tenders were asked for on that. The lumber is being put on the spot under this contract.

Mr. BLAIN. What is the estimated cost of the material and work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Several lots were purchased from different parties. The lowest tender was accepted in all cases. The timber will cost about $35,000. The balance will be for construction and iron work.

At six o'clock, Committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Campbell). The item before the committee is :

Protection to Grand Narrows bridge, $70,000.

Mr. LENNOX. I was saying before the committee rose at six o'clock that the item last year was $10,000 and that the item this year is $70,000. It appears from the estimates that the $10,000 which was appropriated last year was expended. In itself it does not necessarily follow that because there was $10,000 last year we must not have seven times as much this year, but I call the attention of the hon. minister to the fact that it is somewhat surprising that there is this $70,000 of additional money asked, and I think I shall be able to convince the hon. minister that the committee last year had reason to believe that $10,000 was all that was needed for this purpose.

Mr. EMMERSON. I can explain to the hon. gentleman if he wishes the reason for the change. The $10,000 voted last year was the appropriation for carrying out a design which it was felt at that time would obviate the difficulty. That was to have what they call a cluster of piles driven in and loaded with stone. It was thought that that would be sufficient but when we got some experts there the matter was looked into more thoroughly during last fall and the early winter and they determined that that would not be sufficient and that any expenditure on that plan would be money thrown away. It was decided by the department, on the advice of these experts, to make a crib pier which would serve as a guide and at the same time direct the current straight through the passage way. The original design would have cost about $10,000, but in my judgment it would have been money thrown away and would not have served the purpose. Instead of throwing that money away the department changed the design and the work which they now propose to do will cost $70,000.

Mr. BLAIN. What proportion of the $10,000 was expended last year and how ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was estimated that $10,000 would be expended up to June 30, 1904. That $10,000 was applied to the new work. I have explained that we asked for tenders for certain timber and that money has been applied on that.

Mr. BLAIN. Applied to the payment of the timber ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, and also in connection with the experts. We got the services of these experts, and of course it was necessary to pay them ?

Mr. LENNOX. Do I understand from the hon. minister that there has been a contract let ?

Mr. EMMERSON. For the timber, and we are now about to ask for tenders for the work.

Mr. LENNOX. What is the nature of the work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Cribwork filled with stone, sheathed with creosoted plank to protect it from the ravages of the worms.

Mr. LENNOX. Will $70,000 be the full amount of the contract or $80,000 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend wants to know the total cost of the work ?

Mr. LENNOX. Yes.

Mr. EMMERSON. The total cost of the new design is $89,475.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Is that a tidal bridge ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, in tidal water. I am mistaken as to the amount. We only ask $70,000 by this vote. The total estimated cost of the works at Grand Narrows is put down at $89,475. That includes work already done. There was some work done in 1901 and in 1902, and taking the whole——

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps the hon. minister would give the amount expended in 1901, 1902 and 1903 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There was some amount expended in 1897, but that was only $25.73 for preliminary surveys. There was expended in 1901 $4,576.48 and in 1902 $4,872.79. Of course Grand Narrows is a station. These items I have just read are not expenditures made on this particular cribwork, but they are made in connection with the Grand Narrows station, and the general manager said that he furnished this information because we usually asked what had been the general expenditure made under that head.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is this masonry work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No.

Mr. LENNOX. There are one or two things that we want clearly understood before we leave this item. The $70,000 that the hon. minister is asking now is to be added to the $10,000 vote of last year making $80,000—is that right ?

Mr. EMMERSON. To be exact in figures the estimate before me is $79,556.95 for the proposed cribwork which is to be a guard pier and a current breaking pier. The $10,000 voted last year has been applied on that, and if you deduct the $10,000 it would leave $69,556.95. We ask this year for a total vote of $70,000 assuming that the contingencies may possibly be short.

Mr. LENNOX. It is hoped that the $70,000 we now vote will complete the work.

Mr. EMMERSON. It overlaps it by a few hundred dollars, and we hope to keep it within that figure.

Mr. LENNOX. The $10,000 is already expended ?

Mr. EMMERSON. In the purchase of timber and in securing the services of experts.

Mr. LENNOX. And upon the new scheme; the old scheme being entirely abandoned ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Wiped out entirely.

Mr. LENNOX. In my opinion the Minister of Railways has not pursued a constitutional course in this matter. We voted $10,000 last year for a specific purpose, the object of which was explained to us. It was said that this $10,000 would complete the object, and the committee was pledged last year to a total expenditure of $10,000, whereas now we are pledged to a total expenditure of $80,000, and the $10,000 voted last year has been appropriated, without authority I believe, to this new scheme. I do not question the wisdom of the new scheme, but I say that there was no authority to apply the $10,000 to that purpose without coming to parliament again. It is for the minister to say whether there is any explanation required.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have earned a very good reputation for not speaking too much and I would not wish to destroy it by going to the other extreme ; but if the committee will pardon me I will explain. This bridging of the Grand Narrows, the connecting link of northern and western portion of Cape Breton with the southern and eastern portion is a very important matter. If anything happened to that swing or drawbridge, the whole traffic of the Sydneys would be interrupted. Protests were made against the old plan by the business interests of Sydney who represented that if that cluster of piles were put down there would be danger not only to the vessels but to the bridge as well, because, should the currents swing these vessels against the draw there would be a complete interruption of traffic. As the responsible head of the department I did not think that any risk should be taken and as this $10,000 was entrusted to the Department of Railways to overcome the difficulties at that point, and without there being any plan or specification for carrying on a particular work, I do not think parliament would wish that the old design should be carried out, if it were found that it should not accomplish the good intended. No advantage has been taken of parliament by the action of the Railway Department, because the money was voted for the purpose of removing the difficulty and danger at that point, and it has been devoted to that purpose. That was the whole object that parliament had in voting that money. It is true that the department thought that the $10,000 would be sufficient, but upon investigation it was found that it was inadequate.

Mr. BLAIN. That is all very well, but is it not rather misleading the committee ? The minister says that upon examination it was found that the expenditure of the $10,000 would not be sufficient. I do not know that any member of the committee would complain that a larger expenditure was found to be necessary to accommodate the trade of that place, but we do complain that when it was represented that this $10,000 would be sufficient, the minister appropriated it to part of an expenditure that will run up to $79,000, and he did that without consulting parliament. Then after the contracts are let, the timber purchased, and the $10,000 paid out, the minister makes the statement that he has changed the plan without consulting parliament. Are we to understand that is the policy the hon. gentleman proposes to pursue ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The money is voted for a specific purpose and is applied to a specific purpose. We have, it is true, entered into contracts, because if we had not done so, we would have been unable to get the timber after parliament had met and voted the money. It was necessary to let these contracts during the winter months, so that the country would get the advantage of the least cost in securing the material. There must be some discretionary power left to the Department of Railways in regard to a government owned and government operated railway. If not, that is one of the strongest arguments that could be used against government ownership. If we could not exercise some discretion and do work when it is essential to the safety of the road and the traffic, or to prevent a paralysis of business, I am sure it would be impossible to meet the requirements of the country.

Mr. MORIN. If I remember rightly, before recess the minister said he had bought the timber for that sheer wharf or pier for $35,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. We have entered into contracts to that amount.

Mr. MORIN. Will the minister be kind enough to tell the committee how much he pays for the timber per thousand, board measure or cubic measure or lineal measure ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I will obtain that information.

Mr. MORIN. What kind of timber do you propose to use ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Some creosoted timber, some spruce and some hemlock under water. According to the estimate of the engineer, we require 417,000 feet, board measure, of 10-inch by 10-inch hemlock timber; 104,000 feet of spruce or hemlock logs; 10,500 lineal feet of ballast poles; 140,000 feet, board measure, of 2-inch creosoted sheathing; 14,600 cubic yards of stone ballast; 3 piles of 3-inch creosoted piling on the Sidney side 280 feet long in water from 25 to 50 feet deep, 120,000 feet of 3-inch by 12-inch creosoted sheet piling; together with the labour and the screw bolts, spikes and drift bolts, all making up the sum total of $29,000.

