HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 5, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

SPRING!

Mr. Ray Perrault (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of utmost urgent importance. It has to do with a meteorological and horticultural phenomenon occurring at this very moment on the west coast of this nation, in the province of British Columbia. Evidence of this approaching event was delivered into our hands today as British Columbia members, aided by the Greater Vancouver Visitors and Convention Bureau, provided each and every member of this House with his own sample for study and contemplation.

What I am about to announce, Mr. Speaker, will bring joy to all our hearts, locked as we are in the apparently inexhaustible grip of winter. Spring has shown itself on the Pacific coast! There is absolutely no doubt about it. Daffodils and crocuses are blooming in profusion in greater Vancouver, Burnaby, the Fraser Valley, in the Islands of the Gulf of Georgia and in the gardens on Vancouver Island. If this can happen in British Columbia, it can happen in the rest of Canada. Let us not lose hope.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member also rising on a flowery point of order?

Mr. Caouette: If things are so nice in British Columbia, it is because they have a Social Credit government.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PEDDLE—PRIOR ANNOUNCEMENT OUTSIDE HOUSE OF SETTLEMENT OF TRADE DISPUTE WITH MEXICO

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, this is a rather unserious setting for a serious piece of business. I rise on a question of privilege. I intend to follow my few brief remarks with a motion. On Thursday, February 26, I directed a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding a trade dispute between Canada and Mexico which threatened to have a very grave economic effect on the newsprint industry in the riding which I represent. I was assured by the minister that negotiations to resolve the dispute were to take place and that the House would be kept informed.

At 2 p.m. yesterday, March 4, the Secretary of State for External Affairs tabled in the House an announcement of a settlement of the dispute, and copies were quite properly provided to the Press Gallery after it had been made. However, the announcement was released to the Newfoundland press by the Minister of Transport at approximately ten o'clock yesterday morning, four hours previously.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Peddle: The Minister of Transport acted quite improperly, in my opinion. He used his office to obtain information which, for political reasons, he released some four hours before it was made available to this House. I, and a number of my hon. friends, continued to deal with the numerous expressions of concern from my constituents right up to the opening of the House yesterday, with no way of knowing that the question had been resolved. A minister of the Crown was aware that a settlement had been reached and had announced it publicly four hours previously, extracted his pound of political flesh and clapped his hands gleefully.

There are a number of other serious implications in the fact that this news was released in one province of Canada four hours before it was released in the nine other provinces; I need not go into detail as to that aspect. My motion, seconded by my hon. friend from Gander-Twillingate, if necessary, is that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador has filed the notice required by the Standing Order. The Chair has thus had an opportunity to consider the circumstances on which the hon. member's question is based.

As he has explained, there had been an undertaking by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the House would be kept informed of developments concerning the imposition of a surcharge on certain textiles entering Canada. Such information was conveyed to the House yesterday, pursuant to the minister's undertaking. The difficulty stems from the fact that prior to the tabling of the press release on the subject, the Minister of Transport had made an announcement outside the House.

In so far as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned, his undertaking seems to have been met by the tabling of the announcement at the opening of yesterday's session. The question is whether the prior announcement by a minister constitutes a breach of privilege.

I have on occasion referred hon. members to Citation 113 of Beauchesne and also to the views expressed by Sir Erskine May at page 45 of the 17th edition of the author's book on parliamentary practice. Without going into the details of these citations, I would remind hon. members that parliamentary privilege is the sum of the fundamental rights of the House and of its individual members over and above the common law rights of other citizens. Seen in this light, parliamentary privilege or the breach thereof cannot be claimed lightly. Indeed, Citation 113 of Beauchesne states specifically that a question of privilege ought rarely to come up in Parliament.

In the same citation, Beauchesne suggests that such a question should be dealt with by a motion giving the House power to impose a reparation, or impose a remedy. What reparation or what remedy would result from a referral of this question to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or any other committee of the House is difficult to see.

It seems to me that the only action which could be taken would be to condemn the action of the minister, and this, I suggest, can only be done by way of a substantive motion. Again, there are many precedents to support this suggestion. My conclusion is that although the hon. member may have a grievance, or may wish to question the propriety of the minister's early announcement, there is not a prima facie case of privilege which should be investigated by a committee.

I should add that perhaps the kind of situation or circumstances to which the hon. member has alluded might very well be the subject of debate under the motion standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition which will be considered by the House later today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RATIFICATION OF NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY BY CERTAIN NATIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the House in order to welcome an historic development marking the most important achievement to date in the field of arms control. I refer to the ceremony in Washington this morning and to the similar ceremony in Moscow today during which instruments of ratification of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty are being deposited by the United States, the Soviet Union and a sufficient number of other states to bring the treaty into force.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: This convention is the culmination of more than five years of negotiations in which Canada played a significant role. Canada ratified the treaty on January 8, 1969 and was in fact the first nation with a technological capacity to produce nuclear weapons to renounce this weapons option by ratifying the non-proliferation treaty. We shall continue to stress the importance of adherence to the treaty by those states that already have or are close to attaining the technological capacity to produce nuclear weapons—the so-called "near-nuclear" nations.

Canada welcomes the coming into force of this treaty and urges all countries to make it an effective means of counteracting the dangers inherent in the proliferation of nuclear weapons. We hope that those nations which have signed the treaty but not yet ratified it, as well as those which have not yet signed, will proceed to ratification and to implement its safeguards provisions designed to preclude proliferation. Finally, we hope and expect that, in accordance with Article VI of the treaty, this substantial step forward will inspire renewed efforts to curtail the arms race.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This is a very significant day. While we must, of course, bear in mind, as I am sure we will —indeed, this announcement constitutes a reminder to us—how much yet remains to be done before we can feel that we really have effective control of nuclear weapons or their proliferation in the world, nevertheless this is a step about which we can be very pleased.

I think it is appropriate, as we welcome this development, to bear in mind not only the effort made by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs but also those of his predecessors, going back to the days of the Hon. Howard Green, all of whom were concerned about atomic weapons and their proliferation. Neither must we forget the efforts of the devoted officials of the Department of External Affairs. As I say, I am happy today to associate myself with the remarks of the minister.

Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, true that every citizen in every part of the world will be happy to hear that the non-proliferation treaty has at last been ratified by a sufficient number of states to bring it into force. I join with the Leader of the Opposition and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in greeting the importance of this event.

I am sure I am not saying anything more than is in the hearts and minds of every member of this House when I warn that we should not become too complacent about this treaty, first, because it touches a matter which is not as basic to the problem of the nuclear arms threat as some other matters; second, because important nations in the world have not ratified the treaty, one of them being France and another China, so that the family of nations under this treaty is still very dangerously incomplete and, third, this treaty, like the test ban treaty, only touches the periphery of the problem of the threat of the nuclear destruction of humanity. It merely indicates the need for further steps and discussions in SALT and at the disarmament conference in Geneva.

In brief, while I join everybody else in greeting the importance of this day, I am conscious of the fact that it is a small and relatively less important step toward relieving the world of the danger of nuclear destruction, than the very important and much more difficult steps that lie ahead.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): We are glad to endorse the comments made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We rejoice at this historic event which is the most important accomplishment so far in the field of arms control.

We are certainly glad to see that Canada, which ratified the treaty in January 1969, was in fact the first nation to ratify this treaty, because we were the first nation with a technological capacity to produce nuclear weapons to renounce this weapons option by ratifying the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Speaker, Canada stands as a shining example for humanity, because this treaty will certainly help men refrain from killing each other, as could easily have been the case.

It is with pleasure therefore that we join the government and the leaders of the other parties in welcoming this achievement.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1969-70

A Message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates (B) for the financial year ending March 31, 1970, was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

[Later:]

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move, seconded by Mr. Drury, pursuant to Standing Order 59:

That, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order (58)15, the Supplementary Estimates B for the year ending March 31, 1970, tabled in the House this day, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT ON CONDITIONS IN TORONTO OFFICE

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): On Monday, Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and the hon. member for Greenwood, I agreed to make a statement in the House today to ascertain whether or not there was any delay in the servicing of unemployment insurance claims in the Toronto area. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings mentioned that such a delay would be due to the rapid rise in unemployment in Metropolitan Toronto, while the hon. member for Greenwood was concerned about the long delays and queues which have accumulated in the Toronto office. He suggested special measures including a larger staff and more interpreters.

The answer, as supplied to me by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, is very detailed and very lengthy, and in view of the fact that the estimates of the Unemployment Insurance Commission will be before the appropriate committee in a very short time I would like to reserve this lengthy statement until that time. Nevertheless, I think it is fair to both hon. gentlemen that I touch briefly on some of the contents of this statement.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission points out that the volume of payment of unemployment insurance tends to increase during the winter months because of seasonal lay-offs in various industries. As the pattern is a repeating one, the Unemployment Insurance Commission plans its workload accordingly and it is wrong to imply that increased workloads in winter are unforeseen and unplanned. Since January, 1970, the increase in new claims over the comparable months last year was under 700. The active claims increased by a little more than 8,000. In anticipation of this increased work load the Unemployment Insurance Commission increased its normal complement of 330 regular employees by 130 seasonal employees. This is approximately 50 more than last year.

The hon. member for Greenwood pointed out the inconvenience and the hardship of queues in long lines at the UIC office. In order to reduce these long line-ups the UIC recently added a telephone service in order to avoid the necessity of people coming to the office, sometimes at great inconvenience to these people. There are at present 16 telephone lines to handle incoming calls only and an additional 10 lines to handle outgoing inquiry calls. There are also 80 other telephones in the Toronto office. It may be useful to note that the total inquiries by telephone and in person are in fact lower this January than a year ago.

In the case of the line-ups, members may recall that before the UIC introduced service by mail the larger Toronto offices would handle 6,000 to 7,000 personal callers per day necessitating line-ups that extended out onto the street and around the corner. Now, under the postal system, calls to the office number 500 to 600 on peak days, or approximately 70 to 80 per hour. Last week when a press photographer called at the office to take a picture of people waiting in line, he left without photographs because there were fewer than ten people waiting in line, and he felt that this did not dramatize it in the way intended.

The necessary forms that must be completed by claimants have been greatly improved and more than half the questions on the forms are questions related to identification of the claimant. Furthermore, the commission has recently revised a great number of form letters in order that the language be made less technical and more easily understandable to everyone.

Most inquiries arise because claimants fail to qualify because of insufficient contributions or employment in non-insurable employment and not because of commission delays.

In short, people are now able to deal with the UIC by mailing in their forms which, if properly filled out, result in speedy payment, also by mail. In addition, callers no longer have to come to the office to make personal inquiries. Those who report to the office do so voluntarily to obtain general information.

Forms are available at the Post Office, Canada Manpower Centres and in some union halls.

I should like to shorten this statement. Statistics kept by the commission indicate that claimants are paid consistently within three weeks of the date of initial claim for 97 per cent or more of claims. This is an even higher proportion than last year. For example, on January 12 only 2.8 per cent of the claims filed in the third previous week were still pending and only 12 claims of 4,458 were still pending from the fourth previous week.

I have other similar statistics which I shall skip over. On February 23, the last total I have, only 1.6 per cent were unsettled at the end of three weeks and 6 of 6,407 were pending from the fourth previous week.

Both official languages are available to claimants in the Toronto office. In addition, several of the employees speak a number of the more common languages in the Toronto area. Efforts will be made to identify these employees in order to facilitate the problems of new Canadians who are not yet fully conversant in either of the official languages. It is not unusual for 10 to 12 languages to be spoken at one time or another by claimants, admittedly creating a problem in communication. Nevertheless, the commission has always been ready to do what it can to secure help in interpretation as required.

Several information publications are now being written in several languages to assist in educating insured persons concerning unemployment insurance requirements and how to go about filing and receiving unemployment insurance.

• (2:30 p.m.)

The Toronto office is presently located on Dufferin Street in temporary premises. It is the intention of the commission to split into two separate offices in the area of Toronto, one of which will be located on St. Clair Avenue and the other in the west end of the city. This will be done before next winter.

I have already arranged for the physical facilities of UIC offices across the country to be made more comfortable for applicants and the general public visiting these offices.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize again that the UIC is perfectly capable of coping with current workloads of claims. Both its staff and its systems are such that they can meet any emergency which may arise because of particular circumstances in an industry or an area. There will always be cases where for lack of complete records or particular circumstances, such as for one claim following a previous claim, a longer time is required to process the payments. These cases are serious for the people affected and everything possible is being done to minimize this problem.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the statement the minister has just made concerning conditions in the Unemployment Insurance Commission office in Toronto. I also thank the minister for sending me a copy of the statement.

The very fact that there is an increase of 700 new claims and of 8,000 active claims over the figures in the same month a year ago illustrates the serious unemployment situation in Toronto. I cannot understand nor, I am sure, can the people of Toronto, why a city the size of Metropolitan Toronto has only one unemployment insurance office and that a temporary office on Dufferin Street. Surely a city the size of Toronto needs at least two offices, and I am glad the minister is making arrangements to open a second office. However, here we are locking the door after the horse has been stolen. This should have been done long ago for a city the size of Toronto.

The office of the UIC is doing much to relieve the serious situation. We are glad to hear that more telephones have been installed and we are pleased to learn that new forms have been introduced. The forms which claimants have had to complete in the past could only be figured out by a Philadelphia lawyer. Too many questions were put in too small a space poked full of holes for computers purposes. In many cases the holes went through the words printed on the cards, which made questions difficult to understand. No wonder people had all kinds of trouble in filling out these forms. I am glad the minister has revised them.

The minister said that only a small percentage of applicants have not had their unemployment insurance claims paid. The percentage may be small but the number of people is very large, and the very fact that a person with a family of five or six children to feed and clothe has to wait three weeks for his unemployment insurance is intolerable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: Thirty-buck Benson.

Mr. Hales: The new office which Toronto is to have will not be ready until next year so that the unemployed in the area will have to manage with just one office for the rest of the year. It is regrettable that the Unemployment Insurance Commission did not have sufficient foresight to prepare itself for the present situation. I am glad to hear that the minister is doing the best he can under the circumstances.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am naturally delighted at the minister's announcement which indicates a sensitive reaction to the criticism by members of the opposition of the situation which has developed in regard to unemployment insurance in light of the very substantially increased numbers of unemployed. I think the figure is over 30 per cent in Metropolitan Toronto, which indicates a much larger increase than the usual seasonal one.

It seems to me it is of the utmost importance in this as in other fields where the individual citizen confronts the state or its representatives that he be assured that his rights and his feelings are being treated with respect. Justice should not only be done but should be seen to be done. Employment in today's world is so important, both to the maintenance of income and to the maintenance of self-respect, that unemployment is a traumatic experience.

In the past, as I know very well myself and as the minister's statement indicated, unemployed people have been subjected to delay, frustration and discomfort because of their difficulties in completing forms, in attending inadequately staffed offices and in having to wait in line and often to return from time to time. There are other problems such as transportation which may seem small but are serious when there is only one small office for a vast area like Metropolitan Toronto. These problems will have to be considered.

I am very pleased that steps have been taken and are being taken to remedy the situation, and I sincerely hope they will be effective.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, we are also pleased with the measures that have just been announced by the Minister of Labour who is responsible for Unemployment Insurance offices.

Many members have been aware of the problems concerning unemployment insurance for a long time. We are happy to learn that the minister is ready to take the necessary steps in order to make the application forms for benefits understandable to citizens of various ethnic groups who have to deal with Unemployment Insurance offices.

However, the statement made me realize as it did for the previous speakers that the problems about unemployment insurance are increasing because of technical reasons, but also because of the present economic conditions in Canada. In fact, the Minister of Labour can improve the methods, personnel and working conditions in the Unemployment Insurance offices with a view to providing better services to the claimants; however, if the economic conditions deteriorate before the department has been able to achieve the proposed improvements, we will keep on losing ground.

I must also recognize that the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the subject dealt with by the minister just now, has installed long-distance telephone systems in some cities, in order to allow the claimants to describe their problems more readily to UIC officials.

Besides, UIC officials have told us that the Department went too fast in establishing a Canada-wide system of computers in regional offices, particularly in larger centers such as Montreal which covers the whole province of Quebec.

They say also that the computer system was initiated prematurely and in too many places at once, instead of limiting it to one region in order to detect its flaws and then confidently establishing it in the other regions.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister to see that the computers operate as soon as possible in order that the thousands of claims which have been pending for weeks or months may be settled.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING OF REPORT ON PARLIAMENTARY RETIREMENT ALLOWANCES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to lay on the table of the House a report on parliamentary retirement allowances prepared by Dr. C. A. Curtis, Emeritus Dean of Queen's University, and delivered to my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, while we are still on motions, I would ask the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) if he could not avail himself of this opportunity to make a statement concerning the postal situation, with regard to both the G. Lapalme Inc. case and the postal union which would permit hon. members to ask questions in due course.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I will be ready to answer any kind of question.

[English]

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1970

MEASURE TO SUPPLEMENT PENSIONS

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-194, to provide supplementary retirement benefits for certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and to amend certain Acts that provide for the payment of those pensions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CONTINUANCE OF OPERATIONS OF E.M.I. COSSOR PLANT—TAKEOVER OF FAIREY AVIATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had a question or two for the Prime Minister, but I really could not expect them to be within the knowledge of an Acting Prime Minister, so I would ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am at a complete loss to understand how anybody could take any offence at that. It is a simple statement of fact—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: To make it clear, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to cast any aspersion on the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I simply meant to state the information would be peculiarly within the knowledge of the Prime Minister.

I would like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether his department proposes to take any steps to assure the continuance of the operations of the plant owned by E.M.I. Cossor in the Halifax region? I ask this question not only because of its regional significance but because in the closure of this plant, along with the closure of Fairey Aviation, the Department of National Defence would seem to have a very acute interest.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Acting Prime Minister would be the most competent one to answer, but if the Leader of the Opposition would be satisfied with a less informative answer I can inform the House that a few departments here in Ottawa are negotiating right now with the government of Nova Scotia, and we hope we can keep this plant in use.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. Let us find out whether the Acting Prime Minister can answer as intelligently. Can the Acting Prime Minister indicate—

An hon. Member: Have you got an intelligent question?

Mr. Forrestall: I do have a fairly intelligent question, Mr. Speaker. I think it is fairly intelligent. I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether or not the government is taking any steps to protect Canada's financial investment on research, development, modification and sophistication of the variable depth sonar? Has the government taken any steps to protect that expertise for Canadian use?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister would say what I am going to say, namely, that is the sort of question that might be put on the order paper.

Mr. Forrestall: You don't know the facts. I wish to direct a further supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Development. When will the minister be in a position to make some announcement to the House, and to the people of the metropolitan area of Halifax-Dartmouth, about the intentions of Bell in connection with their takeover of the Fairey plant?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any date.

Mr. Forrestall: As a final supplementary question may I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration what in God's name he is going to do with the 1,200 or 1,400 unemployed people there?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion related to negotiations with the provinces. Inasmuch as the minister was not sure yesterday what was taking place with respect to Saskatchewan, could he explain to the House the progress of the negotiations with that province with respect to making the facilities of his department available to northern Saskatchewan?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are negotiating with the ten Canadian provinces to determine special areas in connection with development programs. We expect that operations will start on April 1 next. I do not have the details of the proposed agreements which the provinces will have to sign, but even if I had them, I would not make them known before signature of the instruments by the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Another supplementary, if I may, Mr. Speaker. The minister, as I understood him to say, indicated there are agreements in existence with some provinces—from his gesture I take it he did not really say that.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF DENISON MINES BY U.S. INTERESTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. What is the purpose of the negotiations between the government and the Roman and Hudson's Bay interests? Is the purpose to enable these two corporations to consummate the arrangement which they originally had in mind despite the policy announced by the Prime Minister the other night?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, would the minister inform the House why the government considers it necessary to negotiate with a corporation seeking to sell an interest in another corporation to still another corporation? Why is the government involved in this kind of matter?

Mr. Greene: Well, Mr. Speaker, these corporations and their officials wished to see us after the announcement by the Prime Minister, and as with any citizens we are always happy to see them about their problems.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he can now, and if he cannot now whether he would at an appropriate time under motions, tell the House what he meant by the statement that it may be possible for Roman and Hudson's Bay to carry out their intentions so long as the uranium remains in Canadian hands? Exactly what is it the minister was aiming at in that suggestion to the people of Canada?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I think the statement of the Prime Minister speaks for itself. The government has announced its decision that this vast deposit of uranium should remain in Canadian hands, and if there is anything we can do to assure that continuity certainly the government will be very glad to be helpful in that regard.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Since he has recently shown his interest for wheat growers by assuring them grants totalling $100 million, would he tell the House whether or not he is now urging the Canadian government to give back to milk producers the $10 million cut from their subsidies?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this question has been asked a number of times.

Mr. Baldwin: Why not answer it, then? This is supposed to be a question and answer period.

[Translation]

DAIRYING—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary.

Does the Minister of Agriculture think he will be in a position to announce the dairy policy for 1970-71 by March 31, 1970?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It will be announced before the new dairy year begins on April 1.

DAIRYING—PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS TO CURTAIL PRODUCTION

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the serious problem of overproduction in the dairy industry, is the government going to follow a policy for that industry similar to the policy of payment for not planting as announced for wheat producers and initiate payments to dairy producers, to curtail production instead of letting the dairy industry suffer the present penalties for overproduction?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Department of Agriculture are completing their discussions with the various marketing industries in the provinces as well as with Dairy Producer Representatives to find a better way of keeping production and consumption in balance.

Mr. Baldwin: No doubt so that the minister need not make a statement.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government going to give the $10 million to the dairy producers on condition that they do not milk their cows?

Mr. Baldwin: Or the taxpayers.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

FINAL PAYMENT ON DURUM WHEAT

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio who answers for the Wheat Board. Because of the concern of the Durum wheat producers of western Canada, will the minister inform the House if it has been decided that the board will make a final payment to the producers from the surplus now in the Durum wheat account?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The estimates tabled earlier today show that the government proposes to allow a sufficient amount to make up the deficit in the wheat, oats and barley accounts in last year's pool in such a way that the surplus which has accumulated to the Durum account will be payable to the Durum producers.

[Later:]

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise whether the amount of money available for the Durum wheat producers will be the $6 million the producers are expecting.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it should be in that order or perhaps a little more.

An hon. Member: Should it not be $48 million?

CLOSING OF SPRING-WHEAT POOL

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate on what date the pool for spring wheat will be closed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Mackenzie on a supplementary.

Mr. Korchinski: It is a related question, Mr. Speaker, and not necessarily a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: I believe quite a number of hon. members wish to ask supplementaries and they ought to have the opportunity of asking them. The hon. member for Peace River.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ALLEGED HARASSMENT OF ALBERTA FARMERS MAKING DELIVERIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, will the minister consult with the Wheat Board and also with his colleague, the Solicitor General, and inquire into allegations that the RCMP is harassing farmers on the Alberta side of the Peace River who have licences to deliver and are attempting to deliver grain on the British Columbia side of the river?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into the hon. member's suggestion.

WHEAT—CONGESTION AT MEADOW LAKE SHIPPING POINTS

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board. Has anything been done to alleviate the difficulties experienced at some shipping points in the constituency of Meadow Lake? I have received a letter today which says that the elevator has been filled to congestion since December 18 last and since then only one car of grain was loaded to make space for turning elevator stocks—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should not read the letter but ask his question directly. I believe he has already asked his question.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): The point is that these farmers are on a unit quota and many have not been able to haul even one load in this crop year. I wonder if the minister has looked into the seriousness of this situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this point to my attention. We try to bring to the attention of the Wheat Board all those delivery points where difficulties seem to be occurring, and the board tries to draw up a program for moving grain from those points where it has not been moving.

WHEAT—REVISION OF ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the proposals made and the problems raised in the debate on Monday on the government's wheat acreage reduction program, what steps is the minister taking to deal with these matters? Will he be making a further statement announcing any revisions to the program?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member he is inviting the minister to make a general statement. Perhaps the minister should indicate simply whether such a statement might be made on motions.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make a statement at present on motions. Of course, regulations in connection with the plan are being developed. We had taken into consideration before the debate most of the points which were raised the other night.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the widespread confusion on the Prairies as a result of the minister's statement—

Mr. Baldwin: And in the government.

Mr. Korchinski: —how soon will the government make clear to the people concerned what is to be done?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, an outline of the program is being prepared and should be available for mailing to permit holders in the near future. This will counteract the confusion which has been spread by hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not deal with one part of the question I asked previously. I was inquiring as to what steps the government is taking, in response to certain proposals made and certain problems which were raised in the debate on Monday. Is the government considering making any changes in its announced program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understood the hon. member's question in the first instance and suggest again that it ought to be answered by way of a statement on motions. I understand the hon. member for Mackenzie has a supplementary.

Mr. Korchinski: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the inspectors to be employed in connection with the acreage reduction program be made available by manpower offices, or will the government appoint them under a system of political patronage?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISCUSSION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Privy Council.

Is he in a position to tell the House if the government will allow the House to consider the second report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture before the Minister of Agriculture officially announces the dairy policy for the year 1970-71?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): As I stated last Thursday, I believe, Mr. Speaker, the government feels that the subject has already been discussed at length a few weeks ago, therefore, it does not intend to resume this debate.

Mr. Rondeau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Does this mean that the government intends to ignore completely the second report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gaspé.

FISHERIES

OPERATION OF FOREIGN VESSELS IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

Could he give confirmation of the presence of many foreign fishing boats in the Gulf of the St. Lawrence and would he say what action is being taken by his department and by the coastguard in order to drive these ships out of Canadian waters?

[English]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, there are foreign, commercial fishing vessels from European countries inside the Gulf of St. Lawrence. We have informed their officers and crews they are not welcome and have been in touch with their governments, through the Department of External Affairs, and told them that as well. We cannot evict them because we still have not completed our system of fisheries closing lines around Canada's east coast. Until we do we are not in a position to make sure these ships leave.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: I want to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell us which countries these ships belong to?

[English]

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, France, Spain, Portugal, Norway and Denmark.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): May I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In order to settle the struggle to control our boundaries, would the minister suggest to the government of France that it offer us St. Pierre and Miquelon in payment for the bases at Marseille and Metz in France?

IMPLEMENTATION OF 12-MILE LIMIT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): A supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister indicate how much more time he thinks will be required to implement the 12-mile fishing limit authorized by the House in 1964?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we have legislation which is scheduled for this session. Once it is passed, we should be able to complete our fisheries closing lines.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I wish to ask the Minister of Fisheries if he has received any reports of numerous foreign vessels in Newfoundland waters and other Canadian waters inside the three-mile limit? If so, can he indicate what action has been taken?

Mr. Davis: Not recently, Mr. Speaker. However, as the hon. member knows, the treaty rights which France, for example, enjoys and have not as yet been phased out, enables their fishing vessels to come right up to our shore.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): As was mentioned before in a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries, legislation passed by this House over six years ago gives the government the authority to police the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence where, as the minister has admitted, foreign vessels are carrying on fishing operations. Why can the minister not use his authority to clear the fishing grounds?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. MacInnis: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If legislation has been passed by this House, why has the government not used it to protect our fisheries?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. I ask the minister if he will ignore the provision in the petition presented yesterday by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, the effect of which would be that the continental shelf would be inside the 12-mile limit?

Mr. Davis: This would be quite an exercise in geography, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member knows, the continental shelf extends 400 miles off the coast of Newfoundland.

Mr. Anderson: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member in a moment. I suggest to hon. members that perhaps we should proceed to another subject. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie has been seeking the floor for a long time. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Anderson: The petition I presented yesterday would not have the effect which the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question of privilege.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIAMEY—COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I would ask the minister, in connection with the answer he made to the House yesterday to the effect that he intends to give a very special role to the Quebec delegation to the Niamey conference, whether he could state more precisely the role he intends to give to Quebec.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which is under discussion with the government of Quebec. I can assure the hon. member it would be a very prominent role, recognizing the position of Quebec as one of the principal centres of our French speaking population.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question.

Would the minister be prepared to tell the House whether the province of Quebec has agreed to participate in the Niamey conference even if it should not act as a delegate of an official government? In other words, did that province agree or refuse?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member feels as I do, that the Quebec delegation will be there as a part of the Canadian delegation.

DRUGS

LEGALIZING OF USE OF MARIJUANA

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's recent statement in Ottawa during a question and answer period at Carleton University, is it government policy to legalize the use of marijuana if the government finds that there is a significant minority of Canadians using this substance?

Mr. Speaker: The question as asked does not seem to be in order. The hon. member cannot ask for a statement of policy in this way.

Mr. Nesbitt: Your Honour, if I am out of order I will be happy to rephrase my question. Is it government policy to legalize the use of marijuana if the government finds that there is a significant minority of Canadians using this substance?

Mr. Speaker: It seems that the second question is very much like the first one.

Mr. Nesbitt: I thought perhaps Your Honour was going to object to it.

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF LEDAIN COMMISSION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question. According to the reply I received the last time I asked this question, I thought we would have had the LeDain report by now. Can the minister say when the LeDain Commission is going to submit its report? Will there be a statement by the government at the time the report is presented to Parliament?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the first part of the hon. member's question, I cannot say specifically when the report will be in our hands. I anticipate it will be some time within the next two weeks. As to the second part of the question, it is premature to say what disposition will be made of the report as far as Parliament or public statements are concerned. I will have to wait until we have the report.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question. Will the cabinet be considering the report before it is tabled in the House of Commons?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt if it is in order to inquire whether the cabinet will be considering any particular matter.

GRAIN

WHEAT—PAYMENT ON DEFERRED DELIVERIES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In light of the previous answer concerning payment for the Durum pool, can the minister advise the House if any consideration is being given to a matter of even more serious consequence? Is the government considering, or is the minister recommending to the government, the payment of 20 cents a bushel to those who did not complete delivery of their five-bushel quota the previous crop year and are on a five-bushel deferred quota this year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker. The deliveries under the deferred delivery permits form part of this year's pool. Of course, those people delivering on those permits will be eligible to share in any final payment for the current pool.

AGRICULTURE

OUTBREAK OF ANTHRAX IN SOUTHEASTERN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister been advised by the Saskatchewan veterinary officials of the outbreak of anthrax in southeastern Saskatchewan? What action has his department taken to eradicate the outbreak of this very serious disease in view of the fact that the federal government is responsible for the control of anthrax?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, but I will check into it at once.

[Later:]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, may I have a few moments in which to supplement the answer I gave to the question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain regarding an outbreak of anthrax in Saskatchewan? This case has now been confirmed and the health of animals division of the department has begun control measures.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO WHITE PAPER

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can the minister inform the House when the promised white paper—I am not sure the minister is following the question. He is following it. Can the minister inform the House when the promised white paper on the Unemployment Insurance Commission will be made available?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): As mentioned in the Throne Speech, Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to bring forward a proposal or white paper on unemployment insurance in this session.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED U.S. NUCLEAR TESTS—INFORMATION ON FIRST TESTS

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On February 3 I asked the minister whether his department had received from the United States data on the results of the United States first nuclear test at Amchitka so that we Canadians could judge the desirability of the second series of tests. Is the minister now in a position to inform the House whether this information has been received?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe my department received such information. If received, it would come through the Department of External Affairs.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY BEFORE EASTER RECESS

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the minister's indication of an early announcement of the government dairy policy, will he give an undertaking to make this announcement in the House before it closes for the Easter recess?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hope that can be done, but as the hon. member and other members who are keenly interested in the dairy industry know, there are a number of points outstanding that have not been resolved between the various sectors of the dairy industry. I would like to go as far as I can in resolving and reconciling those differences. It is hard to put a specific date on it.

[Later:]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I want to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture in order to clear up the confusing answers which the government is providing. In answer to the original question on dairy policy, the minister said he would make a statement in the House before the end of the month. In answer to the last question, he said he hoped to make it before the 25th. Inasmuch as the Easter recess is due to begin on March 25 and we shall not be back until April 6, how can the minister explain his statement?

Mr. Olson: There is no confusion, except in the mind of the hon. member. I said in reply to the first question posed to me that I would be making a statement—I did not say it would be in this House—before the end of this month. In reply to the second part of the question, I said that if there was reconciliation of the various legitimate viewpoints within the industry I would make an announcement somewhat sooner. I certainly hope hon. members opposite are not asking me to make a unilateral decision before there has been adequate and complete consultation with the industry.

Mr. MacInnis: Do I not recall the Minister of Agriculture saying on another occasion that he would make all statements in the House, and not outside this chamber?

GRADING OF WHEAT BY PROTEIN CONTENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): A supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will we have an opportunity in the near future to give consideration to the grading of wheat by protein content?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): When the Canada Grain Act comes to the House for revision there will be an opportunity for doing so. Whether or not a completely new grading system could be worked out in time for the new crop year, should the new act be passed, is still a good question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LEGISLATION RESPECTING ROYAL ANTHEM

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I should like to direct a question to the Government House Leader. In light of the tremendous enthusiasm for the Queen of Canada shown on Monday last, would the government consider separating its consideration of the Royal and the National anthems and bringing in a separate bill to deal with the Royal anthem, further legislation being deferred until such time as the difficulties the government is having with the Weir descendants can be resolved?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we would be prepared to give that suggestion serious consideration. It would certainly be preferable to deal with both subjects at the same time and we hope to resolve the current difficulty. But I will give the hon. member's proposal serious consideration.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FAMILY PLANNING PROGRAM

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Did the minister and his department drop the family planning program which the Family Planning Federation of Canada had prepared for the department at the hon. gentleman's request?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

SALE OF ATOMIC ENERGY PLANT TO ROUMANIA—CONTINGENT CONDITIONS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the success experienced in the "on-power" refuelling of the Douglas Point Candu reactor, will the minister tell us whether this was a contingent condition for the sale of an atomic energy plant to Roumania?

Mr. Speaker: I would think this question could be placed on the Order Paper. If there is urgency about the matter, it could be debated at the time of adjournment.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONTINUANCE OF LAND CLEARING

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act comes under the minister's jurisdiction, and since the PFRA has embarked on a large-scale project of clearing land in Indian reserves on the prairies, and bearing in mind the recently announced program to take farmland out of production, can the minister advise whether or not these projects are to be discontinued?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker. That is not the intention of the department.

HOUSING

POLICY RESPECTING BUILDING SOCIETIES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. Has the government advised the province of Ontario formally of its decision with regard to building societies, and, if so, what was the decision?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I understand that a letter has been sent by my colleague the Minister of Finance to the minister of trade and economic development of the province of Ontario. Perhaps when the Minister of Finance is in the House he could give a more definitive answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Alexander: In the light of the alarming decrease in building starts particularly in evidence in the province of Saskatchewan and in the cities of Toronto, Hamilton and Halifax at a time when the interest rate has reached an unprecedented 10.1 per cent, is the minister giving consideration to the creation of new lending institutions pursuant to the thought he expressed when he said that if the money lenders were not co-operating he would have to consider such a move? Is he considering the establishment of new lending institutions? On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, will call the question out of order and the minister will not have to answer. What else is the minister waiting for?

Mr. Andras: Why doesn't the hon. member answer the question? He seems to have all the answers.

Mr. MacInnis: Any time you like.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: Take your marbles home with you.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, I know the Minister without Portfolio is as interested in this question as I am—as we all are—and I would hope that the Chair would allow him to answer.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair did not prevent the minister answering. The minister had ample time in which to answer had he wanted to do so. For the moment, the Chair has recognized the hon. member for Gloucester.

[Later:]

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of my question, and its relation to the present housing situation, I feel sure the minister would wish to reply. Since he was not prevented from doing so by the Chair, may I express the hope that he will answer my inquiry this afternoon?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I appreciate the opportunity to reply, Mr. Speaker. We are considering all the options available to us in this matter of making a flow of mortgage money available for housing. The building society proposition did not, after thorough examination, seem to promise to provide more mortgage money. But we are looking at other options and I will be glad to report on them as they unfold.

ENTRY OF NEW BRUNSWICK INTO MEDICARE

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Can the Minister of National Health and Welfare advise the House when New Brunswick will enter medicare?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INFORMATION CANADA

PUBLICIZING OF POSITION OF OPPOSITION PARTIES ON GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Since Information Canada will use the services of television stations to make government policy known, will that body also get the people acquainted with the reactions and views of the opposition parties concerning government policy?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this quite interesting question could be put on the order paper.

[English]

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the great conciliator, the Postmaster General, and ask him whether, after all the weeks of poor service or no service, anything close to normalcy is now returning to the postal service of Montreal?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): The situation is normal in Montreal for the moment.

Mr. Macquarrie: I want to give the minister an even break. Can he advise us when the backlog of parcels is expected to be delivered?

Mr. Kierans: If all proceeds normally, within about two days, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications.

Since he has already answered a question from one of my colleagues on the matter of mail distribution, can he indicate to the House what stage the discussions with the Union of Postal Employees have reached?

Mr. Kierans: The discussions are still proceeding, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Speaker.]

SOCIAL SECURITY

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION DURING PRESENT SESSION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the assurance he has given several times this session and the hope he expressed yesterday that the white paper on social security will be tabled this session, could the minister tell us whether legislation based on the white paper, particularly with respect to old age pensions, will be introduced this session?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is very doubtful, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister whether he is giving favourable consideration to the representations being made to him in this regard by Liberal Members of Parliament?

Mr. Munro: The representations have been made, and they contain considerable merit. They are being considered within the over-all context of social policy as set out in the white paper.

POLLUTION

AIR—ACTION RESPECTING FEDERAL AGENCIES AND BUILDINGS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's pessimism yesterday with regard to a clean air act, after his brave words in recent speeches, will the minister say what the government is doing in the meantime about air pollution caused by federal agencies such as Air Canada, and by federal government buildings in well-known places like Saint John?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It appears to me that this information should be given to the House by the minister in the form of a general statement and not by way of an answer to a question at this time.

[Translation]

CANADA COUNCIL

SUGGESTED GRANTS TO RETAIN SCIENTISTS IN CANADA

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Could he indicate to the House whether the Canada Council has taken positive steps under its subsidy policy to check the exodus of Canadian scientists, whose education would have been paid by the Canadian taxpayers?

Mr. Speaker: This is a question of a very general nature, and I believe that it could readily be put on the order paper.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a more specific question.

Would the minister state to the House if the Canada Council intends to establish a subsidy program to help the less fortunate universities, mainly those of the Maritimes, set up research centres in social sciences?

Mr. Speaker: I would like to point out to the hon. member that his supplementary question could also be put on the order paper.

[English]

GRAIN

WHEAT—FILLING OF THUNDER BAY TERMINAL FACILITIES

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the St. Lawrence seaway will be open within 25 days, could the minister assure the House that the terminal facilities at Thunder Bay will be full at that time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform hon. members that the schedule that had been set up to fill the terminals prior to the opening of navigation has not only been kept but, indeed, exceeded. As a result, the target amount should be in the terminals well before the opening of navigation.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—DATE OF SIGNING OF AGREEMENT ON DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that the government of Newfoundland has announced a regional development program to commence April 1, is the minister now in a position to tell the House on which day such agreement will be signed so that those of us who are interested will have a chance to examine it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I have not read Mr. Smallwood's statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister's reputation for evading questions is well known, so I will put my question to him directly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary or his question should not be preceded, I suggest, by this kind of statement or allegation. The hon. member has the right to ask a supplementary.

Mr. McGrath: With great deference, Mr. Speaker, had the minister answered my question, my premise would not have been necessary. The minister never answers questions in this House and this makes our role very difficult.

My question to the minister is this. On what day will the agreement with the government of Newfoundland in connection with a development program alleged to commence on April 1 be signed?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I did not hear the minister's answer. He mumbled something halfway to his feet. I think the House is entitled to an answer to my question.

Mr. Speaker: The minister said "soon". I have to inform hon. members that it is now time to call Orders of the Day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, perhaps the President of the Privy Council, the Government House Leader, would indicate to the House the business the government proposes to place before the House for consideration during the next week.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I thank the hon. member for his question. Tomorrow the first item of business to be called will be government order No. 67, Bill C-183, to be followed by government order No. 76, Bill S-14.

For the week commencing Monday, March 9, the first item will be government order No. 46, Bill C-161, with regard to the Dominion Coal Board. The second item will be government order No. 75, Bill C-190, with regard to the National Energy Board Act. The third item will be government order No. 49, Bill S-5, with regard to the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

On Tuesday, we will call for second reading debate the pensions bill to which we have given first reading today.

For Wednesday, an announcement will be made when the progress to that point is noted.

On Thursday next, we will call for the first item government order No. 47, with regard to the Standards Council of Canada, Bill C-163. This will be followed by government order No. 78, the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act, Bill C-193. I would remind hon. members that the business on Thursday next, March 12, will be interrupted at eight o'clock for the budget speech by my colleague the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, with regard to today's debate, I should like to make a suggestion for the consideration of the House. After the first four speakers representing the parties in the House have made their speeches in the time normally allotted to them, would the House be agreeable to limiting the following speeches to 15 minutes each so that more members will have an opportunity to take part in the debate?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We would be most agreeable to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered. Orders of the Day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION—EFFECT OF ALLEGED ARBITRARY ACTIONS AND DESTRUCTIVE POLICIES OF SECRECY AND NON-DISCLOSURE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its arbitrary actions and destructive policies of secrecy and non-disclosure including its attitude towards parliament which deny the right of citizens in this country to be informed and to participate fully in the government of Canada, particularly through their elected representatives, and which endanger the balance between the two structures of government—the executive and the representative.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is out of the city today because, by the very nature of things, this resolution touches the Prime Minister closely as head of the government. I think I should begin by quoting one of the Prime Minister's favourite authorities in politics. In the 16th century Machiavelli wrote:

—our experience has been that those princes who have done great things have held good faith of little account, and have known how to circumvent the intellect of men by craft, and in the end have overcome those who have relied on their word.

It is in light of this quotation that I wish to consider some developments that have taken place in Canada during the past year or two, developments which, taken together, I suggest are quite alarming. It seems to me that all the talk that there has been about participatory democracy has been only a screen to hide the effort to concentrate power in Canada and to weaken our traditional safeguards against the abuse of power.

Over the past couple of years there has been a gradual but quite radical change in the system of government in Canada, with an almost invisible and ad hoc amendment of our constitution, so as to build up the power of the office of the Prime Minister and of the cabinet of Canada and to break down institutional safeguards designed to protect the individual Canadian. While not wishing to be in any way an alarmist, I do suggest that a pattern has emerged which requires the attention of the Canadian public, certainly the attention of Parliament, and not least the attention of private members on the other side of the House in whose name the cabinet is accumulating this power.

I ask this House to consider some of the elements of this dangerous, and I think undemocratic, concentration of power at the centre of government in this country. The changes in Parliament are well known, and they are very crucial. They are well known because Parliament must always be the ultimate protection of the individual against an arbitrary government. The issue goes way beyond Parliament and should be discussed in its broader terms as well, that is, in terms broader than Parliament, important as that is, because Parliament is the most important safeguard of citizens. They have other safeguards which have lost a lot of their clout during the last two years.

I have suggested that the talk about participation is simply talk. After all, there is a big difference between genuine participatory democracy which is, on the one hand, to send up trial balloons to sample public opinion and, on the other hand, an exercise in public relations designed to condition the public to a change that the government has already decided to make. There is also a difference between participatory discussions and shouting matches with extremists; the latter may very well be designed to suggest that all of those who disagree with the government are also extremists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: This is a well known technique which was not invented by the Prime Minister, (Mr. Trudeau) but employed to a considerable extent by him.

During the 1960's, governments representing both parties established various new agencies and new programs genuinely designed to broaden the base of government and participation in government, to broaden the opportunity for citizens to express their views or draw attention to their demands. These were genuine examples of participatory democracy. It is very interesting and noteworthy to consider that their fate is in the hands of this government.

The ARDA program, with its emphasis on community involvement in decision making, is certainly being pushed out. Perhaps the best example of its replacement was the Prince Edward Island development plan where the effective control is highly centralized here in Ottawa.

Then there is the Company of Young Canadians. Certainly, it has been "co-opted" and turned into what looks like a tamed creature of the government. We all agree about the government's role as an agent. We, on this side of the House, would have wished the government to start afresh. Certainly, Sir, we never agreed to an agency designed to be participatory being simply taken over and operated by the government. The mandate of this agency now is to be an agent of the government among the young, and not an agency of youth in governmental matters. This distinction is generically the same as the distinction between propaganda and information.

There are other examples. It is clear that at the same time the government is talking about making democracy work, it is changing or restricting or closing down those few federal agencies which have allowed some form of genuine participation. These programs have been replaced by tokenism; for example, naming regional representatives of the poor and flying them occasionally to Ottawa for discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I suggest there has been quite an alarming increase in the recourse of this government to arbitrary procedures. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has left the House, and I am sorry he has. According to reports, that minister directly threatened to impose or continue certain policies against copper companies unless they agreed to limitations on price increases. We can all understand the desire to curb price increases or to limit them if they cannot be avoided. The suggestion is that the minister concerned boasted of the big stick he holds over the producers by way of copper export permits.

There is also the whole question of sanctions and the government's proposed voluntary restraint program. I favour this program and I have been advocating the use of guidelines. I must say that I am concerned about the cloak and dagger methods the government seems to be resorting to in order to obtain compliance with this program. It is one thing to have a law which prohibits something and to provide penalties which are to be suffered by those convicted of a violation of that law. That is part of what we consider to be the rule of law. It is a very different thing when you try to attain a very valid aim—an aim we can all support—through very vague threats. It is a different thing when you ask provincial governments, for example, to be prepared not to buy from a company because the Prices and Incomes Commission says that the company has violated this program. The government seems to feel that the end justifies the means and that this sort of thing has to be done in the national interest.

I do not think it is any exaggeration to say that most of the atrocities in history actually have been committed in the name of the public or the national interest. I say our democratic system requires more specific safeguards, and that we must take the rule of law seriously if we are going to preserve respect for the law, and if we are going to preserve freedom. This kind of approach has serious implications for Canada because it can be very popular. A member of the government can appear popular if he seems prepared to bang somebody around, particularly a big business man or even a small one sometimes. You can be popular, but it is very dangerous. I do say if the government is prepared to use weapons such as this for good purposes, that is bad; but if the government is prepared to also use arbitrary actions to achieve something that is improper in itself, that is very bad indeed.

This brings me to the question of public information and the media. This is a delicate area in which Information Canada seems to pose a most direct threat, since the press has been proven a better judge of what in fact is information than the government has proven to be, whether by accident or design. We have had a succession of threats; a lecture to the press in London, a threat to have the mounted police look into the private lives of journalists, and a threat to lock the door at Radio Canada. These things reflect an attitude to the press which certainly makes me uncomfortable, and I think makes many journalists in Canada uncomfortable. This sort of thing may be popular. The vice-president of the United States, as well as the Prime Minister of Canada, has apparently found that the road to popularity lies in attacking the press and the media in this way. Just as the Vice-President of the United States, if I may say so, is creating great uneasiness there, the same sort of thing is creating uneasiness in our country.

We should bear in mind the great power that governmental agencies have to control certain forms of the media. Radio stations and television stations are licenced only for short times. Therefore, the owners of these licences are bound to be nervous when anything that seems like a threat is involved. I think it is worth observation that this discomfort is not relieved by the convening in the other place of an inquiry into the media under the chairmanship of a former national director of the Liberal party. I believe he is known as the "Rainmaker". It is in this context that we have the suggestion, or at least the declared intention of the government, to establish Information Canada which I fear will be in fact "Manipulation Canada". In this context this is a very dangerous proposal. There is also related to this, the matter of the access of the government to the media. I think it would be useful for the CRTC to spell out the ground rules governing the conditions under which government statements should be allowed to preempt other programming on television, for example, by beating the audience to its knees. There seem to be no rules about this at the present time. Perhaps such a rule is particularly necessary in view of the new ruling regarding Canadian content and in view of the establishment by the government of a central propaganda agency authorized to use such vast and sophisticated techniques to tell the story on behalf of the Liberal government.

Perhaps the CRTC would consider some means of setting a rule concerning not only a minimum in respect of Canadian content but a maximum regarding government content or propaganda content. Mr. Speaker, propaganda and secrecy in this regard are two aspects of the same thing. They both relate to efforts to control public opinion. Both are methods which are always used by genuinely dictatorial governments. On the one hand, we have Information Canada coming along and, on the other hand, we have the virtual unlimited access of the government to networks. In addition, we have the secrecy and the refusal to give information. Then, there is the use of a vast number of task forces, the reports of which are kept secret. Of course, there is the well-known refusal to give information here in the House.

What is happening in respect of other institutions which traditionally were capable of standing up to the federal government? The provinces in Canada traditionally have provided some balance. After all, that is what the federal system is all about.

During recent years there has been some concern perhaps as to whether the federal government is strong enough to discharge its national responsibility. But there can be little doubt now concerning the direction in which we are headed. There can be little doubt now —and I say this advisedly—that the government is trying to beat the provinces to their knees by a fiscal squeeze. There can be little doubt that the government of Canada, through the white paper and other methods, is trying to create a preferred financial position for itself. It is one thing to ensure that we have a federal government with adequate powers to discharge its national responsibilities. It is another thing to create a situation in which there is a very real risk that an increasing number of provinces may become unable to discharge their constitutional responsibilities effectively and in which an increasing number of provinces may be beaten into subserviency. Is there not a real danger in Canada today that fiscal restraint will turn into something like fiscal terrorism. I mentioned the white paper. If anybody thinks the federal government is above throwing its weight around in its relations with the provinces, he should ask himself how much real authority is left today to the legislature of Prince Edward Island.

It is against this sort of background that the playing down or downgrading of Parliament becomes even more significant. The things I have mentioned may seem to many people to be isolated instances, but really they are all part of a pattern. When we start to discuss Parliament in this context, we should recall the conception of Parliament apparently held by the majority of my friends opposite. This conception is that we have an election periodically; that following that election the government has a mandate and that between elections the only proper role of Parliament is to process whatever business the government may choose to place before Parliament. As I said before, and as I say again, the role envisaged for Parliament by most of my hon. friends opposite seems to be not very different from the role envisaged for the Chamber of Deputies by General de Gaulle.

At this point there is no need to review the rules debate except to note that the government was so intent on exercising authority that it used closure to bring in a rule that it cannot use.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: This is a pretty good indication of the mentality of the members of this government and their attitude. In the discussions about Parliament, there has been much emphasis on efficiency and on the need for getting business done in this modern day. A great many rules that were formulated here to enable the opposition to dig in, and insist upon getting information, have been removed in the interest of getting the business done. I want to see Parliament efficient but I do not want to see it emasculated in the process. Parliament has been downgraded in a number of ways. There has been an increased volume of legislation which delegates very extensive powers to the Governor General in Council. This increased volume of such legislation has been a matter of concern for some time.

As a result of that concern, we had a report by a committee of this House on statutory instruments. To my knowledge nothing has been done about that report. Not one step has been taken. Not one recommendation contained in that report has been implemented. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) keeps shaking his head. He looks quite natural when shaking his head in that direction. I do not know what he would look like if he shook his head in the other direction, because I have never seen him do that.

Another trend which seems to be gaining momentum is the trend to remove very large areas from public debate, so to speak, that is outside the effective surveillance of Parliament, by resort to the technique of creating Crown corporations. We have always had some Crown corporations engaged in commercial business in Canada. But now we have the use of this technique in connection with the national parks. There is an indication there will be resort to it in connection with the Department of Transport, and so on. This is a great way to move large chunks of public concern a long way from the effective surveillance of members of this House. Then, we have the roster system. I have no doubt other members will mention this. I want to say this about it again, that it was introduced to this House without any consultation, in an entirely arbitrary manner.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is not so.

Mr. Stanfield: There has been no change in the rules of this House to justify it. Apart from the question of its merit, it is an act of arrogance and a complete disregard for the rules of this House.

We are all familiar with the technique of refusing to answer questions fully in Parliament and then going outside and answering them fully in the corridors before the television cameras, sometimes answering them in a rather different way. Indeed, the only positive talent that some of the ministers seem to have is a talent for ambiguity. I suppose it is a valuable one.

Apologists for the government claim that the committee system is making up for these other changes and is enabling Parliament to play its proper role. But that party line is so absurd that no self-respecting member of the government will peddle it. Indeed, they would be little short of fraudulent to do so. It would be little short of fraudulent to suggest that committees, in their present state, are a substitute for a Parliament with power, because the committees are understaffed and their members are overworked. The committees are still creatures of the government, without independent powers, with the exception of occasional initiatives such as that taken recently by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) as a result of a very happy and, I believe, a very courageous ruling by you, Sir, if I may say so. When the committees do make reports, those reports are frequently manhandled by the government.

An hon. Member: Or ignored.

Mr. Stanfield: The report of the Committee on Transport and Communications was ignored. We know what happened to the recommendations of the Committee on National Defence with regard to NATO, and of course we know what happened more recently to the recommendations of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The President of the Privy Council still has them tucked away somewhere in his back pocket. I presume we are not likely to see them again before the House.

Mr. MacEwan: They are in the privy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: It is perfectly true that a grant has been made to provide research staff for the opposition parties. This has been done for the first time to my knowledge both for the government caucus members and for members on this side of the House. This is helpful, but one would have to be pretty Machiavellian to pretend that this measure offsets the vast increase in the power apparatus of the government.

My time is almost up. Let me say in conclusion that I understand the desire of Canadians to see things get done. I understand the desire to have problems tackled vigourously, and I understand the occasional impatience with discussion and debate. But I must ask the House to express its concern regarding the growing centralization of power in the federal government, concern over the demonstrated willingness of the Prime Minister and the government to use this power arbitrarily, concern over the increasing efforts of the government to manipulate public opinion by the use of both secrecy and propaganda, and concern over the efforts of the government to beat down and weaken the institutions in this country which have traditionally stood prepared to fight abuse of federal power.

It is because of this concern about the magnification of the power of the government, the manner in which this power is being used and the breaking down of institutions provided for public protection that I call upon the members of this House to vote for the resolution that you have read, Sir.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I rise to support the resolution, perhaps not for all the same reasons that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) mentioned—he and I have basic disagreements about some of the things which he stated—but in the 20 minutes that I have at my disposal I want to make a few comments about the subject which the Leader of the Opposition has placed before the House. I appreciate the fact that he has done so.

I want to suggest if I may, without appearing professorial but with great seriousness, that what we are discussing is nothing less than the adequacy of our parliamentary system to deal with the complexities of the modern society and with the fact of increasing government intervention in various phases and facets of modern life. It was relatively simple a century ago, or even half a century ago, to speak as the Conservatives and Liberals used to speak about the place of Parliament because Parliament had relatively little to do and government was required to do less in order to govern best. That was the concept.

Today, of course, we live in an entirely different kind of society. The issues which face us in Parliament and in the country are always complex and serious. They are not easy of solution and they are not even easy of analysis. In the solution of all the issues that touch the daily lives of people, governments at all levels are required by the increasing consciousness of our society to take the initiative and to participate in the solution of the problems. It is no longer possible in modern society to think of solving any of the major problems by leaving them in the hands of private enterprise, private corporations or individuals in society. In every case, whether it is pollution, the quality of life, or the environment in which we live; whether it is the problem of education or of regional disparity, the question of bilingualism and national unity, the public authorities in the country, federal, provincial and municipal and the public treasuries of the country are necessarily and importantly involved.

It is in this context I suggest that members of this House and the people of Canada must look at the activities of a government which attempts to deal with this kind of complex, modern society. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that what we have in this government, and in the Prime Minister of this country, and what leads to the concentration of power without any of the safeguards that one can have confidence in, are, the following characteristics among many:

Ever since the Prime Minister was elected Leader of his party he has, it seems to me, been persuaded that style is much more important than substance. Ever since that time he has played a role almost like a studied actor, showing a certain image, taking a certain attitude towards Parliament and Members of Parliament, taking certain attitudes when he appears in public before students and others, attempting to suggest something that I cannot quite define, but is quite irrelevant to the substance of the matters that concern the lives of people in Canada.

I informed the members of this House some time ago that in a short telecast interview, I think a day before the Liberal leadership convention opened in this city in the spring of 1968, I described the Prime Minister, then a candidate for the leadership, as a suspended brain, an impression which I have had ever since I have had the pleasure of knowing him. I have the impression that here is a mental machine functioning in a vacuum without any of the electrical cords running to the hearts and feelings and sensitivities of human beings.

An hon. Member: That is what Judy LaMarsh said.

Mr. Lewis: This is the kind of thing that has characterized the right hon. gentleman's and the government's callousness about the growth in unemployment, their callousness about the increase rather than decrease in regional disparities, their callousness about certain international matters such as the escalation of the nuclear arms race in ABM's, the callousness about pollution, whether east or north, and the acceptance of the fact that you can have a tanker go through the northern waters, a tanker which had been damaged and which the company concerned is refusing to reinforce, and you take a chance again on having the same kind of calamity as you had on the east coast.

And all of this callousness, this lack of sensitivity about matters which concern people, derives from the conviction the government has that so long as it is able to engage in a certain style, and to give a certain image, and to titillate a certain proportion of the Canadian people, people will be fooled into thinking that the government is doing something.

The second characteristic of the Prime Minister and this government, Mr. Speaker, is a technocratic approach to the solution of the problems. The government has been in power now—this government, let alone the previous Liberal governments—for almost two years. And without being too partisan—it would be stupid and dishonest and insincere to say I am not partisan, but without being too partisan—every time I sit back I ask myself, what has this government accomplished in two years. This government has been led by a man who said to the Canadian people that there were going to be tremendous changes—"I have a feeling of the inevitability of changes—there are problems and we will meet them," without saying what the problems were or how exactly they were going to be met. For the most part, there are some exceptions, I find myself enumerating to myself the appointment of task forces, the production of white papers, the tabling of reports, and the continuing promise of something yet to come, although you do not quite know when or what. Even today, the very excellent person in the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand)—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: I did not say the excellent minister. I said the very excellent person in the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, on being asked a question with regard to certain plans, answered, "I cannot give you any date yet on any point on which these things are going to be accomplished." And he now nods his head in agreement.

There are certain problems that Canada has had for years. It does not require any of the long studies in which the government is engaging in order to deal at least with some of them.

But the technocrat approaches things entirely differently. He is not concerned with solving a problem which he and everyone else can see. He is concerned with finding himself a precise technocratic framework in which the particular item might fall. He is satisfied, because that is the nature of the technocrat, if he can show structures, if he can persuade you he has frameworks, that he has appointed task forces or can table white papers and reports, if he can tell you he is continuing to study the matter, because no person with that approach is as much concerned with solving a problem as with being satisfied that he has technocratically analysed it.

This is what happens every day with this government. When you have that kind of approach, if you are concerned more with style than with substance, and if you have a technocratic approach to problems why should you pay any attention to Parliament? Style is of no consequence here. The Prime Minister and his colleagues in cabinet are not likely to persuade many members of the opposition. Style is important outside. It is important at the university, important in front of the camera. It is of no importance here.

Why should the Prime Minister waste his style on the floor of this House, on Parliament? Why should he waste his great acting talents on the desert air of the Members of Parliament of Canada? If you take a technocratic approach to the analyses and solution of problems, why should you bother with Parliament? Indeed, if you take that kind of technocratic approach it is obvious that Parliament, its procedures, the admitted relative inefficiency of the democratic processes, are a matter of great impatience to you.

Anybody who has studied political science and history, knows perfectly well that if you have a dictator, if you have an arbitrary dictatorial person in charge, you can do things a great deal more efficiently than the parliamentary process does them. There is no doubt about that. Whether you do it for the benefit of the people, whether you enable the people to feel that they are part of a society, that is a different question.

But Stalin and the present leaders of the Soviet Union do things a great deal more efficiently than the democratic world does them. They can decide today what they will do tomorrow, and not be answerable to anyone except members of the Politburo or perhaps the larger body in the Central Committee. Democracy and the democratic process are by design a little less efficient in that sense of the term than the technocrat has patience for, because the democratic process means you have to listen to what people have to say. You have to hear what they have to say. You have to think about what they have to say. You have to present yourself to the criticism of the opposition. You have to permit the opposition to know what you are thinking, what you have done, what you propose to do.

But if you are a technocrat you don't have to tell the opposition what you propose to do. You clothe your obscure generalities in mountains of white papers, and you give the impression of a kind of frenetic activity when in fact there is no activity at all, because all that counts in that context is to give the impression of something rather than the reality. If you are that kind of Prime Minister and this kind of government, all you have to do is give an appearance of change. You don't have to do any real changing in any real sense, but you have to give an appearance of change. And you have to have a stance from time to time.

I give you an example, Mr. Speaker, I happen to be totally in favour of the government's action with regard to the proposed takeover of Denison Mines. I am worried, as my questions earlier this afternoon to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) no doubt suggest, about what is taking place in the talks going on between ministers and representatives of the corporation involved. I am worried about what is being cooked. All this is a perfect example of something that has no importance in reality. Of all industries in Canada which are foreign owned, the uranium industry has least importance as far as ownership is concerned in Canada. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because, under the British North America Act it has been declared as being of general advantage to Canada. As a result, strict and complete controls have been established under the Atomic Energy Act and regulations to govern the operations of this industry in Canada. The industry cannot export a single pound, a single ounce of uranium, without obtaining permission from the relevant agency of government. So, the question of foreign ownership is less important with the uranium industry than with almost any other industry in this country, because the controls over the industry are so far reaching.

I favour its being Canadian owned and grieve that as of today we have permitted 50 per cent of our uranium resources to be owned by foreign corporations. Of course, I am glad that the government made the previous announcement and hope from my heart that the discussions now taking place will not change the policy announced by the Prime Minister the other night. What I am saying is that this government and this Prime Minister chose an industry in which foreign ownership is least important to make a grandstand play and show how determined the government is to retain the industry under Canadian ownership, whereas it is the other resource industries which are foreign owned and controlled from outside that affect employment in this country, affect our exports, and possibly interfere with our national planning. These things are not true of the uranium industry. Therefore, the government is making a grandstand play about the uranium industry to satisfy those who support it in the party and country, and who demand greater attention to Canada's national identity and independent national future.

Here we have a recent and important example of what I mean when I say that you only need to bring about an appearance of action and an appearance of change; you need not do anything else. This government and this Prime Minister have remained perfectly traditional and orthodox in almost every area but have presented us with an appearance of change and an appearance of action.

It also follows, if I am right, that the Prime Minister will necessarily increase his powers. I do not think it is intellectually honestly possible for me to say this is the first time a prime minister has been powerful. I do not suggest that. I think under our system of government a prime minister inevitably is very powerful. The Office of the Prime Minister is a very powerful office and has always been powerful. Because he has final authority over the appointment and dismissal of ministers and other people in the service of the government, the Prime Minister is necessarily a very powerful figure. In this age, with its more complex and difficult issues, the power of the Prime Minister, as I have said, is necessarily greater even than it has been in other ages. But in the present case even more is involved.

In the nature of things, as I said, the Prime Minister is very powerful, and his office is a very powerful office. In the present case where style counts for more than substance, the appearance of change for more than the reality of chance and the technocratic approach to the solution of problems overrides any real attempt to attack those problems, the Prime Minister must be all powerful. He cannot permit ministers to have any influence which might detract from his power, because style means that one person rules. When you have a technocracy you have one leader. You cannot have more than one. So, collective leadership becomes impossible. In the context of that theory and practice of government, it was inevitable that the Prime Minister should increase his staff and make himself more powerful than prime ministers traditionally have been.

I see that my time has almost expired. I want to say that I support the resolution moved by the Leader of the Opposition because I see in the present trend a danger to the people of Canada. As I have explained, they may be misled by an appearance of change, by an appearance which has no counterpart in reality, and by the concentrated power of a government which is concerned with holding on to orthodox, traditional programs and policies which have choked the Canadian people in the past.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, after saying that he took exception to what he regarded as the tendency of this government to relegate all its opponents in the community to the positions of extremists in political doctrine, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), in rather fanciful speech, tried to draw a picture of dictatorship enclosing the Canadian people. I must say I have some difficulty in taking the Leader of the Opposition seriously on that one, and I think most people will not take him seriously. May I also make one or two comments about some other matters he referred to, and I particularly wish to confine myself to certain comments and misleading statements he made about parliament, this House, its rules, and the facilities which have been provided to private members.

In his diatribe concerning information and the creation of Information Canada we heard an interesting contradiction. On the one hand, the Leader of the Opposition said that the government evolved task force papers and whitepapers which it refused to make public; yet a few minutes before that he had been very critical of the government for establishing Information Canada. Well, Information Canada was the result of just one such study. It was the result of this process of having the serious problems in government studied, making the conclusions on those studies available for consideration and taking administrative action on proposals in that regard.

Mr. Baldwin: On those portions the government liked.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I hope the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) will not mislead the House. The two documents produced by the task force on information were published. They were very critical of the government and of agencies of government. For all that they were published. Perhaps we might recommend that the Leader of the Opposition and his lieutenant do a little more reading instead of talking in the course of their parliamentary duties.

An hon. Member: They would not know how.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The Leader of the Opposition said that the creation of Information Canada is some means of controlling the press. I remind him that in a province such as Ontario, which has a government of a political persuasion not far removed from that of the government of which the hon. gentleman was leader, there are centralized government offices the purpose of which is making government information available. The press has not been controlled or downgraded in any sense by that.

The only other comment I wish to make about his very fanciful statement pertains to his allegation that there was some squeezing of the provinces and that we were trying to take away a further counterforce in Canadian life by virtue of our putting a financial squeeze on the provinces. Well, may I recommend that the Leader of the Opposition read the report of the tax structure committee on taxation resources and expenditures by Canadian levels of government. He will notice that in 1952, after transfers, the federal government took 67 per cent of that part of the gross national product devoted to the public sector. This federal-provincial committee estimates that by 1971 the share of the federal government will go down to 40 per cent. In other words, far from the federal government's putting a financial squeeze on the provinces, it may be said that the financial squeeze is coming from the other direction.

I want to direct myself specifically to the allegations made by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to Parliament and to what he says is the downgrading of Parliament. He said there is a decline of debate in this chamber; I want to debate his assertions.

First, I want to make it clear on the record that the Prime Minister is not in Ottawa today. His absence from the House was well publicized in advance and should not be misconstrued. It has been known for some time by all hon. members in this Chamber and, I presume, the Leader of the Opposition, that he would be absent. For reasons known only to the hon. gentleman, he put forward this motion. On the other hand, it might be useful to have this debate in the absence of the Prime Minister. It will avoid the embarrassment of having him present while we discuss his role in this Parliament. We now have an opportunity to discuss the events of this past Parliament.

I make the contention without qualification that under no previous government has there been such a devolution of responsibilities to the private members of this Chamber and, at the same time, in no other Parliament has there been so great an increase in their facilities to enable them to carry out their responsibilities. It may be useful to remind the Leader of the Opposition in detail of the manner in which this devolution and increase of facilities have taken place. The hon. gentleman referred to the figure of almost $400,000 per annum which has been made available to the opposition parties and the private members on the government side for the purpose of enabling them to engage in a study of government legislation.

The Leader of the Opposition suggested that the committees were under-staffed, that they were lacking in research staff. This may be true, but perhaps I should introduce him to the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) who has been a perennial complainer when committees recommended that they be entitled to retain counsel for the purpose of enabling them to carry on their work. Which voice from the other side are we to believe, the Leader of the Opposition or his follower? Do we have too much staff or too little?

I am prepared to say that committees are in an emerging role within Parliament as are the use of research and assistance that will be available for committees. I am prepared to acknowledge we are at present in a situation where we are feeling our way to find the best manner in which staffs can be used.

It was the government which took the initiative, in connection with the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, to establish as its advisor the new institution of the parliamentary committee on foreign affairs and foreign trade, which was created with the general blessing of the Chamber, and to have Mr. Dobell and his associates operate with the Standing Committee of External Affairs and National Defence. It can be said that in no other Parliament of Canada has there been as extensive a study and deep a knowledge of external affairs as there has been on the part of the members of that committee and on the part of private members. This, I may say, is as a result of initiatives taken by this government.

The experience gained in that committee has been particularly valuable. It has not only been experience in developing the substance of those questions with the members of the committee, but it has also been a very useful experience in how a non-partisan adviser may carry on duties. They are a partisan and adversary body just as much as this House is a partisan and adversary body, and problems arise in relating his role to such a body.

I point out to the Leader of the Opposition that in this Parliament there have been extensive changes in the responsibilities of the committees, extensive changes in opportunities for hon. members to participate in legislation, many of which did not exist before. For example, in the case of legislation there is now the opportunity which did not exist before on all bills, to examine at length the minister and officials responsible for policy and technical advise and also to call outside witnesses. I refer to the Canada Water Act which is now before the committee and on which extensive hearings are now taking place; the Canada Corporations Act in which respect similar hearings are taking place, and the hate literature bill on which there has been extensive discussion and debate.

As the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) will acknowledge, there are far greater opportunities now to engage in the prosecution of these particular questions than was available in the past.

Mr. Valade: What about the possibility of amendments?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member asks about amendments. Hon. members opposite feel in some kind of an arrogant way that their point of view must automatically be accepted in committees. I say that is an adversary body just as is this House. If they can make a good case, let them do so. I think the experience is they have not been able to make a good case for changes in the laws when in committee.

Mr. Danforth: What a misrepresentation!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There have been exceptions to that. I recognize the contribution of the hon. member for York South in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and in the special committee on official languages. In other words, we have moved into a situation, the end of which we cannot predict, which is far from having a concentration of power in the hands of the government. We are bringing a situation into the committee system where there is taking place a greater decentralization of power. From the government's standpoint, I do not expect this to be without pain or incident, but I think it is totally false to suggest, in light of the changes made in this Parliament, that there has been a centralization of power.

With respect to the spending estimates of the government, there is a far greater opportunity for them to be studied. We no longer have the charade that formerly took place in this Chamber. We have the situation now where members could go after the officials responsible for a particular department asking for information and policy. Further, I think it is fair to point out that the office of the Leader of the Opposition has been strengthened by this government during the course of this Parliament. I think it is fair to make a comparison with the past with the decision made some months ago by the Commissioners of Internal Economy with respect to the gentleman's own office. The decisions were made after a request was put forward by him to the commissioners. In addition to Mr. Speaker, there are four cabinet ministers who are commissioners. The requests of the hon. gentleman for additional staff were met by the decision of members of this government.

A rather striking contrast can be drawn between the situation when I was first a member of this Parliament in 1962 under the leader of the Right Hon. L. B. Pearson, as Leader of the Opposition. The government of that day allowed only two very distinguished positions in the office of the Leader of the Opposition and a very small staff. I think the point can be fairly made that the capacity of the Leader of the Opposition to deal with the responsibilities of that office has been greatly enhanced by this government. Every reasonable request that he has made has been met by this government.

May I also emphasize the amenities made available to members in general. I am prepared to acknowledge the fact that I am not satisfied with the amenities now available. I agree with my colleagues who seek additional facilities which would better enable them to discharge their responsibilities. However, within the area of administrative decision which is available at the moment, I think it is fair to point out the expansion of secretarial facilities available for members of all parties, the expansion of telephone facilities by way of long distance lines and second lines and with regard to certain of the transportation costs which are of assistance to members.

I am happy that the Beaupré Commission will be looking into the conditions of the Members of Parliament and considering additional suggestions to enhance the role of members of this House that have been made, such as providing constituency assistance and better facilities here. We have been concerned about the office facilities in the House. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) has been participating with us in this. We have been looking for further means to provide better space so that members on both sides of the House may be in a better position to carry on their responsibilities from an office standpoint.

The Leader of the Opposition made some reference to the roster system. If he talks to his hon. friend from Peace River or with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I think he will find it is not true this system was introduced without consultation. I will not say that hon. members opposite were in agreement with it, but then they were not in agreement with many of the other changes which we felt were necessary for the improvement of government. But this question was extensively discussed in the late summer of 1968, and it was certainly not introduced without knowledge of the intentions of the government before the change was put into effect.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I would agree that it was not done without our knowing it would be done, but it is not quite fair to say there was consultation. We objected, but the government had decided to go ahead with it, anyway.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the hon. member had the opportunity of objecting, he must have been consulted. As he knows, he was consulted by me. Whatever hon. members may say in this regard, the fact of the matter is that the question period has not been cut down in any way. The consent of the House generally was given to placing a time limit on the question period, and I think it is correct to say there has not been a question period since the roster system was introduced when the number of questioners wishing to ask questions of ministers did not exceed the number which could be heard during the time available. In other words, the opportunity to raise questions was available. The absence of ministers has not slowed down the question period, though perhaps the absence of relevance and succinctness on the part of the questioners has done so.

May I refer briefly to the allegation by the Leader of the Opposition that there has been a failure to provide information? I would remind him of a remark which I believe can be attributed to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—in essence that the question period is not an information period but a form of political warfare. Any objective person examining the questions asked, examining the performance of, for example, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) or of the Leader of the Opposition himself, would agree that the extent to which they were seeking information as opposed to making points for the record, or appearing to do so, seems very slight.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Let nobody be fooled about what is really happening during the question period. The fact is that it is a form of political debate.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. This afternoon I addressed a specific question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), asking him how he defined the special status he intended to give the Quebec delegation to Niamey, but the minister refused to give this information. This proves that the Leader of the House is mistaken in his understanding.

Mr. Sharp: On the same question of privilege, may I say I have never refused to give information. However, the Chair has on a number of occasions turned down requests of the kind made by the hon. member on the ground that I am not supposed to be asked questions seeking an opinion. I interpreted the question as indicating that the hon. gentleman believed in the fragmentation of Canada.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There could be no better illustration of the point I was making than the intervention of the hon. member. I will leave it there.

The subject of replies to written questions has been raised. The figures in this connection are significant. With the exception of two sessions during the history of this institution—one of them was nearly twice as long as the present session and the other nearly three times as long—more questions were placed on the Order Paper during the first session of this Parliament than was ever the case previously. And 100 per cent of those questions were answered, after taking into account that hon. members consented to withdraw certain others which, because of their wording or some other consideration which appeared reasonable to them, appeared appropriate to withdraw. In other words, during the last session the government answered 100 per cent of the questions which were left standing on the order paper.

I will concede right away with regard to notices of motion for the production of papers that the government has concluded that it cannot answer all the demands which have been made. This is a position which has been taken by governments of many complexions in this House over the years. I am sure it was the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition when he was premier of a province, and I am sure it was the position taken by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) when he was in a similar office.

It is only fair to point out that there are occasions when the government feels, for the sake of harmonious foreign relations, or because confidential memoranda are involved preceding the development of policy, that documents should not be made available. Then again, it has been clear that hon. members have been putting notices of motions on the Order Paper even though the material given to them in past sessions covered the requests made. This was obvious as recently as yesterday in the case of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). Hon. members put these motions on the Order Paper but they do not read the material when it is sent to them.

Since January of this year, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg), the hon. member for Waterloo, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) sought the production on six different occasions of documents which had either been produced in previous sessions or were already on the public record. It seems to me that what is required with respect to information is not that more should be brought into this House but that hon. members opposite should spend a little more time studying what is already available to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I shall close, now. Some of my colleagues will be making their views known with regard to the speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition. I have said virtually nothing about what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) had to say. It seems to me the comments he made expressed his personal view of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau); I do not think they require an answer from me at this point.

I return to my central theme. In no Parliament has there been a greater opportunity for private members to participate in or help develop public policy and legislation in this House. In no Parliament have greater facilities been made available to hon. members for this purpose. If there has been a downgrading of Parliament it is because this institution is founded upon an adversary system, and an adversary system assumes not only a strong government but a strong opposition; it assumes not only an able group of members on this side of the House but an able group of members on the other side of the House. If this Parliament is a duller place, it is because of the incompetent leadership which the other side has got from the Leader of the Opposition. The adversary system will not work with mediocre infantry led by an incompetent general with bad judgment, and that is what I say of the motion put forward by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I was pleased to hear the balanced, impartial and well-reasoned arguments of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). As I listened to him I wondered whether the question period, already emasculated, is now about to be reformed out of existence altogether, taking account of his gratuitous and condescending lecture on the way in which questions should be asked.

We are engaged today in a very serious debate on one of those fundamental questions. Today we are not asking what the government is doing—and, God knows, that is a question which surely needs to be asked—but how the country is being governed. It is unfortunate that since this government took office the House has had to spend so much time diagnosing the ills of this institution. We do it because there is widespread anxiety among members on this side, a feeling that the institution is in fact in danger. This being the case, we try to buttress the institution against encroachments which would erode its capacity and functions. When a moderate man like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr.

Stanfield), a man not given to being an alarmist or crying wolf, presents such a motion as this in strong terms it is an indication that something is amiss, and it behooves us to become aware of the gravity of the problem.

Part of the problem, indeed I think the essence of it, is that this institution, the heart and centre of our democracy—if it is not that, it is not anything—is endangered not from without but from within. It is the Prime Minister of this country, next to Mr. Speaker himself, who should be the chief champion of the rights of Parliament. That is within the measure of his responsibility. However, even with all the great acting ability attributed to the Prime Minister by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), I am sure there is no one in this country who can envisage him playing the role of the protector of this House and of the fullness of its rights and liberties. That is one act that he has never even endeavoured to put on.

Efforts to denigrate Parliament have been the earmarks of this government's dealings with this Parliament. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has discussed the fiascos of the allocation of time debates. During recent months we have heard about what has happened to our committees: the government ignore their recommendations, pre-empt their recommendations, as when with undue and indecent haste they killled the Prince Edward Island causeway before the members of the transport committee have returned to Ottawa from making an on-the-spot investigation. The final stage was the directing of committees beforehand as to what to recommend, as in the case of the 18-year olds franchise.

Contempt of Parliament has been escalated, and is still escalating. Questions are ignored; the government refuses to disclose documents; questions asked by hon. members are evaded. Today, we have had scorn heaped upon the whole institution of the question period. It is clear that the asking of questions by opposition members is not something that is viewed by the government with pleasure, not something that they regard as important. It is conceivable in this era of the Park Avenue approach, an age when the image is the thing and manner is more important than matter, that something else may be substituted, that some process may be developed whereby questions as well as answers are manufactured in some sophisticated and costly way.

There is reason for thoughtful people to be concerned about what is taking place. Time was when governments actually appealed to the people in regard to what they were doing. Today the approach is what the Canadian people may be induced to believe that the government looks like or that the Prime Minister appears to be.

We are passing through a phase of austerity. But in the very midst of this we find that with lightning speed comes the announcement that the costly apparatus of Information Canada must be established forthwith. More millions and further regiments of public relations men will be hired to join the hundreds already employed in ministers' offices and at the Prime Minister's regional desks to disseminate news. When I asked the prime Minister a question about Information Canada some weeks ago, he indicated his relief in the importance of proper information. That is a very important adjective, and leads me to wonder who will judge what is proper and what is not proper. It is inconceivable to believe that it will be anyone but some government expert on public opinion management.

I do not think it is unrealistic to suggest that the glitter and glamour of 1968, the charisma of that exciting period, may have worn off or worn out by the time the next election comes, and so something else has to be ready. Information Canada and all the other intentions and manipulations referred to by the Leader of the Opposition in connection with the media are important matters. It is a strange thing that at a time when so many important operations of government, such as the Economic Council of Canada and many highly qualified people in the public service of Canada, even in the professional echelon, must be given the axe, we must rush with precipitous haste into the manufacture of government information.

We already have a situation where I believe there are more regional desks in the Prime Ministers office than there are seats in the House of Commons. That may be an exaggeration; perhaps they are not all desks but merely bureaux. We are told that in this new phase of participatory democracy the question period is to be diminished. Ministers have been told to stay away from the House. The caucus of the government party has been diminished in effectiveness, government members being told to meet not once a week but twice a month.

We have heard in recent weeks discussions, academic and otherwise, about the virtues and values of the presidential system. The Leader of the Opposition is very wise to get the point across that the presidential system that is conceived is not that of the United States, where the legislative arm is powerful, healthy, respected, and well able to discharge its duties in representing the people. Rather is it to be something that can be likened to the chamber of deputies under General de Gaulle. When I very carefully read the ministerial and prime ministerial statements about the kind of parliamentary body envisaged, I think it will be something much weaker even than the body that functioned in the third, fourth or fifth republic of France.

Therefore, it is important that we look now before it is too late and take stock of those measures, movements and intentions that would weaken this place. We are all accustomed as individual members of the House of Commons to being derided, to being made the butt-end of popular jokes. But when this institution itself is demeaned before the public, when more and more it seems to be irrelevant, it is time for us to take stock.

You do not have to be an evil man to destroy things that are good. All that is needed is a man with a distorted sense of values, to have a situation where precious things can quickly and perhaps imperceptibly disappear. Democracy, as we have discovered through the ages, is a frail flower. It cannot flourish in adversity; it has to be nurtured, it has to be nourished and it has to be protected. When he whom the people have given the greatest power and responsibility looks upon it as something that should be cribbed, cabined and confined, rather than enlarged and made more effective, then we are entering a climate in which it could wither and perish, a fate that none of us wants to see. Therefore, I appeal for support of this very perceptive motion so eloquently pleaded by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this debate could be one of the most significant this session because it relates to the way in which we handle our business in this chamber, not only from the standpoint of efficiency in dealing with the heavier and heavier work loads of legislation, but also from the standpoint of carrying out our mandate to the people of Canada who elected us to Parliament to legislate on their behalf in a free and democratic way. So, the proposition contained in the resolution of the Leader of the Opposition that this government has arbitrarily denied to citizens the right to keep themselves informed through their elected representatives is perhaps not the sense of the debate in which we are now engaged.

Lest we forget some of the formal measures taken by this government to keep members and the public informed, let me review them. The story about them is pretty well told by Professor Denis Smith of Trent University, of whom hon. members opposite will no doubt have heard. He was the author of a paper entitled "President and Parliament" which he prepared for the Progressive Conservative Conference on "Priorities for Canada" held in Niagara Falls, in October, 1969. Here is what he said about the revision of the rules of December, 1968, all of which, you will remember, were unanimously adopted by this House:

> The reforms of December, 1968, while extending some of the principles first outlined in 1965, were notably more radical. They reorganized and simplified the manner of passing legislation in the House; they diverted detailed debate on all estimates and virtually all legislation from the floor of the House to the specialized committee; they established an annual timetable for the consideration of spending estimates; they created a special committee on Statutory Instruments; and they reduced to twenty-eight the number of days in an annual session controlled by the opposition for debate on topics of its choice. Again, the nice balancing of concessions to the House against concessions to the Government brought the agreement of all parties to the proposal. (In November, 1968, in addition, the Prime Minister had announced that the estimates would contain annual grants to the leaders of the opposition parties to finance research offices.)

These were the words of Professor Smith as he addressed the Conservative conference in Niagara Falls on what this government, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), had done in respect of the organization of this Parliament.

What was the effect of these reforms? Did they, as the resolution states, bring about an air of secrecy and non-disclosure to Members of Parliament? Here is what Anthony Westell says on the subject as reported in the Ottawa Journal of January 22, 1970:

> Although the complaining MP's make it sound as if their difficulties are new ones, and thus make themselves appear useless and ineffective, they have in fact made remarkable progress in adapting the Parliamentary system.
> Commons committees are tackling major issues today with a zest and freedom from party and parliamentary restrictions unknown just a few years ago. When they are not complaining about the uselessness of their parliamentary lives, MP's are protesting that there is too much work to be done in too many committees.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition has been out stumping the country to give comfort—I am glad to see him back in his seat in parliament today—to people in the higher income brackets because of their fears of the tax proposals. Does he want to tell this House or the Canadian people that there is secrecy and non-disclosure in Parliament or in the committee in relation to tax reform? Is that what he told the people in the upper income brackets as he wandered around the country?

I want to suggest that the resolution fails to touch the real problems affecting Parliament, and I want to suggest we—

Mr. Alexander: How many letters did you get this morning?

Mr. Deachman: I see I am beginning to touch a nerve which results in chirping by members opposite.

Mr. Alexander: Get me a typewriter so I can answer the objections to the white paper.

Mr. Deachman: We could never confine ourselves to the narrow theme of secrecy and non-disclosure in this debate. The real theme, and the one we all going to deal with here, and which even the Leader of the Opposition dealt with when he raised the subject, is the theme expressed in the last words of the resolution, "the danger to the balance between the two structures of government—the executive and the representative".

If Mr. Westell feels that the committee system is playing a more vital role in Parliament, he and others have little good to say about what they see going on in this chamber. In concluding, the column from which I just quoted he says:

Above all, there is not much point in permitting broader scope, and in encouraging MPs to conduct their investigations with enterprise and independence, if the full House of Commons cannot keep up with the rising output because it insists on staggering along in its tiresome, time-wasting old way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deachman: In an earlier column on January 3, Mr. Westell spelled out in detail what he meant by "staggering along in its tiresome, time-wasting old way". Here are his words:

Conservative House Leader Gerald Baldwin—

I am glad to see that the hon. member has just come into the House and that the crowd is beginning to thicken up as I speak.

[Mr. Deachman.]

An hon. Member: They are thick all right.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Westell said:

Conservative House Leader Gerald Baldwin denies there is any political strategy of holding up government business, but he frankly admits that the opposition feels no responsibility to help speed the legislative program.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Deachman: To put it in other words, the whole legislative program is staggering along in its tiresome, time-wasting—

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. Baldwin: I am rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I am glad fate decided I should come in here this afternoon to hear this inaccurate statement that is being made. Had I known the hon. member was going to speak I would have been sure to be here to listen to his inaccuracies. What I said was that we had no responsibility to speed up legislative programs that are out of date. We have a responsibility to see that the legislation that is passed is good legislation. Certainly, on the basis of this government's record in relation to the legislation it has passed, very obviously this is going to be a very slow process.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, let the hon. member deny what the press has said about him.

Mr. Stanfield: What would you do without that article to read from?

Mr. Deachman: I am just about to read the hon. gentleman another little piece. A little later in the same column, this is what is said:

So now the Commons is back in the familiar and frustrating position in which there is only a minimum of co-operation between the Government and the Opposition to keep the wheels turning—slowly.

The House Leaders of the four parties meet fairly regularly to discuss the timetable in the Commons, but they rarely make an effective agreement.

That is how the meetings of the House of Commons leaders work. The article goes on to state:

Even when the Opposition leaders are willing to make a deal with the government to put through an item of business, they are often repudiated by their own backbenchers who see no reason to limit debate.

Mr. Alexander: What was that again?

Mr. Deachman: I have some more, Linc; just hang on to your seat.

Mr. Baldwin: What would you do without Tony?

Mr. Deachman: I will tell you what I would do without Tony. On January 30, the Ottawa Journal had this to say in an editorial, and this is not by Tony:

> Of course the opposition is not without sin in the delays the House endures. The Government's impatience with progress in the present session is made more intense by the Opposition's leisurely and meandering discussion of, for example, the CNR financing bill earlier in the session.

That is what this Tory paper had to say. These remarks and dozens more like them appeared in papers across Canada in response to the information released in January by the Government House Leader showing how much work had to be accomplished in the present session and how little willingness there was to accomplish it. Noting that the House took five days and part of a sixth day to put through the CNR bill, our friend Westell concludes:

> So when the Government and Opposition—

An hon. Member: A real friend, isn't he! That is the first real truth.

Mr. Deachman:

> —next clash on control of the House and its business, the public might ask not which is right in the particular circumstances, but whether Parliament itself can serve the national needs in the Seventies.

That is the real meat of today's debate. That I presume is the reason for the debate initiated by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). That is what raises in many minds the whole question of the adequacy of this system.

Well, if this nineteenth century institution is inadequate in the last half of the twentieth century, we should be prepared to admit it and to search for valid alternatives rather than wait until events overtake us. I do not think the Tories believe their own stuff—nor do I think the public believes it—when they tell us that the new closure rule is too severe; that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is too presidential; that ministers are not all in the House during the question period; that efficiency is smothering democracy; that the House leader is too tough; that the work program is too heavy for one session; that the committees are hamstrung; that the backbenchers are powerless and that the government is contemptuous of Parliament. I do not think the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who spoke in this debate, believes his own stuff when he says that the Prime Minister is an actor; that he functions in a vacuum; that he is callous toward the people; that he is callous toward Parliament and that his government is too technocratic.

Mr. Baldwin: What does Perry Ryan say?

Mr. Deachman: Ask him. He is closer to you than to me.

I believe the public wants us to get on with the nation's business in a modern and systematic say. I think the public is ready to see changes made in this old institution to accomplish those aims, provided we do not lose the sense of democracy which this institution preserves. I do not believe the public is fearful of examining parliamentary systems or even presidential systems, as the Leader of the Opposition calls them, in an effort to find new systems and new ways of keeping pace with the needs of Parliament. Here in Canada, in this House, we should be concerned only with finding the best system in the interests of all.

Let me dwell for a moment on some things which I believe we should be doing in this place. The government believes, and the government in England and members of Parliament in England believe as members of the parliamentary committee which went over there were told, that the government must have the right to have a reasonable program of work considered in a session.

Mr. Baldwin: Who is the judge of what is reasonable?

Mr. Deachman: You were there. The hon. member was a member of the committee and helped write the words in the report. When the report was made to the House he voted for it. I will tell the hon. member just precisely what was said.

Mr. Baldwin: I was the one who put in the word "reasonable".

Mr. Deachman: All right, good for you. The government must have the right to have a reasonable program of work considered in a session and, quid pro quo, the opposition must have reasonable time to examine the government's program before voting on it. My hon. friend agreed to all this but, in my opinion, he would be the last man in this House to co-operate with the House Leader in seeing that the things that might make this House function more successfully are made operative today in this House.

Committees must organize and plan their own work in such a way that their members are able to cope with their House and committee assignments. This must be done. An increasing number of study papers, prepared with expert professional help and investigation, must flow from committees and party caucuses so that there is an increasing input of ideas into the formation of government policy—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I could conclude in about a minute or two. I wonder if I might have the indulgence of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I am sorry but there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I believe under the rules to which we have agreed the hon. member can finish his sentence. This is permitted, but we are not going to listen to this guff all afternoon on our own time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Deachman).

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, although I am allowed to finish a sentence, as all hon. members know it is extremely difficult for a member of Parliament to construct a grammatical sentence. I hope you will indulge me. We must recognize when we come here that we do so to deal with a government program in order to see that we have the best possible program in the interests of the people; further than that—

An hon. Member: Period.

Mr. Deachman: —we must bring to Parliament new ideas from which modern and beneficial legislation may flow. This requires a much higher degree of co-operation than we have witnessed in this current Parliament and it requires a much higher level of discipline in the management of debate. It requires better organization of committee work and it requires many improvements in our staffing and working methods. These are real challenges for hon. members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, the resolution put forward by the official opposition is a far-reaching one. It seems to deal with several things. Sometimes the motions brought forward by hon. members to the right seem to be rather double jointed, something like the title of their party. Although the title of my own party contains two words, at least its name is not a contradictory one. However that may be, I intend to confine my remarks to the part of the resolution which condemns the government for its arbitrary policies of secrecy and non-disclosure. We, for our part, also think the government is secretive. We have a proposal which we have already put forward as a means to cure part of that secretiveness.

I suppose the reason that I am speaking for our party at this moment is that I have a bill which deals with government secrecy, and how to avoid it. I refer to a bill in my name in respect of public access to government information. Of course, I am very much interested also in government information. It seems to me sometimes that government information and government secrecy are interchangeable terms. The Liberal government has been spending approximately $3 million a week on government information, for the most part so far as I can judge on publicity. It spends this money through the various departments and agencies of government, many of which are staffed by good friends of mine. They are very good fellows who, for the most part, are very anxious to do a good job in their fashion, but what a fashion to operate under! We have the report of the task force on government information. This is not the report of an opposition committee; it is the report of a government commission. That report strongly criticizes the government for its failure to provide government information sought by members of Parliament as representatives of the people of Canada.

It is a fact that at this moment there are scores of motions for the production of papers on the Order Paper of the House, and we are all familiar with the recital or the set phrases used by spokesmen for the government in denying members access to those papers. The aim of these motions which we and other members put forward is to gain access to the information which will reveal the basis of the decision of the government on matters of vital interest to the Canadian public because these decisions affect the lives of the people. To the extent that we are denied that information, there is a great degree of government secrecy in that area.

The task force report—again I say it was the report of the task force appointed by the present government—was most critical of the government on this point. It pointed out that while the government is spending an estimated $148 million a year to provide publicity, largely to say how good the government and its agencies are, it withholds the very basic facts which the public's representatives want to learn.

We think that government information is desirable when it helps the public. We do not think it is desirable when it is intended to help the government. We think that government information is useful when it is information such as is needed by veterans, pensioners or health and welfare recipients. We do not think it is needed in fields such as the competition between sections of the armed services. We do not think it is needed when it is used in such advertising, for example, as was recently indulged in by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, largely, it seemed to me, to glorify the UIC.

This is not the time to go into the matter of Information Canada, but may I say in passing that I very much doubt whether the addition of this new layer of government publicity apparatus to the existing layers in the departments is going to do much to clarify, make efficient or reduce the cost of what government information should do.

As to that part of the task force report dealing with government secrecy, which is contained in pages 25 to 34, it deals with a detailed examination and criticism of the hush-hush and secrecy now observed by the government. There are also some excellent comparisons between Canada's outmoded procedure in this area and those of other countries, notably Sweden. I should like to quote very briefly from the report which indicates the difference between the Swedish method of handling government information, that is allowing the public and opposition members access to governmental facts, and that of our country. It reads:

> A full appreciation of the impact of the principle of open access can be gained only by giving some examples of the extensiveness of its operations. It applies, for example, to public documents kept by all sorts of administrative agencies, from government departments to police officers, administrative tribunals and local governments. Even parliament is under the rule; for instance, a citizen can demand to see the minutes of its committees. Moreover, anybody is entitled to ask for documents; he does not have to show that he has a legal interest in seeing them nor is he obliged to say for what purpose he wants them. To make sure that agencies do not purposely delay in answering a request, the Constitution of Sweden provides that a requested document shall be "made available immediately or as soon as possible", and the courts of Sweden in their judgments have taken this rule seriously.

A few months ago, the Southam news service, in making a survey which delved into government secrecy and the lack of access by the public to government information, said this:

> Creation of a freedom of information act such as the one on the statute books in the United States would be a way to greater access of the public to government information.

The United States act of 1966 requires federal agencies to make available for public inspection and copying all final opinions, views, statements, policies and interpretations, staff manuals and the like. The act gives to the American people the right to challenge public officials in the courts if access is refused. Such an act for the Canadian scene has been proposed by me, and without burdening the House with any of its details I will simply say that I believe the adoption of some such measure would be a step toward ending the high degree of government secrecy which now prevails. We should do this mainly by making the House, through its committees and individual members, privy to almost everything which is going on in the government. We in our party prefer that course to what the Prime Minister appears to be doing at this time in dominating the cabinet, the caucus and Parliament and making his own direct line to the public.

May I say in conclusion that we support the motion of the official opposition, not that we really believe they would do differently from those in power whom they criticise but because we oppose what is being done now.

Mr. John Roberts (York-Simcoe): For a few moments at the beginning of the speech of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) I thought we were going to have a discussion on a theme worthy of that hon. member, and indeed worthy of serious discussion and debate in the House. At the beginning of his remarks he put forward very precisely and perceptively a problem which is a continuing one in the development of governmental institutions, that tension which exists between any opposition and any government on the allocation of time, that tension and that balance which exist between the opposition's right to discuss and the government's right to present its legislation. He spoke about the difficulties and the necessity of adapting the traditional system to the needs of a modern age. This has always been a problem in British parliamentary institutions—it is not a new one. Over a hundred years ago Walter Bagehot said:

> The most imposing institutions of mankind are the oldest; and yet so changing is the world, so fluctuating are its needs, so apt to lose inward force, though retaining outward strength, are its best instruments, that we must not expect the oldest institutions to be now the most efficient. We must expect what is venerable to acquire influence because of its inherent dignity; but we must not expect it to use that influence so well as new creations apt for the modern world—

That is really the problem that faces us as parliamentarians,—the creation or adaptation of institutions to meet the modern world. What a speech the hon. member for York South could have made on that subject because of his experience and his sensitivity to political questions! Alas, he slid off into an easy attack on personalities, a smashing attack against style. I always find it rather puzzling that the hon. member for York South should be so much against style when he is so stylish himself and is married to such a stylish lady.

There were a few words in his speech about technocracy. Of course, nothing has been done in the past two years, he said. Regional development, the Criminal Code, the official languages act—an act on which both he and I worked—the committee system, tax reform, changes in foreign policy,—all this was forgotten; for him nothing has happened in the last two years. And then there was his long, rambling discussion about Denison Mines. I do not regret the speech the hon. member made; I regret very much the speech he did not make and could have made about a subject of permanent and continuing interest to members of this House.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) meandered about the subject, gingerly sidling up once in a while to an argument, as is his wont. I am puzzled by the Leader of the Opposition. Once upon a time he was the leader of a government in Nova Scotia and there was not a great deal of activity by the independent members of that legislature. It was not so much a question of how closely that government approached parliamentary democracy but what kind of oriental despotism is exercised. I say "oriental" because it was way down east.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a very curious motion indeed. I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition discussed it with the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I am not surprised to see that that right hon. member is not here, because this motion, particularly in what it says at the end, is an attack on the general theme which has been sustained by the right hon. member for Prince Albert throughout his parliamentary career. This motion scorns the government because it "endangers the balance between the two structures of government—the executive and the representative." Two structures of government, Mr. Speaker, two different functions; one independent of the other, one looking at the other, one checking on the other. This is not a description of what has been traditionally the theme of parliamentary democracy, which regards the executive as a committee of the majority party, a committee of the House of Commons, uniting the representative and governing functions. This motion rejects the fundamental parliamentary principle of making the executive and representative power—cabinet and Commons—mutually dependent. It makes them independent opposed structures. There is quite a simple description for that theory of politics. It is called the separation of powers. That is the system they have in the United States. The introduction of that system is something which the right hon. member for Prince Albert has fought against throughout his parliamentary career, and therefore I am not surprised to find him not here to support it.

Even more curious, of course, is the way in which this motion automatically assumes that the opposition members alone are the representatives of the people. They represent the citizens. They often talk about the arrogance of the government in power. I can understand that. When you don't have power you rather resent those who have it. But what about the arrogance of the opposition? They ignore the majority of the people who voted for the government.

Mr. Baldwin: A minority voted for the government.

Mr. Roberts: Yes, it was a minority vote, but I suppose that if a party which can collect barely 25 per cent of the vote wishes to say it represents the people, then it must maintain that delusion in its own eyes. Here is a government which has a majority of the members of this House. We have by far the bulk of the population supporting the government through the members of this House. But the opposition says: ignore that. Those government members speak not for the people. They, the opposition, are the representatives of the citizens. The cabinet is not representative of the citizens; they are. They manage to secure just something over a quarter of the vote, but they are the ones who are to speak for the citizens, and no one else. But they are not talking about the rights of citizens. They are merely talking about their own desire to talk, as long as they are interested in hearing themselves talk, whether or not the public is listening.

They, Mr. Speaker, are suffering from poverty. They are a poverty case. It is not a poverty of time, nor a poverty of opportunities. It is a poverty of ideas, a poverty of policies, a poverty of the capacity to communicate, and in the end, a poverty of leadership.

An hon. Member: They do a lot of talking.

Mr. Roberts: Sure, they do a lot of talking but they don't say very much, and that is their problem. Where do they stand? Where do they stand on the problems that young people face in our society? Where do they stand on the constitution? Where do they stand on the problem of drugs?

Go out through the cities of this country and ask the men in the street where the Conservative party stands on these issues, and you will find they are regarded as the grand, original know-nothing party. They wonder why nobody pays any attention to them. It is not because they have no opportunities to speak. It is because they have so little to say. As a result, they have developed a kind of foreign devil theory to describe their own inadequacies. They say it is the mean government which is depriving them of the opportunities to present their points of view.

They seem to say: never mind the funds provided us for research. Never mind each time a minister makes a statement to the press or on television, and tries thereby to communicate with the citizens of this country,—we will scorn that as an abrogation of the privileges of this House. And when a minister tries to use a modern means of communication, such as slides, a means which has been around for a long time, we will scorn that. When the government tries to provide information to the people through Information Canada, we will describe it as propaganda. When the government establishes committees of this House for the effective review of administrative decisions, we will downgrade that.

They ignore all these things, and take the attitude that the government is the scapegoat for the inadequacy of their own attempts to communicate to the people that which they do not have to communicate,—ideas and policies. The fault is not in the government but in themselves that they are underlings, and rather than look to the other side for scapegoats they should look into and search their own hearts for their inadequacies and failures to get through to the people of Canada what their position is. It might help them to do that if only they could find a position to hold, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very interesting debate thus far. I found it interesting to attempt to follow the rationale of government backbenchers trying to explain why they are powerless to influence the executive that is running this country today. They did a far-reaching job this afternoon in an attempt to convince somebody, I think really themselves, that they are useless—I mean useful around here.

An hon. Member: You were right the first time.

Mr. Horner: I will come to that later. This debate centres around the efficiency of the government. We have seen newspaper articles indicating that the government is efficient. But the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been making snap decisions. Is this efficiency? We saw a snap decision made on the Estate Tax bill, and it pretty well had the country in an uproar. We had a snap decision on the white paper on reform of taxation, and another uproar, with the result that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) does not know whether he means all that is in the white paper or not. The Prime Minister says he wants the people of Canada to tell him whether they like the white paper or not. Is this a proper kind of efficiency?

This is a democracy. In a democracy, the executive must be responsible to the elected representatives. Mr. Speaker, we have seen the roster system in operation. Nobody minds a minister being away from the House on government business, when he goes to Vancouver or overseas to study some problem. This is understandable. Every elected representative understands that point. But when Ministers deliberately stay behind the curtains, or run up to their offices, afraid to come into the House and answer questions about their responsibilities, that is not responsible government. That is not discharging the responsibilities of their office.

We hear members of the government talk about the fact that they were given a mandate. They were given a mandate to run the country—yes—but to be responsible in running it, to answer questions. We in the opposition have a mandate also, a mandate to scrutinize and to determine how legislation will be applied across the country. We heard some criticism this afternoon of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for going across the country and attempting to explain the application of the white paper. Certainly, this is correct. He has a mandate to watch. He has a mandate to examine, and to examine very carefully how the government's proposed legislation will be applied across the country. He has a mandate to inform the people.

Some hon. member opposite quoted the press a great deal this afternoon. The press have a role in democracy. Their role is to be critical, to examine closely so as to inform the people of the exact application of the legislation and how the people will be affected.

The press, of course, today are groping and grasping for more and more power. They want the complete opposition out of the House. This is the way it is in the presidential system. The Leader of the Opposition isn't around. He is not in their debates. This is the way the press want it in Canada today. They want to take over the official role of the Official Opposition. That is their aim. That is their game.

Mr. Perrault: Oh, marshmallows.

Mr. Horner: I hear some comment from that great wizard down there. He has been pretty quiet lately. He must be discontented. Debate in this House must at all times reflect the mood of the country. If it does not, democracy has failed somewhere along the line. If the country is stirred up over the white paper then this House, in which are the representatives of the people, must be stirred up over the white paper. If the country is stirred up over the lack of housing in our cities and small towns, then this House must reflect that mood and be stirred up over the question of housing.

Did the government, during the election campaign, tell the people of the country it would bring in the new estate tax legislation and implement the Carter report? Did it say it would out-Carter Carter, so to speak? It did not, and it should be made to answer for hoodwinking the people.

The restlessness of the country ought to be expressed in the House, but hon. members cannot do that because they are thwarted by the rules and the skilful manipulation of those rules by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). We all know how the committees system works. If the chairman does not turn in a report which the government favours, he is dismissed, jerked off that committee. That is what happened to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) who served on the Transport Committee; he was jerked off the committee and someone more receptive to the government's ideas was appointed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) ought to be more precise in his allegations. He is not, and therefore I cannot really respond to him. However, no such incident as he alluded to occurred so far as I am aware.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I am allowed only 15 minutes and will not waste time arguing. The hon. member knows very well what I am referring to in connection with the Great Slave Lake Railway contracts. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), who also served on that committee and also favoured a position contrary to the government's on this matter, was dismissed from the committee. There were three such hon. members, and I shall remember the third in a minute. Those three hon. members were dismissed for not following the line laid down by the government.

Mr. Baldwin: Shame.

Mr. Horner: What do the backbenchers feel about their role here? The Prime Minister's right-hand man from Toronto, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), resigned from the cabinet because he could not stomach the way this government was acting. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) left the government side of the House and came to this side to sit as an independent. What did he have to say about the rules and opportunities for participating in debates? And what did the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) have to say? I will read an excerpt from the Toronto Star of January 19:

> Givens said this makes MPs 'about as useless as an udder on a bull.'

His meaning is pretty plain. What did the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) have to say about our committees system?

He said, as reported in the Globe and Mail of February 20:

> —the government has told its backbenchers they are not to amend bills or estimates in Commons committees.

Did the people of this country give this government that kind of mandate?

An hon. Member: It should resign.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for York East also said, as reported in the Telegram of February 20:

> Although committees have been given a great deal of work to do, the government members of the committees have been instructed to make no changes to the bills coming before the committee, and to vote exactly as they are told by the government.

I will not read what opposition members are reported to have said. The hon. members for Trinity, Spadina, High Park (Mr. Deakon), York West and York East have at one time or another expressed complete dissatisfaction with the system which denies them an opportunity to participate in House of Commons debates. There you have five members representing one of Canada's major cities who completely reject the way our Parliament has been operating and who think they are about as useless as udders on a bull.

Mr. Baldwin: Other government members feel the same way, only they have not the courage to say so.

Mr. Horner: Only if ministers are in the House during the question period and answer questions can the government be made aware of the country's problems. Ministers are not here; they hide themselves during the question period. Then, too, some behave as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) behaved when he announced the reorganization of his department. Instead of announcing the reorganization in the House and answering hon. member's questions, he appeared on television at ten o'clock in the morning and made his announcement.

Other ministers behave similarly and then come to the House and table reports without giving the people's elected representatives a prior opportunity to examine them and ask meaningful questions. I have said repeatedly that behaviour such as this is unacceptable because in this way ministers are evading their responsibilities to the democratically elected representatives of the people. Sometimes I wonder if we are adopting the presidential system of government, but at least under that system there are checks and balances to the executive power. United States government committees exercise real power and check the power of the executive. Under our system we seem to be moving toward a presidential form of government without adopting the checks and balances that offset the president's power.

The motion before the House is timely and expresses clearly to any backbencher the danger Canada faces. Our parliamentary system is changing for the worse because although our Prime Minister may make snap decisions which are not always in the people's best interests, he need not answer to anyone for those decisions. The President of the Privy Council complained that the question period has become a sparring match for political points. Perhaps that is how the cabinet sees it. We try to ask our questions earnestly and obtain information on government policy, only to be met with smart replies and quick quips. For instance, if one were to check the record one would see that 90 per cent of the Prime Minister's answers are smart, political quips which contain no information. Is that what the people of Canada told him to do when they elected him? Is that the way a government responsible to its people behaves?

Our system of government is founded on the principle that the government is responsible to the elected representatives of this country. The Prime Minister has not accepted that responsibility, and until he does the agitation and unrest throughout the country will continue. Let's not fool ourselves: if a government shows no concern for its people you will see burnings, lynchings and all kinds of destruction. Just look at what has been happening south of the border. Under our system of government we reflect the country's angry mood in our debates and by demanding that the government show responsibility toward the democratically elected representatives of the people. This government has not accepted that responsibility; it has made no attempt to even become interested in it. It is no wonder the country is completely agitated and concerned. I see my time has expired, Mr. Speaker.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). I would like to remind him of some facts concerning the Great Slave Lake Railway case. It is one I was interested in and participated in to some extent. I spoke to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) to see if he was in fact yanked off the committee. He informed me he was not; he voluntarily took himself off the committee to take a trip to his constituency. I recall that the original draft report which dealt with that case was turned down by the committee. The report that was adopted was drafted by the hon. member for Crowfoot. There has been a certain amount of non-partisanship in that committee's deliberations.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? The report to which the hon. member is referring which was drafted by me and unanimously accepted, was it concurred in by the government: has the government acted on it yet?

Mr. Reid: I understand the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has been in consultation with the railway and the people making the claims to set up a proper tribunal to adjudicate the claims.

Mr. Horner: Why does the government not concur in the third report of the Transport Committee? That is the report to which you are referring.

Mr. Reid: I forget the number of the report, but the report on the Great Slave Lake Railway recommended that an investigation be made under the Inquiries Act. They are now trying to determine the type, number and quality of people to carry it out. It seems this is as reasonable an approach that any government could be expected to take.

We are discussing a rather long, rambling and very unprecise resolution:

> That this House condemns the government for its arbitrary actions and destructive policies of secrecy and non-disclosure including its attitude towards Parliament which deny the right of citizens in this country to be informed and to participate fully in the government of Canada, particularly through their elected representatives, and which endanger the balance between the two structures of government—the executive and the representative.

Mr. Baldwin: Read it again it sounds good.

Mr. Reid: I am not one of those members who speak very often in this Chamber. I have not had the opportunity to develop a speaking style and do not feel at ease when speaking in the House of Commons as do members of the opposition. It seems that when we are talking about the powers of Parliament, what we are really talking about is the quality of debate and the impact Members of Parliament can make on the general public: that is where the real power lies. This institution is not here for us to exercise power as our own right. We are here to exercise power as delegated by the people who elected us. If we are to have good debates and make our points clearly and forcibly to the public at large, the whole process must be dependent upon the exchange of ideas by members of the opposition and members of the government.

I came to this House in 1965, and it seems to me that the quality of debate has fallen off sharply since the election of 1968. The personnel on the government side have remained relatively constant; the personnel of the opposition, including the leadership, have changed. A logical analysis would lead one to believe there has been a decrease in the ability of the opposition to even oppose effectively, let alone initiate new ideas and concepts of government.

There has to be a two-way street. The House of Commons is not a forum for the government; it is basically constructed to provide a forum for the opposition. One of my frustrations as a backbencher is that the opportunities for me to speak in this Chamber are extremely limited because of our antiquated rules and the limited opportunities under those rules for members such as myself to participate. Until we have a sensible allocation of time rule in this House, government backbench members will have to pay the price; we will be unable to participate as much as we would like. It is necessary for the government to rule. For the government to do that, legislation must be passed and discipline exercised by the backbenchers in order that the greatest good can be accomplished.

I wish to say a few words about the committees system, which has been derided as a voice of the House of Commons by reason of the rules and attitude of opposition members. I get satisfaction from my committee work. I have been rather fortunate to be involved in a number of issues in which there has been a great deal of excitement and the committees have had an opportunity to make genuine contributions.