Mr. MORIN. Will the minister say whether the timber is hewn or sawn ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Some is purchased as square timber and some as round, and it is so used. It is bought in the proper lengths and furnished, according to the dimensions required, ready to be put in the work.

Mr. MORIN. Is the square timber hewn or sawn ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is sawn dimension timber. The surface face is square. On the inside the timbers are round.

Mr. MORIN. The part that is to be under water may be sawn, but the part that is to be above water should be hewn.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. minister has not told us what he paid for the timber.

Mr. EMMERSON. For the square timber we paid $14 per thousand feet board measure. For the creosoted timber $43, for the poles 2½ cents per lineal foot, and for the other timber, 6, 7 and 8 cents per lineal foot, according to dimensions.

Mr. MORIN. What kind of timber did you pay $43 per thousand feet for ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The creosoted pine. We have to get it from Norfolk, Virginia. It is two inches thick and some is three by twelve besides the sheath piling.

Mr. MORIN. Where did you get the hemlock and spruce ?

Mr. EMMERSON. From Nova Scotia all along the line and some from Cape Breton. There was a general call for tenders posted up at every station.

Mr. LENNOX. In view of the exceptional circumstances, I think that we should have all the papers connected with this item before us before we pass this vote. Has any of the work beyond the collecting of the material been actually done ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No, we are waiting for the vote.

Mr. KENDALL. I need only explain the urgency of the matter to convince the House that the minister did perfectly right. The Grand Narrows is a very deep neck of water. The water is from 58 to 75 feet deep in this locality and nearly half a mile wide. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company's large steamers, some which carry 3,000 tons of freight, go to the westward of this bridge, and one of them, two years ago, heavily laden, was caught with the tide, when coming down, swung against the boom and seriously damaged.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What is the object of this pier ?

Mr. KENDALL. My predecessor, Mr. McDougall, again and again reported to the engineers, when the railway was built, that the draw should not have been put in the place it was, because, owing to the formation of the land, there is a strong four knot tide right across the channel, so that steamers coming down are liable to be driven diagonally across stream. A steamer laden with 3,000 tons struck against the pier and the pier was very considerably damaged.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Was the captain a St. Lawrence pilot ?

Mr. KENDALL. No pilot could command a steamer when she gets into the current there. My colleague and I made representations to the government two years ago, but we were overruled and an arrangement was made to expend $10,000. The authorities found shortly afterwards that that would not meet the requirements, and I just wish to point out the importance of the department acting without delay. To the east side of the county of Cape Breton there are some 70,000 people and some $50,000,000 invested in coal and iron mines, which produce some 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 tons of coal per year. If that pier gave way, the whole traffic with the southern part of the county would be cut off, and Mr. Johnston and I urged the government to have the matter attended to at once so that the danger resulting from delay would be reduced to a minimum.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What relation would this pier bear to the one the steamer struck against ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It would be a continuation of it.

Mr. MONK. If the government has waited so long before beginning the work, it cannot do any harm to wait long enough to give parliament the opportunity of voting intelligently on the item.

Mr. EMMERSON. If my hon. friends have not sufficient knowledge, we will go on with some other item and there is no use taking up time dwelling on this any longer.

Mr. MONK. I am very glad to see that the minister takes that view, because it seems to me that the demand of my hon. friend is a most reasonable one.

Mr. EMMERSON. Without expressing any opinion on that subject I shall defer to the request.

Mr. MONK. Since the minister comments on the reasonableness of my hon. friend's request, I may say that for my own part there is not one of these items upon which it seems to me we should not have had ready for us twenty times the information that my colleagues have succeeded in extracting after extraordinary efforts of patience and perseverance. I do not apply that remark particularly to my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson). I admit that his is a difficult department and that those items were of some difficulty, but I will say this on behalf of those whose duty it is to criticise and to inquire into the reasonableness of these votes that if we had the full information at our command which any business man would demand before authorizing an expenditure aggregating $3,000,000 it would greatly facilitate the work of this House. Here is an urgent item for repairs for which we voted last year $10,000 on the assurance that that would complete the work. But what do we find ? It was found insufficient. Representations were made to the minister by people who knew something of the locality and if the minister believed that these works required to be hurried as was stated by the hon. member for Cape Breton, the law indicates a way to provide for cases of that kind. The minister had only to conform himself to the formalities of the statute. He might have obtained a special warrant and not have put us in the position we are in to-day, but he went ahead without the authority of parliament, without any authority whatever, and contrary to the law in urgent cases, purchased this large amount of wood and to-day, instead of dealing with a work which we sanctioned last year, costing $10,000, we are called upon to spend an amount immediately of $70,000 which I have no hesitation in saying, from what experience I have had and from what the hon. gentleman who preceded me has stated, will cost a good deal more than $70,000 and when one of us, deprived of every information to which we are entitled on a job of that magnitude asks for fuller information and for a delay of a few hours in order that parliament may be able to exercise its right to intelligently control these expenses, the minister, who has been treated with a great deal of leniency in regard to his estimates, flippantly remarks that he would rather not be called upon to express an opinion as to the reasonableness of that request.

Intercolonial Railway—Semaphores at stations, $2,500.

Mr. EMMERSON. This provides for eleven mechanical semaphores and for two electric—magneto semaphores at two stations, one at Trenton and one at Oxford Junction. The two electric—magneto semaphores cost $400 each, that is $800, and the eleven mechanical semaphores cost $450 each, which makes $1,650, altogether $2,540, which, with $50 added in connection with placing them, makes a total of $2,500.

Mr. LENNOX. I would like the minister to explain how it comes that these semaphores are charged to capital account. On an old established road, they must be very much in the same position as a new door or window in a building, simply a matter of ordinary, every day repair.

Mr. EMMERSON. These are semaphores at stations at which there were no semaphores before. There had not been any semaphores at Oxford Junction and it is proposed, because of the situation of that station, at the junction between the two lines, that an electric-magneto semaphore should be placed there and that one should also be placed at Trenton which is at the junction with the Iron Works Railway.

Mr. BLAIN. Is this the introduction to a large expenditure in connection with semaphores, or would the minister say that this will be the total amount required for some years to come in connection with semaphores ?

Mr. EMMERSON. These are all we propose now and all that are now required. As new stations are established and sidings put in at these stations, and they become of some importance, it may be that in the future we will have to put in one or more a year.

Mr. LENNOX. These are not put in at new stations.

Mr. EMMERSON. These are stations which have not before had semaphores. They were not of sufficient importance to require them but we have found it necessary to put them in now.

Mr. LENNOX. Are there stations where there are sidings at which there are no semaphores ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No ; these semaphores are not switch lights.

Prince Edward Island Railway—to increase accommodation at Kensington, $4,000.

Mr. HACKETT. Is it the intention of the government to build a new station there ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes ; a new station and freight sheds.

Mr. HACKETT. Of what material will the station be built ?

Mr. EMMERSON. According to the general style of stations on the Intercolonial—of wood.

Mr. HACKETT. Has a contract been let for building that station ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No ; we have not yet called for tenders, but we propose to do so at once after this vote is passed.

Mr. HACKETT. Kensington is a very important station on the line of the Prince Edward Island Railway, and there should be no delay in building a new station. The old station is in a very dilapidated condition, and is looked upon as not being up-to-date. I would now urge upon the minister to make no delay in calling for tenders and building an up-to-date station there.

Mr. EMMERSON. I can assure my hon. friend that is what we intend to do, and do it promptly.

Mr. BLAIN. There was $1,000 voted last year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There is a small station there, and it was thought that we might extend it ; but in consequence of the protest we received from the people who are interested in it and of the recognized importance of the place, we concluded to give them a new station. We therefore revote that $1,000 and add an additional $3,000 to it. That will furnish them with a new station and freight yard.