I will use as an example the experience of the Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts Committee when dealing with the Company of Young Canadians. We held extensive hearings over a six-week period. We drafted a report which was submitted to the House of Commons. After considering the report, the government introduced legislation which in the main followed the recommendations which an all-party committee had made. I would point out to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that very few party lines were drawn in that committee. The reason for this was that no party had given instructions to its members that they must take this position or that: the members were able to evolve the policy which was later accepted by the government. Certainly there were differences in detail; the members of the official opposition wished to wind up the CYC and some Liberal members voted with them, but the majority of the committee recommended that the operation should be continued under a new structure.

The Leader of the Opposition said something about removing participation from the council of the CYC. This is so, and the suggestion was included in the report but not as a strong recommendation. The report indicated that the system of participation of the CYC, by volunteers on the council, had not worked and was not likely to work in the future; therefore, if the Company was to be continued some other form of governing system had to be worked out. The government came up with the concept of a Crown corporation. This is a concept which has worked well in the past. Any Member of Parliament who has tried to get the CBC, the CNR, Air Canada or the Canada Council to change its mind once it has been made up under the Crown corporation system knows that these agencies have as much independence as they care to exercise.

I can think of one example which was raised some time ago in committee when the Canada Council had the temerity, according to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), to award Mr. Stanley Gray of Montreal a $5,000 scholarship. The members of the official opposition on that committee did everything they could to get the minister and the officials of the Canada Council to revoke the award. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition knows it was not done.

There are great powers available to members of committees if they wish to exercise them—which of course is the biggest risk of all. Many members on both sides of the House do not want to take this risk: it means exposing themselves, going out on a limb and taking your chances with the public. I feel the committee system that we now have is stronger than it has ever been. It is still evolving and getting stronger. Standing Order 65(8) sets out the powers of a standing committee. It reads:

> Standing committees shall be severally empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters as may be referred to them by the House, and, to report from time to time, and, except when the House otherwise orders, to send for persons, papers and records, to sit while the House is sitting, to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned, to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by them, and to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House.

Any fair-minded person reading that Standing Order will realize that committees have a great deal of power and authority. It is a question of how much will and desire there is to exercise those powers. We have real problems in the committees system; I do not think anyone doubts that. At the present time there are 24 committees of the House of Commons; 19 standing committees, four joint committees and one which the House approved a few weeks ago, a Special Committee on Pollution comprising 15 members. This committee has yet to be established. This gives a total of 24 committees. They require a total of 595 Members of Parliament to staff them. There are 264 members in the House. Deduct 30 cabinet members, 16 Parliamentary Secretaries, 20 members for chairmen and 20 members on the opposition front benches who do not participate continuously in committee proceedings, and one is left with 178 members who are available for active committee duties—about 3.25 to a committee.

Therefore, it seems to me that to ensure a much stronger committees system, three things should be done as a first step. The size of committees should be reduced to 12 members. We have experimented with this idea in the case of several special committees, such as the committee to consider the official languages bill. At present there are two committees of this size among our standing committees. This, it seems to me, would be a useful reform.

Second, we should reduce the number of committees from 19 to 14 or 15. Third, research facilities should be made available to committees from the Library of Parliament research staff on a better basis. At present, members of this staff are being seconded to committees by reason of a somewhat dubious procedure. The problem is that once a committee obtains the services of a research person, it rarely lets him go. If the staff of the research section were increased, or if a separate division were set up, it would make it largely unnecessary to employ outside persons, often at considerable expense.

One of the things which might be changed is the method of appointment to committees, although I have no particular quarrel with the present method. It is my experience that no member has ever been pulled off a committee for voting against the government or for exposing weaknesses of administration. Tenure is always accorded. The government is well aware that if any member was yanked out of his place there would be a tremendous outcry. So members have as much freedom in committees as they want to take. That, of course, is the key phrase. Very often, though, members who might be doing useful work in committee do not perform this work because they would prefer to see their names in the media. To be named by the media means to be spectacular and, to some extent, irresponsible because of the competition for media space among Members of Parliament. If we could forget the joy of seeing ourselves through the media we might be far better committee members and even far better Members of Parliament.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke about government hiding information. Anyone who looks at the amount of information being dredged up by committees cannot take such a charge seriously, particularly when under the current system officials of the departments, together with ministers, for extensive periods of time, are available for questioning. In addition, of course, it is possible for committees to send for papers and outside witnesses in connection with almost every subject which comes before them.

It is my opinion that Members of Parliament do not yet sufficiently appreciate the possibilities which the current rules provide. For some reason we are not prepared to do the necessary work in committees, though this would lead to greater knowledge and would obviously make us more effective Members of Parliament. It is not so much lack of information which concerns me; it is the inability of members to make good use of the information already available to them. This may be because our office facilities do not permit us to spend the time on this work that is necessary; the library research staff is overloaded. Nevertheless, in my opinion members do not take advantage of all the opportunities which now exist.

The House of Commons, and to a large extent the committees, are really a forum for the opposition. The government can take no blame or credit for a sparkling House of Commons, because the initiative must come from the opposition. The opposition has to provide the alternatives, the new approaches. I regret that when the record of this debate is read tomorrow it will probably be seen that the best speeches were made by members on the government side and not, unfortunately, by Members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Mr. MacInnis: With the time so close to the dinner recess, may I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I intend to open my remarks this evening by quoting a few excerpts from the press. When quoting passages there is always a danger, of course, that you are repeating the words of somebody who has referred to the same quotation; but even if repetition is imposed on the House, this is absolutely necessary so that the government is made to see the error of its ways. I should first like to quote an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail:

> At the time the article was written there were 45 task forces in existence compared to four royal commissions, and some 60 per cent of these were using surveys. About 18 of the task forces came directly under the Prime Minister's office or the Privy Council office.
> There are significant differences between task forces and royal commissions; perhaps the most important is that neither statute or convention requires task forces to make public their reports.
> There is a real danger in the secrecy which surrounds the surveys done by task forces.
> Those who were just surveyed do not know what the reports contain, the public does not know, parliament does not know.

When the government makes its policy decisions, it uses these reports. The public and Parliament cannot know on what facts the decision was based. It may be on factors known to all; or on secret information in the reports.

The public and Parliament cannot even know if the information was valid.

In one case it was not. After the Hellyer task force on housing reports, the government put a freeze on large public housing developments. It claimed that it did this because studies had shown that such projects had serious social, psychological and economic defects, and required further study.

It turned out later that the particular study involved had been only a pilot project designed to discover how such a study should be made. It has not surveyed a statistically meaningful group, just 100 public housing residents . . . the study was not nationally, provincially or even municipally representative. Of its use, its author said, "it's a good study—

Yet on the basis of that study the freeze was established.

This is far too dangerous a way to run a country. It opens the possibility—which cannot be checked by parliamentary opposition—that the decisions are made on inadequate or faulty research. It was another, quite unjust, effect; it provides masses of research, some of it undoubtedly of value, to experts outside government who may use it for their own purposes. This could be grossly unfair to persons and businesses surveyed, who do not have the information themselves.

Participatory democracy, if it is not to be cynical, must include feed-back as well as feed-in. The public and Parliament must be as well informed as the government if they are to challenge the government policy effectively. Never should private individuals have private use of government commission surveys.

I should like to refer to a report which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of October 24, 1969, entitled "Open government ahead":

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Trudeau, through the Throne Speech, leads us to believe he too is striving to capture that spirit (participation), however, the performance of his administration so far has been dismal in this respect.

In one breath he talks about participatory democracy and in another he refuses to reveal government deliberation and findings, even to members of his caucus.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) refuses to reveal information to his own caucus I am reminded of the set-up within the committees which were supposed to be so useful during this Parliament. There is no doubt that the committees themselves are a farce. I say this now because in essence I am quoting an hon. member of the Liberal party, a member of this House, who made a statement to the effect that Liberal members were instructed not to make any changes whatsoever in the legislation placed before committees.

If I were saying that on my own, no doubt I would be challenged on a question of privilege by someone on the other side of the House. In the end I might even have to stake my seat on that claim. I am repeating the remark made by a Liberal backbencher to the effect that the committees were useless. The government is completely ignoring the work of committees. We have had several examples of that recently. Again I say that if I were to make that statement on my own I would be challenged immediately by a member on the other side of the House and would probably have to stake my seat on that claim.

An hon. Member: Oh no; it is not that important.

Mr. MacEwan: You are waking them up, Don.

Mr. MacInnis: Don't offend the lads sitting to your front and left. Prior to the supper hour we heard the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) talk about the responsibilities of opposition in this House. I should like to know what he knows about responsibility, when he does not know what it is to sit on this side of the House seeking information and not knowing where this government is going. Is it any wonder that the opposition does not know where the government is going, when its own backbenchers do not know where it is going?

We have heard Liberal members outside this House complaining about the committees' structure; we have heard them complaining about the caucus because they cannot put their views before the caucus, and we have heard them complain that they are only allowed to speak in this House with permission.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member says "Oh, oh!" Speak to your House leader. It follows that they are not only caucusbroken and committeebroken; they are also Housebroken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis: Getting back to the question of what members of the opposition are faced with, I would refer to the question period. The question period has turned out to be a complete farce. We have a roster system. When I raised a question of privilege on the roster system a couple of weeks ago, it was accepted by Mr. Speaker; it was not ruled out. I asked for a ruling as to whether the roster system was in keeping with the qualification put on questions that are asked orally in this House every day. I say this is a violation of the question period. I can refer to precedents by a former Speaker of this House who ruled on the urgency of a question raised. It did not involve a matter of days, hours or minutes. Now, it involves a question of seconds: a question must be qualified as urgent before it can be asked in this House.

I say to the government that the practice of predetermining the absence of ministers and keeping them out of this House—they are kept out of the House, because we had the example of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) who wanted to come in and answer a question but had to get permission to do so, and on that day permission was denied him—is wrong. My question of privilege was not ruled out, and as yet there has been no ruling on it.

The roster is a complete violation of the question period, as are the qualifications placed on questions asked during that period. Let us take today, for example. The Minister of Fisheries sat dumbfounded in his seat when asked what he was going to do in respect of legislation passed in this House six years ago. He was asked what he was going to do to protect our fishermen and our fishing industry. There is no denying it—this House passed legislation six years ago that gave the Minister of Fisheries authority to protect the fishing industry and fishermen. He sat mum today; he could not, or would not, answer. Why? What is this practice doing to the question period? It is making a complete farce of the question period. In fact, Parliament is being made a farce of.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis: We have had any number of examples of this. We have had the Prime Minister rise in this House and say, in answer to a question in respect of the Manhattan project, that it was not in any way, shape or form involved in any question of Canada's sovereignty in the north. Two days ago we heard over the radio from Newfoundland a statement by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) saying there must be a joint effort between his department and the Department of National Defence to protect our north because of the question raised by the Manhattan project in respect of Canadian sovereignty in the north. This was a complete denial two days after the Prime Minister made his statement.

While we are talking about denials let us take another look at the Minister of Fisheries. He sat mute in his place despite the fact that legislation passed by the House provided him with the means of defending and protecting the Canadian fishing industry. This is the same minister who has gone around the country condemning his own government. The Prime Minister said not too long ago that there were going to be no loose-lipped statements made across this country by ministers. At one time it was an accepted principle that if a minister made a statement outside the House, unless he said he was speaking personally and on his own account, any statement he made outside the House was, in effect a statement of government policy.

Let us look at what the Minister of Fisheries has done to his own government. He has completely denied it. He has criticized and condemned his own government; yet he sits here and enjoys a seat on the executive of this country. He sits in the government with a Prime Minister who maintains he is going to maintain discipline within his cabinet. He is maintaining discipline all right! He is shoving the backbencher down, to use his own phrase, to a nobody. That is what he said we were, and that is what he is saying you are over there. You are nobody outside the House; you are nobody inside the House; you are nobody at caucus, and you are nobody in committee.

The Prime Minister is allowing the Minister of Fisheries to get away with a condemnation of his own government. Let me quote from a remark he made in British Columbia not too long ago:

> I don't believe all that I read about dying lakes and sickening seas. Most of it is poppycock—written by novices who are reaching for headlines—

That is, anybody who questions pollution in this country or says anything about it is just a novice reaching out for headlines. That is what the minister said in British Columbia. Let me now read what the government has said—and the Minister of Fisheries is part of the government. I quote from the Throne Speech:

> The evidence of past failure to rehabilitate our water resources is there for all to see—befouled water, despoiled beaches, rotting marine vegetation, and diminished fishing.

If this is not a complete contradiction by the Minister of Fisheries in respect of his own cabinet and government, what is it? Where is this Prime Minister with his discipline? Where is he now in respect of his statement that no minister will go around the country making loose-lipped remarks about government policy? Here we have a minister completely condemning his own government, the members of which sit in silence when legislation of his House provides them with ways and means of protecting our fishermen. They do not answer. They contradicted their own Prime Minister two days after his back was turned.

Then we have the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) with his concern about the recognition of Red China. This is a dandy! Red China must be recognized. Why must we recognize Red China? The minister says it is so we can bring influence to bear in respect of peace in the world. Let me tell you that nations with far greater influence than Canada have recognized Red China, and they are not influencing Red China in any way, shape or form. This is a lot of poppycock, using the words of the Minister of Fisheries. This is a lot of nonsense. Twenty million Canadians will not influence 700 million or 800 million Chinese. They will make up their own minds. The minister of external affairs is wasting an awful lot of the Canadian taxpayers' money and time in trying to bring about this recognition. I am reminded of what one old philosopher said about Red China. He said—and this should be given considerable consideration—that he thinks it would go well with a white tablecloth.

When asked if Canada would maintain its boycott against Rhodesia, the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not take a better line on the colour problem. He said we would maintain the blockade on Rhodesia rather than give recognition, in order to bring about a more satisfactory solution. He cannot solve the problem in that country, yet he wants to go to work on 800 million Chinese.

We have the Prime Minister going about this country taking chips off the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans). He thinks it is great sport to make fun of the mail service of this country. No doubt there is reason to take chips off the Minister of Communications because the mail services are fouled up. But what does the Minister of Communications do—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Government Administration

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this debate I heard a very precise quotation from Machiavelli by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). But had he examined the book a little further he would have found that a worth-while prince, having encountered opposition to his plans, shall take good advice and shall continue his course of action in such a way that will make him loved and revered throughout the nation.

No one in this House would dare accuse me of ever kow-towing to either government edict, the Prime Minister's edict or anyone else's edict. I have always spoken however I thought right. I do not deny the statements I made 18 months ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not consider what is the great privilege of the House that they so fondly protect and want back again. One would imagine that prior to this administration this House was a most powerful body. It was not. It was a club. It was a luxurious and very exclusive club, but nevertheless it was a club. The committees had no meaning and this House had no meaning. We talked, not to each other but at each other. It was sad.

We discussed estimates, for example, and when the estimates were before us we could discuss any subject we desired. An hon. gentleman not now with us, from Fort William, regularly moved that the estimates be reduced from $700 million, $800 million or $100 million to $1. It was a vote of non-confidence. We were expected to be able to examine the estimates, but this was not the case. I do not deny for a minute that when this administration took over—and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not deny it either—the amount of policy decision-making was nil. It was recognized that government policy by and large was dictated by the elite, whether administrative, financial or other economic elite. It was the Prime Minister's determination to change the course of this Parliament.

An hon. Member: So he could do it himself.

Mr. Otto: No. It was his determination that more voice should be allowed in respect of policy decisions made in this House or in committees. The introduction of the regional desks was an idea. It has not developed as had been expected, but on the other hand I think it was a good idea. The regional desks are now helpful to members although they are not a substitute for this House of Commons or the members who sit here.

The committees system about which I spoke was confined at one time, but I can assure the House that this situation no longer exists. Indeed, members of the committee are free to alter legislation. As an example, a suggestion that went before the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development came forth in this House directly contrary to government opinion and yet it was accepted. Recently the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) had to bring forward an amendment in respect of the Research Development Corporation bill which was not to his liking, but it was the decision of the committee which put it forward.

If, indeed, there is not enough input into committees by members, it is our own fault because we have the opportunity to digest, examine and carefully go over all legislation. We do not do this because we have still ingrained in us the idea of opposition in the House. Every innovation is immediately contested by the opposition who think that the rights of Parliament are being abrogated. In fact, on one occasion the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) and I decided it would be worth while to go over to the opposition just to show them how to oppose. They have not taken advantage of the news media to form an effective opposition. Instead of taking advantage of all the powers the committees now have and all the opportunities to contribute effectively and knowledgeably, they sit here and complain about the good old days—but the good old days were not the good old days.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Otto: I will answer questions after my few remarks. Some mention was made of the question period. One would imagine, and we and the people of Canada are supposed to imagine, that members who ask questions are really seeking information. That is nonsense. They know the answer, otherwise they would not ask the question. Now we have a committees system whereby members can ask questions until they are blue in the face. Members need not pass estimates or legislation until they are satisfied.

Mr. Danforth: That is wrong.

Mr. Otto: It is not wrong. There has been a great complaint that this House has lost its power and that the Prime Minister is somehow deemed to be a dictator. We have a system in caucus whereby all members will be consulted first, as the caucus chairman can tell you, on policy decisions. Now there must be approval by the elected representatives before policy decisions are considered by the committee of cabinet. I say this with all respect and without partisanship. There is an avenue that I would like the House leader to consider, because opposition does not generate from the Prime Minister to giving committees the right and the power to examine and scrutinize the estimates and make recommendations which the government will accept.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I am sure that if we showed responsibility —and judging from this motion and the speeches made in the House I cannot see that we have yet shown it—and if the opposition did an effective job in accordance with the new procedures, we would have as backbenchers and representatives of the people some say with regard to the estimates, the money which the administration so badly needs. If indeed we exercised the power to control the estimates and made recommendations as to how much money the administrators would have, you would be surprised how important the backbenchers would become.

I think that day will come. But we cannot and should not blame the Prime Minister for not trying to get more input from Members of Parliament. He has done everything. He has made changes in the cabinet structure and in the caucus; he has allowed members to bring in new ideas and new legislation, at times to the embarrassment of ministers; he has allowed amendments to be made and he has allowed everyone to speak up. Now the responsibility is ours.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) wishes to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the statement just made by the hon. member. I will qualify my question by stating that I have in my hand a newspaper clipping in which the hon. member's picture appears and in which he is quoted as saying:

> The instructions were that bills are to leave the committees in exactly the same form as they enter—

The statement as quoted is in direct contradiction to what he just said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Otto: There is probably one member in this House who will not admit there is a change when he sees one. I am not that member. The hon. member who just raised the question of privilege may hold on to his views until the end; however, so far as I am concerned, when I see a change I recognize it and I give credit to the Prime Minister who made the change.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danforth: Yes, sir, Mr. Prime Minister, sir.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I ask the member whether he has completely withdrawn the statement he made in respect of the committee hearings.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: That is not a question of privilege; it is an interruption.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have grave doubts whether this is a question of privilege. It seems to me the member raised a point of debate between himself and the hon. member for York East and I do not see how this constitutes a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: It is a question of privilege if any hon. member tries to impose an untruth on this House. I do want to know whether the truth is in his statement which I quoted, or in what he said just now.

Mr. Otto: The hon. member is obviously not rising on a question of privilege. However, I will say right now that obviously the Prime Minister paid attention to what I and others have said, and considered it carefully. He thought there was some truth in it and he changed his idea and said, "Go ahead, fellows".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: Yes, sir, Mr. Prime Minister, sir.

Mr. Otto: There is a big change, a very radical change in the composition of Parliament as it is now. The committees have a lot of power.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: You must be going to the Senate.

Mr. Otto: But, of course, with members such as the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) it does not matter how much power the committees have, they will never get anywhere. Indeed, sir, I rose to my feet without attempting to deny what I had said. I was trying to point out in all seriousness that the committees can be very effective. I am sure that with the research assistance and the greater facilities we now have, we can contribute a great deal to the policy decisions of this government and take them out of the hands of the administration and the elite.

However, what worries me is that as long as this situation goes on, the elite and the administration will continue to hold power because we have not shown responsibility. We have to accept these changes because other changes may not be all to the good. By and large we now have a system that can work. It needs only our desire and our willingness to make it work. It is no good looking back to the old days: the old days were not that good.

If hon. members examine the old days carefully, they will discover that the House was unable to work effectively and that this disgusted and frustrated most new members. The House became a club to which one had to become accustomed. Now there is a new avenue. I plead with all members to make use of it, and I guarantee that the Prime Minister will not oppose it. He wants contributions from members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. The question can be put at this point only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: I should like to thank the House for being so generous to me. Is it not true that under this change, the hon. member's party in fact only meets in caucus every two weeks, that government members have to file notice before raising a question—

An hon. Member: Oh, no!

Mr. Horner: —and in fact they are given only three minutes to speak? Is it not true, also, that the hon. member is a member of only one committee at present, which happens to be the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, which is a very innocuous committee and studies little of the affairs and the economy of the country? Is this not a fact, and is this the reason for the great change we see in the hon. member?

Mr. Otto: I can say that every statement is untrue. First, the caucus functions very well—

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I take it the hon. member for Crowfoot is now rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Horner: My question of privilege is this: The hon. member stated that every part of my statement is untrue. I point out to you, sir, that I have before me Votes and Proceedings and a list of standing, joint and special committees in alphabetical order appended to Hansard. I have checked the membership of every committee, and I see the name of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) under only one committee, namely the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders. We all know that under the rules of the House it takes three minutes or less for the name of an hon. member to be put foward as a member of a committee.

I defy the hon. member to say that he is on more than one committee at present. According to the list of members of committees as recorded in Hansard, the hon. member's name appears only once. He is on one innocuous committee that studies very little of the affairs and the economy of the country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if we are not on a matter of debate here.

Mr. Benjamin: We are, but it is fun.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am prepared to hear the hon. member for York East, but I would remind hon. members to keep to the matter under discussion. I would prefer to recognize the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau).

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I attempted to answer the hon. member calmly, and I am still trying to do so, but if he checks carefully he will find that I am also a member of the Committee on Health and Welfare and Social Affairs, a meeting of which I attended today. I also sat on the Finance Committee this morning, and in fact I did not sit on the other committee at all.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, on that very point of order I say—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As I said before, I think we are entering into a debate. There seems to be a consensus that each hon. member has 15 minutes. Since there are a number of hon. members who wish to speak, I now recognize the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Horner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that I have before me the latest Hansard available, for Wednesday, March 4. The hon. member's name is not shown on the Health and Welfare Committee and it is not on the Finance Committee. I am not denying for one minute that he sat on those committees, but as far as the record goes he did not participate in them. I can only assume he must have had the consent of his party in order to participate as a full, voting member. But according to the record, which is the only thing I can go by, he was not participating in those committees today as a full, voting member.

Mr. Danforth: So there!

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I will wait until order is restored so as to be heard. I am pleased to be able to express my views on the motion presented by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), motion that is being discussed in the House today and deals with the government's policy of secrecy and non-disclosure of information they owe first to the House and secondly to the Canadian people.

We have noticed for a certain time that many ministers are absent from the House. Such absences may be motivated but it seems that the ministers of the most important departments are mainly the ones who are not in the house. In fact, I have not been able during the last four days to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) because he was not in the House. I think that since this roster system was established, the order of attendance has not been respected. I suggest the ministers have been too often absent from the House during the last few days.

When the ministers are in the House, especially following a federal election, they give us fairly good answers, for they work zealously, as I have noticed since 1968. However, for the last six months, sound and valid replies are getting ever scarce and we can rightly complain about the information we have received to date.

For instance, when we ask questions about the C.B.C., the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) takes pleasure in saying that it is a crown corporation and that he does not want to interfere in its business. Yet, we know full well that the C.B.C., even taking into account the services it gives, spends ten times what a private concern would spend. In fact, the C.B.C. spends money extravagantly; this would not be tolerated by the most spendthrift, the richest private enterprise. Yet, the minister responsible for it has never brought up any of those problems.

It must surely come to this, as it did in the case of the Company of Young Canadians: some public man, such as the mayor of Montreal, or the chairman of the executive council of that city, or someone else who has nothing to do with federal politics, will levy serious charges against the C.B.C. or the federal government, based on information obtained from its police force or other sources of information. But, if damning evidence is produced, as in the case of the C.Y.C., the government may deem it advisable to take the necessary steps to hide the problem, to work its way around is, so that the accusers might not be proved right.

We notice that information is not given first in the House. In fact, we often get it from sources other than the legitimate one, that is the House of Commons.

I should also like to say a word about the committees. There is some talk about democracy in the committees, but the government in office as well as the other parties, would have a hard time convincing the government members to attend the sittings of the committees. Why? Because, in spite of the fine promises made by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) advocating democracy, the members cannot play their part as representatives of the people because no information is available to them.

The government makes use of its majority to eliminate witnesses, as it happened with regard to certain suggestions which I had made. At the time my witnesses were not allowed to appear because the government was afraid of them. In that instance, the majority was used to conceal as much information as possible and which is worse, on two occasions, committees adopted a report which the government refused to accept later on.

There is an increasing tendency to conceal facts, figures, in short everything. I would not want us some day to become totally useless in the House and in the committees. That is why I thought it advisable to say a few words on the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition.

Every time Parliament has been faced with a problem, instead of asking hon. members to study it in detail, to undertake research in order to solve it, the government has deemed necessary to appoint royal commissions. In so doing, several problems have been removed from the authority of Parliament and their solution further delayed.

• (8:50 p.m.)

On July 17, 1969, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), put on the order paper question No. 2685 which read as follows:

1. How many study or investigating boards and commissions were appointed by the Canadian government since 1950?

2. (a) What was the cost of each such commission?

(b) What were these commissions and what were the names of the members of each?

The answer was as follows:

As for the cabinet of the Prime Minister and the office of the Privy Council—

—it concerns two ministers only, the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council—

—the answer is as follows:

1. 50 royal commissions and 3 task forces.

The setting up of each of these commissions has cost the Canadian people millions of dollars since 1950. What happened to the information collected by these royal commissions and presented to Parliament in the form of recommendations? Apparently, not even 5 per cent of them were ever implemented.

We kept on the old tracks just as if those commissions had not been set up. It seems that they were used mainly to reward the commissioners. They were on very friendly terms with the party and were paid handsomely. That was the only tangible result.

Mr. Speaker, what I think is strange and has been especially so for some time, is the fact that the government, in order to inform the public, builds a political smoke screen, dreams up political information and generates invisible enemies.

After the 1968 election, the federal government undertook a fight against poverty. What solutions did it bring in to solve the problems of poverty in Canada? Let us ask the businessmen, especially since they got to know the white paper. Nothing was done. However, the people were told that we were preparing to fight poverty. Recently, we undertook a fight against inflation.

The Canadian people is provided with illusions and false information.

The federal government claims that it will solve the problems of poverty and of inflation.

It indulges in a witch hunt because he cannot solve either of these problems. Instead of attacking the real enemies of our economic system, it creates enemies for himself. It cannot act otherwise because our economic system is perverted. Instead of doing something to change the system, it strikes at its results, it misinforms the Canadian people, feeds them with illusions and gives them false hopes.

The Prime Minister said in the House, on Tuesday, February 10, 1970, about the establishment of Information Canada, as reported in Hansard at page 3406, and I quote:

> The organization will be divided into four branches: one for planning and research; one to produce and distribute information; one to gather and publish information on the views of the public; and an administrative branch.

When we see the government acting this way, we conclude that such information will serve at the very most to sell a policy which the Canadian people refuse to accept. In fact, the people have lost their illusions, because they have realized in the past two years that the government's promises have not been kept.

Mr. Speaker, Information Canada will be no more than a refuge for some members who will be defeated in the next election, so that they may continue to promote the policy of the Liberal party.

We know the kind of information that the government makes known. One only has to examine the government's publicity budget for last year, which was published today, to know that the government does not hesitate to spend for the purpose of boosting its own image.

Information Canada should exist right here within Parliament. There is no need to set up structures or new agencies, to hire thousands of employees, to spend millions of dollars, in order to inform the Canadian people. It would only be necessary to ask the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to be more objective in its coverage of political events rather than welcoming petty politicians brought in by friends.

That would be the best way of ensuring Canadians a good information service, as long as its structures are established outside Parliament. How are we to assure the Canadian people of objective information, if it is to undergo the censorship of the party in power. How will the Canadian people be made aware of the activities of the members of Parliament, or of the proceedings and decisions of committees, if they have to rely on whatever information the government in office is willing to pass on to them through a body wholly set up by this government who will use it for its own purposes.

[English]

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand-Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the temper of the House has cooled a little in the last 20 minutes and that we no longer have the heat that was generated when the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) spoke. I was absolutely amazed by the hon. gentleman's metamorphosis, by his transformation, his conversion which, as one hon. member said, almost equals the conversion of Paul on the road to Damascus.

The constituencies of York East and York West are represented here by hon. members who fascinate me. There is the hon. member for York East, who spoke a few minutes ago, and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens), who at one time was mayor of Toronto. We all know what the hon. member for York West said outside the House some time ago. He roars like a lion in front of the television cameras and newspaper reporters outside the House, but in the Chamber he bleats like a lamb.

Mr. Baldwin: Or squeaks like a mouse.

Mr. Peddle: To the press he said this House spends most of its time discussing wet wheat, baby seals and the Newfie Bullet. What utter garbage! The people who talk about wet wheat represent those concerned about wet wheat; those who talk about baby seals represent people concerned about baby seals, and those who talk about the abandonment of the so-called Newfie Bullet are members who represent those concerned about its abandonment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peddle: If the hon. member for York West wanted to perform his duties properly, he should have talked about urban problems in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peddle: And he should not have uttered the kind of drivel that sometimes has great appeal to the press. The hon. member for York East has said that things changed during the past year. I agree with that. They have become worse and are getting worse every day. I see no improvement in the committees system. I do not know if the hon. member is to be promoted to the Senate, but something has happened to make him change his mind. Certainly, if he displays such great inconsistency he will not be elected any more. A few months ago he blasted the committees system, but now everything is suddenly much better. I submit that everything is much worse. Now the hon. member is the great defender of committees; everything is fine now. Something is wrong somewhere. It might be, as I have said, that the hon. gentleman is contemplating a Senate appointment, or his discomfiture may have been lessened by the prospect of an assured salary increase.

• (9:00 p.m.)

The hon. member referred to regional desks. He said they were designed for and served the purpose of helping members. I do not know what members he is referring to. I have no idea what a regional desk looks like. I do not have any idea who occupies the regional desks. They are as far removed from members on this side of the House as some of the systems in Washington: we do not have any more access to them. The hon. member remarked that he was not satisfied with the way things are going. I understand there have been a number of innovations in his party. Caucus meetings are now held once every two weeks. If you want to say a word in caucus, you have to give advance notice and state what you want to discuss. Someone then tells you whether you will be permitted to do so. That is a change, although I do not call it a change for the better.

I raised a question of privilege in this House today which was dealt with by Your Honour. The very smooth Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) is building up a reputation in Canada of being a very urbane, suave and smooth operator.

An hon. Member: Slippery.

Government Administration

Mr. Peddle: The actions of the minister in the past few days have certainly not been smart. I have been outsmarted many times. I do not object to that. But it is not a matter of being outsmarted; it is that of a minister of the Crown making use of his office to give out information before it is made available to the House. The Minister of Transport took it upon himself, in order to further his political ambitions, to make this information available in the province of Newfoundland four hours before it was available to this House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Peddle: I was elected a Member of Parliament and am not embarrassed by such a situation: that is not what bothers me. I want to feel that I am earning my salary. The people who elected me in effect help to pay my salary. I try to do my job. When a member is made to feel impotent by a member of the inner circle of this government, it does not appear too good for the future of this institution. If it continues, I do not mind saying that I will give very serious consideration to whether I want to continue as a member of this institution. I do not want to be here as a figurehead. Members of Parliament have certain responsibilities and the majority accept them. I do not think they should be interfered with by a minister or anyone else. If the Minister of Transport wants to further his political image in Newfoundland, let him go back and enter provincial politics. God knows, there is a big enough vacancy there now. That is where his talents could be put to use.

There are a number of instances of our being treated in a cavalier manner. I am not whining, Mr. Speaker. On April 30, 1969, as recorded at page 1868 of Hansard, I directed a question to the Acting Minister of Transport. I asked him to report on a serious CN bus accident in Newfoundland in which nine people were injured. The bus was completely destroyed. The acting minister said, "I will be pleased to investigate and let you know." That was in the days when that department and its minister were on the move. Within a few weeks the present minister was appointed to that portfolio. On May 20, a month later, I asked the minister if he would investigate that accident, and he said he would be glad to investigate it. I am still waiting for a reply, Mr. Speaker. That is just one example; there are many, many more.

The Minister of Transport, despite the image he is building, is turning out to be one of the greatest procrastinators we have seen in quite a while. He says, "I will be glad to look into it." Everybody is glad to look into it. I would be glad to get the answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peddle: Recently there was a mammoth re-organization of the minister's department. There was a hastily-called meeting of the Transport Committee with less than one hour's notice. We were told, "Come on down; the minister has some disclosures to make." I had no idea what the minister was going to talk about. The fact is that he called us together to take care of the niceties. He then felt everything was fine and gave the whole story to the press. I suggest that with a matter of this importance and the far reaching changes proposed, the minister did not clear himself by calling a hasty meeting of whatever members happened to be around. The chairman was out of town and many other members could not be reached.

It is for reasons such as this that our motion is being discussed. The House condemns the treatment we are receiving at the hands of this government. The government talks about the opposition whining. One would almost think we were supposed to be a cheering section for this government, but we are not —we are the opposition. Surely the government knows it is not our function to cheer them. Our function is to oppose them. God knows, there are enough government members to cheer when they are told.

I would like to see the hon. member for York East now. He is probably busy signing letters answering complaints about the government and its white paper proposals. I would like to see the hon. member justify the position he has taken tonight as compared with the position he took less than a year ago outside this House. It is the old, lion and lamb routine. Maybe he is in fact going to the Senate and is not worried about being re-elected. That is what we have to assume. There are times when I get so disgusted at the role of a Member of Parliament under this administration that I do not know what to think.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peddle: There has been a lot of talk about committees. As far as I can see, all that is accomplished in committees is the government succeeding in fragmenting the members. Members cannot attend all committee meetings. Sometimes there are a half-dozen committees sitting simultaneously. This not only fragments the members but it fragments the press coverage, because members of the press cannot attend all the meetings simultaneously.

What about Information Canada? I say it is part of a system to see that Canada gets as little information as possible. The Information Canada program, which is just around the corner, is really going to be a beauty. It should be called Misinformation Canada.

Mr. McGrath: They don't need Information Canada; they have the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Peddle: We were sold a bill of goods in 1968 when this government was elected. I do not think the time is too far away when Canadians will start having second thoughts. I hope that time is not too far away. I will support the motion before the House. I am sure if the members who are present, and some who are not, were allowed to vote according to their conscience and what they know to be facts, they would also support the motion.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is usually a privilege to be involved in any of the debates which occur in this chamber. One looks forward to seeing a spark of life from time to time on the opposition benches, so we patiently await an opposition day to examine the subject matter which the opposition itself, as so often happens, has an opportunity to choose for discussion. Today, for a change, we are not talking about grain; we are talking about the proceedings of this House.

An hon. Member: You don't like the farmers, then.

Mr. Jerome: I notice that as soon as I begin to make a few disparaging remarks in connection with debates in this Chamber on the subject of grain there is a nervous reaction on the part of members on the opposition benches, because grain seems to be the only thing they know about.

An hon. Member: We know corn when we hear it.

Mr. Jerome: You certainly know it well enough to have dished it out here all day, by the bushel; it is all we have been hearing since this debate began. What puzzles me about the subject matter of this motion, if we can understand its terms, assuming it is intended as a general criticism of the way in which the government is conducting itself in relation to the running of parliamentary business, is that the opposition should have chosen to devote their time to it. I say this as a new member of the House, because I had the privilege of being a member of the Special Committee on Procedure set up to recommend changes in the rules of this House.

An hon. Member: That's what is wrong.

Mr. Jerome: In this committee, whose membership included frontbench representatives of the opposition, we held what I thought were productive meetings to determine some of the changes which we thought would improve and expedite the conduct of the public's business in this Chamber. After three months had been spent on this work, a debate was begun just before Christmas on proposed rule 16A, as it was called—the rule allocating time in this House. As we all know, the opposition then employed a tactic which they use so well, that of digging in their heels and resisting any change in the rules. That is fine. It suited their political advantage to go to the press and say, "We are resisting these changes because the government is attempting to push a steamroller over us and muzzle us in the House of Commons."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jerome: Here, again, the cages are being rattled opposite. What seemed to escape them at the time, and it still does, is the fact that opposition members already take up the majority of the time in this House in speaking—

Mr. MacInnis: Yes. You are not allowed to do so.

Mr. Jerome: What is not apparent to members opposite is that under a time allocation rule the time they take up speaking in the House of Commons will not be reduced. Members of the opposition who every once in a while begin to shout, rattle the tops of their desks and pound, will be speaking for the same length of time as they are now, taking up 65 per cent of the time of the House. The only difference is this: in the same parliamentary year they will have to address themselves to a variety of subjects; they will not be able to enjoy the comfort of spending half their time talking about damp grain, as they do now, a subject on which they all seem to be expert. They will have to consider a number of pieces of legislation, components of a full, dynamic, interesting and intelligent government program.

This seems just too much for them to tackle in the course of an ordinary government year. What do they say? Their theme is: We are the sacred opposition and we defend to the death our right to grind this place down to a slow pace sufficient that we can stand the action. This is their achievement. This was the position they took in the debate over two weeks at Christmas time and during six other long weeks at the end of the session before the summer recess. There is no reason they should not continue to behave like this for the rest of their parliamentary lives.

Today there is a gleam of hope, because we see before us on an opposition day a subject which has to do with the conduct of Parliament. Now we shall have an example of the positive view of hon. members opposite who have arranged for this subject to be debated in order to put forward their ideas before subjecting the government to a vote of confidence on the basis of their contributions. So we know that today we are getting their very best thinking on the subject; we can examine Hansard tomorrow and read it carefully line after line in case we have missed some of the pearls of wisdom they have dropped today. Hansard will stand as a record for all time of the powerful, dynamic suggestions for improvement in accordance with the programs of the parties opposite. Their best talents will set forth their theories and tell us exactly how Parliament should be run.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I say to you right now that without having had the opportunity to read any of the Hansard reporters' notes I shall not be holding my breath until tomorrow, because I have been in the chamber during the debate today and I have not heard one single worth-while suggestion from the other side. And I challenge any of them right now to come up with a single proposal which was put forward today for the improvement of the running of this House.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has issued a challenge and an hon. member rises to respond, but the rules will not allow him to accept the challenge at this time.

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, surely when a supporter of the government issues a challenge of that kind he should give up some of his own time in order that the challenge may be accepted.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the rules do not allow for that.

Mr. Jerome: My point is that during all these hours the party opposite has had time in which to put forward suggestions.

Mr. Greene: They have not had an idea since Diefenbaker.

An hon. Member: Who is a windbag now?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) has the floor. I suggest he be given the opportunity to try to make a speech.

An hon. Member: He is trying.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Try harder.

Mr. Jerome: Before we leave the subject there are one or two interesting observations I should like to make about the advantage which members opposite take of the way the House is run at the present time. Perhaps the hon. member opposite who was recently on his feet would be interested to know, for example, that in one of the standing committees of the House—and in our committees it seems to be generally accepted that there is good opportunity for opposition members to participate in a meaningful way in criticizing the government—it was suggested by the opposition members present at the organizational meeting at the beginning of the year that the election of the chairman and vice-chairman should not be restricted to government party members, but that other parties in the House should be represented. Accordingly, an opposition member was put forward as vice-chairman of one of the standing committees. However, following this decision the attendance of opposition members at the meetings of that committee fell to just about nil.

• (9:20 p.m.)

As if that were not enough, about three weeks ago the same committee met in order to make certain decisions relative to a report that was to be made to this House. I am not passing on information given me by somebody else; I am speaking from my own experience as a member of that committee. I will not specify the names of the delinquent members because it would embarrass them, but they could be named. However, there is a principle involved here. The committee was staffed with a sufficient number of government members to reach the decisions necessary for the report, but after waiting for half an hour the committee had to disband because no opposition members from any party showed up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jerome: If the hon. member from Cape Breton wants to get to his feet and ask me for details, I would love to give them to him. However, I do not see him on his feet.

Mr. MacInnis: Surely, Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has asked me to get to my feet for the second time, you will permit the question to be put?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the hon. member permit me to accept his challenge?

Mr. Jerome: Delighted.

Mr. Baldwin: Just briefly, for one minute.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There has to be order in the House. The hon. member is introducing a novel concept in a debate in the House of Commons in suggesting that an hon. member who has the floor may yield to another member for a certain period of time and then regain the floor. I am afraid our practice does not allow that. The hon. member can accept a question, but he cannot say he will yield the floor for a certain period to allow a challenge to be taken up. I suggest the hon. member be allowed to make his speech.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I have one or two comments to make and then I will be delighted to receive a question from the opposition House leader. I notice, tragically enough, that although he participated in the special committee that dealt with changes to the rules and contributed many times in a very vigorous way, so far today the hon. member has not seen fit to take part in the debate.

Mr. Baldwin: Then I will now. Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Jerome: As soon as I am finished, I will, if that is permissible, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has cast reflections on the operations of this House, and therefore is casting a reflection on the Chair. Furthermore, I suggest no member should be permitted to use his time to challenge opposition members and then not accept the challenge when it is taken up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I was only curious to know whether any of the opposition members were ready to get to their feet so I could give them the details of which I speak.

Mr. Baldwin: I am.

Mr. Jerome: If any hon. member wants the information, I shall be happy to provide it in a minute. There is one closing observation that should be made, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the way of the House operates. At the present time, out of around 155 to 160 days in the parliamentary calendar, about 40—certainly 25 per cent of the time—are designated as days on which the opposition either control entirely the subject matter of the debate, or are at liberty to discuss as freely as they wish any subject in connection with which they may wish to criticize the government. I refer to the number of days allotted to the opposition on which they control the subject matter of the debate; to the budget debate; and also to the Throne Speech debate in which opposition members participate fully, criticizing the government on a whole range of subjects.

In addition, there is provision for setting aside time for emergency debates, which is always an opposition prerogative. On top of that, there is the time occupied by the opposition during private members' hour. The opposition is also on its feet for about 95 per cent of the time allotted to the question period. Then, of course, there is the system under which time in any given debate is allotted. As we know, there is always a desire in any given debate to recognize opposition members and consequently there is more participation by opposition members than by members on the government side. Accordingly, as a matter of simple mathematics, the time taken by opposition members in directing themselves to the subjects being considered is perhaps double the time taken by government members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg).

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I should mention to the House that it has been agreed that the last few minutes might be divided between the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). Since each member will have but a short time, I hope not too much time will be taken with points of order.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I want to make it clear that I said that at the end of my speech, which is now, I would be perfectly prepared to answer questions, and I stick by what I said.

Mr. Hees: Yes, on somebody else's time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The two members Your Honour referred to are most intelligent, and I shall not take much of their time. The only thing I was going to suggest was that since the previous speaker has said nothing so far, the House give him unanimous consent to continue for another 20 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, all we have heard today from government members is a defence of a weak government, which weakness has, I am sure, been well exemplified today. When people ask us what kind of government that party over there has, I suggest that we can only reply that it is a mythology government, which means a government on the borderline of philosophy and science. Today we have a straight case of all philosophy and no realism on the part of hon. members opposite.

I suggest that when the hon. member opposite talks about the way members of the opposition deal with issues that are critical to the nation at the present time—I refer to agriculture—he fails to realize that over 50 per cent of the people of this country are, directly or indirectly, connected with agriculture; and when these people become unemployed, the responsibility falls on his shoulders and the government's.

We also heard the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) stand in his place and criticize the members of the New Democratic Party for the number of Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers that they have on the Order Paper at the present time. The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto), as well, unfortunately, as one of the members of the official opposition, criticized our demand that these Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be passed so that the information is made public and all concerned can find out what is going on.

We are also criticized for taking the time of the House. I suggest this situation is an idiotic one, since there is much talk about having an effective opposition in Parliament. In view of the pittance given opposition members to conduct research, how can there possibly be an effective opposition? That is why we must ask for these papers. It utterly amazes me to hear government members stand in their places and ask why we want these returns. Even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), in one of the debates on a Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers, was very concerned at the number of sheets of paper that would have to be produced if the motion were granted.

I am sure everyone knows they make up copies only for the people who are interested. To add insult to injury, they came up with microfilm a short time ago. After we asked, the minister assured me—as recorded in Hansard for February 5—that these 19 consultant's reports would be available to me and I could see them in his office. I wrote the minister a letter dated February 19 asking whether he could advise me if I could see the 19 consultant's studies referred to in my Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers. I said in my letter:

> Of course, I am certain you realize that it would be impossible to spend the time required to pursue these studies in a short period of time. In view of this, would it be possible for me to borrow these reports for a limited time to be studied in my office or residence? At the same time I would appreciate knowing if the contents of such studies are to be treated confidentially or am I at liberty to treat the contents as public information?

Finally, on February 23 I received a letter from the executive assistant saying:

> —your request will be brought to the minister's early attention.

Is this what we call divulging the information the public of Canada must have? I suggest the motion introduced by the official opposition is quite in order. If any member cannot understand the motion, there is something very wrong so far as his intelligence is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, we are talking about research people being assigned to various parties. How can any member of this House undertake the type of research we need when we do not have research people who are provided with the material needed for such research? At the same time, how can the press of this nation possibly report to the people unless it, too, has access to these papers?

Another short comment, in view of the agreement we have made, is that it is absolutely impossible under present circumstances for members who have small offices and one secretary to undertake the type of research and study necessary to form an effective opposition or to be an efficient member of the House. I offer this as constructive criticism to the President of the Privy Council and suggest that something be done to provide each member with an office of his own. This must be done if we expect to have an effective opposition and effective backbenchers on either side of the House.

When the President of the Privy Council was speaking this afternoon he said that sometimes questions we place on the Order Paper have already been answered. I thought the effective way of operating in this House of Commons was for reasonable people to deal with reasonable people. Unfortunately, the President of the Privy Council does not seem to fit into that category.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skoberg: A short time ago the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour did not hesitate to tell me that they apologized for any misunderstanding created by the rather broad interpretation taken of a question. Everybody can make mistakes, Mr. Speaker. All I am asking is that this government realize the position of an opposition which makes the backbone of a good, democratic society. If the government is in fact trying to tell the opposition this will not be the case, of course all we have is a complete breakdown of democracy and an autocratic, dictatorial and arrogant system which means that Members of Parliament will not be able to participate in making sure that we retain democracy in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge my debt to you and the previous speaker for the opportunity of making one or two very brief observations in this debate. It would have been interesting to spend the remaining seven or eight minutes dealing with some of the comments of the last two speakers. Suffice it to say that it is interesting to recall the time spent in this House by the government in forcing upon this nation an iniquitous amendment under the Excise Tax Act dealing with enabling legislation to tax airline tickets, only to have the government a few weeks later crawling back into the House and saying, "After all, fellows, we do not want to do anything about this until next year." Therefore, it means nothing to me to hear people talking about time being wasted in this House.

I want to speak for a minute or two about the type of situation that is evolving and the trend that is developing in this House as it has a direct effect upon the people. I have in mind the people of Canada who sent us here. Apropos of that, it is not necessarily to the backbenchers that we are speaking. They understand what we are saying. We are speaking to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country, and he had better listen because the rest of the people of the country have been listening to us and are becoming very concerned.

The point I want to raise in the few minutes I have available to me is the very undesirable consequence of the government keeping unto itself bits and pieces of information that are vital if our economy and our people are not to suffer adversely from policy decisions made from time to time by the government. As much as two years ago I began asking questions in this House, along with my colleagues, about the economic impact of base consolidation and reductions in defence spending as a direct result of government policy. On every occasion these questions were asked there came back assurances from the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) that no precipitate action would be taken without prior consultation and discussion with the economic units involved—the provinces, cities and towns.

What do we have? Without reading them, but going back to July 18, 1969, one can find comments at page 11341, July 24 at page 11537, and as recently as December 8 at page 11697 of Hansard. Let me quote one brief comment. I am not taking it completely out of context, but slightly, without changing the essence of what the Minister of National Defence had to say. He said that so far the intent is that there shall not be any further change in the situation in the Maritime provinces. The minister was responding to questions not only from myself but other hon. members in this Chamber about the economic impact of changes in defence policy.

What do we have as a result of this wide open policy of communication with the civic units involved? What do we have as a result of the policy intention of the government and the direct pragmatic and practical procedures and steps to be followed? We have seen within the last three months the closing of Fairey Aviation without prior consultation; we saw the closing last night of EMI Cosser in Dartmouth without prior consultation; and we have heard rumoured very seriously this week that the Dockyards Trade and Labour Council in Halifax, as a result of the intention of the government, is to start reducing staff by laying off several hundred civilian employees.

If it is necessary to do these things, it is incumbent upon the government to go to the economic units involved and tell them its reasons. If the government will not tell us here in the House of Commons what is going on, at least it should go to the economic unit that is most directly affected, that is to say, the city, the village, the town or the province. The government should talk to the civic and community leaders in those places telling them well in advance what it intends to do. But it has not done that, and it has no intention of doing that. This has been made patently clear.

The tendency to withhold information is leaving, not only the members of the opposition but I am sure many, many backbenchers with a feeling of frustration. Something serious is happening: people are being left with the impression that they can no longer believe what they are being told by the treasury benches of this government. It may well be that the treasury benches of this government are not advised by the Prime Minister of his intentions. I suspect that in no small measure that is the reason for the situation. He advises them in many cases in his office or through the medium of the press.

One member of the treasury benches employs a student to read the newspapers and tell him what his colleagues and the goverment are doing. Is that any way to run the government of this country? If I were that member, I would have long since resigned. I shall come back to one of my serious fears about the tendency to withhold or hide information. We have suspicions in respect of the actions of the government, for instance, under the austerity program. Indeed, a year or so ago we were told by the Minister of National Defence and others that there would have to be extensive lay-offs of civilian employees in the Department of National Defence, probably as many as 5,000.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that not only in the case of these civilian employees but in all matters directly affecting individuals who have wives and families and who live under a threat, belief or understanding that at some point in the future somebody may—not positively will—say to them, "I am sorry; you are no longer required", it is incumbent upon the government to stand up, accept its responsibility and go not only to this Chamber—we are prepared to accept being placed in the background—but to the civic bodies affected, the towns and cities, and lay bare their plans.

Mr. Speaker, I support this motion. The hon. gentleman from Halifax proposed it in all seriousness; it was not put forward lightly. This matter was raised in our caucus which happens to meet in a forum of free expression, unrestricted and unfettered. The motion has been put forward seriously and I suggest to the government and its backbenchers that they indeed take it seriously.

Mr. Speaker: It being 9.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 9 of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Stanfield) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

At 10.12 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 6, 1970

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

TREASURY BOARD

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBER FOR DAVENPORT AS PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO MINISTER

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Prime Minister I wish to announce that in view of the increasingly heavy responsibilities of the President of the Treasury Board, the hon. member for Davenport has been appointed Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, effective today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I should like to make a suggestion with regard to the business today, Mr. Speaker. As the House will recall, I called as business for today government order 67 and government order 76. From inquiries I have made, I gather there is some prospect that if the debates took their usual course they might well be disposed of by one o'clock today.

Hon. members will have noted that there is a motion on the Order Paper in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, and I suggest the House might make an order along the following lines: that the House proceed with other routine proceedings and the question period now, that the two government orders announced for today be considered and dealt with by one o'clock today, and that the House should then move to consider the motion in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

On this basis the business called for today could be dealt with, the House could have a question period and the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador along with his hon. friends from Newfoundland, including the Minister of Transport, would have an opportunity to deal with the question of Labrador transportation.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, when the President of the Privy Council makes a suggestion we always stand back and examine it with great care. We are prepared to be very accommodating. On the instructions of my leader I suggest we proceed with the question period in the normal way and that the order in the name of my hon. friend should then be called.

I agree with the Leader of the House to this extent, that the two items of business called for today could probably be dealt with, and receive the proper examination, within an hour. But it is our view, and the view of the mover of the motion, that his motion should at least be the subject of a reasonable amount of discussion in the House. We therefore make the following proposal: that after the question period we should proceed with the motion, and that at three o'clock the debate would be concluded and a vote taken. We do not suggest the government has to accept this motion, but having regard to the great statements which were made yesterday about the right of this House to express its views, we feel we should have the right to express an opinion on the motion. It seems to me this is a very reasonable request to make, and I am sure that having heard it the President of the Privy Council will be bound to accept it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member did not make it clear that the order would also include the putting of all questions necessary to dispose of the two items under government orders by four o'clock—in other words, that we should make a special order that the business previously called for today be dealt with in all its stages between three and four o'clock.

Mr. Baldwin: Following the vote on the transport question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member indicates he and his friends will insist on a vote on the motion. Do he and his colleagues intend to vote against it? I gather there is no disposition on this side to vote against it.

An hon. Member: We shall see.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps we could make an order, then, on the following lines: that the motion outstanding in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador not be considered under motions but that it be considered as the first item of business under government orders; that the question period proceed, the House having dealt with the motion standing in the name of my colleague the hon. member for Gatineau; that at three o'clock, or at such earlier time as the House may have finished dealing with the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, the debate be interrupted for the purpose of putting the question on that particular motion; and that the House would then proceed to the two items called for today and all questions necessary to dispose of those two items would be put to the House by four o'clock.

If the House is generally agreeable, we could agree to an order in those terms.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been on the periphery of these discussions, but the points that have been arrived at seem to be sensible. I take it that as a result we will have the question period, the government will get its two orders through and we will have a debate on the motion of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. The one little problem I see is how to divide the time from three to four o'clock between the two government bills.

Mr. Lewis: Three-twenty and four.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, after the vote. Could there not be some understanding that at that point we would split whatever time there is remaining between the agricultural item and the radiation item?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it was that consideration that motivated me to suggest that we deal with those items first and then, after they have been justly dealt with, go on with the transport committee report. However, I am prepared to accept whatever hon. members regard as an equitable division of time between the two items so long as all questions are disposed of by four o'clock.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I think we might discuss the last aspect and work something out. There may be fewer speech-emitting members by 3.20 and we can conclude the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the proposal advanced by the President of the Privy Council, after open discussions with the other House leaders. Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL

EXTENSION OF REPRESENTATION ON COMMISSION

Mr. Hyl Chappell (Peel South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-195, respecting the port of Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Chappell: Mr. Speaker, at present only the city of Toronto and the federal government are represented on the Toronto Harbour Commission. This bill proposes that the province of Ontario and Metropolitan Toronto be also represented. If that happened, there would then be four levels of government forming the commission. I believe that if that were the case it would overcome the jurisdictional snarl and the commissioners could get on with their plans for a new harbour, including an inter-city airport in the harbour area.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—SUPPLEMENTARY DOCUMENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question about the supplementary paper in connection with the white paper on taxation that the minister said on Wednesday he had approved and was sending to the chairman of the appropriate committee of the House. Would the minister tell the House precisely when he will be sending this document? I ask him this in view of the obvious interest of the House and the country in knowing the contents of this document.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I would think on Monday, Mr. Speaker. It is being translated and I would think it will be mailed on Monday. I have approved it for mailing but the letters of transmittal have not come back.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, would the minister assure the House that he will not use the ordinary mail to transmit this document? Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I ask this question because I will not be here to question him on Monday or Tuesday. Will he indicate briefly the aspects of the white paper that he will be covering in this proposal?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I will be reporting on the specific matter I indicated to the committee I would report on to them.

Mr. Stanfield: One further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will this document the minister will be sending to the chairman of the committee on Monday include all the changes in the white paper proposals that the minister is prepared to make at the present time?

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am not prepared to make any changes in the white paper proposals. I would rather follow through the normal procedures of Parliament when a document is referred to a committee, that is, to have the committee hold hearings and advise the government on it.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister agree that it would be perfectly proper for the minister, as he is now doing, to indicate the changes that he is already prepared to make so that the minister would be indicating to the chairman of the committee any changes that have taken place in his thinking? That is why I asked whether these changes incorporate all the changes that have taken place in the minister's thinking to date?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the matter is before the committee. The committee is holding hearings. I hope all thinking Canadians who wish to make proposals will make those proposals to the committee. The government will expect to receive advice from the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, could the minister indicate when he expects to announce the important and numerous changes which the Prime Minister said on Wednesday night at a Liberal dinner in Toronto would be made in the white paper?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends seem not to believe in Parliament at all. This parliament referred the white paper—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benson: This House referred—

An hon. Member: Look who is talking.

Mr. Benson: This House referred the white paper to a committee of the House to examine it. The committee is examining the white paper. I think it would be quite improper for me to run around and flout the committee as the Leader of the Opposition is doing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister but we are perhaps now entering the field of debate. We should now go on to the next question.

HOUSING

STARTS—INTEREST RATES—DISCUSSIONS WITH GOVERNMENT AND FINANCIAL REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of housing. In view of the drastic decline in housing starts and the unprecedented height of mortgage interest rates in the first part of this year, will the minister invite to Ottawa representatives of the provincial and municipal governments together with representatives of the financial institutions for the purpose of finding ways and means to solve these problems and to give federal leadership in this important field?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting and constructive suggestion. I would only comment that we are almost constantly in communication with each component group that can bring effort to bear on the matter. I will certainly take the suggestion under advisement.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the minister. As an interim measure would the minister direct $50 million of the $200 million set aside by him for innovative purposes for the purpose of rent subsidies to assist low-income people to obtain adequate accommodation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is really a proposal or suggestion. I would not think this is a proper question. He has to assume that the minister will consider the proposal that has been made to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing.

Could he tell us why his department has reduced from $35 million to $17 million the grant which was to be given to the City of Montreal for the Little Burgundy renewal project?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, no agreement was ever entered into by the federal government with the city of Montreal for $35 million or any other amount for urban renewal there. Authority for such negotiations was given to one of my predecessors back in 1966-67 but in the meantime the Quebec Housing Corporation was formed and we were asked to enter into a master agreement with them with the understanding they would allocate the urban renewal funds in that master agreement. With regard to our offer made to Quebec in December which I announced in the House concerning three schemes, one in Montreal and two in Quebec, satisfactory negotiations are going on now with the Quebec Housing Corporation. Frankly, it came as a complete surprise to me to be told of the press statement which appeared this morning about Montreal.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister. Is it true that the city of Montreal has rejected the $17.8 million that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has offered to it for the Little Burgundy urban renewal project?

Mr. Speaker: The question as asked is not in order. The hon. member is inviting the minister to confirm or deny a report. In this way the question is not in order.

Mr. Allmand: Perhaps I might reword the question, Mr. Speaker. Has the city of Montreal sent a message to the minister stating that they refuse the $17.8 million which has been offered to them?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, no such communication has been received by me.

[Later:]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he would reconsider his position in view of the fact that without this money urban renewal in Montreal cannot go on. Would he reconsider his opposition and grant the $35 million which is required for the project?

Mr. Andras: We have offered to the Quebec Housing Corporation and the Quebec government $17½ million for the implementation of the Montreal scheme. I have had no counter-proposal from them so all this battle is going on through press statements.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, will the minister say, in view of the housing crisis to which my colleague, the member for Broadview, has referred and in view of the forthcoming budget, whether the government is giving consideration to the elimination of the federal sales tax on building materials?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, of course, is anticipating an order of the House.

URBAN RENEWAL—COMMITMENTS TO HAMILTON AND MONTREAL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. In view of the growing concern and frustration that has resulted from the government's attitude with regard to urban renewal, would the minister take it upon himself at least to visit the cities of Montreal and Hamilton in order that some concrete proposals can be made with regard to continuing urban renewal, particularly when commitments or implied commitments have been made by this government?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we made a very clear commitment to the city of Hamilton and a precise amount of money was named in that commitment. So far as I am concerned I have had no communication from official representatives of Hamilton to the effect they are having difficulty forming a plan within that commitment. If they want to communicate with me directly I will be glad to visit with them. So far as Montreal is concerned I believe I gave an explanation a few minutes ago.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the answer the minister has given me but I thought I had pointed out there is a sense of frustration which exists in the city of Hamilton—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

CONSTRUCTION BY POLYMER FOR LOW-INCOME GROUPS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, could the minister indicate whether CMHC has had discussions with officials of the Crown corporation, Polymer, which has just entered the housing construction business with the intent of providing at the earliest possible time housing for low-income groups in Canada?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Yes, Mr. Speaker. CMHC has had such discussion.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, has the minister in charge of housing abandoned the proposal of the Hellyer task force that the federal government should make direct loans to municipalities and regional governments to assist them in assembling and servicing land for urban growth?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In the examination of prices in an effort to provide housing at more reasonable rates for the people of Canada have the minister and his associates studied the plan in operation in Australia where people can buy a three-bedroom house for the equivalent of $12,000 with a $1,200 down payment and a 5 per cent mortgage?

Mr. Speaker: This interesting question is of the same nature as the one asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. Perhaps it would be more proper as part of a debate.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is a very important question. The minister can very easily answer yes or no if he knows the answer.

[Translation]

INDUSTRY

GOLD MINING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS—PUBLICATION OF STUDY

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Could he indicate to the House whether the policy regarding subsidies to gold mines for the next few years is still under study and whether he has received or intends to hear representations from industrialists and union members?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the study is still going on and I shall be pleased to hear the representations referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Is the minister in a position to tell us whether the report on this study on subsidies to gold mines will be published and whether the proposals that his department intends to make will be announced soon enough, this with a view to reassuring the miners and allowing the mining companies to work out their budgets?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, no decision has been made yet on whether the report should be published or not. However, I can assure the hon. member that an opportunity will be provided to spokesmen form industry and unions to discuss the matter before a decision is made.

[Later:]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

When he answered the hon. member for Abitibi a moment ago, he referred to the fact that for various reasons, the recommendations of the study would probably never be published. Can the minister tell the House that those recommendations will be published, so that fair and complete representations can be made?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance to the House, because I am not the only one concerned, since the government is also involved. I can, however, assure the hon. member that we will certainly listen to the representations to which he referred.

[English]

GOLD MINING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS—REALLOCATION OF WORKERS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): May I ask the minister how soon he will be in a position to make a statement regarding this crisis with reference to further assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. May I also ask him what consultations he has had with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, whether special counsellors have been sent into the area to cope with the situation, and whether any thought has been given to the reallocation of workers?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No decision has yet been made as to when reports will be made available or as to when there will be a decision, although obviously it must be taken before the end of the year. We are doing a very comprehensive survey in the regions affected to determine the nature of the economic and human dislocation which would be caused by the discontinuance of the program. If it were deemed in the public interest that the program be discontinued, then certainly these studies will be made available to the Department of Manpower and Immigration and to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to achieve the maximum well-being and offer alternative opportunities of employment to the workers.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): What steps have been taken to date by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and what consultations have taken place in line with the statement of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that no corporation and no government should lay off massive groups of men without making proper arrangements and giving adequate notice?

Mr. Greene: The surveys are being done by my department at the present time, and officials of my department are of course consulting officials of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, but until a decision is made to abandon the program no alternative program can, of course, be considered.

TRANSPORT

ACTION ON RAILWAY FREIGHT RATE INCREASES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the increase in freight rates, effective March 1, on the part of the CNR and the CPR for livestock and certain other commodities. I raised this question earlier to ascertain what the government is going to do in order to protect agriculture from this further body blow with respect to livestock production at a time when encouragement is being given to diversification from wheat and other cereal production.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys).]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question in part the other day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Only in part.

Mr. Jamieson: At the time when the freight rate increases were announced originally the railways, at the request of the government, deferred their implementation until the conference sponsored by the Prices and Incomes Commission could be held. Subsequently, when the guidelines were announced by the Prices and Incomes Commission the railways felt they were well within those guidelines and consequently announced they were going to proceed with the increases. As a result the Prices and Incomes Commission is now investigating whether or not these price increases were justified, and in order to facilitate this investigation, to get it done as quickly as possible, Canadian Transport Commission officials have been made available to the Prices and Incomes Commission for this purpose.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether the increases have actually taken effect already, and what representations did he or any member of the government make to Canada's railways? He cannot make representations to the CPR, but what representations were made to the CNR?

Mr. Jamieson: I held lengthy conversations with both Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways. Their submission to me naturally was that these increases were justified in light of very considerably increased costs, including a 6½ per cent, I believe it was, labour cost increase as of January 1. I was not prepared, on the basis of my own competence, to judge whether they were justified or not, and hence the reference to the Prices and Incomes Commission.

I think the right hon. member will know there is no authority vested in the Minister of Transport arbitrarily to roll back these price increases which I regret, I am sure, just as much as he does.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do recognize that fact but, after all, surely the CNR would listen to the government in a matter such as this? This is the second increase on livestock freight in a year.

[Later:]

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Was the CNR not one of those government agencies, on the list of such agencies issued recently, that were not going to increase their prices or their rates?

RAIL AND TRUCK SHIPMENT OF GOODS F.O.B. TORONTO OR HAMILTON—EFFECT ON PRICE RESTRAINT PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Has he received complaints from a large number of people in western Canada that goods which were formerly shipped by rail or truck f.o.b. Winnipeg or Regina are now shipped f.o.b. Toronto or Hamilton, which has meant a substantial increase in the actual prices which will be passed on to consumers, making a mockery of the government's restraint program? Has the minister had any complaints and, if so, what is he doing about them?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I do not recall at the moment whether this specific matter has been referred to me personally but if the hon. member, who obviously has had complaints, will send them to me I will be glad to investigate them.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—DECREASE IN REVENUE—LOWERING OF RATES ON CEREAL GRAINS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact that the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority has announced a drop of 14 per cent in its earnings this year, and that in large part this is due to the decline in wheat carried, will consideration be given to lowering the rates or tariff on cereal grains to correct this situation and to help the movement of grain east?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, this is a very complicated subject, and I do not believe I could answer it in a manner that would be acceptable to you. I can only say my information is that the drop in revenue was only partially and perhaps minimally affected by grain rates and was due to the lengthy and protracted iron ore strike in Labrador.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED RENT INCREASE FOR PERMANENT MARRIED QUARTERS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In keeping with other government agencies and departments that have withdrawn projected increases in fees, rentals, and so forth, is the Department of National Defence considering the withdrawal of the proposed rental increase for permanent married quarters, projected for April 1 next?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have delayed actually implementing a decision that had been taken some time ago on the advice of the Treasury Board. We are trying to comply with some kind of national average in this case. I think the decision to increase the rent was taken before January 1, and the roll-back applies to decisions taken on or after January 1.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question. Perhaps the minister can reconcile his statement with the government's decision to withdraw the airlines ticket tax which was originally announced in the last budget—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think this is a proper question. The hon. member for Oxford.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

RESIDENCE OF THOSE CONDUCTING PRICE SURVEY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will the minister get in touch with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and make arrangements to have its local representatives conducting the present consumers' price survey carry out their duties in areas other than those in which they are resident? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked the question. I have suggested before that it is not in order to continue the matter by explaining or indicating why the question is asked. It is much simpler to just ask it and give the minister an opportunity to answer it.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I would like to know more about it, Mr. Speaker. Are these people not good Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this is one occasion where the explanation might be helpful.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is what I had in mind, Mr. Speaker. I asked the question because I have received several complaints that persons are refusing to answer the many highly personal questions in this survey because they are being asked by next-door neighbours, which creates great personal embarrassment, and these people who are refusing to answer the questions, are liable to be prosecuted.

Mr. Speaker: I suppose the matter will now be clear to the minister.

Mr. Pepin: I will look into it immediately, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION OVER WHEAT, OIL AND TRANSPORTATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House dealing with the constitution are limited by their terms of reference to dealing with proposals advanced by the government, is it government policy now, as was indicated recently in a speech by the Minister of Supply and Services in Winnipeg, that it is not out of the realm of possibility for western Canada to control wheat policy, oil policy and possibly transportation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and all members of the House that the government takes full responsibility for the policies it announces and supports.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PUBLIC HOUSING GUIDELINES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I with your permission come back to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing and ask him whether he has completed his discussions with the provincial ministers in charge of housing, and whether he can inform the House as to the date when we may expect a statement from him with regard to public housing guidelines?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, those consultations I regret are not yet completed, although I am just as eager as the hon. member to come to a decision. Therefore I am not in a position to give a precise date. As far as I am concerned it will be as soon as possible, recognizing the need for some statement on this matter.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Lewis: Could the minister indicate even approximately how much longer he expects these discussions to take so that Parliament and the country may know what the policy with regard to public housing will be without too long a delay?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that it would be a matter of three or four weeks. I might add that in the meantime many, I think, beneficial changes are taking place on a somewhat unofficial basis, so the time for a precise announcement does not mean a total loss of change required.

CONSULTATION WITH INSURANCE COMPANIES, REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND LAWYERS RESPECTING FEES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. In view of the kind of program the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is endeavouring to carry out, has the minister consulted with insurance companies, real estate people and lawyers in an effort to have fees, commissions and other costs involved in house sales and transfers reduced, or at least the line held, and is the minister giving consideration to establishing a national conference with these people to discuss this topic?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, that is a long and involved question. Most certainly in the amendment to the act last summer we reduced certain of the fees chargeable in this general area. We are making our views known to lawyers and insurance companies about our distaste for excessive charges in this field, but as far as a national conference is concerned it has not been planned along that line.

CMHC CAPITAL BUDGET—APPLICATIONS FOR SHARE OF $200 MILLION FOR INNOVATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether any actual applications have been made to CMHC for any of the $200 million which the minister announced in the capital budget of CMHC for new innovations?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I would say dozens and dozens of these applications and suggestions are flowing in and we have a special group in CMHC dealing with them trying to choose among the many very good suggestions.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of supplementaries so perhaps I might return to the hon. member for Winnipeg North in a moment. The hon. member for Hillsborough.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister which concerns the continuing chaotic state of the mail service in Montreal. Now that the Minister of Labour and the Postmaster General have failed, could he advise what other minister or ministers will now be assigned the duty of bringing about a solution to the prolonged postal dispute in Montreal?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROCEDURE IN REDUCING NUMBER OF CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Further to his statement when he announced reductions in the strength of the Canadian Armed Forces, could the minister now indicate to the House and the people of Canada what procedure he will follow in achieving the reduction of the 5,000 civilian employees?

Mr. Speaker: I would think that the information the hon. member is seeking is of such wide import that it should be given to the House by way of a general statement. If the minister has a short reply I am sure that would be fine, but in the normal way the information should be conveyed on motions.

Mr. Forrestall: Then, Mr. Speaker, could I invite the minister to make a statement at an early opportunity in view of the widespread rumours circulating within the ranks of civilian employees? Would the minister make such a statement in the next few days?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, certainly in a general way one should discount rumours. There was one in Halifax yesterday to the effect that we were dispensing with the services of 1,000 people. This is completely untrue and therefore I cannot speculate on rumours. I think I did indicate in a general way when I made my statement that most of the reductions would be achieved by normal attrition. There are some problems, but in any case I gave a commitment, which I am trying to live up to, that never in our reductions would we give less than six months' notice. This happened last week to a group in a depot in Montreal which we are going to close. They were given six months' notice and most of them were given some preference or some kind of priority for an examination in the civil service that would come up—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think the statement should be made now. The hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton.

POLLUTION

SECOND VOYAGE OF "MANHATTAN"—PLANS TO DISPOSE OF POSSIBLE SPILLED OIL

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport with respect to the Manhattan voyage in Arctic waters. I should like to ask the minister if his department now has a plan whereby any spilled oil can be immediately disposed of should some catastrophe befall the U.S. tanker Manhattan while she is in Canadian waters?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me this same question was asked last week or earlier this week.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OPENING OF PASSPORT OFFICE IN TORONTO

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the great demand for passports and keeping in mind the frustration and confusion that the Canadian people were confronted with last year in applying for passports, is it still the intention of the department to open an office in Toronto and, if so, when may we expect it to be opened and what is the possible location?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can answer the last part of the question by saying it is still the intention to open an office in Toronto. I think all the arrangements have been completed and an announcement will be made within a few days, I hope. May I say while I am on my feet that I hope all Members of Parliament will encourage people who intend to travel at the peak of the season to apply for passports now as this will greatly facilitate the handling of the problem.

CHARGING OF FEE FOR ASSISTING PASSPORT APPLICANTS

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. A few days ago I asked a question in connection with a news item which indicated that travel agents were going to charge $5 for getting passports for people. Does the minister have a report?

An hon. Member: Running a racket.

Mr. Stanfield: Who, the minister?

Mr. Hees: Did you hear what he said about you? Deny it. You are in serious trouble.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what was suggested in the news report, this did not have the blessing of the passport office. All applications for passports are handled with all possible speed for the regular fee, whether sent direct or through a travel agent. Where delays occur in issuing passports, it is usually because of errors or omissions in the application. If applicants for passports wish to ask a travel agent to assist them in making out their application and forwarding it to the passport office, they are free to do so. The new branch passport offices in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver will be able to give advice and assistance in urgent cases. I do want to say that the agency explained to us at least that their service was not meant to be available to the public but to travel agents in other parts of the country. I can assure you that this did not have the blessing of the Canadian government, and I advise anyone concerned not to waste his money.

[Later:]

OPENING OF PASSPORT OFFICE IN VANCOUVER

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister advise if any special arrangements are being made to assist people in the city of Vancouver in respect of passports?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is our intention to have an office in Vancouver which will be opened shortly to handle, particularly, emergency cases. I hope that other applicants will continue to use the ordinary facilities but use them in time and not wait to the last minute.

HOUSING

ESTABLISHMENT OF GOVERNMENT SAVINGS AND MORTGAGE INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. Is consideration being given to the establishment of a government-owned system of savings and mortgage institutions designed specifically to serve the residential mortgage market on a regional basis?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Such consideration has not been given at this time, Mr. Speaker, but I think many of these kinds of alternatives are being looked at.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION OVER WHEAT, OIL AND TRANSPORTATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services. Will he make a statement on motions at an early date setting forth his policies with regard to wheat, oil, transportation and the constitutional aspects? In particular, would he explain in the statement how his views differ from those being put forward by the Quebec government with regard to provincial authority?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this should be the subject for a statement on motions.

POLLUTION

CONVERSION OF SEWAGE TREATMENT PLANTS TO REMOVE PHOSPHORUS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources dealing with pollution. Since the International Joint Commission has now stated that only 2 per cent of the phosphorus entering Lake Erie and Lake Ontario from all sources comes from Canadian use of detergents while 90 per cent of all the phosphorus in sewage should be removed in order to control the growth of algae in lakes, what recommendations is the minister making to convert existing sewage treatment plants for the removal of phosphorus?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the total package can, I think, be subsumed best under the Canada water bill. If the committee can get the Canada water bill back to the House so that we can make it law, I think it will be an extremely useful vehicle for the solution of the problem.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance mainly because so many other ministers are defying the roster system and Standing Order 5 of the House of Commons today. Has the minister any evidence of wholesale bank deposits made by Canadians at American border points because of their fears of the white paper and the future of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not in order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RATIO OF LAY-OFFS IN CANADIAN AND U.S. AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I shall direct to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the concern regarding the unemployment in the auto industry in the Oshawa area and surrounding areas, could the minister indicate if this situation is peculiar to this area or if the same situation exists in other areas of Canada and the United States?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cafik: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this matter is of genuine concern to the people of my area. I ask Your Honour to allow the minister to reply to the question.

Mr. Speaker: It is the form of the question about which I have doubt. I realize how important the matter is and that it is of concern. I do not want to prevent the minister from answering an important question if it is the feeling of hon. members that the minister should be given an opportunity to reply.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department keeps monitoring this situation. It has not been found that there are disproportionate lay-offs in the automobile labour force in Canada as compared with the situation in the American labour force.

Mr. Cafik: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are such unemployed people in the auto industry eligible for assistance under the TAB program?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, they are eligible under the unemployment act and under the TAB program. I understand in some cases the benefits can be as high as 95 per cent of the usual take-home money.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question. Is it not the case that the three most recent applications for TAB in the Oshawa area have been turned down?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is asked in an argumentative way.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will the minister consider having the prices of Canadian cars reduced to the same level as those in the United States in order to increase employment?

Mr. Pepin: No, Mr. Speaker. However, I am glad to report that the gap between the United States price ex-factory and the Canadian price is shrinking. Last year it was 3.8 per cent. It is now down to 3.5 per cent.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DECREASE IN COMMODITY SURPLUS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline what steps his department is planning to take to counteract the decrease of more than half a billion dollars in our commodity trade surplus that has taken place during the past year?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I doubt that, Mr. Speaker, but I am in the habit of writing to the hon. member when he asks me one of these colossal questions. I can promise him another letter which will place his observation in the proper perspective.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. Will the minister make sure that in his letter he explains the situation rather than dealing in the meaningless gobbledegook which his department—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the government's austerity program, will the minister please inform the House why electric eye magnetically-controlled toilet flushers were installed in place of manual flushers in the officers' quarters at Uplands?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: This question could be placed on the Order Paper.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION OVER WHEAT, OIL AND TRANSPORTATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not have an opportunity to answer the last question. I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services in connection with his reconfederation plan to offset separatism in western Canada, under which western Canada would have control over wheat policy, oil policy and transportation. Will the minister say whether there is a task force working on this?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I assume the right hon. gentleman is referring to a report of a speech I made in Winnipeg on Monday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Richardson: I did name these subjects but I was not talking about our present wheat policy, oil policy or transportation policy. I was talking about where these policies should ultimately be directed. This is a constitutional matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister, but a question on this point has already been asked. As hon. members know, the only way questions can be asked about statements or speeches made outside the House is by way of a question to the Prime Minister or the Acting Prime Minister as to whether these statements represent government policy. The question has already been asked of the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the question directly? What is the plan that the minister has in mind whereby we in western Canada are going to be able to control our wheat, oil and transportation? What is this plan?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the minister would want to give this explanation by way of a statement on motions.

Orders of the day.

I gather that in view of the order passed earlier today we now revert to motions for the purpose of putting to the House the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador) moved that the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented to the House on Tuesday, February 3, 1970, be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, some time last year the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications received an order of the House to travel where they saw fit in the Atlantic provinces to deal with questions of transportation. The original idea was that the committee would visit only the provincial capitals. I and my colleagues from Newfoundland who were members of the committee at the time were successful in conveying to the committee and convincing them of the absolute necessity and importance, because of the unique transportation problems in the Labrador part of my riding, that they should also pay a visit to Labrador. I sincerely appreciate the committee's sympathy in agreeing to visit Labrador.

We decided that because we did not have too much difficulty convincing them to pay one visit we would press our advantage and suggest that they make two visits in Labrador. We again received the support of the committee on this suggestion. Consequently this past September the committee visited the Wabush-Labrador City area and also the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area. In addition, the committee visited many areas on the north shore. They visited Lévis, Baie-Comeau, Sept-Îles and Schefferville in the province of Quebec and the towns of Wabush, Labrador City, Goose Bay and Happy Valley in the province of Newfoundland.

I do not really believe it should be necessary to take the time of the House to have a debate on this matter. My motion is simply that the report of this committee be concurred in. Hon. members will recall the report was presented to the House on February 3 by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) in the absence of the hon. member for LaSalle (Mr. Lessard), the chairman of the committee, who was ill at the time.

Mr. McGrath: The genial chairman.

Mr. Peddle: The genial chairman, of course. When a report of this kind is presented to the House, I cannot understand why a motion for its concurrence is not made at the same time. However, this was not done. The committee consisted of 20 to 25 members of this House from all parties. We proceeded on this trip at very considerable public expense. There was a bevy of interpreters, technicians, shorthand writers and clerical staff. A lot of hard work went into the drawing up of this report. Following the trip there was further discussion and investigation and I do not really see what the objection is to concurrence by the House.

• (12:00 noon)

I am sure the committee was pleasantly surprised at the reception members received when they arrived in Wabush. The people of the area were enthused about a visit of the Transport Committee. A friend of mine in Labrador, Mr. Burgess, had seen fit to arrange for a big welcoming committee to be at the airport. We stayed in this area for several days. The meetings were well attended by the public. We received a large number of briefs from various groups and organizations, briefs which were helpful and well constructed. It was generally agreed on the way back that the committee, in its travels, had never seen such interest and such enthusiasm.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peddle: There is a good spirit in Labrador, and I am sure the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) will bear me out when I say this. Only recently we had the opportunity to attend a great conference there on Labrador's role in the 'seventies. The minister spoke to the gathering there and I believe the title of his speech was "The Federal Government's Plan for Labrador".

The Transport Committee made a number of recommendations to the House. I expect the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Blouin) will deal with those which affect his constituency—we share a common boundary. My remarks will concern the recommendations which apply to Labrador. Action has already begun with respect to one of these recommendations, namely, that an instrument landing system be installed at the Wabush terminal airport. I note with pleasure that there is an appropriation in this year's estimates of some $200,000 to provide this facility. A further recommendation is to the effect that the Department of Transport should take over the operation of the terminal at Wabush which is presently administered by a private concern.

The recommendation which arouses most interest among the people of Labrador is, I believe, the one which has to do with roads and highway construction. The committee recommended that the federal government consider the advisability of entering into an agreement with the Province of Quebec and Newfoundland with a view to constructing a road to connect the north of Baie Comeau with the cities of Sept Iles, Manicouagan, Gagnon, Wabush, Churchill Falls and Goose Bay, of course, by using existing roads as far as possible. A further recommendation was that a connecting road should be constructed to link the city of Schefferville with the new road.

Everyone is aware that highways normally come under provincial jurisdiction. The committee accepts this principle, and was aware of it. Nevertheless, the suggestion was made that the federal government should initiate discussions with the two provinces concerned to the end that a satisfactory road be established.

I shall not stand here and talk just for the sake of talking. As I said earlier, I do not think it should be necessary at all. Last night we heard the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) take back some of the unkind remarks he had made about the committee system. He told us that in his opinion the committee system had greatly improved and that he now had no compunction about lauding it in the House. If the committee system is to mean anything, I see no reason why the Transport Committee should not exercise the same amount of influence as, for example, the committee of this whole House. After all, we did not go on any pleasure cruise; our members worked hard under the guidance of a very capable chairman, the hon member for LaSalle (Mr. Lessard).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peddle: I feel sure that had the hon. member not been ill when he presented the report to the House on February 3, he would have moved for concurrence at that time. The arrangement today is that a vote is to be taken at three o'clock. If the Minister of Transport, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) or any other of the hon. gentlemen opposite would say right now that the report can be concurred in, I am sure there would be no further debate, at least from this side of the House, and we could get on with the rest of our business. I invite the genial chairman of the Transport Committee to participate in the discussion. I invite the hon. member for Manicouagan to participate. I am certain he will support the idea that the report should be concurred in. I invite the Newfoundland representative in the federal cabinet to throw his support behind the motion in the interest of Newfoundland.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is always a happy day for me when I can agree with the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) and demonstrate, despite some criticism to the contrary, that my interest in Newfoundland remains as extensive and every bit as sincere as is his own.

I am always happy when I can commend the Committee on Transport and Communications, of which I was a member back in days before many hon. gentlemen were in this House. I have good reason to know the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador is correct when he says this is one of the most hard-working committees of the House and one of the most thorough. It usually comes up with some of the best recommendations.

Among those are the recommendations contained in this report. I say this, perhaps, with more authority than I can express judgment on some of the other matters dealt with in the committee's recommendations, because I have a personal knowledge of at least most of the matters which are discussed in this report. It is clear from the recommendations that are made that they did, in fact, get first hand information in the areas in which they travelled. In fact, what they have said constitutes a very good reflection of the views of people living in those areas. The solutions that they propose appear to be, in most instances at least, logical and sensible, ones that the government ought to pursue. So I have no hesitation in saying that, certainly in principle, the ideas expressed make a good deal of sense.

I was also delighted to have the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador acknowledge that in the case of highways, and in the case of some of the other recommendations contained in the report, these are not matters that are completely within the competence of the federal government. There is in the case of the roads proposals, as in some others, the necessity to consult with the various provincial governments, and even with some of the municipalities. Indeed, there are other places where even private interests are involved. In one or two cases one might question whether or not the recommendations come within the purview of the federal government at all. I have in mind the last of the recommendations having to do with the current status of the Carol Lake Company Act, which it could conceivably be argued is a matter relating wholly and exclusively to the provincial government. I am not certain of that but that will be a point worth examining.

My main reason for making these comments is to point out that in all cases we will be more than prepared to make the studies that the report recommends. On balance, as Minister of Transport, I feel that many of the recommendations are sound. As the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador has said, in one or two cases we have already proceeded to implement these recommendations. Certainly, I see no reason why we should not look into the others.

Again, let me emphasize that in virtually all of the recommendations there is, in addition to the need to consult with, for example, provincial governments and other agencies, the necessity for feasibility studies to be made. There is also some question of jurisdiction in the matter, for instance, of the ferry from the north shore to the south shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Again, this is one of those issues where it is not clear in my mind whether it is a federal responsibility or requires the initiation of the provincial government which will be helped through some form of subsidy program, if that turns out to be the logical answer to the problem. Similarly, in the case of other proposals, it will be necessary to discuss whether this method would provide the solution.

I have received, as I believe the committee have, representations suggesting that the real answer in terms of that part of the country is perhaps an extension of the roads system. Therefore, within the whole complex of these first class recommendations, I am sure that the committee members, as well as the members of the House, recognize the need for the studies they propose.

On the question of airline activities in northern Quebec and Labrador, here again there is some question as to the competence of any government agency to require that, for example, the two airlines pool their activities. This recommendation pretty well parallels one that was made by the Canadian Transport Commission itself at the time that these licences were granted. It will be necessary in this case to see whether or not we have the power or the authority in any agency of the federal government to force them to do this if they do not feel so inclined.

I want to express my very great regret that these airlines have not, in fact, as yet seen fit to carry out this suggestion of the Canadian Transport Commission. Quite frankly, I am disappointed that it has taken so long for them to do so. As yet I have not found any clear cut explanation on the part at least of one of the airlines concerned why that is so. I am told that one of the airlines is quite happy and is prepared to do so. However, I simply make this point of order to emphasize that it may not be something that we are in a position to require two carriers to do. If we can do so, then I will not be in the least hesitant to utilise my maximum authority, because what the committee has recommended does make an enormous amount of sense.

All of this is simply by way of saying that I and the government would have no compunction whatever about accepting the hon. member's motion. In giving concurrence to the committee report, I want to emphasize what I said before. Concurrence on the part of the government in this motion involves our acknowledgement of the valuable work that has been done by the committee in examining transportation conditions in eastern Canada. It involves the acknowledgement that the work was thorough and that many reasoned recommendations resulted. By concurring in the motion, the government also agrees that the committee's recommendations deserve, and will get, full consideration in terms of the implementation of policy. To the extent that our competence, budgetary conditions and general policies permit, as well as, of course, in terms of the limitations of our jurisdiction, as I said a moment ago, we will be pleased to act on the recommendations and to make them the basis of future policy planning.

I am delighted to have been able to say this, and I am also delighted that we can now save the time of the House. In view of the commitment made to us by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador that this will end the debate, I suggest that the question be put and that we get on with the business of the House.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: That's right, talk it out.

Mr. McGrath: We have no intention of talking out the motion, but I do feel it necessary to make a few comments on the remarks that were just made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson).

First of all, I suggest to the minister that we are delighted the government has finally decided to recognize that there was a fourth report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and that, as a consequence of the initative of my colleague the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle), the government are going to accept the recommendations contained in that report.

I find it passing strange that this report was presented to the House on February 3, yet no initiative was taken by the government, or indeed by the hon. member for LaSalle (Mr. Lessard), the chairman of the committee, to move concurrence in the report. One can only conclude either that the government did not know that a report existed, or that the report in some respect must have represented an embarrassment to them.

Contrast the motion on today's Order Paper by my colleague from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador with the second motion standing in the name of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The two motions are similar except for the fact that the second motion is standing in the name of the chairman of the committee. He is moving concurrence in a report that was presented to the House two days ago. The fourth report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications was, as I have said, presented to the House on February 3, over a month ago, and concurrence is moved only today and only as a consequence of the initiative of an hon. member of the opposition, my colleague from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador.

I think that the House deserves an explanation of this situation. Certainly, the minister did not give an explanation. I hope that the hon. member for La Salle will get to his feet and tell the House why he did not carry out his responsibility as chairman of the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (LaSalle): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will allow the hon. member to speak in a moment, but I have to bring to the attention of the hon. member for St. John's East that what is before the House is a detailed report. I suggest it is quite unparliamentary to attack the conduct of a member or of the chairman of a committee in the way he has. If he believes the report is worthy of consideration at this time, he should consider a discussion of that report but not the conduct of another member or, the conduct of the chairman of the committee. That is what is being done at the present time.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation at all in complying with your ruling as I have the greatest respect for the hon. member for LaSalle (Mr. Lessard). In fact, he is one of the hardest-working committee chairmen in the House. It is because of my great affection and respect for him that I hate to see the work of the committee as well as his hard work put aside in this way. I was about to suggest, before Your Honour got to your feet, that perhaps the hon. member for LaSalle failed to present the motion for concurrence in the report because of pressure from the government. That is the only conclusion to which I can come.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (LaSalle): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lessard (LaSalle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. friend from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) that the committee never enjoined me to move that my report be concurred in.

[Mr. McGrath.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, I would like to suggest to the hon. member that what is before the House now is the substance of the report. It seems to me this is a very important report and if we are going to have a debate that is what we should be considering at the present time.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I agree with your ruling. I want to just comment on the suggestion by my hon. friend that there was never any suggestion there would be a motion for concurrence. The transport committee proceeded to Labrador and the north shore of Quebec last September in compliance with an order of reference from the House to conduct a study of transportation problems of the north shore of Quebec and that part of Newfoundland known as the territory of Labrador.

In compliance with that order of reference the committee, during the course of the recess prior to the present session, travelled to the north shore of Quebec and to Labrador under the capable chairmanship of the hon. member for LaSalle. It conducted hearings in the cities of Levis, Sept-Îles, Labrador City, Schefferville and Goose Bay, and worked diligently for ten days to hear the evidence on which the report and the recommendations now before the House are based. I find it inconceivable the hon. member for LaSalle would imply that there was never any suggestion the committee would not expect that its fourth report would be concurred in. Anybody who reads the recommendations contained in the fourth report, which is before the House, could only come to the conclusion that obviously the committee intended that the recommendations be concurred in by the House because they are specific recommendations to the House.

This is not the first time this has happened, Mr. Speaker. The same hanky-panky took place with the same committee at the last session of the House. I remember full well the second report of the transport committee and how at the last session of Parliament—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should deal with the report which is before the House. Again, I suggest that if this debate is to serve a purpose it should be a discussion of the report before the House, not on reports which had been considered or perhaps ought to have been considered before. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member, and those who take part in this debate, that it is rather sterile to spend the whole day on a debate as to whether a motion which is not before the House now should have been moved before. What is up for discussion is the substance of the report.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the report before the House and the recommendations contained in the report are, as I was suggesting, the results of a long and exhaustive study and public hearings. I am glad to see the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Blouin) is in the House because he was one of the members of the committee who worked hard in the preparation of the report and he has a particular interest in the report because it affects so much of his constituency. I hope the hon. member for Manicouagan, before the allotted time for this debate has expired, will rise to his feet and make comments on the recommendations contained in the report. These recommendations are very important to the territory of the north shore of Quebec, and to my hon. friend's constituency of Manicouagan which is suffering the consequences of an inadequate system of transportation.

These recommendations are vital to the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, and I hope that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) will not hide behind the narrow, hair-splitting excuse of jurisdiction as he suggested he is going to do. He has suggested, for example, that highroads come under provincial jurisdiction. Everybody in the House knows that. The committee knew that when it made these recommendations and the committee also knew—

An hon. Member: You don't seem to know—

Mr. McGrath: I do not mind being interrupted by Your Honour but, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that members on that side should permit me to conclude my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor and questions can be asked of him only if he is prepared to yield the floor.

An hon. Member: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, I will be glad to entertain a question from the hon. member when I have finished my remarks.

We all know that highway construction does come within provincial jurisdiction. The committee knew that when it made its recommendations. We also had the experience of the Trans-Canada highway, and we also had the experience of the Roads to Resources Program. Both these programs were as a consequence of federal initiative, and both programs were carried out with substantial federal financial participation. There is, therefore, no suggestion that we are interfering with any area of provincial jurisdiction.

What we are suggesting is that the government of Canada exercise its responsibility to get an agreement between the province of Quebec and the province of Newfoundland and that the government of Canada participate in this agreement to build a road across Labrador, through the constituency of Manicouagan down to the north shore of Quebec. That is all we are suggesting; but the Minister of Transport knows the intransigence of the Premier of Newfoundland in this regard. He knows some of the political implications involved in this program. Perhaps that is why he suggested, or tried to suggest he was powerless to act because this was a provincial responsibility.

We are delighted that the government intends, at long last, to act on or accept the recommendations of the committee. The only thing we find difficulty in understanding is why the Minister of Transport—perhaps the hon. member for Lasalle will enlighten us on this—allowed us to take the initiative in moving concurrence in this report, and why the hon. member for Lasalle as chairman of the committee did not move concurrence in the report a few days after it was presented.

[Translation]

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be taking part in this debate. I have no wish to delay the proceedings of the House, but I would like to say a few words about the motion of my friend the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle). Our districts have a common border. In those vast areas, needless to say that difficult problems do arise, not only with regard to transport and communications, but in many other fields as well.

I was a member of the committee on transport and communications and I was very happy to visit the area in the company of 20 other parliamentarians of various political allegiances who were able to find out on the spot that the problems to which I have just alluded do exist.

I will mostly discuss the contents of the committee report. I was pleased to hear the devoted Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) who spoke earlier say that he agreed with the report's recommendations.

In accepting that report the minister who represents Newfoundland must surely be aware of the gigantic developments in the constituencies of Manicouagan and Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. Now, should he feel that the recommendations in the committee report are too exhaustive, I must remind him that in my constituency the federal government gets $20 million a year in corporate income taxes.

Moreover, taking into account the recommendations of the committee, he would only make up a little for the huge amounts that the mining industry pays each year to the government.

A specific mention is made in the report about ferryboats. The minister said earlier that he did not know whether ferryboats were under the federal or the provincial jurisdiction. I know that after many efforts to secure a ferryboat service between the south shore and the north shore we have always been told, at least these last few years, that those ferryboats provided a provincial service and that, consequently, jurisdiction over them ought to rest with the province of Quebec.

The ferryboats system also comes under the federal jurisdiction, I think. In fact, all ferryboats in Canada, whether they are provincial or interprovincial services, have always been subject to federal interventions and in some cases, the federal government has subsidized them. I can hardly understand why this government would not do the same in an area where industry is very active and where ferryboats services are very much needed.

Mention is also of the ports at Baie-Comeau and Sept-Îles. I would like to say a few words about the latter. The committee members, including some opposition members, in particular the representative of the New Democratic party, came to visit the Sept-Îles harbour and they all agreed that it did not meet the actual requirements of maritime traffic.

For the past three years, in keeping with the recommendations, I have been trying to get a new dock for this seaport from which 25 million tons of ore were shipped last year, giving it first place for shipping volume. An increase of some four million tons is expected this year, which means total shipments of some 30 million tons.

[Mr. Blouin.]

It is therefore most urgent that another dock be added to the present port facilities and I again ask that the Minister of Transport try to convince of this necessity the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) who over the past three years has been against the building of this new dock.

My colleagues from Newfoundland have commented on air transportation. I would add that some of the recommendations proposed extending the Baie-Comeau airport and I hope the minister will take good note of them.

When it comes to roads, I must say that everywhere the committee members travelled on this vast territory they expressed the desire that the isolated mining towns would be linked by a road network. I know that roads come under provincial jurisdiction, but if we examine the committee recommendations we see that they favor an agreement between the Newfoundland and Quebec governments in respect of road construction.

I think it is the responsibility of the federal as well as the provincial governments to get these very active and hard working populations out of their isolation. Once on the site, we talked a lot about roads. Of course, the committee then explained that the roads department came under the jurisdiction of the provincial government.

As far as the other transportation systems are concerned, the committee heard some evidence and received more than 60 briefs. The committee then replied to witnesses that television was the responsibility of the Department of Communications.

The inhabitants, who are increasing in number from year to year, in view of the gigantic developments, are still without a television network. I think the government should look seriously into this matter, which seems to have been the case for a few years, but they have not yet come up with any suggestion.

I am glad to note that the House accepts unanimously the recommendations of this report. In visiting my constituency the committee has done an excellent job. I am convinced that the people acknowledge that. They were pleased to see members of Parliament coming to them, as they are not usually want to do, in order to assess local problems.

In co-operation with the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, we often have to study various problems. He also has made recommandations. When this motion was presented, I felt that the House should adopt it, and it did in fact do so. I wish to thank those who participated in this debate and who were all in favour of this report being concurred in.

[English]

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, in supporting the motion the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) has put forward at this particular time, I should like to say that a few minutes ago the minister said he was prepared to accept in principle the recommendations that were made by the committee I believe this is only proper. He said the government would look at the recommendations, but there was a great need for consultation at all levels in so far as some of the recommendations were concerned.

I agree that there is a great need for consultation at all levels because this is the basis upon which our federal system operates. The recommendations of the committee cover every area of the territory that we visited. I would like to say that, in the short time I have been a member of the committee, I have never seen as much participation by members in those areas which we visited on the trip as was the case this time. I should also like to say that I believe it is most important, now that the recommendations have been made by the committee, that they be considered seriously by the department and that those people who will be responsible for implementing them be made fully aware of the observations that have been made at the meetings of the committee.

I think that we should give some thought to whether we should move concurrence in a report of a committee when the report is tabled in the House. I understand that this decision is not left up to the chairman. I appreciate the fact that the chairman himself cannot move concurrence in a report unless the committee members instruct him to do so. I think that when committee reports are tabled in the House concurrence should be moved, particularly when there is unanimity among the committee members. This is what we should think about seriously if we want to make effective use of committees in this House.

In conclusion, I should like to say that we in this party have no hesitation at all in supporting the report and recommendations of the committee fully. It is a privilege for me, on behalf of our party, to urge that this motion be adopted unanimously.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I will make one of the briefest speeches on record. I simply wish to go on the record as supporting the motion of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) that the House concur in the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. This is perhaps an unprecedented move in the sense that I understand it will be unanimously accepted by the House.

Mr. McGrath: With the qualifications of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson).

Mr. Lundrigan: This action by the House points out the value of an efficient, aggressive, competent, able, effective, determined and dedicated opposition. Perhaps if we were in the Newfoundland legislature—and the Minister of Transport will appreciate that—I would repeat the whole sentence because this is certainly a sentiment one eminent politician on the Newfoundland scene does not appreciate.

I simply wish to go on record as supporting the motion of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. He has been very active in this area, and I think that the motion today for concurrence indicates his dedication to the report and the recommendations of the committee. I sincerely hope that the transportation problems in Newfoundland and Labrador will be at least partially solved as a result of the recommendations and that the government will take some initiative, not just play around with words as all governments and oppositions tend to do.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I now leave the Chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.45 p.m. the House took recess.

Agricultural Co-operative Marketing Act

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS CO-OPERATIVE MARKETING ACT

AMENDMENT OF DEFINITION OF "AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS"

The House resumed, from Friday, February 20, consideration in committee of Bill C-183, to amend the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act—Mr. Olson—Mr. Faulkner in the Chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Friday, February 20, 1970, clause 1 of the bill was under consideration. Shall clause 1 carry?

On clause 1—"Agricultural Product".

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the committee would be disposed to wait for a moment or two until the minister is able to be present because our questions will necessitate the information that is at the minister's disposal?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am almost tempted to respond to agricultural questions, but I think it more appropriate that my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, should respond in this regard and I believe he is on his way.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I think the President of the Privy Council is being too modest for once in his life because, although he does not know very much, he probably knows as much as the Minister of Agriculture about these problems. As an alternative, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. member for Don Valley, who is in the Chamber with his notes, could give us a brief explanation of the white paper. I am only trying to be helpful.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me some of the members opposite could use at least a brief explanation of it.

Mr. Gleave: I doubt that we could be any more brief than your own minister. He is having a fair time with it himself.

Mr. McBride: Brief and to the point.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I could make a note of the questions asked by hon. members and forward them to the Minister of Agriculture or his Parliamentary Secretary as soon as one of them enters the House.

[English]

The Chairman: I am certainly disposed to that suggestion if—

Mr. Stanfield: I did not hear it.

The Chairman: The suggestion was that the minister would take notes of any questions and transmit them to the Parliamentary Secretary when he arrives.

Mr. Stanfield: Surely, Mr. Chairman, we have not been reduced to that yet.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I have a private member's bill in my name. We could probably dispose of that while we are waiting.

Mr. Bell: Even under the presidential system there is no provision for other ministers to take notes.

Mr. Pepin: I was just trying to be helpful.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could have the attention of the House leader. As we are not proceeding very quickly on this order of business, would he like to bring order No. 74 before the House, and we could have a vote on the amendment that was put thereto?

Mr. Baldwin: That is agriculture.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to take this opportunity to speak on agricultural matters, particularly as an Ontario minister and in view of the fact that this Bill C-183 deals with Ontario wheat and the Ontario wheat marketing situation. I am sure the hon. member would agree with some of the other hon. members who have spoken; for example, the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin—

An hon. Member: There is no such riding.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —or whatever the riding of my hon. friend is, would agree with those hon. members that it is eminently desirable that Ontario wheat should be included in the provisions of this particular statute. Therefore I would hope that if he has any commendatory remarks to make about the bill, or any suggestions as to the better administration of the Ontario wheat problems, he will do so and we will be most glad to hear him. If, of course, he has nothing to say on this question that is another matter, but we feel this is a valuable—

Mr. Baldwin: We don't like the Ontario corn we have been hearing.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks that I should like to make because I was not able to be here two weeks ago. I want to follow my remarks with a question to the minister that I would like answered, but I think we should wait until the minister is here; otherwise, my remarks would be useless.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member could have no more sympathetic ear than my own. I will be glad to bring to the attention of the minister what I am sure would be the well informed representations he will make. If he would like to start now, we will be glad to get him all possible answers to his questions.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, this order of business was announced last night, so the minister had ample warning to be here and could have been prepared. It was thought this item would be brought on immediately after the question period, but another order of business superseded it. The minister has no excuse for not being here. If the House leader has a reasonable excuse for the minister not being here, he should give it to the House now.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, it was in conformity with a request received from the opposition that we went ahead with the motion in the name of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. I agree with the hon. member that it would have been far more intelligent to proceed with the business as announced and dispose of this business at the regular time in accordance with the regular procedures of the House. However, we conceded priority to the hon. member and let him go ahead with his motion first, so the timetable has been upset. I am now in a position to announce that the Minister rather than the Parliamentary Secretary will be here shortly to listen to the hon. member's comments.

Mr. Baldwin: You should issue communiques every five minutes on his progress.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the remarks that were made by the House Leader last night, as recorded at page 4429 of Hansard:

> If this Parliament is a duller place it is because of the incompetent leadership which the other side has got from the Leader of the Opposition.

I want to say right now, for the record, that if this is an example of competent leadership from the House Leader, I think there is something that needs attention.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, so that the record will be clear in this regard, I repeat that the gentlemen on the other side are mediocre infantry badly led by an incompetent leader.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that it would not hurt us just to sit quietly for a few minutes.

The Chairman: Yes, I think that is a very useful suggestion. There was a lengthy debate on this subject last night by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster—

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to waste time around here but I was wondering if somebody at the table could get a copy of Beauchesne to see if there is a precedent for this undue waste of time that has been brought about by the incompetence of the House leader. I think it is outrageous and I do not think it has ever happened in the history of this Parliament.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could suggest to the House that, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, we might rise, report progress, and agree to sit later this day. The second item of business for today could be called for which the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is responsible.

The Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

RADIATION EMITTING DEVICES BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDARDS, APPOINTMENT OF INSPECTORS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-14, respecting the sale and importation of certain radiation emitting devices, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Monteith: Is the Parliamentary Secretary not going to say anything?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege, on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), of introducing in the House of Commons, for consideration by hon. members, Bill S-14, an act respecting the sale and importation of certain radiation emitting devices. This bill, which was introduced earlier this session in the Senate, was studied by the Senate Committee on Health, Science and Welfare and was given third reading and passed by the Senate on February 19, 1970.

In this age of rapid technological progress, we have witnessed, among other things, an electronic explosion. This technology, connected with electro-magnetic radiation and its many applications in the fields of medicine, industry, education and entertainment, has been accompanied by many dangers. The Department of National Health and Welfare has, for some years, been involved in the health aspect of the use of radioactive substances and recently has become increasingly aware of the need for control in the design and sale of devices which emit electro-magnetic radiation.

Bill S-14 deals specifically with the sale and importation of devices that may produce and emit dangerous radiation. It will enable the Governor in Council to establish minimum safety standards with respect to the design and construction of radiation devices not involving atomic energy or radioactivity, which are already controlled under the Atomic Energy Control Act. The purpose of the bill is to protect the public from a particularly insidious hazard; for example, exposure to radiation that may escape from the device and harm people in the vicinity.

Radiation is a broad term. The bill refers to electromagnetic and ultrasonic radiation. The radiation-emitting devices covered by this definition include x-ray machines, microwave ovens, laser generators and ultra-sound equipment. It also includes certain electronic devices which emit radiation as an unwanted by-product of their operation. None of these instruments, designed principally for scientific, medical and industrial use, are presently subject to federal control.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

The need for safety standards for radiation equipment has been recognized for many years. Radioactive devices are strictly controlled under the Atomic Energy Control Regulations. The other forms of radiation, equally dangerous, should be subject to similar safety restrictions. Many scientists in Canada and other countries have urged the necessity for this, and for good reason, because the effects of radiation on health are particularly serious.

It is well known, for example, that exposure to even small amounts of radiation can increase the incidence of leukemia and cancer and produce genetic damage. Although the experts in this field cannot give, in quantitative terms, a precise measure of the number of persons affected, they are convinced that even low level emissions, so-called "stray" or "leakage" radiation, adds in some degree to the statistical incidence of these diseases. The seriousness of these effects, even where the risk is low, makes it imperative to hold radiation emissions to the very lowest levels possible. To do so, standards must be set and maintained by regulatory control.

Particularly important is the provision of standards governing the design and construction of the devices. They apply before the device is put to use and constitute the basic first line of protection. It is with such standards that Bill S-14 is concerned. Proper design of equipment can often reduce unwanted exposures very significantly without impairing the usefulness of the device. Appropriate standards for this purpose have been recommended by scientists associated with the World Health Organization and other international agencies.

Not all these recommendations, even the very simplest, are being followed at the present time in Canada. In the case of x-rays, for example, a recent survey of dental x-ray units in the Ottawa area, carried out by the Department of National Health and Welfare, showed that a large percentage of the x-ray machines in use had one or more shortcomings, as judged by the recommended standard, which could result in unnecessary exposure to patient or to the operator.

Microwaves, in addition to their use in radar and communication networks, are finding extensive application in commercial equipment such as ovens and dryers. They are used in automatic food vending machines, restaurant kitchens and many industrial operations where fast drying or heating is needed.

Ill effects reported in humans include eye cataracts, blood changes and disturbance of the nervous system. Evidence of a statistical increase in the incidence of eye cataracts among persons exposed to microwave emissions has been documented.

To prevent such adverse health effects, international agencies have established recommended standards with respect to radiation emissions, that is, the leakage radiation. Nevertheless, in a recent survey carried out by the United States department of health, education and welfare, it was found that a substantial proportion of the microwave ovens tested emitted radiation in excess of the standard. The Department of National Health and Welfare is currently conducting a survey of ovens and dryers in the greater Ottawa area and has found some similar deficiencies.

Laser devices are now extensively used in hospitals and in industry. Furthermore, they are being sold to educational institutions as teaching aids. This type of device is relatively new and uses are being developed rapidly. The small, but very intense beam of laser light is known to be particularly harmful to the eyes. Clinical evidence of damage to the retina of the eye, caused by accidentally viewing inadequately safeguarded equipment, has been reported in the United States and in other countries.

Ultrasonic devices are finding many applications in medical practice and in industry. Until recently it was thought that the passage of ultrasonic energy through the body, as carried out in medical diagnostic procedures, is not hazardous, but recently there have been reports of experiments on animals which indicate an effect on growth patterns. There is also some indication that ultrasonic radiation can interact with reproductive cells in a way which could produce genetic defects.

The bill, therefore, covers a wide range of devices which are used primarily for industrial, medical and scientific applications. It will ensure that defective, sub-standard equipment is kept off the market. This, of course, is only one aspect of the radiation protection problem. Other aspects such as safe installation and operation are not dealt with in the bill because they come under provincial jurisdiction. Some provinces have already passed legislation along these lines. Bill S-14 can be considered as complementary to, not conflicting with, these provincial regulations.

Finally, I should mention that the bill is drawn in a way which envisages the introduction of regulations on a gradual, step-by-step basis. Specific categories of devices will have to be defined and standards established for each. There will be ample opportunity for discussion with manufacturers as to any modifications necessary to meet the standard proposed. This procedure is possible because the hazard is viewed as, principally, a long term one. Adverse health effects would be expected only after very long periods of exposure. Therefore, except in unusual cases, it is unlikely that the introduction of standards will necessitate immediate and drastic design changes in present models.

When Bill S-14, after receiving second reading in this House, is studied in detail by the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, I expect to introduce an amendment to subclause (h) of clause 2, changing the definition of radiation emitting device so that it will mean any device which emits radiation. In this way, devices such as television sets may be included in the regulations to the act if approved by the Governor in Council.

Bill S-14 is an important piece of legislation and one more step taken by this government, and particularly by the Department of National Health and Welfare, to protect the health of the Canadian people. On behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I commend this legislation to all hon. members, as it is in the public interest.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I trust the Minister of Agriculture will remain here during this discussion. I see him behind the curtain. As long as he stays, it will be all right; we do not want to lose him now for another 25 minutes.

The Parliamentary Secretary has given an explanation of this bill. It will, of course be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs where it will receive a careful and more detailed examination. I have read the bill and I do not find much there with which to quarrel.

The Parliamentary Secretary told us that this measure would cover X-ray machines, microwave ovens and certain laser beam installations. I can understand that danger might be involved in handling these things—that dangerous radiations might be emitted, and that some provision is necessary. The Parliamentary Secretary mentioned that surveys were being conducted in the Ottawa area and that some deficiencies have been discovered. I agree that action should be taken to protect the public in this respect. I am pleased to note that, generally speaking, equipment presently in use will not be affected by the legislation. The Parliamentary Secretary intimated, to the best of his ability I gather, that most of the equipment presently in use would not have to be discarded. So, no monetary penalty will be incurred by present users.