Mr. SPROULE. Will this complete the station ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We expect this will cover all the necessary cost in connection with that station.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this vote based upon the estimate of some competent engineer ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes ; this is from the engineer's department, on an estimate of what is required. It will be let by contract.

Prince Edward Island Railway—To straighten the line at Curtis Creek, $21,500.

Mr. HACKETT. What has been done in connection with straightening the line on the Island Railway ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Six tenders were called for, and the lowest was accepted.

Mr. BELL. What is the length of the new line ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is not a new line, it is straightening out curves, and involves a little over 1·07 miles of track laying.

Mr. BELL. Is that going to cost $36,000?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total cost is supposed to be $42,851.

Mr. BELL. That is a very expensive work.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a very bad cutting, the curve is a dangerous one, and in its present condition it has been a great receptacle for snow. We will have to widen it out.

Mr. BELL. You speak of straightening the line. What distance is saved ?

Mr. EMMERSON. On the present line there is a six-degree curve and a five-degree curve. It is proposed to build a line 5,300 feet long to cut these curves out. The new line will be straight. On the present line there is a bridge on one of these curves consisting of three spans 28 feet long. On the new line a culvert will be substituted. The grade on the present line is 1·26, and it will be the same on the proposed line. The new line will be 3,090 feet shorter than the existing line, and there will be no curves. There is now a double curve, and a very bad one.

Mr. HACKETT. Who is the contractor for the work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The lowest tenderer was Mr. Henry Kitchen.

Mr. HACKETT. Did Mr. Kavanagh, of Charlottetown, tender for the work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think he did.

Mr. HACKETT. What is the difference between the tender of Mr. Kitchen and that of Mr. Kavanagh ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not remember the exact figure. There was considerable difference, so much so that I was constrained to give it to Mr. Kitchen, although he is not the local man. Sometimes, when they are nearly equal, one feels disposed to give it to the local man, but in this instance the discrepancy was so great that I was obliged to accept the other.

Mr. SPROULE. Will this complete ?

Mr. EMMERSON. This is the estimate given by the department, $42,851. There are some credits to come off. There is a credit of $6,350 for certain iron work, and there are girders and rails on the existing line that may amount to $36,000. The $15,000 we voted last year taken from that leaves a balance of about $21,500.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister says he had two tenders.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think there were more than two. There were four or five. But that was the lowest.

Mr. SPROULE. This was for timber work as well ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No timber work.

Mr. SPROULE. No timber work at all ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No timber work at all.

Mr. HACKETT. Is the Westinghouse brake to be applied to all trains on the Prince Edward Island railway ?

Mr. EMMERSON. As my hon. friend will see there is an item for that purpose and we are putting them on as fast as the finances will permit.

Prince Edward Island Railway—To apply Westinghouse air brakes and air signals, $35,500.

Mr. EMMERSON. The amount asked for this year is $35,500. This amount is to equip locomotives and cars with the Westinghouse air brake. The passenger cars are at present equipped with the vacuum brake ? This system has gone out of use elsewhere. It has not the power of the compressed air break in retarding the progress or stopping a train and it has only an atmospheric pressure of 15 pounds to the square inch, while the air brake has a pressure of from 60 to 80 pounds to the square inch. The expenditure for 25 locomotives at $534 each $13,350, for six passenger cars at $140.50 each $8,507 and for freight cars, 413 at $85 each, $35,105. The total estimated cost is $57,025. The appropriation over the estimated expenditure for 1903-4 was $21,600. That leaves to be voted at this session $35,500. It will really be $35,425, but these are estimated amounts and I therefore make it in round figures.

Mr. BELL. Will that equip the whole of the service ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That will equip the whole of the service.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this done by contract or day labour ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The air brakes are purchased from the Westinghouse Company of Hamilton, Ontario, at their fixed, standard price. They are taken to the island and there put on the cars by the workmen in the machine shop connected with the Prince Edward Island railway.

Mr. SPROULE. What do you pay for the air brakes ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Of course these items include the cost to apply. The cost of equipping a locomotive is $534, and a freight car is $85.

Mr. SPROULE. What do you pay for the air brake ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not the figures as to what they charge, but I will furnish them to my hon. friend. The price can be ascertained from the bills that have been received. It is the standard price that is paid by all companies. This is a patent and it is not a matter in which there is any competition.

Mr. SPROULE. I take it there will be no competition in it because the company which hold the patent will necessarily have the only authority to sell this article and they will sell at their own price, but a statement of the price will enable us to ascertain whether we are paying more than the price which is paid by an ordinary railway company.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think we pay the standard price which is paid by other roads. I will furnish my hon. friend with that information.

Mr. SPROULE. There are several appliances for the safety of the employees of the road to put on freight and passenger cars nowadays. I would ask the hon. minister if the government have considered the advisability of equipping the Intercolonial Railway the same as the best roads owned by private corporations are being equipped to-day for the safety of the employees ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The general manager says they have on the Intercolonial railway all the appliances for the safety of the employees that are in general use on railways in Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. Automatic couplers, side ladders and all that ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. I presume you buy these air brakes ready to attach to the cars. I was going to ask the hon. gentleman how much he figured as the cost of attaching the air brake to the car.

Mr. EMMERSON. We buy the break complete with the exception that it has to be applied to the car and we pay all the cost of that, the necessary labour, piping and also the freight from the works at Hamilton.

Mr. WILSON. The hon. minister in estimating what this will cost surely must take into account what it will cost to attach the air brake to the car when he gets it. He has men in the shop attaching the air brake to the car, and if so, does he pay the same as a contractor would ?

Mr. EMMERSON. For a locomotive the whole cost is $534, and for a passenger car it costs $140.50 complete.

Mr. WILSON. You ought to be able to divide that up.

Mr. EMMERSON. And for a freight car $85. This is only a question as to the invoice price we pay. I have not that information, but I have promised to bring before the committee to-morrow or at the next meeting when we have the railway estimates under consideration, that return.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the minister promises to bring down a detailed statement of the cost of the whole thing ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Are the engines on the Prince Edward Island Railway fitted with the air brake ?

Mr. EMMERSON. This includes a vote for that purpose.

Prince Edward Island Railway—To increase accommodation at Charlottetown, $85,000.

Mr. HACKETT. What is the nature of the increased accommodation at Charlottetown ?

Mr. EMMERSON. For this purpose $87,000 was voted last year, and $2,000 of that was expended up to the 30th of June. The details were given last year, but if the committee wish I will repeat them.

Mr. LENNOX. It was not very fully explained last year.

Mr. EMMERSON. The following is the estimate : New station and covered platform, $55,000 ; additional freight shed accommodation, $5,000; additional land, $4,000.

Mr. WILSON. How much land ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We have not purchased it yet, but it is estimated that we can get the land for $4,000.

Mr. HACKETT. Has the minister decided upon the land which will be purchased at Charlottetown ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There are as usual differences of opinion as to what site should be selected, and I have not had the privilege of going there personally to form my own opinion.

Mr. HACKETT. Come over and see us ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I would like to, but I suppose I would have difficulty in satisfying all the opinions that might be expressed.

Mr. WILSON. The minister ought to know how much land he wants ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is not exactly determined how much land we should want, but I would rather not state the exact quantity because if we were to make any detailed statement as to that it might affect the financial situation as regards the price. There are two or three points where the station might be located and the officers think that $4,000 will purchase sufficient land.

Mr. WILSON. The minister ought to have some ideas as to the size of the station building ; he ought to know whether or not he will erect it on the site of the present station.

Mr. LANCASTER. The minister had better come out of the clouds and land on the earth, and tell us how much land he wants for this station. He asks $4,000 for this land and he coolly tells the committee that he does not know what it is for. Perhaps he does not want any land at all ; perhaps he will build the new station on the site of the old. The minister should give us some reasons for wanting this $4,000, or 4,000 cents for that matter. I confess that I do not think the hon. gentleman is dealing seriously with the committee. Time and again we have asked to-night for information, and we have been told that when the minister gets the money he will come to some conclusion later on. That is a pretty cool fashion in which to ask us to vote the people's money. I protest against the principle of this thing ; the minister is not on the land ; he is in the clouds.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is not a celestial railway.

Mr. LANCASTER. It won't be a terrestrial railway either unless the minister gets down to the earth, where he can tell us something that is not misty and mistic. These estimates have been treated all day as if they were a huge joke. Why should we be asked to vote $4,000 or 4,000 cents or one cent for that matter, until the minister has made up his mind as to where he is going to spend it and how he is going to spend it? This committee should know something of the circumstances surrounding the money they are asked to vote away for this purpose ; and until the minister makes up his mind, with the assistance of his officers, that he does want some amount, I for one think this item ought not to pass at all.

Mr. HACKETT. I would like to ask the minister if he is in negotiation with the owners of the land at the foot of Great George street for the purchase of their rights for a site for this station ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We have obtained prices on lands there. It is supposed that we shall require, in connection with the new station, between an acre and an acre and a half of land, and it has been estimated by the officers of the department that it should not cost more than $4,000. The total vote of last year was $87,000. That was under the same estimate as exists to-day. There was $11,000 for additional siding and the re-arrangement of the yard, $8,000 for additional wharf accommodation and dredging, and $4,000 for engineering and inspection. I cannot give anything more definite than that. The work has not been gone on with. I shall expect, in company with the officials, to visit the locality and determine finally the exact location of the proposed station. It is impossible to say at present just where it will be. It would not be wise, perhaps, even if I knew it. The point is that additional accommodation is required, and we propose to go on with the work if parliament votes the money.

Mr. WILSON. I gather from what the minister says that he intends to move the station to some other part of the city ; he has not told us why. He has not told us that he cannot get sufficient ground where the station is located now, or what he intends to do with the old station. If there is to be a new station built, especially in some other part of the city, we ought to have some reason for it.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have not said that the station is to be moved. In fact, I am frank enough to say that I have not been called upon to determine the question at all. If I am, and when I am, it is my purpose to endeavour to determine it in the public interest, and having regard to the trade interests of the island and the city of Charlottetown.

Mr. WILSON. Will the hon. minister tell us what is the matter with the present station ? Why is it that he wants more accommodation ? Is it for freight or passenger traffic ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is for all departments. As I am informed, the present station is entirely inadequate to the business requirements of Prince Edward Island and the city of Charlottetown.

Mr. WILSON. Is there any difficulty in getting land where the station is now ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It must be borne in mind that the general offices of the Prince Edward Island Railway are in the old building, and they require to be re-arranged to afford additional room and greater convenience. More yard room and more siding room are also required. This vote covers all these conveniences.

Mr. WILSON. The hon. minister has not told us whether or not he could get the land there.

Mr. HASZARD. As I know all about the situation in Charlottetown, I may say that the present station is altogether unsuited to the requirements of railway business, and at the same time it is placed on about the only piece of soft land that can be found in that part of the city. A few years ago the land about the present station had to be built up to such an extent that it was claimed that the water was turned on the other side of the street to such an extent that an action for damages was threatened against the Railway Department, and the department has since been threatened time and again. There is no doubt that the present site of the station is not at all suitable and will not be acceptable to the people. The difference between the Railway Department and the people of Charlottetown, so far as I can understand, is this. The railway authorities think they can utilize some of the land at present owned by the government and used as a railway yard. The people of the city feel that the station should be carried further west and built on high, dry land; and the reason why this matter has been delayed the last two or three years is because they cannot agree among themselves as to where the station should be built. As the hon. member for West Prince has said, they consider that at the foot of George street is the most suitable and acceptable, but for some reason or other the engineers claim that there are engineering difficulties in the way. I myself applied to the department about two months ago for a report on that site, but although I have been calling on the department a great many times since, I have not yet succeeded in getting it. I would like to have some assurance from the minister that the report will be furnished without delay.

Mr. WILSON. Have they got it in the department ?

Mr. HASZARD. I understand that they are preparing it. There is just this difficulty that the people have not been willing to accept the site which the Railway Department are desirous of using. If that site should be used, the Railway Department would require to buy a little more land in order to have sufficient room for the present works and the new station.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat says that the people of Charlottetown are not willing to accept some particular site. I do not understand what the people have to do with it in the sense he indicates. The people of the whole Dominion are called on to furnish a lot of money for some very indefinite, vague proposition, and it appears that the people of Charlottetown are in controversy with the government as to where the government should build the station. But if the government are able to run the railway, they ought to be able to decide where the station should be built, and take the responsibility of a decision without entering into any controversy with the people of Charlottetown. Until the government know where the station is to be built, they should not ask this House to allot an indefinite sum for the purchase of land that may or may not be required. The hon. minister has told us that he has given the House most definite information. But all he has told us is that certain sums are asked for to do certain things and certain other sums are asked for to do certain other things, but he does not say that any one of the sums asked for will be required to do any certain thing. He wants us to vote $4,000 for the purpose of buying land which may after all not be required. Three years ago, when I was in the city of Charlottetown I went to Summerside from the station in question, and unless the city has been built up very much in the neighbourhood of that station within the last three years, there should not be any difficulty in getting land there. It seemed to me that the station was on the outskirts of the city and that here was any amount of vacant land to be had in that locality at a very moderate price. I do not think the Minister of Railways ought to have a member like myself, from the Niagara district of Ontario, telling him about the condition of things in Charlottetown, nor do I think that he ought to have another member from Charlottetown giving him information. It is he who ought to give this House the information and who ought to be in a position to tell this House definitely what he proposes to do with the money and not leave us in doubt as to whether he will use the money or not. I could understand his telling us that he did not wish to make public the exact site he intended purchasing and the quantity of land he required, because that might give an opportunity to the owners of the land to hold the government up for an unreasonable price. But he does not say that. He will not say even that he wants the land at all and therefore I do not see why we should vote the money before the minister is in a position to tell us that the government have come to a decision, and actually shall require the amount they ask us to vote.

Mr. HACKETT. I desire to say, before the item is adopted—because there appears to be no disposition on the part of any hon. gentleman to pass this item——

Mr. LANCASTER. If we can get the information.

Mr. HACKETT. If we can get the information from the minister. The railway station at Charlottetown is really a disgrace to the Dominion. It is nothing but an old wooden shed which was built some thirty years ago. Whether the site is a proper one or not for a railway station is another question, but I believe that if the minister could secure land at the foot of Great George Street, below the Davies Hotel, that would be most convenient to the people, and I trust some action will be taken shortly in this connection. The hon. minister spoke about the land near the present railway station. Might I ask him if any action has been taken with regard to reclaiming the land within the past year, which is now covered by water ?

Mr. WILSON. I would like the minister to account for that $2,000 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That amount of $2,000 was the estimate made in February last of the probable expenditure up to June 30. I have not the details of it, but I shall furnish them to-morrow.

Mr. HACKETT. I would like to ask the minister about the reclamation of land at Charlottetown. For the last 30 years no one has thought of reclaiming that piece of land but just previous to the by-election of last winter, a number of men were placed on that work to fill up the hole with brush and stone in order to reclaim it. I would ask why the necessity arose ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was done with a view to making a yard there. This place required to be filled up with a lot of brush and during the winter season orders were given, some time before, to have the brush furnished. It could be done more cheaply if the brush was hauled on the snow and some stone piled on it. I think it was only a coincidence that there was an election ; I cannot be responsible for these coincidences.

Mr. HACKETT. The election was a coincidence in the first place and this came as a matter of business on the part of the government, and my hon. friend from Charlottetown (Mr. Haszard), for whom I have the greatest respect, received a large number of votes because the work was done at that time.

Mr. EMMERSON. Surely not, surely not. I would not expect that from the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. HACKETT. The people of Prince Edward Island are like the people of every other province, they do the best they can. I would like to ask the minister what wages were paid those men employed on that work?