I am wondering just where television sets might fit into this legislation. Would they come under the Hazardous Products Act, or would they be dealt with here? I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman mention that the regulations would be brought in step by step, on a gradual basis. I note clause 12(2) suggests that reasonable opportunity will be afforded to manufacturers, distributors and other interested persons to make representations to the minister. We are in favour of this.

There is one clause, however, with which I have to disagree. I refer to clause 13, which simply means that an accused is guilty until he has proved his innocence. This seems to reflect a trend of thinking which has been developing in government circles. To my mind, this is not justice. I believe it is up to the Crown to prove guilt. The clause reads:

> In any prosecution for an offence under this Act, it is sufficient proof of the offence to establish that it was committed by an employee or agent of the accused whether or not the employee or agent is identified or has been prosecuted for the offence, unless the accused establishes that the offence was committed without his knowledge or consent and that he exercised all due diligence to prevent its commission.

This puts the onus directly on the accused to prove that he did not know his employee or agent might have been guilty of some offence. I think it is for the Crown to prove that the accused must have known. As far as I can see, the trend today in government activities is that the authorities seem to feel they, themselves, are above the law. The income tax department have been carrying on this way for years, and I just do not like it. We are putting the finger of guilt on the accused until he proves that he is innocent, something that I think is a very unfortunate, indeed a bad, trend.

With those few remarks I will resume my seat; when the bill does reach committee, closer examination of its details will be made.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief comments to make on this bill. I too, support the principle of the bill and look forward to examining it in detail in committee. I have really one point only. I am not quite sure whether this bill will affect any equipment manufactured in Canada that emits radiation. In this regard, I am concerned for the good name of Canada abroad when equipment of this kind is exported . If the Parliamentary Secretary dealt with this point, then I missed it.

I suggest that if there is no law governing the matter, we should at least apply some pressure to make certain that equipment manufactured in Canada and sold abroad must conform to some sort of regulation. We have a large stake in export markets abroad. Certainly, as far as export sales are concerned, I wish that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) would get busy and sell some atomic energy plants.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS CO-OPERATIVE MARKETING ACT

AMENDMENT OF DEFINITION OF "AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS"

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-183, to amend the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act—Mr. Olson—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. When the committee rose on Friday, February 20, 1970 clause 1 of the bill was under consideration. Shall clause 1 carry?

On clause 1—"Agricultural Product".

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, this is one amendment to the act with which I think most of us will agree, particularly the wheat producers in the province of Ontario, because it was at their request the minister brought forward the amendment. Most of the remarks that I might have made today were made previously in the House, I believe two weeks ago today, so I will not take the time to cover old ground.

However, further to anything that was said on that day, I should like to put a couple of suggestions to the Minister of Agriculture, who I am glad to see has been able to make it to the House. Perhaps I should make a speech for a few minutes on the problem of keeping a well-run and well-managed House, though a lot was said about that yesterday.

Mr. Olson: You will be sorry if you do.

Mr. McKinley: The experience of today only proves that much that was said yesterday by opposition members was quite correct. However, I am not blaming the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Osler: Would the hon. member permit a question. I do not know whether or not we are on the subject, but is he talking about hogwash?

Mr. Danforth: Yes; the hogwash you hear from that side of the House.

Mr. McKinley: Only the people here who come from "Hogtown" know about hogwash.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre does not come from "Hogtown".

Mr. McKinley: Recently in the House it was announced that assistance would be given to the western wheat producers not to grow wheat. I take no exception to that at all, though I doubt very much whether the proposals that were announced will do the job the government intends them to do. Be that as it may, a certain amount of money is going to be spent in assisting western wheat producers.

The Wheat Producers Marketing Board of Ontario feel that the wheat producers of Ontario should not be left out of the picture altogether. In view of the government's failure to sell western grain, it is becoming quite obvious that many western farmers are going to diversify and go into some other type of farming operation, mainly the feeding of livestock. This will no doubt create a hardship for the eastern farmers by diminishing the traditional role that they have considered to be theirs.

This was part of the reason Eastern farmers requested this amendment to allow the minister to guarantee loans to the Wheat Producers Marketing Board of Ontario, who will make initial payments to farmers. This guarantee of initial payments will be, in effect, a floor price. The Wheat Producers Marketing Board of Ontario has done a tremendous job of moving the wheat that has been grown by the producers. Oftentimes, in fact most of the time, all this wheat has to be kept in storage for considerable lengths of time until markets can be found. When markets are found, it is helpful if there is a considerable amount of wheat in storage to fill these orders. This is the traditional method of marketing that has developed in the last three years.

A charge of 17 cents a bushel is deducted to pay the storage costs. This amount has been sufficient to cover the cost up to now, but beginning in the next crop year 17 cents a bushel will not be sufficient to pay the storage costs and also fulfil the subsidized contracts for export sales that are necessary to move the wheat. Because of this fact a request has been made by the Ontario Wheat Producers that Ontario grain, particularly wheat, come under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act in order that government funds could be used to pay part of the storage costs that are entailed in the marketing of this wheat.

I should like to ask the minister if it would be possible, under this legislation, for the government to pay a certain portion of the storage costs that are necessary in the marketing of wheat from Ontario. Really, we are asking for no more than the western wheat producer receives. I believe the government pays the storage charges on everything over 178 million bushels, which would mean at the present time it is paying the storage charges on close to one billion bushels. I do not think this is too much for the Ontario farmer to ask. I should like to ask the minister, either now or at some later time, to give us an indication of the possibility of something like this being done to assist the eastern producer.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to apologize to the committee for not being here when this item was being considered at two o'clock or shortly thereafter. For the information of those who are interested in agricultural matters, I was at a series of meetings today, starting at nine o'clock this morning with the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Canadian livestock feed board for a number of reasons which I will not explain now.

In respect of the question that has just been raised by the hon. member for Huron, there is under Section 4 of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, a provision where the minister may, with respect to any agreement under this act and with the approval of the Governor in Council, prescribe variations in the initial price and that sort of thing. It also includes the maximum amount that may be allowed under the agreement for processing, carrying or selling costs with respect to the marketing of an agricultural product.

We are talking specifically about wheat grown in Ontario, which this amendment was designed to cover, so these things can be taken into account in the agreement that is made between the minister, under the authority of this act, and the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board. It seemed to me that the hon. member was not putting the question exactly in that context. It seemed to me he was asking whether we could use the authority of this act to directly pay the storage charges on that wheat. If that was the question, as I understood it, the answer is that we cannot use the authority of this act for that purpose. What we can do is take into account these other costs such as storing, and I will repeat them, processing, carrying and selling. Those costs can be taken into consideration when we agree to the guarantee, that would be provided by this act.

Mr. McKinley: I thank the minister for his answer. I should like to ask whether it would present a different picture if the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board became an agency marketing board?

Mr. Olson: It could, but, of course, as I understand it, some subsequent action by Parliament would be necessary to provide for a direct payment for storage. As my hon. friend knows, in the other case he referred to the authority given there is specifically contained within the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which was passed by this House in 1956.

Mr. McKinley: Could Ontario wheat not come under that Temporary Wheat Reserves Act?

Mr. Olson: No, not unless that Act were amended.

Mr. Danforth: I have some specific questions I should like to put to the minister which are not in opposition to the amendment. I think there should be more definite information available to those who will be affected by this amendment. If I could get it on the record we might save a lot of time and worry perhaps in future considerations.

I should like to ask the minister, first, since initially the request for this amendment was forwarded by the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board, is it possible for the Wheat Board and the wheat producers to take advantage of the initial payment provided for in the regulations and the bill, without having other aspects of their activities regulated and regimentated? I think the farmers and producers would be interested in knowing, through the minister, whether they are in a position to request money from the government for the initial payments on this type of wheat, or are there strings attached?

Mr. Olson: As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, I cannot accept the word "regimentation" and all of the others involved in this at all. All this bill is designed to do is provide them with a government guarantee so they can obtain the credit to make the initial payments. The minister, under this act, is required to make sure that the security is sufficient to take care of that guarantee, taking into account, I believe it is three years marketing returns from this crop. He is obliged to make certain that the initial payments are set in compliance with the performance of the market for the three years previous, and take into account such other things as are spelled out in the measure, when entering into a contract with the marketing board on behalf of the government of Canada for the funds that are used in the initial payments.

Mr. Danforth: In the latter part of the minister's statement I think he started to get at the crux of the matter as far as producers are concerned. I am familiar with the terms of the act. It seems to me, if I understand it correctly, that if the producers in Ontario are prepared to accept loans under this bill for the initial payments, it also follows that no subsequent payments can be made until they receive the consent of the minister. When these initial payments have been made—and this is one regulation I will refer to—is there also not an implied provision that the minister and his department then concern themselves directly with charges incurred in transporting, storing, processing and handling of grains?

Mr. Olson: Not on a day-to-day or month-to-month basis, Mr. Chairman. We are concerned about following the operations not only of the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board but of all other boards which from time to time ask to be brought under this act. All we are interested in is that there be sufficient security left for the initial guarantee. If at any time during the year the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board would want to make a further payment, or indeed a final payment to the producers, our interest would be to make sure there is not a deficit in the pool, so that the guarantee is taken care of at the end of the marketing season for whatever crop is involved.

If, at any later date after the initial payment has been made, the board could indicate it had surplus funds that it wished to disburse or pay out to the members, and there were still assets in the pool after the payment of the initial guarantee, we would have no objection to the board making that disbursement.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy and patience of the minister. I am trying to have the facts placed on the record so they may be available to the producers. As I understand it, under this act the initial payment does not necessarily have to be 80 per cent of the value of the product, but no initial payment could be instituted or promoted by the pool or marketing agency without direct consultation and agreement with the Department of Agriculture.

The initial payment does not necessarily have to be 80 per cent; it can be 20 per cent, 35 per cent or 70 per cent of the estimated value of the crop. This would mean that the farmers would receive the agreed initial payment which could be 60 per cent of the market price, and there would be no further payment except through consultation between the operators of the agency and the minister at a subsequent time which could be three, five or eight months later. This is the type of regulation I am trying to have the minister explain, for the benefit of those who will have to consider whether or not they wish to accept it.

Mr. Olson: I am not quite sure I understand the hon. member. Is he suggesting that after the agreement had been signed in respect of the initial payment a situation would arise whereby there would be a deterioration in the value of the crop so that a substantial change would be required? If this is the question, I suppose the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board would be interested in taking whatever action may be appropriate to make sure that their initial payment was not continuing at a rate in excess of what was considered to be fair taking into account the value or the then amended value of the crop.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, in pursuing this matter further—

Mr. Olson: If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should say that I have been advised we have never found ourselves in a position under any of these agreements in which we have had to ask the agency to lower, or even where the board has asked us to lower the initial payment part way through the selling season.

Mr. Danforth: There is another problem that disturbs me in considerating this matter. Perhaps I might put the question in two parts. If there should be a disposition on the part of the eastern producers to accept this proposition, will they not of necessity be forced into some sort of pooling arrangement? Second, as I understand it, very often there are varying grades of wheat even here in eastern Canada and some grades may be sold even below the initial price. If there should be additional sales in one grade, is it not within the power of the minister's department and the agency to divert this money to the government coffers in order that the government regain its initial payment? From my understanding of the act it would seem that if some grades sell at greater than the initial payment, and other grades sell at lower than the initial payment, there is recourse for the government under this particular proposition.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the first part of the question may I say that that is very definitely so. There would have to be pooling by the producers who sell to the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board. Indeed, that is the sole purpose, not only of this amendment but of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act. When it was passed in 1939 it was called an act to assist and encourage co-operative marketing of agricultural products.

In response to the second part of the question concerning what would happen with regard to the value of various grades, and what would happen in respect of the pay-out or transfer of money among those various grades, certainly the money would not come to government coffers but there might be some money from certain grades, depending on when the sale was made at a higher price, that would find its way into the pool of the agency during the season. But that, of course, is based on the assumption that there would be a loss on a pool.

When I talk about this matter I am talking about receipts for the whole pool in excess of the total initial payment. If there should be an excess in the pool over the initial payment, the agency would have authority to make a final payment or an interim payment that would vary from grade to grade taking into account the selling price of the various grades. But in the case where there would be a loss on the over-all pool—and just to repeat, that is when the total amount of the receipts from the pool would be less than the total amount of the initial payment—of course this would have to be taken into account. It would not come into government coffers but, of course, it would be in the agency's treasury.

I suppose that is why the limit is 80 per cent of the value of these crops for the last three years, so that the initial price can be as high as possible without there being too much of a risk of paying out more on the initial payment than the final price would be. So the answer to the first question is very definitely yes; pooling is the whole idea of this act. In respect of the second part of the question, I do not see any problem if there is not a deficit in the pool. If there should be a deficit in the pool, I suppose some of these arguments could be made.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I have one further question, if I may have your indulgence. I can see that the farmers certainly would expect that the working of this system would be in the form of a pool. Under this act, and within the prerogative of the agency, is there the power, or could there be the power to set up definite quotas? I wonder whether the minister would, for the record, repeat what he said. Since this legislation comes under provincial jurisdiction, no agency can be set up without the whole matter being referred to the farmers by way of a plebiscite. Am I correct in this assumption?

Mr. Olson: With regard to the first part of the question as to whether this act would automatically set up quotas, the answer is no. I think that the terms and conditions under which the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board operates now would be, in effect, that if they decided to have quotas there would be a sharing of the available market so that one farmer would not be able to deliver 5,000 bushels and another 500. But that is not part of this act; it is within other regulations.

In so far as a plebiscite is concerned, I am not quite sure about that. I would say, off the top of my head, that to set up a marketing agency for any commodity under Ontario law requires some kind of plebiscite. Whether that is true in all cases, I do not know; but I think that that process has already been started in so far as the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board is concerned. We would not require any further plebiscite for the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board to enter into a contract with us so that we would guarantee them some money for an initial payment. As I said, I stand to be corrected on that because I do not know what the terms and conditions of their rules are, but I think that a plebiscite to set up the marketing board in the first instance was held some time ago.

Mr. McKinley: My understanding is that no type of marketing board will be set up for Ontario wheat without a plebiscite first being held. This is the assumption under which the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board is working at present. With regard to some of the remarks I made earlier, the minister stated that an amendment would be necessary to the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act in order to have Ontario wheat storage charges supplemented by the government in a similar fashion to the western wheat storage charges. I ask the minister if he would be prepared, at the request of the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board, to bring forth such an amendment with a view to providing assistance in respect of wheat storage charges.

Mr. Olson: That rises a completely new dimension that has no application within this act. I am not prepared to give a categorical answer to that question in the context of this debate.

Mr. McKinley: I should like to ask the minister, then, whether this request has been put to him by the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board.

Mr. Olson: I do not recall that it has. I am not saying that it has never been included in any of their briefs to me, but I do not recall that this kind of request has been made. There is one other thing I should say. When we enter into this kind of agreement at the request of any commodity marketing board, we do in fact have consultations with the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board or with any other specific marketing board.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Huron mentioned that under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act the government was paying storage on a billion bushels of wheat. I am sure he would agree with me that this figure should be corrected for the record. Someone said there is a billion bushels of wheat out there. There may or there may not be that much—I do not think anyone knows for sure—but much of it is held in the farmers' hands. I am not sure how much is in the process of being handled at present, but the storage payment is made on what is in store at the end of the crop year.

If the minister would care to comment, he could probably give us an approximate figure. I do not know whether he carries that information in his head, but the figure would not approach a billion bushels. I can understand the concern of the Ontario people about setting up this system and knowing for sure how it works, when out west we are looking at a Wheat Board marketing system which is now going to go into wheat production control in a fairly large way and direct the amount of production in that area without the benefit of a special act of this House.

We are going to institute a radical change in the nature of our farming. This may or may not be true of the Ontario wheat producers. The Ontario farmers are more fortunate than we are, in that they have a larger number of options open to them in terms of production, due to the nature of their land, the environment and the fact that they operate very close to a large market. I thought some light might be shed on whether the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce gives any assistance to the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board in marketing their products. Do they help them find markets?

A statement was made here not too long ago that an opportunity for a substantial sale in the United Kingdom market was not exploited. I wondered at the time what aid was given to this agency to seek out markets. I would be very pleased if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture would comment on this matter.

Mr. Olson: There have been a number of cases in which the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been very helpful in promoting, and instrumental in completing some significant overseas sales of Ontario wheat. Last year it was Syria, but there are a number of other cases in which I know they have been involved.

Mr. Gleave: I recall that the other day I had an opportunity to glance briefly at Hansard wherein it was mentioned that there are a few other products, although not very many, which have received marketing assistance under this act. It seems to me that in the past there has been sometimes intervention on behalf of a group of producers when they needed assistance. I am wondering if it is the intention of the Department of Agriculture to use this act more extensively in assisting farmers. There is in my constituency a small group of farmers who are interested in marketing potatoes. They were in that business for a short period of time but had some difficulty. The storage facilities are still there.

A request went to the department for assistance for this type of operation. I talked to the deputy minister about it on the phone. I wonder what is the attitude or approach of the Department of Agriculture to this type of application. Are they actively encouraging the expansion, in these areas, of the use of the act—that is, in small, isolated areas? I think this would be a fair way to put it. Are they actively encouraging the use of this act under these kinds of circumstances?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this act, of course, are open at all times to commodities that are sold under a co-operative arrangement. All of those things are listed in clause 1 (a): milk and milk products, vegetables and vegetable products, livestock and livestock products, fruit and fruit products, poultry and poultry products, honey, maple syrup, tobacco, and any other product of agriculture designated by the Governor in Council. So there is no limitation there.

At the present time, as has been pointed out, we have contracts for this kind of credit for processing apples in Quebec, and for white beans and yellow-eye beans in Ontario; but it has been used over the years from time to time for such things as forage crop seeds, potatoes, ranch-bred fox pelts, fresh apples, apples for processing, maple syrup, tobacco and beans. So it is available. But there are certain conditions such as administrative arrangements that are necessary to pool this product and to make an initial payment on it. That is what the measure is designed for.

With respect to the other part of the question as to whether we encourage it or not, certainly when I talk to vegetable-growing co-operatives, for example, I remind them that we have this act and that we are prepared to discuss and negotiate with them some kind of a contract so that it can make an initial payment. This, of course, is aimed at relieving some of the pressure at harvest season so that one farmer does not reduce his price substantially in the short run, because in our view there are many cases where it is advantageous for these crops to be pooled and sold at a uniform price. That is sometimes a better price, or a more beneficial price than the very low prices at harvest time when everybody is rushing to market with their crop, whatever it happens to be. They get a substantially higher price at some other period of the year.

So that while we have not got an active campaign going, we do in fact remind these boards and commissions that this act is in place and we are prepared to discuss with them the arrangements that would be necessary to have a uniform price paid to all the producers who belong to the co-operative or the pool.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I notice the minister said "boards and commissions." What is the minimum number of farmers who can form themselves into a co-operative? I assume that a co-operative can take action under this act. Is that right?

Mr. Olson: We do not have a minimum number but what we have to look at is whether the volume of production that is in the hands of these people who wish to make application is sufficient so that it will have an effect on the market; in other words, so that it will work.

Mr. Gleave: Then I take it it would not apply, or would not be made to apply to a small group of vegetable producers or potato growers who were in an isolated pocket, as it were, who would not be able to affect the market structure as such. Am I right on that? I would like to have this matter defined, Mr. Chairman, because, as I say, a specific group of producers requested from the minister's office information on how to do this sort of thing. I would like to know whether a group of producers can do it.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will look at section 3(6) of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act he will note the following:

> No agreement shall be made under this section unless the co-operative plan applies to such a proportion of the primary producers within a certain geographical area or to such a proportion of an agricultural product produced in such area that the minister is of opinion that the marketing of the aforesaid agricultural product under the co-operative plan will benefit the primary producers.

That means, as I understand, it, in layman's language that the geographical area, whether it is large or small or whether it is isolated or not, is not the particular point—but there shall be enough producers within that geographical area, however small or large it may be, that it will be of benefit to the primary producers within the area. If there were an insufficient number of primary producers in the co-operative who were selling their product into the pool, so that some or many of their neighbours were able to do things that were not of benefit to the producers and frustrated the co-operative effort of the producers, I suppose we have to be of the opinion that it would not benefit the primary producers to attempt to hold their product and sell it in the market on a gradual basis, assuming there would be some time later a price better than that available in the harvest season. We would have to take that into account, but I do not believe it excludes a small area if there is in the area a sufficient number of producers who agree to pool their crops.

Mr. Gleave: I thank the minister for his explanation. I think he is being as clear about it as he can. But I point out that one of the people in his department suggested that if the people applying, after carefully studying the act and the commentary decided it might be feasible under the act, they should make a request of the minister.

Mr. Olson: That is right.

Mr. Gleave: I think some clarification might be useful with respect to this type of application, so that if there are only half a dozen people involved they will not spend a lot of time and effort trying to come under a system that does not apply to them.

Mr. Olson: I do not think there is necessarily very much time and effort, or indeed expense, involved. It is very difficult for us to give a definition of the whole of the clause in order to provide for all the variations that could in fact emerge from among the wide variety of crops covered. But if that group, no matter how large or small it may be, could give us an outline of the plan it has in mind for pooling—for selling, if you like—their total crop, I think we could give far more specific answers more in line with what the hon. member is asking than we could without having any conception of what the producers have in mind.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks on this first item of the clause, though I did speak on it on the former occasion. Before doing so, I might say I was rather interested in the explanation the minister gave with regard to his delay in getting to the House today. He inferred that he was at a series of committee meetings that might have something to do with a dairy policy—

Mr. Olson: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Howe: —that is going to be announced one of these days. In that connection, I hope the minister will take cognizance of the recent press release issued by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the effect that skimmed milk powder on world markets is selling at a much better price. There was a paragraph in the release which said that due to this fact, the dairy farmers in Canada will be much better off. I hope that when the policy comes out the $10 million that has been extracted from the dairy farmers of Canada will be put back in, due to the fact that skimmed milk powder is selling at a better price in world market. That statement is right in the press release. Perhaps the minister had better read it next time before he sends it out.

Mr. Olson: The exaggeration may be in the interpretation.

Mr. Howe: It is right there. In regard to the legislation before us, I share some of the skepticism that has been shown in this House, not only by Ontario members but also by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar who has had a great deal of experience with pooling, order permit books and legislation of all kinds that has entered into the lives of the people in the western provinces with regard to the wheat problem.

This problem has been accentuated in the last year because the government has not sold wheat the way it should have and has left it piled up on the farms and the railroads. Now the government is entering into a program of deciding how much wheat is to be grown in designated areas and is going to pay farmers not to grow grain. There is a story about the same kind of program that was carried on in the western United States. A chap from that area came to visit me, and when I asked how many acres he had, he said he had 800. I asked, "All in crop?" He said, "No, it is in the soil bank and the government is paying me for not growing it." "Oh", I said, "then you are not growing any?" He said, "Oh, yes; I rented a farm across the road."

This is what happens under government control and with the government interfering in people's lives. This is the feeling we have sometimes about legislation such as this. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister about the last item in this bill. This bothers me because it almost indicates that never again will legislation such as this have to appear before the House. It reads:

> any other product of agriculture designated by the Governor in Council;

I ask the minister if this means what I think it means, that the Governor in Council is once again interfering in the lives of the farmers of Canada by deciding which of his products will come under this marketing authority.

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Chairman, it does not mean that at all. That was put in the act in 1939 and it is not up for amendment now.

Mr. Howe: Then it should be removed from the act, because it says:

> any other product of agriculture designated by the Governor in Council;

In other words, does that mean that any other product, whether wheat, oats, barley, rice or anything else, can be brought under this measure by the Governor in Council?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, it does. But the government does not bring it under this act. The only thing that happens under this act is when farmers producing a certain commodity band together in a pool or co-operative agreement and come to the Minister of Agriculture, and through him to the Governor in Council, to ask that the particular commodity in which they are interested be made eligible for a guarantee by us so that they can make an initial payment to the farmer. That is all.

There is no possibility, and it has never been done in 31 years, that the government would impose this provision upon anyone. The initiative is completely in the opposite direction. That clause is in there so that if there is some other commodity that does not fit any particular definition, it would not be completely excluded. There is no possibility that the government is going to include a commodity under this act for any purpose except at the request of the co-operative marketing agencies.

Mr. Howe: That may be so, Mr. Chairman. Probably this is correct and this government would not consider anything of this type.

Mr. Olson: Nor would any other government.

Mr. Howe: My first question is with regard to the dairy policy that is coming up. Will the minister give consideration to this news item sent out by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and look again at that $10 million?

Mr. Olson: It is not under this act. The hon. member knows very well that is completely irrelevant to this act.

Mr. Howe: The minister put that in himself when he came into the House and was trying to explain why he was not here earlier. I have a perfect right to discuss dairy policy.

Mr. Olson: Not in my view.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Chairman, I have one question I should like to ask the minister. If this act goes into effect, will it remove the possibility of wheat being placed under the stabilization act for establishing a floor price?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Danforth: No, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Kent-Essex.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, the minister's remarks have created some doubt in my mind and I should like an explanation. I am always suspicious of the fine print in bills which says "and other regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the Governor in Council". These regulations that are prescribed from time to time, mostly when Parliament is not sitting, cause great concern to many members on this side of the House. The minister stated that initial payments may be anywhere from 35 per cent to 80 per cent of the estimated value of the product to be disposed of under this agency.

Under this avenue producers could be bound by pooling, by quotas, by accepting directives as to where they may send their produce, when they may deliver it and other regulations which could be prescribed under the terms and powers of the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board. Would the minister indicate what advantage this is to the wheat producers of eastern Canada, if initial payments are based on the equity of the crop, over the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board itself going to the bank and obtaining moneys without all these other regulations being entailed?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, that is a decision the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board would have to make. I know they have asked us if we could amend this act so that they could be included, because the result of the provision in the act away back in 1939 excluded them. They seem to think there is some advantage to them in having the credit guaranteed by the Minister of Agriculture under the authority of this act, or they would not have asked us.

I think all the other questions the hon. member has raised should be referred to the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board, because they make the regulations. Under this act, all we need is to be satisfied that the initial payment, the part that we guarantee, is such that on a reasonable prediction, and taking into account the value of that product for the last three years, it is reasonably secure. That is all there is to it. On the other part of the question, Bill C-183 does not call for any changes in the authority to make regulations. All it calls for is the amendment so that wheat grown in Ontario can come under the act. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Danforth: It is not as simple as that, Mr. Chairman. The fact remains that the minister has not indicated the advantage in obtaining the money through the government compared with obtaining it through the bank. Is it not true that the government guarantees the initial payment? Somebody has to pay interest on the moneys involved. Are the guarantees through the banks? Who pays the interest? Is it subtracted from the payments made for the product itself? These are questions that concern me.

There is another question, Mr. Chairman, which deeply concerns me. The minister stated that a request was made under this act by the wheat producers. The request for this change was made by the directors of the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board. I am sure the members have confidence in the board. I am very disturbed about the implication that because the producers of Ontario, eastern Canada, and areas of British Columbia are now under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board, by a simple amendment—the addition of one word in this act—they can be saddled with pooling and with quotas.

Mr. Olson: That is wrong.

Mr. Danforth: They can be saddled with an initial payment.

Mr. Olson: No.

Mr. Danforth: The minister indicated this afternoon that all these things are possible.

Mr. Olson: I know the hon. member is reasonable, but the point he has completely overlooked is that they must apply to us. We do not ask them to form these boards or, even if boards are in existence, to come to us. All this bill does is provide us with authority to make a guarantee for the finances they require to make the initial payments. The initiative to do that is with them. It does not change the quotas, areas, constitution or terms and conditions of a co-operative marketing board: all it does is give us an opportunity to provide them with funds for an initial payment.

The hon. member asked what advantage this would be. I suggest the advantage would probably be that they may get a slightly more favourable interest rate if the government of Canada guarantees the credit. I suggest they might even be able to get a larger amount of credit if it is guaranteed by the federal government. Most members of the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board think these advantages would be desirable in their operations to maximize their returns to producers.

Mr. Danforth: I appreciate the patience and the courtesy of the minister, but I think this matter should be clarified for the benefit of the producers. What the minister says in the main is correct, but the fact remains that this change in the act enlarges the powers of the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board to such a degree that they are in a position to establish initial payments. Under the provisions of the provincial act they are unable to establish quotas and all the other regulations I have outlined. Without this amendment they could not establish an initial quota or an initial payment.

In effect, this act will make it possible—not probable—for the wheat producers in eastern Canada to find themselves in the same position as the wheat producers in western Canada. If the minister is correct in stating that the marketing board is not changed and can negotiate with the federal government to this degree, I point out that this can be done without other producers in Ontario being able to indicate through a plebiscite whenever they wish it.

I wish to raise one more point before the minister replies. Under the provincial marketing scheme, if there is a petition by the growers for a plebiscite on the question of dissolving a particular marketing agency, the provincial government will grant it. If I understand the terms of this act, if the government has guaranteed loans and made an initial payment it certainly will not be disposed to having a plebiscite held to abandon a marketing scheme. If there is a loan from the goverment on initial payments and an equity on the crop of the growers, is it not a fact that a vote or plebiscite under those conditions could not be entertained?

Mr. Olson: The Ontario wheat producers can do anything they like within the rules and the law, so long as this money is repaid or the liability of this guarantee is removed. That is all. We are not suggesting that they have to change. If the hon. member is under the impression that this act will do a terrible disservice to the Ontario wheat producers either directly or indirectly, we should take another look at it. However, I think all it is doing is removing the provisions of the act which exclude Ontario wheat even if an application were made to us. It is not changing anything else.

Through a series of changes to the Canadian Wheat Board Act over the last 30 years, the Ontario producers of wheat have been excluded. As I explained in my opening statement, Ontario wheat was included in the Canadian Wheat Board Act, in the first instance, before the war. There was an amendment in 1947 or 1948 which removed Ontario wheat from the designated area under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, but this act still excluded wheat. What we are now doing is changing it to mean any kind of grain other than wheat that is grown in the designated area of the Wheat Board. Therefore, Ontario wheat is not automatically excluded. That is all it is.

I fail to see the relevance of the hon. member's contention that this change will do a disservice to the wheat producers and the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board. All it is doing is giving authority to make the provisions of this act available to the Ontario producers in the same way as all the other products that are listed under clause 1, and under the same terms and conditions as the other commodities listed in clause 1.

We are not asking them to change their rules respecting quotas, etc., but if they make application to us for a guarantee of the money to make an initial payment, we will now be able to do so. If this amendment is not made to the act, we will have to say that wheat has been excluded, including wheat from Ontario. It is also involved in the exclusion. We are trying to tidy up the act so these people can have access to the same kind of financing, under the same terms, as producers of the other commodities; that is all.

I fail to see where there is any disservice to them. They indicated it will be of help. Even if we change the act, if they collectively agree they do not want to make application for the guarantee, there is no change. They just do not make it. However, if we provide a guarantee and there is a great deal of money loaned, we have to protect that money by security. Perhaps that could be done by having the security of whatever volumes of wheat were in any position. Our only terms are that we be able to recover the initial payment made; that is all.

Mr. Danforth: The initial concern I am expressing is that now producers of wheat are able to make the decision as to when they will sell their wheat, what price they are willing to accept for it, where they shall deliver it, whether they want to store it and for how long. My fear is that once this system is entered into, the farmers will lose much of the power they have over their products. We have seen this happen before. On many of the commodities already under this act there are very strict provisions as to the allocation of tobacco, for example, and the agencies have definite control over the disposal of products.

I would not have felt this concern had I received an assurance that the farmers will be able to see the regulations and then determine whether to accept them. Had the facts been placed before the farmers, I would have been perfectly prepared to let this bill pass. Perhaps we could get further ahead if I were to ask the minister a few questions in this regard. Can the hon. gentleman give me an assurance that under the terms of this bill, as it will be administered in conjunction with the provincial act, farmers will not be prevented from selling their wheat to whatever purchasers they wish; that they will not be restricted by quotas; that they will be able to sell through whatever agency they may be disposed to select; and that they will be subject to no restrictions beyond those presently in force?

Mr. Olson: Those are all valid questions, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think they should be addressed to me; they should be addressed to the director and personnel of the Ontario Wheat Marketing Board. The hon. member is implying that somehow or other I can intervene as between the producers and the Ontario board. I must tell him I have no such authority, nor am I disposed to be placed in such a position.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

Mr. Olson moved the third reading of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Danforth: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. As it is four o'clock, the House will now proceed with private members' business as listed in today's order paper, that is to say, public bills.

[English]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Mr. O'Connell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There have been discussions with hon. members who have Notices of Motions Nos. 12, 14 and 15 standing in their names, and I believe it would be agreeable if those three motions were allowed to stand, at request, and we were to proceed to No. 16.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With the first three holding their places on the Order Paper.

Mr. O'Connell: Yes, with the first three holding their places.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Stand at the request of the government.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF TRANSIT AUTHORITY

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the expediency of entering into discussion with the governments of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec on the terms under which a National Capital Region Transit Authority could be created and incorporated by federal charter bearing in mind (a) the inadequacy of public transportation facilities in the national capital region (b) the restriction by charter of transit services, both publicly and privately owned, to municipal boundaries (c) the need for long-term planning of an integrated system of rail rapid transit, bus and other means of urban transit (d) the crises developed by the unfair competition provided by public subsidies on behalf of private vehicles (e) the contribution by an efficient, low-cost public transportation system to the balanced economic and social development of the whole national capital region.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is put forward for consideration and public debate at this time. I hope hon. members will judge it in relation to two bills which stand in my name on the Order Paper—Bill C-57, to establish a National Capital Region Planning Board and Bill C-112, to establish a National Capital Region Pollution Control Board. These two measures, together with the present one which would create a regional transit authority, are based on certain assumptions. The first is that following a recommendation of the Federal-Provincial Conference of February, 1969, the form of article 16 of the British North America Act will be altered to provide for the inclusion of an area in the province of Quebec and an area in the province of Ontario which will correspond roughly to the area defined in the act establishing the national capital region. In other words, the unanimous agreement which was exhibited at the conference where the report dealing with this matter was tabled persuades me that we should consider, when planning the future form of the capital, an area of roughly that size.

The second assumption is that a federal district such as Washington or Brasilia will not be created. In its place will be a development of two municipalities, the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, which has been created on the Ontario side by act of the provincial legislature of Ontario and which is now well under way with a good start, and on the Quebec side the communauté Outaouaise which has been created by act of the provincial legislature of Quebec and which is now in process of development.

These two municipalities, I confidently predict, will develop according to the cultural and legal patterns which reflect the duality of Canadian life. On the Ontario side, I fully expect that the civil law as it affects property and other matters will continue to be that which prevails in the province of Ontario, and that the education system will continue to be the system adopted by that province. On the Quebec side, property and civil law as observed in Quebec will continue to be the basis upon which business is carried out in that part of the national capital region, and the educational system will be essentially that followed in Quebec. I am not one who looks forward to the creation of yet another education jurisdiction in Canada. Ten are more than enough, in my opinion.

If we proceed on the assumption that there are to be regional municipalities on the two sides of the river within two provinces, and if there is to be an extension of the federal government's jurisdiction, it seems to me we must consider the question how certain basic services are to be provided within an orderly framework. Pollution, whether of water, soil or air does not know municipal or provincial boundaries. It seems to me it could have been dealt with, within a territory as restricted as the national capital region, by an act of Parliament ten years ago or more.

It seems to me that this would be a logical regional basis for transportation planning. I think that we must look to something in the order of a regional authority. I know there are constitutional problems. I also appreciate that there are hon. members in the House who will say to me that these are matters within the jurisdiction of the province, to which I must reply that at some point common sense has to prevail. There is no means by which you can lick the pollution problem in this area by fractioning jurisdiction to the point where you cannot touch this because it is in the municipality's jurisdiction, and you cannot touch that because it is in the province's jurisdiction. The Ottawa River is polluted by everybody, and sooner or later there has to be a co-ordinated attack on that particular problem. I suggest the problem of urban transportation is equally serious.

I had hoped that the concept of some kind of regional authority being established to deal with this specific problem would be the type of instrument that could be created by agreement at a Federal-Provincial Conference, and that the necessary powers would be delegated to that body which would be incorporated, I would hope, by federal charter and concurrent provincial enactment.

I should like to quote from the Ottawa-Hull area transportation study which was conducted in 1965. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec and something like 30 municipalities contributed financially to the preparation of this study. On the subject of urban bus routes the study had this to say:

> The cities of Ottawa, Hull and Eastview and the adjacent communities in a very real sense form one metropolitan area. People may live in one municipality, work in another and do their shopping in a third, and political divisions will rarely have a restraining effect on travel. Yet there is little in the provision of public transit services crossing the Ottawa River that recognizes this situation. The Ottawa Transportation Commission operates only one route across the Chaudière Bridge—

And so on.

> Admittedly, these routes are oriented to serving the employment concentrations in the central business district, which produce the most important segment of all public transit trips in the study area. However, no such level of service is provided for persons who, for example, may live in Pointe Gatineau and work in the west end of Ottawa. Because there is little or no penetration of routes from one side of the Ottawa River to the other, and because there is no free transfer system, passengers making this type of trip are subjected to great inconvenience and, undoubtedly, this must force potential patrons into using automobiles instead.

I am sure my colleague the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) will be able to deal much more adequately than I can with the problem of crossing from the other side of the river. I do not want particularly to highlight the problems of the residents of that area as against the problems of the residents of any other part of the region. My point is that we all have a stake in the number of automobiles that come into this part of the central community on a daily basis, just as we have a great stake in seeing that there is a proper balance between the various modes of taking people to and from their employment.

A later study which was commissioned in 1969, the Ottawa central area study, is much more explicit in its recommendations. This study, which in my opinion used an excessively high population projection—though I do not feel this invalidates its conclusions—recommended that a high feed, high capacity transportation system is essential to meaningful urban life in the metropolitan centre of Ottawa, and that this rapid transit system should be developed as early as possible to bring about a regional development pattern that could be integrated with it. They set a target date of roughly 1990 by which a rail rapid transit system should be operating as part of the balanced system. They recommended that the balanced planning of the use of automobiles, buses and rail rapid transit be determined by some type of authority created for this purpose. I believe that the motion standing in my name today essentially would incorporate these recommendations and make it possible to implement them.

It seems to me that our objectives in the development of a transportation policy are essentially three-fold. We want the highest level of service for a balanced system. A balanced system includes the private automobile, bus transportation, and over a longer period as soon as density will permit, a rail rapid transit system. I believe that our objectives should also include, on a very high priority basis, the reduction of air pollution and traffic congestion. It is abundantly clear that the private automobile is contributing to congestion, and through use of fuel containing lead to pollution of the air that we breathe in our working day to a degree that very few of us really understand. It is fashionable today to attack pollution, to recognize it as a high priority public problem. But in my opinion it is essential that we provide not only prohibitions on certain types of fuels; we must also offer alternative means of getting people to and from their places of employment if we are to achieve our objectives.

In addition to a high level of service and the reduction of pollution, I believe our objectives must also include a proper balance of public expenditure on various modes of travel. The priorities must not be too heavily weighted in favour of the private automobile and against buses and rail rapid transit. I had the privilege of serving on the Ottawa Transportation Commission for two years. This was an experience I thoroughly enjoyed because it gave me the opportunity of observing the operation of what we had every reason to believe was a good, efficient, modern bus system. In the ten years between 1954 and 1964 this system lost 30 per cent of its traffic. From carrying 45 million passengers a year, it slipped to carrying a little over 32 million passengers.

During this period the bus system standardized its operation by using one type of bus. A new and efficient garage was built at the east end of the city and at Champagne Avenue. It undertook a program of personnel training and staff reduction which brought it a very enviable record in terms of maintenance cost. The system won a number of awards for safety, and I believe the community had every reason to be proud of its technical performance at a time when it was losing 30 per cent of its passengers.

In 1965 the tide was turned by the process of holding down fares; and with the vigorous support of the municipal authorities the system regained a portion of its former passenger load during the years 1965, 1966, 1967 and 1968. The process was then once more reversed. As a result of an excessive tax burden and some rather large settlements arrived at in collective bargaining with the employees of the system, substantial increases in fares were made and the reserves of the system were depleted. The system is now at the point where it has to be subsidized by a levy of something like two mills.

This is at a time when the provinces of Ontario and Quebec impose the highest level of taxes on public transportation systems on the North American continent. Let me repeat —the highest level of taxes on the North American continent on a public transit system are imposed by the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. Something in excess of 10 per cent of gross revenue is paid directly in taxes.

At the time when this took place the municipality also undertook, with provincial assistance, a very heavy subsidy to the private automobile drivers. The automobile driven subsidy takes many forms. It takes the form of the new Queensway construction, new expressway construction, a traffic engineering department and a rather advanced and sophisticated synchronization system to make sure that traffic signals all change at the right time, and also off-street parking. The tragedy about this form of subsidy is that it is concealed and the taxpayer does not know or think about it. The subsidy to the private automobile is there in the budget of the public authority.

In the province of Ontario an absolutely incredible, short-sighted policy in regard to parking authorities has been adopted. When the municipality puts parking meters on the streets, the proceeds of the parking meters go exclusively to creating and subsidizing more off-street parking. The parking meter rents out space on the street. The streets belong to every taxpayer, not just the people who drive private automobiles. But by legislation establishing the Ottawa Parking Authority, for example, entire proceeds from parking meters go into a fund and the fund is used to acquire more off-street parking facilities in the central areas. The Ottawa Parking Authority has been an extremely well operated body and I pay them the highest compliment in terms of technical performance of the job. But they have created a pattern of off-street parking which is not necessarily related to public transportation. The two have gone off in entirely different directions.

I think it is clear that the crisis in public transit is one of negligence; it is a crisis of community indifference and one of short-sighted provincial and municipal policy. This is a crisis from which we will all suffer if positive efforts are not taken to overcome it. What kind of thing has to be done? I believe that the proceeds from parking meters should at least be split between the bus rider and the automobile rider. Fifty per cent of these proceeds should go toward the cost of operating a good bus system. There must be a community awareness of the need to give greater privileges to a bus carrying 50 passengers than to individual vehicles carrying an average of 1½ passengers. There must be a prohibition of on-street parking on certain through bus routes, especially at peak hours.

Finally, I should like to say a word or two about the thorny problem of the provision of no-charge parking by employers in the central area of employment. In the city of Ottawa—I note that one of my colleagues suggests that this sounds like a city council meeting, but I am trying to indicate to hon. members that the federal government has a special role which cannot be played by any other municipal authority within this area—where you have two provinces involved and several municipalities, I am looking to the federal authority, in its discussions and in the pattern of developing a new national capital, to take a little initiative which cannot be taken, by the nature of things, at any other level.

The problem with parking charges, in which the federal government has a very large role because it is the largest employer in the city of Ottawa and in the whole region, is the pattern which also creates distortion in the use of public transit. I would hope—and I have suggested this at different times—that the regional municipality, when considering the transfer of transportation responsibilities directly from one municipality to a broader region—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House agree that the hon. member should continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I will terminate my remarks shortly. I suppose I can say far too much on this subject. I hope that the federal authority, in its discussions of the future pattern of the national capital, will keep in mind that certain functions in respect of pollution control, transportation and planning cannot be left to fall by the wayside. I hope that those who speak for the federal authority at a reasonable point in the discussion will take the initiative to bring about the establishment of some type of functional body which can deal with the problem of public transit. In my opinion, no greater contribution to the economic health of the region, short of perhaps assistance on sewage treatment facilities to eliminate pollution, could be made.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have proposed that a National Capital Region Transit Authority be created.

I know that my colleagues, namely the hon. members for Hull and Ottawa-Carleton (Messrs. Isabelle and Turner) who also intend to comment on the matter, will approve the proposal I have just made.

[English]

Mr. Desmond Code (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the opportunity of saying a few words about the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis). I agree in most part with what the hon. member has put to the House. He mentioned the problem of pollution. It is my understanding that the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec are not acting in the manner they should to correct the problem of pollution of the Ottawa River. I hope in the near future these two governments will reconsider their position and get together with the federal government to find a solution.

I am not clear about one point in relation to what the hon. member for Ottawa West said. He talked about a transit system for the city of Ottawa. Two or three weeks ago it was announced in the House that a new bridge would be built across the Ottawa River. I know the hon. member was a member of the Ottawa city council for a number of years and may be more aware of the situation than I am, but I am wondering whether this bridge is being taken into consideration in the plans for the type of transit system we would like to have in Ottawa.

Urban transit has become a serious problem in metropolitan areas of Canada. Everyone who has ever had the ulcer-inducing experience of rush hour traffic in Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, Montreal, Quebec or Vancouver is all too familiar with the problem. Statistics are available to outline the congestion. One-half of all Canadians presently live in metropolitan areas with populations of over 100,000, and by 1980 it is estimated that one-third of all Canadians will live in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver. Passenger motor vehicle registration has soared by over 70 per cent in the last ten years. In the past our main response to this growing congestion has been the construction and extension of massive freeway systems.

However, there are definite disadvantages to these systems. The costs are astronomical. Valuable land is consumed by costly expropriation and is thereby removed from municipal tax rolls. Parking space becomes a major problem, especially in the business core. Actual construction costs skyrocket. The elevated portion of the Gardiner Expressway in Toronto cost $16 million per mile. Most urban planners now agree that as an efficient means of carrying people within metropolitan areas, the automobile finishes dead last and that reliance on it should be reduced in favour of rapid public transit systems.

Chicago's Congress Street Expressway provides a good example of cost comparisons between freeway and rapid transit systems. This system consists of an eight-lane expressway and a two-track transit line. The tracks occupy one-fifth of the right-of-way and have a capacity of 30,000 seated passengers per hour, while the expressway occupies four-fifths of the right-of-way and accommodates a maximum capacity of 9,000 people per hour. The expressway cost $188.5 million, in comparison with $36 million for the transit line.

In Toronto there is the subway which was constructed not too many years ago. I think it serves very well the city of Toronto. There also are the go-go trains which were recently installed there. When the hon. member for Ottawa West spoke in introducing the bill, I wondered whether he had in mind these rapid transit systems or expressways for the city of Ottawa. As I have shown, there is quite a spread in the cost between the two. I certainly think that when the various governments get together on this matter they should look very carefully into the cost and consider which system would be most beneficial to the area.

Montreal has a fairly new subway. There are also suburban trains which bring passengers in from Rigaud, Vaudreuil, Ste. Anne and other places along the line. Thousands of passengers are carried on those trains. The hon. member for Ottawa West said it is a good idea to have a system such as I have in mind when I speak of expressways and rapid transit lines. I think this system has been of great benefit to the city of Montreal, where you can see thousands of people leaving the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific stations to go to their offices.

I hope that when the regional, provincial and federal governments get together to consider a transit system for Ottawa they will study the matter in great detail in order to come up with the best answer. I certainly agree with my hon. friend that there should be a better transit system in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I should like to support the proposal of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis). As we all know, he is a very experienced member in local, regional and federal matters. I believe what he has said about the problems which face this area underline a very ironic situation. Here in the capital area of Canada, which should be an example to the rest of the country, we have a growing and very serious water pollution problem, perhaps one of the worst in Canada, and we also have an amazing air pollution problem with which, as the hon. member pointed out, it is increasingly difficult to cope on the present basis. I think what is required is sort of a single-desk treatment of these various joint problems. To the extent the hon. member has indicated, there should be additional planning and the type of administration he described. We support his proposal.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words on the motion proposed by my hon. friend from Ottawa West (Mr. Francis).

The motion comes in the nick of time because it indicates a disastrous situation in the area, particularly regarding transportation within the national capital.

In fact, I cannot understand how it is that we are not any better off as regards transportation in the national capital than we were a hundred years ago.

Mr. Speaker, when talking about the national capital, one generally remembers the Greber plan which was tabled in the House in 1951 and was the beginning of a planned development to make of the national capital a model for the whole country.

Several recommendations of the Gréber plan have been implemented, but many others have not. For instance, as regards transportation in the Hull area, railroad tracks have been removed. Trains no longer cross the city, except perhaps the one known as "the northern train" which stops at the Hull station. Thus the city of Hull has a station where very few trains stop.

We can now do something in the field of transportation because there are two regional governments, one in Ontario and the other in Quebec. In my opinion, obstacles to agreement have been removed, since the 22 municipalities of Western Quebec are now represented by a regional government, just as are the five municipalities on the Ontario side. Nothing therefore prevents the establishment of a committee to study the problem of public transit in the area of the national capital. The federal government should create it or support it. The national capital should set an example, but, our transportation system is unfortunately a real disaster, because transportation today is a technical problem. When money has to be spent, it should be spent wisely. There has never been any long term planning on the problem of transportation in the national capital region, because the three levels of government never reached an agreement.

It is easy to build bridges but I think that bridges should only serve to unite two road systems; otherwise they become useless. If we build a bridge without paying much attention to the problem of approaches, we may create traffic-jam problems.

The best example of such a lack of logic in 1970 was that we had a highway plan for Hull, which was not accepted on account of disagreements between municipalities. In the end, we had to face a situation where two bridges were built parallel to one another, as is the case in Gatineau Point. So we have traffic jams on both sides.

Can we call that long-term planning? Not at all. If we want to indulge in long-term planning, we must build bridges of course, as the need arises, like around the Island of Hull. Moreover, the Britannia suburbs must be linked to the municipality of Deschênes so as to relieve the traffic congestion. Along the Aylmer Road, even a casual glance will show that we are 100 years behind the times in our area. However, we are part of the national capital area.

When I spoke about long-term planning, I said that no announcement should ever be made regarding the construction of bridges or roads without being sure that the project can be incorporated to a broad highway system.

My hon. friend from Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) mentioned another problem. Long-term planning is a good thing and I hope that we shall go into it. However, short-term planning is also required. When long-term planning works are carried out, the immediate needs for transportation services across the Ottawa river have to be considered at the same time.

By 1972, many Ottawa residents will go to work in the Hull area, but if some rapid means of transportation are not available, connected with the systems in operation on both sides of the river, we shall face in our national capital the greatest traffic tie up ever seen before in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have proposed a monorail. Of course, there are other means of transportation, but my suggestion is based on technological data. Within the framework of the Canadian Transport Commission, has been established an agency called the Research and Development Unit on Urban Transportation within the Transport Department.

This body is set up in view of developing national methods of approaching the problem of transport in the towns of Canada and eventually solving them.

Canada cannot maintain a sound economy if traffic tie-ups and ill-adjusted public transportation jeopardize the productivity of our towns. Considering that urban transportation absorbs about a fifth of the cost of the whole urban economy, the measures intended to improve their efficiency can not only benefit the national economy but also improve the standards of living of most Canadians.

The Canadian Transport Commission set up this body in 1968. I wonder what part the Transport Commission was able to play in this respect, now that urban transportation is based on technology. Indeed there are now new means of transport, made available to the public such as the hovercraft, or vacuum tubes where fast trains would be able to be run in air-tight tunnels; there are helicopters and also STOL planes.

A lot of studies have also been conducted on the monorail and the underground. The problem is therefore to use in the best possible way the existing means of transportation, even if this means considering the implementation of traffic rules and the development of a utilitarian urbanization, which in the present trend have already resulted in a comprehensive program.

Just think of those who apply modern technology. I am thinking of the French lineal "Urba-IV" motor, based on the suction principle a type of "hovercraft" in reverse that does extraordinary things. It is the motor of the future seeing it weighs next to nothing.

Since modern technology has been applied, wonderful results have been achieved. The London-Manchester Railway line was electrified, in England; this resulted for British Railways in a 54 per cent increase in the traffic, and 40 per cent in income in the first year of operations, of the new express trains, in 1966.

The great speed of the "Capital", the famous train between Paris and Tolouse, was the direct cause of a 42 per cent increase in the traffic on that line. In Japan, the inauguration of the train "Tokaïdo" fooled all the experts by reducing the air traffic between Tokyo and Nagoya to such an extent that the service had to be interrupted.

Just recently, I was reading in Aviation Week and Space Technology that American Airlines was considering the possibility of abandoning its New York-Washington line because, as a result of the competition of express trains such as the "Metroline", it is no longer profitable.

The situation is much the same wherever modern technology has been applied. What is the research division of the Transport Commission looking for? I do not know. Perhaps some day it will bring forth something that has been gestating quietly in the dark. However, it is responsible for not applying modern technology to a rapid transit system between Ottawa and Hull. This is the national capital, yet no one has thought of that. I feel so strongly about this, that I think the chairman of the Transport Commission should resign.

When the first national transport conference was held at the Royal York in Toronto, someone said this, and I quote:

[English]

The government of Canada is convinced that urban transportation is essentially a responsibility of provincial governments.

[Translation]

This may be true in theory, but not in practice, because it is up to the central government to update transport technology today, since it has set up a research division within the Canadian Transport Commission.

On the other hand, and this is where I see the prostitution—

[English]

Canadian Transport Commission president J. W. Pickersgill presented the semi-official Ottawa attitude in the usual terms: stressing that urban transportation was essentially a provincial matter and the federal government, constitutionally, could not interfere. He carefully avoided any commitment to provide federal funds for developing subways and other means of mass transit.

And just to be on the safe side—though he denied this later—Pickersgill cut from his prepared speech the one paragraph the 1,000 delegates wanted to hear.

What he did not say was this: "Since adequate, efficient and economical urban transportation is just as necessary to the national well-being as adequate, efficient and economical extra-urban and international transport, it is the proper concern of the government of Canada".

[Translation]

Since the Canadian Transport Commission has voted funds for the research section, what are we waiting for to do something? Concurrently with the Greber report, transportation studies have been made and should have been published in 1966. Nothing has been done, even if several thousand dollars were spent.

Recently, the Quebec government has decided to undertake a transportation study in Hull. When are we going to write our exams, Mr. Speaker? When will we finally understand that we are not living for structures, but to help our fellow-men?

When bridges are built, the use of cars is encouraged, the air becomes more polluted and people get on each other's nerves even more. Psychiatric problems are created. People are frustrated at having to wait several hours on bridges when traffic is heavy.

I proposed building a monorail. This is a modern and futuristic solution to the problem, and I am not alone to suggest it. Mr. Fullerton, the present chairman of the National Capital Commission, formerly financial analyst for the newspaper La Presse, in an article dated February 17, 1969, and entitled: "Cities should promote public transit", said the following:

Evidently, it is costly to build new rail systems. However, a monorail system for suspension-trains would permit significant savings on the cost of ground space. The hon. member for Hull, Mr. Gaston Isabelle, incidentally, has just recommended that type of transportation to provide a more convenient link between Ottawa and Hull. It really seems that the monorail is in a fair way to asserting itself as the ultimate solution to the problems of transportation between cities and suburbs.

That man now holds the office of Chairman of the National Capital Commission: we will see what he can do in this area.

In Canada, it is claimed that it is not for the government to consider those things and to allocate funds to further technology so that the transportation means at our disposal are as adequate as those existing in Europe. In this respect, the November 1966 issue of International Science and Technology published an article entitled New Transportation Technology. It says the following, and I quote:

• (4:40 p.m.)

[English]

No really new technology is ready to go yet. But a lot of technology will get further development now that the federal funds are becoming available.

[Translation]

That was the situation in the United States in 1966. I suggest we should follow the example of that country with regard to transportation. Intensive research is carried out there. For this, the Americans deserve congratulations.

Today, there must be agreement. Yes, as there are two regional governments, we should, with the help of the National Capital Commission, carry out a study on the creation of a public transportation system, in order to put a stop to the present situation where the people are penalized because governements have not carried out their responsibilities.

I alluded a moment ago to the establishment of two regional administrations. Does the public know when this project was first considered? It was in 1946 and recommendations to that effect were submitted in 1947. The Ottawa Planning Board also promoted this idea in Toronto. This concept was accepted two years ago, Mr. Speaker.

In the province of Quebec, they have just approved the creation of a regional government. It took almost 25 years to finalize such a plan. If we have to wait for the Canadian Transport Commission to find Easter eggs at this time, in order to make modern technology bring forth something, the eggs will have hatched and we will be right where we are today.

Before concluding my remarks, I wish to point out that in France, at the present time, they are putting the finishing touch on the famous Bertin aero train that is to run at a speed of 350 kilometres per hour and will be used between Paris and Orléans. If the Canadian Transport Commission goes on beating about the bush, I shall recommend to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) to make an airbus available to me so that I might go over there and see with my own eyes what is going on. I do not know if they are aware of it, but I was told they were looking into the same problems as we are. For years now the linear engine URBA-IV has been under consideration in Paris and Lyon. Here studies are starting all over again.

The Canadian Transport Commission, instead of suggesting the construction of a subway, ignores the matter completely, as evidenced at the first national conference on transportation, held at the Royal York Hotel just as if we were still in 1929. I think that our organizations lack responsible leaders. It is said that often parliament moves slowly due to its age-long tradition, perhaps, and its obsolete customs. I agree on that, but it is essential that the responsible authorities be dynamic and take into account modern technology in connection—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Does the House agree to allow the honorable member to carry on with his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I express the wish that men of good will get together and get to work in the best interests of the people of the national capital area. In fact, the Gréber report provided for a comprehensive plan integrating all the important services. As the transportation question is one which has nothing to do either with language, religion, traditions, nobody could claim that the identity of Quebec or Ontario must be preserved. When you drive a car, it has not always been made in your hometown. In fact, transportation is an international activity that should be discussed seriously, in order to find solutions which only modern technology can provide. The Canadian Transport Commission shows no concern for modern technology. On the other hand, they took the wrong track with this famous turbo-train which will never work despite the huge amount of money being spent on it.

[English]

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) who speaks, as everybody knows, with special authority on this matter. This derives from his long experience in municipal affairs in Ottawa, and also from his special knowledge as a former member of the Ottawa Transport Commission.

I also wish to speak in support of this motion, as have my friends, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Code), the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) and the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle). In addressing myself to this problem, hon. members will understand it is not just a local problem, it is a national problem, and that we are confronted in this country finally and fortunately with an important change in public attitude.

For many, many years public transit has been regarded as a second best. But now people are beginning to see that public transit is a necessity; and more than that, it is a more desirable alternative than the proliferation of travel by motor car. What people are finally seeing is what the hon. member for Ottawa West referred to as the hidden cost of motor car travel. This has always been hidden, and it has to be balanced against the exposed cost of public transit, which is out in the open. Public transit has suffered; the people have suffered. But I hope we have at last come to the time when the people generally share the views expressed here, that rational choices have to be made in order to re-organize the total transportation system, not only of this area but of every metropolitan area in Canada.

The costs, which are now apparent, of the proliferation of motor car travel include clogged highways, congestion, the turning of our downtown areas virtually into parking lots, pollution, accidents and the ever-increas- in expense necessary to meet the requirements of private motor car travel. One authority who participated in the conference to which the hon. member for Hull referred, the first Canadian Urban Transportation Conference, Dr. Joseph Kates, referred to this problem as follows:

We have private car oriented developments and we are becoming increasingly dependent on the private car. This marvellous flexible machine, the dream of everyone who hasn't one, the luxury conveyance with its image of freedom, flexibility and status is also becoming the Frankenstein monster who frequently dominates our life and our cities and forces us to pay a very, very high price for its convenience. What is this price we pay?

I do not wish to expand on that price, but people are becoming aware of what it is. The controversy over the Spadina development in Toronto, which is matched in Ottawa by the controversy over a proposal to run a freeway through the centre of the city, indicates to all sections of our population the price we pay in trying to accommodate the ever-increasing number of private cars. We see this in many ways.

I quote further the words of Dr. Kates, who speaks about the situation in metropolitan Toronto and whose remarks on the total cost of all private car travel might be of interest to the House:

The utilization of our huge investment in private cars is unbelievably low. The car fleet in metropolitan Toronto alone represents an investment of several billions of dollars, the garages, carports and parking lots required to store these cars represent a further investment of several billions of dollars, the roads, bridges and tunnels required for these cars represent a further several billions of dollars and the costs of operating, maintaining and repairing this huge fleet amount to perhaps another $500 million annually.

Yet this huge investment is used on the average perhaps one to two hours a day, or less than 10 per cent, representing an enormous wasteful use of expensive resources which could be used in so many other ways to make us stronger and richer. When this low utilization of the car is multiplied by the low utilization of its seats we find that the huge investment has a utilization of less than 2 per cent.

While as individuals we are frequently willing to buy expensive cars, often a little beyond our means, as a society we find ourselves financially in serious trouble in meeting the requirements of these cars in terms of roads, bridges and tunnels, and parking facilities.

Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that we can legislate the private car out of existence. This is clearly impossible in a free society. As the hon. member for Ottawa West pointed out, the obvious solution is to provide a transit system wherein people will have an opportunity to express a reasonable preference between public transit and the use of their private automobiles. There is experience to show that where these reasonable alternatives are provided, people will prefer public transit. For example, it is estimated that 85 per cent of the commuter traffic within range of the new GO transit system outside Toronto use that transit system.

Despite the difficulties of our local transit commission in Ottawa it has been shown that by improving the services and providing better facilities, greater utilization occurs. In another paper presented to this conference, Dr. Kates had this to say:

In Canada, transit organizations have also made important progress. The Ottawa Transit Commission, for example, has introduced new bus shelters, extended routes, provided more frequent service and introduced better vehicles. The result is a significant increase in the number of passengers.

The hon. member for Ottawa West referred to the fact that this significant increase occurred over a period of four or five years. Mr. Speaker, the problem we face in this area is clearly one of attacking transit on an area-wide basis; it cannot be attacked on the basis of solving it within local municipal boundaries. It is not an easy problem to solve; it requires study, co-operation and experimentation. Nor can it be solved by trying to impose arbitrary penalties on one section of the population as opposed to another. It will not be solved for example, by imposing penalties on public servants in respect of their parking privileges when there are no public transit facilities from the suburbs to bring people to work. The basic problem in my constituency on the outskirts of Ottawa, which includes Nepean township, is that there are no public transit facilities. The Ottawa Transit Commission comes to the fringe of the area at Bayshore and Parkwood Hills but the rest of this important suburban development, which has upwards of 40,000 people, is not served by any public transit at all.

Mr. Winch: Are you going to talk this motion out?

Mr. Blair: I always appreciate the views of my hon. friend. The problems faced by people in this area are substantial. Again I quote the words of Dr. Kates, who said:

The car oriented city provides less and less ability for those not able to afford a car or not able to drive, the poor, the young, the aged and the infirm. While the private car enables car owning families to move far from public transportation, providing mobility to the head of the family and possibly his wife it isolates even in such families, the children, the old, the infirm in the same household and forces car driving adults for many precious hours into becoming chauffeurs for the rest of the family, relatives and friends.

In my experience, there is no single problem as great for the people in the suburbs of Ottawa as the fact that they are isolated from public transit.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winch: Don't you talk it out; let him talk it out, he is the Ottawa member.

Mr. Blair: There are very hopeful signs, Mr. Speaker, that action will be taken. The new regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton has an important committee headed by the mayor of Ottawa, the purpose of which is to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS—CONCURRENCE IN FIFTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau) moved that the fifteenth report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, presented to the House on Wednesday, March 4, 1970, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CONSTITUTION OF CANADA—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Warren Allmand (for Mr. MacGuigan) moved that the first report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, presented to the House on Thursday, March 5, 1970, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TORONTO—CLOSING OF DUNLOP PLANT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for unanimous consent to present a motion.

Last Friday Dunlop of Canada announced the closing of its industrial products division in Toronto, to be phased out in a few weeks. As a result 597 Canadians, many past 40 and with long seniority, are being thrown out of work at a time of very high unemployment. The government, through two of its ministers, had been informed of the company's intention. The closing of this plant is another example of decisions by corporations without regard for the effect on the lives of Canadians and on the community and without adequate notice to the employees concerned. It is urgent that the facts of this case and the entire problem be studied in depth by a committee.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That the closing of the Toronto industrial products plant of Dunlop Canada Limited be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that his proposed motion, under the terms of Standing Order 43, can be put to the House only if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the hon. member that there is no unanimity. Therefore the motion cannot be put at this time.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

CANADIANA MOBILE UNITS

Question No. 702—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What was the cost of the mobile units used to take Canadiana to the people of Canada during Centennial Year?

2. Were any of these units retained for displaying Canada abroad and, if not, for what reason?

3. How much was realized by the sale of the units through Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

4. What is the cost of the mobile units being used to take Canadiana to the Francophonie countries of Africa?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. $5,001,712.

2. No department expressed the wish to retain any of the units for displaying Canada abroad.

3. $803,504.

4. Four tractors, $25,160; four trailers, $19,570.

"POSITIVE ACTION" PLAN, EASTERN SHORE, GUYSBOROUGH COUNTY

Question No. 721—Mr. MacEwan:

Has the Prime Minister received a communication from the Goldboro-Bayview District Board of Trade, Isaac's Harbour, Nova Scotia, containing a blueprint of a "Positive Action" plan for the Eastern Shore of Guysborough County and, if so, what action does the government intend to take on this matter?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Yes, but federal assistance would be to the government of Nova Scotia, with whom the request will be reviewed.

REVISION OF DESIGNATED AREAS

Question No. 812—Mr. McBride:

1. What is the earliest possible date that a revision of the designated areas under the Regional Incentives Act will take place?

2. Are surveys of any kind now underway either by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or by any other agency with the knowledge and compliance of that Department to provide information for possible revisions of the designated areas in Canada?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. Present Orders in Council are effective to 30 June 1972; other Orders can be made.

2. Various organizations are preparing briefs.

GRANBY, QUEBEC—CANADA MANPOWER CENTRE COSTS

Question No. 914—Mr. Rondeau:

What have the annual (a) administrative (b) rental (c) maintenance (d) renovation (e) miscellaneous costs, for the Canadian Manpower Centre in Granby amounted to, since its opening?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): So far as the Department of Public Works is concerned:

CNR—SPARE GANGS IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Question No. 916—Mr. Rondeau:

1. What hourly wage is paid to members of CNR spare gangs in (a) Quebec (b) Ontario?

2. How many hours do these men have to work before they receive time-and-a-half?

3. How many workers are there on CNR spare gangs in (a) Quebec (b) Ontario?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Pursuant to the collective agreement with the Labour organization concerned the current rate of pay for extra gang employees, after a probationary period of 78 days of service, is $2.012 per hour, after a further 156 days of service, the rate is $2.108 per hour. There is no fixed rate of pay during the probationary period, however employees generally average $1.75 per hour.

[Mr. Forest.]

2. The agreement provides for these employees to work up to nine hours per day six days a week at straight time rates of pay. During the probationary period all overtime is worked at straight time, thereafter, overtime at time and a half is only paid after nine hours in any one day and for service on Sundays.

3. (a) On the average about 400 per month. (b) On the average about 115 per month.

ISSUANCE OF PERMITS FOR NON-MILITARY AMMUNITION TO BOTSWANA AND SWAZILAND

Question No. 934—Mr. MacLean:

1. Were permits issued in 1969 for the sale of non-military ammunition to Botswana and Swaziland and, if so, was Canadian ammunition exported to these countries?

2. What was the value of the export, amount, description and calibre of the ammunition in question?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Yes.

2. Permits were issued in 1969 for non-military ammunition to Botswana and Swaziland to a total value of $42,780. Statistics of actual exports in 1969 are not complete and, in any event, would not coincide in value with permits issued in the calendar year owing to the six months period of validity of the permits. Exports were predominantly .22 rim-fire cartridges but included a wide variety of centre-fire hunting calibres and shot-shells.

EDUCATION—READING DEFICIENCIES AND ILLITERACY

Question No. 974—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. Does the government or any department, branch, bureau or agency thereof, have statistics on reading deficiencies and illiteracy among Canadians?

2. What is the percentage of students who have reading deficiencies, by category, based on the method of sampling used to obtain such information?

3. How many illiterates are there in Canada's adult population?

4. How many persons between the ages of 16 and 21, listed as unemployed, are functionally illiterate?

5. What is the percentage of juvenile offenders who are functionally illiterate?

6. (a) Are statistics available on the reading ability of those in the armed forces (b) do these statistics indicate the number or percentage whose reading ability falls below a set or acceptable standard?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of National Defence as follows: 1. Yes, the Education Division, the Judicial Division and the Census Division of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics collect some information on reading deficiencies and illiteracy among Canadians.

2. As of January 1966, 12,108 children were being provided special remedial reading programmes in special education facilities, including both those operated by school boards and those run by other organizations, in which specially-trained teachers were employed. This is not to be taken as an indication of the percentage of children who can be classified as retarded readers. A common finding of researchers is that 3.4 per cent of the population can be classified as retarded.

3. In Canada's adult population (20 years and over), according to the 1961 Census, there were 169,904 illiterates with no schooling (1.63 per cent of the population), and 828,597 who were functionally illiterate, with one to four years of schooling (7.93 per cent of the population).

4. According to the 1961 Census 13.4 per cent of the unemployed, aged 15 to 19, and 10.4 per cent of those aged 20 to 24, were functionally illiterate, with less than five years of elementary education.

5. In 1967, 8.32 per cent of juvenile offenders were functionally illiterate (1,499 of 18,000 juvenile delinquents who had been to court). Of those who entered Training Schools in 1967, 12.83 per cent were functionally illiterate (312 of 2,431). These are not necessarily the same people who appeared in court.

6. The minimum acceptable education standards for a male applicant for enrolment in the Canadian Forces is Ontario Grade 8 or equivalent, and for a woman Ontario Grade 10 or equivalent. In addition to the basic education standard, all applicants must successfully complete a comprehensive testing program which includes reading ability. Thus, there are no members of the Canadian Forces whose reading ability falls below an acceptable standard.

CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT AREA

Question No. 982—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What steps are currently being taken to increase the area of the Charlottetown Airport?

2. If land has been acquired, where is it situated?

3. Have any arrangements been entered into with municipal or provincial authorities in reference to the granting of building permits in the area required for future expansion of this Airport?

4. What is the target date for completion of plans for the Charlottetown Airport?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. There is no action currently underway to increase the area of the Charlottetown Airport.

2. No new lands have been acquired.

3. No.

4. The target date is contingent on the conclusions and influences of two studies namely, (a) Future demands for Aviation Services in the Atlantic Provinces and (b) An over-all plan to serve the Aviation activity on a National basis and thus cannot be estimated at this time.

CANADIAN ARCTIC WEATHER STATIONS

Question No. 1,018—Mr. Thomson:

1. How many weather stations does Canada have in the Arctic and where are they located?

2. (a) Which ones are operated and financed entirely by Canada and which ones are not (b) do other nations participate with Canada in their operation and financing and, if so (i) which ones (ii) to what extent?

3. Has the Government of Canada made any evaluation of the effect that joint operation and financing of weather stations has on our claims to sovereignty over certain Arctic lands or islands and, if so, what have been the conclusions?

Questions

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Transport and the Department of External Affairs as follows: 1. Fifty-eight north of the 60th parallel at the locations given in the attached listing.

2. (a) All the arctic weather stations with the exception of Alert, Eureka, Isachsen, Mould Bay and Resolute are operated and financed entirely by Canada. (b) The United States participates in the operation and financing of the weather stations at Alert, Eureka, Isachsen, Mould Bay and Resolute to the extent of approximately 45 percent of the cost.

3. Canada's sovereignty over its Arctic lands and islands is unassailable and undisputed. Any joint operations in these or other Canadian territories, with the U.S.A. or any other country, could only be carried out with the consent of Canada as the sovereign power and could not affect Canada's sovereignty over such territories.

Arctic Weather Stations

Alert, N.W.T.; Arctic Bay, N.W.T.; Baker Lake, N.W.T.; Beaver Creek, Y.T.; Brevoort Island, N.W.T.; Broughton Island, N.W.T;. POST OFFICE—AIRLINE COSTS FOR CARRYING MAIL

Question No. 1,021—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What amounts have been paid to each airline in Canada for carrying mail each year since 1963?

2. Are airlines invited to tender on mail contracts and, if not, how are the contracts awarded?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications):

2. No. Contracts with Air Canada are not awarded on the basis of public tender but by virtue of an agreement signed by the Postmaster General and the President of Air Canada. The last contract with Air Canada (then Trans Canada Airlines) was entered into on 21st May 1946. Subsequent to this date there have been a number of revisions to update the basis of payment in accordance with changing circumstances such as an increase in the volume of mail etc.

Arrangements with other carriers is made by an exchange of letters between the Department and the airline indicating, on the part of both, a mutually acceptable agreement for the transportation of mail under qualified terms and conditions for a period not to exceed five years. This is the maximum term of agreement permissible under the Post Office Act.

Prior to establishing an airmail service offers are invited from all air carriers in the area who are qualified through holding the required operating licence, as issued by the Air Transport Committee.

COMPLETION OF NEW RUNWAY, VANCOUVER AIRPORT

Question No. 1,024—Mr. Goode:

When will the new runway at the Vancouver International Airport be completed?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Subject to availability of funds and growth of air traffic as now forecast, runway construction is programmed for completion in the fiscal year of 1974-75.

TORONTO AIRPORT PLANNING

Question No. 1,046—Mr. Robinson:

Will the federal government consider the feasibility of setting up a joint committee of municipal provincial and federal representatives to discuss matters relevant to Metropolitan Toronto Airport expansion problems?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Consideration has been given to this proposal. The statement in the House on February 4 by the Minister of Transport explained the impracticability of this approach in the early stages of the study dealing with this problem.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—PRESS RELEASE "NEW BEEF CATTLE PASTURAGE DEVELOPED ON INDIAN RESERVES"

Question No. 1,051—Mr. Gleave:

1. Did the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development make a Press Release "New Beef Cattle Pasturage Developed on Indian Reserves" dated January 29, 1970, and, if so, what specific provisions are made for the Indians on the reserve to build up their cattle herds?

[Mr. Walker.]

2. Is there a specific time-table during the ten-year period to permit the Indian bands to develop cattle herds progressively and take over the grazing lands which are now being developed?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development issued the Press Release dated January 29, 1970.

In addition to having priority for summer grazing in the developed pasture, Indian farmers are assisted in establishing or expanding a herd under the Rotating Herd Program or by loans from the Indian Loan Fund. Under the Rotating Herd Program herds of cows are placed with Indian farmers for a 3 year period. The farmer keeps the female stock to establish a basic herd of his own and sells the male stock to recover operating costs. The herd is placed with another farmer after the 3 year period. Loans, from the Indian Loan Fund, may be made for the purchase of cattle.

2. There is no specific time-table during the 10 year period for the Indian Bands to develop herds and take over the grazing land.

BACCARO LORAN STATION

Question No. 1,055—Mr. Comeau:

Is it the intention of the government to phase out the Baccaro radar station and, if so, on what date and for what reason?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): At the present time there is no plan to phase out the Baccaro LORAN station.

DESTRUCTION OF SALMON EGGS, TWIN DIVERS, B.C.

Question No. 1,059—Mr. Crouse:

Were salmon eggs destroyed in the spawning area of Twin Divers, British Columbia in October, 1969 and, if so (a) how many were destroyed (b) was a large pulp and paper company fined for such destruction (c) how much was the fine (d) is the government giving consideration to introducing legislation to increase the fines for offending industries?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): It is assumed that the Twin Divers referred to is Twin Rivers which is the name of a logging company in northern British Columbia and which operates log drives on the Nass River. On this basis the reply is as follows: (a) No eggs were destroyed since logs are not permitted to be driven over known salmon spawning areas; (b) No; (c) Not applicable; (d) Yes.

COUNSELLING STAFF, PENITENTIARY SERVICE

Question No. 1,087—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many staff in the penitentiary service are employed exclusively on counselling—dealing with inmates' families, planning pre-release and release?
2. How is staff selected?
3. What is the basis of selection?
4. How is staff trained?
5. What is the curriculum?
6. What materials are used?
7. Who staffs the training colleges?
8. What are their qualifications?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): 1. The staff organization of the Penitentiary Service provides counselling service as a function of designated staff positions and not as the exclusive function of any one class of position. Counselling constitutes a major function of each of the following: Classification and Guidance Officers, 120; Psychologists, full-time, 13; under contract, 10; Chaplains, 31; Total: 174.

2. Since September 11, 1969 staff has been selected in accordance with the terms and conditions of the Public Service Employment Act.

3. As for 2.

4. Training of staff depends on background and varies according to the experience and level of qualification in each case; and many consist of: (a) Courses and seminars on interviewing and counselling held at one of the Correctional Staff Colleges, (b) Program orientation and "in-service" training within the Institution under the direction of qualified officers, (c) Leave of absence to pursue university training in a selected field.

5. The curriculum is flexible, depending on the degree of competence and experience. It includes techniques for establishing a relationship of confidence with the inmate during interviewing and counselling sessions; the psychological mechanisms affecting human behaviour and motivation; the development of personality and intelligence; role playing in group counselling situations, inmate characteristics; the psychology of criminal behaviour.

6. Materials used are lecture precis prepared by professional staff; films from the National Film Board that were made in cooperation with the Penitentiary Service; some films of the "Criminal Man" series made by a leading psychiatrist in criminal behaviour in California; and textbooks on Criminology and Penology (Korn and McCorkle), Delinquency and Opportunity (Cloward & Ohlin), the Sociology of Deviant Behaviour (Clinard), Counselling and Psychotherapy (Rogers), the Dynamics of Interviewing (Kahn & Connell).

7. Correctional Staff Colleges are staffed by a Superintendent, a Chief Instructor, a number of Staff Instructors and support and administrative staff.

8. Staff Instructors must possess a minimum educational level of Junior Matriculation or acceptable equivalent. There are four levels of staff instructors and each must successfully complete the appropriate courses designed to provide him with a thorough knowledge of the inmate training program, modern concepts of management and the ability to impart this knowledge to staff members attending junior and senior level courses.

GARNISHEEING OF PENSION CHEQUES BY GOVERNMENT AND INDUSTRY

Question No. 1,094—Mr. Stewart (Marquette):

1. Does the government allow garnishees against Old Age Security Pension cheques by any department of the government and, if so, what is the total number of garnishees placed on such cheques by all departments for the years 1968 and 1969?

2. Are there any appeal procedures available to persons whose Old Age Security Pension cheques have been garnisheed by the government?

3. Does the government allow garnishees to be placed against Old Age Security Pension cheques by private industry?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) Section 20 (a) of the Old Age Security Act provides for the recovery of debts to the Crown in respect of benefit payments made under the Act, and to which the person was not entitled, from any future benefits payable under the Old Age Security Act. (b) Under the terms of Sections 95 (i) and 95 (iii) of the Financial Administration Act, Treasury Board may authorize the Minister of Finance to recover debts due the Crown in right of Canada, and debts in the right of a province in respect of which Canada has contributed under the provisions of any Act, from any money payable by Canada, such as an Old Age Security pension.

The Old Age Security records are maintained in such a way that it is not possible to give the number of cases where pension payments are being withheld in whole or in part in reimbursement of debts referred to in (a) and (b) above.

COMPUTER FACILITIES GRANTS—IMPLEMENTATION OF ERWICK REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Question No. 1,127—Mr. Skoberg:

Has NRC implemented any of the recommendations presented in the report of Erwick, Curry and Partners Limited, of August 30, 1968, as they pertain to the Computer Facilities Grants Program with the universities and, if so, what changes have been made or are expected to be made in line with such recommendations?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Insofar as the National Research Council of Canada and Canadian Patents and Development Limited are concerned, the answer is as follows: 1. No. The changes which are planned for the Cumputer Facilities Grants are in line with the recommendation (No. 22):

The present form of NRC grants to university computing centres be discontinued, and that Computing for research be supported from the normal operating grants of all federal research councils.

made in the report of the Macdonald Committee for the Science Council of Canada (The Role of the Federal Government in Support of Research in Canadian Universities, Special Study No. 7, 1969).

UNIVERSITY RESEARCH SPONSORING BY U.S. CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

Question No. 1,162—Mr. Rose:

Is the government in a position to state whether the Central Intelligence Agency of the U.S.A. is currently sponsoring research in Canadian Universities and, if so (a) what was the general nature of the research for the years 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969 (b) what Canadian universities received CIA grants, and what was the total grant for each of the years listed in Part (a) (c) will the appropriate government department provide a list of the specific research projects and the university where each project was undertaken for each of the years listed above?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes. The Government is in a position to state that the Central Intelligence Agency of the U.S.A. is not currently sponsoring research in Canadian universities and did not do so in 1966, 1967, 1968 or 1969.

2. (a)(b)(c) answered by 1.

CENTRAL NOVA POST OFFICE CLOSURES

Question No. 1,173—Mr. MacEwan:

1. How many post offices have been closed in Central Nova since June 25, 1968?

2. How many additional offices does the Post Office Department intend to close?

Questions

3. Where were the post offices located that have already been closed and what are the localities in which future closures will take place?

4. What is the estimate of the number of letters of complaints and protestations received from groups and individuals protesting the closing of the various post offices?

5. What is the estimated savings resulting from the closing of these post offices?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. 17.

2. 15.

3, 4 and 5 see following:

3 (a) Post Office	5. Savings
East River Sheet Harbour	1,000.
Lansdowne Station	1,085.

4. Departmental records are not maintained on the number of letters of complaint.

* Savings cannot be accurely attributed to one office as a combination of changes, involving the closing of more than one post office and the rearrangement of various mail transportation services, have occurred. As a result of the various changes involved, an approximate saving of $3,000. was realized.

LENGTHENING OF RUNWAYS, ANCIENNE-LORETTE AIRPORT

Question No. 1,181—Mr. Godin:

Has the government made a study in connection with the lengthening of the runways at Ancienne-Lorette airport and, if so, what plans have been made and when is this work expected to be carried out?

[Mr. MacEwan.]

Hon. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): This matter has been studied, and there are no plans for the lengthening of the runways at the Ancienne-Lorette Airport during the next five years.

LAC LA BICHE NEWSTART PROJECT—MACHINERY AND EQUIPMENT PURCHASES

Question No. 1,186—Mr. Benjamin:

1. Has the government authorized the Alberta Newstart project at Lac La Biche to purchase 4 cats, 5 trucks and 1 back hoe from a Mr. W. Hamilton, Contractor, in Lac La Biche and, if so (a) what price was paid for this equipment (b) was it purchased on the tender system?

2. Is Mr. Hamilton on the Board of Directors of Newstart and, if so (a) is he being paid a salary (b) what is this salary?

3. Has any kitchen equipment been purchased for this Newstart school project and, if so (a) from whom (b) at what price (c) was it purchased on the tender system?

4. Have any pool tables been purchased recently for this Newstart project at Lac La Biche and, if so (a) from whom (b) what was the price paid (c) was this equipment purchased on the tender system?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1, 3 and 4. Newstart corporations are non-profit companies set up under the legislation of the province in which they operate. Annual plans and budgets are approved by the federal government and the provincial government concerned. Specific expenditures are then the responsibility of the corporation. These enquiries therefore should be addressed to the Executive Director, Alberta Newstart Inc., Lac La Biche, Alberta.

2. Yes. (a) and (b). These enquiries should be made as above.

TECHNICAL AND VOCATIONAL TRAINING ASSISTANCE GRANTS

Question No. 1,200—Mr. Orlikow:

Under the formula for the equitable distribution among the provinces of federal contributions under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act for financial assistance to the capital cost of training facilities, how much has already been paid, or agreed to be paid, to each province, expressed both in dollars and as a percentage of the total amount each province is entitled to receive under the formula and how much remains to be paid or agreed to be paid to each province under the formula from March 31, 1967 to March 31, 1969?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Federal contributions to the provinces for the capital cost of training facilities provided under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act and the Adult Occupational Training Act are shown in millions of dollars in the table attached.

Federal Contribution to Capital Cost of Training Facilities
(In Millions of Dollars)

Province	Entitlement $ (a)	Paid Apr. 1, 1961 to Mar. 31, 1967 $	Percent of Entitlement (b)	Paid Apr. 1, 1967 to Mar. 31, 1969 $	Percent of Entitlement (c)	Balance of Entitlement as of Mar. 31, 1969

(a) Entitlement—amount federal government agreed to pay=$800 times the population of the province in the 15 to 19 years age group (inclusive according to the 1961 DBS census.

(b) Amount paid to March 31, 1967 as percentage of entitlement.

(c) Amount paid to March 31, 1969 as percentage of entitlement.

SEARCH AND RESCUE—DISTRESS AIR INCIDENTS

Question No. 1,208—Mr. Korchinski:

1. In each of the past two years, how many planes have made forced landings?

2. Of this number, how many have been lost where searches have been conducted?

3. What is the total estimated cost of the searches that were involved?

4. In what provinces or territories were these searches conducted.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. Forced landings are defined as aircraft landings which for any reason occur away from planned or stated destination of the flight. They frequently occur without loss or damage to the aircraft or significant action by control authorities. No reports are made on these unless an accident occurs. The Department of National Defence records all incidents involving the use of Search and Rescue facilities but no statistics are available differentiating the specific causes of the incidents. In 1968 and 1969 respectively, there were 138 and 133 Distress Air Incidents requiring Search and Rescue action.

3. As Order-in-Council P.C. 1962-13/653, dated 2 May, 1962, stipulates no fee will be charged for humanitarian assistance, specifically search and rescue, no record of costs of individual searches is maintained. However, an estimate, based on the percentage of total hours flown in 1968 and 1969, is approximately $4.8 million and $6.1 million respectively.

4. There were Distress Air Incidents, involving Search and Rescue action, in each of the provinces and territories.

UNION DUES INCOME TAX EXEMPTIONS

Question No. 1,238—Mr. Mather:

What was the total of union dues income tax exemptions in the years 1968 and 1969?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): 1968, $137,978,000; 1969, not available.

The figure for 1968 is an aggregate of union, professional and like dues and no separate figure is available for union dues.

Questions

*FINANCE—CRITICISM OF WHITE PAPER

Question No. 1,270—Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many letters, telegrams and/or other communications criticizing or condemning the White Paper in whole or in part have been received by the Prime Minister since the 1st of January, 1970?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to starred question No. 1270 is that a total of 666 letters, telegrams and other communications were received by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) between January 1 and February 28, 1970, criticizing the white paper on the tax reform in whole or in part.

*Westburne Petroleum and Minerals Ltd. is the new name of the amalgamated companies, Anticline Petroleums Ltd. and Excell Petroleums Ltd. (each holders of equity in Panarctic) which are affiliated subsidiaries of Commonwealth Petroleum Services Ltd., 202 Dome Building, 706—7th Avenue S.W., Calgary. Thus, the original list of 20 participants in Panarctic, exclusive of the Government, has been reduced to 19.

EFFECT OF VALUE—ADDED TAX

Question No. 1,298—Mr. Robinson:

How would the imposition of a "value—added tax" affect (a) all present economy (b) inflation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): (a) This question is too vague to be answered. (b) If it was additional to existing taxes it would increase prices. If it were substituted for other taxes the effects would depend on what was dropped.

[Mr. Côté (Longueuil).]

COST OF RALEIGH WEST WHARF REPAIRS

Question No. 1,303—Mr. Peddle:

What was the cost of repairs to the wharf at Raleigh West (Pistolet Bay) carried out by Pinsent Construction Co. in late 1969?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): $1,286.

TEACHERS EMPLOYED BY INDIAN AFFAIRS BRANCH

Question No. 1,319—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many teachers were employed by the Indian Affairs Branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the year 1968-69?

2. Of this number, how many of the teachers were in the classification of (a) teacher aide or unqualified teacher who had no professional teacher training (b) the sub-level who had only junior matriculation education and one year of teacher education (c) level 1 who had senior matriculation and one year of teacher education (d) level 2 who had senior matriculation and two years of teacher education (e) level 3 who had senior matriculation and three years of teacher education (f) level 4 who had senior matriculation and four years of teacher education (g) level 5 who had senior matriculation and five years of teacher education (h) level 6 who had senior matriculation and six years of teacher education?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. In 1968-69, 1,480 teachers were employed by the former Indian Affairs Branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

2. (a) Teacher aide or unqualified teacher level, 112; (b) junior matriculation and one year of teacher education, 121; (c) senior matriculation and one year of teacher education, 530; (d) senior matriculation and two years of teacher education, 281; (e) senior matriculation and three years of teacher education, 148; (f) senior matriculation and four years of teacher education, 185; (g) senior matriculation and five years of teacher education, 66; (h) senior matriculation and six years of teacher education, 37.

PERSONS ENTERING CANADA AT CHIEF MOUNTAIN, ALBERTA

Question No. 1,320—Mr. Sulatycky:

How many persons entered Canada at the Chief Mountain, Alberta, Port of Entry between September 15 and October 1, in each year 1964, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): 1964, 498; 1965, 479; 1966, 981; 1967, 1,896; 1968, 773.

PASSPORT OFFICES

Question No. 1,364—Mr. Rodrigue:

Is the Department of External Affairs planning the opening of passport issuing offices during 1970?

[Translation]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes. The offices were opened on the following dates: Montreal, February 23; Toronto, March 2; Vancouver, March 9.

FEASIBILITY STUDY OF MARINE OIL TERMINAL ON ARCTIC COAST

Question No. 1,378—Mr. Skoberg:

1. Did the Department of Public Works issue a competitive tender regarding an economic and technical feasibility study of a proposal to develop a marine oil transport terminal on Canada's Arctic coast and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, what were the respective bids and which company was awarded the contract?

2 When is it anticipated that this feasibility study will be completed and will the study be made public?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. No. (a) The Department does not usually call for tenders when professional services are required for economic or technical studies. (b) Not applicable.

2. The feasibility study is expected to be completed by the end of December 1970. Whether or not the study will be made public cannot be determined at this time.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DDT—USE BY FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS

Question No. 576—Mr. Harding:

1. How many federal departments use DDT in any of their control programmes?

2. What amount of DDT was obtained by each department in the fiscal years from April 1, 1965 to March 31, 1969 and in the current fiscal year?

3. What is the approximate amount of DDT presently in stock in each department?

4. Have adequate substitutes been found for DDT in any of the programmes in which it was used and, if so, what are the programmes and the substitute now used?

Return tabled.

BIOLOGICAL PESTICIDES

Question No. 707—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Are any biological pesticides in the form of a virus made available by any department of the government and, if so, under what terms and conditions?

Inquiries of the Ministry

2. Does any department of the government carry out basic research in the field of biological pesticides and, if so, which department and under what terms and conditions?

3. How long have biological pesticides been made available by the government?

4. Have any surveys been made to check on the possible dangers of the use of such pesticides?

Return tabled.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON SPACE RESEARCH

Question No. 1,001—Mr. Orlikow:

Has an interdepartmental committee been established to advise the government on space research and, if so, what are the committee's terms of reference and who are its members?

Return tabled.

RESOURCES

MINERAL—ENERGY—REPRESENTATIONS TO CANADA BY UNITED STATES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question normally would be for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but in his absence I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of expressed United States concern over diminishing mineral resources in that country, has the United States government or any official of that government made any overtures or opened any discussions toward negotiating for a package deal involving Canada's mineral and energy resources?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when the Prime Minister met with the President at the beginning of last year they announced there would be joint talks between Canada and the United States in the field of energy. These talks have not proceeded much further. Recently we have been having discussions about oil, and in this context the question has been raised about having over-all policies in harmony in both countries. But that is about as far as the discussions have proceeded.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): At that time were any representations made to the government in respect of non-petroleum mineral resources?

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. The discussions which have taken place have been with regard to petroleum in relation to energy rather than in relation to minerals.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister advise whether he or his departmental officials have asked for a copy of the statements emanating from Washington this past weekend with regard to the problem in respect of mineral resources in the United States and the necessity of having a continental policy?

Mr. Sharp: We expect we will be informed about the official United States government position. If we were to ask for all the statements made recently by those who may or may not speak on behalf of the government there would be a great many to ask for, but we are following the situation closely.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether I am right in understanding that there have been no written submissions by any officer of the United States administration with regard to an over-all energy policy and that these discussions have all been oral at these meetings?

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would not want to mislead the House or the hon. member. Some words have been committed to paper but not in the form of submissions from the United States government to the Canadian government; there have been exchanges of views, some of which have been put down on paper in the form of draft statements which could have been made by the United States government. These views were under discussion from time to time but did not come in the form of proposals to the Canadian government.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether there have been any discussions with regard to the possible export of water to the United States?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. Water was specifically excluded from any discussions that have taken place.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TORONTO—LAY OFFS BY DUNLOP CANADA LIMITED—LEGISLATION AND PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the lay-off of 597 employees in the industrial products division of Dunlop Canada on Friday, no prior notice having been given to the employees affected, is it the intention of the minister to introduce legislation to prevent a recurrence of this situation in other industries by making a company give adequate notice to the employees affected and present a plan for the gradual phasing out of a particular industry?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I am not familiar with that particular industry. I assume it must be under provincial jurisdiction. Most unions of any quality make the necessary provisions under collective agreements to protect their own members against these sudden lay-offs.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to address to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of this lay-off of nearly 600 people in Toronto, what actual or special steps have been taken by his department to find employment for the employees who are out of work as a result of this action, especially for the older employees? I understand that a considerable number of senior employees are involved.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The department will, of course, do everything possible to assist. We are having a meeting this afternoon with officers of the company in Toronto to determine what most effective way can be employed to assist in the situation.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration first whether he was informed of the company's intention to close down this plant some two or three weeks ago and, if so, whether in the meantime any discussions have taken place with the union concerned as well as with the company to find jobs for those who are affected?

Mr. MacEachen: I think the answer is yes to all parts of the question except that I would like to check further on the extent of discussions that might have taken place with the union.

Mr. Lewis: Could the minister inform the House whether any conclusions have been arrived at and whether any plans are at least on paper for finding alternative jobs for the persons affected?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member is repeating a question which was asked earlier by another member.

POLLUTION

SECOND VOYAGE OF "MANHATTAN"—AGREEMENT OF HUMBLE OIL COMPANY TO REGULATIONS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, but since it is not his day in the House I will put it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that Canada has, as the minister puts it, acquiesced in another voyage by the Manhattan, can he say whether the Humble Oil and Refining Company as owners of the vessel have yet agreed to the regulations and requirements being laid down for this voyage by the government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think that question ought to be directed to the Minister of Transport when he is in the House. As I have said on many occasions, the United States government is not asking for permission; it is only the Humble Oil Company that is sending its tanker through our waters, and the correspondence is taking place between the Minister of Transport and the Humble Oil Company, as is quite appropriate. So I think the question should be directed to the Minister of Transport when he is here.

Mr. Nesbitt: I realize that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is right in suggesting that perhaps any questions on details should be directed to the Minister of Transport, but perhaps the minister could tell us whether or not the company has agreed to the regulations in view of the fact that the minister has some interest in this project?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member is repeating the question asked in the first instance.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps Your Honour did not notice, but I believe the minister was prepared to answer the question.

Mr. Sharp: I see no urgency for an answer to the question today rather than tomorrow when it can be directed more appropriately to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Nesbitt: We do not know when he is going to be here.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

MONTREAL—CONSTRUCTION OF COMPLEX

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): I have a question for the Minister of Public Works but in his absence I shall direct it to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Would the minister state whether the federal government has any plans to build a multi-million dollar complex in the middle of Montreal and, if so whether it is ready to go ahead with this project?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, the federal government has not yet made any agreement or taken any decision about this matter.

[English]

AIR TRANSPORT

ACTION TO PREVENT HIJACKING OF AIRCRAFT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he tell the House what progress has been made by ICAO to bring about a system of sanctions against those nations that seem to give approval or support to terrorism on aircraft in any way? Would he also say whether or not Canada intends to join with other countries in the United Nations to bring about a quarantine of such airlines that in any way condone hijacking?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, Canada has probably been more active in this field than any other country. We have been supporting measures of this kind in ICAO. We have been supporting activity that is going on within the United Nations, and we have been carrying on bilateral discussions with Cuba which we hope will contribute something to the cessation of these activities at least in one direction. The question is an extremely difficult one because of the difficulty of finding appropriate sanctions that will indeed prevent this kind of activity, but I can assure the right hon. gentleman knows, Canada has probably all measures that seem to us are likely to help. The most important measure, of course, is one that we have not yet got agreement on, and that is that those who indulge in such activities should be made available for trial either at home or in the countries whose aircraft they affect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister say whether or not there are, in addition to the one example named by him of what he has endeavoured to have done, other ideas that Canada has advanced? Second, I repeat the question I asked earlier. What are the possibilities of joint action by the nations in the United Nations to bring about a cessation or at least to render less attractive the opportunities for those who might have hijacking in mind?

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that this is our objective as it is the objective of everyone in this House, but it is very difficult to know how to take sanctions against individuals who put bombs on aircraft. If it were possible to name the guilty party and bring him to trial and see justice was done, the matter would not require very much explanation, but as the right hon. gentleman knows it is much easier to deal with those who can be brought before the courts than it is with those who cannot be found.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mention was made by the minister of Cuba. Has the government of Canada any purpose in mind of placing Cuba, as it were, on a sanctions list? I am not talking of individuals having sanctions against them, but Cuba seems to be in the position of having a welcome mat for all those who wish to hijack.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the purpose of the agreement we are working out with the Cuban government, namely, to see that anyone who engages in hijacking will be returned for trial.

AGRICULTURE

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION POLICY RESPECTING ARREARS ON LOAN PAYMENTS—REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it the policy of the Farm Credit Corporation, when farmers are in arrears on their loan payments, to demand voluntary assignment or, failing to get that, to institute seizure procedures to the extent of one-third of farmers' delivery quotas in the current crop year?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that is not over-all policy, but there may be cases where these arrears are under contracts that have been in arrears for some time. With regard to such cases, if the hon. member will give me more specific details so that I can identify the accounts I will be able to give him a more complete explanation.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In view of the minister's answer in the House on February 17, as found on page 3680 of Hansard, I should like to ask whether or not the Farm Credit Corporation has notified all those who are in arrears on their loans that they may make application for deferment of payments?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think this has been given as much publicity as is appropriate, but I should draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that this is generally the case in so far as the limitations on grain marketing have been concerned. There are some contracts that are in arrears and have been in arrears from the time before there was any restriction on wheat marketing and these, of course, fall into a slightly different category.

[Later:]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture with reference to the Farm Credit Corporation. If the policy of payment deferment is not generally known, will the government set up a review board, independent of the Farm Credit Corporation, to which farmers may apply if they feel they have been subjected to undue pressure?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I could give some consideration to that but at first blush I do not see the value of it. In western Canada, where the tight grain marketing situation is the major problem related to these arrears, that has been followed. In all cases where there were no arrears up to and including 1967 these applications for deferment, if they have been substantiated with facts related to the cash flow into the farmer's hands, have been taken into account.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Agriculture make arrangements so that farmers may appeal directly to him or so that the Farm Credit Corporation will refer to his department and to himself cases where they are demanding other action than deferred payments?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand the implication of the question—"other action than deferred payments". If the hon. member would like to communicate what he means by "other action" and define it, I would be glad to consider it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we can return to the subject in a few moments.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INCLUSION OF LAST YEAR'S SUMMERFALLOW ACREAGE IN SETTING QUOTAS

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board but in view of the importance of the question to the agricultural industry perhaps the Minister of Agriculture would answer it. In view of the fact that western farmers reduced their wheat acreage by approximately five million acres last year, would the minister give consideration to using last year's total summerfallow acreage as well as this year's as a more equitable basis for setting the farmers' wheat quota in the forthcoming crop year?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this has already been taken into consideration and we are prepared now to give some consideration to the number of acres that will be in the permit book for the 1970-71 selling season. But I am sure my hon. friend will recognize that if the over-all concept of the plan, that is, to reduce the inventory of wheat, is to be kept in mind, there are limitations on how far we can go with that.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister agree with me that by spreading the extra five million acres, adding it to this year's summerfallow as a basis, that it would be a better idea even to reduce the quota?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the question in the form of a suggestion which he has to assume will be considered.

WHEAT—DETAILS OF ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister for Agriculture could indicate when the details of such provisions will be announced in the House so that those farmers affected may be able to apply the program early in the spring?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a circular in the form of the agricultural farm letter has been completed and I believe some of them were mailed on Saturday. I am not exactly sure about the balance, but my information last Thursday was that they would be ready for mailing on Saturday and the remainder would be mailed to every permitholder in western Canada today and tomorrow.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether or not consideration is being given as well to those who increased their perennial forage in 1968 and 1969 in applying the wheat inventory reduction program?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we had that under consideration, but I do not think that any special provisions in the details have been made for that particular situation.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—LIMITATION OF USE OF CREDIT CARDS

Mr. R. L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have directed this question to the Minister of Finance but I should now like to redirect it to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the government or the Prices and Incomes Commission made representations to the credit card companies and those companies and financial institutions who use this method to help promote business, requesting them to regulate the availability and limit the use of these cards in an effort to combat inflation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Not specifically, Mr. Speaker, but we have called upon the financial institutions to exercise restraint and at the end of the year I also asked all lending institutions for a review of their expenditures in the preceding year and their type of advertising material. This is now being analysed.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

STATEMENT ON POLICIES—CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the growing concern in the country over the failure of the government's recent development policies to cope with the serious problems of regional disparity—

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he has to ask the question directly. I suggest that the words in the preface to the question are not quite in order.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will allow me to rephrase the question. Would the minister be prepared to make a statement in the House to ease the growing concern in the country over the failure of his regional economic development policies? I am thinking now, Mr. Speaker, of the speech made a few days ago by an economist of the University of Montreal—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order. The hon. member can ask a question to seek information but it should not be presented in the form the hon. member is attempting to use.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps I can try a third time to phrase my question. Is the minister now prepared, in view of the concern felt about regional development problems, to expedite referral of his estimates to the Standing Committee on Regional Development so that members will have an opportunity at least to quiz the minister's officials since we cannot get any information in the House from the minister?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): My estimates are now before the committee, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman wants to have that information, I think he can get it there.

Mr. McGrath: On a question of privilege or a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with great respect, the minister's estimates are not before the committee. The committee has not met and we have not had an opportunity to consider the minister's estimates. I am asking the minister if he would expedite referral of his estimates to the committee so that we can get into this subject which is of growing concern?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the hon. member that the main estimates for 1970-71 were referred to committees on February 18.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question to the Government House Leader, Mr. Speaker. Would he use his substantial influence on the chairman of the Standing Committee on Regional Development so that the committee can meet and consider the estimates?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be glad to be an advocate for the hon. member.

NOVA SCOTIA—SIGNING OF AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCE

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Does the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion still hope to sign an agreement with the province of Nova Scotia as of April 1, 1970, for programs in that province?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I still hope, Mr. Speaker.

INCLUSION OF REGINA AND SASKATOON IN INCENTIVES PROGRAM

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker. In view of recent reports in the Saskatchewan press to the effect that the government is now considering the inclusion of Regina and Saskatoon under the regional development incentives program, can the minister indicate to the House whether the government has made that decision?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have expressed misgivings and reservations in the past about whether this type of question may be asked because most of the question period might be used from day to day in asking whether this region or that city is included in the program. The question has been asked, however, and perhaps for this once it might be allowed. The minister may want to reply.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I have reason to believe that I can announce the special areas in Canada very soon.

NEWFOUNDLAND—DETAILS OF AGREEMENT ON DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister be prepared, since the House is rising on March 25, to make a statement on motions soon indicating the details of the plan under the agreement which is to be signed with the province of Newfoundland on April 1, as claimed by the province?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the whole matter is somewhat confused. I do hope I shall be able to announce before Easter where the special zones will be in Canada. But it will be extremely difficult to give details about all the agreements, as there must be prior agreement with the provinces on each project.

[English]

SASKATCHEWAN—DECISION ON EXTENSION OF INCENTIVE PROGRAMS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of remarks made by the minister in the House on a previous occasion, is he now able to inform the House if he has reached a decision on the extension of incentive programs which would include not only Regina and Saskatoon but northwestern Saskatchewan and programs affecting Indian and Métis people in various parts of Canada?

[Translation]

Hon Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that very soon I would have the opportunity to tell the House which special areas have been designated by the government and the hon. member will then be able to see what regions have been chosen as special areas.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister define to the House his interpretation of "soon". Does that mean tomorrow, next week, next month or next year?

Mr. McIlraith: Consult a dictionary.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the increasing concern felt by the milk producers of eastern Canada, on the one hand, and the rather evasive statements made by the minister with regard to the establishment and announcement of the new dairy policy, on the other hand, can the Minister of Agriculture tell the House when the new milk policy for next year will be announced and, if so, whether he will get in touch with the unions concerned before making this announcement?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the precise date. As a matter of fact, all the people involved realize that this announcement should come by the end of this month, and the sooner the better. I do not want to cut off the negotiations and discussions going on now between the Dairy Commission, representatives of the industry and the producers' organizations because, while a lot of progress has been made, several matters are still outstanding.

POLLUTION

REPORTED OIL IN SEA OFF ALASKA

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In the light of numerous reports over the weekend concerning oil appearing in the sea off the southwest coast of Alaska, would the Acting Prime Minister watch this unusual event very closely and cause investigations to be made to see if there is any connection between this oil leak and the comparatively recent underground nuclear test at Amchitka in the same general area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the parliamentary secretary is making a suggestion or representation to the Acting Prime Minister. In this way I think we must assume that his representation will be considered.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRINIDAD AND GUYANA—ANTI-CANADIAN INCIDENTS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister concerning the publicized and regrettable incidents in Trinidad and Tobago. Can he advise what steps are being taken to assure the protection of Canadian lives and property in the area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have been in touch from day to day, indeed, more frequently than that, with our representatives in Trinidad and Guyana, the other place where there have been some problems, and the advice we have received so far is reassuring. I can assure the hon. gentleman that we shall be following this matter closely and doing everything we can to protect the lives and property of Canadians. I am told by our High Commissioners in both places that the danger is not great.

Mr. Macquarrie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister consider having the matter fully investigated and possibly making a statement so that we may forestall any misunderstandings or events which could mar the close and valuable friendship between our countries?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would consider doing that. The hon. gentleman should know that we have been in communication with the High Commissioners of these countries in Canada to acquaint them with the process of justice in Canada and assure them, as I assured the House in a statement made some time ago, that we are doing everything we can to make sure this is a society in which racist influences do not prevail. I believe the situation is well understood, but if there is any reason why I ought to supplement what has been done I will not hesitate to do so.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister undertake to the House that in future, when students apply to enter Canada from other countries, their backgrounds will be investigated to make sure they are bona fide students and not members of international revolutionary movements who wish to come here for purposes that have little to do with studying?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: This is no laughing matter, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTED PLACING OF U.S. ANTI-BALLISTIC MISSILES ON GREAT LAKES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of news reports and suggestions that the Congress of the United States is considering placing water-based anti-ballistic missiles on the Great Lakes and at locations off the coast of Alaska and in Baffin Bay. Has the government of Canada been in contact with the government of the United States with regard to a plan of this nature?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. This is the first time I have heard the reports. We have certainly had no communication or advice of this kind from the United States.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate whether it will be his intention to speak to the United States government and obtain information on this project, or does the government perhaps consider that the Rush-Bagot Treaty, which prohibits warships on the Great Lakes, is now passé and should no longer be adhered to?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am confident that if the United States had plans of this kind that country would consult us.

HIGHWAYS

EFFECT ON SAFETY OF TRUCK OPERATION ON SUNDAYS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, my question was to have been directed to the Minister of Transport. Since this is not his day to be in the House and since his Parliamentary Secretary is not here, I would ask an appropriate member of the government to take my question as notice. Having in mind the application by a major Canadian trucking company for unrestricted use of Canadian highways on Sundays and the likely adverse effects on traffic safety, would the minister say whether he intends to look into this important matter?

IMMIGRATION

ASSISTANCE TO POLISH IMMIGRANT TO RETURN TO NATIVE LAND FOLLOWING DETENTION IN MENTAL HOSPITAL

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether he would make a report to the House on the case of a 61-year old Polish immigrant now residing in the constituency of Parkdale, known as Mikolaj Gilewicz, who was detained by Ontario Hospital authorities for the past nine years and who recently visited the Toronto immigration office requesting assistance to return to his native land?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to look into the case and give any information that is connected with the man's immigration status.

Mr. Haidasz: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister had the opportunity to contact the provincial authorities to discuss the feasibility of investigating or reviewing the files of mental patients who are immigrants and unable to communicate in the working language of that mental hospital?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have had no communication with the provincial authorities on the subject but would be happy to consider the hon. member's question.

Mr. Paproski: Check into Danny the Red, too.

MANITOBA CENTENNIAL

ASSISTANCE FOR BASEBALL TOURNAMENTS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare who I understand is unavoidably absent. In view of the urgency of the question perhaps I could direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. Having regard to the fact that Manitoba is acting as host for both the senior baseball championship and the national junior championship as part of its centennial celebrations this year, will the minister be announcing generous assistance under the fitness and amateur sports program soon?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): I shall be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Since it has been the practice of the Department of National Health and Welfare to pay the fares of the visiting teams for the final games in the Canadian amateur baseball championships, would the hon. gentleman assure the House that this practice will be continued, particularly having regard to the extra expenses the towns involved are bearing in connection with the centennial celebrations?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a representation to the minister and he has to assume that the proposition will be considered by the government or by the minister concerned.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): Would the hon. gentleman also bring it to the attention of the minister that both these requests were admirably summed up in a letter I wrote three weeks ago?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has probably not received it yet.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications.

Can he tell the House today whether a definite solution has been arrived at in the postal dispute which has been causing some inconvenience to the population recently. If not, what is the present situation?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, my colleague the Minister of Labour has been examining the matter in Montreal for several weeks and I am awaiting his recommendations and report.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In view of the answer given by the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

May I ask him whether or not he is in a position now, in view of the many meetings he has had, to tell the House where the present postal conflict stands as of now?

Mr. David Lewis (York South): At Montreal!

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I must apologize to the hon. member. I was out of the Chamber to answer a long distance call and I did not hear the main question. I will read it in Hansard and answer tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière wishes to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for kindly allowing me to repeat my question to the minister who had not understood—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I gave the hon. member the floor to ask a supplementary question, not to repeat the question he had already asked. However, perhaps the hon. member may be allowed to do so if the minister is willing to answer the question immediately.

[Mr. Cullen.]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Labour inform the House on where matters stand with regard to the present postal dispute in view of the action taken by him lately?

[English]

Mr. Mackasey: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

METHODS USED IN INVESTIGATIONS OF MEMBERS OF BLACK COMMUNITIES AND CLUBS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): May I ask whether the Solicitor General is in a position to reply to a question which was directed to him on February 20 with respect to an allegation of massive and indiscriminate investigation by the RCMP of black communities and clubs throughout Canada?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity of answering it. The matter has been investigated since the question was asked, and we find there is no foundation at all for the allegation that massive and indiscriminate methods of investigation have been used to harass that community. There is no truth whatever in it. As to the allegation in the statement that threats of deportation were being used, we find it is also completely without foundation.