Mr. EMMERSON. They were paid so much a load. My hon. friend knows that that brush had to be hauled across the harbour while it was covered with ice, and the people were paid so much a load for the brush and stone. It was not a question of labour ; it was a question of assembling a lot of brush and stone and filling in those places where filling was necessary.

Mr. HACKETT. After 30 years, on the eve of a by-election, the government found it necessary to fill up this hole as the minister calls it—and it is a hole. They are in a hole in regard to it. A number of labourers must have been employed who were not engaged in hauling the brush. If he looks over the statement sent in by his officers he will see that a number of men were employed at one dollar a day who were not hauling the brush. I see the minister yesterday took great credit to himself for doing so much for the labouring men of Canada. He said :

> Then also, in 1900 the labourers along the Intercolonial Railway were getting $1.10 to $1.15. I do not here refer to trackmen, because to some extent at least you would refer to them as skilled workmen ; I am now referring to labourers who would not be recognized in any way as requiring any skill in the performance of their labour other than strength and health and physique. These men in the year 1900 received an increase from $1.10 to $1.20 and since that time, during the current year they received a further increase to $1.30 and in many instances to $1.40 a day.

Now I would like to ask the minister if the men of Prince Edward Island who are engaged on this work have not the strength, the physique and the appearance of any men employed on the Intercolonial, and why are they not entitled to $1.25 or $1.30 a day? Having placed these men on that work at $1 a day, as he will find in his reports and as he stated in this House in answer to a question, he will simply be doing an injustice to the men of Prince Edward Island if he does not increase their wages to $1.25 per day.

Mr. EMMERSON. I will say to my hon. friend that the regular employees along the line of the Prince Edward Island Railway, the trackmen and the section foremen, are paid by the same schedule as are the men on the Intercolonial. I am not aware of the amount paid last winter for the particular work to which the hon. gentleman referred but if they were paid at that rate, it was because they worked very short hours. the teams employed in hauling the stuff were only employed during the winter days, and the men necessarily did not work a full day. They were only paid in accordance with the work they were performing.

Mr. HACKETT. Why was it necessary to fill in this hole at that particular time ?

Mr. EMMERSON. This stuff had to be hauled across the harbour or river, it had to be hauled before the ice broke up, and this place had to be filled up.

Mr. HACKETT. We have had winters for the past thirty years and we have had ice, and certainly if this hole required to be filled up it could have been done any time within the past thirty years. But the minister is more enterprising apparently than the ministers who have gone before him. Now this little place at Charlottetown is well known to everybody.

Mr. EMMERSON. That little place was only recently purchased.

Mr. HACKETT. It has been in the hands of the government for the past thirty years, as their property.

Mr. EMMERSON. That is the local government.

Mr. HACKETT. No, the federal government.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am informed that this property only recently became the property of the railway, within a very few months, and that previously it was owned by the provincial government of Prince Edward Island. The railway had nothing whatever to do with it. The work required to be done during the winter months, but the summer came on before the ice broke up, and the department found it necessary to commence this work immediately. The fact that an election was coming on was not a sufficient reason for delaying the work.

Mr. HACKETT. I know all about this business. That little corner between the railway and the gas house at Charlottetown has been overflowed with water for the last thirty years. It is the property of the federal government, and every year the sleepers bought by this government for the purpose of the track on the Island railway were thrown in there to be saturated with salt water in order that they might last longer. The hon. gentleman will find out that this is correct if he will consult his general manager who is beside him.

Mr. EMMERSON. I get my information from him.

Mr. HACKETT. I know all about it. On the eve of a by-election in March last, it was found necessary to close up this place to throw brush and stones into it in order that a certain number of people in Charlottetown might be employed in government work, and that their votes might be thus controlled by the government.

Mr. EMMERSON. If it was only brush and stone, it was not dust thrown in their eyes.

Mr. HACKETT. No, it was not dust, it was snow and ice. Surely the minister will understand that after this hole had remained there for thirty years there was no other reason for filling it up but the fact of a by-election coming on so that the government could control a few voters.

Prince Edward Island Railway—To enlarge freight shed at Breadalbane, $500.

Mr. EMMERSON. The requirements of this place call for a much larger freight shed. $500 is the total estimated cost.

Prince Edward Island Railway—To fit up locomotives and passenger cars for steam heating-$14,500.

Mr. EMMERSON. We require to fit up 27 locomotives for steam heating at a cost of $75 each, and 61 passenger cars at a cost of $200 each. The total estimated cost is $14,225.

Mr. BLAIN. How are these cars heated now ?

Mr. EMMERSON. With an ordinary stove. This vote will heat all the passenger cars. It is proposed to appropriate the whole amount this year, and we expect the work will be finished during the fiscal year.

Mr. BLAIN. Is it done by tender ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is done by mechanics in the repair shops.

Mr. HACKETT. Are there any cars at present heated by steam from the engine in Prince Edward Island ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Not on the Island.

Prince Edward Island Railway—To apply M. C. B. couplers to rolling stock, $26,500.

Mr. EMMERSON. This is to apply the standard coupler to the rolling stock. We propose to apply it to 22 locomotives at a cost of $25 each, to 61 passenger cars at a cost of $70 each, and to 413 freight cars at a cost of $50 each.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. For a coupler ?

Mr. EMMERSON. For a coupler.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. How many are there on the Intercolonial Railway not equipped with the coupler ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There are none on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Are all on the Intercolonial Railway equipped with a coupler ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Almost all have been equipped. There is a vote in the estimates now for the purpose. Ten snow ploughs, $50 each, and flangers, $50 each, making the sum total required $26,500.

Prince Edward Island Railway—Murray Harobur branch and Hillsboro bridge, $650,000.

Mr. HACKETT. Would the hon. gentleman explain this ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Last year there was a vote of $1,230,000. Of that down to June 30, 1904, it is estimated that the expenditure was $580,000. That leaves $650,000 to be revoted. The matter was very fully discussed at the last session of parliament. I can go into the details again if the members of the committee wish.

Mr. MONK. I would like to know how far the work has progressed, what remains to be done, and if this will finish it ? I remember the discussion that took place last year.

Mr. EMMERSON. The work is under construction now. It is expected it will be completed early this fall. I think the time for the completion of the work is December 30. The construction is going on, and I think going on quite rapidly now.

Mr. MONK. How far have they got ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think the whole line is graded down to Murray Harbour.

Mr. WILSON. What is the length of the whole line ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Fifty miles.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask whether the contract was let by tender, and if the work is under contract at the present time ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes ; a certain proportion of the line was originally put up to tender. Then the contractor, Mr. McManus, through an affliction, was unable to proceed, and it was determined not to accept his tender. I think in that we acted very wisely in all interests. A contract was entered into with Mr. Willard Kitchen, one of the tenderers. An extension of the contract was entered into then for the whole line at his figures down to Murray Harbour, and he is completing the work now. I think he is on the last six and a half miles.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know the reason why the contract was taken from the first contractor, but if it was taken from him I do not see why you did not ask for tenders to finish the job, instead of letting it to another contractor by private contract.

Mr. EMMERSON. The contract was not entered into with Mr. McManus at all, but the other tender was taken.

Mr. SPROULE. Was the other tender a larger one than Mr. McManus' tender ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, it was.

Mr. SPROULE. By how much ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There was very little difference, but there were very excellent reasons on the ground of the health of the party tendering, why the tender should not be accepted. There were special reasons given at the time, and as a result the other tender was accepted.

Mr. WILSON. Perhaps the hon. minister will tell us why there were two tenders asked for. Did you ask for tenders from two different contractors ? How did Mr. McManus come to be connected with it ?

Mr. EMMERSON. He was one of the tenderers.

Mr. WILSON. Was he the lowest ?

Mr. EMMERSON. He was the lowest.

Mr. WILSON. Was the contract awarded to him ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was not awarded to him, because the department thought it would not be wise to accept his tender and to entrust the work to him because of his condition of health.

Mr. WILSON. They do not always take the lowest tender, do they ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Unless there are exceptional reasons. I want to say that Mr McManus is a very great personal and political friend of my own, but his tender was not accepted for very good reasons in his own interest, and, as I believe, in the interest of the department, because I am sure it would never have done to have had the work carried on by him at that time.

Mr. WILSON. Was there a separate tender for the bridge, and if so, at what rate ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There was a separate tender.

Mr. WILSON. What was the bridge to cost ? Give us a little information at least as to what the tender was for the rest of it.

Mr. EMMERSON. The tenders were made up on the basis of schedule prices. There was not a lump sum quoted for the work, but there were prices quoted for works specifically required.

Mr. WILSON. But the engineers certainly, if there were schedule prices, gave the minister their estimate of the cost of the bridge

Mr. EMMERSON. The estimated cost of the bridge is $1,494,097 ; the estimated cost of the branch to the river, $926,460 ; the estimated cost of rolling stock, $200,000 ; the estimated cost of the extension to the harbour, $104,600 ; and the estimated cost of the cribwork wharf at the harbour, $69,955, making a total estimated cost of $2,795,113.17. Of that we have paid, including the estimated expenditure for 1903-4, $2,072,525.47. We will require for 1904-5 $722,587.70. We take a vote of $650,000 for next year.

Mr. BLAIN. What will be the total cost of the work including the bridge ?

Mr. EMMERSON. $2,795,113.17.

Mr. WILSON. Why does not the minister ask for enough money to complete the work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We did not wish to ask parliament for more than would be required in that time.

Mr. WILSON. Is it expected that the work will be finished during the fiscal year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It may not be found necessary to finish the crib-work wharf.

Mr. MONK. Will this complete the work ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No. $722,587.70 would complete it if we put in that crib-work wharf. We are only asking $650,000 in this main estimate.

Mr. MONK. What is the total amount of the contract ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The estimated total amount of the contract including the wharf is $2,795,113.17. There has been expended and paid for up to date including the estimated payments for the year ending 30th of June last, $2,072,525.47. That will leave a balance of $722,587.70, and in the main estimates we ask for $650,000. The wharf is a matter which is to be determined. The contract is such that we need not build it unless we deem it necessary.

Mr. MONK. Am I to understand that on the highway portion of the bridge no tolls will be paid.

Mr. EMMERSON. The provincial government is contributing the interest on the cost of that part of that bridge which is used as a highway, and I understand that they have a statute under which they can collect tolls.

Mr. MONK. What is the arrangement between the local government and the federal government as regards that ; it ought be a free bridge if possible. It seems strange that the local government should be able to collect tolls on a bridge which we are building. I have strong objection to tolls, because we suffer a great deal from that antiquated system in the city of Montreal. How does it come, that the local government by virtue of a local statute can collect tolls on a bridge which we are constructing.

Mr. WILSON. I would impress upon the minister the importance of having a free bridge. In these modern days there should be no tolls on any highway in Canada. Years ago we abolished them on the highways of the riding which I have the honour to represent.

Mr. HACKETT. We are retrograding when we ask the people of Prince Edward Island to pay tolls when crossing over this bridge. I agree with my hon. friends from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and from Lennox (Mr. Wilson) in their condemnation of tolls. Is the work on that bridge going on at the present time ?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite are justified in assuming that the local government will charge tolls on this bridge. I would point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) that the federal government is not bearing the whole cost of this bridge ; the local government is contributing the interest on the cost of that portion of it which will be used as a highway.

Mr. MONK. To whom is the interest being paid by the local government ?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. To the federal government when the bridge will be in operation. I presume it may be deducted from the provincial subsidies.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend does not know exactly what the terms of the arrangement are.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I know in a general way.

Mr. MONK. I understood the minister to say that the provincial government was entitled to collect tolls, that does not coincide with the statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) said that the federal government was providing the whole cost of that bridge.

Mr. MONK. There is no doubt of that ; my hon. friend (Mr. J. J. Hughes) admits it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. In one sense that would be right, but if the local government are paying the interest on a portion of the cost of the bridge, that portion would belong to them.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend assumes that because the local government are going to pay interest on the highway portion of the bridge, they will own that portion. I do not understand why they should. On the contrary, I think we shall own it ourselves.

Mr. WM. ROSS (Victoria). I think to collect tolls in this age is something wrong. It belongs to the dark ages, and should be abolished. I agree that it is a step in the wrong direction to collect tolls on any bridge in Prince Edward Island. We have no such savage remnant of the past in the whole province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MONK. I am very glad my hon. friend has come to my assistance. We have suffered a great deal from bridge tolls in the vicinity of Montreal, and we look upon them as an outrageous abuse—as a survival of the dark ages. We would like to abolish them, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has hitherto been an obstacle in the way. Willingly or unwillingly, he has not helped us as we expected he would to abolish these tolls. But I think we are entitled, before passing this item, to know what the arrangements are.

Mr. EMMERSON. The arrangements are embodied in chapter 7 of 63-64 Victoria of the Statutes of Canada, confirming an agreement made between the Minister of Railways of Canada and the Commissioner of Public Works of the province of Prince Edward Island. Under that agreement the provincial government is to pay so much money yearly to the Dominion government, and is to have control of and keep in repair the highway portion of the bridge, and to have the exclusive right to levy and collect tolls and charges for the use of the bridge if it desires to do so.

Mr. MONK. As I understand, the provincial government is not limited in its right to collect tolls, but can collect any amount it sees fit. In the vicinity of Montreal the amount of the tolls, at any rate, is limited. But I call my hon. friend's attention to this —and I do it very disinterestedly on the part of the people who will use that bridge —that in connection with this bridge an abuse is being created which we have been trying to abolish in the neighbourhood of Montreal for over thirty years, and which was established there shortly after the conquest. We have had there the creation of a trust, and tolls have been exacted mercilessly from the people and have gone in great part to pay the expenses of the trustees and of the administration generally. My hon. friend will notice that the provincial government is merely obliged to pay a certain fixed amount every year and to keep the wooden part of this bridge in repair. The bridge is certainly a work of general advantage to the people of Prince Edward Island. It has cost a great deal, and we have not finished paying for it yet. We have built it entirely at our own expense. It is therefore to be considered as a work for the general advantage of the Dominion. The obligation of the local government to keep the roadway planked and the wooden part of the bridge painted is very slight. I venture to say, from the experience that I have had, that that obligation in future will be largely lessened by the large amount of work which the federal government will have to perform upon that bridge. In the interest of the people of the island—and I am sure my hon. friend will support me in that—it will be a very great advantage to have that right of collecting tolls abolished and free circulation given to the people.

Mr. HACKETT. What is being done in connection with the Hillsboro bridge? Is the work going on?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HACKETT. I have read in the newspapers that one of the piers has settled somewhat and got out of line and that the contractor was not able to go on with the work.

Mr. EMMERSON. The newspaper was misinformed. He is going on with the work.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. The case of the Montreal Turnpike Trust is not parallel with the one in question. The Montreal bridge is owned by a road company, but this bridge will be owned by the people of Prince Edward Island, and it is entirely in their hands whether they shall charge tolls or not.

Mr. MONK. So it is with us.

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. The people of Prince Edward Island will no doubt be pleased with the sympathy which the hon. gentleman shows in their affairs, but this matter is entirely in their own hands. The government will not levy a toll if the people do not wish it.

Mr. MONK. Does not my hon. friend think it would be a great advantage to the people who are going to use the bridge, to have the certainty that no toll will be charged?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. That will be a matter for the people themselves to decide.

Mr. MONK. In the neighbourhood of Montreal the roads are government roads. They are under the control of the trusts who represent the government. On the Island of Montreal some of these trusts are appointed by the Minister of Finance and some by the local government; but as a matter of fact the roads to which I refer, and in connection with which the abuses I have condemned exist, are under the control of the people of the province of Quebec. It appears to me a pity that we should create an abuse among the people who are going to use this bridge. It would be better it should be a free bridge just as are the Interprovincial bridge here and others being built now.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. Perhaps it will.