As a matter of policy, the force has encouraged its members to develop a close understanding with community leaders in any areas where they may be working. This applies to all communities equally. There is no evidence whatever that I can find to support the allegation to which the hon. member referred when he asked the question.

FLOODS

NEW BRUNSWICK—ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion about which I spoke to him two days ago. Has the minister or his department yet arrived at a preliminary estimate of the flood damage in New Brunswick and, if so, when will some reassurance be given to the people who have been so seriously affected by this disaster?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I know that representatives of the federal government met with a representative of the provincial government to discuss this matter. We have received no report yet. It may be that my colleague the President of Treasury Board, who has a responsibility in this connection, has received one; the other day I tried to get information from him but he had no information at that time. As soon as I get it I shall be happy to forward it to the hon. gentleman.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO PRICES—ASSISTANCE TO GROWERS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the depressed prices of potatoes across the country, is the Department of Agriculture formulating, together with the prices stabilization board, some form of assistance to potato growers, which will be of particular interest to Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and eastern Canada generally?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I suppose all things are relative, but prices this year compared with last year are substantially better. For example, New Brunswick potatoes were fetching between $1.70 and $1.75 for a 50-pound bag wholesale in Montreal all last week. This compares with a low of 90 cents a year ago, so I cannot agree with the hon. member that prices at the present time are severely depressed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DOMINION COAL BOARD DISSOLUTION ACT

MEASURE TO DISSOLVE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-161, to provide for the dissolution of the Canadian Coal Board and for the repeal of the Canadian Coal Equality Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act and the Dominion Coal Board Act as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Dominion Coal Board Dissolution Act

Mr. McIlraith (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): There are a number of points I should like to raise. I do not know who, on behalf of the minister—

Mr. McIlraith: He is here.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am glad of that. Hon. members may recall that when this bill made its ill-fated entry to the House on a previous occasion as a bill coming from the Senate, questions were raised as to the proper action to be taken to deal with a transfer of appropriations for which the legislation made provision. Before this bill goes through, I should like the minister to tell the House what is to be done with the funds which will be left surplus. This is a bill which comes into effect upon proclamation, so we should like to know when the minister proposes to have it proclaimed. If it were to pass through both houses and be proclaimed, on that day, the day of proclamation, the Dominion Coal Board would be defunct and any funds left in any of the appropriations would then be available, under the terms of clause 3(2), for allocation within the department by the Governor in Council.

This is all very interesting, but I should like to know whether the provision applies to any funds that are to be disbursed before March 31. I do not suppose it does because I do not suppose that the coal board will be wound up before March 31. According to the book of estimates for 1970-71, the amount allotted to the coal board is $6,477,000, of which some $2,427,000 is for program expenditures and contributions of one sort and another under vote No. 70. Then, there is under a statutory item an amount of $4,050,000 for payments to New Brunswick for the rationalization of the Minto Coal fields.

Strangely enough, nothing was said about these points at the committee hearing, and I think that before the bill passes this House the minister should give us a full explanation. We should like to know when he expects the coal board to be wound up, how much money might be left over at the projected winding up date, and where this money is going to go.

I am raising this point, Mr. Speaker, because personally I do not approve of funds being allotted to a given purpose, the Governor in Council fixing a date in the future for the winding up of an agency or board, as the case may be, and the Governor in Council then deciding what is to be done with the money left over. One of the witnesses before the committee indicated that when the estimates for the department were tabled no money was provided for research in the estimates of the coal board. I should like to refer to the evidence of Mr. MacNabb at page 6:20 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence. Mr MacNabb said:

> So, any money that is used in research in the coming year will have to come from department funds, and these would be funds in the Mines Branch of the Department.

I should like to ask whether the intention is to carry on a program of research with the money unexpended by the coal board. If this is to be the case, then would the minister for goodness sake say so? Nothing at all has been said in this regard. The money could be spent on a trip to Timbucktu. As a matter of fact, there is nothing in the bill to restrict the minister and a whole retinue of officials from taking a safari to Africa on any money that is left over. If the travel allotment were overspent the could use any money left over for any purpose whatever. I admit that this might be rather far-fetched, but I use it as an example to indicate that I think that this is an incorrect practice.

If an error has been made in the estimates of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in regard to coal research, then the right thing to do is to come forward with open and clean hands and submit a supplementary estimate. The government should not hide this, saying it will use the money subsequently, but without saying for what. This money has been appropriated by Parliament for use by the Dominion Coal Board, and for a specific purpose. According to this bill it can be used for any purpose within the department, as the Governor in Council shall so determine—which means a recommendation by the minister as to its use.

It has always been the practice that unexpended funds shall expire. If a certain program is abrogated and money allotted to it is left over in the estimates, then that money expires. In this case we have these ancillary moves, and personally as a matter of practice I find the practice objectionable. The bill is asking the House to give carte blanche to the department to use the money for whatever purpose it may determine, and I do not think that that is right. Certainly, I would want an explanation from the minister, because the course I propose to adopt in this matter will depend upon his answer.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, surely we are going to have an answer.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this is the only question hon. members are concerned about, but my impression is that it was dealt with in committee. If it was not, I am perfectly prepared—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it was not, because it is not in the transcript.

Mr. Greene: Then in that case, may I say that the purpose of the broad wording of clause 3 (2) is primarily to enable the work which was formerly done by the coal board now to be carried on within the department. The reason we need broader wording is that the work done by the coal board will now be administered under the authority of the mines section of the department.

I think, quite properly within the ambit of the estimates relating to a particular division of any department, there is an attempt to have the widest flexibility in order to enable that particular division, both within its own resources and the resources in the estimates, to do its work unhampered to the greatest possible degree, subject to the limitations of the point by point items in the estimates.

In attempting to achieve a considerable cutback in the estimates in the interests of its fight against inflation, I think the government has probably also attempted to give maximum flexibility, within the global amounts allotted, to various sections of a department to do their work. It is my understanding that the clause is worded broadly in this way because the amount allotted in the estimates will now come under the administration of the mines section. As I say, within the ambit of the estimates themselves, an attempt is being made to give the broadest flexibility to this section to enable them to deal with coal matters.

I would point out that we are not seeking new funds here; rather we are setting up an alternative method for administering the funds that have already been provided. I think it would have been a retrograde step to itemize, point by point and dollar by dollar, the actual type of expenditure that had been mooted by the mines section.

Needless to say, in administering these funds effectively and efficiently in the interests of the coal industry of Canada, some flexibility is required. Therefore, these funds, which have already been voted, will now be administered by the mines section instead of by the coal board, as was previously the case under the estimates as tabled.

I trust that this explanation is of some help to my hon. friend. I have not gone into the matter in depth because I was under the impression, as I have said, that some of these points had been resolved in committee.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question the minister has not answered? I want the figures indicating how much of the $6 million he anticipates would be unexpended at the date of proclamation. That was not covered at any time during the committee hearings.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a very short question before third reading for the information of those who have known the coal board for many years, which played an important part in the coal industry of Canada. Will the minister advise what will happen to the members of the board? Will the minister advise what will happen to the members of the board? Will they become part of his department or just what will be the allocation of these present members?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the permanent staff of the board have now been taken on the staff as part of the department and the public service. The chairman of the board has already been taken on as advisor to the deputy minister in respect of coal.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, ADMINISTRATIVE POWERS, ETC.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-190, to amend the National Energy Board Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-190 has been placed before the House to enable a number of necessary and desirable amendments to be made to the National Energy Board Act. The Act was first passed in 1959 and has not been amended since 1963 except for matters which were consequential to the passage of other legislation by Parliament. For instance, the passage of the Statutory Salaries Revision Act in 1967 included such an amendment to the National Energy Board Act.

The amendments now proposed in Bill C-190 are a reflection of changing circumstances and the experience of the board in discharging its important responsibilities since the last amendments in 1963. I hope it will be helpful to hon. members if I take just a few minutes to outline some of the more important changes proposed.

Before I do so, perhaps I should remind hon. members of what the board does. It is responsible for adjudicating upon applications for licences to export and to import natural gas, applications to construct and operate inter-provincial and international pipelines for the transportation of petroleum and its products and of natural gas, and applications for licences to export electrical power and energy and to construct and operate international power lines for the transmission of such power. It is responsible for regulating the rates, tolls and tariffs of pipelines under its jurisdiction, a field into which it is just now entering and which will require a great deal of careful attention in coming years.

It recommended to the government of the day what became the national oil policy, established in 1961, and the board has administered that policy since its inception. It has advised successive governments on a wide range of matters having to do with energy, and has assembled a small but highly competent staff expert in the disciplines of engineering, finance and accounting, and operations research as they apply to oil, gas, pieplines and electrical power.

The Board and its staff have earned and have the confidence of the government, and I believe that of businessmen and members of the general public in Canada who have come into contact with their work. In my present responsibilities, I have come to have a high regard for the capacity and judgment of the board, and to rely upon it as a principal source of advice in the many matters relating to energy which require the attention of government. We are at the moment in the midst of particularly complex considerations about oil, but I do not foresee a time when the judicious resolution of difficult questions relating to energy will not be an important concern for any government of Canada. For such resolution, I believe the National Energy Board to be necessary and effective.

I turn now to the substantive amendments incorporated, along with many minor or relatively incidental changes, in the bill now before you. First, let me explain the proposed amendment in respect of international power lines.

Both Canadian and United States power utilities are now placing increasing reliance upon transmission connections with other utilities to achieve additional security of supply, economy of operation and earnings from surplus energy. In an increasing number of cases, such interconnection arrangements are becoming advantageous and desirable as between utilities in Canada and utilities in the United States.

The high voltage interconnection between power systems, one on either side of the international boundary, is normally used for the importation of power for one interval of time, followed by the exportation of power for the next interval. In other words, it is seldom used only for a one way flow of power, whether import or export, but rather it is used for both, as the occasion warrants.

The increasing exchange between the two countries is borne out by the trade records. In 1960, Canada exported some 5.5 billion kilowatt hours, and imported some 0.4 billion, for a net export of 5.1 billion. In 1969 the preliminary figures are that Canada exported about 4.7 billion kilowatt hours but imported 3.3 billion, for a net export of only 1.4 billion kilowatt hours. To put this in perspective, the total supply of kilowatt hours in Canada in 1969 was 194 billion.

As the Act now stands, if a Canadian utility proposes to construct an international power line for the purpose of exporting power, it must obtain a certificate of public convenience and necessity before constructing and operating the line. On the other hand, no present provisions of the Act prevents that utility from constructing a major transmission interconnection if the initial intention is to import power. The line having been constructed, when the time comes for it to be used for the export of power, the board is faced with an ex post facto application which leaves it with no opportunity to deny the certificate and little power to include conditions respecting the route or the adequacy of the specifications for its construction, having regard, say, to the public safety.

[Mr. Greene.]

The government believes it would be in the public interest that the board be given jurisdiction over international power lines constructed and operated for the purpose of importing power on the basis comparable to the jurisdiction which it now exercises over export power lines. It proposes, therefore, that the Act be amended to require that lines to be used for importing power, as well as those to be used for exporting power, may be constructed and operated only pursuant to a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the board. There is no intrusion whatsoever over the existing line of demarcation between the jurisdiction of the provinces over the electrical utilities within their boundaries, and the jurisdiction of the government of Canada over international connections established by such utilities.

At the present time, the importation into Canada of liquified natural gas by any means other than through a pipeline does not require a National Energy Board licence. In 1959 trade in liquified natural gas was not significant, but there have been rapid technological advances. Plans for the importation of liquified natural gas into eastern Canada by tanker or other non-pipeline methods are being developed and, since it appears that the scheme of the Act is to make subject to licencing restrictions any import or export of natural gas which may affect the public interest, the government considers that it would be appropriate that importation of liquified natural gas should be subject to licencing control.

To put it another way, it would be as imprudent to allow an area or community to become dependent upon tanker-borne liquefied natural gas as it would be to allow the same community to become dependent upon natural gas moved internationally or interprovincially by pipeline, unless it had been demonstrated that the service was reliable, economic, and otherwise consistent with the public interest. There are, in addition, considerations as to safety in the handling of liquefied natural gas which would be more readily safeguarded if its importation were subject to licence. It is proposed, therefore, that the existing authority of the National Energy Board to licence the import of gas be extended to include liquefied natural gas by amending the definition of "import" to include importation by railway tank car, tank truck or by tanker as well as by pipeline.

The Act now empowers the National Energy Board, when issuing a certificate in respect of the construction of a pipeline, to prescribe such terms and conditions as are considered necessary or desirable in order to give effect to the purposes and provisions of the Act. It is proposed to make manifest the Board's power to impose requirements respecting preservation and restoration of land through which a pipeline may be constructed by amending section 46 of the Act as proposed in Bill C-190.

It has been brought to the attention of the Board in public hearings, and through representations made in the House and to ministers of the Crown, that dissatisfaction has existed among farmers with the interference with and the impairment of both municipal and private farm drainage systems which may be created by the construction of pipelines. This is particularly so in those areas where the installation of tile and other types of drainage is necessary to carry on efficient agricultural operations. Through the Board's hearing and decisions, and through consultation with various agricultural associations and with pipeline companies and the pipeline division of the Canadian Petroleum Association, greatly improved practices by the pipeline companies have been established. As a result, I believe relations between the agricultural community and the pipeline companies are now much better than at some times in the past.

With respect to new pipeline construction, the Board has applied the concept that gravity land drainage systems should take precedence over pressure pipelines. To ensure that the same concept may be applied to existing pipelines, it is proposed that where the Board finds that such pipelines interfere with or otherwise impair the proper operation of public or private drainage systems, either existing or proposed, it be empowered to direct a pipeline company, upon such terms and conditions as the Board considers proper, including the specific power to direct by whom the cost should be paid, to divert, relocate or otherwise reconstruct the appropriate portions of its pipeline so as to remove the existing interference or impairment or to otherwise facilitate reconstruction or relocation of drainage systems. I should add that a number of pipeline companies have already voluntarily undertaken remedial action of this sort where it appeared desirable.

Since November, the Board has been involved in the most lengthy and arduous hearing since its establishment. This hearing arises from applications by five applicants for certificates of public convenience and necessity and licenses for the exportation and some incidental importation of gas. The decisions on these applications will be highly important to the development of the Canadian natural gas industry for some years to come. At the same time that this major gas hearing has been before the Board, it has also been considering ten other applications for certificates respecting the construction of pipelines and international power lines or for licences for the export or import of propane or for the export of power. The Board has held five public hearings with respect to certain of those applications. Others are still to be set down for hearing when the applicants have satisfied the Board that the data in support of their applications is complete and the application is ready to be heard.

In October 1969, the Board found it advisable and in the public interest to bring into effect, as provided for in section 97 of the Act, its authority over the regulation of rates, tolls and tariffs of certain oil and gas pipeline companies which were not previously subject to the Board's jurisdiction in this regard. A major application by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited respecting rates has already been filed with the Board, and increased activity in this area of responsibility is to be expected.

Because of the increase in the Board's workload arising out of its regulatory function in respect of certification of pipelines and international power lines, its licensing functions in respect of the export of gas and power and import of gas; the impending activity in regulation of rates, tolls and tariffs of oil and gas pipelines; additional responsibilities arising out of its advisory functions, and in keeping close surveillance over new developments in the energy field; and in recognition of the additional responsibilities proposed to be placed upon the Board by the amendments to the Act set forth in Bill C-190, the government is of the opinion that the membership of the National Energy Board should be increased from five to seven, with provision for the appointment of an Associate Vice-Chairman from among the Board members.

This increase in membership would enable the Board to conduct two public hearings upon applications at once, and to reach decisions upon applications in shorter time than has been possible under existing circumstances. Three members constitute a panel for the public hearing of most applications. I say "most" because there is provision under section 14 of the Act for one member of the Board to be authorized to hear and report to the Board upon a matter. It has, however, been found in practice to be desirable to limit the use of this power to relatively simple issues; in most certificate, licence and rate matters the issues are complex and important enough to require the hearing and analysis of the evidence by three independent minds. With five members it is impossible to have two concurrent hearings, and with the present and foreseeable hearing load it is becoming increasingly difficult to hear and decide with reasonable dispatch all applications coming before the Board. If only for the sake of maintaining reasonable expedition in deciding applications to the Board—and of course each of these applications represents a matter which is urgent and important to the many people affected by it—it is therefore desirable that the number of Board members be sufficient that two panels can operate at any one time.

Thus far, on this matter of the number of members, I have been addressing myself only to the regulatory work of the Board. As I indicated early in my remarks, we also call upon the Board for advice on many matters. Board personnel have carried a very heavy responsibility in the preparations for and the conduct of the discussions which for many months have been taking place between officials of the United States and Canadian governments. There is no indication that the need for such discussions will diminish. Often these matters have to be dealt with urgently, and it is not easy for the Board or for me to deal with them promptly if the Board members whose advice I want are tied up in a formal hearing. I, therefore, look to the increase in Board membership to provide more flexibility in the time of the members.

Similarly, it seems to me important that we increase the membership of the Board to enable it to give more attention to the long range implications constantly arising for future Canadian energy policy and problems. Here, the obvious example is the new developments in the North. Hon. members may recall that the chairman of the Board is a member of the task force on northern oil, which we set up after the Prudhoe Bay discoveries but before the discovery of oil in the Mackenzie Delta and of gas in the Arctic islands. The development of these northern discoveries, and the related transportation and marketing problems, are matters that require sound and prompt advice to government. One means to obtain such advice, I submit, is to have available two more men with the capacity, objectivity and dedication which are expected of members of the National Energy Board.

• (3:30 p.m.)

In the bill now before you there are a number of other amendments. I would not describe any of them as unimportant, for the need for them has emerged in the light of experience, and in many cases after intensive discussion with knowledgeable people such as the members of the legislation committee of the Canadian Petroleum Association and executives of the Canadian and Ontario Federations of Agriculture. However, the remaining amendments are of a kind which, with deference, I would suggest could more appropriately be explained and discussed in committee where I and representatives of the board will be pleased to answer questions and explain whatever may need explaining.

I therefore move, seconded by—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is no one to second the motion.

Mr. Greene: —seconded by the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Hopkins) that Bill C-190—

An hon. Member: The minister cannot do it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was moved before the minister started.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It has already been moved.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Obviously this has not been the minister's day in the House. I confess that I believe he would have liked to have answered the questions I put to him on the previous bill, but somehow or other the information was not there or else it was better to obscure the true purpose of that bill.

In dealing with this bill, let me say first of all that I am conscious of the fact that the National Energy Board has been in existence now for about eight or nine years. It was as a result of the Borden Commission report that the board came into existence. The government took the advice of the Borden Commission and set up the National Energy Board. Those of us who were in the House at that time will recall that the creation of this board was breaking entirely new ground and, as a matter of fact, did not meet with universal acclaim. There was some concern in the various parts of the country, depending upon the form of energy that was prevailing or predominant therein, that certain types of people would tend to dominate the board and that primarily electric power utility experts would be dealing with gas and oil.

At that time, the chief problem facing the government of Canada was the question of the export of natural gas, and great pressure was being exerted. We were indeed fortunate in obtaining the services of Mr. Ian McKinnon, who was chairman of the Alberta Oil and Gas Conservation Board, and who came to the public service of Canada first of all on loan and then permanently, to establish the board and to lay down the general lines of conduct. He was fully experienced as the chairman of a form of utility commission, and I think that Canada gained a great deal by this appointment. Now that Mr. McKinnon has retired, I am sure that all of us expect to see the same high standards of performance by the National Energy Board that it has maintained in the past. When called upon to explain matters to members of Parliament, particularly those who form part of the delegation of the Canadian American inter parliamentary group, the Board has filled them in on the situation, and have done so also in the delicate situation concerning oil and gas between Canada and the United States.

There are other problems of course which we cannot neglect, such as the question of water power and the export of electricity and other forms of energy. There is the very difficult situation with regard to uranium and its processing and export for power and energy purposes.

The minister made some very brief comments regarding the performance of the board and its ultimate purposes. I would have liked to have heard him say a good deal more about the national oil policy. I know that there are some problems at present regarding what the decision of the United States may be concerning the level of Canadian imports. Of course this decision will determine the nature of the national oil policy.

There is one thing that I do want to point out, since I come from an area that is more than vitally interested in the marketing of Canada's oil production. Within our own domestic market there are recurring rumours, and reports which go even beyond rumours, that the national oil policy boundary with respect to the marketing of Canadian products along the line of the Ottawa River is being breached by refined products coming from refineries in the Montreal region and in other parts of the country. In addition, with the establishment of the refinery at Port Hawkesbury and the proposed refinery near Quebec city, as well as the proposed refinery in Newfoundland, there will be an ever increasing pressure on the marketing of Canadian oil products by products having their source in off-shore crude. This is bound to happen.

It is not that western products that are already in those markets will be replaced. It is not that the refined products themselves from, say, the refinery that is to come into existence at some time—and this may be a long way off, but there are progress reports which may be mere flack reports for the purpose of keeping up a pretence—will replace western production, but in any event there is no doubt that they will displace other petroleum products within the Canadian structure and gradually there will be a push westward. Naturally, the barrier which will be established by the national oil policy will come under the greatest and strongest pressure. Unless the market west of Ottawa increases substantially to absorb the natural increase in the western production, we will either have to maintain a rigid policy—and I do not know how the board may police this—or ancillary action may have to be taken by the government to police this so-called boundary line and the actions by the oil refineries or the petroleum distributors so that the Canadian production will not suffer unduly.

It is not only the producers of the crude and the refiners who are adversely affected by the diminution in the marketing of Canadian petroleum products, but at least three provincial governments have a great stake in the revenues derived from the royalties and other dispositions of oil and gas rights. There is, of course, the other point about the United States and Canada's rather delicate position at the present time. I don't want to say too much about the negotiations. Certainly, I would not want to say anything that might be prejudicial in arriving at a possible solution for Canadian producers. But it seems to me that with the requirements of the United States for gas, and there is a vast increase in them,—the minister spoke about the increase in applications before the National Energy Board for the export of natural gas—that it would only take a limited amount of enlightened self-interest to see that the marketing of both gas and oil are inextricably linked. There is no question, Mr. Speaker, that most of the natural gas in the past has been found as a result of exploration for oil. If there is going to be a ready market for the gas reserves there is no question one can view with equanimity the rapid accumulation of unproductive oil reserves, or drilling operations that result in a successful well which is merely capped because there is no market for the oil.

There are many operations in western Canada at the present time that are marginal or less than marginal, and unless there is a very strict quota system with respect to operations, many operations will be definitely shut down. True enough, there are many others now who are going out for the exploration of and have found natural gas, and that is their prime purpose. I think we may see a pattern of change in the exploration.

These are problems of very great significance in the field of energy, and yet we see an indication in the white paper on taxation of the government moving in like a bull in a china shop with the taxation of the operators in that field of resource development, without seemingly taking in what they are doing with regard to the ultimate disposition of the end product. It seems to me that when you look at the two points of view they are in distinct—at least in the goverment's eyes—separate chambers having no relationship whatever.

I can readily understand that in the minds of a number of people who have never seen an oil well, all you have to do is open up a drilling company or get out on some exploration program, sink a bit in the ground and, just like Little Jack Horner with that plum pie, by merely sinking a thumb in, out will gush all that is good. It is only an absolutely naive myopia that prevents individuals from understanding the problems of the oil and gas industry and understanding that all is not rosy. True enough, the people in the area certainly may work and get good wages and salaries, but so far as the profits are concerned, in many instances, they are merely sunk with the shareholders' money in holes in the ground. I think I will leave that particular point.

However, we are at the present time, Mr. Speaker, moving into some areas of pressure.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

I asked some questions this afternoon with regard to the fact there seems to be a movement towards the development of a continental energy policy. I don't think anybody is yet in a position to fully realize the implications of a continental energy policy which would involve water, and when one considers it strictly from certain points of view it makes complete sense. On the other hand, I can readily understand there can be arguments completely on the other side with regard to a continental energy policy, and I am sure we will have to give this matter very, very grave and serious study.

Just as an indication, I recall a few years ago when the first export of natural gas took place from Alberta to a copper refinery in Montana. It was felt that this had to be on a fixed period because there was a great deal of money being invested by Anaconda, and they had to be given the opportunity of paying off the capital cost of the installation. But strangely enough, it is much like a small boy who has been given a good treat. As soon as that period was finished or that the flow was appreciated, back they came and said, "More". We have seen a continuing appetite for gas through this particular connection. The same may be said now of the existing pipelines, oil lines and gas lines to the Pacific coast. In addition we see, of course, the extensive requests for natural gas to be piped into the central and east central United States.

There are no two ways about it. This is not an interruptable service. We must clearly understand that the greatest possible persuasion, and not only persuasion but force, would be applied to Canada if for some reason or other in the national interest it came to the point of turning off that gas unless of course appropriate stipulations are made beforehand and are clearly understood. After all, we know what kind of pressures can be brought to bear. At the time the Canadianization of Time magazine was taking place the American government clearly pointed out to the Canadian government that negotiations for oil market quotas in the United States would be completely broken off if Canada did not place Time magazine and Reader's Digest in the most favourable position they are in today.

This is a question of relationships between neighbours, I will agree, but while I come from Alberta and am fully cognizant of the economic worth of these disposals of oil and gas to the United States to that province and to Canada's position in international trade—there are so many advantages—on the other hand I am also wondering, and I put this up as a signpost to observe and to examine, about the danger of getting locked into a situation where there would be no getting out even though in 20 years, the situation may have changed so much that Canada would be at a considerable disadvantage.

And so I conclude with those few remarks with regard to the question of present negotiations, the present situation and the difficulty but necessity of establishing a national oil policy. I must confess that the past few years have not been the most exemplary with regard to a national oil policy. I have always been very critical of the reason for all of this secrecy about the so-called secret accord of 1967. The present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has never been fully able to explain it. He has tried to dissimulate any criticism but frankly he has failed in that regard.

With regard to the present bill there is a great deal of tidying up of definitions to be done. All I can say to that is that it is lawyer's load and of course, this can be readily understood. Over the past ten years of experience with the board, I am sure the committee has come up against certain definitions which were not as flexible as they wanted, nor as accommodating. In any event, I do not think there is much to be said about the definitions part of the bill.

As to the composition of the board, I am glad the minister went into detail and I think the change is quite understandable. If there had been, concurrent with the recent series of hearings with regard to the gas export applications, other types of hearings with regard to the export of electrical energy or the question of uranium, or if there had been problems with regard to the export of water power. I do not know what would have happened. Somebody would have had to queue up because the board was not in a position to deal with that situation. I think the move to get seven members, to have two panels, is a move in the right direction. It is only natural to expect that this board, since Canada is developing more and more of its energy resources, would have more to do. This board, from being a fledgling in matters of this nature, will now assume a much more important role.

Earlier this day we had a bill which set aside the Dominion Coal Board, writing its obituary if I may say so. Although many years ago the Dominion Coal Board was a very important body, with the passage of time and the evolution of technology it was no longer necessary to maintain it. I think in many ways it has been replaced by the National Energy Board since we have now moved to other forms of energy.

Of course, the success of this expansion of the board will depend upon where the emphasis will lie with regard to the skills of the two additional members. I would have liked to have heard from the minister, if he would listen on this particular point, where the emphasis will lie with regard to the expansion of the board. Are these people to be oil and gas specialists or utility men or what is going to be their particular specialty? I have nothing much to say about having an associate vice-chairman. Because of the mechanics of the expansion, it is understandable that there should be one.

There is one rather ironic thing, Mr. Speaker, and that is that the minimum salary scale for members of the board, whose skills are matched by a great many members of this House, is more than double the salary scale for members of this House.

Mr. Greene: Do you mean they are too high or this House is too low?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I think as far as getting qualified personnel for the board is concerned, the minister is quite right. I am glad to see that he set minimum salaries for the positions. I think in order to get appropriate men one has to be in a position to deal with a competitive industry. This is not a case of picking up engineers or specialists coming out of university but of getting men who have established themselves, have made a reputation and have the capabilities and qualities required on such a board. The salaries should be high enough. I think they should range in the level of the Exchequer Court and the Supreme Court of Canada. Having said that, I am sure there are men in this House who have just as much capability and who work just as hard and contribute just as much to this country, yet their salaries are in a somewhat different range.

There are two or three points I should like to make, Mr. Speaker. In clauses 7, 12(3) and 28(3), the board is not allowed to hold public hearings or may not hold public hearings, as the case may be. In clause 7, it is clear by the language in the section that the Board is not to hold public hearings. That may be very well but I will say this: There is no reason why the findings of the board or the decision of the board with the reasons therefor, should not be made public. If the minister will take particular note of this point, it is in the case where either the holder of a certificate consents to it or where the pipeline or international power line to which the licence relates, has not been brought into operation under that certificate or licence.

Notwithstanding the fact that you certainly cannot have private hearings, I do not see the value of any necessity for public hearings. Surely, the respect for this board, as the respect for any other board, lies in the openness of its decisions. It seems to me that notwithstanding the fact there shall have been a private hearing, there is nothing that commends itself with regard to not publishing the decision. Therefore, I would hope the minister would see fit to authorize the board to publish its decisions and any reasons therefor.

Clause 9, and this was a point on which the minister spent some time, refers to the diversion of a pipeline so that it will not damage a farm drainage or a water drainage system. I would say that, in addition to the fact that the board can direct by whom and to whom the cost of diversion or relocation should be paid, there should be specific provision that under no circumstances should it be the farmer or the owner of the drainage system who shall pay any costs.

The last question I want to raise, Mr. Speaker, is with respect to the purpose of clause 19, that is, permitting any pipeline company, in the acquisition of land, to acquire the minerals thereunder. If you will recall, under the original act, mines and minerals were exempted from any acquisition of land. I think it would be instructive to read section 69 as it is now:

> A company is not entitled to mines, ores, metals, coal, slate, oil, gas or other minerals in or under lands purchased by it, or taken by it under compulsory powers given to it by this act, except only the parts thereof that are necessary to be dug, carried away or used in the construction of the works, and except as provided in this section, all such mines and minerals shall be deemed to be excepted from the conveyance of such lands.

At times I have thought that provision constituted some little intrusion into the field of property and civil rights, particularly in those areas which use the Torrens system, as in Alberta, where the question of the rights arising under the conveyance are specifically covered by the Land Titles Act of the province of Alberta. Notwithstanding everything that has been said on the subject, I do not see how amended section 69 could in any way abrogate any rights of acquisition under a conveyance properly drawn up, executed and registered under the Land Titles Act of the province of Alberta or the equivalent act of Saskatchewan or Manitoba. The amendments, as proposed, are permissive. I can see why, if under an order of the National Energy Board a right of way was granted on the surface of land for the construction of a pipeline, it was intended that that in no way was to be deemed as conveying to the company any interest to mines or minerals, with the exception perhaps of subsurface gravel which would be used in the construction of the pipeline. I can see that a pipeline company could specifically negotiate for, and indicate in the terms of its contract, that it is acquiring the right to mines and minerals. This amendment now empowers the company to acquire them, and I can see where this may happen.

I can that at its tank farm, and we have many in Edmonton, a pipeline company with facilities which occupy a fairly vast area would not want an outsider coming in and drilling for oil or gas on its site. Yet, this is actually what could happen. I say that because if the act previously prevented the pipeline company acquiring the rights to mines and minerals and these rights were in the hands of a third party, the third party could negotiate with another exploration or oil development company and an application would be made to the Alberta Right of Entry Board to go in on the land. True enough, it might be at a pretty high cost. I still feel that, unquestionably, a government body or other body should grant right of entry for the purpose of drilling for oil, gas or even sulphur on the land the pipeline company has acquired for major installation purposes. I do not know whether there is anything to be gained by acquiring the rights to minerals underneath the right of way of the pipeline system.

I agree with the minister that there are many technical explanations that can be given in committee. I hope when we see this bill again for third reading, after it has been before the committee, that there will be more clarity with regard to the future of the national oil policy and with regard to our position vis-à-vis the United States. This has become very worrisome and could have grave consequences in Canada on our balance of payments, the level of employment and the revenue of both federal and provincial governments, especially if there were a major cut back in our oil marketings in the United States. We know this is an election year and that there are all sorts of difficulties down there in this regard. I think if our government negotiators, and particularly those representatives who are going to Washington tomorrow take a tolerably firm stand, and all the interests in this regard do not lie on the one side, I am sure our United States counterparts will be made to see that the world does not revolve round their domestic orbit at all times. We hold many cards and intend to develop our oil, gas and energy resources for Canada's interests first. Then we will, I think, be quite prepared to consider the requirements of our neighbours.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, there cannot be much objection to the amendments of this bill which extend the authority of the National Energy Board. Any thorough examination of the bill must centre around the outlook of the National Energy Board and involve an examination of specific clauses. It is unfortunate that the National Energy Board in the past did little except reconcile various conflicting business interests which arose instead of taking an over-all view of whether the activities of this or that business interest in the energy field really made much sense. Unfortunately, we begin with the faulty premise to build on, that premise being that international oil companies which virtually dominate the energy field in Canada know what is best for the country, and that our job simply, through the Energy Board, is to act as a referee between them. Clearly, our government has all the business acumen and astuteness of an Esau selling his heritage for a mess of pottage.

The minister's overeagerness in giving away our resources could well have disastrous consequences. True, the minister may, if he wishes, call us petty nationalists, socialists, or anything he wants. That does not alter the fact that he and those surrounding him have for a long time demanded the continental integration of our resources. The Liberal party does not really believe in Canadian nationalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Saltsman: It wants this country to be embraced by the giant to the south, and the sooner the better. And here, Mr. Speaker, is the one great danger that faces us. As a nation, we do not have control of the situation. Those administering the country do not appear to give a damn about the future of Canadian nationalism.

An hon. Member: That sounds like a farm program.

An hon. Member: It sounds like hogwash.

Mr. Saltsman: The only hogwash around here is coming from the government benches.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: If certain hon. members on the government side keep making these remarks we shall begin thinking that hogtown is now Winnipeg.

Mr. Saltsman: I should also point out that some of our provincial premiers have been responsible for our failure to develop a national policy in this field. All too often they have been anxious to lay their hands on a fast buck, especially just before an election, and have neglected the long run interests of the nation. In some parts of Canada the premiers seem to wear blinders and do not see the long run interests of the nation. An example is to be found in British Columbia. We know what happened with regard to the Columbia River Treaty. Another example is to be seen in the fact that we have allowed the Japanese to come in and develop a resource without paying any regard to the future of the province concerned.

It may look great in the lifetime of Premier Bennett, but the question we have to ask is: what price will have to be paid by those who will come after us? It seems to me the federal government has not been forceful enough in expressing its opinion and standing up to some of the provincial premiers. We see this situation in a province such as Alberta, where everyone's thinking seems to be dominated by oil. One would think nothing else existed in this country except oil. The more oil they can sell, the better it is; they do not care about the conditions. Just sell oil; nothing else really matters. Manitoba is the only province which has shown any sense, any willingness to work in the national interest. I think other provinces would do very well to seek to emulate the statesmanlike stance of the premier of Manitoba.

In Alberta, we find a government which prides itself on the fact that it does not need to impose a sales tax. It points to the other provinces and says: They all have sales taxes, but look, we don't. What the people there fail to see is that because of the national oil policy, because of the myopic-minded way in which we approach the selling of our oil, every Canadian pays tribute to Alberta, and this is why the province is not obliged to impose a sales tax. There can be no doubt that the national oil policy has resulted in the higher cost of gasoline throughout the country. It has been estimated that it costs 5 cents more for every gallon we buy as a result of this national oil policy which keeps one province happy.

Then, there is the foolish policy under which one province is pitted against another in connection with resource development. An industry goes to a province and says: Either you give us the advantage of special concessions or we will locate elsewhere. Provinces fight each other over the right to have their riches despoiled. How long will this sort of thing continue? I know it can be said that a good deal of the fault rests with the provinces themselves, but in my opinion the main fault lies with a federal government which has never asserted itself, which has allowed the matter to drift because it had no policy.

In this country we are always being told how intransigent is the Province of Quebec, how difficult it is to get along with Quebec, how Quebec is threatening confederation. I would suggest with respect that other provinces have been as guilty, if not more guilty, of contributing to the strains within confederation. The federal government has permitted this to go on by failing to take a stand. Sooner or later we must face up to some of these provincial gauleiters. The country does not belong to them, nor do the provinces belong to them. In any confrontation, particularly in English speaking povinces, between the federal government and the provincial governments, I think the people of Canada would opt for the federal government, would opt for nationhood in preference to narrow partisanship in one particular part of the country.

The federal government has failed to produce a policy concerning foreign ownership. The consequence is that a branch plant economy is doing virtually what it pleases in Canada. Operations of companies here have been integrated with those of parent corporations in the United States and in other parts of the world. This may make sense for the companies concerned but it does not make sense for Canada. For Canada, it has meant loss of control.

It is a temptation to view every situation as a crisis and to see every piece of legislation as a watershed. But the forthcoming negotiations on a continental energy policy do, indeed, represent a watershed. We can no longer delay the development of an overall policy regarding the use of Canadian resources. It has been said by people who work in the communications field that we have perhaps ten years in which to solve our problems or else go under as a nation. We could go under even faster by following a resource policy which takes no account of the long range national future.

The minister is sitting very quietly in his place today, although usually he is much given to making outrageous accusations against anyone who does not recognize his omnipotent wisdom, or anyone who dares suggest there might be other ways of doing things.

Mr. McCleave: Did you know that, Joe?

Mr. Greene: They must think I am a socialist leader.

Mr. Saltsman: We have just heard the magic word. The minister's idea of settling a debate is to yell "socialist", like a small boy who hurls four-lettered words and then runs away—

Mr. Greene: Losers can never make me mad. It's the winners I worry about.

Mr. Saltsman: He talks about us being losers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Saltsman: The real losers are the Canadian people.

Mr. Greene: If they ever got you, they would be.

Mr. Saltsman: Maybe the only thing that has saved the Canadian people is that we have been around to tone everything down before the minister and his friends got out of hand.

Mr. Osler: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Saltsman: I don't know. Yes, I suppose I will.

Mr. Osler: Would the hon. member recommend to the premier of Manitoba that he put an end to the mining of nickel and that sort of thing, so that we could conserve it all there?

Mr. Saltsman: I will be pleased to answer that question by saying that I don't know what the hon. member is talking about. Let me say some things which the hon. member may actually understand. Try to understand that this party does not object to the sale or trading of Canadian resources. We have never objected to trading or selling in the world. Indeed, we are very much concerned that where such trading is in the interest of Canada and the international community we should do it. We do not take the attitude: we have certain resources; let us sit on them and to heck with everybody else. We are willing to share our resources. We are willing to work in the international community, but some thought must be given to the national interest. We must consider whether we are really helping in an international way or whether we are merely contributing to making that rich neighbour of ours to the south even richer.

Mr. Greene: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: One thing to which our party takes objection is any policy which would make it impossible for Canadians to create their own kind of society—any kind of continentalism which would tie us in so tightly with the United States as to make it virtually impossible for us to develop anything unique or desirable on our part.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who comes from an oil province and who has a great deal of interest in seeing exports of oil increase, express the fear of a Canadian nationalist that we have not always bargained strongly enough and that there are conditions under which we should not succumb to pressure. He cited the example of Time and Reader's Digest in the case of which one slight threat that oil imports would be cut off was sufficient to legitimize two magazines and frustrate attempts to develop a Canadian literature and a Canadian journalism.

We in this party have been too long concerned over human welfare, and over the future of this country, to want to see that aborted by a continental energy policy that would make any kind of freedom to live our own lives impossible. We will object to placing our affairs in the hands of business corporations, whether they be American or Canadian, that really do not care about the society in which we reside so long as they can make a dollar. It is not only international American corporations of which I speak; some Canadian corporations are equally guilty. The unfortunate fact is that the Canadian government has let them do as they pleased, and this cannot go on. It is one thing to have a continental energy policy that ensures that corporations have some concern for the future of this country. It is another thing to have a continental energy policy that permits corporations to go across the border and act without giving any thought to the future of this country, being interested only in their own balance sheet.

It may be that, if a continental energy policy is to work, we will have to set up marketing boards through which to sell our energy—our oil, our gas, and perhaps our electricity. It may also be that in order to make this policy work and to ensure that Canada receives the maximum benefits from such an arrangement we will have to take the oil industry under public ownership as the only way to ensure efficiency, to ensure that that industry will operate in the national interest. The minister may respond by saying "Socialism!" It may be that the only way to survive as a nation is to bring in national policies, whether they are socialist or otherwise.

The argument about socialism stifling free enterprise does not cut much ice any more with people who are interested in this country. They are asking which way they can best survive, which way they can best serve the interests of Canada. If we cannot meet these objectives—and I do not think we can—by allowing international oil companies to take over our industry, then it may be necessary to bring the oil industry under public ownership; and if this appears to be the course we should adopt, we should not hesitate to do so.

Mr. Greene: Watkins. He is in the Watkins camp.

Mr. Saltsman: Our party will object to a policy that permits people who use our energy resources to pollute and despoil our environment, to dehumanize society, and then to walk away and leave the government to pick up the pieces. This is what they call efficiency. They think this is a good way to run an industry, and that governments are always wrong. Governments do spent far too much money, and one of the reasons is that they have to pick up the pieces after other people have made the profits. This sort of thing cannot be allowed to continue.

In any energy policy there will have to be a very clear understanding that these most important conditions to which I have referred will have to be met. Certainly, I for one am not prepared to see the people of a nation that has ruined its own resources, polluted its air and befouled its rivers, move into Canada and do the same thing with our resources. It is true that we have pollution problems too, but we are going to solve those problems. As I say, I am not prepared to see other people who have flung their own resources away in the interest of a materialistic society, and without caring a damn for the future, given a licence to do the same thing in this country.

We object to bailing out another society that is in serious trouble because it has not exercised wisdom in the use of its resources. As long as 10 or 15 years ago a report was issued in the United States indicating a serious shortage of resources was developing in that country. There was another story in this morning's Globe and Mail confirming how serious is the shortage of resources and energy in the United States.

Again, I want to make it very clear to the minister and to those in his party that we cannot stand by and say to one nation whose resources are being depleted, even though it has been foolish in the use of its resources, "Ah, you have acted badly; don't come crying to us". They are still neighbours of ours, and I think we will have to sell some of our resources to the United States. I think arrangements will have to be made to transfer energy to the United States.

Having said that, my concern is that we transfer these resources on our terms. I am not suggesting we should put the United States up against the wall and tell them we will get the last ounce from them; that is not what I mean. But there does have to be a very clear understanding that resources in the world are scarce and that they cannot simply be flung around. If the United States does have access to our energy, then they will have to adopt policies that are somewhat more reassuring than their present ones.

We also think there has been a lack of balance and emphasis in regard to development of secondary manufacturing in this country. In the long run, it is not good enough simply to continue to plunder resources, because resources become depleted. Since the United States has developed into a manufacturing nation, that country would be in great difficulty if it had to depend merely upon its natural resources.

We have to get rid of a tax system that gives bonuses to the mining and oil industries which should not be given. If we are going to sell our resources, particularly when they are in tremendous demand, then we should at least get some value from them. When a tax system makes special concessions to resource industries, if those resources are sold then some of the benefit that might accrue to Canada will be lost. For that reason, we should make certain that there is no bonusing of the mining and oil industries. Even though the white paper does suggest some changes for these industries, very substantial handouts to the natural resource industries still remain.

So that the minister clearly understands our policy and does not go around spouting a lot of stuff that does not make any sense, I should like to express our position as it is found in these four major points.

First of all, before any continental energy policy is concluded, the minister must ensure that the use to be made of Canadian resources will be made a matter of public policy; that the decision will be made by the government of Canada acting on behalf of the people of the country, instead of the decision being made by the large corporations of the world.

Second, that there will be a real benefit to Canada from such an energy policy, a benefit that is long term, not a short term, quick meal of pottage.

Third, in any energy policy negotiations all matters affecting trade will be discussed, not merely energy. Energy cannot be discussed out of context with other areas of trade in this country. It is true that the United States wants to discuss energy alone, but we should be prepared to insist upon discussing all matters affecting trade at this time. If we bargain away our energy resources, we may never have another chance to discuss those other areas of trade that are so vital to the nation.

• (4:30 p.m.)

One of those matters that has to be discussed is the access of Canadian manufacturers to the United States. The United States has a great deal going for it in Canada. This is a beautiful set-up for them. There are no tariffs against raw materials because the United States desperately needs raw materials. They take all we can give them, but try to sell them some manufactured goods except those in respect of the Canada-U.S. auto trade pact. Perhaps there are some, but they are relatively few. These companies have their branch plants over here which are not permitted to export back to the United States. Let us develop agreements with the United States, because Canadian companies, by agreement, are restricted to the Canadian market. Let us have access to the greater United States market.

One of the problems facing Canadian secondary manufacturing industry, and this is a problem which perhaps would not have faced it if the United States had not come in and virtually destroyed our economy with their branch plants, is the fact that they are blocked from the United States market. Now that they have wrecked our economy with their branch plants and destroyed our efficiency by blocking our manufacturers out of United States markets, at least in respect of most manufactured goods, they have made it virtually impossible for us to develop secondary industry. There should be no export—let me not say "no". I am not prepared to see an enlargement of our energy exports to the United States unless there is some substantial give on their part in the matter of access to their markets for our manufactured goods.

Another matter that needs to be discussed with the United States is the question of their wheat policy. While we are going around being nice boys and signing wheat agreements, the United States is cutting our throats on price. This has got to stop. If you are going to be neighbours you are going to be neighbours. This is one of the problems that must be discussed with the United States before any agreement can be concluded on an energy policy.

Fourth, and most important, there must be a clear commitment from the United States that their laws will not apply to Canada. We are tired of the intrusion of the United States law into Canada causing infringements of our sovereignty. I have in mind their trading with the enemy laws. If their companies are Canadian they are going to have to obey Canadian laws. That must be clearly understood. There must be an end to extra-territorialism on the part of the United States. Surely, no nation that calls itself free, and that looks to have a future, can tolerate the kind of intrusion that has taken place in Canada by the United States government.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is most important as we head into negotiations on a continental energy policy that we be very clear about our objectives and very determined to see that irreparable damage is not done in the course of these negotiations or the agreements that might arise from them. I believe it is possible to have an integrated policy on energy with the United States, but only if the needs and interests of Canada are met in a fair way.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-190 will give the committee an opportunity to discuss the whole question of energy resources, not only in Canada but on the North American continent. I presume their terms of reference will be wide enough to discuss developments in the next 25 years. This is a very complicated subject, and a very difficult one because the self interests of the big international oil companies are affected. Our own self interests are also affected.

I suggest right from the start that it will be very difficult to get the large international oil companies to consider the best interests of Canadians unless we enter these discussions and considerations with a very fair attitude ourselves. We certainly cannot expect a one way deal. We must look at the tremendous resources of energy, whatever they may be, natural gas, petroleum products, electric power, or some of the new, sophisticated sources of power which we anticipate in the next 25 to 50 years. These will include atomic reaction and other forms of nuclear power, including solar energy, which are only now coming to the fore.

The whole subject is complicated because there is a time element involved. We need, as anybody who has studied the white paper will be well aware of, large sums of money for the development of our own country. The government of the day is looking desperately for these forms of revenue. We are discussing the necessity of taxing profits no matter where they are and quite rightly, particularly excess profits or profits not in the best interests of the people of Canada. Certainly, through the white paper, all branches of governments as well as industry itself should take a look at this.

In order to sell any forward looking policy we have to be good salesmen, and a good salesman has to know the people to whom he is selling his ideas. We have to realize what the international atmosphere is, and certainly what the atmosphere at the present is between Canada and that great republic to the south. I do not think the kind of speech we have just heard represents a good start if we expect the United States to come to us, particularly in view of the fact it has most of the bargaining on the short term policy in its hands. As far as we are concerned, the United States controls the large international oil companies. It is principally these United States companies which at the present time import Venezuelan crude into Canada. This is the great source of competition as far as my own province of Alberta is concerned.

As has been pointed out, we have to realize that if we are to pay higher wages in Canada, and if we are to pay greater oil royalties to the provinces, we must remember we are dealing with our United States friends. If we wish to give tax concessions or to give better returns to those people we are encouraging to buy Canada back, or invest in Canada's future, we must remember that is the best way to buy Canada back. We have lived alongside the great United States in peace and brotherhood for 150 years. If they intended to take power, which my friends on the left keep on monotonously repeating, or were about to take over and dominate us, they have had 150 years in which to do so. As far as I can see, they have made no such outward attempts. The fact that we have provided a very lucrative resource for their investment money, money which has come out of their own energy at home and their ability to produce through a free enterprise system, is a credit both to the United States and to the common sense of the Canadian people.

So far, the people of Canada have not been so narrowly nationalistic that they have discouraged the investment of our United States friends which has, in fact, brought Canada ahead by strides unequalled by any other small or medium size nation on earth. Quite apart from not discouraging the United States from investing even more money in Canada, I suggest that all that is required is that the Canadian government, with its own experts and research ability, develop an even better national energy policy through the use of this Bill C-190, which will drive us forward in the next 25 years at a more accelerated pace than we have known heretofore.

I do not share the bugbear about the terrible domination from south of the line. If our industry has been dominated, it is only because we have failed to make the best use of our birthright and develop our own country through our own ability and thrift. If the white paper has anything to recommend it, so far as I am concerned it is the fact that there is a recognition in it that there is a need to encourage Canada's basic industries, particularly mining which includes oil, and a recognition that our basic industries require tax concessions and tax encouragement. As a matter of fact, I do not think the white paper goes far enough. If amendment is to be made to it, I would suggest we give even more leeway than ever to those people who would invest their savings in Canada's future so that we can start now to develop our own country in our own way. Quite apart from being negative or one who would point with jealousy to those to the south of the line who develop our country, I think our whole approach should be one of planning and encouragement to the Canadian people to invest in their country.

I suggest we can still get ahead with the development of our Arctic oil through government encouragement for the immediate building of one or more pipelines from the Arctic coast. If we did this, we would be in a position to supply the physical plant necessary to ship most of that oil to the mid-continent of the United States where the oil is needed. I am sure that the people who are first in providing the physical facilities will be the first to trap the market. We should be looking ahead to this development rather than worrying about the small developments we have had in the past in the Arctic. If I am to believe the reports, the developments in the future will dwarf anything we have had so far. We can learn from some of the mistakes of the past. It is not necessary that we rely entirely on United States capital, know-how and on the United States investor. We should plunge deeply into the development of our Arctic resources. If we put together the plant by which to ship our Canadian resource from the Arctic, it would be very easy to tap into the United States wells and sources of petro-chemicals and ship them down across the continent through Canada.

I agree that we have been slow in developing our own secondary industry in this nation. But again, this is not a field in which we wield any big stick. We have a free enterprise system which I thoroughly endorse. It is up to us to develop our own manufacturing industries and facilities for the processing of minerals in the north. If we use the new gas processes in respect of our crude iron and steel production we can refine the steel and use it in all the industries in Canada which require steel. Steel production in Canada has been very slack. A member to my left suggested we should not play footsie with any one province. I agree with this, but it would seem that the idea behind Bill C-190 is to take a look at our whole natural resource field to see whether the petro-chemical industry can work in with our electrical industry and whether the electrical industry can work in with our water resources and the use of the tides, solar energy or atomic energy.

If we had a proper national energy policy we should be able to include all 10 provinces—or 12 provinces when the two other areas reach provincial status—in an over-all plan. I envisage the time when the iron ore of Ungava is made into pig iron in the mills of Sydney and New Brunswick and then shipped up the St. Lawrence River to Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal and perhaps the Lakehead. A steel industry could be developed in the west. At the present time there is very little development in that regard. There is no doubt there are enormous natural gas and petrochemical resources there, not to mention the unlimited water power. I am sure the committee will look into all these things.

Let us waste no more time with this terrible preoccupation about what is being done by the United States. Worry will not help; talking about it will do a great deal less. Twice in my lifetime the United States has stepped in and saved our way of life, the free western way of life. Rather than worrying about whether or not the free enterprise system of the United States is all it might be, I suggest that my friends to the left should take a good look at the people behind the iron curtain and ask themselves whether any place else in the world a country the size of Canada, with the resources and raw materials it has, has been left very largely untouched by political or military pressure.

I might say, if it is of any use—because I have said it before in the House and no one seemed to believe me—I for one am tired of being a louse on the eagle's wing. Quite apart from looking on the United States as a menace, perhaps we should consider that the United States might well look upon us as a menace to it since we occupy one-third of their continental perimeter for defense purposes. I have heard it said elsewhere, and here behind closed doors, that we need not fear invasion from any other part of the earth because the United States, whether it likes it or not, is faced with the responsibility of defending us. I go along with that. I know the United States has no choice but to defend continental North America, but I am not sure we should boast that we are prepared to sit alongside our friend and greatest customer and say to it that it can pay all the bills and we will bask in the safety and security of its armed forces.

I believe we are well able to pull our own weight. We have the resources, the will and the manpower to do it. There is no excuse for our taking a very scurvy attitude toward the broad security of North America. I think when people speak of a policy of such great economic importance as this, and expect the United States to back out in respect of certain phases of their industry, they should also at least say that we will join with the United States in the broad matter of defence and security. Surely, this would create an immediate atmosphere of mutual trust and good will. There is no need to throw out the strawman of United States domination. So far as I know, the United States people have never exhibited any such attitude. I am merely suggesting it is our plain duty to help defend our own homes. All the talk of the province of Alberta and other parts of our country being despoiled by the United States is sheer nonsense. If it were not for the investments by the United States in Alberta, Alberta would be a buffalo pasture.

Whether or not Alberta has a sales tax, may not be entirely due to our oil policy. Alberta is a favoured province, but we who live in Alberta at least know that the American hands are clean; that they have come there to make an honest investment and to establish an honest industry. We are proud of their record so far. We will welcome even more U.S. investment anywhere in Canada as long as it is made in the same spirit of trust and brotherhood they have demonstrated so far. I only hope that the Canadian people will have as much faith in the future of their own country as the Americans have shown in the future of Canada, and this without any military or political strings attached. I want to hear no more of this bugbear coming from our left. It fools no one in Canada, and if it fools anyone in the United States it cannot do anything except add to some of the difficulty we are having already in keeping abreast of the United States in the orderly development of the economic future of the North American continent.

We have a large and important part to play. There is a great deal of profit to be made from the whole business, and whether it is made will depend on whether or not we pull up our socks and develop a national oil policy and a continental energy policy which is acceptable. We could even go further than that. When we have developed our own national oil policy and a continental energy policy which will develop our resources and our wealth to a greater extent, I hope we will carry it into the councils of the United Nations and other places in the world so that Canada, in full co-operation and understanding with the United States, can become a joint blessing to all mankind.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I would just like to make a comment or two on the speech of the member preceding me before I start on my remarks. When he referred to a continental oil policy and to U.S. ownership, I had the feeling that perhaps I should touch my forelock in the approved method of a peasant saluting the owner of the land. I think that we in this party do not criticize the Americans for making a good business deal in investing in Canadian oil. We realize they have good business heads. However, previously we were political servants or junior partners to Great Britain and eventually we grew up in a political sense so that now we run our own house. In the past, we have invited the Americans to act as the big daddy so far as business is concerned and to do things for us that we could not do ourselves. The situation is now changing. If we were to take a phrase from the separatists in Quebec we might say that we are now masters in our own house. We have now reached our majority and adopted a grown up attitude with respect to business. Perhaps it is high time we stood on our own hind legs and said: "We can run our affairs now". I think that the attitude we in this party take is that as Canadians we are grown up business men and we will gradually become masters in our own house. This is my attitude in reference to the remarks just made.

We favour the improved regulations envisaged in the bill. I suggest that before we go overboard in selling such things as power abroad we take an adequate inventory of the resources we have. This is particularly true of natural gas. We should check what we have in the way of power resources against Canada's possible future needs and make sure that our future requirements are adequately protected. I can well see us selling bottled natural gas from some of our oil wells in the Arctic at the same time as the oil. This could well go hand in hand with oil drilling and it would probably be quite feasible to sell these to anyone in a position to buy.

If we must export power in any form I favour its export in the form of electricity rather than as oil, natural gas or uranium because this means that some jobs will be given to Canadians in constructing an utility.

[Mr. Bigg.]

Hopefully, we will get a return in investment, and I am assuming that any sale of electricity will pay us dividends or will be to our advantage. Surely, this would be the case because if not, what would be the point of selling our power to anyone? The only market abroad for Canadian electricity at the moment is the United States. We have heard repeatedly that they have an increasingly greater need for electricity. If we can sell power to our advantage, it might be better to do this than to sell it in the form of natural gas.

I should like to deal specifically with the sale of uranium of which Canada has plenty. If we could sell atomic energy plants abroad, hopefully sales of uranium or enriched uranium, plutonium or thorium might follow. In effect, we might be making a better business deal than by selling a raw, natural resource power which someone else converts in their factories. What I am saying to the minister is that perhaps we should look for a better business deal than we have in the past. I have a great deal of respect for the business ability of the Americans. They have not achieved what they have without having a fair knowledge of business and displaying a good deal of business ingenuity. When you are dealing with a horse trader of this kind you should use some caution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Regional Economic Expansion—request for inclusion of all Saskatchewan as designated area; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Transport—Charlottetown—Proposed transfer of certain marine agency functions and personnel; the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson)—Trade—Sale of atomic energy plant to Roumania—Contingent conditions.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely notices of motion.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTION TO ALLOW EMPLOYEES DEDUCTIONS FOR LIVING EXPENSES WHILE ABSENT FROM PLACE OF RESIDENCE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act, section 11, subsection (9a) by deleting after the word "where" the words "the employer's establishment to which he ordinarily reported for work was located" and substituting the words "he maintained a self-contained domestic establishment in which he resided and actually supported a spouse or a person dependent upon him for support and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will not repeat the private members' notice of motion No. 12 standing in my name in today's Order Paper. The motion to amend section 11(9a) of the Income Tax Act, which I have the honour to present to the House this afternoon, is based on a brief to the Royal Commission on Taxation submitted by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Employees' Association on behalf of the employees of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool engaged in construction and repair of country grain elevators, annexes and cottages, and made with the full knowledge and support of the employer, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that the original submission dealing with this problem was made directly to the Hon. E. J. Benson, Minister of Finance, on August 25, 1969, in a letter by Mr. G. A. Mills, Secretary-Manager of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Employees' Association.

The purpose of the motion I am presenting today is to allow employees incurring a necessary and legitimate expense for meals in the carrying out of the requirements of their employment to deduct these expenses from their taxable income. At present expenses incurred for board, or received by them for board, are included in computing their taxable income.

The situation I am concerned about is that of the employees engaged in the construction and repair of country grain elevators. After submission of a brief to the Royal Commission on Taxation, some relief was obtained by a ruling of a chief assessor to the effect that those construction employees engaged in "new" construction could come under exemption by reference to section 5(2)(a) of the Income Tax Act. Although welcome, this ruling created an even more obvious discrimination in that workers employed by the same company, often engaged in work of a similar nature at the same site, are in some cases allowed to deduct the value of their expense allowance from their taxable income and others are not.

For example, and as related to the employees of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Association, there is the situation at Gainsborough where repairs to the pool elevator were carried out in November and December of 1968. The work performed included installing electric motors in crib annex, east frame annex, and on head. A complete new boot was installed and metal liners were put in auger box. This is but part of the work that was done there, but as this work was not classed as new construction these men were not allowed to deduct their living expenses while at Gainsborough from their taxable income. Had they built a new elevator at the station, their expenses would have been deductible.

The motion I propose would provide an equitable solution to this problem. It is only since 1961 that these workers have not been allowed to claim expenditures for meals as an expense deductible from income. From 1951 to 1961 these employees were allowed to claim as a deduction from income the amount expended for meals during the period they were required to move to different places in the course of their employment.

The 1961 ruling not to allow deduction of meal expenditure was made by the Department of National Revenue Taxation Division. This ruling is based upon section 11 (9a) of the taxation act, holding that the work site at which employees are engaged is the establishment where they report for work and therefore they would not be away from the employer's establishment to which they ordinarily report for work.

I do not dispute the legality of the interpretation placed on section 11 (9a) of the act by the legal authorities. They have, no doubt, given the wording very close and careful scrutiny and consideration. However, the refusal to consider claims for meal expenses is based entirely upon the words "where the employer's establishment to which he ordinarily reports for work was located." The fact is that the elevator construction and repair workers may work one day at Buffalo Gap, the next day at Big Beaver, and the next four days at Yellow Grass, the next two weeks at Estevan and the next two weeks at Spring Valley. In fact, having completed one day's work at Big Beaver they may not return to that place in the next two or three years. Nevertheless, the department maintains that Big Beaver is the establishment to which these workers report for work "usually" or "generally" or "as a rule." This is a situation which must be corrected.

The department has also ruled that the non-allowance regarding claim for meals that applies to the construction and repair workers does not apply to their foremen. This creates a rather peculiar situation. A foreman, and one of his workers living next door, may be sent by the company to repair an elevator 100 miles away. While on this assignment the foreman's expenditures for meals are deductible from his taxable income while his helper, working under the same circumstances but for a lower income, has no such privilege.

It is no doubt such unjustifiable and plainly evident discrimination and inequity, that prompted the Carter Commission to make this observation, and I quote:

The self-assessment system of taxation is only a viable system if taxpayers believe that everyone is bearing his fair share of the tax burden.

The motion before you is aimed at just that. I express the hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will see fit to adopt this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate. But first of all, we must admit that the point raised by the hon. member has not much significance. There is a point of law I wish to discuss, but I must say that the hon. member is talking about an exception to an exception, because subsection (9a) of section 11 refers to an exception to subsection (9) which in turn refers to an exception to section 5 of the Income Tax Act.

One can see that the Income Tax Act deals differently with the income of a wage-earner and that of a tradesman or someone who is self-employed.

Indeed, a self-employed taxpayer may deduct most of his expenses. If he has to go to another city for something related to his business, he may deduct the cost of his meals. If he takes to lunch someone who will help him in his business, he is entitled to a deduction. All he has to do is establish that such expenses are related to his work in a sense acceptable under ordinary accounting principles.

On the other hand, in the case of a worker who earns a salary, he must find in the Income Tax Act—and this may take much time and effort—a section which spells out the deduction which he is entitled to.

For instance, section 5 stipulates as follows, and I quote from the English version:

[English]

Income for a taxation year from an office or employment is the salary, wages and other remuneration, including gratuities, received by the taxpayer in the year plus

[Translation]

A list follows detailing what must be added. As for what may be deducted, instead of having a general accounting formula, there is a very specific list of what can be deducted.

Speaking of the case mentioned by the hon. member, I say it is a striking example of how specific the law is about allowable deductions. The basic rule is that the salaried employee is not allowed any deductions. Then, there is a list of the specific items that may be deducted.

Subsection (9) reads as follows:

• (5:10 p.m.)

[English]

(9) Where an officer or employee, in a taxation year,

(a) was ordinarily required to carry on the duties of his employment away from his employer's place of business or in different places,

(b) under the contract of employment was required to pay the travelling expenses incurred by him in the performance of the duties of his office or employment, and

(c) was not in receipt of an allowance for travelling expenses that was, by virtue of subparagraph (v), (vi) or (vii) of paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 5, not included in computing his income and did not claim any deduction for the year under subsection (5), (6) or (7).

[Translation]

This is the case of one of those employees referred to by the hon. member.

[English]

there may be deducted, in computing his income from the office or employment for the year, notwithstanding paragraphs (a) and (h) of subsection (1) of section 12, amounts expended by him in the year for travelling in the course of his employment.

[Translation]

I shall deal now with what can be deducted. Subsection (9) does not deal with the cost of meals. However subsection (9a) says the following:

[English]

(9a) An amount expended in respect of a meal consumed by an officer or employee shall not be included in computing the amount of a deduction under subsection (6) or (9) unless the meal was consumed during a period while he was required by his duties to be away for a period of not less than 12 hours, from the municipality where the employer's establishment to which he ordinarily reported for work was located and away from the metropolitan area, if there is one, where it is located.

[Translation]

Let us suppose for instance that a construction worker is employed by a company whose head office is in Big Beaver and that he has to work 100 miles from Big Beaver and stay there less than 12 hours, and that his employer does not pay him any travelling expenses. I must tell you incidently that if the employer pays him travelling expenses, section 5 (2a) applies then but it is a different case.

If the employer provides no allocation and the employee has to pay his own expenses, the latter is entitled to the deduction. Under the change proposed by the hon. member, in order to be entitled to the deduction it is sufficient for the worker to earn his living alone. If he works, not only at a great distance from his boss's office, but far from his usual residence, he is entitled to the deduction.

Under such circumstances, a general deduction may be justified if expenses are incurred by the worker in the process of earning his living. But the proposed amendment generates another type of injustice because, as I have told the member, it is only necessary to work in a location away from home. So, if a man lives 100 miles from Toronto but works in the latter city, he will be entitled to a deduction under the terms of the amendment moved by the hon. member. It may be argued that he is entitled to a deduction under these circumstances, but is it not a fact that the man who lives in Toronto and performs the same work should be allowed the same deduction?

There is something else to be considered in the latter's case. We come to the abnormal conclusion that the unmarried worker with no dependent is not entitled to the deduction. In fact, the amendment merely states that the worker must live far from a town where, and I quote in English:

[English]

—he maintained a self-contained domestic establishment ... in which he resided and actually supported a spouse or a person dependent upon him for support and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption—

[Translation]

Only those in the circumstances described will be entitled to the deduction. Where, indeed, one must ask, is the justice of this? Clearly, a man's living expenses are the same whether he has a family, lives far from his place of work or is single.

Briefly, the employee has to be specifically informed as to whether, in all fairness, he is entitled to the deduction. Without singing the praises of the white paper on tax reform, it can be said that it does seek to establish a much fairer taxation system, and that it recognizes the salaried worker's right to living expenses. Paragraph 2.12 of the white paper reads as follows:

[English]

The government proposes to make more provision in the law for the expenses legitimately incurred in earning wages or salaries. However, it has reached the conclusion that claims for expenses on the broad bases suggested by the commission would either impose record keeping on millions of employees or deny them the ability to submit acceptable claims.

[Translation]

That is those who do not keep their bills and receipts.

[English]

It would also produce an almost impossible processing task in tax administration with inevitably long delays in making refunds. Consequently the government proposes that general limits be retained on the expenses that can be deducted from employment income but that a general deduction be provided.

[Translation]

I insist on that. I continue:

[English]

—and somewhat greater recognition given to special situations where employees have to live for a period of time at a work site away from home.

[Translation]

That is an answer to the unfairness pointed out by the hon. member, since the white paper deals specifically with that situation where a single man or a married man with or without dependents must work, without any financial help from his employer and far from his home. And I emphasize the fact that the system proposed in the white paper will bring about results much fairer in such circumstances.

So, that led me to look for the rulings handed down under that section of the Income Tax Act, since I have heard about the differences between the deductions allowed the employers on the one hand, and, on the other, the wage-earners, and I wish to raise serious doubts with respect of the two different rulings rendered under that section. It is true that the rulings produced strange and varying results between the case of a construction supervisor and that of a worker. But the ruling was rendered in the lowest court, and I wish to point out that, if there were an appeal, it might give satisfactory results.

We then refer, and the hon. member did it himself in his remarks, to the way the following expression is construed:

• (5:20 p.m.)

[English]

—from the municipality where the employer's establishment to which he ordinarily reported for work was located—

[Translation]

I stress the word "ordinarily". I wonder whether, when some industry settles somewhere to perform a job of one or two weeks' or a few days' duration, it can be said that the employer's establishment is "ordinarily" located there. If there is an appeal in a case similar to that described by the hon. member, results might be different.

Mr. Speaker, on the whole, I am in agreement with the hon. member when he says that the provisions of the act are a little odd. The rulings made under that subsection are also odd, and perhaps the law does not justify them.

I hope that an appeal will be made soon, so that we may know the full implications of the act. We find, however, that the remedy proposed by the white paper is much fairer than would be some minor changes to certain sections of the act, which, although they correct many injustices, have also created many others. In fact, workers with a family or dependents, within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, may deduct the price of their meals when they work in a locality far from their homes, while single persons do not have this right.

I must say, however, that I am happy to note that some of those provisions are interesting and that certain groups, which the hon. member has mentioned, are ready to make representations on behalf of the wage-earners. I think it might be said that the reason why there is a difference in the way salaried workers and businessmen are treated is that in the past—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate my support for the motion introduced by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam). I do not intend to speak at any length on this subject or to use it as an opportunity to practise my French because I cannot at this stage imitate the effort of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan). Although I can offer him my congratulations on his very good effort in speaking French in this debate, I may have some other comments with respect to the content of his remarks this afternoon.

I think it is very timely, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution has been presented to the House just prior to the presentation of the budget by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) which is to come on Thursday next. Indeed, I hope it is possible to bring this motion to a vote this afternoon in order that it may have some influence on the Minister of Finance and the measures he will bring forward in his budget.

I think it is very important for us to take a look at the situation of various groups across Canada which are affected by the application and interpretation of our taxation laws. Whenever we find ways and means of improving the situation for a group of people or rectifying a wrong or error in the application of tax law, we should take advantage of the first possible opportunity to correct the situation.

Reference has been made in this debate to the white paper on taxation which is presently under study, and to the fact that some proposals contained in the white paper deal with the situation of employees. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is always commendable to consider these matters; but, at the same time, people working in the calendar year 1970 will have to live with the present tax law, and whenever we find it possible to deal with problems that have been drawn to our attention, I think we should take advantage of the first opportunity to do so.

Everyone, I think, believes in reform, but one does not put it into effect by putting it off until tomorrow. I think the real measure of one's belief in and dedication to reform is one's willingness to take action now. The example that was drawn to the attention of various hon. members of the House of Commons and the Royal Commission on Taxation a number of years ago involves the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Employees Association, the bargaining agent for a large number of employees employed by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool which, of course, is an organization very well known to hon. members. The association has drawn to the attention of the Royal Commission on Taxation and various hon. members of this House the problem facing a number of employees who are engaged in construction work and a number of existing anomalies. Reference has also been made in this debate to the situation involving two men who live side by side and who may go to work at the same place. One is a foreman and the other simply working under his direction. Yet these two people will be treated differently as the result of the application of the present law.

I should also draw to the attention of hon. members that the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Employees Association was not taking issue with the interpretation of the law as such. They are asking for a change in the law because of certain facts and because of the interpretation that has been placed upon the law as it exists. Thus, in my opinion, consideration ought to be given to the situation of people working away from home.

It is highly questionable whether the living allowance provided to certain employees can really be classified as income. A change in the law is badly needed in these circumstances. I hope it will be possible to bring the resolution to a vote in order that members can express themselves on the subject and have an opportunity to correct an injustice suffered by a number of people who are presently employed by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. Certainly, there would be implications affecting other employees in other parts of the country. I trust the House will express its support for the motion.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say on this subject. It seems to me that the malfunctioning of the act, or whatever one might wish to call it, is an example of one kind of difficulty we encounter in this country, the result of a certain remoteness from various events which touch people's lives. Perhaps this causes them annoyance rather than real hardship. It is only a slight hardship, not to be able to deduct the cost of a lunch or one meal a day, when reckoning income tax. It would probably not make or break anybody. But it does seem on the face of it to be stupid. In a situation such as the hon. member has described, what could be more natural than for an employee who is a long way from his employer's place of business to need to eat sometimes? Why should he not be allowed to deduct the cost of the meal simply because he is a long way from his employer's place of business? I fail to understand it.

I hope that whether or not the motion before us goes through today, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and his minions in the back rooms will devote a good deal of attention to it. There is nothing dark or sinister about the changes which the hon. member feels should be made. The federal government will not lose hundreds of millions of dollars; no greasy, cigar-smoking multi-millionaire in a Cadillac will be getting away with expenses to which he is not entitled. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) sees this every day, I suppose, in his constituency, but we do not in mine and I am sure they do not in Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Talking about expense accounts and looking at the proposals which some of the minions in the back rooms of the Department of Finance have produced and placed in the hands of the minister in the form of the white paper on tax reform, it occurs to me that though many of them contain good ideas, others are the product of inquisitorial minds which decline to assume that most people in this country are honest, that most people are not trying to get anything for nothing. Specifically, the new tax proposals would deny all allowances for expense accounts. This is the proposal which has been made. I purposely brought up the image of the cigar-smoking millionaire driving around in a Cadillac. We want to get after these people and cut down some of their expense accounts. But when people with logical but somewhat insular or protective minds begin to formulate policy proposals, they come up with something along the lines I have just mentioned.

In Winnipeg we are fortunate to have some medical people of high calibre. During the year and a half in which I have been in this House I had never been the subject of the slightest pressure from them, on any matter, until we got into this expense account proposal. Doctors at every level in Winnipeg and Manitoba have been writing to me asking whether the government could not be a little selective in this proposal. How are doctors to upgrade themselves if they cannot attend conventions and claim legitimate expenses? I have had letters from engineers asking how they can be expected to keep up their qualifications as they go through life, if they cannot associate with other engineers at conventions or take courses and upgrade their knowledge.

Are these expenses not as legitimate as the expense of going to school? Concessions can be misused, of course, but it is the job of the taxation department to see that they are not. It is up to the legal people to see that the tax laws are not broken. A country cannot be run on the basis that everybody is a crook, trying to get away with illegitimate expenses. The section of the white paper to which I have referred is a perfect example of the stupidity to which attention was called in the complaint put forward by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam).

There is another area in which the same kind of nasty, suspicious mind is at work. I refer to the business of evaluating everything in a house. I know there are people who have made fortunes through misusing personal goods, trafficking in pictures, and so on. They should be paying taxes, as should any other speculator, when they make it their business. But I am thinking now of the average person. To have someone enter his house and evaluate everything in it, and allow him $1,000 a year appreciation on the value of his house, is unacceptable to my way of thinking. This appears to work out at 4 per cent on $25,000. For some time inflation has been running at a little more than 4 per cent. A value of $25,000 is not out of the way for a house in this day and age. So we are not giving the owner anything: he owns his own house, and the proposal is to charge him any capital gain he may make on it.

Then you have these snoopers going in and putting a value on a man's personal property and telling him that if he sells it, trades it or dusts it off he will have to pay the government something. It seems to me that a long time ago I read something about this in the Domesday Book. It used to be fashionable in England 1,000 years ago. They got rid of that concept about the time of Edward the Confessor, and it is time we rejected this sort of concept being brought into Canada.

There must be a way of being reasonable about these things, of getting taxes from those who are trying to be unreasonable while leaving the average man of good will in a position in which he can live his life without looking over his shoulder at some nameless, faceless government which by and large is doing a good job to protect his rights. It is the sort of proposal to which I have called attention, which undermines the faith of the ordinary man in his government, in the good will of his government and in the ability of his Member of Parliament to do anything on his behalf.

[Mr. Osler.]

• (5:40 p.m.)

I am not a lawyer, and this change may not be technically possible in the form suggested. If it is possible, I think the change should be made. If it is not, the Minister of Finance should pay attention to what has been proposed in the motion and have his backroom boys amend the law in an appropriate manner.

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam) for bringing this motion forward. I have for many years been informed about this injustice by people in my area. Many labourers complain to me about this unjust tax. It seems strange that it should apply only to labourers and not to foremen on the job.

I appreciate that these people are suffering an injustice. In the first place, they are put to added expense if they are living miles away from home. We all realize the extra cost involved in this. I had never before appreciated the great disadvantage to which they are put by this injustified tax, which seems so unnecessary. This is especially so when the foremen, the man in charge of the job, is not compelled to pay it whereas the labourers are.

Members of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool Employees Association have drawn this injustice to the attention of Members of Parliament across the country. I am very happy that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain has introduced this motion and I hope that the House will allow it to come to a vote. Since every hon. member has spoken in favour of the motion, this is an injustice that should cease forthwith. Its existence is beyond me. I will take no further time in the hope that the House will allow the motion to go forward and thus correct an injustice suffered by the labouring people of this country.

Mr. Philip G. Givens (York West): Mr. Speaker, unlike my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) I am not one of those guys who smokes a greasy cigar—though I am not sure what he means by a greasy cigar—or a smelly pipe. Neither do I see what is wrong with driving around in a Cadillac. I used to drive around in a Cadillac when I was employed by the city of Toronto—a chauffeur-driven Cadillac. I guess my wife also thought, as the hon. member does, that there is something wrong with that and she humbled me twice a week: after the chauffeur had driven the car off the driveway she made darned sure that I carried out the garbage.

As I told the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the other day when I was riding in his car, there is one thing wrong with riding in a car like that: when you lose the next election, the car stops coming to your door. I lost the next election and blew my chauffeur and the whole deal. Now I do not drive around in a Cadillac any more. But let me assure the hon. member that there is nothing wrong with driving around in a Cadillac, and especially is this so when you are driving around at somebody else's expense.

I cannot support the motion moved by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam). I think that one of the terrible things from which we suffer in this modern state is a multiplicity, a plethora of exemptions and deductions. We are cursed with them. There are exemptions that are peripatetic, exemptions that are casual and exemptions that are isolated.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre says that everybody is honest, that everybody will give the government a fair shake, and that we should not snoop into this or that. I should like to tell him that the amount of pilfering in this country from stores, businesses and various organizations is a national scandal. I wish I had known beforehand that this discussion was coming up today, because I would have liked to bring to the House statistics to indicate how dishonest a lot of people really are. The effect of this dishonesty on many businesses is much worse than any Benson white paper could possibly be. This is due to the basic dishonesty of human beings. I am afraid—

Mr. Southam: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's remarks in so far as they apply to this motion, but what I do not understand and should like him to explain is how he qualifies his insinuation that the employees of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool are dishonest in their request that the income tax law be amended in this way in order to remove the discrimination that exists. The hon. member has heard other colleagues of his in this House agree with the motion. I do not think there is any dishonesty implied here.

Mr. Givens: Mr. Speaker, I was not accusing the hon. member of stealing, and neither was I accusing the people that he is speaking for. I was just making a general statement in reply to a comment made by my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre, who stated that people were so honest that these exemptions and deductions can be justified, and that people receive justice in this way.

I do not think you can get justice by multiplying the exemptions and deductions that are permitted under the income tax law at the moment. According to the tax law, there is a difference between a self-employed person and one who works for wages. This is something that as I have gone through business life I have never been able to understand. Why should people who are self-employed be treated differently from those who are salaried or receive wages? For example, how can you determine the cost of a meal, whether eaten in a catering establishment or on the job? I suppose if you get a chit from a restaurant, this would be one way. But how much can one eat? Is a grilled cheese sandwich different from a steak, and is its cost deductible? I do not think that one meal would make much difference; but when you multiply it by the number of working days in a year, in view of the way some people eat the cost could amount to several hundred dollars.

I cannot support the motion for reasons of this kind. This motion typifies the desires of people who think they can right an injustice by opposing the raising of revenues, and who always favour chipping away at revenues on some pretext or other. I do not think the workers in the west will get justice in this way. I do not think you can get justice by making exemptions and deductions, by making exceptions to exceptions to exceptions. If I had my way I would scrap all exemptions and deductions and start again from scratch.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Does he think that a grilled cheese sandwich should be treated differently from a steak?

Mr. Givens: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should beef about that suggestion or not, but obviously there is a difference between a grilled cheese sandwich and a steak. I am wondering why some people should be able to eat at the expense of the taxpayers while others are not. This kind of situation can be perpetuated ad infinitum, and I think it is wrong. If you are self-employed that is one thing; if you are on salary or wages, that is another; if you are a Member of Parliament, that is still another. I do not think we should change the law in the manner suggested by the hon. member's motion. I think that in a large industrial area such as the one I come from, the adoption of this kind of motion would create many more problems than it would cure.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, although not for the usual motives, I should like to assure the proposer of this motion that in speaking to it I am not going to kill it with kindness, because hopefully it will come to a vote and I will have the opportunity to vote against it.

Before commenting on the resolution I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) on his tour de force en français. It was a remarkable performance and one for which he is indeed to be congratulated almost as much as one might congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) for working his way around to the point where the value of a lunch became the value of a house. I do not know how many cigar-smoking, Cadillac driving millionaires he knows or I know, but I think they are the exception. Even the proposition that came to us from the officials of the tax department in respect of this question amounts to attacking a mosquito with a sledgehammer.

I am inclined to think that there is a great element of overkill in the white paper proposals which would dispose almost entirely of many of the items in valid expense accounts and convention attendance to which the hon. member alluded. This motion proposes an amendment to section 11(9a) of the Income Tax Act. If the amendment were adopted by the passage of this motion on second reading, this part of the section would read:

> An amount expended in respect of a meal consumed by an officer or employee shall not be included in computing the amount of a deduction under subsection (6) or (9) unless the meal was consumed during a period while he was required by his duties to be away, for a period of not less than 12 hours, from the municipality where—

Then we get the change.

> —he maintained a self-contained domestic establishment in which he resided and actually supported a spouse or a person dependent upon him for support and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption—

This would be followed by the words as they are in the act:

> —and away from the metropolitan area, if there is one, where it was located.

I am not sure what the metropolitan areas are in the constituency of Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, but this proposal would present some problems to people living in our larger cities. The first reason I would oppose it is, basically, that there is a built-in discrimination against persons who are maintaining a domestic establishment in which they support people related to them either by blood, marriage or adoption. Perhaps the hon. member would explain at some point why he chose to discriminate against at least most bachelors who are not supporting in their household someone related to them by blood, marriage or adoption. It does not seem to me that this discrimination makes a great deal of sense.

The second reason I would oppose it is that the main thrust of the resolution, even if it were corrected to eliminate the objection I have raised, would be that an employee would have it within his judgment whether or not he would arrange his affairs in order to take advantage of this deduction. The onus or initiative would be on him to determine, of course, where he lived in relation to his job. The way it is now, it is up to the employer whether he wishes to send the employee away from his regular domicile in order to perform a given function.

In this way a man regularly employed, for example in the city of Regina, could unquestionably determine that he would like to live in the doubtless more amenable surroundings of Moose Jaw and commute regularly to work. He would be entitled, provided he was not a bachelor, to support within his home someone related to him by blood, marriage or adoption and qualify under the proposal for the deduction of his travelling expenses.

If the tomato growers from the Niagara peninsula have something to contribute to the debate, perhaps they would move to their own seats and do so from there. I should be glad to give up the floor to the hon. expert any time he wants it.

Mr. Whelan: I just want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member is as accurate about the topic on which he is now speaking as he is about geography, his remarks should be stricken from the record.

Mr. Mahoney: I must apologize to the hon. member for placing Windsor in the Niagara peninsula, and I am not too sure how many will not forgive me for that. I apologize in any case, sir. Another anomaly in the motion is that it is presented on behalf of the Wheat Pool Employees Association and endorsed by the Wheat Pool itself. It seems to me that with a little bit of agreement on attacking someone other than the government to change the Income Tax Act in order to accommodate their own desires, they could very rapidly, by the use of their collective bargaining processes, avail themselves of the advantages offered under section 5(2) of the Income Tax Act. That section was adopted in 1957 and it is one with which I am sure the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu) is familiar. I say this inasmuch as it deals with construction employees. Under that section construction workers may exclude from their income, under the circumstances spelled out—I am sure these people would have no difficulty falling under this provision—allowances paid by their employers to cover travelling expenses, meals and lodging, and so on, between their regular residence and the site of the construction work.

On the introduction of this measure into the House the then Minister of Finance, Hon. Donald Fleming, pointed out the very danger we are encountering when we start to consider ad hoc amendments to the Income Tax Act in order to deal with a very special and particular circumstance. At page 2327 of Hansard for 1957-58, volume 3, the then Minister of Finance said:

> We have given to this plea of the construction workers very careful study and have brought forward this amendment, not without misgivings in regard to the difficulties of administration which might present themselves. I would, however, ask the committee to bear in mind that there has been no opportunity for giving consideration to the position of other workers who may consider that their tax position should be regarded as equivalent to that of the construction worker in the view embodied in the present clause.

So today we have another group of workers who feel they are entitled to special treatment and that the proposals on tax reform—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, ADMINISTRATION, POWERS, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Greene that Bill C-190 to amend the National Energy Board Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was suggesting that when a commodity, in this case energy, is in demand in the United States or in some other area, we try to obtain a better deal than we have been getting. For example, we might tie gas sales in with oil sales; we might make one sale conditional upon the other. Gas is in demand and is in relatively shorter supply than oil. If we are to export gas to the United States, we might try to make oil sales part of the deal. I think this would be good business. Our neighbours to the south, the Yankee traders, are pretty shrewd businessmen and would probably do something of a similar nature if the situation were reversed.

I should like briefly to discuss another idea. Rather than move our energy such as water, gas, oil and power to the big cities or other places for manufacturing purposes, sometimes it might be more sensible to move industry and people to the sources of energy. It would seem to me to be only reasonable that on occasion we consider this approach.

Cities are becoming congested; traffic is a continual problem. We have built up urban ghettos where there are crime waves and a network of social problems which the smaller centres do not have. Recently I read that industry in Great Britain has been encouraged to move out into the country or to more rural areas. It seems to me this would be a sensible approach to take in this country, at least in part. We might on occasion move the people and industry to the power, rather than moving the power to people and industry in the cities.

The United States is proposing a continental energy policy. If the United States really believes in this policy on a reciprocal basis, I think it would behoove that country to encourage some industry to move to our sources of energy rather than expect our water, power, gas, and so on to move to centres of United States industry. If the United States really believes in a continental policy, and if Canada has an advantage because of our raw materials, we might conceivably use this as an approach in solving the over-all problem of industry in North America. I strongly suggest that we use our abundance of energy resources as a lever in order to make a better deal in respect of any future agreements with the United States.

If private business will not develop industry in Canada, where there is a great amount of natural and relatively cheap power, I suggest we look carefully into having the Canada Development Corporation build industry in these resource areas. We could tie our industrial growth in with private industry in this connection. As an example, when the CCF government was in power in Saskatchewan it underwrote the bonds in order to finance the building of the pipe plant in the city of Regina. This was a private enterprise backed by provincial government funds. That plant is a particularly productive and going concern. In fact, at the present time in Saskatchewan, where much of the industry is stagnant, this particular industry has expanded.

Just a few days ago an oil man suggested to me that if a decision were made to build a pipeline from the Mackenzie basin to Chicago, they did not know where they would obtain the pipe with which to build the several thousand miles of pipeline required. In the development of industry in Canada I think there is room for more and continued use of our own energy resources. Instead of importing many of the required items, I think we should take advantage of the opportunity to produce more of them ourselves. In this regard I believe that in co-operation with business we might be able to create the industries to produce some of these items. However, if private enterprise is not interested, I would suggest that in a federal company sense we might ourselves build some of these plants.

We should seriously consider this approach rather than just making a deal whereby we give away our raw energy resources to the United States and do not receive an equivalent long-lasting benefit in return. In effect, we will be hewers of wood and drawers of water forever, in the economic sense, if we do not adopt such a policy. If we want to convert Canada into a modern, industrial state we will have to look seriously at some of these aspects in regard to power in our own country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, APPLICATION, OIL AND GAS COMMITTEE

The House resumed from Friday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Greene that Bill S-5, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and of the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Aiken (page 3591).

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this bill is very important because of its principle and substance as shown in clauses 3 and 6. Clause 3 makes it clear that the principle of Bill S-5 applies "in respect of oil and gas in any of the following areas", and then it states that these include the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. The clause then provides:

> —or if the administration of the oil and gas resources in the area has been transferred by law to, any of the ten provinces of Canada.

From that clause we clearly understand the intent of the government to apply the principles of this bill to practically all the areas of Canada included in the provinces and the territories. Clause 6 covers a vast field because it authorizes the minister or such other person as the Governor in Council deems suitable to exercise such powers and perform such duties as may be necessary for the removal of oil or gas from any area that is outlined in clause 3.

As I said, it is not only an important bill because of its provisions under which a great deal of authority can, will and undoubtedly must be exercised, but it is one in which I find myself keenly interested from an historical point of view because in discussing clauses 3 and 6 we are dealing not only with matters of drilling and pollution but also those of jurisdiction and sovereignty.

In making my own small, personal contribution to the debate I should like to touch on all these factors. As I said, I am keenly interested in this matter because, if my memory serves me correctly, some 25 years ago I moved a motion in the British Columbia legislature foreseeing the problems that have developed in the past quarter of a century and asking that the province of B.C. and the federal government get together to discuss the question of jurisdiction and sovereignty. My motion asked that they go into all the details of the issuance of licences, fees for drilling and the question of royalties; and if they could not get together or reach a satisfactory conclusion, that the matter be referred to the Supreme Court, and pending a decision of the Supreme Court that the government, temporarily at least, exercise jurisdiction but put the money into escrow until such time as the Supreme Court reached a decision.

I mentioned that matter to show that my interest is not new in this most important phase of our economy, and is not just a first interest in the act, the principles of which are espoused throughout the length and breadth of this country. Other speakers have mentioned time after time the dangers of oil pollution and the requirement for the powers which are outlined in this bill. I believe it is not possible to overemphasize the seriousness of oil pollution. It was only recently that the Society for Pollution and Environmental Control put out a most interesting and factual document. Mention has been made of their report by other speakers, but I feel that as a certain amount of detail was not given I should take the opportunity at this time to mention it.

As I say, a study was made and a report was published. I hope it was sent to all members of this House, because in the analysis of the problems and dangers of oil pollution to Canada they pointed out a significant, but I think not too well known fact, that in the three years preceding the wreck of the Torrey Canyon 91 tankers were stranded in various parts of the world and 238 tankers were involved in collisions. If we make a breakdown of the record of this society, we find that in the world at large tankers have been involved in potentially serious accidents on an average of twice a week. According to the available information, during the past 10 years 488 tankers of 30,000 tons dead weight or more that are registered with the American Bureau of Shipping were involved in 573 collisions, an average of one a week, and in 43 of these accidents oil pollution was a possibility.

I think that in order to understand the importance of this bill and the principles contained therein we should note the facts which are available to us, especially the knowledge that the largest number of accidents of tankers carrying oil—83 per cent of them in the last ten years—occurred either close to shore or in ports, areas of the greatest economic, aesthetic and nutritional importance to mankind. We also have to keep in mind that the size of tankers is ever on the increase. Unfortunately, as we have learned to our bitter regret from the experience of recent days and weeks, there is a lack of technology on how to handle oil spillage and oil pollution. But particularly is there a lack of knowledge and technology in handling oil spillage or pollution, tanker collisions or collisions with icebergs in cold weather and Arctic waters. I was most interested recently to read in more than one scientific magazine that scientists state that the potential biological and environmental damage which could result from oil spillage would be most serious in Canada's Arctic. The scientists maintain that the climate will prolong the existence of spilled oil and oxidation and dispersion, which may take several months in temperate climates, will take years in the Arctic.

These reports have been the reason for some of the knowledge I have acquired in recent months. Because of the statements being made by our own scientists and others, because of the future development which we can foresee in the Arctic, particularly with the new field opening up with the second voyage of the Manhattan, I am glad that at long last the government is moving to exact the necessary statutory provisions which will give them the power and the control necessary to not only develop our technology on oil pollution and control the drilling of oil wells in all areas of our country but to bring down regulations that will apply to the vehicles, be they tankers or pipelines, through which oil will move throughout Canadian lands and waters.

I do not think I am overemphasizing the importance of the application of this bill to our Arctic waters. I was most intrigued in reading the publication that was put out not so long ago by Dome Petroleum Limited. I think most of us have not recognized the potential of the Arctic islands. According to the facts, figures and analyses made by Dome Petroleum Limited, the recoverable reserves of northern Canada are 105 billion barrels of oil and 450 trillion cubic feet of gas. In the Arctic it is estimated that we have 85 billion barrels of oil and 510 trillion cubic feet of gas. When we recognize that the water between Greenland and Ellsemere Island is open nine months of the year, and that there is now the potential use of reinforced tankers, it appears there should not be any problems of access to the eastern Arctic islands on a year round basis. This adds to my gratitude in the government having seen fit to take some action through the introduction of Bill S-5.

Mention has already been made—and undoubtedly we will hear a great deal more, not only in this House and in the other place but in the press about it—of jurisdiction and sovereignty. I am glad that this phase, which is of importance to principles contained in this bill, was referred at least so far as the province of British Columbia is concerned to the Supreme Court of Canada. I believe I am correct in saying that there was a general understanding that although the referral was as between the federal government and the province of British Columbia, the decision of the Supreme Court would have application to any province with a coast line, and to the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and the Arctic islands as well. I regret very much that apparently there is still a blockade to arriving at an understanding between the federal government and the provinces.

I remember very well the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on Monday, December 2, 1968. I believe it would be as well to refresh our memory as to what the Prime Minister stated. He pointed out that the question of offshore mineral rights had been a matter of controversy for some time. He commented on the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. He commented on the fact that the court's opinion was that the federal government is entitled to proprietory and other rights in new areas offshore from the historic boundaries of British Columbia, and said that the Supreme Court confirmed the view of the federal government. But in that speech the Prime Minister said this:

> I am announcing today certain steps the government is taking and certain proposals we are making to the provinces which we believe to be both important and equitable.
> In the light of the Supreme Court's unanimous finding in favour of the Crown in right of Canada, on the basis of principles that would appear to be substantially applicable to the east coast as well as to the west coast, the main problem becomes one of delineating the areas concerned to meet the practical requirements of mineral resource administration.

I emphasize the remarks of the Prime Minister in 1968 on mineral resource administration and the promise that was made in December, 1968, because the Prime Minister also said:

> We are offering to work out in conjunction with each of the coastal provinces a method whereby they would, in effect, administer any offshore mineral rights under federal jurisdiction on the landward side of the mineral resource administration lines.

• (8:30 p.m.)

This statement of the Prime Minister in 1968 has a most important bearing on whether or not it will be possible to make the most efficient application of the principles embodied in Bill S-5 until this management, the granting of leases, the collection of fees and royalities has been worked out with the provinces. Because it has not been worked out we find ourselves in difficulty almost all the time. Mention has already been made of the unfortunate squabble, if I may put it that way, between the province of British Columbia and the federal government as to who has the power for drilling in the Georgia Strait. Heaven forbid there should ever be any drilling in the Georgia Strait, in the immediate offshore waters of British Columbia or any other offshore waters. If there is, there must be control and it must rest in one hand—that hand has already been declared by the Supreme Court to be that of the government of Canada. Bill S-5 is an indication that the federal government agrees with the Supreme Court.

Although many months and indeed years have passed, there is no indication of an intensification in recognizing the necessity of working out the most minute detail of the differences between the provinces and the federal government, of working out a method of administration and management. I sincerely hope that as a result of the introduction of this bill—I am certain of its acceptance in principle—we will see as a necessary step, a corollary to this bill and the application of its principles, the working out of the problems which still exist. Of course, that is just a problem of jurisdiction within the boundaries of our country. We have also heard a great deal, and will in the future, about the question of sovereignty over the Arctic waters.

I am glad that there seems to be a growing tendency on the part of the government to make clear to all countries what it maintains is Canada's sovereignty and that it intends to enforce Canadian laws and regulations—there will be many new ones under Bill S-5—relating to the maintenance of water quality and pollution prevention and control. I maintain that we require even more action than we have seen in recent weeks in order to make our sovereignty known in unmistakable terms to all countries of the world.

We know, or should know, that the continental shelf doctrine states that the resources of the sea bed and subsoil belong to the nation. That principle was incorporated in the United Nations Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea in 1958. Although it is a little more debatable, I think we have an additional argument on sovereignty where this bill will have a great impact, and additional strength in that the World Court in 1951 held that the base lines system was permissible and legal and that a country was justified in using it even though the waters which were formerly part of the high seas became subject to domestic ownership. This also became part of the Law of the Sea by the 1958 Conference of the United Nations at Geneva.

If this bill is to mean anything, if its objectives are to be accomplished, I hope we will immediately work out our problems regarding jurisdictional administration, division of royalties and other questions of financial return.

I hope we will more emphatically make clear the sovereignty of our waters; that we will keep in mind the absolute importance for the future of our country and of mankind to enforce laws regarding the dangers of pollution, and to acquire the technology necessary to control it when it occurs.

Mr. Speaker, as I draw to a conclusion I should like to emphasize, not in my own words because I have read words that explain it much better than I can, this fact. I remember, as I think the majority of us do, the adventure of the sea lion which a few years ago escaped into Lake Ontario from a zoo at a Canadian summer resort. I remember reading a comment on that misadventure which said that the sea lion lived for several months in Lake Ontario and died shortly after it was recaptured. The reason for death was malnutrition. There was general public sympathy for the sea lion, but I believe there should have been more concern over the condition of our lake in which the sea lion starved to death. I cannot think of a better commentary on why we in this House of Commons, with our responsibilities, should not be paying the deepest attention to these matters and to a bill with implications and principles such as we see in Bill S-5.

So this evening, Mr. Speaker, when man boasts of reaching the moon, let us hope he does not forget the oceans and rivers and streams that flow by our door. It is indeed a strange fact, that while we are probing outer space for other forms of life, we are neglecting one of the foundations of our own existence. I say it is time we smartened up, and I think this bill is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my voice to those of the many members who have spoken in this debate on the dangers of pollution in Arctic waters. It is a very serious problem and one which this country must meet very quickly.

This bill is pertinent in two ways. It would be pertinent to the possibility of oil pollution in connection with drilling on the sea floor, and it would be pertinent in relation to the pipelining of cured oils from island to island, to the mainland or to seaports in Baffin Bay. If the Panarctic consortium should strike a large deposit of oil at Banks, Melville, Ellesmere. Axel Heiberg or one of the other islands of the high Arctic, we would face the problem of pipelining it out on the sea floor, if that should prove possible, or of finding some other means of transportation.

However, Mr. Speaker, that which has most interested Canadians recently, the voyage of the Manhattan, is not affected by this bill. It is to this aspect that I wish to address these few remarks. I am a little disturbed by the course the debate has taken. As I said earlier, I share completely the feelings of many hon. members who have spoken and who are afraid of the havoc which could be wrought in the north by oil pollution. Unfortunately, instead of leading the House into a discussion of this bill which is designed to give Canada control of operations on the sea bed, several hon. members have turned this debate into one on our sovereignty over the Arctic waters. I see no connection between these two subjects.

I shall refer briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) who moved the amendment to hoist this bill for six months, and the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) which followed. On February 13, as reported at page 3590 of Hansard, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said:

> I think there are two matters that have to be considered seriously, not as to the detail or content of the bill itself, but as to its general effect. The first is what I consider a derogation of the sovereignty of Canada in our northern waters by virtue of a definition in this bill.

On the same day, as reported at page 3595 of Hansard, the hon. member for Peace River, in referring to the bill said:

> In my opinion it could have a serious affect on the Northwest Territories. Both by expression and implication it amounts to a serious diminution of Canadian sovereignty over the waters of the Arctic.

Other than being concerned with operations on the sea bed such as drilling, which may pollute those waters, I contend this bill has little to do with the waters of the Arctic. It does not affirm our sovereignty over the Arctic waters between our islands either negatively or positively. That is an entirely different issue. I do not want to belabour the point but, briefly, there are three areas of concern touching our sovereignty in the north.

One area concerns our sovereignty over the land, and there I think our concern ought to be practically zero because we are not challegend at the moment, and provided we are not so foolish as to lose interest in our northern islands and give them to other people our sovereignty there is assured. The second area of concern has to do with the waters between the islands. I have spoken at length in this House on the matter because I am very concerned about it. I feel that by way of a declaration that they are internal waters or territorial waters, the government ought to exert control over the Northwest Passage.

[Mr. St. Pierre.]

We must be in a position to inspect oil tankers or submarine tankers which may go through in the foreseeable future. This country, and this country only, is in a position to exert that sovereignty. However, this is not what Bill S-5 is concerned about. It relates to the continental land mass of the Yukon and Northwest Territories as well as the Arctic archipelago which lies above it. Originally, the bill said nothing more. When it returned to this House, subclause (b) had been added to clause 3. It reads:

> —those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada to a water depth of two hundred meters or beyond that limit to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of the sea bed and subsoil thereof—

That is nothing more than the commonly accepted definition of continental shelf formulated at the 1958 Geneva Conference. It relates, and I cannot stress this too strongly, solely to the sea bed and minerals which may be found on or beneath it. As a matter of fact, an interesting example has been put forward by international legal experts and it is based on this definition of the Geneva Conference. The example has to do with a continental shelf and its resources. The question that was asked was: Do those rights which extend to the subsoil and soil of the continental shelf extend to the marine life which may be on the shelf?

There was a dispute as to whether one's rights extended to a lobster. Some said that a lobster may not be part of the shelf's resources but a crab is, the argument being that the crab continues living on the sea bed while the lobster flits free, so to speak, of the sea bed and therefore is not necessarily part of the resources of the sea bed.

Hon. members may think I am raising a trivial example. Perhaps it is trivial, but it is very pertinent to the point that the sea bed convention concerned itself with waters lying above the sea bed. The rights alluded to relate purely to mineral exploration and development and, to a very minor extent—so minor that I imagine it is of little concern in the Arctic—to any life which may be permanently on the sea bed itself.

I therefore feel that the submissions of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and the hon. member for Peace River may mislead those Canadians who are concerned about our having sovereign control over the Northwest Passage and who think we ought to decide regulations governing the safety of any ships which might pass through it.

My closing remarks will touch on the subject of pollution. In previous remarks I alluded to the passage of the Manhattan and other supertankers through the Northwest Passage, and to the possibility that drilling for oil on the continental shelf may expose us to the hazards of oil pollution. The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development recommended very strongly that there be immediate research in Arctic waters to determine what the effect of hydrocarbon pollutants will be in those waters, because we do not know. As a matter of fact, the world is grossly uneducated as to the effect of hydrocarbon pollutants in any waters.

Even more so, we lack knowledge of the way in which these oils, particularly crudes, will behave in waters whose temperature ranges from 29 to 31 degrees Fahrenheit over most of the year. How long will they persist? What will be their action in the waters of the eastern Arctic, for example, in Lancaster Sound which is open for a few months of the year and lightly covered by winter ice for much of the year? It is only about this time of the year that the ice freezes to a depth of 12 feet.

What would be the effect further over in the M'Clure Strait which the Manhattan failed to negotiate, where the polar pack comes in with a depth of 20 feet, extremely hard ice built up in many layers? Perhaps while we are discussing this bill I should not mention shipping, since nothing is said in it about the passage of ships. But supposing there should be a spill from a pipeline into these waters: for how long would the oil be trapped beneath the ice? If it moved, where would it move?

I questioned the minister one day as to the committee's report. I must say his answer was of less than statuesque simplicity. He said many departments were involved and he hoped all would be well. I questioned the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) another day, and he suggested that in connection with the research now being carried out in Chedabucto Bay where the Arrow ran aground, Dr. Ian McTaggart Cowan might be able to extend his investigations north into the Arctic—perhaps! If that was not the meaning, it was the intent of his statement.

I was not satisfied with the answer given by either minister. I think it is pertinent to our discussion of this bill to strongly urge that the minister should prevail upon his colleagues, whether upon all five of them or upon whichever combination might be necessary, that they should quickly institute these studies. Knowledge is power. We need power to control pollution in the Arctic. Let us begin by seeking knowledge quickly—this year, this summer. Surely, studies can begin this summer on a subject which is not only of benefit to this country but is of potential benefit to the warm water countries of the world as well as to those nations which have polar seas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken before on the National Energy Board Act amendment. I find myself drawn into debate on the bill before us now because it is closely related, as to jurisdiction, with the National Energy Board measure. I am not saying that the National Energy Board has the jurisdiction which might be given to some body, for example a conservation committee, under this legislation. There is some question, of course, as to the exercise of control over pipelines. If a pipeline were to cross an interprovincial or interterritorial boundary, it would come under the jurisdiction of the Energy Board. I find myself wondering how the two bodies would resolve a conflict of jurisdiction or opinion with regard to a pipeline matter.

I was further drawn into the argument by the speech of the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) who has just completed his remarks. He has in my opinion totally misread the import of the remarks of my hon. friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) and my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). The act does make its own the wording of the Geneva Convention regarding the continental shelf. We must clearly understand the purpose of the act passed last year. It was an act defined as being for the protection and conservation of oil and gas as applied to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Now someone has said: We must tack on provision for the continental shelf wherever it may exist.

I do not think there was any doubt in anyone's mind as to the purpose of the act passed last year. Now it no longer applies. The whole northern purpose of the act is out. Not only is the title changed, but the emphasis has been broadened. Not only is it to control the production of oil and gas on land and on shore, particularly in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, but now we have added the continental shelf.

It is at this point that my hon. friends, both sound lawyers, if I may respectfully say so, say there has been introduced into the definition of this act an element of doubt. The Parliamentary Secretary, the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), and my hon. friends have all made reference to this question. Let us see just what the wording is.

(b) those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada to a water depth of 200 metres or beyond that limit to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of the seabed and the subsoil thereof.

This takes one out beyond what might normally be the surface territorial limits. It also introduces the possibility that there might be areas in the north where waters are deeper than 200 metres and where the superjacent waters would not admit of the exploitation of the natural resources of the sea bed and subsoil. This is the point. When the entire area under examination has not been explored and the precise depths have not been established, it becomes very dangerous to introduce definitions of this type into the act.

If the definition had had two parts, firstly, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and secondly, those coastal waters outside or not contained within that sector, you would then have two areas that were clearly mutually exclusive. The area of the Yukon and Northwest Territories is described and understood, but there is then a second part that tends to overrun the limits of the waters and includes a portion that might not be included within the continental shelf.

My colleagues have indicated that they fear that by introducing this definition the government has tended to weaken the arguments that Canada owns all of the north over which it has claimed entire sovereignty. I do not accept the argument put forward by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin that by putting forward our amendment and discussing the weakness of our case we have perhaps done Canada irreparable harm. Does the hon. member feel that if you have been a serious deficiency in a bill you should not speak up in order to correct the mistake made by the government? Perhaps the hon. member possesses the mentality that thinks that all the brains of the country are held in monopoly by members on the government side, that government supported by the administration is the ultimate authority.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West.]

Perhaps the hon. member would subscribe to the point of view that was expressed by a former Minister of National Health and Welfare when he first proposed a national pension plan for Canada. The minister was heard to say, "This plan has been produced by the best brains in Canada; the others don't know what they are talking about". The fact is that that plan had four different versions and there was no relationship between the first plan and the one that was finally introduced. Therefore, I feel the hon. member is doing us a disservice when he suggests that we are wrong.

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Mr. St. Pierre: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Because the hon. member has a question is no reason for interrupting. He can ask the question when I have finished.

Mr. Gibson: You are not the Speaker now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is obvious that the hon. gentleman does not aspire to that position, either.

Mr. Deakon: Get on with it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The contributions of the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Deakon) in this House are also noted for their infrequency. Perhaps he also thinks hon. members opposite have a monopoly on brains. As I was saying before the jackdaws crowed, our raising this point should not be taken as an indication that we have weakened Canada's position. It seemed to me that the purport of the hon. member's argument was that we had done Canada a disservice by pointing out this weakness. I do not think we have. I think there is another way to define what the government wants to do, without the introduction of this complication about which I have spoken.

Hon. members have indicated that it would have been better had the federal government been in a position to negotiate with those provinces which have continental shelves and are brought within the ambit of this bill. The bill does not affect Alberta or Saskatchewan, but I think that they, too, have an interest because all citizens of Canada have an interest in the outcome of this whole question of offshore mineral rights and the control thereof.

We are not concerned here only with the question of pollution; the bill goes far beyond pollution. Oil an gas conservation and production go far beyond pollution, as anyone who reads the new definition of a pipeline will see. Admittedly, one would have to use this legislation as the vehicle for controlling and finding safeguards against pollution in our offshore waters caused by exploration for oil, drilling for oil and subsequent production of oil and gas. I would also have thought that in addition to oil and gas we would have to consider controls that would have to be imposed as a result of the production of related materials, such as hydrocarbons and sulphur.

In any event, the view of my colleagues is that this bill should not be passed until an accord has been reached with the provinces on the matter. In effect, the federal government is asserting its authority here, even though it knows that it must make a deal with a number of the provinces. What the ultimate conclusion of the bargain will be, we do not know; the case for Nova Scotia may be quite different from that for British Columbia. Yet in all equity and fairness to Canadians, and to the citizens of the provinces concerned in particular, the settlement must be a uniform one.

Therefore, it seems to me that there is a strong case for deferring this bill until such time as the government has dealt with the matter. I do not see how the government can control pollution arising from offshore accidents to tankers under the terms of an act that deals with the conservation and production of oil and gas. The oil that was in the tanker recently wrecked off Nova Scotia had absolutely nothing to do with oil and gas that was produced on the continental shelf. This was an entirely different source of pollution.

I think there may be confusion in the minds of some hon. members who may think the act could serve as a vehicle for controlling offshore pollution by tankers. I hope this is not the case. However, it does seem to me that until an agreement is reached with the provinces, at least in principle, this bill is premature.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why this bill should be delayed, because it appears to be a step in the right direction. For a long time Canadians took for granted that there must be a dividing boundary somewhere in the far Arctic—my guess would be, probably around the pole somewhere—and that everything on the Russian side of the pole belongs to Russia and everything on the Canadian side belongs to Canada. That was a very simple assumption to make because nobody was going there anyway, so it really did not make much difference.

I would be interested, however, in knowing what the Russians have decided to be their boundary. They are not quite as naïve in respect of the Arctic as we are, and it is quite possible they have made some decision as to the boundary between Canada and the U.S.S.R. which is acceptable to them. I should like our government to indicate what that delineation might be, where the boundary is, and we can go on from there.

There is a general acceptance on the part of Canadians that we own the Arctic archipelago and are entitled to all the land in that area and the ice over it, and probably the transportation lanes through the ice. I was interested in the last day or two to note that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has again been playing that little game that Canadians are so prone to enjoy: he suggests we are the best; we are big, and we are important. In this regard he said that the United States could not protect its ships in the Arctic because they do not have the icebreakers. I am aware that a few years ago the Russians had an icebreaker that could travel many knots an hour breaking ice from six feet to twelve feet in depth. This made our icebreakers look pretty small. I think in fact their icebreaker was atomic-powered. If you remember, the Russians offered to break themselves into the port of Montreal and bring some of their ships in during the winter several years ago, but that offer was declined by Canada.

Recently I read an interesting article that may also have been read by other members. It referred to the fact that a ship, I believe owned by Australia, or perhaps by Sweden, had gone into the Antarctic and had stuck in the ice. It has been there for some length of time with several hundred people on board. The Russians have been trying to get to it, but have been unsuccessful. It was interesting that the United States has now been given permission to go into the icepack in the Antarctic in an attempt to get this ship out.