Mr. MONK. What makes my hon. friend think it will? Had we not better, since we are paying for it, make sure of that now?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. The province is paying for it.

Mr. MONK. Is the province contributing in any measure to the construction of the bridge?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I do not want to split hairs. The province is paying the interest on the cost of that portion of the bridge.

Mr. EMMERSON. Unless the bridge be built, the people of Prince Edward Island will have to continue their ferry, which has been in operation there for generations, at the expense of the people, and the ferry costs the people a much larger sum than would these tolls. It is a matter of provincial arrangement. The people, I presume, will know what is best in their own interest; and as they are contributing a large amount, I do not see that we need worry ourselves about the matter.

Mr. FIELDING. In any case it is not the business of this government to supply free roads either to the people of Prince Edward Island or of Quebec. In this case the people of Prince Edward Island are giving a contribution which is supposed to represent the interest on the cost of constructing that portion. And whether they charge tolls or not is a matter for themselves to determine. If they like to tax themselves, that is their business and not ours.

Mr. MONK. That is the old argument we hear every time we ask for relief for the province of Quebec. My hon. friend says it is not the business of the federal government to provide free roads for the province of Quebec.

Mr. FIELDING. Or any other province.

Mr. MONK. It is unfortunate that he should argue in that way. He knows it is not our business either to lend money to the trustees of Montreal roads, but we have done that and we are to-day in this position, that we hold $200,000 of bonds of the Montreal Turnpike Trust on which the interest is not paid, and the masters of the situation are this government. The interest on those bonds has never been paid, and it is in the power of my hon. friend to say to the trustees of the Montreal roads and the local government: It is time this abuse shall cease and we are willing to forego our interest and the capital, provided the necessary reforms are made. Does my hon. friend pretend that when we are voting a sum of over $1,000,000 for the construction of a bridge, the whole cost of which we shall pay, it is not in our power to say: we will not vote that money unless there will be free circulation on the bridge for the people?

Mr. FIELDING. But my hon. friend overlooks the very important fact that we have already put in our conditions by a solemn agreement between this parliament and the parliament of Prince Edward Island. That agreement is signed, sealed and delivered. It suits the people of Prince Edward Island, and why we should be so anxious to prevent their paying tolls, I cannot understand. As to the Quebec case, we possibly have gone out of our way to lend money to the trustees of the Montreal turnpike road, but surely that is not an offence of which we should be accused. Surely my hon. friend does not consider that a crime.

Mr. MONK. No, but we stand in the position of a creditor who can impose on his debtor what conditions he chooses.

Mr. FIELDING. The one condition which my hon. friend is not willing to impose is that the debt should be paid or any part of it.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the debt is not collectable. I admit there is a distinction between the two cases, but it was only right that we should find out on behalf of the people of Prince Edward Island what are the conditions for the use of the bridge. There is an agreement in this case, but in that of the Montreal Turnpike there is none.

Mr. WILSON. How much did we pay per mile for the building of the railway? What was the contract price? I understood the hon. minister to say that the whole road was let by tender, but there is some doubt about it.

Mr. EMMERSON. $4,621 per mile. That is exclusive of the bridge and of the wharf, that includes rails and equipment.

Mr. WILSON. Was it all let by tender?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes; as I have explained.

Mr. INGRAM. That is surely not in keeping with the statements that have already been made to this House.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have stated it as I have stated it.

Mr. INGRAM. You are not sure of your ground.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have given the history of the matter just as I have now stated it.

Mr. WILSON. What I understood from the minister is that the lowest tenderer was to have got the contract, but the government judged that he was not fit to carry it out, and the next lowest tenderer was given the contract. Is that the case with the whole road?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was extended subsequently, as I stated before. The whole contract was given to the contractor who had received a portion of it at certain schedule rates, and it was continued to completion under that arangement.

Mr. WILSON. When I asked if this was tendered for in two different parts, I understood the minister to say no.

Mr. EMMERSON. I did not wish to convey a different impression from what I am telling my hon. friend now. They only tendered for a portion of the road originally, but it was extended to the contract for the remaining portion.

Mr. WILSON. Without tender?

Mr. EMMERSON. Without tender.

Mr. INGRAM. That is the truth?

Mr. EMMERSON. That is what I endeavoured to say.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman said in the first place, and led us to believe, that it was given by tender, when it was nothing of the kind.

Mr. EMMERSON. I did not wish to convey that impression, because I had stated differently earlier in the evening. I had given the facts before just as I have given them now.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the minister to say that the province pays $9,750 a year, which is supposed to be the interest upon the cost of the passenger traffic part of the bridge. Is that in perpetuity or for any definite length of time?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is unlimited.

Mr. SPROULE. We find that in many of these items the contracts are changed from the description given last year. The minister should tell us any changes that have been made since last year, if the contract has not been carried out on the same basis, for the same amount, and on the same principle ; and he should also tell us if the progress which has been made is commensurate with the original undertaking as to the completion of the contract at a definite period.

Mr. EMMERSON. There is no change in the contract from what it was last year.

Mr. SPROULE. The same amount ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The same rates are being paid this year as last.

Mr. SPROULE. The same rates ? I do not know whether the minister is designedly indefinite and thinks that that statement should satisfy the House, or whether he is innocently making indefinite statements. From his statements we cannot tell what kind of a contract has been entered into. Did the party who is now doing the whole work contract for a portion of it at schedule rates simply, and is he now working on schedule prices ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I want to be clear, and to give the facts as they are. I do not know whether it is my fault in trying to explain these things or my hon. friend's fault in understanding it. What I wish to say is that Mr. Kitchen tendered for a portion of this line ; the line was from a certain point in Prince Edward Island to Murray Harbour.

Mr. SPROULE. And everything on schedule prices ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Everything was on schedule prices. Only a portion of the line was tendered for in the first instance. Subsequently the whole line to Murray Harbour was given to that same contractor on those same schedule prices.

Mr. SPROULE. That might be very fair and might be very unfair. To illustrate, on some portion of the line the grading might be very difficult and on other portions very easy. There might be one kind of material in one place and another kind in another place.

Mr. EMMERSON. They are paid according to the material.

Mr. SPROULE. The schedule prices being so much per cubic yard. Supposing you commence moving this material and are first moving the very easiest kind, and pay the contractors 25 cents a yard. If you come to a hard place it would be worth a great deal more, and in order to determine whether the contract was properly let or not we should have some information as to the character of the ground over which this railway is to be built, whether it is uniform and likely to be of uniform cost in different parts. We have no information in regard to that. A man might take a small piece of work where it was very heavy, and the schedule price would not be high ; but if he extended that same work into a locality where there was an easy soil and where he did not have to remove the material to as great a distance, then the price would be relatively very much higher. We ought to know all of this, in order to enable us to determine whether the contract is a reasonable one or not.

Mr. EMMERSON. The schedule provides so much for rock, so much for earth and so much for other material, broken stone, etc.

Mr. SPROULE. Could the minister give us those prices ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I made a return of that some time ago to parliament. I have not the contract here.

Mr. HACKETT. In connection with the bridge, I would ask the minister whether there is a contract for the building of the substructure only, or for the building of the whole bridge ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There is one contract with Mr. Heney for the substructure and also a contract for the removal of the bridge from the Miramichi river to Prince Edward Island, and for the erecting of it on the substructure over the Hillsboro' river.

Mr. HACKETT. Who has the contract for the moving of the bridge ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Hugh Macdonald.

Mr. HACKETT. Will that bridge be quite wide enough to afford this carriage driveway alongside the railway, or will the bridge require to be extended ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There is a sidewalk apart from the bridge as it now exists, and a carriage way will interlock with the railway proper, the bridge not being wide enough to have a separate track.

Mr. HACKETT. Will there be a carriage driveway on either side of the bridge ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No, only on one side. Then there will be a passage for pedestrians, a sidewalk on both sides. That will be maintained by the local government.

Mr. HACKETT. Will this bridge over the southwestern branch of the Miramichi be quite sufficient to span the Hillsboro river ?

Mr. EMMERSON. There are two Miramichi bridges, the northwest and the southwest. They proved to be too light for very heavy engines, and therefore they are being removed. We are taking all of the southwest bridge and a portion of the northwest, and utilizing them for bridging the Hillsboro river. The material is just as good as a new bridge would be purchased outright, because if you were to purchase one outright you could not get a heavier class of bridge than the one you are now getting from the Miramichi.

Mr. HACKETT. What is the age of the bridge on the Miramichi river ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The line was opened, I think, in 1876.

Prince Edward Island Railway—New station at Alberton, $2,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. There were $3,000 provided last year, and the estimated expenditure during the year was $1,000. We require a revote of $2,000, and we shall still require to supplement this by $2,500 more. We are asking for tenders on three conditions, one to build in stone, one in brick and one in wood. The matter has not yet been finally determined, but I think it will be in favour of stone. The total cost will be about $4,500.

Mr. LENNOX. Is this a revote ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Last year $3,000 was provided, and we are now asking for $2,000. When these estimates were made out in February last it was supposed we would have $1,000 expended. But that has not been the case, because of delay in deciding on the quality of the material to be used. Therefore this vote should have appeared as $4,500 instead of $2,000. As it does appear here we are asking you to vote $2,000 with the understanding that $2,500 more will be provided in the supplementaries.

Mr. LENNOX. It does not appear in the estimates that there has been anything expended at all. The $3,000 voted last year and the $2,000 this year will make $5,000. Perhaps this is a mistake in the estimates as printed.

Mr. EMMERSON. Last year we did not expend anything.

Mr. SPROULE. Why don't you call it a revote ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have it marked here as a revote of $2,000. There appears to have been two or three errors of that kind made by the printers. They were not made in the Department of Railways and Canals. We estimated the expenditure in February last, and expected that the expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30 would be $1,000, and we therefore ask for a revote of $2,000. But it is now found in view of the material that we will likely use, that we will require this $2,000. We have not expended a dollar of the vote of last year, and we will require $2,500 more, making a total expenditure at that point of $4,500.

Mr. SPROULE. We know the amount will be $4,500. But I understand the minister to say he has not expended a dollar of the usual vote given last year. Then that is wrong to begin with, and leaves a wrong impression upon the minds of the committee. Have you no proof reader to go over the amounts after they are printed ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We do not have anything to do with them. We send over our estimates to the Finance Department and they are sent forward to the Printing Bureau. They do not come back to us.

Mr. LENNOX. I trust the minister will take some precaution to see that this does not occur again. Here we have $2,000 when it ought to be $3,000, he should have asked a revote of $3,000. Then there is a mistake in the other column of $2,000 at all events. Now, there are various items showing the same error. It makes a material difference in testing what is the actual expenditure of the government.

Mr. EMMERSON. I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. HACKETT. Has any action been taken with regard to building this new station at Alberton ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Tenders have been received, but the contract has not been awarded because we have not yet decided whether to use wood or stone.

Mr. HACKETT. I trust the minister will build a first-class station there.

Mr. EMMERSON. We hope to.

Mr. HACKETT. Now, with regard to another matter. Has any action been taken to avoid the Y coming into that station ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. HACKETT. Have you a report on it from any of your officers ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, I have a report from the officer.

Mr. HACKETT. Will the hon. minister do what he possibly can to abate the nuisance ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, if it is possible to do so we will certainly do it.

Mr. BLAIN. Will this $4,500 complete the building including heating and lighting apparatus ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Everything. We believe that $4,500 will be the whole expenditure.

Mr. BLAIN. What proportion will go for heating and lighting ?

Mr. EMMERSON. It will be heated by stoves. There will be no hot water system.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. minister to say that $4,500 is likely to be the full cost but he told us previously that he had an estimate for a building in wood, another in brick and another in stone. Which material did he contemplate using when he made up the estimate of $4,500 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am basing that on the idea of utilizing stone.

Mr. SPROULE. If other material is used it will cost less ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HACKETT. There was an amount voted last year for building small stations at Richmond, Northam and Alberton. Are these works being proceeded with ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, they will be completed within the fiscal year.

Mr. HACKETT. The contracts have been let ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, months ago. The works are under contract and they have to be finished within the time to be paid out of the appropriation of last year.

Mr. HACKETT. The important thing is to have the accommodation for the people before the stormy weather commences in the fall of the year. I would like to have that attended to.

Mr. EMMERSON. They will have to be completed now in order to be paid out of this appropriation.

Prince Edward Island Railway—Survey of Montague bridge, $500.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the minister what is the meaning of this item ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Last year there was $2,000 provided. Here is where another error occurs in making up the estimates. This is a survey of a proposed branch line of railway and there was $1,500 expended on it up to the 30th June. That was the estimated amount and we anticipate that amount will be required. That leaves $500 unexpended and we are asking for this re-vote.

Mr. SPROULE. It should be marked 'revote.'

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes. I think there have been four or five errors of that kind in the estimates.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the $1,500 expended on ?

Mr. EMMERSON. In making a survey of this proposed branch of railway from Cardigan to Montague bridge.

Mr. HACKETT. I desire to bring to the notice of the hon. minister the building of a branch line of railway from O'Leary to the west shore of Prince Edward Island, about 12 miles in length. The hon. minister will remember that for several years past I have brought this matter up in this honourable House and that it has been received favourably by the government. I would like to ask him if he intends to have a survey made ?

Mr. EMMERSON. That matter has already been brought to my notice by the people of Prince Edward Island. Senator Yeo and others have presented petitions and made representations in reference to it. It is having the consideration of the department and I shall be very happy to announce any decision later on that may be reached in respect to the matter.

Mr. HACKETT. I asked a question myself in connection with this matter in the early part of the session and the hon. minister said then, about three months ago, that it was under consideration. He has been considering it ever since. I cannot get any definite answer from him. I have a resolution passed by the people of that section of the country who are suffering from the want of proper facilities for the transportation of their produce and other things. It is as follows :

At a meeting held in Springfield Hall, lot 8, Prince Edward Island, on March 9th, 1904 for the purpose of discussing the question of a branch line from the main line of the Prince Edward Island Railway to Cape Wolfe on the west shore of the island, the following resolution was moved by Mr. W. J. Wortman, seconded by Mr. Stephen McEachern, and carried unanimously, to be presented to the Minister of Railways through our representatives at Ottawa :—

To the Hon. H. R. Emmerson, Minister of Railways, Ottawa.

May it please your Honour.

Whereas, a largely signed petition of the electors of townships No. 7, 8 and 9 praying for a branch line of railway from the main line of the Prince Edward Island Railway at or near O'Leary station to Cape Wolfe on the west shore of the island, was forwarded to the Department of Railways during the session of 1903.

And whereas, the prayer of the petition has not received the consideration of the government.

Therefore, resolved, that the electors of townships No. 7, 8 and 9 desire to impress on the Minister of Railways the urgent needs of this section of the province, as stated in the petition of 1903, and the necessity of complying with the prayer of the said petition during the present session of parliament.

(Sgd.) W. T. COSTAIN,
PETER J. BULGER Chairman.
Secretary.

Springfield, lot 8, March 9, 1904.

I would like the hon. minister to do something to relieve these people in their necessities as they present them in this resolution and as they have been shown by the petition sent to the hon. minister himself.

Mr. SPROULE. As we are having morning sittings and it makes a pretty long day, and as we have got through with a pretty good share of the business to-day I would suggest that the committee might rise.

Mr. EMMERSON. I was going to make that suggestion to my hon. friend. We have covered quite a number of items to-day and we cannot work too long at night. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up to-morrow ?

Mr. FIELDING. We expect to continue the estimates of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.