The United States does not seem to be the least bit worried about their icebreaker being able to work in that kind of ice. This indicates to me that they can probably do as well as we do in the Arctic if they are given the opportunity. The United States may have that opportunity unless we make some decisions fairly soon.

We have been told that we are the ones with the expertise in the Arctic. This makes everybody feel good, but probably it is not true. It certainly is not completely true: perhaps we should be told that as well. We are also told that we are giving consideration to this matter of our sovereignty in the Arctic and that the army is going to establish bases there. A few years ago when the radar chain—the Dew line—was established we were not even interested to the extent of maintaining our sovereignty there. In most cases we turned this operation over to the United States, with probably one Canadian there acting as an observer to maintain our claim to sovereignty in the area.

If we are serious about our development in the Arctic we will have to put people there. I am sympathetic to the feeling that the army is probably the most capable body to establish bases in that area and protect our claim to sovereignty, but it is necessary that we do so right away or we will wake up one morning to find that someone else has encroached on our sovereignty. This will probably be the consortium we have set up to drill for oil in the area.

The whole Arctic is very rich and most of its riches have been assessed. A lot of people from my riding are in the Arctic at all times. There are probably hundreds of people from the riding of Timiskaming in the Arctic in the summer. They are diamond-drilling and operating mining camps in that area. I was surprised to hear a nephew of mine, who worked several years ago in some of these places that we think of in a romantic sense, say that every rock you kick with your foot in the summertime contains heavy deposits of minerals including zinc and other metals. These minerals will eventually be produced there and will be of great importance in the development of the north.

We were not particularly concerned with the problems of the north and our sovereignty in that area until a former Minister of Northern Affairs established a consortium of a oil companies in conjunction with the federal government. This was a step in the right direction: it allowed Canadians to participate directly in the development of the area. It has now resulted in blocking out very large oil and gas reserves for the Canadian public.

There is a problem raised in respect of this bill regarding the division of jurisdiction in the north. We have the federal government in the territories, with provincial governments exercising sovereignty over the land adjacent to the sea where there is great interest in the continental shelf. Other members have mentioned the Law of the Sea, the decision of the Geneva convention in relation to the continental shelf and the complexities of that problem. The problem in the Arctic today is rather like the problem resulting from early inhabitants in this country who went to various parts of Canada and settled: as a result of being there, they claimed ownership of the area. Throughout most areas squatters claims were as good as any because of the application of the law of possession.

The suggestion that possession was nine-tenths of the law in establishing ownership was certainly borne out in many parts of Canada and has been the criteria for decisions as to ownership. Therefore, if we are bold enough to establish our rights to the Arctic archipelago, the seas between the islands and the mainland, and our rights in respect of the continental shelf in that area, we will probably have a good claim. If we do not establish that sovereignty in the north, a claim will be exercised, to some extent at least, by the people who take possession. To a great degree possession will be taken by companies based other than in Canada which have purchased large tracts of the area for exploration. They will be established there and will have some right to the gas and oil if such is found in the territories. These resources will in fact be lost to us.

We have also heard a great deal in the last few weeks about oil pollution. It is very easy to talk about oil pollution and the danger it will create in the Arctic. It scares the pants off anybody who thinks about the danger that exists in the Gulf of Mexico and other areas with warm climates and high water temperatures, such as California, and the dangers that exist in the colder waters off Nova Scotia and British Columbia. We cannot assess the dangers that exist from oil pollution in the north.

Oil pollution is almost as certain to follow as day follows night if we do not exercise extreme control over transportation facilities in the area. In my opinion, if this government was at all responsible it would quit playing around with Humble Oil and tankers in the Arctic. This attitude will lead, without doubt, to a tragedy there which will set back for many years the development of the area. The government should get on with the business of developing a pipeline from the coast, through the Northwest Territories, to bring oil into central Canada. In my opinion this would probably satisfy the minister's desire to establish a continental energy policy. I suggest, although this is not the inevitable result of establishing a pipeline, that if a pipeline were established from the Mackenzie River delta south to Edmonton even before a commodity is available to be carried in that pipeline, it would have a great deal of influence on the development of other pipelines such as the one contemplated across the Yukon and Alaska to the west coast.

It will have a great effect on whether or not it is considered to be to the advantage of the companies which wish to move this resource to even consider the development of tankers for the Arctic. I think if we have the foresight to instal a pipeline and put in the facilities, there would be many advantages. A small pipeline has been in existence in that vicinity for many years: it runs from Norman Wells through the Canol project. This oil line has proven to be feasible. The temperatures are not prohibitive for transportation by pipeline in that area.

The fact that we now have a very large reserve of natural gas will probably make the transportation of oil easier. I suggest that in Canada we should be thinking of building a pipeline either in consortium with the oil industry or, if necessary, alone. If the scientists and others who have spoken about the dangers from pollution in the Arctic are correct when they indicate that we have no method by which to cope with the pollution problem, it behooves all of us to consider an alternate method such as a pipeline from that area to connect with the existing transportation facilities out of Edmonton and through the oil and gas distribution system that is now in effect. This would mean we would have to run a pipeline across Canada as well. I think it is time consideration were given to this matter.

I have spoken to the officials of some pipeline companies. As recently as a week ago they told me that the cost of such a system was beyond their capability. The companies that are now transporting our oil from west to east into Ontario do not have the facilities to put in a reasonably sized pipeline to handle the requirements of eastern Canada which would make us less dependent on exports to the United States via a southerly route.

If we were to bring the known reserves from the Arctic through the Edmonton distribution point without having a system of disposing of it when it was brought into the normal stream, the situation would be chaotic. So I suggest the government should give consideration to a pipeline which, it seems to me, would eliminate the necessity of the use of surface and submarine tankers as well as the necessity of demanding that the Humble Oil Company take certain precautions in respect of the Manhattan. We are aware of the damage the Manhattan suffered. We are also aware of the desire of the Minister of Transport that the company instal emergency connections so that the oil may be pumped out of that ship if there should be an accident. I suggest we should not allow that ship to go back into the Arctic for the purpose of transporting oil if danger is contemplated.

I am not opposed to the United States government cooperating with us in examining the feasibility of this type of transportation, but all tankers are not similar to the Manhattan. Tankers which meet very minimum standards may be sailing in there. Even when sailing on the high seas, such tankers have been known to break up. One of them broke up on the high seas off the coast of Africa, where limited restrictions are in force. If such ships are taken into the Arctic, the situation could be chaotic. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) will have to co-operate in respect of the development of oil in that area. The problem is not so small that there will be any difficulty involved in having two ministers engaged in it.

These two ministers will have an opportunity to do something in respect of the development of Canada which will bring great rewards for many years to come. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) pointed out the large volume of oil that has already been assessed in that area. In my opinion the size of this resource should point up the necessity for establishing a reasonably sized pipeline from the Mackenzie delta. That area is free of ice for a sufficient number of months that we would not have the problems that exist in the Arctic. Certainly, such a program would eliminate some of the fears we have. Along such a pipeline communities would develop. Although I am sure the government will not change its policy, I was very interested to hear some of the arguments brought forward the other day by the oil lobby people in respect of the unfairness of the policy requiring the hiring of indigents in the area. They pointed out that this caused some difficulty. They stated that because of this fact they were not meeting the schedules they would like to meet. Tough bananas!

Mr. Greene: They do not have bananas up there.

Mr. Peters: That may be so, but it is too bad for these people. By law they must hire a certain number of the local inhabitants. Once these people are trained, I am sure there will be permanent employment for them if we use the resources we have. I suppose the building of a pipeline in the area would be a very expensive proposition. It would provide a good deal of temporary employment. Also, the operation of a pipeline on the permafrost would involve the employment of a number of employees on a permanent basis. It seems to me that everyone should be interested in the development of an orderly market for oil and gas. I believe it would be much better if the oil and gas could be introduced through a common denominator such as Edmonton or Calgary.

• (9:30 p.m.)

With such a point of connection with the existing facilities which will be bringing in oil from the north, we would be able to utilize and distribute more evenly the potential of the area from which we now receive the major part of our gas and oil. We would be able to extend and equalize the flow from both the Arctic and the local area which have been serving the needs of Canada and the United States for some years and which must have difficulty meeting the demand at peak periods. This difficulty would be partially solved if we added this large resource which in many cases will only be passing through the area.

I imagine that the Americans who are operating the oil discoveries in Prudhoe Bay would be willing to move their oil and gas resources through the same pipeline, through the Canadian distribution system, provided it found its way directly to the United States, with the transportation cost being the only requirement for its Canadians transmission. I think this system could be arranged. I believe we have been very shortsighted in the development of our resources.

We all agree that the danger of oil pollution in the Arctic is almost insurmountable. There is no question in my mind that if tankers in that area were to provide the major source of transportation, disaster would follow disaster. The ice in that area shifts very rapidly. There will be periods when channels which are not supposed to be clear will be clear, and periods when channels which are supposed to be clear will not be clear. A tanker getting stuck in that area will face the difficulties which experts indicate will always be with us. I suggest, therefore, that we send this matter to committee.

I should like the government to consider the establishment of an overland transportation facility to the Arctic. The resources in that area are immense, and because they are immense we will all live to see the day when we establish cities in the Arctic such as the cities of Siberia. These cities will not be established there as the result of someone's dream, but as a result of economic need and feasibility.

Cities covered with glass have been recommended for the Arctic before. They are now in existence in many areas of Russia. It has been interesting—and I have heard much criticism of it—to watch Ab Douglas as he travels across Siberia, to find that Siberia is not the Arctic as we know it and that the development that has taken place in that area is based mainly on the resource industry. I am sure this kind of development will take place in Canada if the government will show initiative by introducing legislation which will make it feasible.

I do not expect the present government to set about drawing up a plan for an orderly development of the resources in the Arctic. However, I do not think it is seeking too much to ask it to consider an alternative transportation method that will meet the needs of the foreseeable future, so far as gas and oil are concerned, by building a pipeline from that area to our main outlets. The government should supply some of the money and the direction that would make this possible.

The Minister of Transport has been very brave in commenting on what he will do and how he will go about it. He says it is not gunboat diplomacy. Perhaps it is not, but I wonder how he is going to enforce legislation. I think the Humble Oil Company has been very generous to Canada. They could probably buy most of the Arctic if they wished. They have been very generous in saying they will make the 30 or 40 changes to their ship; they will build special compartments to comply with Canadian regulations, and they will do all this for the sake of the development, which may not even take place.

This is very good and the Canadian people are quite pleased that the Minister of Transport has taken this kind of action. But I think they would be just as pleased if action were taken by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who has not had the opportunity since he took on that portfolio to do anything of great importance in his own field. In fact, not much has been done by his department since the Trans-Canada pipeline was inaugurated.

I think he would find some support if he were to suggest at least that a feasibility study be carried out by the Committee, in conjunction with a study of this bill, of the development of an alternative program for the building of a pipeline from the Arctic, which would eliminate many of the problems which I think everyone agrees are evident. I do not really expect miracles and I do not expect that suddenly the government will be seized with a vision. If they were, I think they would be very surprised at the response they would receive from the Canadian public.

I can remember when another vision of the north caught on very well. Most people in Canada are sympathetic to the development that is going on there. The fact that northern development is discussed in the House as much as wheat is an indication that there is an interest in our northern resources and a willingness on the part of the Canadian public to participate in their development.

We are again allowing the Americans to provide an alternative that will not cost us anything and that will dispose of one of our products. But we have not really done much for ourselves. I think the minister would find a goal for himself if he were responsible to the Canadian public for the handling of the vast resources which we have in the Arctic and were to provide a means of transportation that would be free of the perils that most people believe endanger the present system.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I shall take about five minutes to express my interest in the intent of this bill. At present, and for a number of years, the search for oil and gas on the continental shelf of the east coast of Canada has been rather academic. Companies interested in this matter procure a licence from the appropriate provincial governments and one from the federal government and proceed to do exploratory drilling.

Since no significant discovery of oil or gas has been made in that area up to the present, it would seem people are content with what is happening. But I submit that there is a need for a great deal of work in this area by the government of Canada. If in the near future there were important discoveries of oil or gas on the continental shelf on the eastern side of Canada, there would be tremendous complications among the different economic interests following the discovery. It is late to do so now, but it would be wise to resolve these jurisdictional responsibilities before gas and oil are discovered in commercial quantities in the area.

It is true the five Atlantic provinces have not decided among themselves where the lines of jurisdiction should lie as between the various provinces, on the assumption that they have the jurisdiction over mineral and oil and gas rights on the continental shelf. But the federal government does not admit their claim, and you have a situation where there is a dispute as to jurisdiction between the federal government on the one hand and the five eastern provinces on the other.

Then you have a potential difficulty between Canada on the one hand and the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon on the other. You have the question of where the division line of jurisdiction lies on the continental shelf between Canada and the United States in the George's Bank area. None of these questions have yet been resolved. If that were not enough, this bill introduces another question of jurisdiction as between the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) on the one hand and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) on the other. I can visualize situations where it would not be clear which minister had jurisdiction. I am not sure, for example, what the position of Hudson Bay is, and I would not be sure what the position would be in Hudson Strait—for example, which minister is responsible.

If oil or gas is discovered in commercial quantities in the near future, it will be of tremendous potential importance. It should be of tremendous economic benefit to an area of Canada that has not shared fairly in the development of our country over the last few decades, and surely the development should be in a manner which would be of benefit to those provinces. Secondly, it would be adjacent to a part of North America which is deficient in gas and oil at the present time. And I might mention, Mr. Speaker, that the geological indications of the continental shelf off eastern Canada look quite promising for gas and oil. If they are found there in commercial quantities, there is an immediate tremendous market and therefore tremendous pressure for immediate development in the area because, as hon. members know, all of eastern Canada is supplied with oil from overseas, chiefly from South America. The same is true of the eastern seaboard of the United States.

So it is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that the discovery of oil in that area would be of tremendous importance immediately and there would be very immediate pressure to develop it at once. Therefore, it is vitally important that the government of Canada resolve these questions of jurisdiction as rapidly as possible so there will be a clear delineation of responsibility before discoveries are made.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I made my major remarks in regard to this debate prior to the introduction of the amendment, but in view of some of the comments made by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) I want to speak very briefly about one aspect of the bill. I do not favour the Conservative amendment. I think this is a good bill, a good amendment to Bill S-29.

I feel that the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin is in error when he says this bill has no bearing on Arctic sovereignty. I would suggest that any time a policeman of any kind functions in an area, he is exercising authority, or sovereignty if you will, over that area. As I see this bill exercising some authority by Canadian law over the waters off Canada's Coasts and along Canada's islands, I do not see how he could deny that this is exercising our sovereignty in that area. I would like to emphasize this particular aspect of the bill.

I suggest we should proclaim Bill S-29 right away, get on with the job, do it quickly, and get out there and exercise some of the authority we have as a sovereign power over the waters off our coast. I think we should pass Bill S-5, which I suggest is a good bill in the main, and that we start also to use this measure to proclaim our authority, or in effect use our authority in these waters, because much of our law is set by precedent and by action of this kind. I say to the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin: Let us get on with the job, and I would urge him to urge the government to become active in this area.

Mr. St. Pierre: Can the hon. member point out any part of this bill which gives the government authority over waters as distinct from land beneath the waters? It is an important distinction, I suggest.

Mr. Thomson: As I understand the purpose of this bill, it is dealing with pollution. If the hon. member thinks the land under the waters can be polluted by an oil well, and the waters on top of that land not be polluted, I cannot follow his reasoning. I think that since we are going to use pipelines in these waters and have regulations covering drilling in them, automatically that affects the waters and not just the land under the waters. I cannot follow that reasoning whatever.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is the House ready for the question?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is maintained by hon. members directly across the House that the bill before us, S-5, in some way diminishes Canada's claim to sovereignty over the waters adjacent to our sea coast, particularly those in the Arctic. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in particular stated he was not opposed to Bill S-5 for technical reasons, but because "it amounts to a serious diminution of Canadian sovereignty over the waters of the Arctic." This is simply not so. As a matter of fact, obstructing the passage of this bill will in itself have the effect of diminishing Canadian offshore claims. However, these are not claims of sovereignty over waters. These are claims of sovereign rights to explore for, develop and exploit the natural resources of the sea bed and subsoil of Canada's continental margin.

Perhaps I might spend a few minutes for the purpose of clearly differentiating between first, Canada's claims to sovereignty over waters lying off our coasts and, second, Canada's sovereign rights to exploit the natural resources of our continental margin. Canada lays claim to sovereignty over waters off our sea coasts where they are internal waters or historic waters forming an integral part of Canada and where they fall within the limits of our territorial sea. Under international law, Canada's internal waters are those on the landward side of the base lines from which Canada's territorial sea is measured, and Canada's territorial sea comprises a marginal three-mile wide belt measured from the coastline, or from straight base lines joining headlands and offshore islands established pursuant to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1964.

The promulgation of such straight base lines involves the seaward extension of Canada's exclusive competence beyond its present limits vis-à-vis other countries. Since this exclusive competence includes proprietary as well as jurisdictional rights, there is no question as to Canada's ownership of the mineral resources of the sea bed and subsoil underlying these waters.

In Bill S-5, we are not dealing with problems of sovereignty over waters. Bill S-5 is concerned with mineral resources, in particular the oil and gas resources, of the sea bed and subsoil of Canada's continental margin. Under the terms of the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf of 1958, Canada can claim the natural resources of the sea bed and subsoil for offshore areas extending off the Atlantic, Pacific, and Arctic coasts far beyond the limits of the territorial sea. The shelf convention is the instrument of international law that confirms the exclusive right of a sovereign state to explore for and exploit these natural resources off its seacoasts wherever it can manage to do so. Thus, Canada asserts exclusive rights, sovereign rights as the shelf convention calls them, over the natural resources of her continental margin extending far beyond the possible limits of Canadian sovereignty over the waters adjacent to our coasts.

I should mention here that Canada is probably the most aggressive nation in the world in asserting her rights to offshore mineral resources. We have issued oil and gas permits covering more than half the total area of Canada's continental margin. Hon. members may recall that our continental margin comprises a total area of about 1.5 million square miles, almost 40 per cent as large as the entire land area of Canada. Thus, the total area covered by oil and gas permits issued to date off our seacoasts is the equivalent of 20 to 25 per cent of Canada's total land area. This is about twice as large as the maximum area that might be considered favourable for petroleum exploration in the four western provinces combined.

To illustrate Canada's diligence in asserting our rights in the offshore, I would like to point out that federal oil and gas permits have been issued off the east coast extending in an unbroken stretch of some 2,000 miles from the Gulf of Maine region through the Grand Banks and thence to Hudson Strait. These permits extend seaward as far as 425 miles east from Newfoundland. We have issued permits off the west coast over a stretch of 500 miles from the Strait of Juan de Fuca region to the Dixon Entrance region, and we have issued permits covering the bulk of Hudson Bay. In the Arctic region, which seems to be the main matter of concern to hon. members directly opposite, approximately 150 million acres of oil and gas permits have been issued in the Arctic offshore. These are situated in the Beaufort Sea region, where they extend as far seaward as 140 miles off the mainland coast, and in the Arctic islands region where they cover most of the channels between the various islands.

One can hardly say that the federal government has not been aggressive in this field. In fact, there has been some tendency of late by various parties, including some members of the United Nations, to find fault with us on this account. If hon. members will refer to Bill S-5, they will note that clause 3(b) states that the act applies in respect of oil and gas in—> those submarine areas adjacent to the cost of Canada to a water depth of 200 metres or beyond that limit to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil thereof.

There is no stipulation here, as has been stated by hon. members opposite, that there is a 200-metre water depth limitation. The wording of clause 3(b) is taken almost verbatim from the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, which clearly states that the exploitable depth is the governing factor. Technology is continually moving this flexible "exploitable depth" boundary farther seaward. Each of the two semi-submersible drilling units currently being built in Halifax will have a drilling capability of 25,000 feet and the ability to operate in water depths well in excess of 200 metres, and technology is fast evolving methods of completing and producing oil wells commercially in water depths of this magnitude.

Here I would point out that the federal government has issued permits in water depths ranging to 2,200 metres—about 7,000 feet—in the Gulf of Maine region; to 3,700 metres—about 12,000 feet—in the Scotian shelf region; to 2,800 metres—about 9,000 feet—in the Grand Banks region; to 2,100 metres about 6,800 feet—in the Labrador sea region; to 900 metres—about 3,000 feet—in the Arctic islands region; and to 2,600 metres—about 8,500 feet—in the Beaufort Sea region.

I believe it is worth while to point out here that there has been a tendency by various nations to minimize the effect of the exploitable depth clause in the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, and thereby decrease the size of continental shelf areas falling under national jurisdiction. Canada believes it is essential that the geologic-geographic realities continue to be the governing factors in determining the limits of our exclusive rights to offshore mineral resources, and to this end we have been advancing the continental margin concept through our representation in the United Nations.

The continental margin comprises the continental shelf and the continental slope as complementary components. Hon. members are probably already aware that the continental shelf is that submerged portion of a continent that dips gently seaward, on the average less than 1 degree, to a point where it merges into the continental slope through an increase in gradient to, on the average, about 3½ degrees. The continental slope then continues downward into the ocean depths.

In the case of Canada, the physical limit of the shelf portion of our continental margin lies seaward of the 200-metre isobath in large part; many miles seaward in some localities. There are in addition many irregularities in the shelf areas involving water depths greater than 200 metres. Some of these are in the form of closed depressions, others are in the form of channels such as those between the Arctic islands. These are second-order magnitude physiographic features of the continental margin just as are the hills and valleys of Canada's land areas. As I have already indicated, we have issued oil and gas permits covering these regions and thus have asserted Canada's rights to the mineral resources of the sea bed and subsoil.

Bill S-5 is designed to provide comprehensive statutory authority to govern oil and gas activities in the regions lying offshore from Canada. Upon enactment, therefore, it will have the effect of confirming Canada's assertion of rights to offshore mineral resources in areas extending far beyond either our territorial limits or the 200-metre water depth. Obstruction of Bill S-5 can only serve to weaken Canada's claims to the natural resources in these areas.

Some hon. members opposite have maintained that Bill S-5 would have to be amended further upon passage of legislation to confirm any transfers of administration of offshore mineral resources by the federal government to coastal provincial governments. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) has stated that the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act will have to be amended further—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—REQUEST FOR INCLUSION OF ALL SASKATCHEWAN AS DESIGNATED AREA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on February 5 I put the following question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand):

> In view of the fact that Saskatchewan is facing a deepening economic crisis, is the minister now prepared to consider the inclusion of the entire province under the Regional Development Incentives Act?

I asked this question for a number of reasons because the province of Saskatchewan is, in fact, in a very bad economic situation at the present time. It is a deepening financial crisis, and because of that my colleagues and I from Saskatchewan believe that the entire province should qualify for any additional help and aid that may be coming under the new Regional Development Incentives Program.

• (10:00 p.m.)

A short time ago—say three or four years ago—Saskatchewan in many ways was a "have" province. Now, because of our agricultural crisis, Saskatchewan is not a "have" province. Saskatchewan and its people are suffering, in one way or another, the consequences of the province's economic crisis. An economic recession is well advanced in Saskatchewan. I shall try in the few minutes I am allowed to speak this evening to outline why I think all that province ought to be included as a special, designated area under the program.

As I said before, the province's crisis affects everybody living in the province, but first and foremost it affects the farmers. Farm income has dropped drastically and many farmers are being forced off the land. As a matter of fact, the way of life of many people is being changed drastically. Statistics show that in the first half of 1969, for example farm income was down by 40 per cent as compared with 1968. The Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) has also told us that there will be no final wheat payment this year, a factor which will add to the problems confronting Saskatchewan farmers.

Those who do not work on farms are also feeling the effect of the economic recession. The average weekly wage has dropped relatively. In 1963, for example, the average weekly wage in Saskatchewan was below the national average only by $3.95. In the first six months of 1969 the average weekly wage had fallen to $9.85 below the national average. As you can see, the average weekly wage is falling further below the national average weekly wage.

Widespread unemployment is another consequence of Saskatchewan's economic crisis. Unemployment now is higher than it has been for a number of years. Retail sales across the province are down; the first 11 months of 1969 saw a drop in retail sales of over $100 million. These figures do not tell the entire story because the businessmen and people of small communities are much harder hit than the people living in the larger centres.

The farm machinery industry is perhaps the hardest hit industry. Many farm machinery dealers have already pulled out of Saskatchewan and others are contemplating this action. Capital investment in the province is down drastically, while in Manitoba and Alberta capital investment has increased as compared with last year. Also, the population of Saskatchewan has declined. As a matter of fact, the only thing we are exporting these days is people; we are certainly not exporting wheat. Between April and October, 1969, 10,500 people left Saskatchewan at an average rate of 1,800 per month.

Hon. members know how well this fact alone indicates the severity of the problem we face. The very future of Saskatchewan is at stake. Including the province in the new plan would be of help to the people of Saskatchewan. Rumour has it, Mr. Speaker, that both Saskatoon and Regina may be included very shortly in the regional development incentive plan. Of course, we are in favour of this, but I hope the government will consider including the whole province in the plan.

In the fairly densely populated area I represent, many people living in towns and villages cannot find work. Many farmers who seek employment off the farm to supplement their income also cannot find work. Whatever form the regional development incentive plan may take, it ought not to take the form of mere paper tokenism. A plan on paper is not enough, because we must bring industry to the province.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion could utilize this plan to bring about national unity in Canada. National unity is not simply a matter of bilingualism and biculturalism but involves matters touching on the social and economic life of the people of this country as well. All regions of Canada must be equal partners within confederation. The government could do much toward solving the province's problems by including the entire province under the regional development incentive program. I ask the government, again, to give serious consideration to including the entire province. There is a grave emergency there and the province will warrant special attention until such time as it extricates itself from the economic recession. Unless the province receives that attention it may not extricate itself from the recession for many years, in which case the income base of the people will be destroyed and their way of life changed.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are all agreed in this House as to the seriousness of the economic situation in Saskatchewan. I know it is the feeling of my hon. friends on this side that the resources of the government must be brought to bear to alleviate the unique financial and other strains thrust in little over a year on Canadians in the prairie provinces, and on none more so than in Saskatchewan.

Saskatchewan has suffered a relatively sudden and drastic reversal in economic well-being. I can assure the hon. member and other members of the House that for its part the Department of Regional Economic Expansion intends to ensure in short order that its resources and programs under its two pieces of legislation contribute in the most effective way possible to improving the economic situation in that province.

The task is to assist not only in meeting the short-term urgent situation which has developed over the past two years but to carry out a longer term industrialization and diversification of the province's economy. My minister has informed the House on a number of recent occasions that he hopes before the end of this month to complete agreements with the provinces to designate special areas jointly selected by the federal government and the provincial governments in which joint economic development plans will operate—plans in which the department's resources play a very significant role, a more significant role than in the designated regions.

I can say that the question of the role of the department in Saskatchewan has been the subject of close examination in the past few months and that discussions with the province of Saskatchewan have sought to find the most effective role for the department in light of the economic situation there and in view of the potential in Saskatchewan for economic expansion and diversification.

This federal role has to be meshed with the province's own economic development programs. We are fully aware of the urgency of the Saskatchewan situation. It is particularly urgent that we should set our course there at the earliest possible date, because programs of industrialization take some time to gather momentum. I believe a decision as to that course will be made in the very near future.

TRANSPORT—CHARLOTTETOWN—PROPOSED TRANSFER OF CERTAIN MARINE AGENCY FUNCTIONS AND PERSONNEL

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been concerned about the diminution of the staff of the Charlottetown marine agency of the Department of Transport. My question of February 24, on which this debate is based, was not my first inquiry on the subject.

There has been a regrettable flurry of rumours and a war of nerves in connection with the fate and future of the Charlottetown marine agency. First there were the stories that one of the ships of the agency was to be transferred out of Charlottetown. After much anxiety and speculation we were given the word that this was not to take place, at least not at the present time.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Now, as a result of the exploits and investigations of yet another task force, it is alleged to be the accounting and engineering division which is to be transferred to another centre. Indeed, a former employee of the Department of Transport in Charlettetown has publicly declared that the move will take place and that June 1 is D-day—diminution day or debarkation day, whatever one wishes to call it. Certainly for the employees it will be debarkation from Prince Edward Island, where they have been performing their duties well and in many cases for a long time. The man who made this statement subsequently resigned from the department.

One of the developments which brought me the greatest satisfaction when I was a government-supporting MP was the building of a new wharf and agency headquarters at Charlottetown. The project took a long time and was not completed until the government I supported had left office. But the splendid headquarters, which I am told are modern, well equipped and practically new, capable of allowing personnel to discharge their duties efficiently and well, stand there—and it is shocking, surprising and totally inexplicable why the personnel therein should be diminished. Why any division of the department should be moved has not yet been demonstrated or declared.

Charlottetown has long been the site of a marine agency, and it is the logical location for a marine agency. But in recent years there have been gradual decreases in its role and function. For instance, purchases which used to be made in Charlottetown on a very satisfactory basis are now being made elsewhere.

We grow weary of these cutbacks in the operation of the dominion government in our province. The closing of the Queen Charlotte naval base was one; the valuable enamel and heating project at the Charlottetown airport brought much needed employment to our city. It had a helpful effect upon our economy, but it too went the way of the naval base. From time to time other aspects of the federal government program are being curtailed or withdrawn. It has happened in the Post Office; and I mean at headquarters, not just the closing of small offices.

The fur research station and biological research have been cut back, and there have also been cutbacks in the maintenance of fishing harbours. All of these mark a decline in the operations of the federal government, producing a shrinkage of employment and loss of economic strength. We have only to look at the estimates for the coming year to see how low a priority Prince Edward Island has with the government.

I ask that this sort of thing end. Strange, indeed, it is to plan a special regional expansion program—for which, incidentally, our province pays two-thirds of the cost—and at the same time to allow other federal government departments to contribute to economic decline and to unemployment which the plan of the regional expansion department is designed to ameliorate and overcome. It seems to me that a recognition of the ills of continuing disparity among the regions of Canada should not be confined to one department of government but should be known and acted upon by all.

Therefore, let the spokesman for the minister give his assurance on this item at least. Let us know that there will not be a depletion of the minister's staff at Charlottetown. Let the minister also use his influence to curtail the cutbacks, of which Prince Edward Island has already undergone more than its share. To use a recently resurrected expression currently getting some coverage in the United States, "More benign neglect we can do without". But even benign neglect is less hurtful than this kind of attention and disruption.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question raised by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) may I say that there was an article in the newspaper recently that did speculate with rumours. I know there is never smoke without fire. Nevertheless, I am afraid I cannot tell the hon. member that something will be done or will not be done, because no decision has yet been taken by the department.

Some quite extensive changes in the Department of Transport have been announced. Week after week and month after month the department is looking to see what it can do to give better service to the public. When changes are made, it is sometimes necessary to move employees around or to change them; this is unavoidable. The department is not trying to do something that is going to hurt the economy of the country or to jeopardize giving good service to the public. But still it is not a fact yet because, as I have said, no decision has been taken.

The deputy minister wrote the hon. member on January 26 last in reference to this matter. There is one sentence in this letter which I think covers everything. It is as follows:

> We are constantly reviewing our organization in an effort to improve our efficiency and our service to the public.

I think every member of the House of Commons should work with that in mind, that every department of the Canadian government should do everything in order to give better service to the public. In a letter written in reply to the Premier of Prince Edward Island the Minister of Transport assured the Premier of that province by saying:

> Several years ago, in an effort to improve our efficiency and our service to the public, we established a maritime regional administration. We are now studying the possibility of providing certain common services more economically. I can assure you however that. contrary to press reports, no decisions have been taken, nor will there be until they are reviewed carefully with myself and officials of my department.

Still there is no decision taken, and I do not see that a decision will be taken shortly in the sense that the hon. member for Hillsborough mentioned a while ago. He has asked that the minister give him and the people of his riding the assurance that there will not be any change. I cannot give that assurance to the hon. member, but I can tell him that the Department of Transport is trying to do the best to give the people of P.E.I. good service.

TRADE—SALE OF ATOMIC ENERGY PLANT TO ROUMANIA—CONTINGENT CONDITIONS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): The other day when I raised a question about the sale of an atomic energy plant to Roumania, Mr. Speaker suggested that there was not urgency in respect of this program, or at least not as he saw it. I should like to read a small excerpt from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of March 7 which says that Roumanian officials are presently in Canada engaged in talks with Canadian officials regarding this sale. This article suggests that West Germany is also interested in the sale, so in fact we have a competitor. The article states:

> The talks involve a $100,000,000 generating station and fuel fabricating plant and, possibly, a $50,000,000 plant to produce heavy water—

So you can see this is an important item to this sector of Canada's industrial economy. If we were successful in building a plant for this country, we might also sell others. I suggest this is quite an urgent matter. I come from a section of the country about which agricultural and trade officials were not concerned regarding the sale of wheat until we woke up one morning and found somebody else had the markets. This is a very important item and the government should consider it very carefully.

There is one item in respect of which I should specifically like to compliment and congratulate those responsible. At the Douglas Point atomic energy plant they were successful in performing an on-power refuelling. This was only partial, but it was something new and it was successful. If the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) had anything to do with this operation, I extend my congratulations to him as well. If I were purchasing an atomic energy plant from Canada or any other country, I would be concerned about the conditions of sale. I would want to know whether the plant would work. I asked specifically in my question the other day about these conditions of sale.

The next item involves heavy water. After considering Canada's experience in this respect, I have some doubt. We have built, or are in the process of building a heavy water plant in Nova Scotia. The federal government has washed its hands of it but Atomic Energy of Canada signed a contract. At the very least, I suggest this was a very sloppy business approach. There were no penalties involved in the contract in respect of the delivery of heavy water. If they did not approve the new method of production, I would ask why Atomic Energy signed the contract. The story has been the same in Nova Scotia. I do not believe Atomic Energy of Canada or the government has anything to brag about in this regard. The sale of atomic energy plants abroad is involved, and a doubt is cast on the ability of Canadian industry generally.

I suggest that the federal government should get on the ball and do something about the problem. I believe if I were inquiring in Canada about a plant of this nature, I would be concerned about the technical know-how of the people involved. The federal government has decided not to proceed with the intense neutron generator which would have supplied us with further knowledge in this particular field. If I were purchasing a plant and was told I would probably be able to upgrade it, and that instead of using uranium I might be able to have a fast-breeder reactor which would use plutonium, or that I would be able to sell plutonium to some other country by purchasing a plant from Canada, I would be very interested.

At the present time I would be very uneasy as a buyer. Our research and development percentagewise in respect of our gross national product is not in any way comparable to that of Great Britain or the United States. I suggest we need to invest our money in this area. If financing is a condition of sale, I suggest that perhaps we should subsidize the financing if this is required. I have one last comment to make in respect of the standardization of equipment. As I understand it, we produce an atomic plant of one kind and other types are produced in other parts of the world. I hope ours is a good one. If we are not successful in our sales abroad in respect of our particular style of atomic energy plant, I believe it is high time we took a real look at the atomic energy situation in Canada.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has ranged far and wide from the question he asked the other day, but certainly some of his contributions are useful. I was particularly glad to see his support for our atomic energy program and his encouragement in respect of our spending more money in this area. If he would be my advocate for the Treasury Board in this area, I think that would be extremely useful. I remind him, however, of the fact that we had to cut back on some of our basic research in areas which might ultimately lead to technology in respect of fast-breeding reactors. Part of the problem is being a small country. We can only afford a certain amount of science. We do not have an open end. Our science spending is not tied to defence spending as it is in the United States.

I suggest that as much as possible we keep in the areas in which we have expertise. I believe that in the field of atomic reactors we have great expertise. We have a scientific team which is second to none. Certainly in the future we can be in the vanguard in the world and possibly achieve a considerable self-sufficiency in the energy field if we have confidence in and support this team which has done so well in the past.

The hon. member specifically asked the other day whether or not our on-power refuelling of the Douglas Point reactor was a condition contingent upon any sale of an atomic energy plant to Roumania. On-power refuelling is one of the real merits of the Canadian Candu system, and our scientists should be given great credit for achieving this. The plants being offered for sale to Roumania and elsewhere do in fact contain this outstanding feature, but it was not a condition of the sale to Roumania.

I think the hon. member has done a service in bringing this matter to the forefront today. Because we have had some problem in respect of on-power refuelling, some people have lost confidence in the reactor program and have some doubt as to whether we should continue. Speaking for the government, may I say I can think of nothing that would do more harm to our country than for us to lose faith in this reactor at the present time, when so much has been put into it and when we have achieved a place in science second to none in the world.

We must bear in mind that other countries have had at least as many problems as we have had in this very new science of atomic energy and reactors. I sincerely hope and have confidence that the Canadian people will not lose faith in this regard and that this House and its members will not be tempted to not follow through with this program. I think it would definitely put us back if we did not follow through with this excellent program in respect of our Canadian reactor, which I think will be of great benefit to Canadian people in the years to come.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

WAYS AND MEANS

DESIGNATION OF ORDER OF THE DAY TO DEBATE WAYS AND MEANS MOTION

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 60, subsection 2, I would request that an Order of the Day be designated for the consideration of a ways and means motion so the Minister of Finance may make his budget statement on Thursday night.

FINANCE

TABLING OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON WOVEN FABRICS OF MAN-MADE FIBRES

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I have tabled today copies in the two official languages of the report by the Tariff Board on Reference No. 144, together with a transcript of the evidence presented to the board at its public hearings. The report covers woven fabrics of man-made fibres used in the manufacture of garments.

I would like to assure the House that the Tariff Board's recommendations will be carefully considered by the government. Therefore, interested parties who wish to comment on this report should bring their comments to the attention of the Department of Finance as soon as possible.

OIL

U.S. IMPORT RESTRICTIONS—REQUEST (MR. LAMBERT, EDMONTON WEST) FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of a statement on motions by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in respect of the marketing of Canadian oil in the United States, arising out of the statement made at noon today by the President of the United States with regard to restrictions on the marketing of Canadian oil in the United States, effective March 1, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask for unanimous approval to move a motion to refer this whole question to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. Surely this motion is worthy of unanimous consent of the House at this time in that at noon on this very day a delegation of members of this House and the other place left for the United States prepared to discuss this very problem with their legislative counterparts in the United States.

I am waiting for the formal motion I dictated after I heard of the President's statement. I was unable to give you notice, Mr. Speaker, because the statement by the President of the United States was made during the noon hour and I was apprised only a few moments ago of the details. I was able to dictate the motion only a few moments ago, but I must present the motion to the House and I trust the House and Your Lordship will bear with me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —and Your Honour will bear with me while the mechanics are being accomplished.

Representatives from western Canada and, in fact, representatives from all parts of Canada are vitally interested in this subject inasmuch as it affects the balance of payments and the level of employment in Canada as well as many other related subjects. With leave of the House and Your Honour I could give the import of my motion while waiting for, shall we say, the housekeeping and administrative difficulties to be cleared up.

• (2:10 p.m.)

The motion would be to the effect that the whole question of the implications of the statement by the President of the United States with regard to the restrictions on oil imports into the United States from Canada as announced today be referred to the Committee on National Resources and Public Works for examination as to its effects on balance of payments, government revenue—both federal and provincial—and the level of employment in Canada, as well as all related questions thereto. I would ask leave of the House for presentation of that motion without the customary notice.

Mr. Speaker: I notice that the President of the Privy Council is seeking the floor at the present time. I am not sure whether it would be proper to allow the minister to participate in the discussion at this point.

We have before us a proposed motion of which the hon. member for Edmonton West is now giving notice under the terms of Standing Order 43. This motion cannot be put without the unanimous agreement of the House and under the terms of the Standing Order there cannot be discussion of the matter. Perhaps I could put the question and thereafter ask if anyone wishes to seek the floor on a point of order. It is a little difficult to do otherwise. Is there unanimous agreement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous agreement to the proposed motion of the hon. member for Edmonton West so it cannot be put now.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, out of courtesy to the hon. member I might mention that since the President's statement was made only a few minutes ago and the government has not had time to consider all its implications, we feel it would be premature to put the motion today. This would not preclude a statement being made on motions tomorrow or on another occasion when the full implications of the President's statement can be assessed.

U.S. IMPORT RESTRICTIONS—REQUEST (MR. DOUGLAS, NANAIMO-COWICHAN-THE ISLANDS) FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, if I may I would put the same proposition from an angle, about which the House may feel differently. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to consider a motion. Under Standing Order 43 I am allowed to make some brief comments and I assure Your Honour they will be extremely brief.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

The President of the United States, Mr. Nixon, has announced this morning a substantial cutback of Canadian oil exports to the United States east of the Rocky Mountains from the present level of 620,000 barrels a day to 395,000 barrels a day.

Whereas this unilateral action by the United States government in sharply curtailing Canadian oil exports will have a most serious effect on the Canadian economy I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House discuss today the announcement by the United States government on Canadian oil exports and the response of the Canadian government to this arbitrary and unilateral action taken by the government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker: I must say I have some reservations about the possibility of two motions on this subject under Standing Order 43 when one has been put to the House and a decision taken that there should not be a discussion. The hon. member may well argue, and I assume would argue, that there is a distinction between the motion he is proposing and the one first proposed. But I still have some general reservations about the advisability, from the procedural standpoint, of having two consecutive motions on the same subject. This is said in a general way.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has indicated what his motion is. Hon. members have heard it. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent is required. I will ask whether such consent is forthcoming.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members have heard, there is no unanimity and the motion cannot be put now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and perhaps for clarification. In light of the statement by the Government House Leader I take it that the decision of the government today is without prejudice to my motion if it were put tomorrow.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, the hon. member will be no more prejudiced in putting it tomorrow than he was in putting it today. Let us put it that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARMING OF U.S. IMMIGRATION AND CUSTOMS OFFICERS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It relates to the fact that for more than a century Canada and the United States have set an example to the rest of the world by maintaining one of the few unarmed frontiers in the world. Does the government intend to protest to the United States government regarding its decision to allow United States immigration and customs officers to carry guns in the exercise of their duty, thus symbolically negating the undefended border concept?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I do not really think that this kind of action would negate the existence of the undefended border between Canada and the United States because I am quite sure that the United States immigration and customs officers will not carry guns in order to prevent an invasion of that country by Canada.

An hon. Member: Would it be to keep out oil?

Mr. Sharp: I regret that there should be weapons in the hands of officers of the government, but this is a decision that the United States must make not only with regard to its relations with Canada but in relation to the security of its own public servants.

Mr. MacLean: Has the government of the United States given any advance information or explanation to the Canadian government as to why they deem this necessary, and is it the intention of the Canadian government to discuss the matter with the U.S. government in the hope that the former situation may be restored?

Mr. Sharp: I was not aware until I read the reports or listened to the radio this morning of the action of the U.S. government. The very fact that they did not discuss it with us indicates, I think, that they did not think it related in particular to relations between Canada and the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: But now that we are aware of the fact, I will be discussing it with the Secretary of State because, as I said before, I am quite sure that this action is not directed against Canada.

Mr. MacLean: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of what the Acting Prime Minister has just said, is it the intention of the Canadian government, since any menace that might face the U.S. officials would, I think, be even greater or at least as great in the case of Canadian officers, to examine the situation with regard to the possible arming of Canadian customs and immigration officers?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, I know of no such intention.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Is it not the intention of the minister to protest against this most unusual step, particularly in light of the fact that no consultation took place? Do we not have an ambassador in Washington?

Mr. Sharp: The answer to the last part of the question is, yes, and he carries out his duties very well indeed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this the government's idea of responsibility?

Mr. Sharp: I would like to repeat what I said, I think the members of the opposition are looking for a fight with the Americans. That seems to be the whole purpose—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: —and I do not intend to succumb to the temptation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs make statements like that seriously? Surely he has a little more common sense than that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members are looking for a fight between themselves.

OIL

U.S. IMPORT RESTRICTIONS—ACTION BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the announcement this morning by the President of the United States that Canadian exports into the American market are to be curtailed some 30 per cent.

In view of the fact that there have been warnings of this for some months, may I ask the minister what response the Canadian government proposes to make and what action, retaliatory or otherwise, the Canadian government has in mind in view of this very serious step taken by the government of the United States?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have been in consultation with the Americans in this regard for some time and we believed that the market should be kept open, as it was. The Americans took this action as they have every right to do under their own policy. I would point out that despite the cutback it means that sales of oil to the United States will increase in this year from some 575,000 barrels per day last year to 650,000 barrels a day this year, compared with 253,000 barrels per day when we took office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is irrelevant.

Mr. Greene: I am somewhat taken aback by the schizophrenic socialism of my hon. friends.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Greene: Yesterday, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression these words are unparliamentary. I believe the hon. member has a supplementary.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the minister apparently wants to debate this subject, I suggest he should have accepted my motion. In view of the fact that official sources in the United States, according to press reports, have indicated that the President of the United States is prepared to remove these restrictions on Canadian oil exports to the United States provided the Canadian government agrees to an energy package policy by the end of this year, will the minister assure the House that no agreement will be signed by the Canadian government until the terms of that agreement have been discussed by this House so that we do not have another under-the-table oil policy like we had before?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. gentleman's question, of course, is not correct. The Americans have never said any such thing, that they would remove these conditions in the event that he has stated. I would point out that there has been a continually improving market in the United States. I would also point out that yesterday the NDP were in here moaning and groaning about the fact that we were going to have too big a market, and today they are moaning and groaning because they say it will not be so big.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan The Islands).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the comfortable pew attitude of the minister who comes from central Canada, and that most of the effect of this action will be felt in western Canada I want to ask him whether there have been continuing discussions with the provincial governments primarily affected by this action in light of the financial implications to these governments with regard to their revenues? This is not an isolated effect. Is it the intention of the government to give instructions or brief Canada's representatives who are today travelling to Washington with regard to the impact of these changes in American marketing regulations with respect to western Canadian oil?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, as stated, we have been in consultation with our American friends. I would point out that while I appreciate the fact that any cutback is not accepted readily by western Canada, we have been in consultation with the premiers of Saskatchewan and Alberta on this subject. I would further point out that from the time we took office until now sales have increased by more than 400,000 barrels a day bringing in some $400 million a year to the economy of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we are entering the field of debate. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre on a supplementary.

Mr. Paproski: It is not a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, it is a new question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North on a supplementary question.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): In light of the decision announced by the United States, is the government giving fresh consideration to the question of constructing an oil pipeline from western Canada into the Montreal and eastern Canadian markets?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, all these matters are given continuing consideration by the government. The American market is still an extremely good one and an evergrowing one, and we believe it will continue to be so in the interests of Canada and Canadian oil producers.

Mr. Orlikow: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister now agree to table the feasibility study prepared for the government on the question of an oil pipeline into eastern Canada?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the question of an oil pipeline from western Canada to the Montreal market has had continuing review not only by the public but by the private sector since the time of the Borden report. There has not been any application from the private sector to build a pipeline into the Montreal market. Nothing precludes such an application and of course it would be considered by the Energy Board and by the government if one was ever made.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister indicate whether the quota announced this morning leaves room for an increase in exports of some 80,000 barrels per day or some 10 per cent over the average of last year's exports?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the averages last year were, in districts one to five, some 575,000 barrels a day. On the estimates they will go up to 650,000 barrels a day this year. The quotas in districts one to four will go to 417,000 barrels a day this year, averaging the January and February figures—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that we are actually having a debate and I wonder whether we should go into the details of the situation as we are doing now. I gather the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East has a supplementary.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary I should like to ask the minister whether the import quotas announced by the President of the United States have any impact on government thinking in terms of sources of acquisition of oil for eastern Canadian use, in particular the Atlantic provinces? Is there any contemplated change in our source of oil?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, most of the eastern sources of oil are from offshore, and certainly this question will be considered by the government in long term plans. As indicated by the President of the United States, it is a temporary decision for the balance of this year only, but it certainly will be weighed in respect of its effect on eastern as well as on western questions.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I might interpret the minister and ask him to confirm whether I have interpreted him correctly. I take it that eastern Canadian sources of oil are going to be a matter of review and will be subject to inclusion in any further negotiations or further review of the total over-all oil policy?

Mr. Greene: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, in determining oil policy as other policies we have to consider the effect on the whole of Canada, and certainly in oil, where there is a peculiar and particular situation in respect of eastern Canada in that most of the supplies are from offshore, that situation will be considered in any policy review.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Winnipeg North, is the government giving consideration to the possibility of a publicly owned pipeline to Montreal?

Mr. Greene: Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker. All our pipelines in this private enterprise economy are currently private enterprise pipelines and, as indicated, if it pays any entrepreneur to build a pipeline I am sure he will put in an application to the National Energy Board.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Have the minister and the government had a chance to consider and assess the implications of the president's statement on the oil industry in Canada? Also, is the minister or any member of the government prepared to make a statement in this House, hopefully before the end of the week, to clarify many of the unsettling questions the President's statement raises?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to consider that thought. I point out that the President's decision raises the level in districts one to four from 332,000 barrels per day—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the minister has already dealt with this.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we might go to the next subject.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISCUSSION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the fact that the first report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture tabled in the House on Tuesday, February 17, 1970, deals specifically with the dairy industry, and considering that the next dairy year is to start in about three weeks' time, is the President of the Privy Council in a position to say when the House will resume consideration of the motion for concurrence in the said report standing as item No. 74 on today's order paper?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and shall study the suggestion of my hon. colleague.

MANPOWER

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the unemployment crisis for students last year, what action has been taken to date and what action is planned to improve job finding opportunities for university and high school students this summer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that that question has been asked a number of times recently. On the last occasion it was put in the form of an inquiry as to whether the minister would be making a statement. At least, that is my recollection of the matter.

Mr. Comeau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister make a statement on this subject very soon?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already made a statement outlining the situation last summer. The situation then was far from being a crisis and our action resulted in the placement of 93 per cent of those students who wanted work. We are following with action along similar lines this year and hope to have a successful program for the coming summer.

Mr. Comeau: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister endeavour to obtain reports from those manpower offices on university campuses which employ the tri-semester system of operation so that we may know whether the tri-semester system, if expanded to other universities, could make available more jobs over the year for other university students?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, any change that would improve employment conditions would be welcome but a change in the semester system is a matter for the universities and provincial authorities.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

MONTREAL—CONSTRUCTION OF COMPLEX

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works but as he is not in attendance and has no parliamentary secretary, I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister.

Could he state whether the government intends to build a $100 to $175 million complex in Montreal, as announced recently by the member for Papineau—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question was asked yesterday and I believe that the minister has answered it.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to that of the hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

Has the hon. member who has just been referred to been authorized to announce the details of the proposal?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not believe the question, as worded by the hon. member, is in order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the hon. member been authorized to announce such a project when facts prove the opposite?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question, I repeat, was asked yesterday. It was the first question first put by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie and the minister, as far as I can remember, replied to it.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, could the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether the government intends, in the future, to have its plans and its policies announced by the chairman of its party caucus?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES RESPECTING ENDING OF WAR

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the continuance of the disastrous war in Viet Nam and the opinions expressed by distinguished United States citizens such as Mr. Roger Hilson, former Associate Secretary of State for Asian Affairs, that Hanoi would be willing to accept terms that should also be acceptable to the United States, has the Canadian government made any representations to the United States government in regard to steps to end the war or in regard to the negotiations taking place in Paris?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has been consulting with United States authorities about the war in Viet Nam over the last few weeks and months. The reports we have had indicate that negotiations have not been proceeding very quickly, and I think this is obvious to all concerned. We are willing to be helpful but we have not yet seen any particular initiative we could take that would be acceptable to both sides. My hon. friend seems to feel the United States government should respond to this particular initiative. Many initiatives have been taken and many ideas are in circulation. This is only one.

POLLUTION

AIR—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on February 24, as found on page 4024 of Hansard, I directed a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It had to do with whether, in view of the great seriousness of air pollution, as indicated by a Toronto doctor who says that over 50 per cent of the diseases suffered by people are directly traceable to air pollution and that we have only two years to do something about it, the minister would make a statement on motions in order that the people of Canada might be assured that measures are being taken to meet this serious problem. Is the minister able to make a report about this alarming statement that over half our diseases are attributable to air pollution?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing specific to report on that statement except that the question of air pollution and federal responsibility in this regard are being considered by the government, and any policy decisions in this respect will be announced in the House in the normal manner.

SUGGESTED SUSPENSION OF ARCTIC OIL EXPLORATION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. The Canadian Commission for UNESCO has called for an immediate halt to Arctic oil exploration until government research shows that there is a safe way of shipping oil without danger? Can the minister say whether Canada has initiated any special and specific research into this aspect of exploration?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have taken a number of initiatives in the field of environment. For instance, in NATO we supported very strongly the idea that NATO ought to be concerned about questions of environment, and we are supporting the same ideas in the United Nations. Of course, in the field of Arctic pollution we have probably been more active than elsewhere, because this is a very special responsibility of ours in Canadian waters. But we are concerned not only about Canadian waters but about the general problem in the Arctic and forthcoming legislation I think will indicate that interest.

EFFECT OF EAST COAST OIL SLICK ON HARP SEALS—CONTAINMENT OF SPREADING

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and I am gambling on it being somewhat related. Has it been brought to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry that the present east coast oil slick has now reached Sable Island and will affect not only on Sable Island but all along the coast of Cape Breton some thousands of harp seals which are about to drop their pups and are going to be seriously imperilled?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not related. However, the question having been asked the minister may perhaps wish to reply.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, our officers have kept the situation under very close scrutiny. They will be assessing any damage, totalling it up and presenting the bill to the right place.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Minister of Transport is not here, can the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry indicate whether the federal government intends to join with the province of Nova Scotia in building a causeway or dam in order to contain the further spreading of oil from the tanker Arrow?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we have been proceeding on our own in these respects and if the government of Nova Scotia can help us in any way we will certainly welcome the help.

REPORTED OIL IN SEA OFF ALASKA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he had any discussions with officials of the United States to determine whether the oil slick in the North Pacific has resulted from the earlier underground atomic test at Amchitka?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not personally. I will have to ask in my department. They have probably acted on certain information that has appeared in the House and elsewhere. I will take that question as notice.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED U.S. NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question concerning the proposed underground nuclear test in the Aleutians. The minister wrote a note to Washington concerning the first test. Has the minister made any representations to Washington since this matter was brought up some two months ago?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As I have said many times in the House, Mr. Speaker, we are still awaiting information on the results of the first test. Of course, all the discussions that take place in this House are well known to the United States ambassador, who I am sure passes this information on to his government. We have not yet made up our minds whether to take exception to another test. Before doing so we would like to see the results of the first test.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Would he tell the House whether he intends to wait until after the debate on the report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture to announce the dairy policy for 1970-71?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Not necessarily, Mr. Speaker, because we have to make that announcement before the House recesses or some time before April 1.

IMMIGRATION

ACTION TO INCREASE NUMBER OF PEOPLE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the many wonderful enticements to enjoy the good life in Canada, can the minister state why the number of immigrants to Canada during 1969 was 12.2 per cent lower than in 1968?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate that the question is asked in an argumentative way. In this sense, it is not in order. The hon. member may want to rephrase his inquiry.

Mr. Paproski: Can the minister say what new action is planned to increase the flow of immigrants to Canada for the remainder of this year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the main reason for the decline is—

Mr. Ricard: The white paper.

Mr. MacEachen: —the buoyant economy in Europe. The hon. member will notice that despite the decline from Europe, the traditional source of immigration, there are increases from the United States—

An hon. Member: Don't boast about that one.

Mr. MacEachen: —the Caribbean and Asia. In reply to the question, Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to promote Canada as a good place for immigrants to settle. We hope we will be able to attract considerable numbers to Canada this year.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF SELECTION CRITERIA

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the increased complaints by Canadian citizens who wish to sponsor immigrants from central and eastern European countries, will the minister review the selection criteria which are now being applied as far as immigrants are concerned?

Mr. Speaker: It seems that the Parliamentary Secretary is now making a suggestion. He has to assume the minister will take note of the matter.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the minister been able to calculate the statistical multiple correlation between the immigration policies of Canada and the United States and the present United States attitude toward our oil exports?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION IN UNITED NATIONS BIRTH CONTROL PROGRAM

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he is now in a position to say if a decision has been made by the cabinet which will permit the government of Canada to participate this year in the United Nations program for birth control and family planning?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the subject is under consideration in the cabinet. I think it would take a little longer than Your Honour would permit at question time for me to announce government policy. I hope there will be an occasion in the future to set it forth in a clear and satisfactory way for my hon. friend.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INTERIM INCREASE IN PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Some time ago the minister was asked a question about whether the government was giving immediate consideration to increasing pensions and war veterans allowances. In view of the very serious situation in which veterans find themselves—the minister has that information at hand—is it the intention of the government now to bring in an interim measure at least so as to assist those who are suffering as a consequence of the high cost of living?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question has been asked before.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When are we going to get the answer?

Mr. Dubé: The answer is the same. This matter is under consideration. When an announcement is to be made, it will be made by the government in due course, not as an answer to a question during the question period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, by taking an attitude like that surely the minister realizes that he is actually saying to the veterans of Canada that he does not care a snap.

[Later:]

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Can the minister advise if he will be bringing legislation into the House during the present session to increase veterans pensions? If so, will it be on the basis of what the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs reports to the House? The committee will be reporting prior to the Easter recess.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, this matter is still before the Standing Committee. I understand the committee will have three further meetings to hear requests from the Veterans Associations. As soon as their report is presented to the House, we will prepare legislation. If the House moves fast enough, that legislation will be placed before it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the government does in the fullness of time, make a decision in regard to the increases in veterans pensions, will these increases be retroactive at least until January 1, 1970, and will the increases be payable to the estates of many veterans who will have died in the meantime?

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, the recent increases in 1968 were made retroactive to January 1, 1968.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—USE OF NURSE CROPS

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. With regard to the recently announced wheat surplus reduction policy, will farmers wishing to seed forage crops early this spring be allowed to use nurse crops while still retaining those acres for wheat quota if they undertake to remove those nurse crops before July 15?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that we have under active consideration now in drawing up the regulations to apply to this program. I am sure the hon. member realizes that there are some great complexities with respect to seeding other crops, whether or not they are called nurse crops, such as barley and oats which would substantially increase the output of those two crops when the major objective of the over-all program is to reduce wheat acreage and at the same time, as far as it is possible, to refrain from overproducing these other crops.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—INCLUSION OF LAND BROKEN LAST YEAR IN SUMMERFALLOW ACREAGE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a supplementary question. Under the announced operation "Lift" program, otherwise known as the Lower Incomes For Tomorrow program, will last year's breaking be included as part of the summerfallow acreage for the calculation of this year's quota since it was not recorded in the permit book?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the breaking was not recorded in the permit book at all, even as new breaking, I do not believe that land will be added.

[Mr. Dubé.]

My understanding of this situation is that even for the 1969-70 permit year any land that was broken in that year shows up for new breaking in that permit book.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question. In order that the situation will be clarified, there are many cases where the breaking occurred late in the fall and consequently could not be recorded in the permit book. Will this acreage that was broken last year be included as part of last year's summerfallow in the calculation of this year's quota?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARMING OF U.S. IMMIGRATION AND CUSTOMS OFFICERS

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs which has to do with the question about the United States arming their customs officials on the Canadian border. I wonder whether the minister would suggest to the United States authorities that they adopt the new Canadian custom of welding the triggers on our guns?

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—SUPPLEMENTARY DOCUMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. On January 15 the Minister of Finance indicated to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs that he would be presenting a white paper dealing with three questions in regard to which the government had arrived at some conclusions as to certain difficulties. In light of the fact that this morning the minister tabled, through the committee, a mini white paper or supplementary paper on one question, can the minister indicate when he will express his views with regard to the remaining points, namely, approval for professionals and the status of investments to be made in less developed countries than Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that my hon. friend has the same respect for the committee that I have, which is not always the case with hon. members opposite. The information to be given was not in the form of a white paper; I was simply to supply the committee with the information. This morning I supplied information with regard to one of the points. The information with regard to the two other points will be forthcoming very quickly.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I just quote the minister's own words at page 1215 where he said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —he would "send along a white paper expressing our views in this regard".

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, since my hon. friend has quoted that, would he also quote the correction made in the afternoon of the same day.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

U.S. PARTICIPATION IN OPERATION "VIKING"

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister tell the House whether soldiers—perhaps I had better say members of the armed forces—civilians or materiel from the United States will be participating in Operation "Viking" in the air, over the water or on the ground?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

POLLUTION

AVAILABILITY TO COMMITTEE OF PROVINCIAL BRIEFS ON CONTROL

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Did the provincial governments submit briefs on the subject of pollution control to the federal government during the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa on February 16 and 17? If so, why has the minister not made these briefs available to the national resources committee which is currently dealing with the Canada Water Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BRANTFORD—CLOSING OF MOHAWK INSTITUTE

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Some hon. Members: He is not here.

Mr. Brown: If the minister is not here, then perhaps someone from the department can answer. Does a recent announcement to the press of the closing of the Mohawk Institute at Brantford, Ontario, the largest Indian educational institution in Canada, without prior consultation—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Brown: —with the Six Nations Council, or even with myself as the Member of Parliament for Brant—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brown: —constitute a change in government policy, or was it a slip-up by someone in the department?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I might advise my hon. friend that the minister is on his way back from the Northwest Territories and will be here later today.

With respect to the question, my advice from departmental officials is to the effect that there was in fact detailed consultation with the Indians involved, and that the closing of the Mohawk Institute to which my hon. friend referred was after these detailed consultations and with the consent of the Indians concerned.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, APPLICATION, OIL AND GAS COMMITTEE

The House resumed from Monday, March 9, consideration of the Motion of Mr. Greene that Bill S-5, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and of the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Aiken (page 3591).

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Division

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Aiken) which was negatived on the following division:

[Mr. Speaker.]

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Is the House ready for the question on the main motion? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacLean: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1970

MEASURE TO SUPPLEMENT PENSIONS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-194, to provide supplementary retirement benefits for certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and to amend certain acts that provide for the payment of those pensions, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the larger portion of the bill before you is required to give effect to the government's decision to introduce legislation to provide for increases in the pensions of retired public servants and their surviving dependants commencing in the month of April, 1970. As the House will recall, that decision was announced by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), just before the Christmas recess in December, 1969.

As that proposed legislation was to include provision for the escalation of pensions of former Members of Parliament, it was going to be necessary to amend both the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act and the 1965 statute which dealt with retirement from the Senate. The government considered it desirable, therefore, to include in this bill the amendments which it was proposing to Parliament as a result of its review of the report on parliamentary allowances of Emeritus Dean C. A. Curtis of Queen's University. Due to the interrelationship of these two sets of amendments, it had the great advantage of simplifying the drafting of the legislation to combine the two in the same bill.

In dealing with the general escalation question, I do not have too much to add to what the President of the Treasury Board said to the House on the afternoon of December 19. The proposals which are now before you are based on a report by the advisory committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act which examined proposals made to the government for a special contributory plan financed by contributions of the government and employees. That committee concluded that such a plan financed by equal contributions of the government and employees is feasible as a continuing method for updating pensions payable in respect of retired public service employees under the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Assuming that this bill is approved and receives royal assent before the House rises for Easter, those now receiving government of Canada pensions in respect of employment with the federal government would have their pensions increased as of April 1, 1970. For example, for those who retired in 1969 the increase will be 2 per cent, while those who retired earlier will receive larger percentage increases up to a maximum of 42 per cent for those who retired in 1952 and earlier. Again commencing in 1971, pensions may be increased by a maximum of up to 2 per cent in each year, geared to a formula based on the cost of living, if in any year that should be appropriate.

These increases will in turn be financed by additional contributions of one half of one per cent by present employees, contributions that will be matched by the government. Both contributions will go into a special contributory account for funding the additional benefits.

My preceding remarks related primarily to the public service employees in the technical sense, and while representatives of the Canadian Forces and the RCMP attended the meetings of the advisory committee during its study of the subject and the preparation of its report, this committee confined its recommendations to the financing of the escalation of pensions of public service employees.

The decision in respect of the Canadian Forces and of the RCMP Force was taken separately in consultation with those responsible for those forces. The same considerations which led to the acceptance of a joint employer-employee contributory scheme for the benefit both of those already retired and of those retiring in the future in the case of public service employees were recognized as being equally applicable in this case also. The costs involved for present members were partly responsible for the choice of age 60 as the normal commencement age for these increases.

The bill also incorporates an additional change with respect to the Canadian Forces pensions and those of the RCMP. As hon. members may recall, when the Canada Pension Plan came into force those two groups elected to have the superannuation benefits received attributable to military or police service reduced at age 65 by the amount of the Canada Pension Plan payments attributable to that service. Those two groups have now signified that they would like to be treated in the same way as other retired public servants, namely, that their superannuation and Canada Pension Plan benefits be co-ordinated so as to produce somewhat higher benefits. The bill includes an amendment to effect that change.

There are, in addition, a number of special classes of public officials who are also dealt with in the bill. Under the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, former holders of that office or their widows are entitled to receive a non-contributory pension. In the same way the Judges Act provides for pensions payable to judges or their spouses without the requirement of contribution on their part. Since those pensions are in a special category related to those particular offices the full cost of the supplementary retirement benefit is borne by the federal government.

Again under the arrangements made in 1963 for those who have held the office of Prime Minister, a pension is payable at the age of 70 to any former Prime Minister who held that office for a minimum period of four years. That pension is a non-contributory one. Under this bill, however, those holding the office of Prime Minister from time to time will be required to make contributions at the rate of one half of one per cent to provide for supplementary retirement benefits.

I would like to turn now to the amendments proposed in the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. Present members of the House of Commons will be given a year in which to decide whether or not to come under the new plan. Until they decide, the only difference will be that they will contribute on their sessional allowances plus their expense allowances at the present rate of 6 per cent plus one half of one per cent required in respect of the plan for escalation under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

The immediate effect of electing to come under the new plan will be to increase the rate of basic contributions from 6 per cent to 7½ per cent which, with the additional one half of one per cent for the supplementary benefit, will make a total contribution rate of 8 per cent on $18,000, as I have said after including the additional contribution for the escalation plan. The contribution of 7½ per cent will apply to the full amount of the sessional indemnity and expense allowance dating back to the opening of this session on October 23, 1969. The amount payable in addition to the contributions already made may be paid in a lump sum or on the insured instalment basis with interest applicable to elections for prior service.

Once a member is under the new plan, he then has a year to elect to contribute for additional prior service credits under the new benefit formula which I shall describe later. This then will permit a member with service at any time since April 8, 1963, to contribute at the 7½ per cent rate on the full amount which he received during that period as sessional allowance and expense allowance less, of course, the contributions already to the member's credit.

As to members with service prior to April 8, 1963, they will be entitled to contribute on the full amount of the sessional indemnity up to $8,000 or $4,000 then received, as the case may be, depending on the maximum sessional indemnity which was then payable. These contributions will be at the 6 per cent rate applicable to those years less, again, the contributions already to the member's credit. Interest is payable on these elections to pay for prior service.

Members who received additional salaries or allowances for additional duties may elect to contribute on them for any time in the past and for each year in the future. The contribution payable may be up to 7½ per cent of the salary or allowance at the option of the particular member.

The benefit formula which was recommended by Dean Curtis in his report involves the adoption of the best six years average formula now applied under the Public Service Superannuation Act, for example. This means that the average of the sessional allowance plus the expense allowance over a period or periods making up to six consecutive years of service in which the total of these allowances was highest, will be used in the benefit calculations.

The percentage to be applied to this average amount will be built up on the basis of 3½ per cent for each of the first ten years of pensionable service, 3 per cent for each of the next ten years of pensionable service, 2 per cent for each of the next five years of pensionable service, and 2 per cent for each year of pensionable service based on contributions made on salaries or allowances received for extra duties. A year of pensionable service is determined by the principal amount contributed in respect of the different periods of service as set out in some detail on page 16 of the bill.

In sum the total of these percentages may not exceed 75 per cent, so that it will take 25 years to reach the maximum for a member who does not make contributions on additional salary or allowances received. A member who makes these contributions simply shortens the period in which he reaches this maximum, but he does not increase the maximum yield. The maximum pension under the proposed system would be $13,500.

The present provision on eligibility for pension after contributing in respect of sessions in three Parliaments has been changed to one of being a member for six complete years. This will undoubtedly mean that some members will qualify after being elected only twice instead of three times as in the past. On the other hand, some members have been able to qualify in as little as 3½ years under the present system.

Dean Curtis also proposed that payment of the full pension be deferred to age 55 with provision of reduced actuarial equivalent benefits payable earlier. The government decided that the principle in the present legislation, which was introduced in 1952, should be retained whereby the pension should be payable immediately a former member qualified. To help fund these payments, the government proposed an increase in the members' contributions to 7½ per cent from the 7 per cent recommended by Dean Curtis.

The bill also meets what has been a serious worry to many members in providing annuity benefits for dependent children of deceased members. Under the present legislation, while survivorship benefits are provided for spouses, none are provided for children. This bill provides that an annual allowance of one-tenth of the basic allowance shall be paid to each dependent child up to a maximum, of three, along with the payment to a surviving parent, of three-fifths of the basic allowance. In the case of orphaned dependent children, the bill departs from Dr. Curtis' recommendations which were that the widow's three-fifths should be allocated among the surviving children whatever their number. Instead, the children's allowances are doubled from one-tenth to one-fifth each.

In the case of senators, a parallel change is provided in that those under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act will contribute on their combined sessional indemnities and expense allowances immediately. The provisions which I have described will be generally applicable to them with the benefit formula accumulating at the rate of 3 per cent for each year of pensionable service as a senator.

The bill also provides that those senators appointed before June 2, 1965, who are under the Senate retirement provisions, will be given an opportunity to resign and go on pension if they are over 75. Those under 75 can indicate their intent to resign on reaching age 75 and thereby provide automatic annuity benefits for their widows if they die before reaching that age.

This is a complicated bill, Mr. Speaker, and there have been some consultations through the usual channels with respect to the best method of dealing with it in committee. I think there might be general agreement that instead of referring the bill, as the motion indicates, to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, it would be desirable to amend the motion on second reading so that the bill may be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. If we could have unanimous consent for that purpose, I should like to suggest that the motion for second reading be amended in that way so that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement to amend the motion as suggested by the hon. minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of part I of this bill is to neutralize to some extent the effects of inflation as applied to certain groups at fixed incomes, namely those on pensions as a result of having served to a pensionable age as civil servants, members of the armed forces, in the RCMP, the Senate, the House of Commons or anyone else covered by schedule A on page 39 of the bill.

We, in the official opposition, are fully in support of the principle of the bill but we have some criticism to offer in that the government delayed so long in introducing it to Parliament. We propose, therefore, that this stage of the bill be as brief as is reasonable so that it will reach the committee in a reasonable time and the committee will have some time to consider it.

Of course in this bill, the government is in the role of an employer and Parliament, therefore, is being asked to make certain amendments and corrections to the conditions of former employees of the government. This bill must receive royal assent by March 25, on our present schedule. Clause 4 of the bill is mandatory and provides that commencing with the month of April 1970, the benefits under the bill shall be paid. Clause 6 provides that these benefits shall be paid at the same time and in the same manner and during or in respect of the same period as the pension payable to the recipient.

My information is that the various pay offices have been and are now engaged in adjusting the April cheques. This government has allowed less than five days since the printing of the bill for an assessment of it. It now allows only 12 days for the rest of the Parliamentary process. Part I is essentially a financial adjustment between the employees of the government, past and present, and the government as an employer. There are benefits to be paid to past and present employees but there are also increased financial burdens to be placed on present and future employees and on the people of Canada who must match the additional contributions of the public service, the RCMP and the armed forces.

To meet the April deadline, this bill must have debate on second reading, be considered in committee, be reported out for consideration on the report stage, get third reading and then go through roughly the same processes in the Senate before it receives royal assent. This timetable can only accommodate government witnesses as to the committee stage. It cannot be expected that organizations representing the public service, ex-members of the RCMP, the armed forces and other organizations will have adequate time to present to the committee whatever their views might be. There is a slight odour of political blackmail rather than participatory democracy in this kind of timetable because it limits debate.

The consideration that Members of Parliament will be able to give the bill in committee will be limited and there will not be as good an opportunity as there should be for those affected by the bill and interested in it to put their views forward to the committee.

Having said that, I say that not only is there not enough time left for its consideration in a reasonable manner but it should have been introduced much sooner because retired civil servants and others have been suffering from the erosion of their pensions for a number of years by inflation. In some cases this has been very unjust.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. MacLean: I want to turn now to Part II of the bill. I note, Mr. Speaker, that it is based in its most important respects on the Curtis report. I commend the government for having appointed Dean Curtis to study this matter of parliamentary pensions because it is a difficult matter. Dean Curtis has had this question under review for about three years now. It is a complicated and difficult task that is not generally understood by the public. In my humble opinion such a study should be made by an unbiased, objective expert as is Dean Curtis instead of a committee of this House, so that we may have a decision that is fair to the public and to members of the House. In his report Dean Curtis says:

> The whole matter of retiring allowances, pension plans, etc., has received a great deal of attention in recent years and has become one of the most important aspects of employment conditions. The great growth in private pension plans, and the social security system in the United States and Canada are all evidence of this. It is therefore appropriate that the position of Members of Parliament under existing plans should be reviewed.
> The growth of private pension plans in recent years has been accompanied by the initiation and development of retirement allowances for Members of legislative bodies in the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. At the present time eight provinces and the federal parliament have established some type of plan.
> In earlier times, being a member of a legislative body was regarded as a form of public service which the individual contributed with the obligation to cover the costs involved. Indeed, it was not until 1911 that the British Parliament introduced payment of House of Commons Members. And in Canada the indemnities were always relatively low. The view that such positions were for people of means has given way to the recognition that adequate payment must be made if people of ability are to be attracted to the field—irrespective of their economic circumstances. It is thus necessary to have retirement plans which are comparable with those existing elsewhere.
> The situation of members of elected bodies is that their retirement may be involuntary—

That is a polite way of saying members may be kicked out by their constituents. I continue:

> —after a relatively short period of service. There is, so to speak, an occupational hazard not common in other occupations. Few people go into public life for the money income involved; indeed the real income of the position comes in the form of prestige, power and the ability to influence decisions.

I sometimes think that backbenchers and members of opposition parties cannot influence the decisions of this government as much as they ought to be able to do. I continue:

> In the main, it is non-pecuniary. But this should not obscure the fact that many able and willing people may be disbarred from this occupation because of economic considerations and the risks involved. It is, therefore, the function of the financial returns to people in public life to reduce such economic handicaps to a minimum. It is also true that being a Member of the House of Commons is now a full-time occupation. In earlier days the House sat less frequently and the Members could continue with their usual occupation in some manner. Now, it is nearly impossible for a Member to carry on his usual business or occupation. If he does, something is neglected.

I could not agree more with those sentiments. May I point out some of the occupational hazards of being an elected representative? According to statistics available for the last few Parliaments, almost half of Parliaments' membership will fail to qualify for the minimum period of six years for the minimum pension. In other words, almost 50 per cent of hon. members serving will not survive long enough as Members of Parliament to qualify for a minimum pension. The statistics of the last few years also show that not more than 1.5 per cent of the total membership of the House will qualify for the full pension. Only 1.5 per cent of all members here will survive that long as members. Only about 10 per cent of the membership of parliament survives in Parliament as long as 15 years. These statistics, obtained by studying a number of past Parliaments, are quoted by Dean Curtis in the report.

No one should think that when a Member of Parliament finishes his parliamentary career, however brief, he will automatically qualify for the $13,500 pension. The ex-member who qualifies for the full pension will be quite a rare bird. The bill generally follows, in most of the important aspects, the recommendations of the Curtis report, and therefore I agree in principle with it.

As the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) pointed out that the government did not accept the recommendation which states that the qualifying age for a pension should be 55 years. Because that recommendation has not been accepted, half of 1 per cent has been added to the total contribution and members who are under 55 years of age as well as those who are over will now contribute an extra $90 a year. The member may begin to collect his pension immediately on ceasing to be a member, regardless of age. By the nature of things few members will qualify for the pension during their younger years, but there may be some. The additional one half of 1 per cent members will have to contribute, plus the one half of 1 per cent we shall have to contribute to provide for the rising cost of living, will mean that the individual's contribution will be 8 per cent of his income, which is quite a heavy contribution so far as pension plans go. But, as I said, we cannot be judged on the same basis as employees who have security of tenure in their employment and can look forward to a long period in the same employment, probably until their normal retirement age of 60 or 65.

Because Members of Parliament may qualify for a pension when relatively young, some may think that the pension provision is unjustifiably generous. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that individuals are not usually selected by parties or nominated by parties or individuals to represent constituencies in Parliament until they have made some reputation and name for themselves in their own communities. It is usually at the beginning of their most productive years, whatever their profession or business may be, that individuals are drafted by their friends or neighbours to run for Parliament. That being so, hon. members frequently find they have given their best years to Parliament and leave it poorer than when they entered. I am, therefore, delighted to see that the bill will remove the terrible insecurity that has been hanging over the wives and children of Members of Parliament. Too often we have seen cases where serving Members of Parliament have died and left their dependents destitute.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in his opening remarks the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) referred to the announcement that was made on the afternoon of December 19, 1969, by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). That was an afternoon I shall long remember. In fact, those who were in the House that day will understand what I mean when I say that for me it was one of the most exciting moments of all the years that I have been in Parliament.

It was in 1944 when I first started arguing the case for an increase after retirement in the pensions of retired civil servants. I have spoken about this matter quite a few times in the intervening years, although I have no record of the number of times. It was, therefore, with great appreciation and real delight that I rose that afternoon to respond to the statement of the President of the Treasury Board when he indicated that legislation would be brought in for the escalation of pensions of all federal superannuates, both those who are now retired and those who will retire in the future. I am happy today that the bill before us, in so far as it deals with that aspect of the matter, implements to the full everything that the President of the Treasury Board announced on the afternoon of December 19.

In the intervening weeks I have received hundreds—it may well run into thousands—of letters from retired civil servants, retired armed forces personnel, retired RCMP personnel and others from across this country and also outside the country, expressing their pleasure that this battle has been won and that from now on the pensions of federal superannuates will go up if the cost of living continues to rise.

In referring back to what happened on December 19, I say again it was one of the happiest and most exciting moments of my career in this place. I am very happy that we have before us in legislative form what was announced on that occasion. However, Mr. Speaker, I have to admit that the edge of that excitement and happiness has been somewhat reduced by the action of the government in putting another matter into this bill, namely the complete revamping of the Members of Parliament pension provisions. I shall come to that aspect of the matter in a few minutes. Before I do so. I want to say a little more about the provision for increasing the pensions of retired civil servants.

The President of the Privy Council today, like the President of the Treasury Board on December 19, has given the main outlines of this provision. Starting next month, April, all federal superannuates will receive an increase in their pensions. The scale has been made clear. Those who retired in 1969 will get a 2 per cent increase; those who retired in 1968 will get a 4 per cent increase, and it goes up, with a bit of compounding, back to the year 1952. Those who retired that year or earlier will get a 42 per cent increase in their pensions. In January 1971 there will be another increase. We can say now that that will be a 2 per cent increase because of the way in which the cost of living has been rising during the past or so.

If the cost of living continues to rise, there will be increases in these pensions of up to 2 per cent every year from now on. In other words, the formula of the Canada Pension Plan is being applied in this case. That is all good, Mr. Speaker. I welcome it. I welcome the fact that there is no means or needs test and no dollar limit on these pension increases. I welcome the fact that everybody is included. I have long contended for the principle of universality in pension matters. I am glad to see it is being carried out in this case.

There are a few matters on which I want to comment, some of it perhaps critical. I think it would have been a good idea to find a way to pay a higher percentage in the case of those pensions that are very low in amount. It is the same old story, to them that hath shall be given and from them that hath not shall be taken away even that which they have.

An hon. Member: Hallelujah!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I don't mind the jest at my quoting scripture, or at least paraphrasing it. I do not mind at all. It is one of those facts of life we shall have to do something about some day, and I shall say something about that later in my remarks today. The way in which we forever find an excuse for widening the gap between the poor and the rich does not gibe with the principles of a just society. I wish a way had been found to increase, by a little higher percentage, those pensions of federal superannuates, be they retired persons themselves or their widows, which are in the lower brackets.

The next criticism I wish to make is not so much about what is in the legislation, but rather of the government in its failure to explain the matter. I say this with particular reference to the additional one-half of one per cent that everybody is going to be required to pay. I support this. I am glad it is universal. Members of Parliament will have to pay it as well as civil servants right up to the top level. Those civil servants with 35 years' service who are no longer paying to the superannuation fund will have to pay this extra one-half of one per cent. I am glad it is being paid on behalf of the judges and the Governor General, and any others who do not make contributions to their pensions.

A certain amount of antagonism to the whole plan is developing in some quarters because some people have the notion that those who are now working are being required to pay the increases for those who are now retired. I think I understand these figures, amounts and calculations well enough that I can see how it can be argued either way. I suggest that the realistic approach to this whole problem is to say that the people now at work, who now pay one-half of one per cent, are paying for their own escalation after they retire. Indeed, I have received letters from people who do not realize they are going to get a benefit when they retire. They think they are simply being asked to pay now for those who are already retired. This is a total package. It is one society. We have to stand together on matters of this kind. As I say, I support the extra half of one per cent, but I wish that the government had done a little better job of explaining to the people involved what it is all about. The President of the Treasury Board sent out a letter to every recipient of these pensions in the early part of the year. Some of those who received the letter have sent it to me, and I find no explanation of this fact in that letter.

I also regret that the government has not found it possible at this time to make some other changes in the public service superannuation legislation. I contend that the formula under which pensions are paid could be improved. I think that the people who have been retired for a number of years might have been given the option of benefiting from the best six year average. I think the amount payable to widows might have been increased to 60 per cent or to 75 per cent. There are a number of other changes in the formula that might have been made.

I did not say this on December 19, Mr. Speaker, and I would not say it today if all that the government was doing in this bill was simply providing an escalation of pensions that have been put in pay. But as I shall point out in a few moments, with respect to one particular group of people namely ourselves, we are revising the formula, revamping the whole scheme. Therefore, I think I can now make a criticism of the government and say that it should, in the case of the civil servants, have made some important changes as well in their pension plan.

There is not time to go into this now, and I will not try to take the time of the House in any case; this I can deal with when the bill gets to committee. However, it does seem to me that there is, particularly in view of the other provisions of the bill, a very strong case for making changes to the public service superannuation plan in addition to those proposed in this particular legislation. I say to those who are complaining about the extra half of one per cent that that is not the thing that is wrong. The thing that is wrong is that something is not being done to improve the other aspects of the plan.

There is one other point I should like to make about the effect of this escalation on one particular group of people, a group that always seems to get it in the neck. I will come at this question by reading a sentence from the letter that the President of the Treasury Board sent to all federal superannuates. This letter went out with all the cheques that were mailed at the end of January; the letter is dated February 2. The President of the Treasury Board had the pleasure of telling our superannuates that this increase was coming in April, and it is a letter that I am sure he enjoyed writing. In his letter he said this:

> I would also like to point out that there will be no means test or needs test in this connection, and that all in receipt of pensions, whether former employees, or their widows and dependents, will benefit from the new provisions.

That sentence is categorical. It says "all"—not "most" of them, not "all but a few", but every one of them—will benefit from the new provisions.

There is one group that will not benefit. I have asked at least one question in Parliament this year to try to bring this point out, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) to whom I put the question gave me a sympathetic answer. He has since written me a letter in which he points out the difficulty of meeting my request.

Here is the situation. There are some retired civil servants included in this category of "all" that the President of the Treasury Board referred to who are on very low pensions. In fact, their pensions are so low that even after they get their civil service pension and their old age security, they still require to get a marginal amount as a war veterans allowance. As the legislation stands, when these retired civil servants get this increase in their civil service pension, their war veterans allowance will be reduced by that same amount under the means test provided in the War Veterans Allowance Act. That situation vitiates, flies in the face of, the statement of the President of the Treasury Board to every recipient of the civil service pension that "all" will benefit from the new provisions.

The President of the Privy Council may tell me that that is something for some other piece of legislation. I would point out that the government did not fail to amend 15 or 20 different acts so as to cover all the matters it wanted to cover. There could have been an amendment in this omnibus bill that is now before the House to provide that, in the case of those who are receiving both war veterans allowance and a civil service pension, they would, as the President of the Treasury Board said they would, benefit from the provisions under this bill.

I expect to be on the committee to which this matter will be referred—I am sure that that will not come as a surprise to hon. members—and I shall certainly go into this matter at the committee hearings. Nevertheless, I think it is a bit raw that a group that was victimized by the means test when the guaranteed income supplement was brought in is now to be victimized again by that same means test because of the government's failure to deal with this point in this piece of legislation.

I must now move on to the other aspect of this bill. Despite the critical comments that I have made, I still welcome the portions of Bill C-194 that deal with the escalation of pensions that have been put in pay as a very desirable piece of legislation. From my standpoint, this aspect is good in itself. It is also good because it sets a pattern. I hope that the Canadian National Railways will be the first to follow this pattern, and that if there are any other emanations of the Crown that need to do so, that they will do likewise. Further, I hope it will not be long before all pensions do the same. Indeed, I want to see it made clear in our pensions standards legislation that a pension is not a pension unless provision is made for escalation. But I say, I welcome this part of the bill.

With respect to that part of the bill that alters and amends—in fact completely recasts—the pension plan for Members of Parliament, I must say this aspect takes the edge off my enthusiasm for this bill. Let me say immediately that I do not think that these wide, sweeping changes should be in this bill at all.

It is perfectly all right to put in this bill, as the President of the Treasury Board said on December 19 he would do, a provision relating to the escalation of pensions of retired M.P.'s, those who are out now. It is also perfectly proper to provide that the pensions of members who are now in the House, once they go out, will also escalate in the same way that all civil service pensions will escalate. But to incorporate in this bill a complete revamping of the M.P.'s pension plan at a time when we are doing only one thing for everybody else does, I suggest, if I may put it mildly, make us look a bit ridiculous.

Although that view may not be shared very widely in this House, I suggest that from the outside the serious question will be asked: How is it that we can do only one thing for all the others, namely escalate the pensions, yet for ourselves we can recast the whole plan, making it much more generous than most other plans that one can find in the pensions field? There are two completely different aspects here. There is what is being done for the civil servants and public employees generally; then there is what is being done for us. I think that it is unfair to us to have put this total revamping into this one bill. I suppose I feel something like some of my friends to my right and my left felt when we had the omnibus Criminal Code bill before us. They did like some of it and did not like the rest. They wanted the bill divided. I argued with them that they could not very well make that claim because, after all, there was a report stage when hon. members could single out those parts of the bill they did not like, move the appropriate amendments, and test the House on them.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Having said that, I think it will be clear that this is what some of us have in mind with regard to this legislation. We have no option, because we want this increase for the retired civil servants, and we want them to get this in April. We have no option but to support the principle of this bill at this second reading stage. But in the standing committee and at the report stage, some of us will be asking that the bill be made just a bill doing one thing, namely escalating all pensions but leaving the question of dealing with M.P.'s pensions as a separate matter altogether.

Even apart from the question of having the M.P.'s pension plan dealt with separately, which seems to imply that maybe some of us are merely stating an objection to the way it is being done and not to its substance, I want to make it clear that I speak for myself and some of my colleagues when I say that we are opposed to the substance. Not all of my colleagues agree with me on this and they will have a chance to state their views. But most of us feel that, particularly in the light of today's conditions, and particularly in the light of the austerity that is being preached, as well as in the light of delays in dealing with old age pensions and war veterans allowance, what is being proposed for us is far too generous.

Where can you find a pension plan where for any period of time you get 3½ per cent credit per year? With the 3½ per cent per year after the first ten years plus the other arrangements down the line, it makes it possible in 25 years to reach a maximum of 75 per cent. Our civil servants take 35 years to reach a maximum of only 70 per cent. Just on the surface of it, I suggest that is too generous. I might say at the same time, though of course this generosity was in our plan before in that a 60 per cent pension provision for our widows was provided, while the civil service plan still provides only 50 per cent. Yet, we are reopening our plan and making changes in it. Why do we not reopen theirs?

Then, there is this whole way in which our calculations are to be made. Some of my colleagues feel more strongly about one point in this bill than they do about anything else in it, that is the provision that from now on our $6,000 expense allowance is to be called indemnity for pension purposes. How many times have we tried to tell the press and the people of Canada that the reason we do not pay income tax on that $6,000 is that it is not salary, it is not indemnity, it is expense money? Now, we turn round and say that for pension purposes this is salary and we are going to pay our pension contributions on our full $18,000, and have our pensions based on that full amount as if it were all salary.

Under the present pension plan the maximum possible pension is $9,000 per year, and that figure was arrived at as being 75 per cent of $12,000 salary. Incidentally, under the rules of the present pension plan nobody could ever get to that $9,000. It would take 30 years on today's rates of pay. For some of us who were here when the pay was a lot lower it will take closer to 40 years. Whether I will be welcome around here for 40 years remains to be seen.

An hon. Member: You are, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank my hon. friend. Now, we have decided that we are going to allow a maximum pension of $13,500 which is 75 per cent, not just of our salary but of this whole $18,000, and it is going to be possible to achieve that amount in 25 years if you are a private member. It is going to be possible to achieve it in about 13 or 14 years if you are a cabinet minister.

I know that what sounds generous now will not sound generous ten years from now. I know when we brought in the first pension plan, it was to be for a maximum of $3,000. This sounded terribly generous but some of our friends who are out now know it is not. Apart from that, I suggest that we are destroying a myth when we say that the $6,000 expense allowance, for pension purposes, is now salary. I think if we are to do that in this bill we ought, in the same bill, to say; all right, because this is salary we will expect it to be subject to income tax.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was waiting a minute for some "hear, hears" to that.

Mr. McCleave: I said "hear, hear".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Good. There are some other areas of generosity in the bill to which the President of the Privy Council referred rather quickly. I think what we are doing for the senators is really out of this world. There are some of them in the other place who were given the option five years ago, within a year of the passing of that bill or within a year of their becoming 75, to choose between staying in the Senate for life or getting out and getting a free pension of $8,000 a year. Some chose one and some chose the other, but now some of those who chose to stay have changed their minds. They would like to get out and get a pension or establish a pension for a potential widow. So, we are opening the option. We are giving them the best of both worlds. They have had five years of full pay and full membership in the Senate; now they can get the pension.

Every pension plan I have had anything to do with has had options in it which some of the people in the plan would like to get reopened. Railway workers all over the place have made such requests, and civil servants are asking that the six year option be open to them instead of the ten they were on before. We are not opening this option to those people but we are opening the option for the Senate.

There was the other option announced today that a senator can say now at age 45 or 50 that he will retire at 75. Even if he is one of the old timers and does not have to retire, he gets the option of obtaining this pension opportunity for a potential widow. These things are very nice, but this seems to me to be generosity running wild. Maybe there is one thing about this bill that I should welcome. Maybe it strengthens my case for the abolition of the Senate. There are 14 vacancies there now. These pension provisions will undoubtedly produce another half a dozen, maybe more. In addition to that, because of the rather generous pensions that are possible in this House you will not need the Senate any longer as a place to appoint defeated M.P.'s because they will be able to live on their pensions. These pensions could be better than the indemnities Senators used to receive. Maybe there is that merit in this bill, that it will strengthen the argument for abolition of the other place.

Let me turn now to another point that concerns me about having this whole question of improving our position before us at this time. How many times in this session have requests been made from this side of the House, and occasionally from that side, for something to be done for our old age pensioners and war veterans? The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked one of his questions again today. He was told he had asked it before and he got the same answer. The answer today was not precisely the same as we usually get. Most often the answer is that these things have to wait until there has been an over-all review of social security. They have to wait until the white paper on social security has come down. Why is it that we do not have to wait for that same review? Why is it that our pensions can be improved before we have the white paper, but old age pensioners and war veterans must wait until that review is down with no guarantee that when it is down there will be any recommendation in it which will improve their position? Therefore, because we are not at the same time doing something to increase old age pensions, and because we are not at the same time doing something to improve the position of our war veterans, I do not think we should be proceeding on this package by which we are more or less doubling our pension provisions.

I think we should now be providing for ourselves only the escalation changes we are providing for all the others covered in this bill. I think the whole question of the age at which these pensions are payable is a question which the President of the Privy Council did not answer satisfactorily. It is the one recommendation in the Curtis report which seems not to have been carried through; that is, that our pensions should not be payable until age 55. It seems to me it is pretty generous to have the pensions available any time one has six years' service, no matter at what age he might have started. This means pensions for persons in their thirties and forties which can be as high as $5,000 or $6,000 a year for life. The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) said there is a certain amount of generosity in all this. I think there is a great deal of it. We did not integrate the Canada Pension Plan with ours. We put it on top; we get it as well. And, if we reach the age, we also qualify for the old age security pension.

Altogether, I think we are going just a little too far, particularly at a time of austerity, at a time when people are being asked to exercise restraint and when we are told that we should do something to fight inflation. I will be told that this does not affect inflation; that these are pensions which will not come into effect until a few years from now and that therefore they cannot affect inflation now. But I submit this does have a psychological effect if the country gets the notion that those fellows in Parliament are doing their best to improve their position—the public knows we have a committee considering salaries and that we are upping our pensions—because they may say let us all do it. Why have restraint? Why hold back? The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says the trouble with inflation is that in such a period those who can protect themselves do so. So, they do not worry and do not really fight the demon inflation. Well, it is pretty hard to say we are not protecting ourselves by this kind of legislation. Therefore, I think we should have second thoughts about it; I think we should delete the provisions for increasing our own pensions at this time.

I have just one more point I should like to make. I admit it is a general, philosophical point to which I alluded a while ago when I strayed off into a scriptural quotation. I think in western society we are coming to the realization that there are some things we thought we could go on doing which we just cannot do. We cannot go on polluting our rivers, lakes and air forever. We cannot go on multiplying the number of automobiles we have and expect our society to be one that will even stay alive. By the same token, I do not think we can go on with the notion that the way to solve the problem of poverty is to raise the incomes of those at the top. To some extent, we have brought up the levels of those at the bottom, but every time we bring up a little the levels of those at the bottom we raise the upper levels still higher and the gap gets wider. The gap between the wealthy and the poor in Canada today is wider than it ever was. The gap between the wealthy nations and the poor nations, despite all the external aid we have provided, is getting wider.

I think we must start narrowing the gap. We must slow down the pace of increase at the top until those at the bottom catch up. I would be preaching in the wilderness if I were to suggest that we bring those at the top down, but I think we must slow down the pace of their increase and raise the level of those at the bottom, even if it hurts. Therefore, I believe someone should give leadership in this sort of thing. If there is any group in Canada that should be giving this leadership it is the Members of Parliament. I think we should be cautious about these motions to increase our salaries, our pensions and other benefits lest we simply widen the gap and lose the respect of the people of this country and their belief that we are seriously trying to solve the problems of poverty and want in this country.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that I feel pretty strongly about this matter. I have tried not to shout or use emotional or strong language about it. I have attempted to be reasonable. I shall continue to take that stance in the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. The fact that this bill is being referred to that committee is an interesting switch. I knew about it an hour before we came in the House today. I agree with the switch, but what interests me is that if we were to do anything about old age pensions this is the very committee to which we would be referring that matter, but no such reference is being made. That matter, says the government, has to wait for the white paper on Social Security.

So, in that committee, while we shall be dealing with our own pensions we shall not be dealing with the pensions of the people of Canada generally. Some of my colleagues feel so strongly about this that they would like to vote against the bill. I hope they can be persuaded not to do so because I do not think we should do anything to prevent the 80,000 federal superannuates receiving their increases in their April cheques. The hon. member for Malpeque said he has learned that the pay offices are already writing the cheques in the higher amounts. I am glad to hear that, and I hope we will get through the part of this legislation which affects these people so that the cheques can go out on time. We must not stand in the way of that. For that reason, for the sake of 80,000 people who need their increases, I am prepared to support the second reading of the bill and its reference to the committee.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Good.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says "good". I hope he will say "good" to the next thought. I shall plead in the committee, and I shall plead when we get to the report stage, for another look, a new perspective in respect of what we are doing. Thought might have been given to improving our position reasonably and justifiably, but not to the extent that we so widen the gap that the people of Canada wonder whether we really are concerned about those at the bottom, those on the war veterans allowance and the old age pensioners.

I shall end where I began, by saying that I was delighted on December 19, 1969, with the announcement of the increase in the pensions of retired civil servants. I am delighted today that that announcement is now taking legislative form, but my delight is dimmed by the fact that we are going too far in the improvements we are making for ourselves.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, it has been a pleasure to listen to the thoughtful exposition of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) and the philosophical approach of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) that this is a problem of great concern to a large number of Canadians. To a certain degree, it was interesting to hear the views of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with whom I served on a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which dealt with this particular matter a number of years back. It is interesting to note that on Tuesday, January 10, 1967 this House empowered that particular committee to inquire into and report upon the matter of pensions paid to retired civil servants or their dependants under the provisions of the Public Service Superannuation Act. Then, as time went by, our terms of reference were broadened for us by the House so that we could consider the pensions of former members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and former members of the armed forces. That committee, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard), held eight meetings, heard 21 witnesses and then with remarkable speed was able to report back to the House and to the other place on May 8, 1967.

The committee unanimously recommended that six things be done. Perhaps it would be worth while to read the portion of the report in which the recommendations were made almost three years ago. The committee recommended:

(a) it should be capable of quick and early implementation in the form of legislation in the next session of this Parliament;

(b) any adjustment in pensions should not be limited to a particular date of retirement and should be in addition to any other increase already granted under the Pension Adjustment Act of 1959;

• (4:40 p.m.)

I pause there to note that it only took the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) some one and a half years to come to grips with the problem. It has taken the government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his predecessor almost ten years.

The report continues:

(c) It should maintain the principle contained in the present legislation that benefits should be related to length of service;

(d) It should conform to the principle that any adjustment formula should take account also of the time which has elapsed since retirement;

(e) It should take into account the increase in living costs during that period of time; and

(f) It should increase the ceilings in the 1959 Pension Adjustment Act.

As I said, with unanimity and after those meetings, on May 8, 1967, the joint committee reported to the respective Houses. Since then, the members of that committee, myself included, have sat in frustration wondering when something was going to be done. On December 19, we heard the announcement from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) that something would be done. Hence, the measure before us now. As I understand from the explanation of the President of the Privy Council, and as I read the special report by Dean Curtis, it is apparent to me that we do not propose to give ourselves or the people of the other place anything. We are going to pay for what we receive under this legislation.

The scheme that is proposed for us is actuarially sound, and I would be very interested to know whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has had his enthusiasm dulled or blunted by it. I wonder what other formula he would suggest, instead of throwing to the gallery some sort of general suggestion or hint that all is not well in Parliament and that in some underhanded way we are dealing with benefits for ourselves. I say, sir, that this plan is established on the best of actuarial principles, and when the government rejected the concept of retirement at the age of 55 it was suggested that a pension could be obtained earlier. The very sensible provision was made to tack on another .5 per cent to pay for that benefit to those who did not wish to wait until the age of 55. However, according to the mortality statistics of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), some of us have no chance of reaching the age of 55. This may be true, knowing the burden that my colleagues on all sides of the House face with an aggravated situation in the committee system. I, myself, am supposed to be at two committee meetings at this time, and would be at one of them if I did not have to be here. I do not think that one could apply to us, in view of the very special hours that we work and the very special responsibilities that we have, the concepts that one would apply to people in grey flannel suits in the suburbs of Canada who live nine to five lives. So I feel no twinges of conscience about the formula that has been devised for members of this and the other House. It is actuarially sound and I think also just.

I do have some question in my mind about the formula by which civil servants now working help, in effect, to underwrite the increases for those who are retired. Let me not be misunderstood on that point. I do not quarrel with the increases rising up to 42 per cent for those who are retired. I think that is justice. I am only sorry that it did not happen at least three years ago when the committee to which I referred made its report. But the fact is that it should be a matter of principle for Parliament and the government that nobody now working should be asked to assume a part of the load for those who are retired. I agree that civil servants, the RCMP and members of the armed forces should pay for their own increases at two percent per year. They should pay into that fund because, on an actuarial basis, they will be receiving the benefit from it. But there is a portion of the increased levy that will be used to pay those who are retired, and I suggest that that sum should be paid out of the whole treasury of Canada.

I further make the argument—and I did raise it once in the House—that to proceed as the government has proceeded with the retired civil servants by putting part of that burden on present civil servants in effect makes the present employees of the government subject to a special tax. I say, sir, that all of us should be paying that tax. Why do I make that argument? Am I just in making it at all? The statment is that some of the money being raised by the special levy will go to help those who have already retired.

When the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) made his announcement to the House on December 19 of last year he listed a good number of points, but that particular piece of information was not given by him. However, in January of 1970 the personnel policy branch of the Treasury Board secretariat made to the bargaining agents in the public service proposals regarding public service pensions. I obtained in Halifax the copy of them that I am now holding from one of the bargaining groups. I also believed that other Members of Parliament should enjoy this special information, and notice of motion for the production of papers No. 361 on our Order Paper dated February 3, 1970 requests:

That an Order of the House do issue for documents sent by the Personnel Policy Branch, Treasury Board Secretariat, to those groups which are the bargaining agents for employees in the Public Service (including Armed Forces and RCMP), relating to the statement of the President of the Treasury Board on December 19, 1969, in the House of Commons concerning extra benefits for superannuates.

Neither the minister nor anyone has as yet tabled that particular document. I cannot understand why, and I regard that as a discourtesy. I asked for a document to be tabled well in advance of this debate, so it could be made available to all Members of Parliament who have not had the advantage of reading the document that I happen to have in my possession. I am surprised that the government did not accede to my request.

What does the paper say with regard to this point? I am saying again that it indicates the government is putting a special tax—which may be minute—on those still working to cover those who are retired. At page 3 of the document I referred to it, it is stated:

The entire amount at the credit of the Superannuation Account is required to meet the liabilities undertaken with regard to the purchase of the basic pensions payable under the Public Service Superannuation Act. There is no surplus in the account which could be used to pay for the increases to present pensioners. Consequently, the escalation funds have to come from the plan's contributors—the federal government and its employees.

Farther on, the following statement is made:

Initially, the additional contributions will be seen as offsetting increases in pensions already in pay. But the plan looks both forward and back.

There are only a very few civil servants in Canada, apart from those who do the active bargaining with the government to obtain these collective agreements, who are aware that they are in fact being asked to pay what I call a special tax. This aspect was never put up to them, in any way, shape or form. When I raised the matter in the House of Commons initially there were some members of the press who saw me about it afterwards. Apparently, they did not think the point was of sufficient importance to bring to the attention of the people, for example of the Ottawa area, where there are a great number of public servants. Yet to me, it is an important matter of principle.

I state again that I don't object to the increases, but I think the increases for those who have retired from public life and are entitled to the benefits under this bill should be a matter to which all taxpayers of Canada should contribute. This special increase properly looks after those who will retire later on but, in my opinion, improperly helps bear the cost for those who have retired already.

There are several other points I think will bear examination in the committee. I note that there is provision in the bill for military and civil servant retirements that are enforced by the mental or physical condition of those being retired. However, as I read the bill there is no provision for those who may be compulsorily retired, that is those people in the public service and in the Armed Forces who are being pushed out before their normal terms of service elapse when they would expect to draw whatever pensions were available to them. And I think that this is a point, particularly with the government having a retirement policy that is somewhat aggravated in these days, that we will have to follow up.

I regret, too, that the government could not have persuaded the Canadian National Railways or its predecessors, the Intercolonial Railways—I think there is a Prince Edward Island Railway in there as well—to give some increased benefits to their retired employees. But perhaps by setting the example in this bill, the railways can be persuaded to take steps that a normal, good intentioned employer would take.

Sir, I can say that I welcome the bill with the exception that I still think it is not a dangerous but a wrongful principle to impose a special tax, as I have argued is being imposed in this case and as I am sure I will be able to prove in the committee when we study the bill, or have somebody prove it for me. But I welcome it. I think it is long overdue. These steps should have been taken at least three years ago, and should have been taken as a matter of principle by the government and by Parliament to keep faith with their retired employees in these inflation infested times.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak too long on this Bill, C-194, but there are a few aspects with which I would like to deal. I might say at the outset that I have not heard any criticism thus far with regard to the escalation of increases of 2 per cent, with a maximum of 42 per cent to retired civil servants, RCMP officers, and to judges and so forth. I rather welcome that, Mr. Speaker, although I might say that in the last few years the cost of living has not increased 2 per cent a year; it has increased 4 per cent and 5 per cent a year. I would hope that the government, in its generosity, would take a second look at that 2 per cent increase and possibly raise it to 3 per cent in some cases.

I thought that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had an excellent point with regard to those retired civil servants whose pensions are not sufficient and who have to depend on the War Veterans Allowance to get by. If perchance these people are deprived of the increase by a deduction from the War Veterans Allowance, I think the government again should give serious consideration to prevent this happening to these people who have given a great deal of service over the years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that December 19 was one of the happy days of his life because of the announcement by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), I could fully appreciate why he was happy. Speaking as a member who has been here from only 1965 to the present I can say that, in that short period of time if there is any person who has pursued the rights of old age pensioners, retired civil servants and other people who need the protection of Members of Parliament, it has been the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre. When he said, rather in jest, that he would hope to be here for 40 years, and I said, "You are more than welcome, Stanley," I meant it, because if there is any person in Canada who has given prestige to Parliament it has been Mr. Parliament himself. He has contributed not only in debate and in procedure, but by his exemplary life he has shown to Canadians the type of people who represent them in Canada. I think December 19 was a happy day for him, and we as members share it with him.

In his criticism of the second part of the bill he said it appeared to him the government was being overly generous with regard to the pensions of members of Parliament. I might say that I was impressed by the hon. member from Malpeque, (Mr. MacLean), who told the members of the House that a study of Members of Parliament over the past few years revealed that only 1.5 per cent have reached the total of 25 years for the purpose of having the full pension, and that only 10 per cent have served for a period of 15 years. I think that this is a very important aspect, Mr. Speaker, and I shall continue at eight o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard)—Indian Affairs—Northern Quebec—Transfer of jurisdiction over Eskimos; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—External Affairs—Withholding of contributions to United Nations Birth Control Program; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—Housing—Construction by Polymer for Low-income groups.

It being five o'clock, the House will not proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

PILOT TRAINING FLIGHTS CESSATION ACT

MEASURE TO ELIMINATE TRAINING FLIGHTS AT INTERNATIONAL AIRPORTS

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond) moved that Bill C-33, respecting Pilot Training Flights by International and Regional Air Carriers at International Airports in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, the underlying purpose of this bill is to restrict pilot training flights by international and regional air carriers at international airports in Canada. It provides that, subject to the provisions of section 17 of the National Transportation Act, the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission may order the cessation of all such training flights.

I am sure many hon. members will realize the pressing need for legislation such as this to provide a measure of relief, small though it may be, for those living in communities surrounding international airports all across the country. However, during this debate today I will deal mainly with the problem as it affects persons living near the Vancouver airport in my constituency of Burnaby-Richmond, although similar situations have existed, or do now exist, at the other international airports in Canada.

Broadly put, the problem would be said to be one of pollution—noise pollution. Now, since the first airports came into existence, aircraft noise has been a source of irritation to persons living nearby. When bigger, more powerful aircraft, especially jet airplanes, began to fill Canadian skies the problem became more and more acute. Nowhere has this been more true than at the Vancouver airport. It is now almost 39 years since greater Vancouver's first airport was opened on almost the same location that the present $32 million terminal complex now stands on Sea Island in the municipality of Richmond. In the intervening years, the original airport which boasted a single 2,400 foot long runway and a total land area of 475 acres has grown to a base which includes more than 3,000 acres and has a main east-west runway 11,000 feet long. This growth was made necessary by the very great increase in the use of the Vancouver facility. Vancouver international airport is one of Canada's busiest centres of aviation activity. In 1967 it recorded 112,826 aircraft movements. Included in this total were 86,000 scheduled flights carrying 1.8 million passengers.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is not difficult to appreciate that with such a great deal of air traffic the seemingly inevitable noise problem has increased accordingly. This fact has caused very real hardship to those persons living in relative proximity to the airport. It is, to say the least, very difficult to live anything like a normal life when jet aircraft are constantly in flight just overhead. But these people of whom I speak are reasonable people. They fully understand and appreciate the vital role which air transport plays in our society. They do not wish to stand in the way of the advances our technology has produced. They merely ask that we begin to turn this technology to the task of solving some of the problems that earlier advances have produced.

Undoubtedly one such problem is the question of noise caused by aircraft during landing and takeoff. I remain unconvinced that this government is moving quickly enough to force commercial carriers to adopt vitally needed noise abatement measures for jet aircraft engines. Nor is it advancing rapidly enough the required research program in the whole field of noise pollution. Nevertheless, some progressive steps have been taken. For example, I give credit to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) for instituting new aircraft noise abatement measures at Montreal international airport. These measures involve the curtailment to an absolute minimum of aircraft movement to and from Cartierville airport which, I might add, was for five consecutive years Canada's busiest airport in terms of total traffic.

This curtailment permits increased use of the runway on the northwest side of the Montreal airport which means that many flights which had been using the southeast runway and passing over a dense residential area, are now making their approaches and departures over the Cartierville airport and the less built up area adjacent to it. As a result, there is a substantial reduction in noise in Ville St. Laurent, a highly concentrated residential area. I have asked the minister, and do so again, to implement similar action on Sea Island at the Vancouver airport. There are presently plans to construct a second major runway at the airport. If these plans are brought to completion, many flights which at present land and take off over the residential areas of Richmond could be diverted to the new runway with the result that approaches and departures would take the aircraft over the Fraser River and adjacent industrial area rather than nearby homes. The present delay in constructing this new runway can not be tolerated any longer. The target date of 1975 is completely unacceptable to this member.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the persons living near the Vancouver international airport are reasonable people with a reasonable request. They want the government to see that the same advanced technology that can produce such flying wonders as the 365-ton Boeing 747 is now turned to ensuring that the noise factor from these jetliners is kept to the absolute minimum. They recognize that increased air service is both necessary and desirable. With this necessary service there is, unfortunately, bound to be for some years to come a certain degree of discomfort from aircraft noise. This fact is accepted. But note here that I have said "necessary service".

There is one practice, one further addition to the general level of hardship, which neither they nor I think should have to be endured. This practice is the use of Vancouver international for pilot training by commercial carriers. My bill seeks to eliminate this additional burden.

CPA is presently the worst offender with regard to pilot training flights at the Vancouver airport. This company conducts 34 per cent of its training flights there with only the most rudimentary restrictions on flight activity. At this time their training flights are subject only to a voluntary effort to avoid noise sensitive areas. How effective have these voluntary efforts been? Allow me to quote, Mr. Speaker, from a letter I received concerning an incident which occurred one evening late last year. My constituent wrote:

> I would ... like an answer why CPA when it was training this night at precisely 8:06 p.m. dove at my house with a four-motor jet, cut the engine power back, let the jet sink then gave full power to the engine and flew off into the dark.

Another letter which came to my office in January read in part:

> Take note that CPA jet No. CF-CPS drove us nuts on Saturday, January 10, 1970, from approximately 9:00 a.m. until noon, and on January 11, CPA jet No. CF-CPI from approximately 7:00 p.m. until 10:00 p.m. Also on the latter date the jet made two extremely low passes over our houses, cut engine power and then gave it full power. These passes were at 7:40 a.m. and 8:40 a.m. Sunday morning.

It seems clear enough, Mr. Speaker, that these so-called "voluntary efforts" CPA is supposed to be undertaking are not enough.

Now I recognize that the company has need to conduct a pilot training program. The argument of myself and my people is not against training flights per se, we just cannot understand why Vancouver international must be used for such flights when there are facilities which are, or soon can be made, adequate at airports near less highly populated centres. One such facility I should mention is Abbotsford airport which is already used as an alternate air field when Vancouver international is fogged in.

Even if CPA would agree to eliminate weekend flights as a gesture of concern, and a show of good faith to the community, feelings might not run so high on this issue. My opinion and that of the residents of the area is that weekends are an especially undesirable time for these training flights, especially on Sundays. For some families Sunday is the only day they have to rest and relax. To be awakened at 7 a.m. on a Sunday morning by aircraft noise is not only an unpleasant experience; it is an abrogation of the individual's right to peace and quiet in his own home. One lady wrote to me as follows:

> On Sunday we rarely ask people to visit, because in the last year the weekend air traffic has made normal conversation impossible. The same situation applies to phone conversation, you don't chose to do the phoning at your own convenience, but rather when the fewest jets will be passing over.

However, CPA has rejected any plan to do away with week end flights. I have put this proposal to CPA on a number of occasions, but as the replies have not been positive we have no choice but to seek approval for legislation which will make it possible for an agency of the government to force commercial carriers such as CPA to do what they should already be doing as good corporate citizens. This is the aim of the bill before this House.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, my remarks have concentrated on the conditions at the Vancouver International Airport but the basic issue under discussion, that of noise pollution, is not just regional in nature. Its scope is nation-wide. Therefore, I hope that this bill, as one measure that should become part of a total program to combat this form of pollution which threatens not only our physical health but our mental health as well, will receive wide support from all sides of this House of Commons.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I congratulate the sponsor of this bill for his concern on behalf of his constituents. Indeed, noise is a form of pollution around airports. In Canada and throughout the world, this form of pollution is becoming very serious and methods must be found to control it.

The sponsor of the bill has not introduced a measure dealing with noise, or with noise as a form of pollution. The bill suggests indirectly that noise is a form of pollution. The purpose of the bill as set out in the explanatory note is:

> —to restrict pilot training flights by international and regional air carriers at international airports in Canada.

I said the other night that a bill introduced by a colleague of the hon. member from British Columbia was good in intent but wishy-washy, and neither clear nor definitive. The same might be said here. Considerable attention has been given to pollution from noise, and much information is available to those who are interested in finding it. Airlines are constantly striving to reduce the noise of their aircraft's engines, particularly around major airports, but stopping flying training at international airports and moving it to regional airports such as Abbotsford is certainly not the answer to the problem. May I say that if the people in Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, Calgary or Edmonton object to flying training in their areas, we shall be very happy to accommodate training pilots at Halifax International Airport, because every time an aircraft lands or takes off it means that money is left in our economy; and we welcome that. Perhaps that remark may sound facetious; at any rate, we would welcome flying training activities in the Halifax area.

Although I congratulate the hon. member for his concern about the people living off the end of one of the busy Vancouver runways, I suggest that what he is advocating or suggesting is not really possible. It may be very desirable; by the same token we may all like to drive Cadillacs, but we do not all have Cadillac incomes. Flying training is a very necessary part of transport and communication in Canada today. With the ever-increasing jet traffic at our airports has come the vital need of making absolutely certain the pilots of these aircrafts are competent and completely familiar with changing techniques that may involve new methods of blind approach as well as operations in the air traffic control tower.

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the basis of my concern is the tragic mid-air collision a short time ago at the airport the hon. member referred to and the reaction of the people who viewed it. There is no indication of what caused the accident and we must be careful not to assess responsibility and blame. The best way to avoid accidents like this is by constantly upgrading the capability of local traffic controllers and the pilots who fly not only private aircraft but the regional, national and international air carriers as well. Air traffic control towers at our international airports report to Ottawa an ever-increasing load factor. Perhaps I might put on record one or two statistics that will support in a general way what the hon. member is attempting to do. I have in my hand a service bulletin of the Aviation Statistics Centre, put out by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The document is dated October, 1969 and bears the number 8705-501. It reads in part:

> In 1967, 7,304 civil aircraft registered in Canada with a valid certificate of airworthiness, flew 2,136,614 hours.

That is an awful lot of flying in anybody's language. I continue quoting:

> Of this total 2,098 commercially operated aircraft flew 1,400,625 hours or 65.6% and 4,722 privately owned aircraft amassed 643,118 hours or 30.1% of total hours flown.

These figures have increased by substantially more than 14 per cent since October, 1969. I, therefore, suggest that the increased air traffic at airports has increased and not diminished the necessity for our constantly upgrading the skills of pilots. Most experienced pilots need to take what are known as check rides every so often. As airports become more congested, senior and advanced pilots must be able to upgrade constantly their flying skills and techniques, and to practise simulated approaches at our airports. Department of Transport statistics indicate that in September, 1969, there were 8,603 simulated approaches in this country, whereas in the previous year there were only 7,170. In other words, simulated approaches are increasing at the rate of 1,500 per year. Many of these approaches were undertaken to upgrade the skills of commercial pilots; some were check rides, and others were undertaken to break in, so to speak, new pilots.

• (5:20 p.m.)

It is impossible to overstate the necessity to maintain the high level of safety that both Canadian Pacific Air Lines and Air Canada have achieved. These pilots must train in airports where there is total control in terms of the ever-increasing amount of traffic at the airports involved. This can only be done at fully equipped airports. In addition to a tower, it is necessary to have precision approach radar as well as fire and crash crews standing by. These men train in highly sophisticated equipment. Although it is dangerous, it is a procedure that must be followed if the pilots of our national carriers are to maintain the very high standard that the Canadian air traveller enjoys today.

Another point I wish to make is that training in flying aircraft must be done in the safest possible manner. While it may be a bloody nuisance to the people living at the end of a runway to have planes flying overhead at eight-thirty or nine o'clock at night, the fact is that this is probably the safest time of the day to do this training. This training should not be carried out during the peak hours. I refer to early morning, mid-morning, mid-day peaks as well as the rush hour between four o'clock and six o'clock p.m.

These are the times when the airports are congested and when there is a maximum amount of operational activity.

Perhaps the member feels the situation has become a serious problem. Possibly an airport should be established somewhere in Canada, maybe in the Prairies, where this type of training could be carried out with the conditions at our international airports being simulated. All material necessary in the event of an accident or emergency could be available at such an airport. However, such a plan would be very costly. This may be the reason the hon. member did not suggest it in his bill.

The bill has merit, although I frankly do not know where our national or regional air carriers could carry out their flight training if this were not done at our international airports. I do not know what other airports in Canada would have the necessary facilities. For these reasons, I feel I must oppose the bill. We recognize the traffic loads at international airports are ever-increasing. The question of safety is much more important than the question of noise, although noise has a prominent place in connection with airports.

I wish to make a further observation about airports and training activity as it applies to the private sector. The Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, which represent virtually all private fliers in Canada, contends that the public image of private flying and the suggestions of near mid-air collisions, etc., is not very good. Indeed, it has been harmful to what is a very healthy and stable Canadian industry. Official government accident investigation reports originating in the United States on collisions between airliners and private aircraft have shown that, in some cases, the airliner overtook or was on a collision course with the private aircraft. Therefore, we must be careful what we do. We must not do anything that will downgrade or cut back the amount of time available to train pilots of our national air carriers. They must be constantly prepared to cope with private aircraft.

Because of the highly sophisticated manner in which our national air carriers operate, and the very lagging ground support facilities, we must be very careful not to move too quickly on bills that would in any way restrict the amount of supervised and controlled time that even some of our most senior and experienced national and international pilots require. They require this training as much as anyone else.

No matter how serious the hon. member might be about the problem of noise, I suggest it would not be in the interest of the Canadian travelling public if this House were to prohibit in this type of flight training at the only airports where it can be carried out.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it is not often a member introducing a private bill indicates so clearly his reasons for presenting the bill. If this bill is passed, I am sure it will eliminate the problem with which he is faced. However, it will accomplish little other than to meet the objections of the residents who live at the end of runways.

The problem is the lack of urban control around airports. I remember when Malton Airport was considered to be a long way out in the country, yet people have been allowed to build around that airport. It is now like a downtown airport. These people have a legitimate cause for complaining about the noise, but I feel the noise is only beginning. When the new supersonic jumbo jets come into operation later this year, those people living within eight or ten miles of the airport will find the noise totally intolerable. Instead of just finding the noise objectionable, they will be blown right out of their beds at eight o'clock on a Sunday morning.

I agree with the previous speaker that pilots must be trained in the type of aircraft they will be flying. There are only a limited number of airports in Canada which have the sophisticated equipment necessary for training. We have not restricted training flights on this type of aircraft, nor have we restricted training flights on much larger aircraft. I am referring to the initial pilot training that is undertaken.

Hon. members will recall reading a week or so ago about a very unfortunate accident which occurred in British Columbia where a small plane apparently collided with a commercial aircraft. Happily—if I can use that term in connection with a disaster—it did not have a more detrimental effect on commercial aircraft, otherwise the toll might have been considerably higher.

This is a problem that occurs when training aircraft use an international airport. For this reason I think many members of the House have been pressing on previous occasions for an extension of airport services in order to allow training at other airports. I think most people would agree that an international airport at a busy time of the day is not the place for somebody to practise circuits and bumps, even in a sophisticated aircraft. This should be done at a time when the airport has the least possible traffic; and I presume this is the case.

If the hon. member is sincere about protecting his constituents who live in close proximity to the airport, then is he not concerned about another matter that is progressing very rapidly? A few miles north of the city of Montreal at Ste. Scholastique the government has decided to build a new international airport. In my opinion it is useless to build the airport there because it will not offer any greater advantage than an extension of the airport at Dorval. I can remember when Dorval was some way west of Montreal. I suggest 10 or 15 years from now Ste. Scholastique will be almost downtown Montreal.

People who are buying real estate around our airports are not being given any protection. Certainly this is true at Montreal. If we build a new international airport 20 or 30 miles north of Toronto to handle supersonic jets, we will find houses being built around the perimeter of the airport just as soon as it is put under construction. Similarly, I am sure people now buying lots around Montreal will be only a few minutes drive from this proposed new international airport.

How much more sensible it would be to build an airport 50 miles north of Kingston, in country that has no particular value for anything else. An airport at this location could handle intercontinental, supersonic jets and the government could buy up a 20 or 30 mile area around the airport and enclose it with a fence. In that event there would be no houses within the perimeter of the airport.

Mr. Danforth: That makes good sense.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member says that makes good sense, and this is probably the greatest objection to its acceptance. There is another objection. Canada does not know how to provide speedy ground transportation facilities. The Japanese would find no difficulty in supplying ground transportation that would get people in one hour either to downtown Montreal or to downtown Toronto. I am sure many members would say that the transportation would have to stop off at all the points along the way, but the Japanese would not see it this way. They would decide to provide a train or some form of ground transportation that would move people at 300 miles an hour with no problems at all. We do not do this sort of thing.

No one really knows what sort of impact aircraft noise will have on people; no one is aware of what is the noise factor around an international airport in terms of long-range damage done to human beings. How much worse will this be when planes are travelling at 1,500 miles an hour, twice the speed of sound, and making landing approaches at speeds beyond the speed of sound: sonic booms will create a noise tunnel across the whole area. Yet no arrangements are being made to cope with this problem. Although the supersonic jets are not with us today, they will be with us soon.

It seems to me that the hon. member, who is interested in protecting his constituents who live near the international airport, is doing something on their behalf and is to be congratulated to that extent. I suppose people living, say, around Abbotsford airport would have similar objections and that their Member of Parliament would suggest that the airport should be moved to Sea Island, for example. This would be a great place for an airport; if international flights ever landed there, the weather would probably be so bad you would not be able to see the mountains and passengers would have to spend a couple of weeks there.

No matter where an airport is sited, urban growth must be restricted within the airport's proximity. It seems to me that if we built an international airport in eastern Canada to handle intercontinental air traffic, both feeder aicraft and ground transportation could be employed. In my opinion, Ste. Scholastique was chosen as the site of an airport to appease Quebec: it is a big donation to Quebec.

Mr. Mahoney: Funny way to appease them.

Mr. Peters: Sure it is a funny way to appease them, but it will backfire very badly. This is a beautiful part of the country and tourism has developed there better than in any other part of Canada. Although it is a funny way to satisfy some of the aspirations of the people there, I do not hear Quebec politicians kicking about it. All they see is the vast amount of money that will be spent in that region. Things will be different once the airport becomes operative. They will have to listen to the complaints that our friend from Burnaby receives; and I would remind hon. members that noise pollution from supersonic jets far exceeds that from any jet flying today.

Anyone who has read articles on the level of noise created by these new jets will agree that the only way we can eliminate this kind of noise pollution is to build airports in areas where people do not reside. Moving an airport a few miles north of the city of Montreal will not provide a noise-free environment for the people there. I am positive that the same is true in the case of Toronto. The views of the Toronto members seem to be the same as those of the Quebec members, though they are not quite so vocal. The decision to build a new airport in Quebec has already been made, whereas in Toronto it has not. There is a growing feeling among people in the city of Toronto that they do not want a noisy airport there, and no airport will be built there if some Toronto members can do anything about it.

From his own constituency point of view, the hon. member appreciates the problems that are involved at a modern airport in eliminating noise. If the hon. member has taken the trouble to read about the problems that are developing in the United States because of noise, and has examined some of the estimates that have been made in France and other countries which are in the market for supersonic jets, he will be aware that the problem to which he has referred is nothing compared with the problems that will confront us in a year or two. If the hon. member wants to look ahead and solve the problem of noise pollution at airports, a noise level which has become almost unbearable at busy international airports today, he will have to afford a protection that can only be achieved by moving supersonic jet airports away from any urban congregation of people.

This is a little bit like the argument that takes place in high school when they ask you: What is sound? If a tree fell in the bush and nobody heard it, would there be any sound? I do not think there would be any sound pollution in the proximity of an airport provided we did not have people living near the airport. The people who work on the airports are not so stupid. You see them going around wearing big earmuffs with headphones inside them. The Compensation Board says they must wear them or they will not receive compensation for damage.

If supersonic jets are to land at airports in areas where people live, there will be damage done to human beings. I suggest that the hon. member consider these additional problems which will plague him and all those concerned with international, supersonic travel. I suggest he should provide protection to the general public by making it impossible for urban development to take place in close proximity to airports. I should like to see this bill pass, not only because of what it contains —it goes some way in the right direction, although I think other arrangements would have to be made for international carriers training their pilots in the use of sophisticated equipment—but because I would like CP Air to be told at least once by Parliament that there is something it cannot do and that it is not a law unto itself. This in itself makes the bill worth while.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this bill gives me a very good opportunity to register my serious doubts about the method proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) to solve the real problem. We all agree there is a real problem. Nobody likes noise, and for those who are living very close to an airport the noise creates almost a medical problem. No one likes the air pollution that jets are causing.

So we all know where I stand now, rather than thinking I may stand in one place and suddenly be surprised at the end of my speech—as we were a few moments ago—I want to say I could not vote for this bill, if it reached a vote, in its present form. Even though it might be a bit of a thrill to kick an elephant in the rear end, or slap a bear and run away, or whatever it is that the hon. member was proposing to do to CP Air, it would still be too inconsistent an act for me to pervert myself by voting to pass it just for the pleasure and thrill of kicking the giant in the shins.

I was interested in the observations we just heard about the Ste. Scholastique airport. If the people of Quebec honestly do not want an airport at Ste. Scholastique—

An hon. Member: Who says so?

Mr. Osler: The NDP spokesman for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). I suggest perhaps he could make this a party plank or something of that kind and test it in that way. I think if he really feels this way, this is one occasion when I would thoroughly back the NDP and do everything I could to promote the idea. I am quite sure the people of Quebec would be no more happy to have the airport north of Kingston, and would be probably less happy than having it north of Ste. Scholastique. If we are going to move so far away from that area, and also move the Toronto airport to north of Kingston, I will back any movement made in that direction. I would amend this idea slightly by suggesting we should go the whole hog and move out to God's country where we have clear skies and pure air. We could have one international airport for all of Canada and we would not give a damn about all the noise that could be made.

Mr. Joseph Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) would permit me to ask him a question. I must give a preamble by suggesting I did not hear the last few words of his remarks. Perhaps they had something to do with my question. In view of what was said by the previous speaker, and what he has said, that many Canadians are concerned about the noise of aircraft, would he agree with me that we could probably have an international airport in the keystone province, say in Winnipeg? I am sure we could solve all the other problems with which we are concerned elsewhere in Canada if that were the case.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) is right, as he usually is. Unfortunately, in this event at least he is right too late, because I have already made that suggestion. I will not fault him in that respect because it is better to be right late than not right at all. I would welcome any movement that would result in such a happy situation. I think we could even have the auxiliary airport built at St. Boniface. The main airport happens to be in Winnipeg South Centre.

Perhaps this will not be considered as a serious suggestion at the moment, but the point is that a tremendous amount of investment has been made on behalf of the people of Canada in major airports in this country. Last year alone there was a net expenditure of $149.6 million in air services by the Department of Transport running airports, air lanes, meteorological services, etc. These services are tremendous. They are always lagging slightly behind the demand, but they are very definitely second to none and we can be proud of them. About 45 per cent of the expenditure by the Department of Transport was on air services and was in the neighbourhood of $149 million. The Department of Transport handles something like 1,048,000 instrument flight rules procedures. Some of these would be in respect of training, but some would not. These airports are superbly equipped for training.

I have no sympathy at all for the motion of the hon. member, although I have great sympathy for the constituents who have bugged him about the subject. It is not their fault they bought houses near the airport. It would not be their fault if they bought houses near any airport. I think this is the fault of the municipal authorities who allow real estate developers to get away with murder. They should not be allowed to sell good industrial land, or land good for any purpose other than residential areas, to people for the purpose of building houses and raising families.

I remember when the Winnipeg International Airport was opened at Stevenson Field. This was a beautiful pasture at the north end of town. I can remember when Sea Island was a heck of a good farm for seagull eggs. So it is not the fault of the DOT, the government or the people of Canada that land in the area of airports has been used for residential purposes. The real estate developers have come in and persuaded people to live in areas where they should not be living. There is lots of room in Canada and they could have expanded in other areas.

I know of one airport, which I will leave nameless for the moment, in respect of which extreme pressure was put on a politician to see whether he could get the DOT to release some land right next to the end of a runway. This happened quite recently. It was wanted so that a developer could go ahead with a residential development. It was not going to be used for factories or anything else. The Department of Transport would not release the land on the basis that within the foreseeable future it might need it for an extra runway, in which case the development would be on the flight path. I do not fault the Department of Transport for that; I fault the real estate operator who intended to use the land to make some money when he could have used land somewhere else and done just as well.

Once people have purchased a home and are involved in a mortgage, there is not much they can do but grin and bear the noise. I suggest it is unfortunate for these people and I sympathize with them, but the way to attack the problem is not to interfere with flight training. Airports are for flying; they are for aircraft and airline use; they are for pilot training, air force overhaul work and anything to do with aircraft. They are not necessarily for sleeping, nor is the environment around them for sleeping. There has not been any jet training in the Winnipeg area. We did have the headquarters for the non-jet training of Air Canada, and the Viscount training is still carried on there. We would be delighted to have anyone come there.

If others do not want CPA, we will take it and even issue earplugs to the people living in the area. We will be delighted when Trans-Air receives its jets as a result of the service which it has just been granted. They will have to carry out some training. I hope there is a great deal of training. So far as I am concerned, the more training the better, especially when I am a passenger.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Osler: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will he arrange that that training be over his constituency, rather than over my constituency?

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to do this because with my usual luck, nature will help me. If the hon. member will allow me to arrange it, 80 per cent of the time I shall be glad to do so because the wind rarely blows from his constituency.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Osler: It may in the House of Commons, but in the state of nature it very rarely blows from his constituency. Therefore, we have to bear the brunt of it when we have a warm southerly wind, but the people are in a good disposition then. When we have cold north winds, they take off over the Prairies and it is not too bad.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hot air comes from the south.

Mr. Osler: Yes; there are quite a few rural constituencies to the south where there is a good deal of hot air. I would be delighted to have pilot training in Winnipeg if the CPA wishes to go there. I would ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) to convey this information to CPA the next time he has an argument with them. I do not know whether CPA is being a little intransigent about this matter, but I am told that at the Winnipeg International Airport those who take part in flight training co-operate; they restrict their training hours to between eight o'clock in the morning and nine o'clock at night and therefore are not seriously bothering anybody.

[Mr. Osler.]

The run-up, on the mechanical end, for engine testing and so on complies with the same regulations. So the only time noise can be really objectionable at our airport is when a test pilot is testing an engine that has just been overhauled. He may do a take-off and throw in his after-burner: then there is a noise. But I suggest airports are for this sort of thing. It is better that he do this and find out whether or not it works, rather than do it later when he has a whole crew of highly trained airforce personnel on board, or many passengers if it should happen to be a commercial aircraft.

I would have been much happier about this bill and would have been able to give it my complete endorsement had the hon. member gone one step further and thought about the situation as a whole rather than the local irritation in his area. If the hon. member were to suggest that the federal government should get seriously behind research into noise and research into pollution to see how these things could be ameliorated in this industry, I think the federal government could do a great service not only to all the constituents but to the area as a whole. But I am against this feeling that it is necessary to pick on pilot training, the airlines or anything else.

I remember being in McLeod, Alberta, which had not seen much prosperity for years, during the war when I was engaged in flight training and was officer in charge of the control tower one night when we received a barrage of telephone calls from people. We had changed to Harvards or some other aircraft and had made a lot of noise. The callers said "You are making a lot of noise and are keeping us awake with the aircraft up there". Our standard answer was, "Whose are they; are they ours or theirs?" They would say, "I guess they are yours". We would say, "Then why don't you get down and thank God and not complain about it?".

There is too much pressure right now, in my opinion, about establishing noise abatement procedures. As an ex-pilot I am not always happy when I see a fully-loaded airplane pulling up short and cutting off power so that people on the ground can feel comfortable; they would feel a lot less comfortable if the procedure were not carried out and the whole load were dumped on them. I think that sometimes we look at the noise abatement procedure a little too intensely. Sometimes I feel it is too bad this bill is not a bill or a motion to get the government behind research into the causes, rather than a bill just to look after a local community.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I feel very much like I feel in the morning when I wake up early and wait for the alarm clock to ring. I am convinced, as always, that my colleague has prepared a bill with his usual good intentions. However, it would seem to me that the many speeches we have heard from members of the House invalidate the relevancy of the bill. I should like to make a brief statement. There were 10,080 flights at the Vancouver Airport in December, 1969, and only 212 simulated approaches. There would appear to be a lack of education in respect of aviation. People do not realize that only certain airports can be used for training. Of course, the international airports have all the sophisticated equipment and the necessary procedures to handle training flights.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hour reserved for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1970

MEASURE TO SUPPLEMENT PENSIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald, (Rosedale) (for the President of the Treasury Board) that Bill C-194, to provide supplementary retirement benefits for certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and to amend certain acts that provide for the payment of those pensions, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I commenced my remarks on Bill C-194 by saying that I would make a few general observations and not a lengthy speech. I pointed out, with regard to the first part of the bill which deals with the 2 per cent escalation in the pensions of retired civil servants, RCMP officers, judges and other persons, that there appears to be very little objection to it even though under this bill people who retired in 1952 would receive a 42 per cent increase in their pensions. I think most people realize that over the years these people have suffered as a result of the increase in the cost of living.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated that December 19, when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) made the announcement, was a happy day. The hon. member had a right to be happy because over the years he has persistently set forth the legitimate claims of pensioners across the country, and more particularly those of civil servants.

The hon. member's persistence has paid off: he had the right to be happy on December 19. He pointed out that some retired civil servants may have suffered if their pensions were so low that they had to avail themselves of the war veterans allowance. If this increase will result in a reduction in the war veterans allowance, I think the government should take steps to take care of the situation.

With regard to the second part of the bill, which is the recasting of the pensions of the Members of Parliament, if I understood the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre correctly his main objection to it was that the benefits which would be conferred upon retired Members of Parliament would be too generous. I could point out to the hon. member that a similar plan exists in the Ontario legislature, the members of which receive roughly the same benefits as those proposed for the Members of Parliament on their retirement.

It may be said, however, that two wrongs do not make a right. I follow this up by saying that the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) made a very salient argument this afternoon when he pointed out that surveys have indicated that only 1.5 per cent of the members of the House will have had 25 years of service which would entitle them to a pension of 75 per cent of their salary, and that only 10 per cent will have attained 15 years of seniority. That is quite indicative. I am sure the hon. member for Malpeque knows it is not only political attrition that takes place with regard to Members of Parliament and is a hazard of being a Member of Parliament. Physical attribution also takes place, because Members of Parliament today are not to be compared with those of 25 years ago. Some 25 years ago the members of this House sat for three, four or five months of the year. We now find ourselves sitting for eight, nine and ten months of the year and facing a very heavy burden of work.

I noticed in the Toronto Daily Star of last weekend that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) set forth his life for a week in Parliament. He said he was only able to spend approximately eight hours in the House and the rest of his time was taken up with work in his riding taking care of immigration problems, pension problems, unemployment insurance problems, housing problems, and so forth. I am sure all members here tonight would say they do roughly the same.

Not only do we work in the House during the week in regard to legislation, in committees, the study of legislation, reports and so forth, but when we return home on the weekend we are faced with constituents' problems which take many valuable hours in the following week to process. So the hon. member for Greenwood made it on the editorial page of the Toronto Star last week setting forth the hard work of a Member of Parliament, and with that I completely agree.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre used a biblical passage and said that the result of the increase in pension to Members of Parliament is much like the biblical saying, "To him that hath, more shall be given; and from him that hath not, that which he hath will be taken away." I am rather surprised that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would use that scripture because I am sure he realizes that the Galilean carpenter was not speaking about money at that time: he was speaking about faith and spiritual grace. It may be the hon. member got his spiritual figures mixed up. As a young socialist, Mr. Speaker, feeling the difference between the old socialists and the generation gap, I thought he could have used a more appropriate scripture and said, as the Galilean carpenter said, "I come that you may have life and have it more abundantly." Today we young socialists have to think in terms of surpluses, and the distribution of the surpluses is so important in society today.

When you think of what we as Canadians are doing with regard to the surplus of wheat, I think we stand condemned for not distributing the surplus to underdeveloped and underprivileged countries. One thing about the old socialists is that they came up in times when there were shortages. We are now in times of surpluses and technological change, and it is up to us to distribute these surpluses to the advantage of all people within the community.

There is one further point that my hon. friend raised this afternoon. He said that there appears to be a widening gap between the people who have and the people who have not. He has fought over the years, with a determination and a might which really fits him in with the saints, Mr. Speaker, for the principle of universality of pensions. I have looked at the problem of universality and I have read a little of what has happened in England. Sir Richard Crossman, who is head of the social service program in England, has pointed out that universality in itself has not closed the gap between the rich and the poor and that all our taxation methods just have not been effective. It may be that we will have to get different ways and means of distributing the goods of society so that the gap will be closed. I could not agree with the hon. member more that the gap must be closed, but I say to him that we must look at the universality principle. He may think it is political heresy for me to say so, because he fought so hard over the years to attain it and it would not be fair to him to dismiss it lightly, but I think we Members of Parliament have to look at the problem closely.

I shall close by saying that there is a certain joy in getting: there is also a certain joy in giving. If a member of this House feels he is getting too much in his pension, he can have the joy of directing the surplus to any project or effort that he deems worthy. It is obvious from my remarks, Mr. Speaker, that I support the bill along with other members of my party and I also respect the views of the people who are in disagreement but on balance I am sure when reason takes its full account, it will be seen that what is being done in this bill will benefit many of the members, because basically we must not only have a salary but we must have a pension scheme to attract the talented young men in society today.

It is not enough to have the spirit: you must have the talent. Many people who are talented are making far higher incomes and receiving far greater pensions in the other fields they are pursuing. To benefit society we have to get these men into Parliament to discuss and to solve the problems of society.

This measure is a first step in giving a person some security with regard to income and pension, a step that will make the job of legislator far more attractive.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the reason that we are considering this bill this evening results from one fundamental difficulty. It is a matter to which I have referred on previous occasions, and that is that the programs of the pensions for the public service, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the armed services, the Members of Parliament and others subject to this bill have never been funded. In other words, while there is such a thing as a public service superannuation account and an armed services superannuation account as book entries, the payments therefrom are a charge against the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

There is no segregation of actual moneys, no fund invested in the hands of trustees, and there is no growth in the fund due to investment. All that there is is the provision of the contributions from members to each of these pension funds, and the contributions of the appropriations by the government. Then in view of the progressive increase in the cost of living over the years and the very natural demand, and the right thereto, by the participants in any of these pension funds to increase their return so as to meet the exigencies of the day and maintain the standard which had been promised them, there is an undertaking that when you give a man a pension scheme, you will give him a standard of living. There is that implication, and it has been denied.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I recall—I believe it was about 1958—that this House gave an increase in pensions to retired public servants and, I believe, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for those who retired prior to 1953 and whose pensions were below a certain level, which I think was $3,000. This was a sort of bandaid operation and I think it was wrong not to tackle the problem properly. Mind you, there were other problems in 1958 which I think would have caused a terrific change. It seems to me that the more we delay, the more difficult will be the change-over.

Doing it this way, with a provision for an automatic cost of living escalator which is fixed, if we continue with the present scale of inflation—and there is no guarantee that we will not—there will be a mounting deficiency each year of something in the nature of 3 per cent or almost 4 per cent. This means we will get the same pressures in a matter of a few years. However, if there had been a funded program for these pensions, there could then have been determined actuarially the increase in the amount of the pensions based upon the increase of the funds through earnings, and therefore through capital appreciation. The funds should not only be in government bonds because they have gone down tremendously, particularly in the past two or three years.

In any event, we would not have this fundamental difficulty of having to come along at this time in order to relieve the very real distress of those thousands and thousands of members of the public service and the armed forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and also, unfortunately, many of our colleagues who have departed from this place, or their widows, who are living in relative penury today. All sorts of ad hoc arrangements have been made to take care of some of the cases to the point that what we had up to a few years ago was scandalous, and it is just short of that now.

We are now asking the public service—ourselves in a different way, but let us say the public service—and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to pay an additional premium into a separate account which I suppose one could call an inflation account. It will put into a separate account an amount which will be then paid to those persons who are the most deserving under the scale proposed in the legislation, where the cases are the hardest. It will also provide that the present members of the public service and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who will retire in the years to come will have this automatic 2 per cent escalator, all because of the additional premium that they pay.

There have been many criticisms of this, but the fact that the pension schemes are not funded is, frankly, the nature of the beast. We simply cannot say to the public service, "All right; for those of you who have retired and whose pensions are below a certain level there will be ex gratia payments or there will be subventions, subsidies to your pensions". If that were the case, there is an equally strong case to ask, "What about all the CNR employees who have retired?" Their fund is somewhat different, but in justice if you do it for one class of pensioner you must do it for another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is a subsidy from the public charge but, Mr. Speaker, why only two groups? You must go along to every pension scheme—

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hear "Oh, no". What greater qualification has a member of the public service or the CNR than a member in a private scheme?

An hon. Member: It is up to his company.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Was it up to the CNR, which was a private company to that extent?

An hon. Member: It is not a private company.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is a private company to that extent; it is a Crown corporation run like a private business and its pension scheme is a funded one—this is the point—and it is one of those that is causing a great deal of difficulty. I do not think you can justify subvention from the public accounts by way of an additional expenditure to increase the pensions of one particular group without giving it to others. They are all citizens of this country; they have all been taxpayers; they were all subject to the same conditions and expectations, whether in the public service or otherwise. So this scheme that has now been devised for the public service will of itself take care of the problem of an additional impost on pensions and pension credits over the next few years. I do not think that is the answer, but I say it is much better than nothing. I hope that before too long we can get around to putting some order into this pension scheme.

Let us look at the other aspect, as to amounts. I think this question can best be discussed in committee. There probably will be representations about whether the provisions as to particular categories of retired public servants and the RCMP will qualify. I think that will have to be determined in committee.

The other day, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) whether there had been a memorandum in existence and circulated among departments which indicated there might be a proposal to postpone service pensions until age 65. The minister has not come back with the explanation but merely told us that initially at least it was never proposed to defer service pensions to people now in the service until age 65. I know that under unification there were some breaches of contract between the Crown and a lot of the volunteer servicemen but never, I think, would any administration attempt that.

Yearly increments in the increases announced by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) shall not apply to the armed services, apparently on the premise that servicemen retire before the age of 65 and are able, because of their training and capability, to obtain positions in the economy to take care of their needs. And even as within the public service, all the pension they are entitled to is not charged to them because of the limitations of these so-called artificial and completely obsolete restrictions that one cannot draw twice from the Crown, once by way of pension and once by way of salary. This restriction is so completely obsolete and wrong that it is stupid.

As a matter of fact, in our own pension plan we deviate from this restriction because we have a provision in our pension act whereby a former prime minister is entitled not only to his pension as a former member but to another one for being a former prime minister of this country. I agree that he is entitled to that, but there are two pensions arising out of two positions. I find it singularly artificial to distinguish between two men, one, say, a former Member of Parliament taking a position as a district court judge and being told that the pension he has earned as a member of this House has been suspended, and another who takes employment with the provincial government as a senior police magistrate at the same or higher salary than that of a district court judge and who may keep his entire pension. What an anachronism, Mr. Speaker! Is the Crown in right of Canada any different from the Crown in right of the province of Ontario? For some unknown reason this silly rule is applicable here. I want to see some changes made in this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I want to see a provision that any pension that arises from service in this House shall not disentitle to the extent of even one penny any pension that an hon. member on retiring from this House shall receive by virtue of taking an appointment with the federal government. Why should a competent lawyer who has been a Member of Parliament for 10 or 15 years and is appointed to the bench, where after 15 years he is entitled to a pension—and I point out he need not contribute to it—equivalent to 70 per cent of his retirement salary, not receive both pensions?

The lawyer who has been in this House for 15 years and worked hard has lost his practice, just as any doctor would lose his practice. He has not accumulated any capital. Shall he go to the bench in competition with men straight out from practice? Of course, the compensation and conditions must be equal, and they are equated by the fact that we are provided with some form of retirement scheme. Why should not a member who is a lawyer retire from this House and go, shall we say, to the Canadian Pension Commission—some have gone there—or the Immigration Appeal Board? The former Minister of Justice has just gone to the Immigration Appeal Board.

An hon. Member: Include the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, or the Canadian Transport Commission. I know the former member for Hamilton West is now in the employ of the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Monteith: In the employ of Jack the Ripper.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Nothing is wrong with that. But for goodness sake, if any men or women who have been members of this House take an appointment under the Crown, they ought to be entitled to be paid their full salary as well as the pension they earned from serving in the House. They earned it. It was one of the conditions of being here, just as there are similar conditions in other types of employment. To negate this in this day and age is so anachronistic that it goes back beyond the horse and buggy age. I hope that in committee appropriate amendments will be introduced so as to remove this disability. I think that would be only fair.

Let us look at the changes in our pension scheme. There are also anachronisms there in the definitions. In one part we see that only $12,000 shall be deemed salary, and in the other part we see $18,000 mentioned; in other words, the expense account in the one case shall not be deemed to be salary but in the other case it shall. There are difficulties here and I trust some way may be found to clean them up. Perhaps the changes in the pension scheme put the cart before the horse because the necessary changes should take place first with regard to members' salary levels, to make them more realistic.

I refer hon. members to the report of Dean Curtis of Queens University dealing with pensions. It was tabled some weeks ago. That report ought to be compulsory reading for members of the press, for those in radio and television and particularly for editorial writers. So many editorial writers seem to think that the pension scheme for members of this House and the other place, and I have read this several times, is the most liberal—with a small "l"—and generous pension scheme in the country. What abysmal ignorance, Mr. Speaker!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What abysmal ignorance, Mr. Speaker, to call our present pension plan the most generous in the country. One ought to examine the tables compiled by Dean Curtis indicating the narrowness of the base and comparing the figures with those applying to our counterparts in the United States. It is almost impossible to compare the two, because their annual salary is terrifically high compared with ours, although I think their responsibilities vis-à-vis their constituencies are not different from ours. I am not saying our salary should be as high as theirs, not at all. After all, $42,500 is so far and away above us that it is almost as far as the moon. One must also remember that members down there employ nine or ten people in their congressional and constituency offices. If we reduced the matter to our scale I think we could perform much better, and I think our work would be much better done in this House.

An hon. Member: We should also pay much more in taxes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I do not know if anybody has put on record some of the tables compiled by Dean Curtis. The comparisons made between the pension scheme in this place and those in the provinces, particularly Ontario and Quebec, are interesting. A comparison of tables dealing with the period of service is surprising. I was absolutely astounded to see the tables. Mind you, there were many fine members here in 1957 when I came to this House.

An hon. Member: That was a bad year.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, that may be the impression of hon. members, but I consider it a banner year. Some of my colleagues who are very fine people came to this House at the same time. When we consider how many members who were here at that time are still here, and how many were elected that year or in subsequent elections and served only one or two terms, some of them very short, we see that the composition of the membership in this House is a vastly changing one. I commend to hon. members the tables published by Dean Curtis in this regard. They show that at the time of the 1968 election there were only 24 members with more than 11 years' service. This represents 10 per cent of the membership of the House. This causes one to stop and consider the reason.

We expect men to come to Parliament to represent the people in their area. Once they are here, they find they must work the year round. For many of them it is at the cost of their businesses. A personal business will go down the drain because there is no such thing as riding two horses or obeying two masters. Either the job is done here, or in the private business. If they attempt to do both jobs, Mr. Speaker, the job here is not done and the job at home is poorly done. As far as the professional men are concerned—lawyers, doctors and engineers or others—whose business is more personal, because of continued attendance in this House, unless their business is close by and they can keep a finger on things, within less than five years the capital of their profession has gone down the drain.

I am certain there are members from all parties who are raising young families. They have a responsibility to their families. If we want to get a broad cross-section of members, the conditions must be such that we will get younger members who can participate in normal family life as much as possible within this calling. This must not be a club of the wealthy or the aged.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It must not be for those who think this job is something greater than they could anticipate on civvy street. All of the conditions that apply must be involved in the pension scheme. I have made some suggestions with regard to the necessity of cleaning up this anachronistic situation of a non-funded pension scheme.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Reference has been made to the difficulties of the personnel of the armed services and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. When they retire before age 65 they are not able to get normal employment with the federal government. This cannot be done in many cases without there being an alteration of their pension. However they can take jobs with any provincial government at the same salary they would receive from the federal government, and their pensions would not be affected. We would like to have some of these men working in the federal service. There should not be a penalty for those retired members accepting appointments with the Crown. Their pensions should not be suspended or merged into the salary attached to that position. I hope these changes will be made to the bill during the committee hearings and that the bill will be improved considerably.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, if other hon. members are like I am, they are always looking for ways to impress their mothers-in-law. When I was first elected to this House I thought that although I had never been able to impress my mother-in-law, this time I had to make an impression. Her daughter and I had grown up in a rather poor neighbourhood of Toronto. I thought she would say, "My son-in-law has gone some distance: he has become a Member of Parliament."

I went to see my mother-in-law to receive the honour which I thought was due me. I had a chat with her. Her first question was, "How is the food?" I said, "The food is fine on Parliament Hill. We have some very good restaurants." When she asked, "Do you have a secretary?" I replied, "Yes, I have a secretary." I went on to suggest that although the $12,000 per year salary and the $6,000 expenses were not the greatest in the country, they were adequate and certainly much better than most people in Canada were earning. I told her a few other things. After listening to what I had to say she asked, "But what good is it? It is not a steady job." As far as my mother-in-law is concerned, if you haven't a steady job, you are a bum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Most of us do not have steady jobs; there is no complete certainty that we will be here year after year. But I suggest we are not bums; Members of Parliament are hardworking people. In the time I have been here I have learned to respect members of this House from all parties, whether I agree or disagree with their philosophies. I find them to be hardworking people who are sincere in their beliefs. They probably do not get the kind of respect to which they are entitled. Perhaps not everyone really understands the dimensions of the job of a Member of Parliament.

I can understand those members who are in favour of the increased pension in view of the uncertainty of their lives and considering how hard they work. They may feel they are entitled to some generosity. However, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect I say that these provisions in respect of pension for Members of Parliament are far too generous and should be changed. They just go too far.

An hon. Member: Your mother-in-law was right.

Mr. Saltsman: This is a difficult speech for me to make. It is quite obvious there is a division of opinion between my colleagues and myself. There is a division of opinion in the House on this matter. This is not the type of speech that anyone would find easy. I do not like to take one position when some of my colleagues take a different position. This bill certainly places me in an impossible position. The fact that the government has combined the pensions of civil servants with the pensions of Members of Parliament will not stop me from voting against the bill. I certainly support increasing pensions for civil service superannuates. I think they will understand, however, why I will vote against this bill. If the bill is defeated because of the provisions regarding pensions for Members of Parliament, I am quite sure the government can introduce another measure for civil servants only which will be passed unanimously by this House.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Tolmie: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Would he accept these general provisions if they were passed by this House?

Mr. Saltsman: I have been waiting for that question, Mr. Speaker. Yes, I would accept them. I am not going to make any grandstand play about not accepting these cheques. If this measure is passed and becomes law, I will take the money the same as everybody else. I am not prepared to step aside in that regard. I know I may be accused of being hypocritical in what I say since I have admitted I will accept the cheques, and I do not know how I can prove that I sincerely mean it when I say I am concerned about what will happen to the image of this House and its Members of Parliament if we vote ourselves such generous provisions. I realize I am wide open, not only to that charge but to other charges, since I have an independent income as well. I have also thought carefully about my position and about participating in this debate.

Nevertheless, I would ask you to listen to what I have to say. I would ask you to reconsider this measure when you have the opportunity to do so in committee. I do not deny that there is a need for improving the position of Members of Parliament, but I am asking you how far you can go. Can you justify giving yourself a pension the like of which nobody in our society has? Can you stand before the country having voted yourself this kind of pension and call for restraint among the working force of this country? Can you ever legislate effectively again, when you vote yourself this kind of bonus?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I must remind him that he should address the Chair.

Mr. Saltsman: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; the question from the opposite side of the House carried me away a little. I will address the Chair, as I realize I should. I am asking the hon. gentleman and my hon. friends in this House, through you, Mr. Speaker, to reconsider this matter when it goes to committee.

It seems to me that in comparing our position with the position of others, we should not be compared with lawyers and what a lawyer would make had he not entered Parliament, or with what a doctor or a businessman would have made. We know that most members of this House sustain financial losses by being Members of Parliament. But our decision to come here was a voluntary one. We all claim that we got drafted for the job, and most of us accepted this at some stage of the operation; but we chose this as our career and we came here to do a job because we felt this work was more important than the money we could have made by doing something else.

I suggest our situation is really far more analogous to that of a soldier who chooses to fight for his country. When we talk about compensation for members of Parliament, I think we should look to the way a soldier is compensated when he returns from a war, rather than to what we might have earned had we become the president of a giant corporation or headed up the biggest law firm in the country. When the soldier comes home, we recognize the hazards of his occupation and the need for his rehabilitation. We recognize that he has given up a certain amount of opportunity and income in order to serve his country. Therefore we make a lump sum payment and give him a rehabilitation grant.

If we were to say to Members of Parliament who either retire of their own accord or sort of get carried out that they will be entitled to a resettlement grant of some kind, and to a fairly generous one at that, I think that is something people would understand because most people are familiar with this kind of operation. But when we provide that having served six years in this House we become eligible for a pension for life, that is something different.

There are many young members in this House who, say, after serving eight years as an M.P. and leaving at the age of 40 would get a pension, under these provisions, amounting to over $5,000 a year for life. Given a normal life expectancy of another 35 years, we are talking about a quarter of a million dollars for serving six years in the House of Commons. Over that period of time such a member would have contributed roughly $10,000. This is a pretty nice investment, and it will be difficult to say that you were serving your country. Members of Parliament would be looked upon as investors who invest $10,000 and get back a quarter of a million dollars over their lifetime. Such a concept is just indefensible.

The Curtis report, to which reference has been made, was a good document and I would be inclined to accept its recommendations provided that the central provision which was removed from the document is restored. That document did not provide that a member would receive his pension upon retirement from the House of Commons, but that he would get it at age 55. That, I suggest, is understandable, but not the other concept. With that particular provision taken out, you might as well take the Curtis report and its arguments and throw them out of the window, because the arguments were predicated upon that central provision. Therefore, I hope I will not hear any more about the Curtis document unless reference is also made to the pension being payable at age 55.

I have talked about Members of Parliament who leave this House at the age of 64. There is one member here who could leave at the age of 30. I do not think he will; he will probably stay here until he is 110. But if he did leave at age 30, in his case we would be talking about a pension that would be payable for the rest of his normal life expectancy of 45 years. This would involve more than a quarter of a million dollars. The pension goes up at the rate of 2 per cent a year, and this will continue because I do not think we will ever bring inflation down below its present level. I would not dare try to work out the mathematics involved and claim that they are accurate, but in rough figures I think this is about where it would stand. Therefore I ask: How we can make this kind of provision?

Canadians have a vested interest in this matter. If the electorate wanted to be cynical about it, it could do one of two things: it could make sure that no Member of Parliament served more than four years to be eligible for this kind of remunerative pork-barrel, or if a member did serve more than six years the electorate could make sure that nobody defeated him so that they would not have to pay a pension to two people.

Mr. Peters: They have it both ways.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, they have it both ways. This pretty well concludes my remarks, Mr. Speaker. As I said earlier, it has not been an easy speech for me to make. In reaching my conclusion I probably had as much difficulty as those hon. members who disagree with me had in reaching theirs. This is a sensitive subject. It is the kind of issue that will be misunderstood no matter how it is explained. It will be misunderstood on both sides. I would suggest through you, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members that we need to take a very close look at this provision lest the image of this House and the motivation of members of this House be brought under suspicion.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), and I must say that to some extent I am quite sympathetic to the position he has taken. However, there are a number of items about which I must disagree with him.

First of all, to tackle the central point that he raised and on which his whole argument seemed to rest, namely the question of image, whether we like it or not we in this House of Commons have to accept responsibility for deciding our working conditions, our pay, our expenses and our pension plan. If one were to accept the argument that, by increasing or by improving our pension plan and providing for legitimate expenses and a reasonable salary, we would be hurting our image, we would still be in the position of the members of the old British Parliament where people served in the House of Commons for no pay at all and held office almost by reason of heredity.

In other words, we have to admit that our intent is to make the House of Commons accessible to all people regardless of income. This requires that a rational rate of pay be established, that legitimate expenses be provided and that the pension plan be drawn up on the basis of a Member of Parliament's existence, which is special and unique.

The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) raised the question of the provision of the pension at the time of retirement of a Member of Parliament after having served for six years. The original suggestion in the Curtis report was that this should be done at age 55. I had some responsibility in this as I had consultations with backbenchers on the other side of the House. It was the unanimous recommendation of the backbenchers I consulted that this provision should be struck out, and two reasons were advanced for this. The first reason was that there is no severence pay in the House of Commons. Members of Parliament who come in, particularly if they are young, are taking a backward step in terms of their professions, are handicapping themselves several years if they go back to their professions after being retired either voluntarily or through the usual procedure, and that therefore there was an element of unemployment insurance involved in providing this pension at the time of retirement.

In addition I would say that the retirement pension does not come cheaply to Members of Parliament. The cost of the pension will be 8 per cent, approximately, on the $18,000, or equivalent to about 11¼ per cent on the $12,000 salary. So I would not say this is a particularly generous plan in that we are getting something free. It is a special plan to which we are contributing our share. It is drawn up in this way because it takes into consideration the special conditions and the special financial arrangements that surround the life of a Member of Parliament. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if I sympathize to a large extent with the position the hon. member for Waterloo has taken because of his age and his personal finances, I find it, as a young member myself and one who is totally dependent upon his parliamentary indemnity and expenses, a position I cannot support.

In addition I would draw one other fact to Your Honour's attention. The statistics provided in the Curtis report are rather clear on the matter as to what age pensions are taken out by Members of Parliament. Dr. Curtis recommended age 55. In point of fact his statistics demonstrated that the average pension is not taken out until age 57. In other words, the statistical probability is that while some members will be able to take advantage of long years at pension, the over-all statistical average for Members of Parliament is somewhat different.

I would go further and direct the attention of members to the Curtis report at page 21 in which there is a table entitled "Length of period of membership in the House of Commons at certain selected dates". I would like to give the round figures to Members of Parliament for their edification. The figures are taken for the years 1949, 1953, 1957, 1958, 1962, 1963, 1965 and 1968. The total number of Members of Parliament with less than five years service was 886; with less than ten years, 634; with less than 15 years, 311; with less than 20 years, 132; with less than 25 years, 76; with less than 30 years, 21; with less than 35 years, 9; and with over 35 years, 1. Those are the results as of the elections in the year specified, a total of eight. If one breaks down the percentages, a great deal of interesting information appears. The total number of members with less than 15 years was 1,831, which is 88 per cent; the total with 15 years and over was 227, for 12 per cent. If you break them down a little finer you will find that about three-quarters of all Members of Parliament during that time had under ten years' service.

So it is quite apparent that if you are trying to draw up a pension plan that makes sense for Members of Parliament, you must take into consideration the high risk and low income potential and the high degree of retirement by non-voluntary means. Members of Parliament do not last long, yet in terms of their personal careers and in terms of the income which they might have made, the sacrifices which they are called upon to make are often quite excessive.

It may well be that there are other factors which should be considered. I think we should look at the statistics which Dean Curtis provided at page 20, on the existence of the present plan of Members of Parliament to find out how it works. In point of fact, the classification of allowances being paid as of March 31, 1968, was as follows: there were 177 allowances paid directly to ex-members; 7 were paid directly to widows; 20 were employed in the public service and their pensions suspended; 13 were appointed to the Senate and their pensions were suspended; and 5 were members of the House of Commons coming back again with their pensions suspended. A total of 41 members died.

Where was all the money going? It may interest hon. members to know that as of the same date there was only one member receiving a pension over $5,000; there was only one member receiving a pension between $4,500 and $5,000; there were two between $4,000 and $4,499; there were three members receiving between $3,500 and $3,999; there were 39 receiving between $3,000 and $3,499; 56 receiving between $2,500 and $2,999; 23 receiving between $2,000 and $2,499: 41 receiving between $1,500 and $1,999, of which four were being paid to widows; there were 16 being paid between $1,000 and $1,499; and there were two pensions being paid between $500 and $999, both of which were going to widows, for a total of 184 people receiving pension. On the facts of this table Dean Curtis comments as follows:

In addition, 376 ex-members received withdrawal allowances since the beginning of the plan. It can be seen from the above material that despite the theoretical ceiling the actual payments have been relatively small. Of course the plan has been in existence for only 16 years and therefore the full impact is not yet evident. But it is evident that more have left the House with repayment than became eligible for pensions. So the main conclusion is that the present level of payments cannot be called adequate. As pointed out, one of the fundamental problems with the House of Commons plan is the relatively short tenure of the members.

So the document which Dean Curtis presented to the House of Commons has investigated this matter and provided a plan that takes into consideration the relatively short tenure of most Members of Parliament. I would go so far as to say that with the increasing number of Members of Parliament who are coming from urban areas where there are fewer fixed voting habits, shall we say, the rate of turnover of Members of Parliament is likely to increase, and in fact the number of members with a small amount of time in the House of Commons is liable to be a matter of concern in the future. Dean Curtis goes on to point out:

Of the total number of cases 2,072, 1,831—88 per cent—are under 15 years service and 227—12 per cent—are 15 or over, and are concentrated in the next two intervals. Clearly the attrition of electoral and mortality factors keeps the period of services relatively low.

[Mr. Reid.]

• (9:10 p.m.)

Therefore, the dean reached this conclusion:

Thus it is clear that one of the basic facts causing the inadequacy of the Parliamentary pensions is the relatively short tenure which cannot be compared with the 25-35-40 year period of private and public employment. A straight line system cannot be adequate—a fact which is recognized in the recommendations.

So I would say that the plan presented by the government clearly takes this into account and tries to provide for it in a reasonable way. Dealing with the current House of Commons, Dean Curtis says:

—of the 1968-69 membership, 159 members have been in the House five years or less; and that some 240 entered the House within the last 11 years. This leaves 24 who entered the House over 11 years earlier. At the end of the present Parliament there will be fifteen or so with 20 years or more service. This overstates the length of service because a number of members were not continuously in the House; they were defeated and were later re-elected. Also some members entered the House by by-elections in off years but this does not distort the general picture.

I think the report of Dean Curtis is rather conclusive, but there is another matter about which I feel quite sensitive. It has to do with the treatment afforded the income of some Members of Parliament. On page 28 of the report Dean Curtis provides the rationale which has been accepted by the government and which I personally do not think is a proper assumption. Nevertheless, it is worth reading into the record because it is a serious point of contention and one into which I hope the committee will look most seriously. Dean Curtis states:

The use of the full emolument as a base—part of which is now tax free—raises some difficulties but upon examination these do not appear serious. In the first place some arrangement must be devised to increase the pensions base in absolute terms and secondly there seems to be no other group for which this would be a precedent. If the full payment is not used as a base it would require a 10½ per cent contribution by the member to get the entitlement set out.

I would point out to hon. members that the figure of 10½ per cent is not accurate because the bill provides that it be 7½ per cent plus, I understand, another one-half per cent to provide for increases for members. This represents a total of 8 per cent on the amount of $18,000. The dean continues:

Although the matter of taxation is not within the terms of reference of this report, it may be relevant to mention that some taxation problems may arise. Inasmuch as a 10½ per cent contribution on the present salary of $12,000 gives the same amount as the 7 per cent on the salary and allowance, it would seem unimportant which technique is used. The amount in fact is less than the maximum deduction under the Income Tax Act. The advantage of using 7 per cent on the $18,000 base is that it automatically adjusts to any change in the proportions of the two categories of payment. With the salary alone the rate of contribution would have to be changed if the proportions were changed. And in view of the fact that the Carter Commission and the Smith Commission (Ontario) were both critical of the existing arrangement, this could be a matter of future importance. Further, if the salary base—$12,000—is used, this figure would have to be the maximum allowance permitted.

However, subject to these considerations, it is true that the base of contribution could be changed to the salary alone and the entitlements still be calculated on the combined return. It is simply a calculation and provided it comes out with the same allowance, the basis of making it has little significance—tax or otherwise.

This was the rationale the government accepted. At the time it was being discussed, I pressed the view that it was an incorrect assumption and one which the government ought not to accept. However, I understand the rationale from the government's point of view was that it was an administratively cleaner situation and one which caused the administration less difficulty. At the same time it has been pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that it does raise some doubt about the separation of our expense account and salary. Therefore, it is a question which I hope the committee will investigate most seriously.

Those are the comments I wish to make particularly in respect of the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Waterloo. I think I have dealt with the two basic objections they raised. I hope hon. members will not hesitate to support the bill, particularly this aspect of it.

I had intended to speak on the question of CNR pensions, especially since this is a fairly important issue in the constituency I represent. I understand that the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) has been looking into this matter. The question which must be solved is this: it is not necessarily a legislative situation but rather a situation in which the CNR pension plan is run by three appointees from the General Chairman's Association as well as three representatives of the CNR management. It is largely a question of union negotiation and I hope it is one which unions will press with vigour.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, it takes courage to introduce a bill of this kind in the House of Commons, especially at a time when one branch of government is begging for restraint while another is saying we should try to do something where there is need. The devil can quote scripture to his purpose and hon. members may decide, if they like, whether I am devil or saint because I intend to refer to a little scripture myself by saying that the workman is worthy of his hire, and thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. I hope my friends to the left are listening; They know about the corn. Then I say: Lo unto you scribes and pharisees, hypocrites. You speak one thing and do another. You are willing to take the money but not the political risk of demanding that which you know is just and fair.

When we consider the spending of $15 billion of the Canadian people's money, it represents a tremendous responsibility on the part of those who sit in this chamber. They form the board of directors of a tremendous corporation, the all-powerful state. I am surprised that the criticism comes from that corner of the chamber where they bow down in their hypocrisy and believe that the people of Canada will support it. What utter nonsense! In some countries of the world I suppose we would be called commissars. Do they live at the bottom of the heap, do they have the private yachts on the Sea of Aza and the private villas on the Baltic or do they eat the caviar and drink the vodka while the poor peasants sweep the streets of Moscow. What hypocrisy, indeed! I will give you a little more scripture: I would that ye were either cold or hot.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has stood up once a week for the last ten years begging for a square deal for civil servants. In one form or another I have been a civil servant for many years. This is a time not to be a civil servant. I think perhaps we should have placed the question of our salaries before a private corporation of some kind. A corporation might not have been afraid to take the responsibility of seeing that members get a square deal from the Canadian people.

You might say, "You were only a policeman once and you walked the beat for 50 cents a day". Yes, I did. You might then ask, "But were you proud of that?" I fought overseas, and it is strange to be told by people who did not fight overseas about my duty to my country. I fought overseas for $1.30 a day. Were the people of Canada proud of that? It is only in the twentieth century that the heroes of the country are denied the rewards of victory.

It is only we who are so mean as to say that those who serve the country well should take the bottom of the heap. When you say that, it is from the depths of hypocrisy because if you are worthy of your salary in the House of Commons, I do not know what your salary should be. We could not pay some men enough money to give up their time and serve here. I could give the House a good example in a man such as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). He could have made ten times the salary of any civil servant had he wanted to stay in private practice and use his great talents for his own personal gain.

I may be well paid, but I know members of this House who are not well paid. It is a poor trick to divide our salaries into parts and say that one part is for expenses, another part is salary and the third part is indemnity. A workman is worthy of his hire if he is doing a good job. I am quite sure that the people of Canada would not object to paying him a reasonable amount. If we are unable to come to a decision on what is a reasonable amount, let us hand over the responsibility of making that decision to a group of university professors, or let it be done by computer.

There are inequities right now in the House of which we are all aware and which members to my left could well point out. They would be on solid ground if they brought them up and I would go along with them in this regard. I will mention one in particular, about which I know something. How about the expense account of our member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange)? Does anybody within sound of my voice think that everybody should get the same expense account as a member who covers 2½ million square miles in an area where there are no roads and no transportation facilities except for the airplane and the kayak? Should he be expected to cover the frozen Arctic on $6,000 a year when it is impossible to hire an aeroplane with a pilot for less than $200 a day, as anyone who has been there would know?

I had the great honour of being the member for Athabasca when I had only 100,000 square miles to cover. I was expected to do it on $6,000 a year. I could not do it then, and I could not do it today. This is very different from having an Ottawa riding and getting the same $6,000. One can say there is an obvious inequity there. However, I would not agree that the man who represents an Ottawa riding is getting too much, because if you got out the score sheet you would probably find that he has expenses about which my friends in the press never talk. How would anyone like three or four school buses full of people driving up to one's door? One is expected to pay for their lunches three or four times a month. This costs money.

My friends to my left talk about the just society just as much as government members. What would they do about this situation? Would it be possible for a poor labouring man to pay for the lunches of 200 school children out of his own pocket? If he were a working man, a soldier or a policeman with a very inadequate pay like I had all my life, this would be impossible.

This is the best pay I have ever had in my life. But if I am doing my work here in the House as I should, I would not hesitate to say that the people of Canada might well take a good look at what I do and decide whether or not I am overpaid. How much does it cost to be a good Member of Parliament without living in the fleshpots, doing one's work, answering one's mail and fighting an election without taking mean or crooked money? It is not one election; we have had six elections in ten years.

Are you supposed to go begging when you write a letter? Are you supposed to thumb your way through the Arctic and pick on the poor natives in the kayaks to get you around this great, dynamic, young country of ours; or should we sit in committee of the House and thrash out this thing like gentlemen? We have computers today. How much does it cost to travel through the Arctic? Let us find out, and stop this business of saying that some of us make a little more and some of us make a little less.

Everyone knows that the hon. member for Northwest Territories is in the hole very day of his life, and we are doing nothing about it. Are we going to hide behind some cheap political jargon and say, "I would not dare go the western farmers and ask them to raise my pay now, when I cannot sell their wheat"? That is quite a different problem which we should also attack. But when we did sell their wheat, our pay was not doubled. That is a very poor argument.

We are not paid on commission. If we were on commission we would have a great deal more money. We are spending $15 billion a year. That should satisfy any socialist. If we were on commission, we would be paid a great deal more than we are at present. We should be paid for the reverse; we should be paid whenever we do not spend money on behalf of the Canadian people. Let us get into the blue for a change let us be paid on how much we take off our national debt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: Let us be paid in a percentage fashion for the things we do positively.

Mr. Peters: Let us start with the CNR.

Mr. Bigg: This might be a good time to speak about it. For 20 years we have been looking for ideas on how to run our railways more efficiently. I do not think this can be done by nationalizing them any more than they are nationalized now. When I went overseas in 1939 in the first contingent, the railroads I saw over there were run very efficiently. Then they were nationalized, and I tried them again. This is your answer. I saw a dramatic change downhill. If I had to go to the Canadian people and say to them, "Reward me for socializing everything," I would not take anything in pay. As a matter of fact, that is one of the reasons I came to Ottawa. I did not know then how much money I was going to get when I came here. I came here because I thought they needed some honest men in this chamber who would devote the rest of their lives to cleaning things up around here. This I have tried to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: A workman is worthy of his hire. I did not sell the last 12 years of my life for cheap money. I defy any member of this House to say that I sold five minutes of it. If he proves it, I will resign tomorrow. Let him prove it. Not five minutes of it have I ever sold for the 30 pieces of silver which a member might want to dig out of the holy book and throw in my teeth. Let us be fair about it. Are we worth what we are getting, or are we not? If we are not, let us go home. If Members of Parliament are going in the hole steadily, and I think some of them are, what is the reason for it? Are they overspending?

Mr. Peters: We have no time to spend money.

Mr. Bigg: What is a member's take-home pay? For 10 years I have listened to references about money that I am getting for nothing. People who write these stories do not know how much I am taking home as a public servant, which I consider to be the highest honour one can receive in the country. As Members of Parliament we get a very small percentage of the salary received by some civil servants who are contributing little or nothing to the welfare of this country.

While I was sitting here making notes I made a list of some of the things we should be doing. We are responsible for the defence of Canada. Have we any defence in Canada? If we were being paid for the defence of Canada, perhaps we should take a 30 per cent cut in our pay and go home. We are here for the formation and improvement of our laws. I am not too sure that some of the laws we pass are any great improvement, despite the hard work we may have done in committee.

• (9:30 p.m.)

We are supposed to be ombudsmen for an average of 75,000 people apiece, yet the government thinks it necessary to have regional desks. If members of the cabinet need regional desks, it is because they are not working us properly, we are not working properly ourselves or we have not sold the idea of why we are here and that we are doing our job. I do not think we need regional desks. I happen to think I am ombudsman for the 77,000 people who sent me here. Maybe that is why they sent me back here five times. I say to hon. members, if you want to qualify for your full pension, be an ombudsman for your 75,000 people and they may send you back here more often than you want to come.

Then there is the question of having two homes to maintain. I have two homes to keep up. We want family men in this chamber. We don't want just bachelors; we don't want just spinsters. We want family men, who represent the greatest cross-section of the people of Canada. If you are a family man and a Member of Parliament, you have two duties to fulfil. You have to think of your family at home, the children going to school, training to be nurses or going to university. In fact your wife has to think of these things a great deal more than you do while you devote your time to the service of the nation. In return she bathes in only a little reflected glory. That little reflected glory gets less and less every time someone gets up in this House and says we are not worth the money, as more than one hon. member has done already. I would like to hear much more from men who are going into debt in the service of our country than from men who do not have to rely on inadequate pensions because they have private fortunes, such as most of us do not enjoy.

Then, too, we have a certain amount of entertaining to do, whether we like it or not. Some of us are a long way from our constituencies and we are only too pleased, when people from home come to see Parliament Hill, to take them around. But some hon. members have busloads of people arriving, and this can become a considerable financial burden unless one happens to have a private fortune.

If you do your work as a Member of Parliament, you are responsible for the political education of the public. Any time you are asked—and it is often at your own expense—you have to go and talk to farmers, tradesmen, fishermen or any other group of people who want to hear you, who want to know how you do your work and the difficulties you encounter in doing it. One of your jobs is to keep people abreast of democratic progress in Canada. All this costs money. You cannot travel from here to northern Alberta, a distance of 2,500 miles, and back without a considerable outlay from your private resources.

The Member of Parliament is not expected to be on a salary. Nobody has ever called our pay a salary, yet that is what it is. The Member of Parliament has to put up with a broken business or professional life. But we won't be hypocritical about that. Of course I knew that was going to happen when I came down here. But putting the shoe on the other foot, do the people of Canada want me to suffer unduly, financially, if I do the job? I do not think so. I think this is one area where if you take the public into your confidence, tell them the whole story, tell them how much it costs you to live, how much it costs you to support two homes, how much it costs you personally to fight elections on their behalf—if you are not fighting elections on their behalf, why are you here?—they will see the merit in the case. After all, this is a democracy.

How many men have become rich by coming here? I know of none, and I think that is a credit to this House and to the people of Canada. Only cynical people think that being a Member of Parliament is a short cut to a fortune. I will tell you how innocent I am in this regard. I do not know any of my friends who have made money by being Members of Parliament. Such a case has not come to my attention. I am naïve enough to believe that this is representative of almost all, if not all members of the House of Commons. So, Mr. Speaker, what are we being so shy about? Unless you are a supporter of the successful government of the day when you retire, you can expect no after-reward. As a matter of fact, by being a Member of Parliament you disqualify yourself from many lucrative jobs, and in fact without loss of pension rights you cannot take a job in the direct pay of the government of Canada once you have been a Member of Parliament. This is not even logical.

I believe that Parliament is a good school for the training of public servants. If a man spends two sessions here, works on the committees, takes part in all the discussions, has the experience of meeting men from all over the country, he would have to be a dull fellow not to have learned to be a better civil servant. Yet from the very terms of our work and the terms of our pension scheme we disqualify ourselves from further service to the country.

I am not whining or complaining. I am just trotting out into the open some of the things that have been behind closed doors for too long. It should be placed on the record that we get $12,000 a year subject to income tax, which in a great many cases means approximately one-third off, resulting in $8,000 take-home pay. I have just outlined some of the expenses which no Member of Parliament can escape. Further, the Member of Parliament is donating his time. I think the people of Canada want to know about these things. Of course, I have received letters saying, "Don't you dare raise your pay. Sell the wheat first, Look after our affairs first." That is a very normal, natural, human reaction. But I do not honestly think the people mean that, particularly if they know how conscientious most of us are, the long hours we work, how hard we work and what our financial condition is.

I consider it a brave move, an unpopular move on the part of the government, to bring this thing out in the open at a time like this. The need is great to update our pay and allowances. I hope that when the measure reaches committee we will have no double talk. If the members there cannot come to a consensus to put this scheme into statutory form, I hope we will hand it over to an independent commission as soon as possible and make an attempt once more to take the whole matter out of the realm of seamy politics where I think it has been for far too long.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill passes by ten o'clock, so I will not speak at length.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): You always get applause for that.

Mr. Peters: It is always a good way to start out, and it makes you feel good. We have heard some very good and interesting contributions, but I may let out a small secret by saying the discussions to date have not been nearly as interesting as they have been in caucus—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: There has not been nearly the same heat here or the same interest in this subject. We have heard comments about the problem of raising the pension for Members of Parliament and Senators. More interest has been expressed in this part of the bill than in others, and I congratulate the government for designing it that way. A lot of people seem to favour raising the civil service pension 2 per cent per year, going back to where those who retired in 1952 will probably get an increase of 42 per cent. I think this is the part of the bill that we should be concerning ourselves with, because this percentage is not nearly high enough. If the cost of living increases 4 or 5 per cent each year, obviously we should be increasing the retired civil servants' pensions by that amount.

• (9:40 p.m.)

I hope that in committee there will be an evaluation of the need to maintain pensions at this level and that the escalator clause now established will be able to do that. However, I think before we establish a proper escalator clause in a pension plan we should see that the plan satisfies the needs of those receiving it. I suggest that senior civil servants who retired many years ago are on a pension which is not above the poverty level in most of our cities.

I have been interested in pensions for a long time. This evening there are several people in the gallery who participated with me for many years in an industry where there was no pension. That industry will probably die without there being a pension in it. Most of the people who work in it would have been willing to sacrifice wages to establish any type of pension plan. When I came to this place first, I was very interested in pressing for a pension plan for miners, for bush workers, for the forest industries and those industries in which normally a pension could not be accumulated for the simple reason that the plants did not last enough to establish the normal industrial type of pension.

I can remember speaking of the establishment of a universal portable pension in this House. Members said, "It cannot happen. We cannot do it. It is not possible." Yet countries like Germany, 30 or 40 years ago put in a pension plan that covered five countries. Even during the war when several of those countries opposed Germany they were still paying universal pensions in the five countries combined. What was the pension? When a person retired after a number of years of employment, he received 50 per cent of his highest five years' income. This enabled people to retire in decency and at a decent time.

I have been interested in some of the pensions negotiated in this country and some that could have been negotiated several years ago when the Canada Pension Plan came into effect. I remember discussing this matter with the Ontario Provincial Police who were a little apart from other civil servants in Ontario. In my opinion they would have had the right to negotiate the stacking of their pension on top of the Canada pension. This would probably have brought them considerably more than 50 per cent of their income upon retirement, but like a lot of people, and some in this House, they decided that the expenditure involved to produce that kind of pension was not justified.

Like the member who spoke previously, when I came here I did not know how much I was going to earn. I won the first election by 40 votes, so you can see that I was not overly optimistic about winning it. However, I came here without knowing what the pay was, and when I found out what it was I was very surprised. At that time we were paid $8,000, with $2,000 expenses, making a total of $10,000. That was a hell of a lot of money—twice as much as I had been earning at my job.

The job I had before that had been in a gold mine for 15 years and I earned from 65 cents to $1.09 an hour. When I left I was a raise man getting $1.09 an hour, so $10,000 a year was a lot of money to me. By that time I had participated in several elections and one day the bank manager called me and said, "My wife and I had a meeting last night and decided we are going to vote for you on Monday." I said, "Thank you very much". He replied, "Don't thank me. If you are not elected, I don't know how we are going to collect our $5,000." I had been going in the hole for $1,000 a year for five years, so I thought $10,000 a year was a lot of money. But I was surprised how much I could spend and how many calls there were on it. I was continually going to the bank to sign another note. I think this is relevant to the extent of what one is doing and what your expenses are.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to talk about wages but I can assure you we are going to be very important people in this country—right now we are not—if we decide our salaries should be $100,000 a year. Then we will be the most important people in this country. We may not be the most popular, but we will be the most important.

Over the years we have seen members come and go. This is an odd job; it is the kind of job where a member has to divorce himself from everything. A member who is really serving in this House—some do and some do not—has to be here before nine o'clock in the morning. I do not usually fit into that category because it is very difficult. But he should be here before nine o'clock or the staff will not be doing anything; and he should be here until the late show at 10.30 p.m. This means that he is limited to meeting the general public on the weekend if he can get to his riding for that purpose. It is not a normal job and the fact that there are only 264 members and not too many people trying for positions is an indication that it has some hazards.

Since I came here I have heard many people say that this or that cannot be done, or that the Canada Pension Plan was an impossibility. Everybody laughed at me when I raised it, but only two years later when the government said they were going to implement it, nobody voted against it. I have seen this sort of thing on many occasions. My interest, Mr. Speaker, is to win for everybody the maximum possible pension. There are many unknown quantities in any pension plan. If somebody says, "Pension plans have always gone broke and the Canadian people have to pay more money all the time," there is something wrong with the plan. We have had two calamities to our pension plans: we had the calamity of 1958 when we lost 50 per cent or more of the members, and the calamity of 1962-63 when we again lost 50 per cent or more of our members. But these are not normal circumstances. The hon. member who spoke previously said that we had six elections in ten years and the turnover was considerable in that length of time. I do not think we anticipate that situation in the foreseeable future, so our pension plan has not been a difficulty to the Canadian public, and we are making our contributions.

Some time ago, Mr. Speaker, I was offered the opportunity of participating in the pension plan of the union where I had previously been employed. That plan was five and five—5 per cent paid by the employer and 5 per cent paid by the employee. Being employed outside that plant I would have had to pay 10 per cent of my present salary of $12,000 plus $6,000. When I looked at $1,800 a year, I decided I could not afford it. It seems to me a pension plan hinges on what a person can afford to pay. No matter whether the employer is paying a share or not, it has to be paid from wages. The plan has to be self-supporting. It is not like the unemployment insurance plan where occasionally we get into a situation where we have to add money to it.

Someone asks, and rightly so, whether we should not do something about the actuarial study that regulates the establishment of that kind of fund. So long as the fund is solvent and no one can point to any error in the calculations connected with the plan, I think we ought to be able to contribute to as large a pension as we can afford.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Several factors connected with the pension plan for a Member of Parliament ought to be considered. One of them is, as Dean Curtis pointed out in his report, the difficulties members may face on being re-elected. Some members who served here for relatively short terms have been unable to find suitable employment, the difficulty being psychological more than anything else. It is hard to be at the top, then be thrown out and start at the bottom. It is much easier to work when you are at the top than when you are at the bottom. Some members who have been in this position have had difficulty. Dean Curtis suggests that perhaps we ought to give these people a generous grant for the first year after their defeat. I think the best way of doing this is by providing ourselves with an adequate pension scheme that will not cost the taxpayers additional money.

The qualifying time for a minimum pension has been reduced to six years. I think that is unduly generous because I saw nothing wrong with the three-term provision. I am amused to see people who during five years here have served three terms. When the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) first came here, he fought three elections in one year. Immediately after his first election he was forced to fight a by-election, and within eight or nine months he again fought a general election. He really has been elected to Parliament three times.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think he was elected to only two separate Parliaments in those three elections.

Mr. Peters: If Members of Parliament are willing to make larger contributions, and if the plan can be introduced in such a way that it does not impose an additional financial drain on the treasury, I see nothing wrong with it. I believe every man should be entitled to a retirement pension which will give him a reasonable standard of living. Every man on retirement should be entitled to live in the manner to which he is accustomed. Some people ask: Why should a man making $50,000 a year be paid $25,000 a year on retirement? I don't know why he made $50,000 in the first place; it is none of my business and I do not give a damn. I do not expect ever to be in that category, but the more power to that man. I do not say he is worth it, but that is his income. He must justify it to some people. His wife will be used to maintaining a certain standard of living. When he retires she will want to continue at that standard and ought to be entitled to do so.

I should like to see in this country an adequate retirement plan for every Canadian. I should like to see insurance companies and the annuities branch eliminated from the retirement field, and the Canada Pension Plan extended to the point where every Canadian can pay into it enough money to assure for himself a decent standard of living in keeping with his best income during his life. We have not been able to do that much for all our people, but that does not mean we should not introduce the changes proposed in this bill. Since we are to enjoy the benefits of a reasonable retirement plan, it behooves us all to do the best we can for all our people.

Finally, I should like to see a change in the proposals of this bill which will give those members who do not wish to participate in the plan the right not to participate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: Provisions might be written into our plan similar to those written into the one affecting members of the other place and which they have not taken advantage of. Those who believe that a reasonable pension plan is immoral ought to have the right not to participate in it. I think that is only sensible.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Last Thursday when the government House leader announced the business for this week, he did not announce the business for tomorrow. Perhaps he could indicate what business the government proposes to present to the House tomorrow.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We propose as the first item of business, Government Order No. 34, the report stage of Bill C-137 respecting motor vehicle safety; to be followed by Government Order No. 25, the report stage of Bill C-138, to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—NORTHERN QUEBEC—TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER ESKIMOS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the proposition I wish to raise this evening arises from a question asked of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) a few days ago which related to the matter of consultation with the Eskimo people, particularly in Quebec, and what the minister meant exactly by "consultation". At no time has the government or the minister attempted to define what is meant by "consultation". The word has been much misused, abused and distorted by the government. I think it probably originated in the mind of the former minister, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing), who developed the idea of the initial round of consultation conferences with the native people coincidentally with the 1968 election campaign. I realize that is an argument.

Anyone examining even cursorily the so-called white paper on Indian Affairs which supposedly resulted from this consultative conference would agree that the word "consultation" is meaningless. In many respects the ideas presented in the paper that evolved as the result of the June 25 meeting last year bear no resemblance to the ideas expressed by the native peoples at the so-called consultative conference. In the minds of Indian and Eskimo peoples of this nation, "consultation" is a word mouthed by government members and is meaningless. They see consultation merely as a process of one-sided conversation, where they listen to people whose minds about the course to be taken are already made up.

We attempted to obtain information from the minister the other day, particularly with respect to the Eskimo people in Quebec who have unequivocally told the government that they do not want jurisdiction over their affairs to be transferred to the province of Quebec. They want to decide for themselves what jurisdiction they will come under. The minister was asked if he would accede to that request of the people. He was asked to listen to grass roots conversation and to pay attention to the needs of the people who would be affected by any such change. The minister refused to budge from his declaration that he would consult with the people. At no time did he indicate he would pay attention or give heed to the intentions and desires of the people.

This matter was put in perspective today by an answer the Parliamentary Secretary gave to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown) in reply to a question regarding the closing of a Mohawk centre at Brantford. The Parliamentary Secretary made his reply with some emphasis and flair. He said, "The closing of the Mohawk institute"—to which the hon. member for Brant had referred—"was after detailed consultations". He made a previous reference to the consultations and used the phrase, "with the consent of the Indians concerned". The phrase "with the consent of the Indians concerned" was said with such elaboration and emphasis it almost appeared as though the unusual had happened. That consultation did not take into account the views of the people concerned.

If the Parliamentary Secretary was at liberty to say that the views of the Indian people with respect to the Mohawk institute had been listened to and acceded to, by the same token the minister, who has far more power and authority, should also take advantage of his privilege and right to say in this House unequivocally and clearly to the Eskimo people in Quebec that the government does not want to impose upon them the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec and objects to it strenuously.

The government should say to those Eskimo people that it is their fundamental right to make that determination. They should be told they are under the jurisdiction of the federal government, will stay there and attention will be paid to their request. The government should say it respects and honours the decision of the Eskimo people and that it will sever any further negotiations and discussions with the province of Quebec in that regard.

Instead of that, the minister talked about the matter of consultation without defining what he meant. He refused to budge from his previous position and tell the Eskimo people who are directly concerned that he would accede to their request, listen to their views and honour their position. In the absence of any such declaration, we can only conclude that these discussions and negotiations with the province of Quebec will continue. The discussions have been carried on for some years; they commenced before this government took office. The purpose of the negotiations is to work out a solution which is contrary to the views of the Eskimo people.

If the Parliamentary Secretary will say, as he said with respect to the Indian people at Brantford and the Mohawk institute, that the views of the people will be listened to and a decision made based upon the request of those people, they will understand clearly where they stand and will respect the government. In the absence of a declaration of that sort, I am afraid the views of the people are going to be overridden.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member predicated his argument or representations on the word "consultation". I do not know of many words in the English language that in their ordinary meaning and sense are better defined in the minds of the people who use them. While I do not have a dictionary here—

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I can send one over.

Mr. Honey: —I think I have a fair idea of what the word means. It means to talk with, to respect the views of. Of course, representations made by various parties are received, considered and a decision is made. That is what my minister has been saying repeatedly, not only to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who has raised the matter tonight but to the leader of his party and to the former Leader of the Official Opposition.

Perhaps the best thing I can do in the one or two minutes that I have is again to put on the record the position as stated on several occasions by my minister. On February 20, as reported at page 3892 of Hansard, in reply to a question from the hon. member's leader, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, I abide by the basic agreement concluded in 1964 between the federal government and the provincial government. We are now negotiating with the provincial government in order to determine whether we could purchase some services from that government for the New Quebec Eskimos, but there will be no transfer of jurisdiction without consultation with the Eskimos.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) then asked a question, to which my minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, that is what we are doing at the present time, and when we have received a report from the officials now engaged in such consultations, we shall be in a position to inform the House on the situation.

I do not have time to refer to the question asked by the hon. member for Skeena on February 25, but it appears at page 4081 of Hansard and my minister gave exactly the same answer. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the federal-provincial team is presently still in the area, as my hon. friend knows, consulting with the native peoples. I am informed that it will be a matter of two or three weeks before the consultations are concluded. They will then, of course, report to the respective governments.

I would emphasize that this is a federal-provincial team which is consulting with the Eskimo people. When a report is received, it will then be the responsibility of the respective governments to consider the recommendations of the report, and if further action or consultation is necessary it will be taken. But at some point a decision will have to be made by those in authority.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—WITHHOLDING OF CONTRIBUTION TO UNITED NATIONS BIRTH CONTROL PROGRAM

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly glad that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is here this evening because I am quite sure he appreciates the urgency of the question of Canada's role in helping, through the United Nations, to get birth control information and family planning to those countries of the world that need it badly.

I was quite shocked when I read in the paper the other day that the program of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities this year has been jeopardized, so the story goes, by differences within the Canadian cabinet over whether or not we should participate in a program that we had agreed to help. Under this program, the United States, Britain, Sweden, Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany, together with Canada, were expected to contribute a total of $15 million for the budget of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities.

Evidently there is a hold-up, and according to the press this hold-up is in the Canadian cabinet. According to this story, the cabinet has not made up its mind about the program although birth control in this country is legal and although we would not be forcing it on any country that did not want it. The Canadian cabinet at that time had plainly made up its mind that Canada should carry out its agreed part of the program.

• (10:10 p.m.)

As I say, I know the minister appreciates the desperate urgency of this situation in the kind of world we have where it took several million years to reach the 2 billion mark in population, which we had in the mid-1930s. They tell us that by 1975 the figure will be doubled to 4 billion people, and that if we go on without any other thing intervening there will be 14 billion people in the year 2035. The likelihood is that there will not be all those people because of a number of very tragic things that will happen. For one thing, poverty breeds poverty and we know how it does. The capital growth of the underdeveloped countries will be brought to a standstill long before that time, because poverty will feed on the few resources they have and there be no chance for them to get ahead. Then there will be continued exacerbations in gross inequalities, and the fear that world income will be going to the developed nations, with all the potentialities for racial hatred and war that that situation will bring.

Also, famine will break out and the people will be dwarfed by the prolonged and dreadful famines of the future. In the next place, the low income and prevalence of hunger in the poorer countries can only mean a continuation of political instability. It is the underdeveloped nations that are most often racked with military coups, civil wars and violent revolutions; and if uncontrolled violence occurs, it can only increase instability. Then there will be diseases. Of course, we now know above everything else the dangers that exist in pollution. They are on a terrible scale, and in all forms imaginable.

It is for this reason I ask the minister—as I asked him earlier today, not knowing that I would be having the opportunity this evening—if he can make some statement as to whether or not this conflict is now resolved within the cabinet and when we can expect it will be resolved. I ask the question because I believe that the matter of world population and family planning can no longer be left to the old-fashioned clichés and shibboleths of yesterday. This is too important a matter to be left to old doctrines any longer: it is a matter of world survival.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much I was not here when the hon. lady put forward her question the other day, but I read Hansard with considerable amusement. I recognize, of course, that the hon. lady, in spite of the mirth that was generated, was very serious in what she had to say. She has today had the opportunity of elaborating her views at greater length and in greater quiet than existed at that time.

The government is actively engaged in elaborating policy in respect of family planning both domestically and internationally. Perhaps I might point out to her as evidence of our great interest that CIDA, the Canadian International Development Agency, has obtained the services of Dr. George F. Brown as special adviser in public health and population. Dr. Brown is well known as a specialist in international family planning programs. I think this indicates that we are not lacking interest in the matter.

I think she will also agree that our international policy must be related to our domestic policies. It would be quite improper for Canada to apply different standards domestically and internationally. We would quite rightly be the point of criticism, that somehow we felt that Canadians were to be treated differently from other people in respect of this kind of activity and policy. I am sure that my friends in the NDP would be the first to condemn such hyprocrisy.

The first step in elaborating a domestic policy in respect of family planning has already been made, as the hon. lady has said, by an amendment to the Criminal Code regarding the dissemination of information on contraceptives, and the government is presently considering what else it should be doing in this field. When we have reached a conclusion in this matter we will be in a position to elaborate our international policy.

In order to indicate that we are not the only important country that is having difficulty making up our minds in this field, I would point out that the United Nations Fund for Population Activity to which the hon. member has referred has only very recently been re-organized. It is only now in a position to accept expanded contributions. Few countries have made contributions. Some countries including Britain, Japan and the Scandinavian countries have the matter under consideration. In this connection I simply want to repeat that the government recognizes the importance of family planning programs and is actively considering what its policy should be both domestically and internationally.

HOUSING—CONSTRUCTION BY POLYMER FOR LOW-INCOME GROUPS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on March 6 I posed a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. I asked him whether or not the federal government intends to make direct loans to municipalities and regional governments to assist them in assembling and servicing land for urban growth in line with the proposal of the Hellyer task force. Mr. Speaker did not allow the question at that time, and therefore I pose it again tonight. The report of the task force on housing and urban development points out the following:

> On the basis of all the evidence and impressions before it, the task force believes that municipal assembly and servicing of land would produce major reductions in land costs in both the short and long-term while encouraging and assisting effective urban planning. Therefore, in summary, the task force recommends that:
> Municipalities or regional governments, as a matter of continuing policy, should acquire, service and sell all or a substantial portion of the land required for urban growth within their boundaries.
> The federal government should make direct loans to municipalities or regional governments to assist them in assembling and servicing land for urban growth.

It was in line with that recommendation that I asked the question the other day. I am sure the government realizes it is not good enough to go about the country with a task force. Grand words concerning what the government may be doing or thinking are not enough. Philosophy is not good enough. Tours of any description across the country are not good enough unless there is active participation by the government in this field. Possibly the government is considering putting this type of money into land assembly projects, but to date the municipalities have been unable to meet the rising costs with which they are faced and therefore cannot be expected to come up with any project in respect of land assembly for urban growth.

At the same time, I am sure everyone here realizes that municipal taxation cannot rise any more: it is at the highest level it has ever been. It would be impossible for the municipalities to attempt to tax the people in order to pay for the type of land assembly that is necessary. With this view in mind, I pose the question and would appreciate an answer this evening.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in the unavoidable absence of the minister I shall be pleased to reply to the question raised by the hon. member on March 6 and his remarks this evening. Neither the minister in charge of housing nor the government have abandoned the proposal of the Hellyer task force that the federal government should make direct loans to municipalities and regional governments to assist them in assembling and servicing land for urban growth.

The task force quite properly pointed out that the joint federal-provincial investment in the assembly of land for housing purposes had been a feature of the National Housing Act for nearly 20 years. The task force recommended that provinces be urged to take greater advantage of this facility. The task force also urged that the Housing Act be amended to provide loans to municipalities and regional governments for the assembly and servicing of land.

Hon. members will recall that the National Housing Act was amended in June 1969. One of the amendments authorized CMHC to make loans to municipalities and to regional governments for the acquisition and servicing of land for general residential purposes. The sum of $20 million was provided in the capital budget of the corporation for 1969 for that purpose.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Again, notwithstanding the government's desire to devote most of its own resources and efforts to the provision of low income housing in 1970, continued support has been given to the land assembly program by including in the capital budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation $30 million for land assembly projects in 1970. These funds have already been allocated to the provinces for use in those municipalities in greatest need.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

TABLING OF REPORT ON "STEEL AND INFLATION"—APPOINTMENT OF BERTRAM G. BARROW AS COMMISSIONER

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table two copies in the two official languages of a report by the Prices and Incomes Commission on "Steel and Inflation", and at the same time I should like to take the opportunity to announce the appointment of Bertram G. Barrow, as a commissioner of the Prices and Incomes Commission with special responsibility for the commission's price review program.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SPECIAL AREAS

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to announce the areas that, effective April 1, 1970, will be designated as "special areas", under the provisions of the Government Organization Act establishing my department. The areas are:

(A) In eastern Canada, six urban areas where we expect that my department's incentives to industry will bring about substantially faster industrial growth. To support this growth, my department is ready to finance community facilities—water, sewers, roads, schools and so on—which are needed but which the cities and provinces cannot afford. These urban areas of eastern Canada are as follows: In Newfoundland, St. John's and a surrounding area including the Conception Bay coast from Portugal Cove to Carbonear. In Nova Scotia, the metropolitan area of Halifax-Dartmouth. In New Brunswick, the city of Saint John as well as the city of Moncton and neighbouring areas. In Quebec, the city of Quebec and vicinity as well as the area of Trois-Rivières, Shawinigan, Grand'Mère and Bécancour.

[English]

(B) In Saskatchewan the urban areas are Regina and Saskatoon.

These cities were not included in the designated region under the industrial incentives program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, because they have in recent years enjoyed very rapid growth. They are now, however, adversely affected by wheat and potash marketing problems. Under the departmental legislation, incentives will be offered to encourage alternative industrial employment.

• (2:10 p.m.)

(C) In Eastern Canada, three areas whose locations give them potential for growth but which may be held back by difficulties in financing community development. These areas are: in Newfoundland, Corner Brook and its environs; in Nova Scotia, the area round the Strait of Canso; and in Quebec, Sept Îles-Port Cartier.

(D) In Newfoundland, six additional areas which contain resettlement centres for people moving from the outports. In some of these centres there is special need for improved water and sewer facilities for housing, schools and roads. The areas are: the part of the Burin Peninsula that includes Fortune, Grand Bank, Garnish, St. Lawrence, Burin and Marystown; the area of Grand Falls, Botwood, Lewisporte and Gander; the area of Stephenville and St. George's; the area of Hawke's Bay, Port Saunders and Port au Choix; the area of Come-By-Chance, Arnold's Cove and Goobies; the Happy Valley area in Labrador.

(E) In the prairie provinces, three mid-northern areas that can be assisted by industrial incentives for the development of forest-based operations and other resource industries and which require improved community facilities, particularly to assist the economic and social progress of Indian and Métis people. These areas are: in Manitoba, an area around The Pas; in Saskatchewan, the Meadow Lake area extending north to Lac la Loche; in Alberta, an area centred on Lesser Slave Lake and including Whitecourt and High Prairie.

[Translation]

(F) In Ontario and Quebec, two areas where improved employment and income prospects depend on encouragement to forest-based industry and other industrial incentives. These areas are:

(1) In Quebec, the Lac St.-Jean area.

(2) In Ontario, the area including Renfrew, Pembroke, Arnprior, Bancroft and Barry's Bay.

The provinces concerned have been consulted about these designations, and the precise boundaries of the areas will be specified in agreements with the provinces.

The initial designations will be effective to June 30, 1972, the same date as for the present designations under the industrial incentives legislation.

The agreements that are now being made with the provinces will be for the same period as the designations. For most of the areas, however, it is expected that these agreements will be followed by further joint development plans extending over a five-year period.

The present agreements will provide mainly for priority projects whose construction can be started in the next few months. These projects will involve commitments of federal funds to an amount of more than $200 million.

That sum is, of course, for the financing of provincial and municipal projects, over and above our greatly increased commitments to the private sector, for industrial development incentives.

The first agreements will be signed shortly with Newfoundland and New Brunswick and will cover arrangements for financing highway construction as well as projects in the special areas.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, we in the official opposition welcome the minister's announcement this afternoon. We have been waiting impatiently for the new department to come alive. The creation of the new department a year ago was heralded as a cure-all for the economic disparities in Canada, and this is the first indication that the minister or his department was even aware that these disparities existed.

We are happy, sir, that the minister has recognized that disparities exist in urban centres as well as the rural areas because some of the worst pockets of poverty in this country exist in the major urban areas.

The greatest curse in this country at this time is regional disparity. For the last 20 months the government has been giving lip service to its promise of a just society. Mr. Speaker, we feel that the great division in this country is not over language or culture but over economics—meat and potatoes. Eliminate the economic depression and there will be no threat to national unity in Canada. Confederation will take on more meaning, especially for the have-not areas, if what is outlined by the minister today is successful in erasing economic blight.

Some time ago in this House the Minister of Transport said that confederation has been a blessing for my province of Newfoundland. Sir, I agree it has been, but there are many promises which still have not been fulfilled. This program has been long awaited by my province, and indeed by all of the other have-not provinces.

We have not yet had the opportunity to study in detail what is planned, but this program is crucial for Newfoundland in order to get the province out of the financial mess in which it now finds itself. I think, Mr. Speaker, that eliminating the present scandalous unemployment in Quebec will once and for all silence those who preach separatism there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: The promised assistance for Saskatchewan cannot come too soon. People are moving out of that province at a rate greater than during the depression. I am told that approximately 7,000 people are leaving that province every year. I am also told that many car dealers there have been taken over by the automobile manufacturers because they just cannot keep going as private enterprises. In the Regina area alone a reported 1,000 homes are standing empty. The construction industry is in one of its slowest periods ever, and we are told that several farm machinery dealers are going belly up.

So far, Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement is merely words. If these words are translated into real action I am sure members on this side of the House will be the first to give full credit to the minister.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, to the extent that the minister's announcement will help areas of Canada facing economic problems, and to the extent that it will help people facing economic problems it will certainly be welcomed. But it should be remembered that the drawing of a boundary, or pointing at a specific community, is the last step of a process that will be meaningful only if it has been preceded by an adequate determination of objectives, what it is the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is setting out to accomplish, and followed by an adequate allocation of financial and other resources.

The government's announcement—I want to thank the minister for making a copy of it available to us, together with supporting material, earlier today—gives no information on the extent of assistance to particular communities, or the approach to be taken in providing assistance to the special areas established. Surely the government has had enough time since the department was established last year to develop a more adequate approach.

The confusion concerning the government's programs will be compounded as a result of questions which quite naturally will be asked concerning the reasons why primary, secondary and service industries can be assisted in the special areas just announced, and only secondary industry can qualify for assistance in the designated areas announced last summer. The programs of this department, if continued in this manner, will end up in one huge jumble. Unfortunately, ever since the new department was established its programs have been characterized by confusion, indecision and lack of adequate planning.

• (2:20 p.m.)

In addition to the elimination of regional disparities the government has for some time attempted to delude the Canadian public with the impression that its regional development program is a major weapon in its war on poverty and is also a major weapon to counteract the adverse regional effects of its over-all economic policies. In both respects the government's policies have been a complete failure. Unemployment rates have continued to rise in Canada and are currently 6.1 per cent for the nation as a whole. It is admitted that unemployment will go higher before the winter is over. Such rates of unemployment for Canada mean unemployment rates of 10 to 12 per cent in some regions of Canada. The government's program has done nothing to reduce the disparity in unemployment rates and in over-all economic well-being.

It is also clear that the government's anti-inflation policy is not working. It is succeeding in dragging the economy down in a way which increases unemployment without lessening the rate of price increases. The New Democratic Party for some time has called on the government to change the direction of its policy and outlined its own proposals in some detail in a minority report on interest rates and inflation last month.

When regional development legislation was before the House of Commons last summer, it was held up as the blueprint for future action and, in particular, the designated areas program under the Regional Development Incentives Act was regarded as the key.

The first major step announced by the minister last summer was the establishment of certain designated areas across Canada. Subsequent questions and inquiries have established that the government's approach on these areas was nothing more than a political exercise unsupported by any sort of satisfactory criteria. The government abandoned its growth centre approach talked about so much when the legislation was introduced.

Information obtained on the operation of the designated areas to date shows that in some cases government assistance amounts to 70 per cent of the total cost of the project. Canadians have a right to expect that the government should have some equity in the project when that proportion of public money is involved.

It has also been shown that a considerable portion of the grants offered are being given to foreign controlled industries. In fact, the government is encouraging non-resident controlled industries to take advantage of incentive grants as illustrated in the answer to a question asked by myself where it was reported that the department has advertised its programs in New York and Boston papers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. It is always difficult for the Chair to determine at what point an hon. member has gone beyond the limits imposed upon comments on ministerial statements. I have to remind hon. members that the comments which are allowed under Standing Order 15 should be brief. Perhaps the hon. member might consider bringing his remarks to a close at an early moment.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I had just about concluded my remarks but there were two further points I did want to draw to the attention of the government. One was the failure to take more adequate action to deal with the problems of the Indian and Métis people. I recognize that the programs—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Burton: —three of the programs announced in the prairie provinces will certainly have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member would want to take into account the suggestion I made a moment ago, that perhaps he is going beyond the limitation of the Standing Order. If the hon. member will consult the rules he will see that the comments he makes should be brief and should refer more particularly and specifically to the statement made in the House by the minister. It seems to me the hon. member is now going rather beyond the terms of the statement.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I was noting that the minister has included in his statement some programs which are of benefit to the Indian and Métis people in certain parts of Canada. I regret it was not possible to develop a more adequate program to deal with this area of problems in view of the very great needs the Indian and Métis people face across Canada.

Finally, I should like to note that I am very pleased some help has been provided for the province of Saskatchewan. That province is facing very serious economic problems and the old designated areas established were quite inadequate. I am pleased that the area of northwestern Saskatchewan has been included and that the cities of Regina and Saskatoon have been established as special areas. The problems faced by businessmen and many people out of work in Regina are well known. It seems to me the provision of programs for these areas is essential if we are to have growth and economic recovery—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he has now completed his statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather funny that the minister should announce the designation of 22 "special areas" in eight Canadian provinces.

At the last elections, in 1968, he said along with newspaper men that the least advanced regions of Quebec had voted for the Ralliement Créditiste. But I find that the "designated areas" in Quebec, precisely because they are underdeveloped, elected Liberal members at the last elections.

Mr. Speaker, two years ago, we initiated the establishment of designated areas in order to fight poverty effectively. And now, it is found that "special areas" are required because the designated areas have not solved anything. In a year or six months, the minister may perhaps designate extra-special, para-special or intra-special areas, to carry on the war against poverty.

Mr. Speaker, not only did the minister explain what was a "special area", but he also stated that the "special areas" had been designated by the federal government after consultation with the provincial government concerned.

So that is the paradox which we are now facing in my own district of Northwestern Quebec: Representations are made to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) for the maintenance of gold mining subsidies, because it seems that 2,000 gold miners are to be dismissed in the Val d'Or-Malartic-Rouyn area, as well as on the Ontario side.

The minister claims that we should discontinue subsidies to gold mines when we can certainly export our total gold production to the United States.

When designating 22 "special zones" a region which is directly affected is being omitted. Lake St. John region is considered to be a logging region. The minister knows that the North-Western Quebec logging region is equal to that of Lake St. John or any other in the province.

I would not like the minister to think I am against the Lake St. John region benefiting by special measures established but what I do say is that our North-Western Quebec region should likewise be designated as a "special region" and benefit from government measures because we are now facing a most serious situation economically, politically and socially.

I think the minister should look into the possibility of making it a special area and of preventing the closing of the mines.

The minister said that setting up an infrastructure would help those areas by the building of schools, roads, and so on. But there is an infrastructure not referred to by the minister, and it is the monetary infrastructure which keeps its diabolical grip over human beings and leaders alike, including the minister. The problem is not to be solved by the designation of such special areas, because neither the minister nor the government bothers to look for the trouble.

I know that the minister will make the headlines tomorrow in all media, especially on the CBC. I do understand that, but this is no solution.

Neither the CBC nor the press settles economic problems which have to be dealt with by a political philosophy resting on sturdy foundations. I therefore say to the minister that if the Social Credit system were implemented we would settle Canada's economic problems.

OIL

U.S. IMPORT RESTRICTIONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion based upon an urgent and pressing necessity which arises out of the following circumstances.

The President of the United States yesterday made a statement regarding restrictions on imports of Canadian oil by the United States. This statement, and a subsequent briefing by a United States official, leaves unanswered questions of concern to many Canadians, namely, whether the Canadian government will comply with the United States order inasmuch as, according to statements which have been made, the Canadian government is to be the agent in administering this cutback; whether the government intends to challenge any of the fallacious assumptions upon which this decision was based; whether it is the view of the Canadian government that the present level of exports was endangering Alberta's reserve capacity, whether the Canadian government was considering similar cutbacks if, as alleged in the United States briefing, the Americans had not decided to apply one, and whether the government does not consider that such cutbacks will destroy Canadian incentive for further exploration.

With leave, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East:

That the subject matter of the President's statement on the marketing of oil in the United States be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, and that the committee report thereon not later than March 20.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member has suggested, this motion can be put to the House at the present time only if there is unanimous consent. I shall inquire whether there is such unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the hon. member that there is not unanimous consent. The question cannot be put at this time.

Mr. Horner: Who said no?

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY SERVICES

Question No. 430—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Is it the intention of the government to withdraw the MV Lucy Maud Montgomery from the Borden-Tormentine ferry service and, if so, when and to where is this ship to be transferred?

2. Have definite plans been made to assist in augmenting the Wood Islands-Caribou ferry service and, if so, what is the nature and extent to which the Government of Canada will be involved?

3. Are the docking and terminal facilities at Wood Islands and Caribou at present capable of giving effective berthing to the Lucy Maud Montgomery and, if not, what is the nature, extent and cost of necessary changes?

4. In the past three years, from what governments and organizations has the Government of Canada received representations concerning the Wood Islands-Caribou service?

5. Have any provincial governments made the Government of Canada aware of their willingness to offer assistance in upgrading and extending this service and, if so, what is its nature and extent of such assistance?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No plans at present to withdraw the Lucy Maud Montgomery from the Borden-Tormentine ferry service.

2. Although the matter is being urgently examined no definite plans have yet been made.

3. No. Dredging at both terminals will be required together with re-construction of a berth at Wood Islands. Approximate capital cost of these changes would be over $750,000 and there will be additional charges for maintenance dredging.

4. The government of Nova Scotia, government of Prince Edward Island, R. M. MacEwan, M.P. (Central Nova), H. A. Venoit, MLA, Nova Scotia, and various private individuals.

5. The government of Nova Scotia has agreed to contribute a sum not exceeding $125,000 to the improvement of terminal facilities at Caribou, N.S.

RESEARCH, TREASURY BOARD

Question No. 605—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Treasury Board and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. If research is defined to include the collection and analysis of information then the operating budget of the Treasury Board is largely directed to this purpose. If, on the other hand, research is defined narrowly to include the development of new knowledge (as distinct from information) then the Treasury Board does not engage in research.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have actual expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Question No. 606—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of National Defence and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. In 1968-69 the actual expenditure was $44,142,000; for 1969-70 the estimated expenditure is $47,399,000. The purposes of the research were to (a) carry out research and preliminary development in those scientific and technological fields that are relevant to Canadian defence and important to the international defence science community and perform tests and evaluations and modify equipment, components or procedures of the Canadian Forces on request. (b) carry out analytical and operational research studies. (c) provide liaison offices and a scientific information centre for the collection and dissemination of scientific information relating to national defence. (d) award grants-in-aid for approved work by university scientists and make contributions to establish or expand industrial research activities in defence technologies.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have "actual" expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Question No. 609—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of Public Works and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1.

Year	Expenditure	Project
1968-69	$12,000	An investigation of the strength mechanisms of highly sensitive clays to earthquake shock loadings.
1969-70	$10,000	An investigation of the strength mechanisms of highly sensitive clays to earthquake shock loadings.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have actual expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Question No. 611—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of External Affairs and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Project: Latin America. Fiscal year: 1968-69; Cost: $2,800. Purpose: To review the extent to which missions are able to investigate and report systematically on the basic social and economic problems of Latin America and on the steps being taken to resolve these problems.

Project: Peaceful settlement of International disputes. Fiscal year: 1968-69; Cost: $3,600. Purpose: To have useful information at hand in anticipation of discussions on this subject at the United Nations General Assembly.

Project: Trade between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean. Fiscal year: 1968-69; Cost: $30,802. Purpose: To comply with a joint agreement reached at the 1966 Commonwealth Caribbean/Canada Conference.

Project: Documents on Canadian External Relations. Fiscal year: 1968-69 and 1969-70; Cost: $9,460 and $13,617 respectively. Purpose: To edit and prepare State Papers for publication of successive volumes.

Project: Canada's External Relations 1600-1969. Fiscal year: 1969-70; Cost: $3,000. Purpose: To edit, prepare and compile a bibliography.

The above items relate to contract research and exclude research carried out normally within the department in the course of day-to-day operations.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have actual expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Question No. 617—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of National Revenue and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1.

Unit	1968-69	1969-70	Total
Customs Laboratory	4,000	5,000	9,000

Purpose: Intra-mural research projects for the most part, generally involving research into analytical methods. The results obtained remain unpublished and are used to facilitate the examination of certain chemical commodities.

It may also be pointed out that National Revenue (Taxation and Customs and Excise) do certain analytical work and research and development in the administrative and operational fields. These activities include analysis of tax laws, computer studies and studies relating to organizational methods and procedures. It is not considered, however, that these come within the area of the research referred to in the question.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have actual expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Question No. 618—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of Justice and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Legal officers of the Department of Justice undertake research projects in connection with their regular duties and it is impossible to say with any degree of accuracy what sums have been expended for this particular purpose. For example, research is undertaken regularly in respect of government legislation on constitutional matters, criminal law matters and various aspects of government-sponsored legislation. The department is currently taking steps to establish a new section to undertake long-term research projects of a type not necessarily related to immediate problems.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have actual expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 619—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. In 1968-69, $4,304,412 was expended on research. In 1969-70, $5,246,075 is estimated as expenditures on research. The purpose of these research projects are to provide information needed for on-going programs in the department. It is not possible to indicate the purpose of each project without a search of every project file. The cost to the government in manpower would be exorbitant.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have actual expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 622—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of Agriculture and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

1. Estimated Expenditures	1968-69	1969-70
Expenditures provided through regular parliamentary votes	$49,896,000	$52,122,000
Cost of services provided by other departments	5,114,000	5,500,000
Total estimated expenditures	$55,010,000	$57,622,000

Research Projects

The Research Branch has approximately 1,400 research projects under five main categories. The principal objective is to increase efficiency and productivity of Canadian agriculture. Further details follow.

Soil Research—Soil genesis, classification, physical and chemical properties, fertility, surveys and mapping, including Canada Land Inventory operations.

Crop Research—Improvement and protection of cultivated plants.

Animal Research—Research on domestic and fur-bearing animals and poultry, including genetics and breeding, physiology, nutrition and management; research on animal products.

General Biology and Support Research—Taxonomy of plants and insects, food research, bacteriology, virology, bio-chemistry, biological or chemical control of pests and pesticide degradation and residues.

Engineering Research—Research on the engineering aspects.

The Health of Animals Branch has approximately 84 research projects. The objectives of these projects are in general similar to those of the Research Branch but emphasizing the prevention, control or eradication of animal diseases and protection of the public against diseases of animals communicable to man. The Board of Grain Commissioners conduct basic and applied research on cereal quality. The Economics Branch conducts research studies on the economics of production, marketing, consumption, farm organization and management and other matters of economic or social significance in Canadian agriculture. (Detailed list of current projects was tabled in answer to Question 37). The Research Branch, Health of Animals Branch and Board of Grain Commissioners projects are essentially continuous in nature.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have actual expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Question No. 624—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. The estimated sums spent by the Office of the Director of Investigation and Research on general or research inquiries conducted under Section 42 of the Combines Investigation Act and other research projects were as follows:

1968-1969	1969-1970 (April 1-November 30)
$116,070	$81,095

The research projects being undertaken during the above periods and their purpose were as follows:

(1) Mergers in Canadian Industry in the Post-war Period—designed to assist the government in formulating any future policy with respect to mergers.

(2) Study of Concentration in Canadian Manufacturing Industries—this is an important aspect of the structure of the economy and one having a bearing on competition policy.

(3) Bid Depositories in the Construction Industry—undertaken in view of the national importance of pricing procedures in the industry.

(4) Research on a continuing basis into problems of structure and behaviour of industry to keep the Director informed of the state of competition in various sectors of the economy.

(5) Research in connection with Canada's contribution to studies conducted by the OECD, including restrictive business practices in international trade, access to patents and trademarks, obstacles to the international transfer of technology and the restrictive aspects of the multinational corporation. The estimated expenditures of the Consumer Research Branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs were $53,000 in 1968-69 and $98,000 from April 1, 1969 to the end of December. Research papers were prepared in the Consumer Research Branch for federal-provincial discussions on consumer affairs, for the OECD, for the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, and for the Interdepartmental Committee on Consumer Affairs. Continuing research is carried out on various subjects of concern to the department.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have "actual" expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 627—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Post Office Department and the Department of Communications and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Post Office Department:

	Thousands of dollars
(a) 1968-69	$ 284.9
1969-70	$ 660.5

(b) To improve the design of static postal equipment and to develop and improve the mechanized mail handling and processing equipments.

(a) The Department of Communications exists only since April 1, 1969. There is therefore no data for that department in 1968-69. (b) The 1969-70 budget estimates for Communications and Space Research are $9,500,000 including $2,400,000 for a satellite construction contract in industry. (c) The research of the Department is divided into 3 parts, the aims of each of these being specified as follows:

Communications Research:

To sponsor, to conduct and to monitor research in all relevant areas of communications technology in order to meet the mission objectives of the Department with special emphasis on communications to Northern Canada.

Satellite Technology:

To maintain a competence in those areas of Satellite technology of importance to Canada. To perform research and to develop technology relevant to Canada's present and future needs. To direct and manage satellite development programs performed by industrial contract.

Research Supporting Radio Spectrum Management:

To perform research on radio propagation which is peculiar to the Canadian environment for both civil and military applications. To improve radio prediction and forecasting services to Canadian users.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have "actual" expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

RESEARCH, DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Question No. 628—Mr. Comeau:

1. In 1968-69 and 1969-70, what were the estimated sums spent on research in the Department of Supply and Services and what was the purpose of each research project?

2. How much money was actually expended according to Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. None.

2. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics does not have Actual expenditures on research for 1968-69 and 1969-70. A survey requesting information on actual expenditures for 1968-69 and estimates for 1969-70 on research in the natural and engineering sciences is in process.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD PERSONNEL

Question No. 714—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has the current year's budget of the National Film Board been frozen at the same level as last year's budget?

2. Did the National Film Board tell its employees that pay increases negotiated would be absorbed in the coming year as they had been in the past?

3. Did the Treasury Board inform the National Film Board that last year's deficit would have to be absorbed in the current budget?

4. Has production of new films by the National Film Board, except for sponsored films, been suspended and, if so, since what date?

5. How many employees of the National Film Board is it expected will leave by the summer of 1970 by retirement, resignation or lay-off?

6. Of those leaving, how many will leave from each of the following Branches—English production, French production, technical services, distribution and administration?

7. Have the proposed cut-backs and lay-offs been discussed in detail and agreed to by the Union representing the employees?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. The parliamentary appropriation has been frozen at last year's level.

2. No.

3. The National Film Board did not incur a deficit last year.

4. Production of films on NFB program was suspended for two months but has since been resumed.

*5. Approximately 97 employees will leave and not be replaced between January 1970 and the summer of 1970.

*6.

	Lay-Offs	Resignations and retirements not replaced	Total
English Production	18	9	27
French Production	4	2	6
Technical Services	12	6	18
Distribution	18	12	30
Administration	11	5	16
	63	34	97

*Staff changes resulting from the Saumier report will not be determined in final form until studies recommended by the report have been conducted. As reported by the Government Film Commissioner in his report to Parliament dated January 22, 1970, seventeen members of English Production, previously slated for lay-off, will be retained on staff.

7. They have been discussed in detail with the three associations representing the employees and have not been agreed to, the associations objecting to a reduction in their membership by a process of lay-off.

RECEIPTS FROM AND PAYMENTS TO INDIANS

Question No. 764—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. In the past fiscal year, what was the total amount of money received by the Government of Canada from Canadian Indians?

2. In the past fiscal year, what was the total amount of money paid out by the Government of Canada to Indian Canadians and what were the major categories of payment and the amount paid in each category?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. It is not possible to separate payments from Indians from payments from non-Indians since the method of recording all revenues received by Canada does not allow such differentiation.

2. The amount of money paid in 1968-69 by the Government of Canada directly and indirectly to Canadian Indians is $141,853,995. The major categories are—(a) Economic Development and Social Programs, totalling, $66,345,358. (b) Education, totalling $68,981,075. (c) Administration, totalling $6,527,562.

"PEACE FESTIVAL"—MOSPORT, ONTARIO

Question No. 865—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Is any department of the government supplying funds to assist the "Peace Festival" sponsored by Mr. and Mrs. John Lennon, to be held at Mosport, Ontario on July 3 and 4, 1970 and, if so, how much?

2. Are any government agencies, Crown corporations or any other emanations of the federal government such as the CBC providing funds for the above-mentioned "Peace Festival" and, if so, how much?

3. Are any departments of government, agencies of the government, Crown corporations or other emanations of the government such as the CBC providing assistance to the above-mentioned "Peace Festival" in non-monetary forms of assistance and, if so, in what way?

4. Are any forms of assistance, as set out above, being provided for a similar "Peace Festival" to be held under the auspices of the Government of the Province of Manitoba during the summer of 1970?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State):

1. No.

2. No.

3. No. I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the only possible CBC connection with this event is its news value and this has not yet been assessed.

4. No.

CNR—REDUCTION IN PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICE

Question No. 878—Mr. Corbin:

1. Was the Canadian National Railway decision to reduce its passenger train service and change the nature of the service offered made at the local, regional or national level?

2. Were the people of the areas concerned consulted before the decision was reached?

3. In the case of the discontinuance of the Ocean Limited passenger train on the Moncton-Edmundston-Joffre line, did the Canadian National Railway consult with the citizens of the areas concerned before making their decision?

4. If not, for what reason?

5. Does the Canadian National Railway intend to consult the citizens of the areas concerned before making such decisions?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Changes in passenger service effective January 7, 1970 were carried out on a system basis following consultations with regional and area administrators.

2, 3 and 4. For many years, when changes in passenger train service are contemplated, it has been the practice to make public announcements of such proposed changes 20 days prior to implementation in accordance with the regulations of the Board of Transport Commissioners and its successor, the Canadian Transport Commission. In the recent changes, 60 days' notice was given in order to allow for any consultation or discussion which the communities concerned might desire. While newspaper accounts from the area served by the Ocean Limited between Moncton-Edmundston-Joffre did indicate local concern and objection, no requests were received for consultation or direct discussion respecting the change. Such discussions would have been held if requested.

5. The Company's policy respecting changes in passenger train service is to announce such changes substantially in advance of their effective date so that discussions in any municipality affected could be conducted during that period of notice as required or requested.

Questions

PUBLIC SERVICE LAY-OFFS

Question No. 928—Mr. Skoreyko:

1. What was the total cost of lay-offs in the Civil Service from January 1, 1969 to January 1, 1970 in (a) British Columbia (b) the Prairies (c) Ontario (d) Quebec (e) the Maritimes?

Region	Number of lay-offs
(a) British Columbia	84
(b) The Prairies	89
(c) Ontario	*239
(d) Quebec	23
(e) The Maritimes	85

*Included in this number are 70 employees laid off when the Canadian Forces Base at Picton, Ontario, was closed. Other reductions in National Defence caused lay-offs at Kingston (3), Ottawa (32) and Trenton (19).

CBC—ACTRA DUES AND FEES

Question No. 953—Mr. Orlikow:

1. In each of the past five years, what has been the total amount of deductions from CBC payroll to cover ACTRA dues and fees?

2. For each of these years, how many individual members of ACTRA had dues or fees deducted?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1 and 2. The CBC does not deduct membership dues or fees for ACTRA members. Over the past five years CBC has paid the following amounts to ACTRA members.

Fiscal year	Total payments in $000's	Estimated No. of ACTRA members
1964-65	$3,943	4,632
1965-66	3,889	5,034
1966-67	4,995	4,933
1967-68	6,244	4,531
1968-69	6,225	5,719

The above statistics apply to the jurisdiction of the ACTRA agreements, but do not include fees paid indirectly to ACTRA members by the Corporation through commissioned productions, i.e. programs purchased from outside firms which might employ ACTRA members.

P.E.I.—FISHING HARBOURS

Question No. 978—Mr. McQuaid:

1. Which fishing harbours in Prince Edward Island will be continued to be maintained by the federal government?

[Mr. Loiselle.]

2. In each category listed, what percentage of these public Servants were English speaking and what percentage were French speaking?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows:

English speaking %	French speaking %
93.3	6.7
86.5	13.5
17.5	82.5
89.5	10.5

2. Will any financial assistance be granted to the Province by the federal government towards the maintenance of harbours other than those mentioned in answer to Part 1?

3. Have representations been made by the Government of Prince Edward Island to the Government of Canada for financial assistance in the maintenance of harbours other than those mentioned in answer to Part 1?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1, 2 and 3. The future of fishing harbours, their maintenance and improvement, is now under study by federal and provincial officials.

*DIRECT MORTGAGE LOANS

Question No. 988—Mr. Goode:

Does the government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, plan to institute a programme of direct mortgage loans to offset the recent downward trend in housing starts in Canada?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the government's very substantial housing programs for the year 1970 were outlined by the minister responsible for housing on February 2, 1970, when the capital budget of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was tabled. I would refer the hon. member to Hansard of that date, pages 3061 and 3062.

*AIRPORT NOISE ABATEMENT REGULATIONS

Question No. 989—Mr. Goode:

1. Are there, at present, any Department of Transport regulations regarding noise abatement at airports in Canada and, if so, what are they and at which airports do they apply?

2. Has the Department of Transport undertaken, or does the Department have plans to initiate, any studies on the problem of noise pollution created by aircraft arrivals, departures and stationary warm-ups at airports in Canada?

3. If such studies have been carried out, what were the findings and how were these findings acted upon?

4. If such studies are planned, when will they begin and what will be the scope of these studies?

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the answer here is quite long, I would beg leave from the House to have it recorded in Hansard and considered as read.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The reply follows:]

1. There is one section of the Air Regulations which deals with aircraft noise abatement. Section 516 (bb) of the Air Regulations states; "The pilot-in-command of an aircraft operated on or in the vicinity of an aerodrome shall conform with any directions made by the Minister relating to noise abatement".

Special procedures for noise abatement are published for the international airports at Winnipeg, Toronto Ottawa, and Montreal. While the same basic concept is employed at all of these airports, the specific procedures vary to suit local needs.

The three basic concepts upon which aircraft noise abatement procedures are predicated are: preferential runways for arriving and departing aircraft, departure-climb and arrival-descent procedures, and curfew.

An ideal preferential runway permits aircraft to operate to and from an airport with a minimum of restrictions while disturbing the last number of people. Departure procedures, which are most important when a preferential runway is not available, are tailored to suit local conditions. To provide optimum relief for noise sensitive areas adjacent to airports aircraft may, consistent with safety, be asked to: attain a certain altitude as soon as practicable after take-off, initiate a turn away from certain residential developments, climb at reduced power and rate of climb while overflying certain areas near the runway, or, operate without any restrictions whatsoever.

On the other hand, arrival procedures are less flexible: depending upon weather conditions, aircraft are to be aligned with the runway not less than 6 miles from the runway threshold, and maintain an altitude of 2000 feet above ground for as long as practicable before commencing final descent for landing.

Curfew is employed at two airports: Montreal and Toronto, between the hours of midnight and 7:00 a.m. This restriction is applicable only to turbo-jet aircraft.

2. Special studies related to aircraft noise have been carried out on behalf of the Department by National Research Council as far back as 1959 and 1960 at Montreal and Ottawa International Airports, and then again at Montreal in 1965. A study is currently underway at Toronto.

3. The results of the Ottawa and Montreal studies were compiled as reports which served as a basis for aircraft noise abatement procedures in the early 1960's. The 1965 report on Montreal resulted in the installation of a central noise monitoring system for that airport, which in turn prompted a similar study for Toronto. An automatic monitoring system for Toronto is expected to be completed by summer this year.

At present, no new studies are planned.

CBC TIME ALLOTMENT TO QUEBEC POLITICAL CONVENTIONS

Question No. 997—Mr. Caouette:

1. How much time did the French and English networks of CBC (Radio and TV) devote to news reports and commentaries on (a) the Union Nationale convention held in June 1969 (b) the Parti Québécois convention held in October 1969 (c) the Quebec Liberal Party convention held in January 1970 (d) the Ralliement Créditiste convention held in January 1970?

2. How many employees of each network were involved in the transmission of each convention?

3. What was the cost of the programmes relating to each convention?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. (a) French TV network, 6 hours; French Radio network, 5 hours; English TV (local or on limited network), 4 hours; English Radio (local or on limited network), 5 hours.

(b) There was no live coverage from the floor of the convention. The CBC decided that, since this was not a leadership contest, adequate coverage could be given in the course of regular news and public affairs programs.

(c) French TV network, 7 hours; French Radio network, 7 hours; English TV (local or on limited network), 7 hours; English Radio (local or on limited network), 4 hours.

(d) See (b) above.

2. Some 100 employees in all, including technical personnel, for radio and TV networks combined.

3. Approximately $51,000 and $77,000 for the Union Nationale and Liberal conventions respectively.

CBC ADVERTISEMENTS IN "QUÉBEC-PRESSE" and "LA PRESSE"

Question No. 998—Mr. Portelance:

1. Did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advertise in the Québec-Presse during the months of December 1969 and January 1970 and, if so, on what dates and at what cost each time?

2. When Québec-Presse sold this advertisement to CBC, what circulation figure did Québec-Presse quote and what were its rates?

3. Did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advertise in La Presse during the months of December 1969 and January 1970 and, if so, on what dates and at what cost each time?

4. When La Presse sold this advertisement to CBC, what circulation figure did La Presse quote and what were its rates?

5. Which section of CBC requested this advertisement in Québec-Presse and who is in charge of the section?

6. How much did CBC pay for the advertisement which appeared on page 16A of Québec-Presse on January 25, 1970?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Yes. There were 14 advertisements in all on various dates during December and January. There were no cash expenditures in this regard since the ads were placed on a contra-account basis whereby comparable value in broadcast time is exchanged for space in the publication.

2. Paid circulation of 92,000 and a rate of 70¢ per agate line according to the contra-account contract.

3. Yes. There were 28 advertisements in all on various dates during December and January for an average cost of about $350. each.

4. Circulation was not mentioned since detailed figures from the Audit Bureau of Circulation are published regularly in Canadian Advertising Rates and Data. Rate: $1.10 per agate line.

5. The advertisements were ordered by the heads of the radio and TV publicity departments.

6. Nil. See reply to part 1 above.

HOCKEY NIGHT IN CANADA SPONSORS

Question No. 1,000—Mr. McCleave:

1. Who are the national and local sponsors of Hockey Night in Canada as shown on CBC TV?

2. What amount does each sponsor pay and for how much time in each instance?

3. Do any of these sponsors have control over material shown during the non-advertising portions of Hockey Night telecasts and, if so, what suggestions or orders have they made which have been adopted?

4. Are any representatives of advertisers or advertising agencies dealing with Hockey Night in Canada physically present in the broadcasting gondola, near the TV cameras, or close enough to communicate with producers, directors, switchers, cameramen and other TV staff during such telecasts and, if so, what type of orders or suggestions, if any, are they permitted to give?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. National sponsors are Imperial Oil, Ford and Molson's; there are no local sponsors.

2. Rights are held by the advertising agency and the amount paid by sponsors is a matter between the agency and the sponsors. The CBC recovers its costs, i.e. production charges, station time and interconnection charges, in full.

3. No.

4. Advertising representatives are present as observers and can communicate with the CBC producer and game officials, which they do for purposes of co-ordinating the insertion of commercial messages into the program. However, they do not give suggestions or orders to CBC personnel with respect to CBC coverage of the game.

DISTRIBUTION OF NFB AUDIO-VISUAL MATERIALS

Question No. 1,014—Mr. Nowlan:

1. Has the National Film Board recently decided to distribute audio-visual materials through private agencies and, if so, what criteria were established for proposed distributors?

2. Who are the partners of Visual Education Centre, one of the successful bidders?

3. Were any of the partners mentioned in Part 2 formerly employees of the National Film Board and, if so, at what time and in what positions?

4. Was any public invitation made to bid on the distribution contracts and, if so, (a) by what date were presentations required to be filed (b) when was a decision made?

5. In the case of the successful bidder, Visual Education Centre (a) how many experienced repesentatives are now available to sell and distribute material (b) what is the minimum annual sales requirement under the contract and what is the penalty for default (c) what is the value of the minimum inventory they must commit to the project (d) is all the capital of the company Canadian (e) are all the partners Canadian?

6. What level of increase in distribution of audio-visual equipment does the National Film Board require, as a result of contracting their distribution?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. Yes. Slides, filmstrips, multimedia kits, overhead projectuals and 8mm silent film loops will be distributed through private agencies. The following criteria were applied for proposed distributors: reputation, distribution of products non-competitive to the National Film Board, enthusiasm, physical proximity to the market, specialization in audio-visual software, financial resources to handle present National Film Board sales volume, Canadian financial control, marketing techniques, and a commitment in writing to a satisfactory marketing plan.

2. Messrs. Don Wilder, Grant McLean and Gordon Burwash.

3. Yes. Mr. Wilder, 1944-1958, cinematographer; Mr. McLean, 1945-1967, film maker in many capacities; executive, 1966-1967, Acting Government Film Commissioner; Mr. Burwash, 1950-1954 and 1960-1967, Writer, Actor, Producer.

4. Public invitation to bid was not requested. National Film Board personnel in offices across Canada were asked to approach and/or submit names of companies which were worthy of consideration. 35 distributors in Ontario were considered. (a) there was no date when representations were required to be filed. (b) the decision to appoint Visual Education Centre was made on December 17, 1969.

5. (a) Visual Education Centre has presently four experienced representatives for sales and distribution. (b) The minimum annual sales volume required by the contract is the estimated gross value of National Film Board audio-visual sales in Ontario projected for the current fiscal year 1969-1970. This is based on sale to date and current market trends. The penalty for default clause in the contract reads as follows: "If the Distributor violates or defaults in the performance of any undertaking or obligation under this Agreement, the Board may, by notice in writing, specify clearly to the Distributor the nature of the violation or default and, if before the expiry of thirty days after the giving of notice, the Distributor does not, to the satisfaction of the Board, rectify the violation or default and give assurance of its intention to comply with this Agreement, the Board may, by notice in writing, terminate the rights of the Distributor under this Agreement with effect from such date as the Board specifies in this notice." (c) Minimum inventory required by contract is a 90 day supply of stock. (d) The contract states that while it is in effect, the absolute majority of the issued share capital of the distributor shall be held by Canadian citizens living in Canada. (e) The partners are all Canadian citizens.

6. The National Film Board requires an expansion of marketing techniques which the distributor has undertaken to provide, and the distributor has agreed in the contract to secure and increase the National Film Board's present volume of sales.

POLLUTION—INSTALLATION OF REDUCED SMOKE COMBUSTERS ON JET AIRCRAFT

Question No. 1,045—Mr. Anderson:

Has the Department of Transport, Department of Health and Welfare or any other government agency held discussions with Canadian airlines on the advisability of installing reduced smoke combusters on jet aircraft to reduce air pollution and, if so, has a target date been established for the installation of reduced smoke combusters on Canadian jet aircraft?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Discussions have taken place with the airlines concerning the JT8D engine which is considered to be the main cause of air pollution by aircraft. Manufacturers' production schedules will permit the airlines to equip their aircraft with modified engines which, greatly reduce the pollution factor by 1972.

5. What are the physical facilities in solitary?

6. Under what circumstances is the mattress removed?

7. In how many cases have mattresses been removed from the cells of inmates in solitary confinement, and what are the facilities for sleeping when the mattresses are removed?

8. What is the menu in solitary confinement?

9. Under what circumstances is the menu changed in solitary confinement?

10. What provision is made for supervision of those in solitary confinement?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): 1. The Prison for Women at Kingston does not have solitary confinement accommodation as such, however, one range has been subdivided to provide a segregation area for purposes of protective custody and for the maintenance of good order and discipline in the institution.

2. 73; (a) 51, (b) 18, (c) 2, and (d) 2.

3. Dissociation as a punishment is governed by Section 2.28 of Penitentiary Service Regulations and may be ordered for a period not to exceed thirty days. Dissociation for reasons other than as a punishment is governed by Section 2.30 of Penitentiary Service Regulations.

4. As for 3.

5. Physical facilities in dissociation are the same as those in normal association.

6. Mattresses are removed only in cases of wilful damage.

7. No record; however, mattresses removed as set in answer to 6 above are returned for sleeping at night.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

8. Unless specifically stipulated, the menu for inmates in dissociation is the same as for inmates in normal association.

9. On the advice of the medical officer.

10. Inmates in dissociation are visited by two correctional officers at least once an hour on a 24-hour basis, and daily visits are made by the senior duty officer, a classification officer, the institutional chaplain, others as required, and psychiatric consultation is available.

RICHMOND CONSTITUENCY—CROWN CORPORATION OFFICES

Question No. 1,147—Mr. Beaudoin:

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY EXPROPRIATIONS OF LAND, CAUGHNAWAGA RESERVE

Question No. 1,161—Mr. Godin:

Did the government recently issue a cheque for $776,389.56 to Chief Andrew Delisle of Caughnawaga Reserve in connection with St. Lawrence Seaway expropriations in 1955-56 and, if so (a) what was the amount and the rate of interest included in this sum (b) how many acres were involved (c) how much did the Indians of this Reserve receive for this expropriation?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: Yes. (a) Interest $667,642.82. Rate 5 per cent. (b) 703.4707 acres. (c) $1,963,563.66, Damages of an indirect nature are presently under negotiation.

GEORGETOWN, ONTARIO—ROSSLAKE AERODROME

Question No. 1,187—Mr. Hales:

1. What criteria does the Department of Transport use to determine what is a settlement, insofar as interpreting Section 529 of the Air Regulations is concerned?

2. Does the Department of Transport propose to prohibit light aircraft from operating from the Rosslake airstrip located near Georgetown, Ontario, because the general area over which aircraft must fly while taking-off or landing from this airstrip is considered to be a settled area?

3. Does the Department of Transport propose to examine all airports and civil aerodromes in Canada to apply similar criteria to determine whether or not flying operations should be allowed to continue?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Since the intent of the regulation is to afford protection to persons and property on the ground from hazards occasioned by low-flying aircraft any decision to invoke the provisions of Section 529 of the Air Regulations in a particular case would be taken where it could be shown that a hazard existed to any small community, village or group of houses in a thinly populated area by virtue of low-flying aircraft.

2. Yes.

3. (a) All airports in Canada are examined at regular intervals and meet the Department's Licensing standards. (b) Civil aerodromes will be examined in every case where a hazardous condition is reported to exist.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—ADVERTISING IN INTERNATIONAL AIRPORTS

Question No. 1,212—Mr. Skoberg:

1. Did the Department of Transport authorize the placing of signs advertising liquor, cigarettes and automobiles, etc., in International Airports and, if so, when was the decision made?

2. Was an opportunity provided whereby all concerned parties were made aware of the decision to allow advertising in International Airports under DOT supervision?

3. Were any regulations specified as to the size and location of each sign and, if so, what were the specified requirements?

4. What revenue is being realized at each of the International Airports from the following companies for advertising (a) cigarette companies (b) automobile companies (c) others?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. Tenders for the advertising concession were invited on July 4, 1968,

2. Tenders were advertised nationally and copies of the tender notices were sent to 153 advertising companies.

3. Tenders were invited in two stages (1) Concepts (2) Financial Offers. Six companies submitted their concepts for advertising in ten air terminal buildings. A briefing was held with the six companies who submitted concepts at which time their proposals were reviewed and they were advised with respect to size, location and types of advertising signs. At the conclusion of this briefing financial offers (Stage 2) were invited.

4. Tenderers were asked to submit financial offers on the basis of a percentage of gross revenue earned with an annual guarantee. Gross revenue estimated by the tenderers was not broken down to show anticipated earnings by category of products advertised. A copy of the financial offer submitted by the successful tenderer showing estimated revenue per airport for each of the first five years, follows:

Financial Offer For Advertising Concession

	Percentage offered	Percentage offered if sales exceed $600,000	Percentage offered if sales exceed $750,000	Minimum annual Guarantee offered
First Year	50	60	In any year,	$250,000

PUBLIC SERVICE—PROMOTION OF UNILINGUAL EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,233—Mr. Coates:

Have any members of the Public Service of Canada, who are unilingual, been passed over for promotion in favour of bilingual employees and, if so, in how many instances has this occurred?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: Promotions in the public service are governed by the terms of the Public Service Employment Act which provide that all appointments are to be in accordance with the merit principle, having regard for certain preferences set out in the Act. Persons are selected for appointment on the basis of their qualifications to carry out the duties of the positions to which they are appointed, and the phrase "passed over for promotion" does not have any precise meaning for the public service.

TENDERS FOR AIRPORT SURVEILLANCE RADAR SYSTEMS

Question No. 1,245—Mr. Skoberg:

Have public tenders been called for the contract to supply equipment on new airport terminal surveillance radar systems for Gander, Edmonton, Vancouver and the New International Airport (Ste. Scholastique) and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No. For equipment of this type, it is the departmental practice to invite tenders from representative lists of suppliers, as this is considered adequate coverage. This procedure is authorized by the Government Contracts Regulations. The tender call made in this instance has a closing date of April 14, 1970.

PUBLIC WORKS—ACCOMMODATION FOR DEPUTY MINISTER

Question No. 1,269—Mr. Coates:

1. Is the Deputy Minister of Public Works moving from his present quarters to new quarters and, if so, on what date and for what reason?

2. Where will the new quarters be located and what will be the cost to the taxpayer of the move in question?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, by the end of March, 1970. The move is one of several required by a reallocation of functions and the regrouping of several executives and directors of the Department.

2. In the Sir Charles Tupper Building; the several elements of cost are not known because they are part of a contract affecting other areas of the building.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—PROTEST OF NEW FILM RENTAL POLICY

Question No. 1,282—Mr. Mather:

Has the Secretary of State received representations from groups, including the Vancouver YWCA, protesting the new film rental policy established by the National Film Board and, if so, what consideration is being given to such representations?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes. The film rental charges have since been cancelled.

RCMP—MARINE SERVICE BRANCH

Question No. 1,294—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. Has the Marine Services Branch of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police been eliminated and, if so, for what reason?

2. (a) How many men will be affected and will they be offered other positions within the Force at the same rank and salary (b) will there be any reduction or change in their pension benefits?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): 1. No; however, the marine services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are being reorganized on a geographical basis to promote efficiency and economy of operation, and they will report through the RCMP divisional headquarters in the region in which they are being used.

2. (a) The precise numbers will not be known until the reorganization is completed, but those affected will be offered other positions within the Force with at least equivalent rank and salary. (b) No.

DEFINITION OF STOL TYPE AIRCRAFT

Question No. 1,305—Mr. Reid:

1. What is the Government of Canada's definition for a STOL type aircraft and, if there is not one, for what reason?

2. Is this definition accepted by the various provinces and by the various regulatory authorities throughout Canada?

3. Is this definition generally accepted internationally?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. There is no official definition of STOL type aircraft either in Canada or internationally since one has not been necessary up to the present.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

ATHABASCA CONSTITUENCY—INDIAN RESERVES LAND-USE STUDIES

Question No. 1,306—Mr. Yewchuk:

On which Indian Reserves, in the constituency of Athabasca have land-use studies been carried out and on which Reserves are land-use studies scheduled to be carried out during the present fiscal year?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Six land-use studies have been completed in the constituency of Athabasca covering eleven Indian Reserves as follows: Driftpile River 150; Sucker Creek 150A; Swan River 150E and Assineau River 150F; Boyer 164 and Child Lake 164A; Beaver Ranch 163 and Tall Cree 173 and 173A; Fox Lake 162 and Jean D'Or Prairie 215.

No land-use studies are under way or scheduled to be carried out in that constituency in the 1970-71 fiscal year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—ENGAGEMENT OF CONSULTANTS 1950-1970

Question No. 1,308—Mr. Robinson:

How many consultants have been engaged by the Department of National Defence during each year 1950 to 1970 inclusive, and (a) what was the cost of the consultants (b) how were the consultants utilized (c) for what reasons were the consultants necessary?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Records are not maintained in a manner which would permit all consultants to be readily identifiable, and the necessary expert staff is not available the undertake the large amount of work which would be required to gather the necessary information. Since 1965, a number of management consultant studies have been undertaken, or are in progress, as detailed in the national defence portion of the reply to Mr. Skoberg's question No. 1,323 in the last session of Parliament and tabled on 25 June, 1969 (Votes and Proceedings page 1227).

The last study "Ships Design, Engineer and Acquisition—System Engineering Processes" by Stanwick Corporation is continuing in 1969-70 at an estimated total cost of $140,000.

In addition, in 1969, a System Validity Analysis of the DEVIL project was carried out by Computer Sciences Canada Limited at an estimated cost of $33,000.

The use of consultant assistance brings to the Department the technical competence and the objective point of view of an outsider who may be in a position to help solve a problem, or suggest an alternate proposal which would meet the requirements.

AGRICULTURE—SUBSIDY TO MILK PRODUCERS

Question No. 1,325—Mr. Robinson:

What was the total subsidy paid to milk producers during each year 1960 to 1969 inclusive?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The total subsidy payments to milk and cream producers each year 1960 to 1969 inclusive, were as follows: 1960-61, $11,432,769; 1961-62, $12,371,154; 1962-63, $13,257,869; 1963-64, $36,513,185; 1964-65, $35,497,064; 1965-66, $28,454,926; 1966-67, $76,370,116; 1967-68, $96,721,480; 1968-69, $101,106,073; 1969-70, (to Jan. 31/70) $77,947,932.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—USE OF TRADITIONAL UNIFORMS

Question No. 1,367—Mr. MacLean:

1. Are all Militia and Reserve Units of the Canadian Forces allowed to continue to use their traditional uniforms, as promised by the then Minister of National Defence in December 1966?

2. Are Militia and Reserve Units being issued with the new uniforms which have been approved for the Permanent Forces and, if so, is this on a compulsory or optional basis?

3. If traditional uniforms are no longer to be worn by Militia and Reserve Units, what compensation will be made to such units for the loss of traditional uniforms purchased out of non-public funds for bands, ceremonial occasions, guards, etc.?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The Militia is an element of the Canadian Forces Reserves and the policy regarding uniform applies equally to all elements. 1. Yes, as indicated on December 7, 1966, until all members of the Canadian Forces have been equipped with the new service dress, they may continue to wear the present uniform, regimental dress and mess dress uniforms on appropriate occasions.

2. The Reserve Forces are being issued with combat clothing for field training which is that currently in use by the Regular Force. No firm date has been established for the issue of the new service uniform to the Reserve Forces, but it will not commence until after completion of the Regular Force issue program.

3. Not applicable.

GOVERNMENT LAMB PREMIUM

Question No. 1,379—Mr. MacLean:

1. What has been the rate of government premium paid on lamb for each of the past five fiscal years?

[Mr. Groos.]

2. On how many occasions, during these five years, has this rate been changed and, on what dates?

3. What was the import of each of these changes?

4. What has been the total amount paid under this premium policy to lamb producers in the Province of Prince Edward Island, for each of the past five fiscal years?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture):

	Choice	Good
	1 and 2	1 and 2
1. 1964-65	$2	$1
1965-66	$2	$1
1966-67	$2	$1
1967-68	$2	$1
1968-69	$1	—

2. Once, April 1, 1968.

3. The change in 1968 did not affect the percentage of lambs grading Choice and Good in that year.

4. 1964-65, $9,250; 1965-66, $8,349; 1966-67, $7,347; 1967-68, $4,470; 1968-69, $1,602.

GOVERNMENT BACON HOG PREMIUM

Question No. 1,380—Mr. MacLean:

1. What has been the rate of government premium paid on bacon hogs for each of the past five fiscal years?

2. On how many occasions, during these five years, has this rate been changed and, on what dates?

3. What was the import of each of these changes?

4. What has been the total amount paid under this premium policy to hog producers in the Province of Prince Edward Island, for each of the past five fiscal years?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. 1964-65, $3 Grade A quality; 1965-66, $3 Grade A quality; 1966-67, $3 Grade A quality; 1967-68, $3 Grade A quality; 1968-69, $2 Grade A quality (9 months); $3 Canada index 103 or higher (3 months).

2. Two. April 1, 1968 (reduced to $2 Grade A quality); December 31, 1968 (changed to $3 on Canada Index 103 or higher).

3. The change on April 1, 1968 did not affect the percentage of hogs grading A. The change December 31, 1968 was associated with the change to the new Hog Carcass Valuation System which equated returns to the producer with value to the consumer.

4. 1964-65, $106,750; 1965-66, $108,651; 1966-67, $96,653; 1967-68, $152,530; 1968-69, $93,398.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CF-5 AIRCRAFT

Question No. 1,388—Mr. MacLean:

1. How many CF-5 aircraft are now in service with the Canadian Defence Forces?

2. Have any tanker aircraft been acquired for air-refueling of the CF-5?

3. By what date is it expected that the full requirement of tanker aircraft for refueling the CF-5 aircraft will be procured for, and in service in the Canadian Defence Forces?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Thirty.

2. Two of the Boeing 707/347C being procured for the Canadian Forces will be modified to provide an in-flight refuelling capability.

3. Approximately 24 months is required, as the lead time for the procurement of the parts is estimated at 14-16 months, with additional time being required for installation, checkout, instrumentation and flight testing.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—MARITIME COMMAND

Question No. 1,389—Mr. MacLean:

1. How many ships of each class are now in commission in Maritime Command?

2. How many of these ships could be fully manned, up to the present authorized complement, in all trades, in case of emergency?

3. In what trades, if any, is there a shortage of fully skilled personnel, under the present authorized complement?

4. Does the de-commissioning of the aircraft carrier Bonaventure (a) create a surplus in some trades, and, if so, what trades (b) compensate for the shortage of certain trades in the complement of other ships (c) is there still a shortage of certain skilled trades for the manning of the remaining ships, even with the de-commissioning of the aircraft carrier Bonaventure?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. One A/S aircraft carrier; Eleven destroyer escorts; Nine destroyer escorts (helicopter); Four submarines; Two operational support ships; Two repair vessels; Six minesweepers; One hydrofoil—still in experimental stage to determine its potential as an A/S vehicle; One diving depot ship.

2. All of them.

3. Small shortages (less than 15 per cent) exist in the trades of Radioman Sea, Signalman Sea, and Radar Plotter.

4. (a) Yes, a temporary surplus in the trades of Air Boatswain, Marine Engineering Technician and Electrical Technician. It is anticipated that this surplus will disappear in 1971; (b) Yes; (c) Yes, see 3.

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 1,391—Mr. Harding:

1. (a) How many private timber berths are there still remaining in Glacier National Park (b) who is the registered owner of each berth and what is the acreage involved in each?

2. (a) How many private timber berths in Glacier National Park have been obtained by the Crown since December 1, 1968 by (i) purchase (ii) expropriation (b) what was the total amount paid for each timber berth?

3. Is the federal government currently negotiating the purchase of any remaining timber berths and, if so, when are the negotiations likely to be concluded?

4. Are there any privately held mineral claims in Glacier National Park and, if so (a) how many claims are held (b) who is the registered owner of each (c) what is the acreage involved in each case (d) is the federal government currently negotiating the purchase of these claims?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) One. (b) Selkirk Spruce Mills Ltd. own one berth covering the following area: Berth No. 117 3.37 sq. miles or 2,156.8 acres.

2. (a) Five timber berths have been purchased; however, in order to establish a date and to ensure that all claims are cleared by mutual agreement between vendor and purchaser, expropriation is being implemented. (b) Negotiations with the vendor, Kicking Horse Forest Products Ltd., were not based on the value of each individual berth but on their total holdings. These holdings were as follows:

Glacier National Park

	sq. miles		acres
Berth No. 40	6.25	or	4,000.0
Berth No. 292	6.28	or	4,019.2
Berth No. 328	1.85	or	1,184.0
Berth No. 329	2.63	or	1,683.2
Berth No. 342	11.88	or	7,603.2
Total	28.89		18,489.6

Mount Revelstoke National Park

	sq. miles		acres
Berth No. 73	1.11	or	710.4

The total amount agreed upon for these holdings is $2,750,000 of which $1,250,000 has been paid.

3. Yes, negotiations have been completed for the purchase of the only remaining timber berth in Glacier National Park, held by Selkirk Spruce Mills, Ltd. The transfer of the title to the Crown is expected by March 31, 1970. Again in this case in order to establish a date and to ensure all claims are cleared by mutual agreement, expropriation will be implemented.

4. Yes. (a) One; (b) Mr. B. C. McCorkell, Vancouver; (c) Approximately 25 acres; (d) No. This claim appears to have no economic value by itself and it is expected that it will lapse in time.

P.E.I.—AGRICULTURE LIME ASSISTANCE

Question No. 1,416—Mr. MacLean:

What is the total paid out under the Agriculture Lime Assistance program, for lime used by farmers in the Province of Prince Edward Island, for each fiscal year 1965-1966 to 1969-1970 inclusive?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture: Nil.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GOVERNMENT COMMISSIONS

Question No. 383—Mr. Coates:

1. How many commissions have been established by the present government since June 25, 1968?

Return tabled.

Mr. Carter: I ask the Leader of the House for the fourth time when I may expect an answer to question 516 which has been on the order paper since November 20.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I shall have to make further inquiries, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I refer once again to starred question No. 1,265, dated February 18, asking how many letters, telegrams and other communications criticizing or condemning the white paper on taxation in whole or in part have been received by the Minister of Finance since January 1, 1970. I understood that the minister was going to provide an answer today.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can respond to the hon. member's question. We expect to have an answer shortly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is playing fast and loose with Parliament. Even though they may prove embarrassing to the government, answers to starred questions should not be delayed in this way. There is nothing more serious than the manner in which this government treats the House with sublime contempt in respect of questions which should be answered. What do starred questions mean? This question has been left unanswered from February 18 to March 11. I know it is difficult for the government to count the innumerable letters and telegrams they have received and I understand how embarrassing this is. But the truth should not be hidden from this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that 68 questions were answered today and that more than 70 per cent of the questions asked this session have already been answered.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the House to permit me to withdraw questions Nos. 1,242 and 1,243 which both deal with the Arrow tragedy and will both be answered, I believe, in the course of the judicial inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

U.S. Oil Import Restrictions

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

OIL

U.S. IMPORT RESTRICTIONS—EFFECT ON CANADIAN ECONOMY—RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by my hon. friend from Waterloo, to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the announcement by the President of the United States on Canadian oil exports, its effect on the Canadian economy, and the response of the Canadian government to the arbitrary and unilateral action taken by the United States government.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has given the Chair the notice required under Standing Order 26. As hon. members know, in determining whether an emergency debate should be granted the Chair must take into account, along with other factors, the probability of the matter being brought before the House within a reasonable length of time by other means. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands knows, and as is known by the House, there will be a budget presentation tomorrow followed by a budget debate within the next ensuing days. It seems to me there will thus be ample opportunity for the hon. member and others interested in this very important and urgent matter to consider it during the course of the debate.

It would appear, therefore, that the Chair would not be justified in allowing an emergency debate at this time under the provisions of Standing Order 26.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY POLICY—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 26, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing an important and urgent matter, namely concurrence in the first report of the standing committee on Agriculture, tabled in the House on February 17 last, whose recommendations must be discussed before the announcement of the dairy policy of the government for the coming year, that is before March 31, 1970.

Mr. Speaker: As the previous speaker, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 26, has sent the Chair a notice of motion which he wishes to introduce and this has given me the opportunity to look into it carefully.

As the hon. member said, a motion has already been introduced in order to approve the report to which the hon. member referred and debate on this motion began on February 19, a debate which went on for some time on this occasion.

The order of the day for resuming debate is still standing in Routine Proceedings and, of course, this debate might be taken up again at any time at the discretion of the government. Finally—and this is the major aspect—I must point out that the near future will likely provide several opportunities for discussing this question. More particularly, I remind the hon. member that the budget debate which will begin tomorrow night will be carried on next week. I regret that, for these reasons, I cannot accept the motion proposed by the hon. member for Bellechasse.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 334 and 361 are acceptable to the government.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Notices of Motions Nos. 334 and 361 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ELECTRIC REDUCTION COMPANY PLANT—CORRESPONDENCE WITH BEDFORD INSTITUTE OF OCEANOGRAPHY

Motion No. 334—Mr. Carter:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada or any of its representatives and the Bedford Institute of Oceanography relating to the establishment of the Electric Reduction Company's Plant in Long Harbour, Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS CONCERNING EXTRA BENEFITS FOR SUPERANNUATES

Motion No. 361—Mr. McCleave:

That an Order of the House do issue for documents sent by the Personnel Policy Branch, Treasury Board Secretariat, to those groups which are the bargaining agents for employees in the Public Service (including Armed Forces and RCMP), relating to the statement of the President of the Treasury Board on December 19, 1969, in the House of Commons concerning extra benefits for superannuates.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, notices of motions Nos. 133 and 149 are acceptable to the government, subject to the usual conditions as regards confidential documents and to the approval of the government authorities concerned.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that Notices of Motions Nos. 133 and 149 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXPORT OF LOW-COST GOODS TO CANADA

Motion No. 133—Mr. Saltsman:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all current agreements or arrangements between Canada and other countries regarding the latter's restraints on the export of 'low-cost' goods to Canada.

Motion agreed to.

JET AIRCRAFT ANTI-POLLUTION REGULATIONS

Motion No. 149—Mr. Harding:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all recent correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario regarding anti-pollution regulations for jet aircraft.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 53, 54, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 197, 245, 248, 249, 250, 272, 289, 319, 320, 324, 352, 370, 372 and 385?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

"MANHATTAN" PROJECT—DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND HUMBLE OIL COMPANY

Motion No. 53—Mr. Thomson:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the Department of External Affairs and the Humble Oil Company and its partners in relation to the Manhattan project.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

"MANHATTAN" PROJECT—DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND U.S. GOVERNMENT

Motion No. 54—Mr. Thomson:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence between the Department of External Affairs and the United States Government in relation to the Manhattan project.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

MANAGEMENT SYSTEM, EQUIPMENT ACQUISITION PRODUCTS

Motion No. 187—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Peat, Marwick, Livingstone and Company, Boston, USA undertaken for the Department of Defence Production in 1965 on the development of an effective management system for equipment acquisition products, mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the report referred to was commissioned as a working document for the internal use of the former department of defence production. As such it is considered confidential and not in the public interest to table. In these circumstances I hope that the hon. member will be willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I believe that a working document, if it does not contain names, should not be confidential and I would ask for a vote at this time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Motions for Papers

Mr. Speaker: The motion is transferred for debate.

AUTOMOTIVE VEHICLE SAFETY CODE

Motion No. 188—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by J. A. Bancroft, Ottawa, Ontario, undertaken for the Department of Defence Production in 1965 on the development of an automotive vehicle safety code, mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, there is no specific report resulting from the work undertaken by Mr. Bancroft for the former Department of Defence Production. Mr. Bancroft's services were retained to provide technical advice in the preparation of the automotive vehicle safety code, and not to prepare a consultant's report. I therefore hope that the hon. member may be willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Skoberg: I will withdraw it.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

PLANNING, PROGRAMMING AND BUDGETING, DEFENCE PRODUCTION

Motion No. 189—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Peat, Marwick, Livingstone and Company, Boston, USA, undertaken for the Department of Defence Production on the development of departmental planning, programming and budgeting system, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same as the one just given in reply to motion for the production of papers No. 187. I therefore ask the hon. member again to withdraw.

Mr. Skoberg: I make the same request for a vote.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): And I make the same request.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM, DEFENCE PRODUCTION

Motion No. 190—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Peat, Marwick, Livingstone and Company, Boston, USA, undertaken for the Department of Defence Production on the development of an effective project management improvement program, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same as the one just given in reply to motions for production of papers Nos. 187 and 189. I would ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. Skoberg: The same request.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): And the same.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

AUTOMOTIVE VEHICLE SAFETY CODE

Motion No. 191—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by J. A. Bancroft, undertaken for the Department of Defence Production in 1968 on the further development of the automotive vehicle safety code, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the reply to this motion which refers to the work done by Mr. J. A. Bancroft is the same as the reply given to the motion for production of papers No. 188. Once again, in the circumstances I trust that the hon. member will agree to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Skoberg: I agree.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

POLLUTION OF B.C. WATERS

Motion No. 197—Mr. Rose:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence between the Department of Fisheries and Forestry and pulp mills in British Columbia regarding the pollution of B.C. waters and the pollution guidelines of the Department.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is the view of the government that the tabling of this correspondence would seriously affect the confidence and effective relationships between the department and the companies in question. Frank discussions between the parties would be inhibited and the successful relationships established between the department and the pulp mills seriously hampered. In view of this fact we should like to request of the conscientious hon. member that the motion be withdrawn.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, it is my view that information on pollution should be public. If I cannot get the information from the department then I may move in on Information Canada.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

LEATHER FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY PRODUCTIVITY

Motion No. 245—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by John L. Schwab Associates on productivity in the Canadian Leather Footwear Industry undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is willing to table copies of the consultant's three volume report which contains his evaluations, appraisals and recommendations. There is some supporting data of a highly technical nature which is not available in sufficient copies to permit tabling. However, the minister would be pleased to show it to the hon. member or anyone else who may wish to see it.

Mr. Skoberg: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN COMMUNICATIONS SATELLITE SYSTEMS—NORTHERN ELECTRIC REPORT

Motion No. 248—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Northern Electric Company Limited on Canadian Communications satellite systems undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the member that the report in question contains proprietary information, disclosure of which is prohibited by the agreement under which Northern Electric Company Limited supplies this report to the government. In these circumstances the minister would respectfully ask the hon. member for Moose Jaw to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I believe we should have further information and I would ask for a vote on this.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

DESIGN IN CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Motion No. 249—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Price Waterhouse Associates on a survey of design in Canadian industry undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that he is willing to table copies of this study with the exception of certain supplementary information which was submitted, in addition to the report, by the consultant. This supplementary information deals with the establishments which were canvassed for the study, completed questionnaires and similar information which was received on a confidential basis.

Mr. Skoberg: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN COMMUNICATIONS SATELLITE SYSTEM—RCA VICTOR REPORT

Motion No. 250—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by RCA Victor Company Limited on a Canadian Communications satellite system undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the member that the report in question contains proprietary information, disclosure of which is prohibited by the agreement under which RCA Victor Company Ltd. supplied this report to the government. In these circumstances, the minister would ask the hon. member for Moose Jaw to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to be partial so I believe I should call for a vote.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Motions for Papers

GULF OF GEORGIA OIL DRILLING COST—BENEFIT STUDY

Motion No. 272—Mr. Rose:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the cost-benefit study undertaken in the Department of Fisheries and Forestry regarding drilling for oil in the Gulf of Georgia as mentioned by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Fisheries and Forestry is undertaking a cost-benefit analysis regarding the drilling for oil in the Strait of Georgia. However, it will be a considerable time before it is completed. In view of the fact that there is therefore no report available at the present time, may I suggest to the hon. and reasonable member that he may wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, since I am always honourable and reasonable and since the minister in question has called for an underwater national park in this particular area I can therefore assume that the cost must be greater than the benefit.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION SHARING—CANADIAN FIRMS EXPORTING TO U.S.

Motion No. 289—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a list of all Canadian firms exporting products to the United States, under the Canada-U.S. Defence Production Sharing Agreement from its inception in 1959 to November 30, 1969, listing the specific materials, components, etc., exported and the dollar aggregates involved.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move the motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the information requested is not releasable since it is provided to the Canadian government for statistical purposes only and on the understanding that it is to be treated as commercially confidential affecting the competitive position of the companies involved. In view of this, the minister would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

[Mr. Speaker.]

REPORT ON POLICY AND PLANNING BRANCH, ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Motion No. 319—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Operation Research Industries Limited undertaken for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding a quantitative assessment of the Policy and Planning Branch as mentioned in answer to Question Number 2,452 of the past Session.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the report is an internal working document relating to the internal organization of this section of the department; its release is not considered to be in the public interest. Under these circumstances it is suggested that the hon. member be requested to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I will put that to a vote.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

REPORT ON WATER SURVEY OF CANADA DIVISION

Motion No. 320—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by James F. MacLaren Limited undertaken for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding a review of the Water Survey of Canada Division as mentioned in answer to Question Number 2,452 of the past Session.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same as the previous answer to Notice of Motion No. 319.

Mr. Skoberg: And a like request.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

PRIMARY DISTRIBUTORS, CANADIAN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES

Motion No. 324—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a list of (a) the approximately 200 primary distributors of Government of Canada marketable securities, and (b) the primary distributors who are at present eligible to enter into purchase and resale agreements with the Bank of Canada, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 65 and reported in Hansard of December 17, 1969 at page 2067.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, inclusion of a firm at any particular time in the requested lists depends on its being actively and continuously engaged in the distribution of trustee-type securities and in its demonstrated ability to market government of Canada securities. Composition of these lists changes from time to time. Publication of these lists as at a certain date could lead to unfair reflection on a firm which happened to be omitted at that particular time. For this reason and, in the case of Part (b) of the motion, because of the banker-client relationship involved and because the number of primary distributors eligible to enter into purchase and resale agreements with the Bank of Canada changes from time to time, it is not considered in the public interest to publish the lists requested, and it has not been the practice of government to do so. In the circumstances, I hope the hon. member will agree to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the minister's need for secrecy in this particular matter. I believe it would be in the public interest to disclose the dealers.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

STUDY OF GOLD MINING OPERATIONS

Motion No. 352—Mr. Peters:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study on gold mining operations undertaken in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as mentioned by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and reported in Hansard of January 23, 1970, at page 2738.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act will expire on December 31, 1970. The study relating to gold mining in Canada is under way at the present time. It is expected to be completed by the middle of this year. On receipt of the report a decision will be made on whether it will be made public. In view of this, I hope the hon. member will withdraw his motion.

Mr. Peters: Question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Motions for Papers

INDIAN LAND AND TREATY CLAIMS AND ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Motion No. 370—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between Dr. Lloyd Barber and the Native Indian peoples organizations across Canada regarding the matter of Indian land and treaty claims and aboriginal rights.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the commissioner that it would not be in the best interests of the commission and the native Indian peoples to make these documents public. I would hope, therefore, that the hon. member would agree to withdraw this motion.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is pretty presumptuous for the commissioner to decide what is in the best interests of the Indian people. Let them decide.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

BACKGROUND PAPERS AND REPORTS ON TAX REFORM PROPOSALS

Motion No. 372—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all background papers and reports related to Chapter 8 of the Government White Paper on Proposals for Tax Reform regarding the impact on revenues and the economy.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the papers and reports requested by the hon. member are internal working papers prepared for ministers by departmental officials and, as such, are privileged documents. In view of this I hope the hon. member will consider withdrawing his motion.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, in view of the uncertainty regarding the impact of these taxes I think it would be very much in the public interest that they be made public.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

PHASE-OUT OF U.S. ARGENTIA NAVAL BASE

Motion No. 385—Mr. Lewis:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all the correspondence, memoranda, communications, etc., between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States regarding the phase-out of the United States Argentia naval base in Newfoundland.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the documents requested are part of confidential discussions with the United States government, and I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question!

[English]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the next item, although I see that the Solicitor General is not with us at the moment I wonder whether I might make an inquiry in respect of Notice of Motion No. 356 which relates to the food strike or protest sitdown at Prince Albert penitentiary just before Christmas. This Notice of Motion has been on the order for about five weeks now. I wonder whether some indication could be given concerning when this might be dealt with.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I will bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw attention to Notices of Motions for the production of papers No. 345 and No. 346. It seems strange to me that these papers could nt be produced before now since the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has made an announcement which has to do with these papers.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining Notices of Motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AIRPORTS

STE SCHOLASTIQUE—TABLING OF DOCUMENTS CONCERNING SITE

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Since the Quebec Minister of Municipal Affairs this morning agreed to Ste Scholastique as the site of the proposed international airport and tabled all the relevant papers, I should like to know whether the Minister of Transport in turn intends to table in the House the federal government file in order that the Canadian people might be adequately informed on that long-standing issue?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the general comments made by the minister from the province of Quebec are concerned I have not yet seen these and naturally would prefer to have an opportunity to peruse them before making any detailed comment. I would hope to give a more definite answer tomorrow.

[Translation]

STE SCHOLASTIQUE—PREPARATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF AREA

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

The Quebec Minister of Municipal Affairs stated this morning that land development was the concern of the province. Does the minister agree with this statement? If so, will he soon meet with the Quebec authorities for the purpose of determining this policy?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that the first part of the hon. member's question is in order, but the minister may wish to answer the second part.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are in contact with the Department of Municipal Affairs of Quebec and we are trying to establish structures in order to ensure the orderly development of the Ste Scholastique region.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put another supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Does he intend to co-operate with the Minister of Municipal Affairs of Quebec in order to make the development of the territory economically possible?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to co-operate in that respect.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

I should like to point out to the minister that, as an answer to a question asked in the House on January 30, he had undertaken to make a statement in order to give detailed information about this airport. As he did not follow through and as the Minister of the Municipal Affairs of Quebec stated this morning that the government had given no answer to the proposals of Quebec about economic development and expansion, I should like to ask him whether he intends nevertheless to carry on the work at the Ste Scholastique airport without having agreed about that beforehand with the government of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the latter part of the question, I indicated earlier that discussions were going on, and in fact I have had conversations with the Minister of Municipal Affairs for the province of Quebec. I apologize to the hon. member and to the House for not having made the promised statement earlier, but the fact is that these negotiations are a necessary preliminary to that statement and they are not yet completed.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport.

Considering the particular circumstances and the urgency of the question, I would like to ask him if he would undertake to make a statement in the House either tomorrow or the day after, with regard to the construction of the Ste Scholastique airport?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: As I indicated in reply to an earlier question, I will take a close look at the reported statements of the spokesmen for the province of Quebec and will be governed accordingly.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport.

Are the discussions taking place now with representatives of the province of Quebec still connected with changing the airport site? Is this a final decision, and will the government proceed with the construction of this airport?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: I can say unequivocally that the site is Ste Scholastique, that we are proceeding, that a number of important contracts have already been let, that as soon as the ground is free of snow the clearing will get under way, and I hope there will be no unnecessary impediment to the provision of a good deal of labour in that area.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport.

In view of the reply he has just given, could he tell us clearly and specifically whether the federal government intends to carry on with the project even if Quebec does not accept the regional development and the land use proposed?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this is essentially a hypothetical question, but if we have to go it alone, we will.

An hon. Member: That is what 30-buck Benson said.

Mr. Ricard: You are passing the buck, as usual.

OIL

REPORTED WILLINGNESS OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT TO IMPOSE RESTRICTIONS ON EXPORTS TO U.S.—GENERAL ENERGY POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and at the same time welcome him back from Canada's Arctic, over which I trust Canadian sovereignty reigns supreme. In view of the statement by Philip Trezise, the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs in the U.S. government, to the effect that the Canadian government fully understood the need for the cutbacks in shipments of Canadian oil to the United States, and that if Washington had not imposed these cutbacks the Canadian government would have done so, I ask whether the Canadian government concurred in the cutbacks and was prepared to impose these restrictions at the request of the U.S. government.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not true, of course, that the Canadian government concurred in the action taken by the U.S. government in imposing a limitation on imports from Canada into the United States. It is true, as the hon. gentleman knows and as is known particularly by those who were responsible at the beginning for the negotiation of the open border between Canada and the United States, that there was always an underlying agreement for restraint on the part of Canada. During these negotiations we offered to continue the policy of restraint. That, however, was rejected by the U.S. government because the figures at which we were prepared to apply restraint were very much larger than they were willing to accept.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I ask the Prime Minister, in view of the recommendations of the presidential task force headed by Mr. George Shultz, Secretary of Labour, suggesting that any removal of curtailment of Canadian shipments of oil to the United States should be contingent upon an energy package policy, whether any discussions are going on regarding an energy package policy. Also, can the Prime Minister assure the House that before any agreement is signed in this regard, the House will have a full opportunity to become acquainted with the nature of the agreement?

Mr. Sharp: First of all, I would like to deny that there is any necessary relationship between any future action on the part of the United States and the removal of restrictions on imports of oil from Canada. I believe they took action in the interest of maintaining some stability in the oil industry in the United States. There have been some discussions of a peripheral character with respect to an exchange of energy. There has been no decision of any kind on a continental policy or anything similar. I said in a statement the other day that we were seeking harmonious policies between our two countries. I think that is what we should be pursuing.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands rising on a point of order?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I asked the Prime Minister for a certain assurance and have twice received evasive replies from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Surely the House is entitled to a reply from the Prime Minister, particularly when a question is asked about a very important matter of government policy.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, speaking on the point of order raised by the hon. member, may I say that I am busily reading the debate that took place last Thursday during which I was accused of exercising too much power. I thought it would be nice if I let some ministers exercise it.

An hon. Member: Why don't you do that all the time?

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the recent increase in Canadian crude exports was largely the result of Canadian entry into the Chicago market, and that entry into the Chicago market was the benefit which Canada was to obtain for restricting its exports under the 1967 secret agreement, does the government not feel that this cutback of one-third of Canada's exports to the United States is the beginning of a squeeze by the U.S. government on our whole economy as a result of other actions of this government?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: What other action?

Mr. Horner: I will explain that later.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I put a further supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it the intention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make another trip to Washington to discuss this matter with Secretary Hickel?

Mr. Sharp: As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said yesterday, we do not agree with the action of the United States in imposing these restrictions. We understand they are temporary: that is our view and our belief. I am sure that all members of the House, even including members of the New Democratic Party, will want to have this restriction removed.

INDUSTRY

GOLD MINES—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Since the government will decide this year whether subsidies are to be paid to gold mines over the next three years, can the minister inform the House whether the government will maintain these subsidies so as not to harm the economy of the north-western region of Quebec?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, contrary to previous remarks by the hon. member, I have never stated that I was opposed to subsidies. The problem of gold mines, particularly as regards workers, is being considered by the department. We shall try to take into account the interests of the workers and the municipalities concerned in this issue.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—LETTERS OF PROTEST

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the hope that was expressed, that participatory democracy would assure us a new world, I ask the Minister of Finance a question in connection with the letters he has received on the proposed tax reforms. Was there too much participatory democracy on the part of the Canadian people? Further, what is the reason for not answering these letters? Are the objections and complaints as numerous as the sands of the sea?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to know, because this looks like a flagrant disregard of Parliament.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be most pleased to answer the hon. member's question. I have been very encouraged by the letters I have received—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alkenbrack: But not from Kingston and the islands.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, for the first time in parliamentary history in Canada, Great Britain and anywhere where there is a parliamentary system such as ours, a government has had the guts to bring forward proposals for such tax reforms.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister might want to answer the question, but it seems to me that we are entering the field of debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am tremendously interested in the knowledge of anatomy displayed by the minister and I ask why does he not have that particular quality in answering this question.

Mr. Benson: I will answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question about all these letters he is so pleased about. Among those letters was there one from the hon. member for Trinity with suggestions for dealing with the desperate plight of Canadian finance today?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIAMEY—COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could he tell the House whether the Canadian government has reached agreement with the government of Quebec concerning the composition of the Canadian delegation to the Niamey conference?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these discussions are still under way.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Seeing that the conference is being held this weekend, would the minister state to the House if the talks are actually at a point where the Canadian delegation will not be able to attend this conference?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. On one point I can be very clear; the delegation will be led by my colleague the Secretary of State. He has already left Ottawa on his way to the conference.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Joliette wishes to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister if he could tell the House whether he has received from the Quebec government any recent proposals which could justify the appointment of a co-chairman for this conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As has just been said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker, negotiations are still under way between representatives of both governments.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of hon. members—

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is seeking the floor on a supplementary. Order. Four or five members are rising apparently to ask supplementaries. Would the hon. member for Témiscamingue please resume his seat. I must point out to the hon. member for Témiscamingue, to the hon. member for Saint-Denis and to several others who wish to ask supplementary questions in this connection, that time is running out and it would be perhaps proper for us to proceed to something else.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

A conference in which Quebec is highly interested is being held and it must be decided today whether Quebec will participate. I believe this is an urgent matter. The Prime Minister did not give an adequate answer to the hon. member for Joliette and I would like to ask him a question about it.

[Mr. Sharp.]

POLLUTION

AIR—ACTION TO REDUCE LEVEL AT TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the alarming degree of air pollution found at Toronto International Airport, far above the maximum safety level allowed, what steps are being taken to handle this very serious situation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I indicated some weeks ago that Canadian airlines have been requested to adapt the exhausts of their jet engines to lower the level of pollution. They have undertaken to do this voluntarily. I am hoping the whole program can be completed within three years.

NATIONAL PARKS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—SETTLING OF ABORIGINAL RIGHTS BEFORE DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has he agreed to the request that the aboriginal rights to land in the Northwest Territories be settled before any lands are set aside for national parks in that territory?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have met with the representatives of the Indian Federation of the Northwest Territories and we had a discussion on the matter. It has been agreed that the representatives of the Indian Federation of the Territories will meet the experts of my department working on the development of a park in that area. In addition, when I visit the Northwest Territories during the stay of Her Majesty the Queen in Canada, on July 8, I will again meeet the representatives of the Indian Federation of the Territories in that connection.

FINANCE

REPLY TO LETTER FROM QUEBEC FINANCE MINISTER

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question.

Can he tell the House whether he intends to reply to the letter which was sent to him by the Quebec Minister of Finance on February 26 last and which was tabled in the Quebec legislature yesterday?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, an answer to this letter is being prepared.

SECOND VOYAGE OF "MANHATTAN"—AGREEMENT OF HUMBLE OIL COMPANY TO REGULATIONS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Your Honour may recall that I asked this question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Monday, and he indicated that the Minister of Transport would be prepared to reply today. Assuming it has been brought to the minister's attention, is the minister now prepared to state whether the Humble Oil Company has agreed to the regulations required by the Canadian government? Also, would the minister table the regulations with which the Manhattan is expected to comply?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not have a formal letter of compliance from Humble Oil at the moment, but we have had every indication that they are prepared to comply. The list of requirements is now in the final draft stage. We have carried out a preliminary study of the ship and the list of requirements and general assessments as a result of that study is now being prepared. As I mentioned earlier in the House there is no reason why this list should not be tabled, I hope before the end of the week.

Mr. Nesbitt: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, could the minister give us the date of the sailing of the Manhattan? Also, has a draft of these requirements been sent to the Humble Oil Company? If not, how could they reply?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to go over this matter step by step in as brief a time as you will permit. In the first instance, I repeat that we carried out a preliminary investigation of the ship over the last weekend to give us an idea of what is in place now. Having done that, the inspectors are writing, indicating what additional steps they think should be taken. This list of steps is being drafted and will be sent to Humble Oil. It will be tabled in this House, I hope before the end of this week. As to the date of sailing, that will be around April 1. But there will not be any sailing unless and until these regulations have been met.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EFFECT OF HATE LITERATURE BILL ON PARLIAMENTARY IMMUNITY

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Solicitor General this question. If in free expression in this chamber any member brings himself within the terms of the hate literature bill, would the normal parliamentary immunity apply to that member?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think that the question as asked is in order as a verbal question at this time. I would think it might be placed on the Order Paper. At the same time, it seems to me the hon. member is asking for the expression of a legal opinion and I do not think the question is in order.

INDUSTRY

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF EXAMINATION OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister without Portfolio from Windsor West. Is he prepared to provide the House, and consequently the public, with the terms of reference regarding his examination of foreign ownership of industry in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, this task is being carried out as part of cabinet duties, and it is a matter for the decision of cabinet and the Prime Minister.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to determine whether under the aegis of the minister's study he is taking account of the question of international unions as well as international companies.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CLOSING OF CERTAIN STATIONS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Does the minister know that a certain party, by the name of J. A. Gauthier, an employee of the Canadian National, is presently rudely soliciting members of certain municipal councils in the Province of Quebec in order to obtain their agreement with regard to the shutting-down of some stations? If so, what gives this individual the right to make threats?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question should be placed on the order paper.

[English]

THE BUDGET

METHOD OF RELEASE OF TEXT OF SPEECH

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and concerns tomorrow evening's trans-Canada release of the text of his budget speech. In view of the emerging commercial significance of former fur trading posts such as Edmonton which are not endowed with an agency of the Bank of Canada, does the minister intend to follow the precedent established in the release of the white paper on taxation by using the district offices of the Department of National Revenue?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, we shall follow the usual budgetary procedure and use Bank of Canada offices.

EXPECTATION OF INCREASE IN OLD AGE ASSISTANCE

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance about a statement by Senator Croll concerning increased old age assistance. I quote from a newspaper report as follows:

> I think we can expect that will be looked after in the budget. It is more than hoped; I think we can expect it.

I wonder whether this is government policy, and can we expect it to be announced tomorrow night in the budget?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question as asked is in order. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

Mr. Monteith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this looks to me very much like a budget leak and it seems to me the question should be answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggested to the hon. member that the question as asked was not in order. He was asking whether a statement made by a Senator or person other than a member of the government represented government policy. The question in those terms was not in order. However, if the hon. member has another angle he would like to inquire about, the minister might wish to reply.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would simply say that I believe Senator Croll knows about as much about what is in the budget as my hon. friend.

In answer to the previous question, the reason I am pleased with the letters is that they contain so much constructive comment, unlike the comment—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member wishes to ask a supplementary question but here again I must remind hon. members that there are only a few minutes left before the end of the question period. I was hoping that many hon. members would have the opportunity to ask their questions, and that is why I intended to recognize.

[English]

Order, please. I have recognized the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I realize that some hon. members and, more especially, some party leaders are allowed to ask up to ten supplementary questions. I beg to ask a second one in the whole afternoon and I am asked to resume my seat. I simply wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will be pleased to recognize the hon. member in a moment, but I have now recognized the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

[English]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ASSISTANCE FOR NOVA SCOTIA HIGHWAY PROGRAM

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Could the minister indicate when he will be making an announcement as to the assistance that will be provided to the province of Nova Scotia to carry out its highway program?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it will be at the same time as the agreement is signed with the province of Nova Scotia.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM— ANSWERS TO LETTERS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question.

He was saying awhile ago that he has been receiving a great number of favourable letters from the Canadian taxpayers since they became acquainted with the white paper. Could the minister tell us if he answers all the letters received from Canadian citizens or taxpayers about the white paper?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker—and I hope my hon. friends opposite will not complain if I have to get extra staff to help me.

Mr. Bell: Use some of the Prime Minister's.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

RETENTION BY RETAILERS OF PRICE REDUCTIONS INTENDED TO BENEFIT CONSUMERS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is his department investigating the practice of some retailers in not passing on savings which are apparently intended for the consumer? For example, if on a pound of coffee it is indicated that there is a reduction of six cents from the original price, is his department investigating the practice of some retailers in not passing on this saving to the consumer but retaining it for themselves?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I follow the example and I wish the hon. member would send it to me. We have charged and have had a number of people convicted who have been using cents-off transactions to misrepresent the price of goods to consumers.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FORMATION OF NATIONAL YOUTH POLICY— WELFARE COUNCIL RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. However, in his absence I might be permitted to direct it to the Parliamentary Secretary. Could the Parliamentary Secretary indicate whether the minister has had the opportunity to review the recommendations set forth in the recent Canadian Welfare Council report, outlining a number of initiatives which the federal government might consider respecting the formation of a national youth policy? Also, could the Parliamentary Secretary indicate whether the minister will be making a statement on motions concerning this matter?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries of the minister.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ARCTIC DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister, now that he has returned from his extensive tour of the Arctic, report to the House his conclusions regarding a national policy to develop our last great frontier?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope the Prime Minister would not make such a statement now. I would think a statement of this nature would have to be made on motions.

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Surely the Prime Minister is able to give us one drum solo, or is he through beating his own drum?

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMBINES

REPORT ON NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE ACTIVITIES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a non-musical question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Did he receive recently a report and certain recommendations concerning possible combine activities of the National Hockey League? If he did, when is the minister prepared to make this report public?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have stated many times, inquiries under the Combines Investigations Act are kept secret until such time as a report is made by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission or a charge is laid in the courts.

INQUIRY AS TO NEW ACT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As a result of the Young Commission and the discussions that have taken place in recent weeks, does the government intend to bring in a new combines act?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I explained to the House several times and in the committee yesterday, we are working overtime in the department to produce a revised combines act which, as we said in the Speech from the Throne, we hoped would be introduced in this session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will it be introduced in this session, or will it be postponed?

Mr. Basford: We certainly hope it can be introduced before the end of June, Mr. Speaker.

AMENDMENTS RELATING TO PROFESSIONAL SPORT

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister intend to introduce amendments to the Combines Investigation Act relative to professional sports? Is this being planned right now?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my hope to introduce a complete revision of the Combines Investigation Act. Specific provisions of the act will be revealed when the bill receives first reading.

POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—REIMBURSEMENT OF EXPENSES OF PROVINCIAL DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport concerning pollution control costs caused by the sunken oil tanker Arrow in Chedabucto Bay. As the minister is aware, some 1,200 people are employed in the fish plants in this area and in order to prevent the shutdown of these plants due to contaminated seawater, provincial authorities have expended funds in the hope of finding other sources of water. My question is: Will the federal government reimburse the provincial departments of mines, fisheries, lands and forests, and others, for the expenses incurred as a result of this disaster?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I have stated on numerous occasions, my hope is that the polluters themselves will eventually bear the responsibility for all costs in this connection. I can tell the hon. member and the House, however, that a letter has gone, or will be going today, to the government of Nova Scotia indicating that any expenditures it undertakes will be regarded by the federal government as a first charge against the insurance money that we know is available.

AIR TRANSPORT

ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND EPA RESPECTING SERVICE TO MARITIMES

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister been made aware of arrangements respecting air traffic through Maritime airports between Air Canada and EPA? If so, how long did it take these arrangements to come about?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not had any formal advice from either of those airlines. In the case of Air Canada, I investigated the question which the hon. member posed the other day. There is some change contemplated. As I understand it, it will not be announced until their spring or summer schedule is put forward. It has not been given to me.

Mr. MacInnis: A supplementary question. Will the minister acquaint himself with what is common knowledge and take steps to stop arrangements made behind his back? These arrangements have been finalized. Air Canada officials and EPA officials have made public announcements on television in Cape Breton. Since this question was brought to the minister's attention some time ago, he must realize the arrangements are objectionable to the people in that area. Something should be done about their underhanded methods.

Mr. Jamieson: I do not propose to comment on the adjectives used by the hon. member other than to repeat that officially I have not had any advice on this matter. I took it up as a result of the hon. member's earlier reports, which at that time had to do primarily with the assurance of employment for Air Canada employees. I was advised, in fact, that no such employment problems would exist.

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister has referred to my earlier question and is talking about employment. At no time did I mention employment. I repeat the question, for the benefit of the minister. On February 24—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the hon. member's attention that we appear to be entering a debate between the minister and the hon. member. It is not a question of privilege. The hon. member might want to ask a supplementary, but I do not think he has a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a further question of privilege. The minister must be talking about a question put by someone else, because my question had nothing to do with the assurance of employment. My question was directed to the minister, and I repeat—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure all hon. members will accept the member's statement about what he said previously. It seems this is a debate. The minister and all hon. members must accept the word of the hon. member when he says a certain statement was not uttered by him previously.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister has to accept it when it is written into the record. On the point of order, the question arises as to what the minister is going to do about arrangements between EPA and publicly-owned Air Canada, when the people in the area are expressing dissatisfaction and the minister is allowing this situation to go on.

Mr. Speaker: Essentially, this is a repetition of the earlier question asked by the hon. member.

SPORTS

PAN-AMERICAN GAMES—GRANTING OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO WINNIPEG

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the fact that Hansard records many questions about Winnipeg's request for assistance in connection with the deficit with respect to the Pan American Games, and in view of the fact Hansard does not record what was done, will the minister seek the consent of the House to table the press release on this matter and his letter to Mayor Juba of a few days ago, and have them added to Hansard so the record will be complete?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the letter to Mayor Juba is of course public. I shall be very pleased to table it and accede to the request of the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May it be made an appendix to Hansard, Mr. Speaker?

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, relating to something that happened a few moments ago in the question period. I asked if the Minister of Supply and Services could be permitted to table certain documents and have them appended to today's Hansard. He was willing to do so, but I do not think the matter was settled. I wonder if it could be so ordered?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of documents see appendix.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TIME REQUIRED TO PROCESS PASSPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question of which I recently gave him notice. Will he indicate to the House, either now or on motions, the normal time experienced by the department in the processing of applications for passports? I suggest the question has urgency because some people still think the situation in the passport office is the same as it was last year.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would now have to ascertain just how long a period it is. I heard recently that sometimes a passport can be obtained within a couple of days. On the other hand, I have felt it very desirable, and I repeat it here, to advise all who read Hansard or read about it in the newspapers to apply for their passports well in advance of travelling because delays occur later in the holiday season.

HARBOURS

CARIBOU, N.S.—IMPROVEMENTS TO FERRY TERMINAL

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the importance of the ferry service to the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, can the minister advise if an agreement has now been reached between the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia regarding improvements to the ferry terminal at Caribou, Nova Scotia?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Such an agreement has been reached, Mr. Speaker. I personally would be very glad to release the details of the agreement, but I would like to first consult the government of Nova Scotia to see if they have any objection. I can assure the House that agreement has been reached.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNDERSPENDING OF FOREIGN AID APPROPRIATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the fact that the appropriation for Canada's foreign aid was underspent by over $100 million last year, the largest gap between allocation and disbursement in three years, can the minister assure the House, or indicate an intention, that the new estimate of $363 million for foreign aid will actually be expended, if approved by Parliament, for the purpose for which it is voted?

[Mr. McCleave.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I regret to say I cannot give this undertaking. I do not think the hon. member should press me. I think it is good policy for Canada to give the recipient underdeveloped countries an opportunity of deciding when they would like to have the money spent. Some countries insist that it be spent within the appropriation year, and therefore the underdeveloped country rushes into a project just to spend the money. We do not follow that policy; our moneys are available for spending at any time once committed.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST THAT MEADOW LAKE CONSTITUENCY BE DESIGNATED AS SPECIAL AREA

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Now that the minister has accepted two points in the Meadow Lake constituency for economic development and expansion, will he include the whole constituency because many other points are in dire need of works programs and development?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is a form of representation. He has to assume that the minister has noted it. Perhaps the hon. member would ask a supplementary question tomorrow: we are running short of time.

AIR TRANSPORT

AIRCRAFT SABOTAGE AND HIJACKING—ALLAYING OF PILOTS' CONCERN

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the growing concern by air pilots about sabotage and hijacking, to the point that they are now considering a one-day international strike, what steps has the Canadian government taken recently to allay the fears of pilots with regard to hijacking and sabotage?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the House would agree that it is extremely difficult to allay such fears in total. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I have indicated on a number of occasions, Canada is quite prepared to participate in any international or even smaller group discussions on how best to resolve this admitted problem.

OIL

IMPOSITION OF EXPORT QUOTAS

Mr. Jack Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In order to comply with the United States government's ruling on Canadian oil imports into that country, is it the intention of the government of Canada to impose export quotas on the oil industry?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. No such request has been made to us.

AIR TRANSPORT

GRANTING OF ROUTES TO TRANSAIR—OPPORTUNITY TO MAKE REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that interventions were filed before the Canadian Transport Commission by the Ontario government, Nordair and other associations over the application by TransAir for two new east-west air routes with access to Toronto, and the fact that no public hearings were held by the Canadian Transport Commission before the decision was made, will the minister say whether he will immediately use his influence in the cabinet to stay this decision and give those who have intervened an opportunity to make representations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a decision as to whether to hold public hearings, as the hon. member knows, is for the Canadian Transport Commission. After a decision is made, there is a means of appeal. Of course, everybody involved knows what that method is. When it comes to the question of what influence I will exert, it depends entirely on whether I receive an appeal.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY

NATIONAL MARKS AND STANDARDS

On the order: Government Orders:

Report stage of Bill C-137, an act respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicles and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicles imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications—the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Skoberg: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been indicated in this House that the Standing Committees are most important in our parliamentary democracy. This bill has been called in the House today and the same time the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications is holding hearings on another department's estimates. I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to take into consideration the desirability of members of the transport committee being present in the House while this bill is being discussed today. Could not the business of the transport committee be postponed, in these circumstances?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Speaking to the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express support of the suggestion which has been put forward. The bill on auto safety, which the House is to discuss, was considered in detail by the transport committee only a short time ago. Most committees do not meet on Wednesday afternoons, but the transport committee has a great deal of work to do and for some reason or another it has been decided that it should proceed today.

In my view, either the committee should cancel the arrangement to meet this afternoon, or the House should defer consideration of the bill before us, in order that members of the transport committee who are interested in the subject of auto safety may take part in the proceedings in this House and lend their wisdom to both matters which require their attention. They cannot be in two places at the same time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the point seems to be a reasonable one. As hon. members know, I have no control over the arrangements made for committee meetings. I understand, however, that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport will be intervening with the chairman of the transport committee to suggest that today's meeting be postponed until later this evening after the debate in this House has been concluded, or until another day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Since the difficulty seems to have been dealt with satisfactorily, the motion might be put to the House.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-137, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicles and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicles imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jamieson moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Howe: Does the minister intend to say anything on third reading of this bill?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take the time of the House with words which would, essentially, amount to a repetition of what I have said before the committee and on second reading. But I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): I should like to say a few words on this legislation, Mr. Speaker, because I feel it is one of the most important pieces of legislation which has been brought forward this session. It has to do with car safety and it is not necessary for me to remind hon. members, or the general public, how important this subject is to every individual in Canada.

I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the Canada Safety Council for the important work it is doing in advising people of ways and means by which they may be able to overcome the difficulties which arise in connection with motor safety and thus avoid many of the accidents which occur on our highways. I should like to refer to two or three of their pamphlets. One of these, put out in connection with a car check campaign, is headed, "Periodic car checks". The theme is: check your car, and check accidents. This is very important. After all, if a driver looks after his vehicle properly and has confidence in it, the chances of an accident are tremendously reduced.

The council has issued another bulletin on the subject of driver responsibility. Responsibility, it points out, goes hand in hand with power—and this includes horsepower. In this bulletin the council reminds motorists that they are responsible both morally and legally for the safe mechanical condition of their vehicles. This leaflet, like the last to which I referred, speaks for itself. After all, responsibility must rest upon an owner or driver of a car to see that it is in fit condition to be driven.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

A third bulletin put out by the Safety Council has to do with the diagnosis of defects in automobiles. It advises motorists to go to garages and service stations in which they have confidence and where there is likelihood that the work necessary to maintain vehicles in fit condition for highway travel will be carried out effectively. Motorists are told:

> It is most important to see and be seen, so motorists should check their lighting systems, windshield wipers and mirrors to ensure that they are working correctly.

Reading these bulletins will acquaint motorists with many other ways in which they can take their cars on to the highway with a minimum chance of an accident. In connection with this bill I should also like to pay tribute to a former member of the House, Mr. Heward Grafftey, the former member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howe: There were occasions when he was almost jeered in this House for his persistence in keeping this subject before the attention of the government. I think he deserves the thanks and the support of all Canadians for the tremendous job he did in calling attention to the importance of car safety.

Over the years we have heard much—as well we should—about the need for research into the cause and eventual cure of cancer and heart disease. These are generally recognized as the No.1 killers of our day and age. Often overlooked, however, is the fact that the leading cause of death for persons in the age group 1-46 years is the traffic accident. I suggest that the money made available for research into the causes and prevention of traffic accidents is peanuts when compared with the amount made available for research into health problems. A greater effort must be made in the direction of auto safety because, unknown to most people, the lack of it has become one of the biggest social problems of our time.

Last Friday a debate took place in this House in connection with the social problems which have arisen because the centres of our cities are jammed with vast numbers of automobiles. Eventually, of course, it may be necessary to prevent private cars entering downtown areas and mass transit systems will be provided along modern lines to move people rapidly, at the same time eliminating a major cause of air pollution. But it would be wrong to blame auto manufacturers and governments alone. I certainly do not believe that the auto of today is safe, but according to the Canadian Safety Council, 90 per cent of all accidents result from human failure. Of the 8 per cent attributable to mechanical failure, a goodly proportion results from the lack of proper maintenance.

• (3:50 p.m.)

While the government has a great responsibility for highway safety research and education, a burden undoubtedly rests on the road user. The specifications for the national safety standards as set down in Hansard for January 29 include provisions for seat-belts. I agree wholeheartedly with putting teeth into the law as far as it concerns automobile manufacturers, importers and distributors. To sell a car without such equipment, or with inferior equipment, is criminal. If attempting to take one's life is still adjudged a criminal offence, I venture to suggest that to drive without a safety belt is an elaborate attempt at suicide and should also be viewed just as seriously. Indeed, I would go so far as to say that the non-use of seat-belts probably contributes as much to the death and injury of other persons as it does to the non-user. A seat-belt limits mobility, and limited mobility is one certain way of preventing motorists turning around to carry on a conversation with the back seat driver, or an irate parent turning to admonish the noisy children in the back seat.

The January, 1970, edition of Safety Canada, published by the Canadian Safety Council, reports:

> An extensive safety belt survey conducted by the Alberta Safety Council from Sept. 27 to Oct. 18, 1969, disclosed that only 18.4 per cent of 43,057 drivers and passengers interviewed were wearing the restraining devices.
>
> Volunteers interviewed drivers and passengers at service stations and car washes on four successive Saturdays in 29 towns and cities.
>
> The survey was accompanied by a major publicity campaign involving the press, radio, TV, distribution of restaurant place-mats and the handing out of pamphlets to motorists by volunteers.
> Of those interviewed, two-thirds had safety belts available, of whom 27 per cent of the drivers and 28 per cent of the passengers had them buckled up.
> On the highways, 42 per cent of drivers and passengers with safety belts available were wearing them. But this figure dropped to only 19 per cent in urban areas.
> The low urban use of safety belts flies in the face of facts showing that most traffic fatalities take place within a 25 mile radius of the victims' homes and at speeds of less than 40 mph.

We have talked in this debate and in the committee of introducing uniquely Canadian standards and that we should not ape the standards of the United States. I could not agree more. The Canadian market is of such a size in terms of cars sold and dollars transacted that provision should be made for Canadian standards which would meet the conditions of our roads and our weather and the acceptance of our people. After all, we have highway and weather conditions in Canada that are not found in too many other places in the world.

We discussed in committee the necessity for a regular monthly check of mufflers as a result of the salt and sand that is used on our highways to melt the snow. For a starter I would suggest that one safety requirement for Canadian automobiles be that it would be impossible to start a car without first securing the seat-belt. I believe there has been some practical research into this idea, and while we may not like the taste of it, this sort of medicine is good for us.

The minister stated on January 29:

> Here, if I may be permitted, I should like to pay tribute to the provincial ministers concerned who have shown at least as much interest in this matter as the federal government. They have also co-operated with us in every way—as the debate revealed and the subsequent questioning in committee—in order to ensure the maximum amount of co-operation between the two levels of government, because the federal effort alone would not be sufficient to make a significant improvement.
> The federal-provincial discussions to which I have referred led to my meeting with the provincial ministers on September 4, 1969, when it was agreed that the federal government should assume responsibility for the safety standards for new motor vehicles manufactured in Canada and for motor vehicles imported into Canada. At this time it was also agreed that the provinces, under existing legislation, would undertake to ensure the safety of vehicles in use as well as the safety of replacement and additional parts for motor vehicles.

There apparently was unanimous agreement that at the federal level we could make the biggest impact on the problem by dealing with the new car manufacturer to ensure that as cars leave the factory they are in top condition. It was also agreed that we would work closely with the provinces to ensure, wherever necessary, that they would introduce the kind of legislation which would put their needs on all fours with ours in terms of replacement parts. I do not think this is acceptable. The provinces do not have existing regulations to complement this act and I see here no guarantee that they will enact legislation to protect the innocent purchaser of a car bearing the national safety mark but which has passed hands once or several times since earning this seal of approval.

It was said the other day during the debate—and I agree with it—that this act should be broadened to the extent that it would cover the resale of cars in our provinces. There is sufficient federal legislation covering the movement of fish, grain and meat, and it would be common sense to include the auto in like legislation. Fish, grain and meat are movable, as is the auto. The big difference seems to be that while the first three items are consumed, the last named consumes.

I think provinces have generally lagged behind in setting standards for performance achievement and the maintenance of cars on their roads. However, I do feel that our own province of Ontario has set some fairly high standards in respect of the resale of cars and safety checks on highways. It would appear that the city of Vancouver, and I believe the city of Victoria, have their own motor vehicle testing stations. These cities should be commended. Such stations should be located all over the country.

As outlined in this bill, there will be heavy penalties for misuse of the national safety mark on motor vehicles. There should be equally heavy penalties for misrepresentation of this safety mark by those dealers who will use it as a selling aid for cars that should long ago have been conveyed to the scrap yard. I hope the government will take steps in respect of an education and information program related to the use of the national safety mark and national safety standards. Perhaps this could be undertaken by a branch of Information Canada.

In this connection, in respect of the participation of provinces there was an article in the news the other day which indicated that our percentage of accidents per capita was higher than in a great many countries of the world, particularly the United States. The article went on to indicate that one of the reasons might be the tremendous educational program they have had in the United States to teach young people how to properly control the horses under the hood. I feel our provincial governments are taking this matter into consideration.

As I said in my opening remarks, the motor car and driving the motor car has become such an essential and important part of every person's life that it ranks with almost any phase of our educational program in high school, and it should be taught in high school. Proper driving methods and procedures should be taught along with academic subjects. In the city of Kitchener some years ago they adopted an extended program in their high schools. It is rather significant to note that a tremendous drop in car accidents in that community occurred as a result of this educational program.

The meaning of the national safety code should be spelled out very carefully to all road users. The limitations of the national standards should also be made very clear. At the same time, every effort must be made to intensify educational programs on proper road and automobile use. We must work to strengthen this bill by regular report on and examination of the regulations. One half of the individuals driving today have been or will be involved in injury-causing accidents this year in Canada, and we can expect some 5,000 deaths on our roads and nearly 200,000 injuries. These are the stakes. Let us hope that with the enactment of this legislation the stakes will favour the Canadian motorist.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, while I also do not wish to unduly delay the passage of this legislation, which in my view is very long overdue and really does not go far enough, I do wish to put something on the record in respect of the views of my party on this very important subject. There are some issues which cut across all party lines, and I think this is one.

Car safety and traffic safety in Canada involve the lives and well-being of all our people. It is surely a very important fact that for several years now 100 Canadians have been killed every seven days on our streets or highways as a result of traffic accidents. At the same time, some 3,000 others have been variously injured either in a minor fashion or so severely that many of them might as well have died. In addition to that, as a people we spend something in the order of $1 billion a year to protect ourselves from this traffic "unsafety" situation. This includes car insurance payments.

So far as the Canada motor vehicle safety standards bill goes, it at least is a start in the right direction. It's terms which will be incorporated through order in council, I believe, will follow exactly the provisions developed in the same area in the United States. These standards which we are taking from the United States were won over a period of years from the heel-dragging motor vehicle industry in the United States. They are not altogether adequate for Canada. Indeed, they are not altogether adequate in the United States. They do not have within them, for example, provision for such Canadian requirements as what I would consider to be a Canadian rear-window defroster and a common bumper height standard. There are other areas such as tire safety. I do not think these things are properly spelled out in the United States legislation which we are now picking up. We also feel there is a lack of proper car safety standards in respect of exhaust pollution.

Before the transportation committee we proposed several amendments along the lines I have indicated which we felt were necessary. We were told, and I agree, that the legislation, particularly at the committee level, is largely a vehicle by which to incorporate the beginning of safety regulations. The regulations themselves will be fitted into the vehicle. We hope we will get more and more adequate regulations as time goes on. I must compliment the minister because he accepted in general terms one or two amendments put forward at the committee stage which I think are useful.

I should like to say just a word or two in order to underline one or two other aspects which in my opinion are related very closely to the motor vehicle traffic situation. One of these is car insurance. We feel that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should work more closely with the Department of Transport in reviewing the present car insurance situation in Canada. On every dollar Canadians spend on car insurance they recover from car insurance premiums only about 65 cents or 70 cents. As I said, I think this is a matter in which the Department of Consumer Affairs and the Department of Transport could interest themselves.

Although the campaign for safer cars in recent years in North America has resulted in some reform in respect of some very dangerous ingredients, the auto makers seem to have designed their vehicles with a view to making an additional profit from the collision of these vehicles. Perhaps the car manufacturers took a cynical attitude in respect of the car safety enthusiasts when the car safety enthusiasts suggested there was a need for collapsible front ends for the protection of the riders. They have built collapsible front ends and rear ends. They have done this with a vengeance. They have added a bit of engineering apparently to ensure that whatever the front end hits will also suffer the maximum possible damage. If another car happens to be hit, the repair bills from the collision will certainly spurt upward, as hon. members and many other citizens of the country can testify.

Bumpers which once performed a protective function for the vehicle are now eye-catching decorations with built-in lights, grilles, knobs, vertical and horizontal knives of assorted kinds and sizes, and sharp snouts, all guaranteed in the event of collision to do three things: first, send the car to the repair shop for expensive replacements; second, ensure that whatever is hit will be carved into appropriate designs thus forcing the owner to undertake costly repairs and, third, improve economics for the manufacturer of spare parts.

Testimony taken during the U.S. Senate subcommittee hearings on anti-trust and monopoly showed that from 1965 to mid-1969 new car prices for popular Ford and Chevrolet models rose by 10 per cent and for Plymouth models by 11 per cent. During the same period the price of replacement parts for Ford cars rose by 34.6 per cent, for Chevrolet cars by 19.9 per cent and for Plymouth cars by 22.5 per cent. Very briefly, this means that if a car which sells for $3,500 were rebuilt from spare parts, it would cost $15,000 for parts and labour.

Various tests have been conducted to illustrate the point I have been trying to make about the vulnerability of modern cars. This is not the time to go very deeply into this question. However, one test was made at five miles an hour, which is slower than the speed at which a Member of Parliament walks. The car was driven into a barrier. It resulted in damage in the amount of $200. The cars then backed into the same barrier at the same slow speed, and the damage averaged $214 in each case.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude by urging the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to follow the example of the Secretary of Transport in the United States in respect of sending out information. This U.S. minister is extremely active in this regard. I receive from his office no less than three separate releases each week dealing with what is being done by his department in matters which are important to life and death. I am not one to be easily enthused about things, but in my opinion the United States, finally, is really stepping up its safety program.

I have received releases from the United States department concerning such things as tire standards, recall of faulty tires, inflammable materials used in the interior of cars, air pollution from exhaust systems, brake testing and recalls. They are particularly concerned about compliance with the requirements of car safety legislation. Public meetings are held by the department of transport at which consumers, dealers and others are encouraged to state their views on any matter of car safety.

Finally, as I say, there are three things involved in traffic safety—the car, the car driver and the road. This measure deals specifically with the vehicle. To the extent that this bill is on the road, we want to be sure it will continue in the right direction in respect of ensuring maximum traffic safety.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to participate in this debate, but since we are on the final stages of passage of the bill I thought I would put a few remarks on the record. I listened with some degree of interest to the last speaker, and I suggest to him that an old, gas washing machine motor and a tub with wheels on it would probably give him the kind of vehicle for which he is asking.

First of all, when we are dealing with this matter we must try to determine what the legislation will do to take care of existing problems in transportation in so far as automobiles are concerned, and discuss at some length some of the real hazards in the industry. The main hazards in automobiles are, first of all, horsepower and, second, speed. It seems to be a trend of the automobile manufacturers to go for bigger, faster and more powerful automobiles.

I suggest it is not at all difficult today to build a motor with an engine, a transmission and a differential that will perform as efficiently as the engines in today's automobiles, which will produce all the horsepower required under any circumstances and yet be limited to the road speeds that are permitted in Canada and the United States. I see very little sense in selling a Dodge Dart that will do 120 miles an hour to a 19 year old boy who is somewhat impressed with the appearance of the automobile but is certainly more impressed with its horsepower and the speed he can get out of the car. I say there is an inconsistency in our laws if we mark our highways, as is the case in Ontario, indicating 60-mile speed limit and then produce cars the main selling feature of which is the horsepower they can produce, when the speed which they can attain on our highways is in fact illegal.

A number of factors must be recognized when you analyse the general construction of an automobile, what it is composed of and what it is intended to do. When we speak about hazards and look at statistics, we find that a large number of the accidents that happen on our highways almost daily are caused by the failure of the operator to obey laws and signals or to recognize road conditions. But in many cases the accident is due to the failure of a component of the automobile. I suggest that this bill should impose on the manufacturers conditions that must be adhered to before the automobile can be put on the market.

One of the essentials of any automobile is a dual braking system. The braking system of automobiles should be manufactured to extremely rigid standards to assure the purchaser that, first of all, it will give the maximum braking effect and, second, that any wheel will operate independently of the others. Again, the national safety mark or the label that will be put on an automobile is really meaningless unless quality control is a rigid aspect of company policy. I think no government agency can guarantee the competence of an automobile within minutes of its leaving the dealer's showroom; therefore, quality control is essential.

The second important consideration which should be given by the government to the problems that we have on our highways is that money be spent on compulsory driving schools for any driver who was involved in an accident of any seriousness at all. Attendance at these schools must be compulsory.

Automatic dimming devices should be compulsory in all vehicles. I do not think it would be too difficult for manufacturers to consider a form of warning signal in the event of the failure of any component that could impede the safe operation of the vehicle. We should consider regulating a safety level for standard equipment such as automobiles tires. Not too long ago two-ply tires were standard equipment. Today there is a change in some areas, but two-ply tires are still available on the market. The standard should be the highest available grade of tire on the market, and the use of such tires should be compulsory. There is today on the market a first grade, second grade and third grade tire, and in most chain or department stores there are unbranded tires or what we refer to sometimes as factory rejects. These tires usually sell at less than one-third of the price of first grade tires. The use of such tires should be absolutely prohibited.

I have the privilege of coming from the city of Edmonton where in the last year compulsory car check legislation was brought in. Every automobile in the province of Alberta within certain areas had to be passed at a car check centre. First of all, tests were made on the surface of the automobile only. The finding of the tests was certainly not conclusive and could not prove whether or not the automobile was roadworthy. The argument that so many people used was that the job was not done by experts and therefore was not successful. I received a number of letters from people who complained bitterly because they had been requested on the first examination to make certain repairs to their automobiles. Indeed, my wife when she took her car in was requested to do repairs worth $65 to her car, but having done the repairs the car was not reinspected: she simply went back and told them the job had been done, following which they handed her a car test sticker for a $1 fee. This is why some of these programs fail. I commend the minister of transport in the province of Alberta for having had the foresight to discontinue this program.

Again I go back to the old argument that we must recognize the problem where it begins. It begins when the car leaves the factory. If the car has not gone through a rigid inspection procedure, if quality control has not been one of the conditions of the automobile company, there is no way in which we will get a truly safe automobile on the market.

Most American and Canadian cars are constructed to give the ultimate purchaser the maximum comfort, the maximum performance, the maximum eye appeal and, I hope, maximum protection against all the elements. I think the government would do well to provide, if necessary, assistance to manufacturers to further their studies into every aspect of motor vehicle safety and to enlarge their quality control departments.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see what is being done about auto safety through the provisions of this bill. I am sure it is long overdue and needs further additions. But I would like to remind the House of one fact, which is that no matter how careful you are, accidents will happen. Recently I had a problem driving a car with two master brake cylinders on it. One cylinder apparently was low in oil, and the seal on the other one was broken. One morning, backing out of the garage I went to put on the brakes and found I did not have any brakes. As a result, the car and I went into a snowbank and I had to get a wrecker to pull it out. If this had happened on the highway there could have been a disastrous accident. I do not know how such things can be avoided. It seems to me it may be necessary to have periodic check-ups for motor cars. But this car had gone 25,000 miles and had been serviced regularly. However, since the brakes appeared to be working, apparently they were not checked. This is something that happened to myself within the last two weeks.

Mr. Skoreyko: If the hon. member would permit me, Mr. Speaker, may I say such a problem could be corrected simply by having hydraulic and mechanical brakes on the vehicle. That is the simple solution so far as the manufacturers are concerned.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for bringing up this point because I used to drive a Hudson, now gone from the field, and it had hydraulic and mechanical brakes. But because this other car had two master cylinders, apparently the manufacturers thought one set of brakes was sufficient.

I now wish to deal with the question of the massive air pollution in our cities and on our highways caused by the motor car. Those of us who have driven in a large city at rush hour, taking an hour or an hour and a half to get out of the city, have seen the carbon monoxide pouring out of the motor vehicles, rising up into the air and polluting the atmosphere of the city. Many people think we are moving too slowly to control air pollution. This is one of the criticisms that I hear frequently. We know that the motor car is one of the prime causes of air pollution, particularly in urban areas—an estimated 60 per cent. One university professor has gone so far as to say that governments are hiding pollution data describing the extent and the hazards of pollution. All of us who have been in places frequented by buses and motor cars realize the amount of poisonous gases that they give off.

Just a few days ago one well known Toronto medical man stated that 50 per cent of the diseases of mankind today can be traced directly or indirectly to air pollution. That is a frightening statement. And it must be considered in the context that fatal accidents, mainly automobile accidents—over 50,000 per year—are the greatest cause of death for those in the one year to 35 year age group. This shows that preventive medicine has pretty well halted the fatal effects of communicable diseases. Accidents have taken their place and, as I say, today they are the major cause of death for the one year to 35 year age group.

Hon. members are well aware of the number of motor car accidents which take place across Canada, over 150,000 per year. Today one bed out of every ten in our hospitals is taken up with an accident case, the majority of them being motor car accident cases. Leaving aside consideration of the suffering involved and the fatal tragedies that may occur, these accident cases are using up hospital beds that are sorely needed for medical and surgical cases. In addition there is the consideration that the federal and provincial governments are now paying for medicare. That means you and I. This is a pressing economic reason for doing something about the problem. That is not all, Mr. Speaker: I would remind you that many people who are involved in motor car accidents cannot return to work again—some are crippled for the rest of their lives; some are able to do only partial work. The economic loss is tremendous and far overshadows any cost of solving the problem.

Today I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) a question about air pollution at Toronto International Airport, and I wish to thank him for the answer he gave. I was pleased to hear he is doing something about it and that within a few years jet planes will not be polluting the atmosphere. But I would point out to the minister that at Toronto International Airport, in my opinion you encounter far more pollution when you go downstairs to collect your baggage and move out on the ramp where the diesel buses and motor cars come to collect travellers. About two weeks ago I was out on that ramp. It was pretty bad that night because some charter planes had come in, apparently all nearly at the same time. There was such a crowd around that one could hardly move. Traffic was congested. One car had stopped completely and people were waiting for a wrecking truck to pull it away. You never saw such a jam in your life. People could hardly breathe standing on that semi closed-in ramp. The pollution caused there was far greater than that caused by the jet planes.

I could see people coughing and wiping their eyes. It reminded me of the occasion about ten years ago when I was in Los Angeles. One morning when I came out to go to the airport on my way home, my eyes started streaming. They were smarting and smarting. I wondered what was the cause. It was the air pollution: fog and mild rain held it at ground level.

This pollution problem must be tackled. Cardiovascular and respiratory diseases are the worst problems being faced by the medical profession today. They are presenting a real challenge to the medical profession. In many cases they are caused by air pollution, and the solution of this pollution must be tackled no matter what the cost. Too often we are prone to forget about the toll taken by car accidents when those accidents do not involve us personally. The cost of all this involves the pocketbook of everybody in Canada. We had better waken up and realize that the burden of looking after the consequences of air pollution and car accidents can become too great.

I expect the minister to look at the Toronto International Airport and others that present the same problems. I suggest to him that it should be possible to bring in some type of transportation other than diesel. Surely buses using diesel could easily be replaced, probably by buses which are battery-driven or use a low-pollution gasoline product.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise for a few moments to comment on the bill before us. The hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) who has just participated in the debate, and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) who has been working in the committee, have already said many things about the bill. I think the bill is going in the right direction but, typical of many things we do in Parliament, it does not go far enough or quickly enough. Once again, we seem to be hesitating.

As one hon. member said, now that we have the car on the road we must get it out of trouble. We must look ahead at many of the problems that will face us in the whole area of auto safety. The hon. member who spoke before me mentioned accidents and pollution. These matters must be of concern when discussing this bill. One thing I should like to impress upon the minister—and, hopefully, he will comment on it later—is that I think the Canadian government should make safety bumpers compulsory on all cars. I am told that Canadians spend $400 million or $500 million per year on so-called car cosmetics. Some of this is spent because cars do not have the proper bumpers.

A car moving at four or five miles an hour which becomes involved in a small collision may incur damages amounting to $400 or $500. About 70 per cent of accidents in Canada occur at speeds under 30 miles an hour. Safety bumpers would be of real value in saving money for the consumer and preventing injuries in many cases. Studies indicate that between one-half and three-quarters of the money now spent on repairing automobile cosmetic damages could be saved if cars had the proper type of bumper.

As an example of what I mean, in the United States last year tests were carried out on 1969 automobiles where cars were driven into direct barriers to see how much impact they could stand without sustaining damage. It was found that the average 1969 car could hit a direct barrier at only two miles an hour without damage. When this is compared with the old model A which had a capability of hitting a barrier at ten miles an hour before it was wrecked, it shows the value of having a bumper with strength in it.

The direct barrier tests revealed a number of shocking things that should concern us all. They showed that 1969 products such as those of General Motors or Ford, travelling at five miles an hour would sustain about $200 worth of damage when they hit a direct barrier. They also showed that cars travelling in reverse at the same speed sustained $215 in damages when they hit the barrier; at ten miles an hour the damage was about $600. This shows the severity of the problem, Mr. Speaker.

Questions may be asked about the feasibility of safety bumpers. I think that what I have said points out that they are desirable if only from the point of view of the money they would save. There have been many new developments, one of which is the water bumper which can stand an impact at ten miles an hour without the car sustaining any damage. This is a great improvement over our present bumper which would sustain about $600 damages in the same circumstances. The Manasco Company in the United States is experimenting with a silicone bumper of the same type that is used on the landing gear of airplanes, and apparently these have recently been used on railway cars as well. Tests show that these bumpers can hit a direct barrier at speeds up to 30 miles an hour without damage. These examples, Mr. Speaker, show that bumpers can be developed to protect automobiles, if we really want them. Cost is a factor which we should always look at and I am assured that a safety bumper can be installed on a car for $25, so this should be a compulsory feature of every automobile. The height of the bumper would have to be standardized so that they would meet in the event of a crash.

When we look at modern cars we see how much emphasis is put on design and physical beauty, if not even sex appeal. However, safety bumpers could be added without spoiling the design or beauty of the vehicle. I suspect that one of the reasons we do not have them is that auto manufacturers feel that if small accidents were eliminated, a source of revenue in repairs would be lost. It is economically feasible and technologically possible to design beautiful cars with safety features. I think a clause should be included in the bill to make it possible for all cars in Canada to have safety bumpers installed to give them greater protection in small accidents. We do not have to wait for the United States in this regard. I am sure Canada is still independent enough that we can do this without waiting for our American brothers across the 49th parallel.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my remarks on Bill C-137 will be very brief because the bill has already been discussed in committee for three or four days; in fact, it has been so thoroughly discussed that there are approximately 250 pages of evidence. Most of the points have been raised and have been answered by the minister and his officials. I think everyone agrees that the principle of the bill is good, that everything that can possibly be done to make a vehicle safer should be done. I appreciate the minister's desire to have the bill passed in time to have some of these provisions effective in the current year.

I do not want to delay passage of the bill. However, there are one or two questions I would like the minister to answer in his final remarks. No bill is perfect in its draft stage. There were a couple of serious flaws in the bill as originally drafted. After spending two or three days studying the bill, I felt I was barking up the wrong tree and there was something wrong with me, but eventually the minister and his officials recognized and corrected these defects. I am happy about this because there were serious flaws in the original draft of the bill.

The bill deals primarily with the importation of vehicles from the United States. The main criticism that we in the opposition had to the bill was that the penalties provided were not stiff enough. We discussed at length the fact that the standards were not laid down or specified in the bill. I can appreciate the reason for that. It might be better to pass the legislation first, then let the minister promulgate the safety standards. He supplied us with a list of 29 basic regulations.

I remind the minister of the commitment he made in committee. I asked him if, after the bill was passed, he would entertain representations from the committee or individual Members of Parliament as to new regulations that should be promulgated. The minister assured us that he would be very happy to listen to representations. He indicated that if he thought they were serious and worth while, he would implement them. I remind the minister of this commitment. I hope he will keep the commitment in mind when the time comes to redraft the bill and to make changes.

Some of the standards which we felt were not rigid enough have already been mentioned. One such standard concerns bumpers. Most people will agree the bumper on the present-day car is nothing but an ornament. It is a piece of chrome put on the car for appearance. It has no function with regard to safety. It is a piece of ornamentation. As the previous speaker mentioned, new types of bumper are being developed. I hope the minister and his department will consider the feasibility of these new types of bumper becoming standard equipment. There is also the matter of exhaust emission and pollution control. The minister indicated these would be taken into consideration.

I also suggest that the braking standards are not rigid enough. I was surprised to find that some of the higher powered cars, those with the most horsepower, have the lowest ratio of horsepower to braking area. This is ridiculous and should be checked into with the manufacturers. Cars are being manufactured with higher horsepower, yet they are still using the conventional old-style brakes. This area should be studied very thoroughly by the department when the regulations are being promulgated.

I wish to make one more suggestion. I am still not happy about the provisions of compensation for seized vehicles. One of the things that bothered us in committee was that the original bill could conceivably give inspectors the power to seize a private vehicle. This was corrected when the amendment was made to clause 13. As the bill now stands, vehicles can be seized from the premises of a dealer. The only compensation the dealer can receive is under clause 14 (2), which states that the provisions of section 64 (a) of the Fisheries Act will apply to the new act. It seems there could be quite a lapse of time here. If vehicles are seized from a dealer under the provisions of the Fisheries Act, I understand there could be a lapse of up to 90 days. A vehicle could be held that long. The vehicle could then be seized, and the only provision under section 64 (a) of the Fisheries Act is that the owner is entitled to his equity in that vehicle. However, if the vehicle is sold by public sale and only realizes half its value, as I understand the act the owner would be entitled to only the proceeds of the sale. Possibly the minister could explain that later.

It can be said that this is a matter between the manufacturer and the dealer, that if the manufacturer values the dealer's franchise he will compensate the dealer for the loss of those vehicles. I feel there should be something in the bill to make the sanctions a little stronger against the manufacturer. If a dealer has in his showroom 12 vehicles that are seized and tied up for a period of 60 to 90 days, vehicles which have probably been financed under wholesale replacement, what does the dealer do for replacements in order to stay in business?

I hope the minister will answer these questions when he closes the debate. I support the early passage of the bill, although I still maintain it does not go far enough. I think it will give the minister a vehicle to bring into force effective regulations for vehicle safety.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I would like to briefly repeat some of the proposals which were brought forward in committee. I appreciate that this debate may be a vehicle to bring to the attention of the public automobile safety standards. At the same time, I emphasize to the minister the urgency of spending money on research and development in this field. In my opinion too little is being done in Canada in the way of research and development in the field of pollution. We talk a good fight, but when it comes to doing the research that is meaningful, we fall by the wayside and have to depend on what has been done in other countries.

We had quite a discussion in committee on the warranties of automobiles being manufactured at the present time. It was suggested that the warranty should be included in a safety bill such as is now before us. It was suggested by the minister that warranties come within the jurisdiction of the individual manufacturer, and probably the legal institutions if the warranty is not honoured.

Each new car has an average of 25 to 40 defects which may or may not be covered by warranty. If it is necessary to hire a lawyer to bring about a correction of these defects, this is an added cost to the purchaser and is reflected directly in so far as consumer costs are concerned. I am sure the minister will study some of the matters which were studied by the committee. If he looks at the Minutes of Proceedings of our hearings he will appreciate that the warranty situation cannot be left to the whim of the manufacturer and the courts of this land.

There is another point which I feel needs clarification. I refer to page 1133 of the committee proceedings. I understand the minister has a thirtieth proposal in so far as the list of motor vehicle safety standards is concerned. It is with regard to the impairment of health to the individual. If the transcript is read, it will be seen that what is really involved is the impairment of health. When we read the transcript, we see just what the committee had in mind. I wonder whether this bill goes far enough, or as far as the committee thought it would go, in the direction of pollution control. On page 33 of the eleventh report of the committee we see a reply given to a question by a member. Protection against impairment of health was afforded, according to the witness, by providing for the control of motor vehicle exhausts. The witness said the definition of safety standards would also permit regulations to be made limiting noise emission from new motor vehicles with a view to protecting persons against impairment of health.

I hope the minister is not simply talking about the elimination or reduction of noise when he refers to pollution in this field. I am sure all of us were thinking of pollution in a much wider sense. When I look at the standards set in the Guide to Traffic Safety, I find they deal with pollution generally. I quote:

> With an ever-increasing vehicle population and resultant traffic density, the toxic gases emitted from engines assume more importance. Under certain circumstances some constituents of vehicle exhaust may react to form irritating smogs. Also, individual pollutants such as carbon monoxide may be of concern to drivers in dense traffic—

I emphasize, once again, that what concerns us is pollution—pollution of the kind with which everyone in the country from coast to coast is concerned at the present time. As we look further into the question of pollution by motor vehicles, we find it has reached a point which has made it necessary for a number of countries to lay down increasingly stringent legislation designed to reduce it or eliminate it altogether. In terms of the bill we are now considering, I suggest Canada has fallen behind by failing to provide sufficiently stringent regulations so far as pollution is concerned, and this at a time when all the developed countries, by and large, are introducing increasingly stringent measures to deal with it. In my opinion, the provisions contained in this measure as they affect restrictions which will exist in the future, are not sufficient.

An article from the Petroleum Press Service states that the main pollutants associated with gasoline engines are carbon monoxide, unburned hydrocarbons and nitrogen oxides. According to the writer, it is estimated that motor vehicles account for at least 60 per cent of the air pollution in the United States and as much as 85 per cent in some urban areas. The time has long passed when we could concern ourselves mainly with the pollution of our water resources and not be equally concerned about the pollution of land, air and sea as an entirety. It is high time Canada put stringent controls into effect which would oblige all manufacturers of gasoline engines to meet certain anti-pollution standards. This could be done in Canada; it is already being done in California.

The minister suggested to us that many of the ideas put forward in this area are difficult for the federal government to handle because of the jurisdictional problem as between the federal government and the provinces. I will refer directly to one such situation. The proposal was made that in the event of defects, having regard to the motor vehicle safety standards, there should be liability for payment of the costs of labour and parts necessary to correct such defects. The minister thought this was too broad an undertaking and that the federal responsibility did not go far enough to enable its adoption. I appreciate his reason for concern, but I hope he will look into this matter again, and tell us why the cost of labour and parts cannot be included when it becomes a matter of correcting defects in construction or design of a motor vehicle. It is not enough for anyone to say these costs are not involved in the application of motor vehicle safety standards. Defects which are apparent in a new vehicle certainly come within the scope of the proposals in this bill. I believe this provision could have been added, thus protecting the public to a considerable extent.

Other aspects of this bill have been well covered in previous speeches. Let me say a word about one important consideration which we feel should be dealt with in the bill. I refer to the standardization of bumpers. I hope the officials who will be drawing up the regulations will make a really determined attempt to get bumpers standardized as to height. It is no use waiting for another country to do this first and then expect Canadians to be proud of the work of their own government. I am sure that if we provide for the standardization of bumpers, pollution control and the use of window defoggers, the Canadian people will be appreciative of our efforts.

It is of great importance, in my opinion, that committees dealing with bills such as Bill C-137 should at least have every opportunity to ensure they are paying attention to matters with which their constitutions are really concerned. The only way in which committees can do this is to hear evidence from witnesses who are directly involved. With this consideration in mind, a motion was introduced in the committee asking that representatives of the Big Four auto manufacturers be invited to appear and explain what they had done with regard to the 29 auto safety features which Canada had imported from the United States, and what they planned to do about them in Canada. Unfortunately, a solid vote by government members on the committee resulted in the motion being turned down. I am greatly ashamed that our committee, though in session at the time, did not call for evidence from the auto manufacturers, the people directly concerned in this field.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

We are quite prepared, of course, to hear witnesses give evidence about safety devices which they themselves have developed, but I deplore the fact that the most important segment of the industry, those who will be called upon to put these regulations into effect, were not called before us. We know that representatives of the auto industry appeared before the United States Senate. We recognize that the 29 standards were, in fact, imported from the United States—and understandably so; I shall not argue that point at the moment. But in my opinion this committee of the Canadian Parliament failed drastically when it declined to summon representatives of the auto industry before it to explain what they had done in the field of research and development as far as the regulations likely to be made under the terms of this bill are concerned. I realize, of course, that the regulations are to be made by Order in Council and that they will not form part of the bill itself. I also realize that we as a committee wanted the advantage of having these people appear before us, not just the people from the minister's department who drafted these regulations and who wanted to appear for their own purposes.

● (5:00 p.m.)

I wish the bill well and I am sure the people of Canada feel it is a step in the right direction. The people of Canada are entitled to more than this. I hope that after research by our own people we will come up with something that will make Canadians proud that we have passed in this House legislation which means more to them than a piece of legislation which we might have imported some time ago. Surely, we are not still a developing nation. Surely, we can come up with some research and development in order to encompass automobile safety standards of the kind we all have in mind and which are not included in this bill. I believe they should have been included at the start. There are many other things that might be included in the bill and, hopefully, the minister will take this debate to heart and bring in regulations that will really and truly meet the needs of the Canadian people.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up a great deal of the time of the House to recapitulate, as it were, many of the things I said in connection with this legislation both on second reading and in the committee. I think, however, it is fitting that I express my thanks to members of the House, and most particularly to members of the Transport and Communications Committee, for their co-operation and for the thorough way in which they dealt with this bill. As was pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—or is it Moose Jaw-Skoberg?—we achieved in the committee advantages and benefits through the amendments I was very happy to accept. I think this was a good demonstration of how the committees system can work. I do not propose to go over all the points that have been raised this afternoon because, as I have said, it would take a great deal of time. I believe that the hon. members concerned have most of the answers, at least to the extent that I am able to give them.

With regard to the question of seizure raised by the hon. member for Moncton, he does know of the problems of limitation in that regard. Perhaps he might be satisfied if I indicated to him that I do recognize, as I do in respect of some of the other points he raised in the committee, that there is validity in what he said. This involves a matter, again, of the extent of our authority and competence. If experience shows we can do something to improve the situation, then we certainly will do so. I might say, too, that I think it is our intention to avoid to the maximum extent possible the likely seizure in the manner which he outlined and which would cause this problem.

In other words this act, when it becomes law, will be most effective if indeed we prevent cars which have discrepancies of one kind or another from reaching the point where they are in the hands of purchasers. It will only be in terms of a latent fault that this would result. I think we will be performing best if indeed the problem that the hon. member for Moncton outlined does not occur, because this will indicate that we have caught the deficiencies before they have reached that point.

Throughout this debate I think there have been one or two what I might describe as general inconsistencies. I do not say that in any critical sense. I think I ought to point this out for the record. One has to do with some of the matters raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw about warranties and the obligation on the part of manufacturers to pay for such repairs or replacements as may be necessary. I do not believe it can be argued that these are matters falling within the ambit of this bill which is related to auto safety. As I explained in committee, while I agree wholeheartedly that the user or purchaser of an automobile should not be penalized for something over which he has no control, I suggest to the hon. member and to the House that in fact this is a contractual relationship between the purchaser and the supplier which is only indirectly related to safety, and that therefore it does indeed come under provincial jurisdiction.

At least, this is the best advice we have been able to obtain, and it has been confirmed in a number of quarters. I mentioned that matter in particular because it leads me to the second point on which there has been major inconsistency in this debate. It has to do with those matters which are of federal jurisdiction entirely and those which fall within the responsibility of the provinces.

This legislation will not be as effective as I and all hon. members would want it to be unless we have the full co-operation of the provinces. I emphasize again that our jurisdiction and our authority extends only to new vehicles, only to the manufactured item as it comes from the plant. The instant it is sold, it becomes an object which for all practical purposes is under provincial jurisdiction.

Quite a few members, while pointing out very valid problems in terms of auto safety, I think failed to make a distinction and failed to recognize, to the extent that is necessary, the limitations upon federal power. Above all, the necessity for co-operation with the provinces is a recognition of this from the outset. This bill, when it becomes law, will not really do its job unless there is companion legislation in the provinces which is on all fours with the federal legislation. So there have been to date two separate federal-provincial conferences involving the ministers responsible in each of the ten provinces and myself. This has been an excellent example of federal-provincial co-operation.

There has been widespread agreement and recognition of the need for supplemental legislation by the provinces for such a thing, for example, as was touched on this afternoon—that is, tire safety and tire standards. It will not do very much good if the federal government says that tires on brand new vehicles have to be of such-and-such a standard, and the replacement tires purchased in provinces are not of the same standard. In this case the provinces will, I am sure, apply the same standards on replacement tires as we set up for new tires. I hope we can extend that principle to a wide range of replacement parts so the provinces will be able to help us, and we them, in what is after all a common problem to all of us.

There has been some mention today of pollution. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), who I know has a particular interest in the matter, was the primary person to mention it. When this bill was originally drafted, it was strictly an auto safety bill in the sense of protecting life and limb. We made a more exhaustive study of our regulatory powers and came to the conclusion that we could, in fact, regulate and define auto safety as having to do also with the preservation of health. It was for this reason I expanded the bill to include exhaust systems. As the House will know, I have indicated on earlier occasions that we propose to be as stringent as we possibly can in this regard. There is a good deal that can be done now, even, in terms of the devices that are to be employed.

As the House will know, in some states of the United States, and in fact in some provinces in Canada, regulations are either now in place or are proposed which will enhance greatly improved exhaust systems. This, I may say, is only a partial answer because some of the devices, while removing some of the noxious substances, actually create others which are at least as harmful and perhaps even more so because they are both invisible to and undetectable by the average person.

In our research and development section we must attempt, to the maximum extent that we can, to devise new forms of combustion fuels and, perhaps, better combustion engines. I have had considerable discussion wih my counterparts in the United States on this question, and I am pleased to say that our level of co-operation is very high. As the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) mentioned earlier, the United States government and the United States people are very much seized of this and they are moving ahead certainly as fast as we are, if not faster.

So we have at the moment what amounts to a tacit understanding, which I hope will eventually evolve into a formal agreement, that we will exchange information and work together, because whatever the merits may be of continentalism in other respects having to do with energy policies and the like, there is no question that the Canadian interest is obviously served best by continentalism in terms of auto and highway safety and related matters.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

It might be interesting to this House if I were to say on a remotely related subject —that of air pollution from aircraft, to which the hon. member for Simcoe North referred today—that of course it is rather pointless for the Canadian government to move in this field unless there is companion action in the United States, because aircraft move back and forth across the border constantly. It is my considered view that in so far as the continent is concerned, we will make very significant improvements in this field in a relatively short time.

What will prove to be more difficult—and I am already attempting to do something in this area—will be to arrive at agreement internationally in respect of flights coming in from overseas across the Atlantic and the Pacific where there is not the same rapport, closeness or liaison as there is with the United States. Happily, it would seem that there is now this new awareness of the real danger of pollution. I hope we can extend this liaison to the international community as well.

These are just some of the matters which have been raised. I would differentiate between the problems in respect of automobiles which are wholly related to safety and those which are only indirectly related or not related to it at all. I do not say this in any critical sense, but I might point out that there was some at least superficial difference of opinion between the hon. member for Surrey and the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw in effect said, "Let us go out on our own and create an all-Canadian car." I do not wish to overstate the case but I believe he was suggesting that we do the thing on our own. The implication is that in some way or another the great majority of United States cars are inferior. On the other hand, the hon. member for Surrey has been castigating us in his mild fashion for not going ahead as fast as the Americans. I suggest there is some inconsistency here; there are two points of view. However, I know that both gentlemen are on all fours in respect of their desire to get the best bill possible.

The question of bumpers is of continual annoyance, I expect, to all hon. members who think it is not they but rather their wives who become involved in small scrapes.

An hon. Member: You will receive a lot of letters on that.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes. The fact of the matter is—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You will need a new set of bumpers yourself, now.

Mr. Jamieson: I don't need them. In any event, this is a matter which is not only a question of safety. There is also a cosmetic question involved. It seems that most of the low-damage items to which the hon. member referred are not those which cause bodily harm. They are usually more of a cosmetic nature. In that field the Department of Transport has a difficult time seeking to determine whether or not the emphasis should be on the safety features. The safety of life and limb concept might come under that department, while perhaps some of these other matters might more directly come under the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or perhaps the two departments could co-operate on them. I have no problem in agreeing with the hon. member that something should be done about this problem.

From a research point of view we are learning about everything done by United States agencies. In fact, we are undertaking some studies on this ourselves. One can find many different types of argument on this question, even including the one which has a measure of validity—that in fact the collapsible or give-away bumper is an assist in highway safety. The fact that there is a breaking away means that the car is not so rigid that the parties inside will be hurt. This is only one of a score of new concepts. There are such things as the water bumper or the air bag for the interior of cars, which is designed to inflate inside upon impact so that the parties in a sense are surrounded by a cushion of air.

The hon. member who spoke at the beginning of the debate today referred to seat-belts and various harness arrangements. There is some disagreement on the efficacy of these in their present form. I do not think anyone would argue that they are not good when properly placed and when they are of the proper strength. Here again, our standards will enable us to test them constantly and to also ensure that as new developments come along in this field they can be implemented quickly.

I have one final comment. This is something I have tried to emphasize throughout. It is one which, perhaps a little ironically in my judgment, throughout the debate and in the committee has not really obtained the amount of consideration it deserves. I refer to the fact that an accident happens only because something goes wrong. In the opinion of all the authorities on the subject, including those within my highway safety branch, the No. 1 task is not to ensure that we have the safest of all vehicles, because no matter whether the driver has happened to have a drink or something, when an automobile accident occurs the No. 1 challenge in respect of highway safety today is to find out the cause of the accident, what causes it to happen.

This is where the real research is required. It is not simply a matter of the drunk or inebriated driver. There is the fact that 70 per cent of the accidents occur when a vehicle is travelling at a speed under 30 miles an hour, and the fact of the number of accidents which occur on straight pieces of highway at mid-day when there is only one person in the car. One must also consider the frame of mind of the driver who goes off the road under such circumstances.

While auto safety is unquestionably of enormous importance, the fact is that no matter how safe the car, we will continue to have a good deal of carnage on our highways unless we find an answer to the problem of the driver and the causes of accidents. Perhaps it is necessary to consider both the driver and the nature of our highways and ask ourselves whether the highways are being properly constructed. As the hon. member for Simcoe North mentioned, we have some of the finest highways in the world. Everybody says now we are out of the woods because, we have incredibly good roads, but this fact simply seems to amplify the number of accidents which occur. So the question is whether our highways are faultily designed in some way or another. These are some of the interesting challenges which we face.

Again I want to thank members for understanding the need for relative haste in getting the measure through the House. I hope it will start having its effect very soon. I hope we will hear from the automobile companies. I agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw that their co-operation in this task is vital and that they have a responsibility to make known to the Canadian public what they are doing and what their intentions are with regard to compliance.

I do feel, however, that the appropriate time to ask the question is when the regulations are promulgated. Then I am sure they will not only be anxious but will be compelled to appear to indicate exactly what they feel about these regulations. Again may I extend my thanks to the House for what would appear to be its approval of what in many respects is a most historic piece of legislation.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, would the minister answer a question? He commented about safety bumpers and said that research is presently going on in a government department. Could the minister inform us whether we can expect regulations soon in respect of safety bumpers? Is he planning to bring in new regulation in this field?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to be specific, but I cannot answer by saying just how far this concept has advanced. I can simply say that if we come up with something we think is worth while, we will not be hesitant in bringing it forward at the earliest possible time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ACT

GUARANTEE OF REPAYMENT OF MONEYS BORROWED BY COMPANIES AND PERSONS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-138, to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion) moved that Bill C-138, to amend the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Regional Development, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith (for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. MacInnis: I have no intention of holding up the passage of this bill, Mr. Speaker, but we were hopeful we would have a statement from the minister at this stage.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister I would be very pleased to inform the House again of the purpose of this amendment to the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act. I would like to begin by thanking the Standing Committee on Regional Development for the great dispatch with which it processed this bill through the committee and accepted it with some degree of unanimity and then reported it back to the House.

This bill is rather limited in its scope, although it is important. It does not change the structure of Devco, nor does it change its basic functions or basic purpose. It is intended to add to the financial powers of that corporation and to put it on a footing equivalent to that of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion with regard to special areas.

One financial capability was lacking in Devco's battery of financial tools. This was Devco's lack of power to guarantee loans which an industry might seek from the private sector in order to establish itself in Cape Breton Island where Devco operates. The corporation had already been granted the power to make loans, to give incentive grants and to take equity positions in industrial concerns which seek to locate in Cape Breton Island, in order to stimulate industrial development there and to diversify the economy of the island. But it did not have the power to guarantee loans which any corporation might secure from the private sector. That is an important financial instrument. Some industries are quite capable of making their own way without obtaining significant loans, grants or equity positions, but access to private capital markets would be facilitated for them if they had a guarantee of the repayment of the principal and interest from such a Crown corporation.

So the sole purpose of the bill is to give that power to the corporation, to give guarantees on the loans advanced by others to industries which wish to settle on the island. There is a limit to the guarantee that Devco might give. That limit is $100 million which covers both principal and interest. As I think hon. members know, Devco is authorized to make loans and grants and take equity positions up to the limit of $20 million. That $20 million ceiling is not affected by the proposed amendment. What this proposed legislation adds is a guarantee capability of $100 million. As I said, this puts Devco in the same position to exercise financial powers as the department itself in special areas, but it is the view of the department that it would be better if that power resided with Devco rather than be spread between Devco and the department. This would put the island in exactly the same position as other special areas so far as financial powers are concerned.

This is a straightforward amendment and an important one. It is designed to enhance the opportunities for the industrialization of Cape Breton Island. I will close my remarks by again thanking the committee for the expeditious way in which it brought this legislation back to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, in line with the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis), I have no intention of holding up the passage of this bill. We feel that it may have some very beneficial effects on the economic future of Cape Breton Island. As the Parliamentary Secretary stated, the committee exercised great dispatch in reporting back to the House, I believe to the surprise of some members of the committee as well as the minister.

I say in conclusion that perhaps in the future the Parliamentary Secretary will introduce legislation of this type, in which case it will pass through the House much more quickly because of his capable manner and Irish eloquence, which puts him in a much better position than the minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Watch out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BROADCASTING OF DEBATES BY RADIO AND TELEVISION

The House resumed from Monday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale):

That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, in consultation with Mr. Speaker, be directed to study the question of radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its Committees, including the legal, procedural and technical aspects thereof, and the question of arrangements made for reporters for the electronic media in the Parliament buildings.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising once again to conclude my speech in this debate I shall be as brief as possible in enunciating a number of reasons for my opposition to the introduction of television into the House of Commons. First of all, it has been said on more than one occasion that the same argument was advanced when Hansard was first proposed for a daily, written record of the debates in the House. It is now being said that the same arguments advanced against Hansard are now being advanced against the introduction of television into the House.

It seems to me that the two cases are not alike. Much goes on in the House that is not recorded in Hansard. Many conversations are carried on and a great deal of highly skilled lobbying goes on that is not recorded in Hansard. Many jokes and jests uttered in the House are not recorded in Hansard. Sometimes it must be difficult for the interpreters and the Hansard reporters, but it is a known fact that much goes on in the House that is not printed in Hansard.

If the proceedings in this House were televised, all this would be heard. A member rising to speak would either be speaking to an attentive audience or he would be speaking to empty chairs. This would not give a good impression to his constituents who might not know that the absent members—many of whom are to your right, Mr. Speaker—were at committee meetings or in a minister's office attempting to ferret out the reason for government interference in their constituencies.

Another reason against the introduction of television is that a member who may be making a good and logical speech might not know how to put it across. His delivery might be poor and he might be reading every word of his speech. This would appear on television, but it does not appear in Hansard.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Years and years ago the rules of this House laid down that a member should not read his speech. That rule is still in effect. Why was it incorporated in our Standing Orders? It is because a Member of Parliament is sent here to represent the true feelings of his constituents. He is supposed to know their thoughts, to be concerned with their problems. He is supposed to be able to speak from memory about these things and to tell how the application of a certain piece of legislation will affect his constituents, whether beneficially or otherwise.

A Member of Parliament is not supposed to pick up a speech written by somebody else, or even by himself, and read it. If television is introduced, each member will prepare his speech in advance. He will even have a tendency to act out the words of his speech. As I said previously when I had an opportunity to speak on this subject, a member will even pronounce words in a certain way to express the feeling that may exist in his riding about a piece of legislation, not because he feels that way about it but because he thinks his constituents believe he should feel that way.

If there is one thing I detest today, it is the widespread feeling about the phonyness of politicians. Too many people across Canada say, "He is just a politician. Does he really mean what he says, or is he acting out a part"? I know some hon. members could not be actors even if they tried, but others would sure love to try—and television in the House would encourage them. It would be detrimental to the logic of the arguments they present in this House on behalf of their constituents. For that reason alone, Hansard and television are two different things.

I have mentioned that television would show the number of empty seats in the chamber. If this afternoon's proceedings were televised, showing all the empty seats to your right, Mr. Speaker, people in western Canada would naturally assume that since there is no western minister in the House the government is not concerned with their problems. They would make a snap decision on the basis of television. I should also point out that once introduced in this chamber, the televising of our proceedings would likely continue forever. In my opinion, Members of Parliament should make their arguments coolly, logically, and in a rational manner, in accordance with their beliefs in the kind of Canada that they want.

Some mention has been made that television could be extended to the proceedings of our committees. Although it may surprise some hon. members who have listened to me on this subject, I believe that would make more sense. If I have time this afternoon, I may deal with the question of television in our committees.

What would television in the House of Commons really mean?

It would mean televising its proceedings in their entirety from two o'clock in the afternoon until ten o'clock in the evening, and this would require practically a whole new network across Canada. What about the enormous cost of that? Has anybody thought about that? I know the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has had a great deal of experience in the television field. Can you envisage the enormous cost of establishing a whole new network to hear politicians expound on the glories of their constituencies and on how they think legislation will affect their constituencies?

At the close of the last session of Parliament, last July, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, "We have to get these bums out of here. They are using the House of Commons as a soap-box to spread their ideas all across Canada." Mr. Speaker, if we had television in the House of Commons the bums might want to hang around a lot longer, at least some of those who profess to be good actors on television, and the Prime Minister would have much more difficulty getting legislation passed.

But let us examine the matter a little further. Who is going to watch the televised proceedings? Who has time? In my opinion, only those who have retired, who are over 65 years of age, and instead of watching a movie on a particular they may want to watch the House of Commons for an hour or two. But anybody engaged in earning a living does not have time to sit down and watch the House of Commons on television. On occasion someone who is ill at home, or a man who is babysitting while his wife is at the dentist, may turn on the television set for a half hour or so. Such casual viewers do not understand the working of Parliament. They do not know why those seats opposite are empty, why somebody down in the corner is talking to a friend instead of listening to me, and why somebody else is walking out of the House. As a result, they will make incorrect interpretations of the situation.

The cost of a completely new television network would be practically prohibitive for any sane government. There is some question of whether the present government is sane or not, but let us give its members the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you very much!

Mr. Horner: Let us say they are sane. If so, they will see the prohibitive cost involved. But there are those who advance, as an alternative, the televising of our proceedings for a two-hour period, covering motions, orders of the day and part or all of the question period. What would happen in the case of motions, Mr. Speaker? In recent years we have had five political parties represented in this House. Now there are four. On motions a minister gets up and makes a statement. I am one who has complained that ministers do not make enough statements on motions, that they make too many outside the House on television. But if television is introduced here, will that prompt them to make more statements on motions? For example, let us say a minister has a statement to make on the reorganization of his department and he makes it in the House of Commons. He will take up a certain amount of time. We had that experience today with a statement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). His statement was commented upon by one member from each of the other parties.

As I say, we have only four parties now. In years to come we may have five again, or even six, as somebody suggests. In that case five statements, all in critical vein, will be made in reply to a minister's statement. In these circumstances a minister would be reluctant to make a statement on motions in the House, whether on the reorganization of his department or the establishment of departmental offices across Canada, as was the case today. Because he would have to face five critics he would be tempted to go down the hall to the television room and have his statement telecast from there, where there is no one to criticize him unless the television interviewer wishes to call in one or two critics.

Let us not be fooled by the argument that a televised two-hour period would enhance this House. Let us project this thing a little further. Let us suppose we have disposed of motions and have moved into the question period. Normally the question period is 40 minutes. Today it was mainly taken up with questions posed by members of the opposition, but from my study of the rules I do not see that the question period is reserved exclusively for opposition members. From time to time government backbenchers have expressed dissatisfaction at the decisions made by the government and have sought a more active role as Members of Parliament. What is to stop them demanding of the Chair equal time in the 40-minute question period?

It is a simple case of arithmetic. There are 264 members in the House excluding the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker. The government is in power, so it will more than likely have the majority of seats or it would not be in power. Even taking out the cabinet ministers, they will more than likely still have just as many members in their backbenches; and if you include the Parliamentary Secretaries you will probably have more than the whole combined opposition.

It is logical to assume that in a close and hard debate over the question of the allotment of the 40 minutes televising of the question period, government backbenchers would demand 20 of the 40 minutes, which would leave the official opposition with 20 minutes. The parties to my left would not be particularly happy with that. They are noted for being quiet, but from time to time they may want to raise a few questions. They could argue that their party should be allowed five minutes. So lest we think the question period would be enhanced, the official opposition would be allotted ten minutes, the NDP would be allotted five, the Ralliement Créditiste would be allotted five and the backbenchers of the government would be allotted 20.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): How about the answers?

Mr. Horner: The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté) asks, "How about the answers?" That is what I was coming to. Let us suppose the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked a particularly embarrassing question of a particularly capable or verbose minister such as the Minister of Transport. He is very capable with words, but how capable with action we have yet to judge. But suppose he was asked the question—does anybody in this House think he could not talk for ten minutes? We would be surprised if he could not, because we know he is great with words and that there are a number of cabinet ministers who are perhaps just as good. We would have lost the ten minutes allotted to the official opposition for that day. From time to time we have heard backbenchers complain that the Speaker does not recognize them as often as he does the front row. They can rest assured that if television comes in during the question period, they will not even be bobbing up for a question. The same principle applies to the two parties to my left.

Let us look at the 20 minutes that will be absorbed by the backbenchers of the government. Say, for example, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) wants to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) which concerns his riding. He does not want to fall out with the minister because he may want to ask a petty favour in the future, so he sends notice of the question to the minister. The department tells him how to word the question so that the minister can answer it politely and look good. It is all a great show. Over a period of ten years of steady watching, I suppose the Canadian public would catch on that the whole dang thing is just a sham, that it is just a great show, and would realize that it was a planted question. It would be obvious that the whole 20 minutes was purely for show.

The whole purpose of the question period is to solicit information on the intentions of the government in running this country, not necessarily to give notice but to try to pierce the armour to see if there is any weakness in their administration or their intention in the application of a particular piece of legislation. In my opinion, with television in the House of Commons the question period would eventually be destroyed.

Let us go a step further and study the role of the House of Commons. Many people complain that it is a dead place, that nothing happens here and that everything takes place in committees. Yesterday was a good example. There were eight committees sitting, so the House was rather empty. I was in the agricultural committee in the morning and then in the transportation committee until ten o'clock at night. We had a pretty good attendance there. We had the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) right on the firing line and things were pretty hot at times. With eight committees sitting at the same time, television would not bring members back into the House if they had a duty in the committee. Just because the transportation committee was not televised and the House was, I would not like to think that I had deserted the cause of my constituency and left the committee because I had no chance of getting on television there. Surely a Member of Parliament is not sent here just to sit; he is sent here to work, to use his energy. As long as there are eight committees sitting during the day, whether or not this House is being televised surely duty will come before show in the eyes of many representatives on both sides of the House.

What will be the role of television commentators? Let us suppose that the two hour period, or the whole of the proceedings of the House of Commons is televised. Few people have a chance to watch it regularly—perhaps just those who happen to be ill or are retired. I suppose we still watch television to some extent at home in the evenings, watching the eleven o'clock news and the weekly commentaries and educational shows, etc. Who is going to do those weekly commentaries?

We have just had a debate in this House which hinged on pollution to some extent. Let us suppose that for some reason or another the debate came up in a hurry and the member handling it was not able to bring all his facts with him and consequently was not able to do the job of which he was capable. He does not have 17 research assistants, as have some of the big T.V. commentators. These people can prepare themselves very well for a 15, 20 or 30-minute show on the weekend. They can roll back reels of film of the time when the question was debated in the House and say, "Didn't that Member of Parliament, when he was speaking on pollution, know that 77 per cent of the air pollution in major cities is caused by the automobile?" I just throw that figure out as an example. If television is brought into the House of Commons, the T.V. commentators will assume the role of the opposition to the government more so than they do today.

It is no wonder that the great Pierre Burton and Charles Templeton—the first two that come to my mind—say they are all for it, and that in this technological age it is ridiculous that television should not be in the House of Commons. They think it should, Mr. Speaker, but it should enhance them so that rather than pick holes in my arguments, they can pick holes in me and my ability to push ideas across. It is not that they have ever done it, or that I have any particular grudge against those two commentators. However, it would only enhance them, and not the members who participate earnestly and to the best of their ability in the debate.

Now let us take a quick look at the role of a representative. A Member of Parliament is sent here to concern himself with the problems of the country and his constituency. Those problems take him all the way from the acreage payments announced a week ago by the minister to the Indian Affairs problem, to the oil problem, to the depths of foreign affairs and to the depths of our military role in the western alliance.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Some of the problems are big; some of them are little. It may seem surprising that it is the little things that concern the people back home. They may be personal problems about which a member has to see a minister, deputy minister or someone in the department. The member must say to that person, "Why wasn't so-and-so given a passport? Why is it being held up? Why wasn't such-and-such a corporation given a grant by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion? A member must be capable of making arrangements to see ministers and deputy ministers. He must be determined enough to pursue the little problems through the bureaucratic empire in Ottawa.

A Member of Parliament should not have to be a television actor capable of presenting arguments before the television cameras every day. I wish to deal with a Member of Parliament who may be very congenial and good at getting in to see ministers or their assistants about the little problems of his constituents, but cannot make a good speech off the cuff. Maybe he cannot talk about any given subject. If television comes into the House of Commons, every constituent in Canada will be watching to see if his member speaks.

If they do not see their member on television making a speech in the House of Commons, they will say, "So-and-so is up all the time, but I haven't seen our member. Where is he? Why isn't he here? Whether he likes it or not, the member will be judged by the number of times he participates in a debate that is being televised. What he says will not be important; what will be important is how he participates in the debate. They will be looking to see whether his hair is combed, what is the colour of his suit, the colour of his eyes, or how well his tie matches his shirt. That is not the reason a member is chosen to represent his constituency. He is not elected solely on his ability to expound at great length on any given subject without having been given notice. He is chosen because of his concern for the people in his riding, his desire to work for them and try to better their position in life. Television in the House of Commons would not enhance this aspect of Parliament at all. We have a very serious matter here with which Members of Parliament must concern themselves.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the motion under consideration, which reads as follows:

> That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, in consultation with Mr. Speaker, be directed to study the question of radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its Committees, including the legal, procedural, and technical aspects thereof, and the question of arrangements made for reporters for the electronic media in the Parliament Buildings.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very important piece of legislation because it will be possible, through the media, to reach the people and to acquaint them with what is going on in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, one can but commend the idea of informing the public, but I wonder if the best way of reaching the public was considered in the proposed measure.

I listened attentively to the comments from the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), and I subscribe to several of his observations. For instance, he expressed concern about the course that could be given to the question period, as government back-benchers could prepare in advance their questions for the ministers so as to enable them to indicate the government policy. And if the Liberal back-benchers had the least bit of imagination, they could do exactly the same thing now. There is nothing to prevent a government member to put whatever questions he wants. In any event, they have done so on several occasions.

This can therefore not be argued against televising the debates of the House. It should be realized that the viewers do not have the advantage or privilege that we enjoy, since we are paid to be here, of following every day the debates of the House in front of their T.V. set.

Several people have to work outside. Even the housewife does not have much time to spend in front of her set. Several persons will therefore not be able to follow what goes on in the House of Commons, for once the broadcasting is over, in the course of it, it is not possible to give an instant replay as is done during hockey or baseball games for instance.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock for I would have other remarks to make later on?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

NEWS RELEASE

The Honourable John Munro and The Honourable James Richardson announced today that the federal government has agreed to pay to the city of Winnipeg an additional grant of $589,516.00 to cover the city's share of the deficit of the 1967 Pan-American games.

Mr. Richardson stated that a letter was being delivered today to Mayor Stephen Juba informing him of the government's decision.

With the approval of this additional grant, the federal government has paid a total of $2,839,516.00 or 46 per cent of the total cost of holding the Pan-American games in Winnipeg. This includes the $750,000 federal grant, or 50 per cent share of the cost of the Olympic Pan-American swimming pool which is now in active and continuous use in the city.

In the final accounting, the federal government has paid 46 per cent of the total cost of the games, the Government of Manitoba 42 per cent and the City of Winnipeg 12 per cent.

March 9th, 1970

His Worship Mayor Stephen Juba,
City of Winnipeg,
Manitoba, Canada.

Dear Mr. Mayor:

I am very pleased to inform you that the federal cabinet has agreed to cover your administration's deficit with respect to the 1967 Pan-American games by making a grant to the city of $589,516.00.

I know you will share my great personal satisfaction that this very pressing problem for Winnipeg has been resolved. As you know, Canadians from coast to coast took justifiable pride in the outstanding success of the Pan-American games and the federal government's decision to make an additional financial contribution is a reflection of the widespread appreciation for the contribution made by Winnipeg to Canada's centennial year.

For Winnipeg, the Pan-Am games represented a prodigious community achievement in which thousands of Winnipegers contributed time and effort. The financial support received from all Manitobans and from all Canadians was, of course, vital, but the work, the enthusiasm, the drive and the imagination were of the authentic Winnipeg variety. I am delighted that our city's great contribution to centennial year is receiving this further recognition from the government of Canada.

Sincerely,
James Richardson.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 12, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

12 March 1970

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Gérald Fauteux, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, March 12, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be, Sir, Your obedient servant,

Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT OF PRESIDENT OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRANCE

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will be pleased to learn that, in reply to my invitation on behalf of the House, the President of the National Assembly of France, Mr. Achille Peretti, will visit Canada from March 20 to 23 next. Mr. Peretti will be accompanied by an eminent member of the National Assembly, Questor Lucien Neuwirth.

In the person of President Peretti, members of the House of Commons of Canada will be welcoming a friend. Indeed, our distinguished visitor has often expressed his attachment for this institution and for Canada. A founding member of the Franco-Canadian Interparliamentary Association, he has attended all annual meetings of the Association, which constitutes for us an important link with the National Assembly of France.

Unfortunately, President Peretti's stay will be very short. However, he will have the opportunity of meeting His Excellency the Governor General, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other leaders of Parliament. It will be my pleasure to introduce Mr. Peretti at the opening of the House next Monday, March 23. I have no doubt that the House of Commons will show warmth and cordiality in welcoming President Peretti to the capital city and the Parliament of Canada.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

Third report of Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, in French and in English.—Mr. Isabelle.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity on motions to make my weekly statement on the business of the House because I would like to follow it with a number of procedural suggestions. As hon. members know, the business called for today includes government order No. 47, Bill C-162, with regard to the Standards Council of Canada, and government order No. 78, Bill C-193, with regard to the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act.

As hon. members know, there will be Royal Assent at 5.45 p.m. this afternoon and the business will be interrupted at 8 p.m. for the budget presentation of my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Tomorrow the business will be called in the following order: the first item would be government order No. 71, report stage of Bill S-9 to amend the Parole Act, to be followed by such of government orders Nos. 47 and 78 as shall not have been disposed of in today's sitting. As the fourth item of business there will be that perennial favourite, the motion in my name for television in the House.

Business of the House

On Monday next and including through until next Thursday the time will be devoted to four days of budget debate. On Friday, March 20, and on Monday, March 23, the House business will be devoted to legislation to be announced.

On Tuesday, March 24, and subject to the approval of the special order that I hope to propose in just a moment, we would have the final allotted day for supply in this part of the session, and on Wednesday we would be calling other government legislation, with Royal Assent and a motion to adjourn the House for the Easter Recess.

PROCEDURAL ORDER AFFECTING PRESENTATION OF BUDGET

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a number of procedural suggestions to the House. First, so that we can proceed to the budget debate at eight o'clock this evening and complete the budget proceedings in a normal manner, I would suggest that the House pass an order that at 5 p.m. today the debate on the government item then under discussion should be adjourned so that at 8 p.m. government order No. 2 can be called for the budget presentation, and also that Standing Order 40, dealing with the late show, be suspended for today's sitting. Accordingly I move:

That at 5:00 p.m. today the debate on the item under government orders be adjourned so that, at 8.00 p.m., government order No. 2 may be called for the purpose of the budget presentation; and

That the provisions of Standing Order 40 be suspended for today's sitting.

If there is unanimous consent perhaps that could be made an order of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEDURAL ORDER RESPECTING SUPPLY

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should also say that there have been some discussions among the representatives of the various parties with respect to the supply business for this part of the session, and I think it will be found that there is general agreement that one of the allotted supply days should not be taken in this period but that it should be added on to the number of supply days for the third semester of this session and be taken at that time. The understanding is that it is to be a

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Friday in that period under the auspices of the New Democratic Party. On that basis an order has been prepared as follows:

That, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 58, the supply period ending not later than March 26, 1970 shall consist of six sitting days: provided that, in relation to this order, one sitting day shall be added to the next supply period and that, for the purpose of section (10) of Standing Order 58, the sixth allotted day shall be deemed to be the final allotted day in the current period and that at 9.45 p.m. in the sitting of Tuesday, March 24, 1970, unless the business of supply be previously concluded, any proceeding then before the House shall be interrupted and every question necessary to dispose of any supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1970, all stages of the bill based thereon, the adoption of the motion for interim supply for the period April 1 to June 30, 1970, and the passage of the bill based thereon, shall be forthwith and successively put and disposed of without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Speaker, if there is unanimous consent perhaps that order could be put to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Malpeque.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, we in this party are agreeable to this general arrangement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this plethora of words sets out what we have agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY DUNLOP CANADA LIMITED—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion. I do so as a result of the lay-off at Dunlop Tire Friday involving 600 workers without prior notice. In view of the financial and social hardships that this means I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That the question of finding a way to keep open the Toronto plant of Dunlop Canada Limited, pending a thorough study of the operations of the company, be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, with instruction to report back to this House within ten days.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the proposed motion. As hon. members know, under the terms of Standing Order 43 the motion can be put only if there is unanimous agreement. Is it unanimously agreed that the motion be put at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: It appears there is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIAMEY—COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he tell the House whether there has been an agreement between the federal government and the province of Quebec about the composition of the Canadian delegation to be sent to Niamey?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Two days ago on March 10 we received a letter from the Prime Minister of Quebec making certain comments on the composition and functions of the Canadian delegation and the part that the government of Quebec would play in the Canadian delegation. After we had been able to consider the letter from Mr. Bertrand at the cabinet meeting today, the Prime Minister sent a reply to Mr. Bertrand.

An hon. Member: What was the reply?

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the House what counter proposals were made by the federal government to the province of Quebec in reply to the suggestions of the Quebec premier?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if there is agreement, as I hope there is, between our two governments we would, of course, make that agreement public. If there is not agreement I suppose we would make that public too, but we are hoping for agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put another supplementary question.

In my opinion, the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not understand my question. I would like to know what counter-proposals the federal government has made to the Quebec government in reply to the suggestions of the Quebec premier? It seems to me that my question is clear enough.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am confused about the words "counter-proposals". That is why I could not answer the hon. gentleman's question. The Canadian government's position has been and it must be that we have been invited to go to the meeting in Niamey. The Canadian government has been invited. Certain provinces have been invited by us and by President Diori, as part of the Canadian delegation. That is the fundamental position, and within that context we have been trying to agree as to the respective functions of the federal and provincial representatives. That has been the issue and I hope it has been clarified. We have done everything possible to recognize both the principle that Canada speaks with one voice and the special position of Quebec and the other provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question concerning the Niamey conference.

Can he inform the House on the substance of the letter he has sent to the Quebec premier on the matter referred to by the hon. member for Charlevoix in his question?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not intend to do so before the Quebec premier has had time to look into the document; as stated a moment ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if there is agreement, the letter will be made known. On the other hand, in case there is no agreement and the governments involved agree to make the correspondence public, the federal government will have no objection. Then, hon. members can look into the reply.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

When did he forward his letter? Was it today, yesterday, or the day before yesterday?

He may not have heard the special news bulletin at noon announcing that the province of Quebec would not be represented at the Niamey conference.

Mr. Trudeau: A special bulletin, certainly not. The letter was forwarded on the 10th, and I perused it yesterday. The cabinet met this morning to decide upon the answer.

Could it be that the hon. member is making a subtle distinction that escapes me, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The "subtle" distinction is that the Prime Minister does not hear the news properly, or does not listen to them, because the Quebec premier stated this morning, following his announcement with regard to the provincial election, that the Quebec government would not send any representatives to the Niamey Conference.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether there is one hoax or two, one truth or two. For my part, I was presiding at a cabinet meeting at 1.55 p.m. and I do not listen to the radio at the same time.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the House what role has been attributed to the province of Quebec at the Niamey conference?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already explained the general policy. As he said, it has been agreed that there would be a Canadian delegation. However, as the Niamey conference will deal with many matters, both federal and provincial, the delegation is to represent Canada as a whole but as certain of the matters to be discussed might, according to our own internal policy, come within provincial jurisdiction, the Canadian delegation will include representatives of the different provinces involved. That is the basis on which Canada was invited to Niamey, and the basis on which we invited the different provinces, including Quebec, to appoint representatives to the delegation. Moreover, that is how we proceed in the case of other delegations to international meetings.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask another supplementary question.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Could the Prime Minister tell the House if the province of Quebec has been charged with a special function since it represents 80 per cent of the French Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: I should like to suggest to the hon. member that this is the question he asked earlier. I should like also to say to him that it would perhaps be appropriate to give other hon. members the chance to ask questions, but we might later on during the question period come back to this problem.

[English]

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to—

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Charlevoix is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I have great respect for your guidance, Mr. Speaker, but we often try to ask questions, without success. When matters such as wheat or oil are being discussed, the Chair sometimes allows members to put 10 to 12 questions. However, when a member wants to ask an important question which concerns Quebec or French-Canadians, the Chair should allow him to ask more than one question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TORONTO—CLOSING OF DUNLOP PLANT—SUGGESTED TAKEOVER BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion regarding the closing of the Dunlop Tire Company plant of Toronto without any notice being given to the 600 employees who are now going to be out of work? I ask the minister if his department is prepared, either alone or in conjunction with the province of Ontario, to take over and operate this plant, as was done with the Dosco steel plant in Sydney, at least until such time as the feasibility of the operation can be established and a course of action mapped out?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I can announce any decision concerning that plant at the moment. This is something we are looking into. This may be a sound proposal, but I am not sure that it is a proposal that will be adopted by the government.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. Has the minister or his department made any approaches to the government of Ontario with respect to some joint action which might be taken between the two governments in order to keep this plant in operation and to provide employment for the men who are otherwise going to be thrown out of work without any prior notice?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not know of any specific communication on that problem. I will make inquiries. Perhaps tomorrow I can answer the question.

TORONTO—CLOSING OF DUNLOP PLANT—SUGGESTED MEETING OF FEDERAL, PROVINCIAL AND COMPANY REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would he display the leadership I know he possesses—at times—and immediately convene a meeting of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Minister of Labour and himself, as well as representatives from the Ontario government, the union involved, and from the Dunlop Company whose action has so seriously affected the workers, to ascertain if the proposed lay-offs, which are being carried out in a crude and terrible manner, can be averted, and report back to the House later?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As a first step in displaying the leadership which is displayed by the government at all times—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —I am having a meeting this evening with the group of workers involved. This will be the first step. If a further meeting with my colleagues arises out of the consultation with the workers, I will be happy to arrange it.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I know about that meeting, Mr. Speaker. I hope to be there also. Rather than delay the matter, will the minister not at this point co-ordinate all these forces and ascertain whether something can be done to prevent these lay-offs?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the proposed meetings this afternoon and this evening with the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and, I hope, other cabinet officials, will the minister make a statement within the next few days with regard to the results of those meetings and any proposed plans that the government may make?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, at the moment I can tell the hon. member that the Department of Manpower and Immigration has been active in this situation for quite some time. We attempted at the beginning to negotiate with the employers a manpower assessment incentive agreement that might, even at a late stage, do some advance planning to assist workers. In the absence of reaching agreement on that point, we have at present about 14 special counsellors in the area attempting to assist the workers in every possible way.

LA GUADELOUPE, QUE.—LAY-OFF OF 300 EMPLOYEES FOLLOWING CLOSURE OF PLANT

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Labour but, in his absence, I shall direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary.

In view of the fact that the Boa-Ski corporation, set up at La Guadeloupe, in the riding of Frontenac, and sold to American interests a year ago, has closed its plant without notice and that 300 workers are deprived of their livelihood, could the minister—since this is a labour problem—get in touch with officials of the company concerned in order to ensure that these workers are treated in a more humane manner?

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): The Minister of Labour is in his office right now engaged on government business. I will bring this matter to his attention immediately after the question period.

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the minister's representative promise that he will go to Miami to negotiate with officials of what has now become an American company?

[English]

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

ARCTIC ARCHIPELAGO—CONTESTATION BY UNITED STATES OR OTHER NATIONS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to address to the Prime Minister a question related to the communiqué which was issued following the thirteenth interparliamentary meeting in Washington. It was stated that the United States delegates did not expect their government to accede to arrangements which would involve United States recognition of Canadian claims to all the waters of the Arctic archipelago. My question is: have Canadian claims to sovereignty over the lands and waters of the Canadian Arctic been challenged by the United States or by any other nation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacLean: I will ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question and then he can take the opportunity to answer both questions at once. Will the Prime Minister be making an unequivocal and forthright statement asserting Canadian sovereignty over the Arctic before the sailing of the Manhattan through the Arctic waters in the near future?

Mr. Trudeau: As I have stated before, Mr. Speaker, when we introduce the bill concerning Arctic sovereignty, which we announced in the Speech from the Throne, the position of the government will be stated.

Mr. MacLean: A further supplementary question either to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the United States government given any indication to date that it will question Canada's right to exercise pollution control over marine traffic in the Canadian Arctic?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No question of that kind has arisen so far. We have been taking effective measures in connection with the voyage of the Manhattan, and, of course, no protests have been made with regard to them. I do not think any protest could arise until we had taken action to enforce pollution control measures in the Arctic by a Canadian law. As the Prime Minister has said, the legislation will be before the House, and that is the time at which the matter can be tested.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the United States government has communicated to the Canadian government at any time its contention that the Northwest Passage is open sea rather than Canadian territorial waters?

Mr. Sharp: I would have to search the files to determine exactly what the United States government has said to us in this regard. It is certainly clear they would probably not accept without question the claims that we would make.

GRAIN

WHEAT—PROSECUTIONS FOR OFFENCES AGAINST WHEAT BOARD REGULATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt. Having regard to the multitude of prosecutions which are taking place or have been launched in the province of Saskatchewan under the Wheat Board Act, and the fact that most of the alleged offences were of a technical nature, as in the Humboldt area of which the hon. gentleman has some knowledge, has consideration been given by the Wheat Board to withdrawing these charges because of the uncertainty of the potential prosecution, which now hangs over so many western farmers, especially in view of the difficult economic situation in which our province finds itself at this time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): The question of particular charges laid under the Wheat Board regulations has certainly been receiving considerable attention and publicity. Consideration has been given to the whole question of their nature and background. However, I really have no more to say to the House at this time about the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having heard that equivocal answer from the minister, may I ask whether it means that the threat of persecution—prosecution—

An hon. Member: Right the first time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —on technical grounds, which is now hanging over western farmers, will not be proceeded with? And will the minister also tell us how the siutation in Humboldt in his own constituency is developing?

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio whether there have been any withdrawals of prosecutions within the last few days?

Mr. Lang: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—CLARIFICATION OF EXPLANATORY PAMPHLET

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I, too, wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the pamphlet put out to describe the operation of the wheat acreage reduction program does not give any examples which would apply to a farm that has been under continuous cropping, will the minister prepare such an example and release it for the information of farmers and of the House?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): We shall, of course, be dealing with many more examples in due course in addition to the kind of case referred to by the hon. member. We shall be discussing these in public and giving appropriate publicity to them.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Can the Minister without Portfolio assure western farmers that in the application of the acreage reduction program special consideration will be given to those who were hailed out last year or who were unable to harvest their crops because of unseasonable weather?

Mr. Lang: The program itself is not designed to compensate farmers for damage which their crops may have suffered as a result of hail or similar occurrences. However, the position of farmers who did not have a surplus because of such disasters was certainly taken into account in the designing of the program.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—MEETINGS WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF FARMERS' ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In reply to a question last week in the House, he said that there had been some talks between the representatives of the Canadian Dairy Commission, those of the department and those of farm organizations. Could he tell the House whether there have been negotiations with the representatives of the Quebec Manufacturing Milk Producers' Union, together with those of the UCC executive?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but not in the last few days.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. The hon. member for Ontario will have to wait for just a few moments. There is a supplementary question to be dealt with. I will return to him shortly.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I know that the minister has just said "not in the last few hours", but my question relates to March 5, 1970, because at that time the minister answered that talks were going on with representatives of the dairy industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has now had his supplementary question.

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I had a meeting yesterday with the representative committee of the Dairy Farmers of Canada. Prior to that I have had several discussions with some of the producers of Quebec, including representatives from the UCC, though I am not sure of the exact dates.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now reward the patience of the hon. member for Ontario.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAID-OFF GENERAL MOTORS EMPLOYEES—TYPE OF BENEFITS AVAILABLE

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question that I should like to direct to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Was he reflecting government policy when on March 6 he indicated that laid-off employees of General Motors in Oshawa will be eligible for TAB benefits?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this question gives me an occasion to confess that I made a little mistake the other day; I referred to the TAB program when I had in mind SUB, and I apologize for that slip.

The policy is simply that either SUB or TAB can be used. In the case of TAB, a relationship must be established between the lay-off situation and the Canada-U.S.A. automobile agreement. In the three latest instances such relationship was not established.

Mr. Cafik: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate whether these laid-off employees have any recourse by way of appeal from the decision that has been made in this respect by the adjustment assessment board?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not think that that question is in order. The hon. member is inviting the minister to express an opinion on an interpretation of the law and regulations, and in this form the question is not in order.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SPECIAL AREAS—OMISSION OF PARRY SOUND-MUSKOKA—FURTHER DESIGNATIONS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. My question concerns the announcement yesterday of special areas eligible for assistance by his department, and the unfortunate and ill-considered omission of the Parry Sound-Muskoka region while including adjacent areas in a similar situation. Does the minister intend to make further special designations from time to time which might hopefully include this region?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have designated a certain number of areas now. Probably in the future we will have to designate some more, depending on circumstances, but I cannot indicate any limit or give any time period within which this will be done.

Mr. Aiken: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that supplementaries will not all be directed to situations in particular regions of the country. For the moment we might allow a supplementary question from the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Aiken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the minister whether he can briefly explain the criteria on which people can get in on these special designations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this very general information ought to be given by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In light of the announced program of the government to create a higher level of unemployment, would the minister consider declaring the whole country a special area for incentives?

DESIGNATION OF SPECIAL AREAS WHERE ARMED FORCES BASES CLOSED

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I intended to ask this question yesterday but the question period was too short. My question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the minister's statement yesterday, would he now make it possible to make all areas where Canadian Armed Forces bases are being closed eligible for assistance under the program? I ask this question in view of the fact that the Canadian Armed Forces base at Clinton is now in the course of being phased out.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I cannot make this general statement.

OMISSION OF CORNWALL FROM SPECIAL AREAS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that on television last evening mention was made of the fact that naturally Your Honour could not express any interest in the reasons why Cornwall was omitted, would the minister say why Cornwall, with 20 per cent unemployment, was left out of the special areas program?

Some hon. Members: Answer!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Speaker is not holding you back.

ARDA GRANT TO INDIAN ASSOCIATION OF ALBERTA

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the severe difficulties which are likely to result from the drastic cutback in the grant to the Indian Association of Alberta under ARDA, and in view of the fact that economic development among Indians is likely to suffer most from such a cut, will the department consider reviewing its decision to cut the grant?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that the grant had been cut.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is his department presently considering further programs of assistance to people of Indian and Métis origin?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary. In light of the fact that the minister is unaware of the cutback in the grant, would he take it upon himself to talk with the president of the Indian Association of Alberta who is presently in Ottawa?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I met with the president yesterday and I think he is now convinced that the grant has not been cut back. Certainly the grant was not increased, as he probably wanted.

SPECIAL AREAS—MEADOW LAKE—SUGGESTED INCLUSION OF BIG RIVER REGION

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The people of Meadow Lake are certainly very happy with the announcement made yesterday, but could the assistance be extended to take in the Big River area, where a year ago an unforeseen and unfortunate occurrence resulted in the loss of the sawmill, leaving the area in great need of expansion. I think this is very urgent—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member can be considered to have made a representation to the minister.

COMBINES

ACTIVITIES OF RUBBERMAID COMPANY

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who received about five months ago a request to investigate the activities of the Rubbermaid Company which was allegedly violating the Combines Investigation Act.

In view of the time that has elapsed, could the minister inform the House what concrete steps he has decided to take immediately in keeping with his authority?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have explained on a number of occasions, proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act are kept confidential until a charge or report is made.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lisgar.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Unless the hon. member wishes to ask a complementary question, I invite the hon. member for Lisgar to put his question.

[English]

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—CONSULTATION WITH CHAIRMAN OF GRAINS COUNCIL

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon. In light of the statement made by the chairman of the Canada Grains Council to an agricultural seminar at the University of Alberta that the government acreage reduction plan may not benefit individual farmers, can the minister inform the House whether Mr. Runciman was consulted with regard to the development of the plan?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Yes, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Runciman was among the leaders of farm and other organizations consulted during the formulation of the plan.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister has apparently chosen to ignore the advice of the chairman of the Grains Council, a body that was set up to advise the government on these matters, is it the intention of the government to disband this group as an advisory body?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not the intention of the government to do that. Neither is it a fact that the advice of this body has been ignored.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ACTION RESPECTING NON-RETURNABLE BOTTLES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of recent legislative action in British Columbia against non-returnable bottles, and in view of the announcement of the Minister of Highways of Alberta that the highways ministers of all ten provinces will discuss this matter unless the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs places a ban on non-returnable bottles, what plans has the minister to protect the consumers of Canada against this pollution menace?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the Order Paper, or if the minister prefers he might make a statement on motions.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—MEETINGS WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF FARMERS' ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question.

In view of the statement he made a moment ago, could he tell the House if, between February 17 and March 5, he had talks with the representatives of the Quebec manufacturing milk producers' union as well as with those of the UCC?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of the dates, but during the course of the last three months I have had several meetings with representatives of the groups named.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LEGISLATION REQUIRING SIX MONTHS NOTICE OF PLANT OR MINE CLOSURES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to the disaster that has struck the workers of Dunlop of Canada at Toronto, and it is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Can he advise when legislation may be brought forward along the line suggested by members of the opposition, and concurred in by the minister, which would compel corporations to provide notice of closure of a plant, mine or, indeed, any operation, at least six months before the cessation of operations resulting in throwing workers on the street?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there are too many weaknesses in this proposal and I do not think the government will adopt it.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, would the minister advise why he soundly endorsed this policy when we had a similar problem at the Hawker-Siddeley Steel plant at Sydney, which threw 3,000 people out of work, and this government sat back and did nothing?

GRAIN

WHEAT—ALLOTMENT TO WHEAT OF 50 PER CENT OF ACREAGE SEEDED TO FORAGE IN 1969

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board. Has the hon. gentleman received representations from the Manitoba pool elevators recommending that farmers who seeded forage crops in 1969 be allowed to claim 50 per cent of that acreage for wheat in 1970 and, if not, will he give positive consideration to this recommendation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I have been out of the office for a day or two and neither this representation nor any such representation has come to my attention. I will certainly look into the matter as to whether or not it may have been received.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY OF GRASS SEED AT REASONABLE PRICE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board. In light of the serious shortage and high prices of grass seeds resulting from the government's recently announced wheat acreage reduction plan, can the minister indicate what action, if any, is being taken to make these grass seeds available at a reasonable price?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, before announcing the plan we had information about the allocation of grass seeds and the likely available supply. It was reassuring to us to know that the large quantities were in the hands, for instance, of farmer-owned organizations. We were sure we could count on them to be responsible in regard to the price of these seeds.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

TAKEOVER OF FAIREY AVIATION PLANT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker. Can he indicate what progress is being made by the Bell Corporation, Fairey of Canada, E.M.I. Electronics and the group interested in the takeover of the Fairey plant?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations are still going on and I am still very hopeful that they will reach a settlement.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TORONTO—CLOSING OF DUNLOP PLANT—LEGISLATION RESPECTING SIMILAR OCCURRENCES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question that has in part been discussed, and I direct it to the Prime Minister. In light of the Dunlop plant closing without notice, putting 600 men on the scrap heap of unemployment, is the government considering any form of legislation to deal with the likelihood of similar occurrences in federally controlled industries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would seem difficult for the federal government to consider legislation in an area which is essentially provincial.

Mr. Brewin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think the Prime Minister misunderstood my question. I asked whether in light of this occurrence, within provincial jurisdiction it is true, the government was considering dealing with the possibility of similar occurrences in federal industries by federal legislation? I was not proposing that we should go into the provincial field.

Mr. Trudeau: I would gladly consider that proposal, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: You don't have to; it is already on the books.

POLLUTION

VANCOUVER HARBOUR—KILLING OF FISH BY CYANIDE

Mr. Ray Perrault (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of reports that another major fish kill induced by pollution has occurred in Vancouver harbour, is the minister able to inform the House whether the nature and source of this pollution have been determined and what action, if any, is contemplated?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the pollutant in question is definitely cyanide which came, in all probability, from a plating plant in the area. We hope this afternoon to definitely pinpoint the plant. Of course when we do a prosecution will follow.

[Translation]

HOUSING

MONTREAL—LITTLE BURGUNDY URBAN RENEWAL PROJECT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the minister in charge of housing.

In view of the difficulties the city of Montreal is presently experiencing about the Little Burgundy project and since there has been a 50 per cent reduction of the subsidy for that project, could the minister tell us whether he intends to review his decision and if he agrees with his colleagues that an order in council is not a commitment?

Mr. Speaker: The second part of the question is obviously not acceptable.

[English]

I believe the hon. member for Fraser Valley West has a supplementary question.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries in relation to the questions asked by the hon. member—

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much to interrupt the hon. member, and he will be recognized in a moment, but the hon. member for Joliette has a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, you will not allow the second part of my question. I agree with you on that point, but the minister is apparently willing to answer the first part.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, no basic revision of the amount of money being considered is now under review. Negotiations have been going on in respect of this whole matter of urban renewal with regard to the government of Quebec, including the one in Montreal. I have stated before that there was an Order in Council in 1966 authorizing the entry into negotiations with the city of Montreal vis-à-vis la Petite Bourgogne, but this was superseded to a considerable degree by the formation of the Quebec Housing Corporation and the entering into matters occurring subsequent to the Order in Council.

[Later:]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. I think he made a mistake earlier when he referred to the Order in Council of 1966. I think he meant 1967. I would like to ask the minister whether this Order in Council has been rescinded or if the minister does not intend to live up to the Order in Council to pay half of the cost of La Petite Bourgogne?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the master agreement with Quebec of 1968-69 meant that we offered $27 million to the province of Quebec for urban renewal programs in that province, the priorities of which were to be decided by the government of the province of Quebec. It certainly would be totally up to them to make decisions to apply some of that fund to the Montreal situation. I believe a very small amount was for a neighbourhood operation in Little Burgundy. Subsequently we offered an additional sum last December, drawing their attention specifically to the Montreal project and the project in Quebec City. This amount is negotiable. If they want to pay it all to the city of Montreal we are certainly open to that type of suggestion.

POLLUTION

VANCOUVER HARBOUR—KILLING OF FISH BY CYANIDE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question supplementary to the question directed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour to the Minister of Fisheries. When the cause of this particular pollution is ascertained will the name of the polluter be made public?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, certainly when a charge is laid, and I expect one will be laid, the name of the polluter will be made public.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AVAILABILITY OF NON-CYCLAMATE DIET FOODS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the deep anxiety felt by many diabetics on special diets about the approaching deadline in respect of the purchase of diet foods, will the minister state whether manufacturers will be ready to market substitute foods to take their place?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the food industry has indicated to myself and the Food and Drug Directorate that it will be possible to produce dietetic beverages and spreads without the use of cyclamates. Formulation research is in progress on dietetic fruits and it is anticipated that satisfactory fruit products without cyclamates will also be available. Some of these spreads are already on the market, and I presume—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—PROVISION OF APPEAL BOARD

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan. I should like to ask when he hopes to set up an appeal board which will deal with matters such as indicated by the question of the hon. member for Crowfoot, in addition to the problem facing those people who broke land, and also in respect of the special conditions that may exist on Indian reserves where some of the land is under contract? When can we expect that appeal board to be set up?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the regulations concerning the acreage reduction program are being developed at the present time. I cannot put an exact time on when they may be finalized.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I know that you have a difficult task in recognizing members and I do not mind getting up 25 or 30 times, but I am just wondering if I could be given an idea as to when I can ask a question. I have a file six inches thick. I cannot understand it, Mr. Speaker, because you accept questions from this side of me and from that side of me and come back the next day to this side and that side. Should I come here any more or should I stay in my office?

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member is well taken. If hon. members are in agreement, perhaps the hon. member should be allowed to ask his question at the present time. I hope, however, that this does not set a precedent.

Mr. Marshall: Really I should not do it, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but he has gone now. I will try tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might ask the question and it would be on the record.

An hon. Member: Here comes the Minister. He just put out his cigarette.

Mr. Bell: He really should not smoke.

Mr. Marshall: I thank the minister for coming back. Perhaps we should get together and have a drink or something.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

NEW PHYSICAL FITNESS PROGRAM—GRANTS TO ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Could the Minister of National Health and Welfare advise the House if, under the new program for physical fitness which he is due to announce later this month, provision will be made for grants to the Royal Canadian Legion? I am referring to the grants that were withdrawn from the national track and field program which has been of such enormous value to the development of youth in the country.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): At the time the Royal Canadian Legion received their last grant they were advised that we would not be in a position to renew it.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STANDARDS COUNCIL OF CANADA

ESTABLISHMENT, OBJECTS AND POWERS, ORGANIZATION, ETC.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-163, to provide for the establishment of a Standards Council of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, before we begin consideration of this question, I should like to raise a point of order for your consideration. The point does not require an immediate decision but, perhaps, a decision should be made on it in advance of any amendment that might be proposed. Briefly, the point of order centres on the basic principle adopted by the House that the same question can only be considered and resolved once during a session of the House.

The specifics of the point of order are that Bill C-163 purports to be a money bill under Standing Order 62. The message and recommendation of the Governor General were printed on the notice paper of 28 November, 1969, and in Votes and Proceedings of 1 December, 1969. The text of the recommendation is printed on the page of the bill facing page 1. The purpose of the bill is given in the title as, an act to provide for the establishment of a Standards Council of Canada. The recommendation and clause 17 of the bill provide that the money for this purpose shall be paid out of money appropriated by Parliament.

Standards Council of Canada

The main estimates for 1970-71 were tabled on February 11, 1970. When they were brought in, the message from the Governor General was presented to and read by you, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 62(3). This message is the money resolution that will cover all the votes in the Main Appropriation Act. These votes are founded on the items in the estimates. The estimates for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce authorize a budgetary expenditure of $190,000 as a "grant to assist in establishing a national standards association". This appears at 10-10 of the department's estimates and is included, I believe, in vote 5 under "grants and contributions".

As far back as April 2, 1604, there has been a parliamentary rule:

> That a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the House.

This rule, although not in our Standing Orders, has always been followed in this House. It is cited in Bourinot and Beauchesne, and has been upheld in decisions of our speakers in recent times. It is a common sense rule that is intended to prevent repetition in debate and stability of decision during a session.

• (3:10 p.m.)

It seems to me that this House is going to be asked to vote successively in this session on two identical questions: once on the so-called money vote in this bill and once again on a part of the budgetary vote for the department in the main appropriation bill. If we proceed on the assumption that this is a money bill and vote on the question that this bill have third reading and pass, then so much of the budgetary vote in the department's estimates as relate to the purpose of this bill will have to be deleted when the main appropriation bill is brought in.

I believe that the late Watson Sellar wrote in the audit guide a direction to the audit officers that they could not pay out money under a bill such as this.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): It seems to me, even from the hon. member's own remarks, that there is every indication that these are two different questions. The first concerns the setting up and empowering of a Standards Council of Canada, provision for which is made under this bill, and the second is the appropriation of money from time to time to provide for it.

[Mr. Downey.]

I suppose that the logic in the thinking of the hon. gentleman would lead him to conclude that since virtually every federal public law that provides for a money spending body is covered by the annual appropriations, one could never introduce in the same session both an appropriation bill and any amendments to the basic statute. Clearly, this does not follow. The words of clause 17 referred to by the hon. member bring out clearly that the creation of the body is something quite different from the appropriation of money. This is a standard clause which has been adopted by the House many times and used repeatedly in statutes, providing that the appropriations may be made from time to time and to give flexibility to the institution so it can increase or decrease its funds from year to year.

The simple answer to the hon. gentleman's question is that the creation of this body, with possible demands against the Consolidated Revenue Fund, is one question, and the actual annual appropriation of funds from time to time is another question. In effect, the two questions, are not the same at all. There are different aspects of the administration of this problem, and I suggest therefore that there is no conflict between the two.

I suppose it could also be said that neither of the two questions has really been decided as a second point. The House cannot assume at what time this bill will be passed nor can one make assumptions with regard to the appropriation for the national standards. So that, in effect, neither of the questions has been decided at this time.

The fundamental point is that the matter of the creation of the body is separate and independent from the appropriation of funds for it from time to time, and this is my reply to the hon. member's point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Basically the hon. member is right in his contention that the same question cannot be put twice to the House during the same session. This has been decided, as the hon. member has pointed out, and we should be careful at all times not to put the House in a position where a decision has been reached and the same question is put a second time. That is only logical, and I am sure hon. members would want the Chair to ensure at all times that this principle is preserved.

However, I think that the argument brought forth by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) has considerable merit, particularly the second point which he raised. I think that the hon. member, if he has a point of order, is anticipating the situation.

He is assuming, first, that the bill will pass, and second that there will be an estimate to cover the situation later on. I think that if he has a point, he would have to wait, first, for the bill to be passed and then for the matter to come up, again before the House. At this time he may suggest that we are being asked to consider for the second time a question on which a decision has already been reached. So, my suggestion to the hon. member is that he is anticipating the situation. I am not ruling that his point of order would be acceptable if it were raised later on, but I respectfully submit to him that it cannot properly be submitted at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, if I am allowed to say a few words on your comments, I undertake not to spend the $190,000 if the bill is not carried. I think that this would be agreeable to everyone.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill now introduced in the House is to establish a corporation to be known as the Standards Council of Canada. It will be responsible for promoting and co-ordinating the role of existing organizations involved in voluntary standardization in Canada. It would also be responsible for Canadian participation in international voluntary standards organizations.

Before we have a look at the bill, let us ask ourselves a few basic questions about standards. Not long ago I acquired some knowledge on the subject and I should like to share that knowledge with my honourable colleagues.

What are standards? Mr. Speaker, standards permeate all aspects of life. A standard is a basis of comparison. It can be anything used to measure, to measure in its broadest sense: length, height, time, colour, utility, performance of products, beauty, virtue, tolerance—and so on.

Let us have some examples:

Building codes or zoning regulations, established by municipal governments, are standards. Regulations defining membership in a club are standards. School examinations are standards of academic excellence.

In the present bill however, we are naturally concerned only with the industrial standards of products and their manufacturing process.

In industry and commerce, standards may define how something is to be produced or how something should perform. For example, a standard might define a kind of steel by stating its composition and heat treatment or again its strength and hardness.

A standard can also define size and shape, for example, the size and shape of a cassette for a tape recorder is standardized to permit interchangeability, that is to permit their use in recorders of different makes. Plywood and wallboard are produced in standard sizes to facilitate design.

Standards also can define the brightness of a light bulb, the power of an engine or the durability of paint. Mr. Speaker, I am cutting this short, but this gives an idea of the nature of industrial standards. Every day, each member of the House undoubtedly comes into contact with industrial standards, whether he drives a car that meets certain performance requirements, uses a home appliance subject to safety conditions, eats meat of a certain quality level or buys Canada Standard Size garments for his children.

Mr. Speaker, there are two types of standards. First of all, there are voluntary standards. In most free enterprise economies the identification, formulation and usage of many standards is based on voluntary participation arising from a recognition of a common interest on the part of producers and consumers.

There are also mandatory standards. In some areas, such as public health, safety, or welfare, it is not sufficient sometimes to leave the enforcement and the development of standards to voluntary action. In the food and drug industries, for example, or even in the construction industry, no variation in minimum quality levels can be permitted if the public is to be fully protected. Mandatory standards are therefore established by legislation, at one or another level of government, making compliance a legal obligation.

Penalties are imposed upon individuals, associations or companies that do not adhere to the requirements specified in the legislation. There was an illustration of this in the House yesterday with the bill providing for mandatory standards with regard to motor vehicle safety.

I underline that Bill C-163 is concerned exclusively with voluntary standards. I repeat that there is nothing in it about mandatory standards.

Why do we need standards? First of all, it is in order to improve the quality of goods. Standards provide also for the interchangeability of parts which makes possible, of course, mass production techniques. When a part is standardized, it is possible to manufacture it in greater quantity, because it is known that it can be mounted on several devices.

Standards help also to improve the flow of goods and services in international trade. This is obvious. If a part is standardized, it can be sold in several countries, but if it is not, its sale will be limited to the domestic market.

Standards help to bring some order into a world where industrial production is becoming more and more diverse. Once you know that a certain article meets a given standard, you already know a great deal about it.

In a country such as Canada, where about 40 per cent of the industrial production is destined for export, international acceptance of our goods and the expansion of our trade is directly tied to the extension of the use of standards in Canada and in foreign markets.

I have asked the able member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) to say more about the importance of standards in industry and commerce.

Who uses standards?

Standards are of interest to two main groups of people: the industrial producers and the users or consumers. I have already said enough, Mr. Speaker, not to have to demonstrate the interest of the producer.

The user, be it the large industrial purchaser or the man on the street, will want to ensure that standards are drafted in a way to constitute a meaningful protection of his interests.

I believe the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) will speak further on this matter of protecting the consumer by way of voluntary standardization.

Who can create standards? In each country, industrial and commercial standards can be written by one or more agencies. These agencies may be private or public. Standards used in some fields may actually be written abroad (by an international or a national foreign agency) and 'imported' into a country by companies who find it convenient to use them.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, it should be pointed out that there is no single "right" or "wrong" way for standardization to take place. Different industries, different countries use diverse approaches. For instance, we will be told that the "American way", the "French way" or the "English way" to implement standardization is the best one. I do not think that argument has any value. Every country sees the problem from a different angle, and has its own way of institutionalizing it into agencies such as the ones I shall deal with later.

In this connection, Canada provides a good illustration of the possible diversity of approach. Indeed, we have here in Canada quite a varied and complex situation. This is precisely one of the reasons why we advocate the setting up of the Standards Council, that is to attempt to draw up some strategy, some co-ordination between the various agencies I will now mention.

Many standards employed by Canadian companies are written by the Canadian Standards Association. This Association has a long history and is the prominent private agency in Canada. And we want to make sure that its importance will be recognized and even emphasized.

A limited amount of standards writing is performed by other private agencies, such as the Canadian Gas Association or the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association.

In many important fields where the CSA is not active—for instance, textiles, paper products, paints or petroleum—much standardization has been performed by the Canadian Government Specifications Board.

Although this Board is a federal organization, many of its standards have been adopted voluntarily by the private sector and are now used throughout Canada. In several other important fields, standards used by Canadian manufacturers have been formulated in other countries, notably the United States. Thus, the ASA speed rating on photographic films relates to an American Standards Association standard (now called the American National Standards Institute).

Finally, Canadian standards may be affected by international consultation. There are two major standards-formulating bodies at present: The International Organization for Standardization and the International Electro-Technical Commission. These agencies prepare international standards which, as they become accepted in more countries, do much to facilitate the flow of world trade. Their work is particularly helpful to small and new countries who may be more or less "starting out" in standardization. It does not mean that other countries do not also use it extensively.

To protect its own position, Canada must ensure that its interests are taken into account by these international agencies, ISO and IEC.

To sum up, I should say that standards emanate, in Canada at least, from a wide variety of agencies and organizations. So there is a possibility that a patchwork quilt of standards, repetitious, if not contradictory, may develop.

Consequently, only close intra-national and international consultation in standards writing helps to ensure the consistency and efficiency that we all want so much.

The need for consistency and co-ordination in Canada, in standards making, is the driving force behind the legislation I have the honour of introducing today.

In view of the fact that the present bill would create a national Canadian entity in this area, let us ask ourselves what should be the characteristics of a national standards organization.

I ask the question once again: since we are trying to establish such a body this afternoon, and perhaps another one tomorrow, what should be the features of a standards organization in Canada?

It should meet the following requirements. First of all, it should be representative of all those groups with major interests in standardization. Broadly speaking, this includes producer and consumer associations, plus government representatives from all levels, since governments are major users of standardized products besides having responsibility to ensure that the broad public interest is taken into account.

The first condition is that this organization should really be representative of all those concerned. The second condition is that it should be able to gain and retain, through the quality of its management, orientation, dynamism and leadership the confidence of industry and the general public.

The third condition is that this organization should be impartial. No group's special interests should be allowed to predominate in the organization. As it was said about Caesar's wife, not only should it be impartial, but it should also give the impression of being so. It seems to me that the most important thing is "to be" impartial, but "to seem to be impartial" is not unimportant either.

The fourth condition is that this organization should have a wide scope of activity and concern, and be prepared to take an interest in all sectors and in all parts of the country, as well as in developments in other countries.

The fifth condition is that the organization should be energetic, responsive to needs and able to identify new areas of concern, in the light of rapid technological developments and constant increase in the variety of new products placed on the market.

It should also be fully aware of the government policy in the field of industrial development and international trade and be able to develop a fund of information relating to standardization in the country as well as abroad.

That is, Mr. Speaker, the aim of the new Standards Council. The government felt that only such a Council as the one described in the bill could meet all these criteria—or all the standards, if you will allow me this play on words—which I have just mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bourassa (Mr. Trudel) has told me that he would like to give the history of standardization in Canada as well as in foreign countries, to underline the importance of it.

[English]

For my part, I speak now not to the history of the whole field of standardization but to the history of this particular bill, C-163.

In 1966, in view of the growth of Canadian international trade and of the increasing rate of technological change leading to a proliferation of new techniques and products, the federal government thought that a close look should be taken at the development of standards in Canada. A steering committee was established comprising representatives from the federal government and the major private Canadian standards writing agency; that is, of course, the Canadian Standards Association. The purpose of this steering committee was to examine standardization activity in the country and to make recommendations for future action. The federal government and the CSA were equally represented on that steering committee, having six members each.

In July, 1967, the prime minister of the time wrote to each of the provincial premiers inviting them to send representatives to a full federal provincial conference for an exchange of views on the steering committee's proposals. This conference was convened in February, 1968. I am trying to underline, en passant, that we have been at it for four years; this is why I give the whole chronology of events that have taken place. A consensus was reached at that federal provincial conference: a standards council of Canada should be established.

Standards Council of Canada

In June, 1968, the Canadian Standards Association annual meeting approved a resolution supporting the creation of the Standards Council of Canada. In July, 1968, 258 organizations selected by the federal government-CSA steering committee were sent detailed information of proposals concerning the establishment of the standards council of Canada. Each organization was asked to indicate its reaction and replies indicated an overwhelmingly favourable reaction. I do not know what those who did not reply would have said, of course.

In June, 1969, the unanimous support of the steering committee proposing the establishment of the standards council of Canada was submitted to the government. The government decided, then, to proceed on the basis of the committee's recommendation. After four years of careful consideration and consultation with standards writers and users, the time had come indeed for us to take concrete action. Thus, in December, 1969, this House gave first reading to the present bill.

• (3:30 p.m.)

What is in the Bill? The objects of the council are defined. Those objects are to "foster and promote"—and I do not know how many times I shall repeat those words before the close of my presentation. Nowhere in the bill will one see the word "replace". The objects are to foster and promote in Canada the voluntary standardization of weights and measures, quality and performance of goods and industrial and commercial methods and practices not expressly provided for by law. I am not trying to invade the domain of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). We are creating here a voluntary organization dealing with voluntary standards, voluntarily arrived at and voluntarily implemented.

Mr. Peters: Why is this bill being introduced?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the intention of the bill will be to advance the national economy, benefit the health, safety and welfare of the public, assist and protect consumers, facilitate domestic and international trade, and further international co-operation in the field of standards.

Mr. Peters: But what does it all mean?

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Pepin: Some reaction is coming from the NDP side of the House: the voluntary approach is not considered strong enough. I must, therefore, repeat that standardization can be achieved by two different methods, one that is voluntary, and the other that is mandatory. These are two different means to the same objective; they do not contradict each other, they complement each other. There is no reason to believe that the voluntary way is not productive; neither are there reasons to believe that the mandatory way is always unnecessary. It sometimes is necessary. We are talking about two different ways of doing a good thing.

To reach its objective, the council will foster and promote co-operation between all interested parties, manufacturers, commercial interests, service industries, government, and consumers. As I said, the council will speak to and for the whole population of Canada.

The council, I repeat, will be concerned with voluntary standards only. I have already said on two occasions that the standards developed on a voluntary basis might later be adopted by governments and become mandatory. That will be a decision for the different levels of government to take. The council will have no power to enforce standards. As I said, the standards referred to in this bill are to be voluntarily arrived at, voluntarily adopted—

An hon. Member: Why repeat?

Mr. Pepin: I am repeating because I am expecting to face some lack of understanding on these points, and I should like to prevent it.

Mr. Peters: We will vote against the bill, anyway.

Mr. Pepin: If hon. members on the other side of the House want to oppose the bill, they ought to know what they are opposing. That is why I am repeating some of my remarks.

An hon. Member: I suppose we are all stupid.

Mr. Pepin: The standards council will make maximum use of existing capacities and Canadian organizations concerned with standardization. The demands placed upon existing organizations for developing new standards are expected to increase. The increase will come about partly as a result of the creation of the national council, because of the great deal of interest it will generate.

The bill specifically provides in clause 4(1) that the council is to "foster and promote" standardization—not to write standards—and to promote co-operation between all existing agencies, whether private or governmental. The latter provision is to be found in clauses 4(2) (a) and (b).

In meeting new standardization needs, the council is directed to obtain the co-operation of existing organizations accredited to it. That is to be found in clause 4(2) (f) (i). It is not intended that the council will write standards itself. Its role would be to encourage the identification of needs.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I ought to add it will please my tough friends of the NDP, that in the event that existing organizations prove unwilling or unable, for whatever reason, to meet an identified standardization need in Canada, the council has the power to promote the establishment of a new organization to see that the need is met. However eager we may be to use available and existing agencies, I do not think it would be acceptable to ask that the council be completely in the hands of existing agencies. That is why, if the council identifies a need for a standard in a certain area of endeavour, whether it be in processing, manufacturing or any other, the council can say, "We want to establish that standard." If existing organizations do not move to introduce the new standards, then it will be the job of this organization, to create a body that will do so.

I have received many letters expressing the fear that we would not respect existing organizations. We will. There is no intention of having the standards council duplicate the work of existing organizations. That would be pointless. In their own fields, existing organizations are performing very useful functions. But if a new need develops, if existing organizations cannot meet the need, then clause 4(2)(f)(i) will ensure that the council can take action that is clearly in the public interest.

Existing organizations will maintain their own freedom to determine their own priorities and policies. Contrary to the statements that have appeared in some newspapers, the establishment of the standards council does not imply a takeover of present independent agencies. The procedures for standards formulation in Canada remain unchanged under the proposed act. Existing procedures employed by major standards-writing agencies such as the CSA and CGSB have performed well. Recent indications suggest an increased desire by such agencies to secure maximum participation in standards writing by interested parties.

The establishment of the council will extend the principle of consultation and participation to the level of policy formulation at the full national level, so that interested parties may have a chance to be heard not only in standards writing but in planning the whole direction of standardization activities in Canada in the future. I hesitate to use the word "Parliament" in this connection, but perhaps I ought to do so. This will be the Parliament of standards in Canada. Its members might not be elected but will be sent there by their respective associations.

Bringing standardization in Canada under the umbrella of the proposed council is expected to have particular advantages in the realm of international trade. I, as minister responsible for external trade, would like to see the council fully involved in that. The new council, by providing a forum where an overview of Canada's standardization activities can be arrived at, will ensure that competing interests are reconciled and that a balanced posture reflecting all these interests can be taken by our Canadian representatives at those different international organizations I have already mentioned. They will speak with one voice, to use a phrase the Prime Minister used today when talking of another matter. They will speak with a reconciled voice in international matters. The council will also be asked to take responsibility for the development and co-ordination of the planning and preparation for conversion of Canadian industry to the metric system of measurement, including metric standards.

What about the organization and financing of the council, Mr. Speaker? As I have said, a national standards organization must be sufficiently broadly based to take full account of all sectors of interest and all standardization activities in the country. The standards council would satisfy this requirement. Members of the council, all 57 of them, would be drawn from primary and secondary industry, distributive and service industry, consumer associations, trade associations, labour unions, professional associations and from federal, provincial and municipal governments.

In this connection, I should stress that the standards council of Canada will be independent of the government—I emphasize the word "government"—in its policies, financing and operations. Policy will be determined by the council alone. To avoid the need to rely on special interests for financial assistance the council will, however, be entirely financed by parliamentary appropriation, as per clause 17 of the bill, and will be accountable only to Parliament. Obviously, there is a difference between the "government" and "Parliament" in these matters.

The possibility of the council financing part of its own expenses by membership fees and industry contributions was considered. However, in attempting to do so the council would have competed with private standards-writing organizations which rely on these very sources to finance their own activities. Again, it was decided not to weaken these organizations. That is one of the reasons there will be parliamentary appropriation.

Quite normally, the council will be expected to report annually to Parliament. Usually, the minister rises and says he wishes to table the annual report of such-and-such an organization; the minister certainly does not write the report. He may not even look at it before it is tabled. He acknowledges receipt of the document and gives it to the Parliament.

The accounts of the council will be subject to audit by the Auditor General as provided for in sections 19 and 20. If the council should fail to perform adequately, the option of discontinuing financial assistance always remains as a last resort, but it is for Parliament to decide.

Some people might ask, in fact some have already asked, why is government action necessary? I hope I have suggested some reasons by now. The government, in any broad field such as standardization which reaches far into the lives of many people, has a responsibility, not to control the field but to ensure that the public interest is protected. What the standards council provides is a forum where all interested parties can participate. Thus, the public interest can be identified through debate, discussion and consensus.

The government could have turned over its funds to an existing institution and said, "You do the job". However, it was believed that no agency existed which was national enough in scope and representative of enough interested parties, not only at the standards writing level but also and, mainly, at the policy-making level. No such organization exists at the present time. This is why we are, hopefully, creating one now.

[Mr. Pepin.]

In the areas of standardization where good work is already being done, it is proposed that maximum use be made by the council of existing organizations. In areas where there is a need for new activity and initiative, a broad, objective forum is provided, independent in its policy formation and execution, able to identify and resolve problems as Canadian industry further develops and trade further expands.

It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that we might continue to look for "the best possible structure". That might be an interesting academic exercise, but the problems which are posing themselves in the field of standardization are serious and need full attention now. "The best possible structure" has been studied carefully for four years. The government consulted provincial governments, associations and organizations across the country. I suggest that the House approve the concept of this bill today. I will be pleased, with the support of my learned officials, to answer any detailed questions in committee.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take a few minutes to ramble on and react to some of the statements made by the minister. I am reacting because I was not aware of the points that would be made by the minister. I hope there is a possibility that some of the observations we on this side of the House make will be taken into consideration by the minister and his department and perhaps some modifications will be made to the present proposals.

After listening to the friendly and genial minister, it is difficult to immediately start criticizing because he spent his time smiling and encouraging fellowship. I wondered whether he was trying to convince the House of the importance of the particular bill before us or just himself. Perhaps he was trying to convince the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), who listened very intently to his remarks. Possibly, there has been some discussion behind the curtains and sound and solid argument between the two departments on the actual intent of the legislation.

The minister went into great detail about the tremendous amount of consultation which has taken place during the past four years. In a very general way, he indicated the basic aims and philosophy of the standards council of Canada and emphasized the necessity for its establishment. It is difficult to quarrel with the fact that consultation is necessary. It is even more difficult to quarrel with some of the basic aims of the legislation. The minister indicated that the provinces agree there is a need in Canada for a standards council in order to co-ordinate and support the standards which exist, not only in Canada but internationally. It is difficult to quarrel with the fact that over the years governments, private industry, consumers and the Canadian Standards Association have all been involved. All have made their points of view known and the government has acted accordingly.

I do not honestly think that the minister has told the whole truth. Perhaps I won't tell the whole truth. My aim is to look at some of the aspects which the minister very carefully, and perhaps deliberately, avoided. It struck me as being more funny than rational that the minister indicated the council would be totally and completely independent of government. All throughout his remarks he emphasized that this would be a totally independent agency, yet clause 3 of the bill reads:

> A corporation is hereby established to be known as the Standards Council of Canada consisting of > (a) six members who are employed in the public service of Canada,
> (b) ten members, one member to be nominated by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of each of the ten provinces, and
> (c) not more than forty-one other members, to be appointed by the Governor in Council as provided in section 6.

Right off the bat I smell a rat. I will not comment on that aspect, any further. Perhaps it is not important. I point out to hon. members that we can take exception to the minister's point of view in that regard.

I wish to make some observations on this bill. First, there is the involvement of the CSA, the provinces, industry, consumer groups, etc., the great amount of consultation which is taking place and the consent of these groups to this legislation. This is what the minister said. Second, I want to deal with the powers given to the council under section 4 and to take issue with the minister's statement that the basic aim of the legislation is to foster and promote co-ordination between existing organizations, not to replace them. Third, I want to get involved in the economics and to raise the question of the capability of the council, when it is established, as far as its technical and administrative aspects are concerned. These are the points with which I wish to deal.

In the area of consultation, the minister said he consulted with the provinces. He indicated that there was some discussion as far back as 1967.

Mr. Pepin: 1966.

Mr. Lundrigan: 1966; the minister indicated a steering committee was set up, the CSA was consulted and the recommendation of the steering committee was that there be a federal-provincial conference to study this whole matter. I believe this was consummated in January of 1968. As a result of that conference there was almost unanimous agreement. The minister almost gave the impression that these groups were all holding their breath waiting for the government to introduce this piece of legislation.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I believe there has been a misunderstanding between the governments of the provinces, the existing organizations, various other groups of interested people and the federal government. I suppose we all agree with the concept underlying the establishment of a council, a council which would play a supporting role in co-operation with existing organizations, as is the case in many countries of the western world. There is, indeed, a need for co-ordination of effort in this field, a need for the promotion of the work internationally. It might be a good thing. It might cause an overflow effect which would benefit industry and international trade. I have the impression that the provinces believed this was the purpose of the legislation. I have the impression the Canadian Standards Association believed this was the purpose of the measure. If, when the discussions were going on, I had been asked my own opinion as a Member of Parliament, I would have said I was in favour of the kind of thing the government was proposing to the provinces and the organizations.

When we look at the legislation, however, we realize that the government evidently does not intend to play a supporting role. The intention is, basically, to create the power to usurp the entire role of any others engaged in this field. From representations I have received, I am aware that a number of provinces are having second thoughts after seeing the bill. I should like the minister to tell us how many provinces have made representations to him since the bill was placed before the House for first reading on December 1, seriously questioning the powers provided for in the bill. The provinces feel it is a far cry from the objects and aims set out when this measure was in contemplation, and the provisions which are in fact contained in Bill C-163.

I do not know precisely what is the attitude taken by the Canadian Standards Association, but I bet the Association feels this legislation has gone far beyond what was necessary. I bet the Association feels that the federal government is sticking its bureaucratic nose much further into the affairs of private enterprise than was anticipated. The minister definitely left the impression with the provinces, the Canadian Standards Association and the other associations involved in standardization across Canada that the government's role would be to foster and promote, rather than provide for a take-over. Hon. members will find, I am sure, that there is a great divergence between the attitude taken by the minister today, as expressed in the bill before us now, and the attitude of the people to whom I have referred. I am confident the minister himself really wants to believe that the intention of the government is, in fact, to foster and promote, not to replace. I am sure he did not intend to mislead the House.

Nevertheless, I want to read clause 4 of the bill, subclauses (1) and (2), so that hon. members may see what powers are contained therein. They will find the government has power to completely replace the Canadian Standards Association, power to do everything and play a major role. And instead of the business being done for four or five million dollars, perhaps, with another couple of million from the government, we will find the Canadian public paying as much as $20 million. We are told that one of the basic objectives of the bill is to foster and promote in Canada the voluntary standardization of weights and measures, quality and performance of goods and industrial and commercial practices. The CSA has authority given to it under letters patent going back to 1914 and renewed in 1944. For half a century or more, the Canadian Standards Association has been the association recognized internationally as being in the forefront of this work. The CSA has the authority to provide, originate and furnish Canadian standards of any nature whatsoever which are in the interest of producers and users.

Another power, which goes back to the SCC, the Standards Council of Canada, is to promote co-operation among organizations concerned with voluntary standardization in Canada, to co-ordinate standardization activities and to develop common standards and goals. The CSA has the auhority to provide systematic means by which organizations interested in standardization work may co-operate in establishing and promoting Canadian standards to the need that duplication of work and the promulgation of conflicting standards might be avoided. According to the powers given it here, the SCC will be able to represent Canada as the Canadian member of the international organization for standardization, as the Canadian member of the IOS, the international organization for standardization.

Mr. Perrault: You mean, ISO.

Mr. Lundrigan: All right. It is written here. I wonder whether we could have the co-operation of the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) Mr. Speaker. He is getting a little hot under the collar. I hope that when he does get a chance to speak and convey his coached information to the House he will do so. I am looking forward to hearing the coached hon. member make his views known.

Mr. Perrault: I am listening to every word. Get on with it.

Mr. Lundrigan: The minister's council will have the right and the power to collect, translate and distribute information on standards and standardization activities in and outside Canada. The Canadian Standards Association has the right to serve as a clearing house for information on standardization work in Canada and foreign countries.

The bill obviously gives the government total power in this field, if it wishes to use that power, to usurp a function presently being carried on by an existing organization. Again, the proposed council is to have power to promote the use of standards approved by the council. The CSA is already promoting the knowledge of and the use of approved Canadian standards both in Canada and in foreign countries. The proposed council is to have the power to establish and register under the Trademarks Act its own standards marks, and, subject to that act, to authorize and regulate their use. The CSA has the right to register in the name of the association and to hold, own, use and operate any and all trade marks, trade names and other distinctive marks. I place these facts on record in order to show the extent of the powers for which provision is made in this legislation; they are, indeed, sufficient to enable the existing associations to be replaced.

• (4:00 p.m.)

The minister will, no doubt, say: It is difficult to write anything which is to become law without building in certain powers; however, we do not intend to use these powers; we just want to have them. Let me return to a point upon which I touched briefly a few minutes ago. One of the sound, basic arguments in favour of establishing any sort of council is that in doing so we might improve Canada's reputation as a member of international standards committees. An international standards organization is now in existence, and numerous committees have been established to deal with the setting of standards for various products, consumer goods, electrical goods, mechanical devices, and so on. All of these are represented at the moment by the Canada Standards Association. As a matter of fact, Canada is on no fewer than 80 committees of the ISO, I understand. I think that the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour corrected me on that.

On the other hand, I think Canada sits on 22 other committees of an international nature. I am sure the government, the council and the provinces would be quite eager to agree that our role at the international level is not aggressive enough; that perhaps we are not as well represented or as aggressive as we should be. One of the limiting factors, as the minister has pointed out, may be that the CSA and other existing organizations in Canada do not have the resources to become involved, to be as aggressive as we would wish and to take the kind of initiatives that we would like them to take. I should like to ask the minister why it is that consideration is not being given to doing what other countries in the western world do, namely to assisting the existing organizations, at least for the time being until we get a clear description of exactly how far we want to involve ourselves in standardization.

I should like to know why we cannot assist existing organizations. This question has been raised before and has undoubtedly been given some consideration, but I should like the government to reconsider that point. Why is it that in this respect Canada is so different from other western nations like the United States, Britain, France and West Germany? If the minister would take the time to consult his learned officials—he must have done so already because I can see evidence of it all through his speech—he would ascertain that much of the legislation in other countries in this regard is supporting legislation. The role of this legislation is that which the minister says is also the role this bill will perform. Other countries, such as the United States, Britain, France and West Germany, have standards associations. I forget the actual designation of the American institute, but it does play a supporting role, one of promoting and fostering. Certainly, it does not play a role of usurpation; that is not its function. As I say, other countries in the world have similar institutes.

This is the reason I ask why we cannot now assist our existing organizations in order to enable them, as they are attempting to do within their limited budgets, to refine their procedures and change their structures? The minister knows that during the last year the Canada Standards Association really went overboard in trying to redirect its energies and restructure itself in order to meet an ever-growing need and fulfil the function it is designed to perform. Why cannot the government try and give a little more assistance, even on some sort of trial and error basis, to help promote the CSA and other organizations internationally, instead of granting us power to stick our parochial noses into private enterprise and possibly bring about some sort of restriction under this legislation. When the minister gets an opportunity to think about this, let him give us some formal reaction to the proposal, instead of pursuing his present course.

There is another point I want to raise, one that bothers me as a Canadian and as a member of the House of Commons representing other Canadians. We are living in a period, as every dedicated member of the House knows, of great stress and strain for the average Canadian citizen as a result of the government's fiscal and monetary policies of restraint and restriction. We are all aware of some of the moves that have been made by the government. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) today asked the minister of health why $50,000 is being taken away from the Canadian Legion sports program. I visited the province of Prince Edward Island last evening and I found the people there very concerned at the lack of federal activity and federal assistance in promoting growth in various regions of Canada. We all know that Prince Edward Island did not get its causeway, even though the government spent $20 million on it.

Last week I was at a committee meeting at which one member made a very interesting point in connection with a grant given to promote fish markets during the Lunenburg fishing fair, which has been held now for almost 100 years. This year they lost $3,000 as a result of a cutback in the grant. We have witnessed other cutbacks in post offices across the nation. The Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) is actually closing out 2,000 post offices in Canada so as to save $2 million.

I could go on for a week, Mr. Speaker, telling the House about some of the moves the government has made to cut back spending. I have received representations from Canadians who have worked for government departments for 25, 30 years and now are laid off as a result of government cutbacks. We find the government cutting back its spending in all departments. Its attitude seems to be that the economy cannot stand any more government expenditure, that the government has to curtail inflation.

Then, all of a sudden, this year—not next year or in a couple of years' time when the money situation has hopefully eased—we find the government saying that it is now going to involve itself in something that has already been done by private enterprise, though granted perhaps not to the extent that is required. I am not talking about government involvement in the Canada Development Corporation; I am not talking that kind of language. Neither am I talking about promoting across the nation the idea of upgrading people through new start programs. Nor am I talking about trying to improve relations with Britain, the United States and other countries which have been strained to the point where we are now getting anti-Canadian reaction. I am talking about becoming involved in standardization. I should like to inform the House that one association in Canada today is spending $4.5 million on employing expert technical and administrative assistance, and other expenses of this nature, to try and promote standardization. In Rexdale, Ontario, I believe it is, something like 300 people are employed by the Canada Standards Association.

In addition to that, we have across the nation—if I am wrong the minister or the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour will correct me—about 3,000 people who voluntarily are assisting in projects similar to the schemes now being devised by the government. These 3,000 people sit on God knows how many hundred committees. These people are taken from the consumer section, from government—many are officials from government departments—from industry, from the universities, from the professions, engineers, industrial experts and so on. All of them are volunteers.

I should like to ask whether these people are going to volunteer their services to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. If the government throws in the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) as well, then that might make it attractive enough for the volunteers to stay. But I predict that if, as appears to be the case, the government takes over the work of existing organizations—

Mr. Pepin: No.

Mr. Lundrigan: The minister says no, but the government will have the power to do so; and if it does do so it may be that the government will do the sort of work that has been done by the expenditure of the $4.5 million to which I referred. This work has not been totally effective, because I think $6 million would be required to make it completely effective, but doubtless the government will spend $20 million instead of $4.5 million; that seems to be what will happen.

For the life of me, I cannot see how the interests of consumers will be enhanced or protected by this legislation. I suggest that the basic consideration in examining the legislation is the interest of the consumer. Is there going to be a greater effort made to standardize products so as to provide more safety, better quality and more economy in purchasing for the consumer? I suggest that if the government becomes involved in this sort of thing, the price of ordinary, commonly-used goods will take quite a leap. Having seen the government's efficiency during my brief experience as a Member of Parliament, I cannot see what the effect of this bill will be except that the consumer is going to pay a lot more because the government is now going to spend a good many millions of dollars to do something which is now being done effectively by the existing establishment.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The minister talks about this council being completely independent of government. I am interested in that and I just want to raise this point for the consideration of the members who are going to speak later. Clause 6(1) of the bill indicates that:

> Each member of the council who is employed in the public service of Canada shall be appointed to hold office during pleasure.

Is that the pleasure of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, or is it the pleasure of the minister? I already know the answer to that one. In any event, it reads:

Each of the other members of the Council shall be appointed to hold office during pleasure for such term, not exceeding three years, as will ensure—

It goes on in this vein. I can see a lot of my friends who perhaps got badly hurt during the last federal election finding their way into the standards council of Canada.

I want to raise one other question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Perrault: Tell them to make application.

Mr. Lundrigan: "Tell them to make application", the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) says. I have some friends. The former member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception has been looking for years for a position. If you want, I will now make formal application on his behalf right now. Nevertheless, I will get along to another point.

An hon. Member: What is his name?

Mr. Lundrigan: I forget his name; Tucker or something. In any event, getting down to Clause 14 of the bill, there is an indication that the people who will be employed by the SCC, or the standards council of Canada will be—I can read it.

The council may
(a) appoint such other officers and employees as are necessary for the proper conduct of the work of the Council—

What kind of people are to be employed? The minister never reflected on this at all. What kind of people are going to be employed by the standards council of Canada. Is it going to employ technical people? I have had people indicate to me the government has already put out feelers to some of these people who are working in various capacities with other agencies and organizations.

The government has been putting out feelers saying: We are going to have openings, you know, so keep your options open. I ask the minister, is the government going to employ people who are now in the technical end of standards-writing for the Canadian nation?

Mr. Pepin: I have said four times that the council was not going to be writing standards.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, the minister is indicating that the council is not going to be writing standards. What kind of people are going to be employed? I see no definition. I would like the minister to prepare some kind of brief for the consideration of the House. This bill will be before the committee before too long, we hope. Actually we do not hope that, we hope this bill will get before the committee some time in the distant future. Why does the minister not give us information in respect of two or three things? Let him give us information, first of all, on what kind of people he is going to employ. How many people is the council going to employ? What is going to be the cost to the Canadian taxpayer of this new found employment? Perhaps I should not be too critical. This is the best hope for employment I have seen for a long, long while.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member for Waterloo wants to ask a question.

Mr. Saltsman: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lundrigan: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Saltsman: This question of cost is of concern to all of us. I should like to ask the hon. member whether it is not a cost to the public if industry employs the present members of the council? After all, that cost is deductible for tax purposes. If it is deductible for tax purposes it is reflected in a cost to the taxpayers, surely.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, the other day the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce referred to the schizophrenic, socialistic tendencies of hon. members to my left. After that question, I am beginning to realize that there is something to that observation.

Mr. Saltsman: I rise on a point of order. I am always interested in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I do not think the hon. gentleman is in his seat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lundrigan: That is an indication of the confusion that exists in the mind of the hon. member. I was asking the minister, before I was interrupted by the hon. member who will undoubtedly want to rise in his place and make some observations later, to indicate the nature and kind of people who will be employed by the council. There is no indication here as to how much money this is going to cost the Candian taxpayers over a period of time. I should like the minister to give us an indication of this. He should prepare a lengthy proposal or document. Perhaps he should take this bill back for a few months and prepare that sort of thing in order to convince other people in Canada of the need for this organization.

I have the impression, as a result of the mail reaching my desk, which is not as extensive as the mail reaching the desk of the minister, that the people do not know what this is all about. I should like to ask the minister to give us an indication of the depth of the studies that have been made with regard to the implications of this kind of move.

The minister talks about consultation and his proposals to the standards associations. There are a lot of people who sit back in their offices with a pen—those great experts who draft legislation—who somehow or other do not have the required knowledge at their fingertips. They do not understand all of the implications of these things. Frequently, legislation which reaches the House does not seem to reflect the total situation. As a matter of fact, it is almost impossible for it to reflect the total situation.

I am sure the provinces would be very interested in having this information. I should like to ask the minister to indicate what types of studies have been made and what type of promotional role has been played in the international sphere. What type of technical assistance, in addition to what we have, does the government intend to give to assist existing organizations? What is the long term role of existing organizations and associations, and what is their future? Can they start planning to continue their role with enthusiasm and vigour? These are the kinds of questions we would like the minister to answer.

I am sure my colleagues, and all hon. members of the House, feel that the government has not given this matter enough consideration. I suggest, therefore, there is a great deal of concern in the minds of those who have taken the time to read this bill as to the cost of this measure to the taxpayers of Canada and the relative benefits to be derived. Again, on the basis of the reaction of the provinces and the lack of information regarding the studies which have been made, which are not as extensive as they might have been, we wonder about the underlying philosophy and attitude the government has taken toward this measure. We accept this bill as the beginning of a journey toward the establishment of some kind of council which might be modified to suit the needs and interests of Canada. With this in mind I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey):

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

That the word "now" be deleted and the words "this day six months hence" be added.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have changed my mind about this bill several times this afternoon. I read it and thought I agreed with it. I have been informed by many of my constituents that there are many desirable aspects to the establishment of standards in many fields. I was surprised to hear the minister suggest he was going to keep repeating the words "foster" and "promote" and "voluntary action" because he felt we did not understand them. As a consumer, I do not want voluntary action. I want a standard I can trust. I should think such a standard should be adopted in respect of various things. This information should be attached to the items I buy. I do not want voluntary action. I do not have much faith or trust, and I do not want to foster or promote this lack of trust in respect of guarantees.

After reading this bill, I felt there was an indication it would mean something. It is very interesting to note that this organization will eventually supersede the Canadian Standards Association. In a letter which that Association circulated to all Members of Parliament—several of my colleagues received it so I assume it was received by all members—they said that if the bill is enacted, it appears that a federal government corporation will be given the power to supersede the Canadian Standards Association as the national agency for voluntary standardization in Canada. This letter is dated March 10 and the bill is dated December 1. Several newspaper items on the subject are dated early in January, so the conclusion of The Canadian Standards Association is that they will be superseded.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I should like to know from the minister whether or not what this organization says is true, because if it is true then I am very much in favour of the bill. However, if it is not true, then I would be prepared to support a six months hoist. So, I hope the minister will decide whether or not the conclusion of the Association is valid because there is a need for such an organization in Canada. I was interested to note that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) is aware of the fact that he has oodles of trouble, a lot of which stems from the fact that we do not have proper standards in Canada and that the agencies that have been attaching a tag to the products are not better than the people who produce them.

I am also interested in another aspect of the matter. The minister said he is going to support the association, and he commented on the wonderful work it did. In their letter, the association says that it is privately financed, and that it has an annual budget of about four and a half million dollars to which the federal government contributes only about 1 per cent. These people have been able to raise for themselves four and a half million dollars for doing what? Certainly, not for protecting the public. The 1 per cent which the government put into the organization could have been 50 per cent if they thought that organization would protect the consumers. The minister must think about the Canadian Standards Association because that association, from whom I received the letter dated March 10, either does not believe the minister that the organization proposed under the legislation will not supersede them, or else is pretty stupid. No wonder it does not make better decisions on some of the safety regulations, because if it read the minister's bill as badly as I did then neither of us should set standards for electrical appliances.

A number of articles were written by Maurice Western, a special correspondent for the Journal who had some things to say about this matter. His opinion is that, of course, the minister's bill is only the thin end of the wedge. Judging from his argument it seems to me he believes it is a voluntary foot in the door is not opened, then the minister will have some leverage. He gives some reasons as to why this bill is necessary. One of the reasons is to allow the minister to exercise some control. In one of the articles appearing in the Journal Western said:

> But standards can also be a cloak for extortion. They can be used to impose higher prices on Canadian consumers by keeping off the market goods which have proved safe and serviceable in other countries.

He goes on to give an example:

> In Ontario, for example, firms have been prosecuted by provincial authorities because they offered for sale such items as Japanese radios and radiophonographs which did not carry the approval stamp of a private organization, the Canadian Standards Association.
>
> Until now, Parliament has shown no interest in this anti-consumer aspect of standards regimes. Furthermore, although Mr. Pepin's bill contains a few pious expressions about "facilitating domestic and international trade" and "furthering international co-operation in the field of standards", there is nothing in it which promises an effective attack on the problem.
>
> If there are to be standards policed by the provinces, which may indeed be necessary in many cases, they ought not to be set by representatives of private organizations with a market interest. In principle, therefore, an official standards council is a good thing. The one proposed will consist of six civil servants, 10 members nominated by the provinces and not more than 41 other members chosen by the federal government on some basis not spelled out in the bill.
>
> The general idea of the legislation is that the new council will work through existing organizations. It may "accredit, in accordance with criteria and procedures established by the council, organizations engaged in standards formulation, testing and certification in those fields—

Western goes on to say:

> Since it will not have its own laboratories, how will it avoid becoming captive to these bodies, including presumably the Canadian Standards Association and Canadian Gas Association? In the past, such groups, although non-government associations, have managed to endow themselves with a semi-official aura. Now they are to be accredited, which will put the matter beyond doubt.

The article goes on to describe the effect this will have on imports and exports and how United States products have been unable to come into Canada because total and often useless changes would be involved. Mention is made in the article of one case, of which I have known for some time, of an electric stove that was brought to Canada. Most of us do not consider the Americans to be backward in their industrial products, yet the wiring in that stove has to be removed and a different type of wiring installed, boosting the price, I would imagine by 10 per cent. What does it do to the cost once a stamp of approval is put on the stove? It boosts the cost of that stove by 100 per cent so the stove, which would be considered acceptable in the United States and which sells for $100 there, will probably cost $200 or $225 in Canada. In addition, there is the bother of having to re-wire it to obtain a stamp of approval, which obviously the Americans do not think was necessary so why should we?

The minister is also aware that often we have not been able to sell in other countries products manufactured in Canada because we have not been able to meet their standards. It has been very interesting, in travelling around parts of the world on a number of occasions, to find that in other countries electrical appliances are uniform in their application. We do not have this uniformity. An electric shaver in Europe operates on current of different voltage. In Canada, electric shavers do not even operate on household current but have to have a special transformer attached to them because they cannot take normal power fluctuation.

It seems to me that we are not all that smart in this respect, and the minister who is responsible for trade must realize that the area of his responsibility is much larger than just to protect an association. Let me tell the House that this is a very powerful association if it can raise privately four and a half million dollars a year. This indicates that they must be very effective with the people to whom they talk, but since they could only receive 1 per cent from the government, they are not very effective with the government. This shows a great degree of self-interest and a smaller concern for the consumers, for trade interests or even for safety interests in many cases.

The association sets out in its letter how much money they raised and how much the government was providing. They consider it in a different light than I do. I do not think it is unfair to say that some self-interest must be served in this field. As a matter of fact, I imagine there is a total monopolistic interest in this field. Certainly, this is the case with gas underwriters. I have seen many appliances bearing the laboratory underwriters's stamp, and I would think this is a good standard. I have seen Good Housekeeping's Seal of Approval on many appliances also. If I saw that on an electric iron I would think it was worth buying, not because of standards set by any government agency but because use of the Good Housekeeping Seal has been restricted, and any article which bears it is usually satisfactory. That has been my experience.

Another seal of approval is that of the Canada Standards Association, but this only means that it is legal for me to use the article bearing it. I have bought equipment with that seal, and without it. I have not considered that seal as any great stamp of approval, except that it is the legal stamp of approval needed in the province of Ontario, and thus is absolutely necessary in that province.

As the minister said, he is backed by a large number of people in his department who are very competent in their various fields. I suggest that their's is a fairly new competence. I am impressed with the interest which Canada is showing in developing trade, mainly through co-operation between international agencies. It is no longer a question of,

[Mr. Peters.]

"We have it; if you want to come and buy it, do so. If you have it and if you want to send somebody to us to demonstrate it, then maybe we will buy it." Now, there is co-operation. Trade seems to be on a fairly formal basis, and not only the present minister but several previous occupants of that post have made fairly good showings, both throughout the country and in this House. The reason for that is the expertise which is behind them.

Experts have pointed out that a number of changes must take place in Canada if we are to expand our trade. One of the changes I wish to talk about is the adoption of the metric system. I have introduced a bill dealing with this subject on a number of different occasions. Now, on looking over it again, I do not know where I stole it originally, or where it came from, because certainly it is pretty complicated. I do not think I knew that much about the subject. I really do not know how I developed such a comprehensive bill, but I would ask the minister to have a look at Bill C-42, and it might explain some of the support that I have been receiving on this subject.

Some of this support comes from people in the educational field. The annual general meeting of the Canadian Teacher's Federation in 1962 passed a resolution which read:

> Whereas countries containing 78 per cent of the world's population either are using the metric system of measurements or are in the process of adopting it; and
> Whereas 57 per cent of world trade is carried on in metric units; and
>
> Whereas the metric system is much simpler and more systematic than the English system; and
>
> Whereas the metric system is already being used in Canada to some degree;
>
> Be it resolved that the Manitoba Teachers' Society adopt a policy of favouring a complete change in Canada to the metric system of measurements; and
> Be it further resolved that the Manitoba Teachers' Society recommend to the Canadian Teachers' Federation that it, too, adopt a policy of favouring a complete change to the metric system.

A report on the metric system by Dr. J. T. Henderson of Ottawa was presented to the Canadian Conference on Education in January, 1962, in which he stated his firm belief that the change to the metric system would cut a whole year from the present 12 year elementary and secondary education course and thus enable young people to become members of the labour force one year earlier. That is an interesting conclusion.

Most of the world is interested in doing business according to the metric standard.

The metric system is simple, involving multiplication and division by tens. It is easy to train young people in its use. In fact, at present many Canadian industries use it, but for domestic purposes have a conversion system to the English measurement system. All measurement in the pharmaceutical industry is done according to the metric system. Hospitals, doctors and scientists operate according to the metric system, and I am glad that the government is now making a detailed study of the subject.

A change to the metric system need not be made overnight. It is not like the recent experience in Sweden, where a change was made from driving on the left hand side of the road to driving on the right hand side of the road. That change had to be implemented overnight, but the adoption of the metric system could be spread over a much longer period of time.

I have been informed that the Canadian construction industry has done a study on the metric system and is prepared to adopt it. That industry needs only a little encouragement from the minister to do so. I believe there are many other industries that would be interested in gradually adopting the metric system, and thus better serve world markets.

It is inevitable that we will adopt the metric system, and I commend the minister for having announced, as reported in the Ottawa Journal on January 16, that the government believes adoption of the metric system of measurement is ultimately inevitable and desirable. I am quite pleased with the development that is taking place in this field. I suggest that we start with industries that are now willing to adopt the metric system, and encourage others to do so as well. This standards bill is broadly based, and in the last few months we have had three bills of this nature.

The other day we had a bill on the standard of textiles and not long ago we had a bill on the standard of sizing for children's clothes. We have considered a number of these standards, and they seem to be haphazard. I suppose the CSA was administering those as well. Size two clothes would fit a child aged two or one aged six or maybe one in the cradle. We have not established standards and it seems to me we are going to be hard pressed in making trade agreements with other countries unless we do.

A standard has to consider the consumer in my opinion. If we set standards that raise the price of the commodity 30 or 40 per cent artificially then, of course, the establishment of those standards is too expensive. It is more than we can afford and will not serve the purpose. Standards should be properly administered and uniformly developed so that they can be applied in the trade. The housewife should be able to pick up a can and know whether it contains 11 ounces or 14 ounces. It is very interesting to look at the shelves in a grocery store where the cans appear the same size but examination will reveal perhaps an ounce difference in the contents, and the price of one will be a fraction of the other. It would take a mathematician to figure out if one is cheaper than the other.

We will have to establish and enforce standards, and that is why I am opposed to the minister saying that his job is to promote voluntary action. I do not think the Canadian public is interested in the fostering of voluntary standards if that means they will be established a long time from now. The general public is interested in standards being established now so they know what they are buying. We should know exactly what a standard means.

So much depends on the company that is producing food products, for instance. One company will maintain that its soap is 99 or 100 per cent pure. I do not think this claim has ever been challenged. Pure what? Pure soap? Pure lye? Pure fat? Pure what? It is hard to say what it is, but nobody complains. We have so many things that are "select", "first grade", "pure" this or that, that are not pure at all. The reference is to something that is not a commodity in itself but is a combination of commodities. It cannot be pure unless it is free from impurities and "pure" would have to be defined.

This country is demanding very strongly and rapidly a more complete knowledge of products on the market. For example, if you went to Europe and bought a bag of Canadian flour you would know the protein content of the flour and what grade it was. You might even know where it came from because of certain standards that must be marked on it. But if you go downtown in Ottawa and buy a bag of flour it will be marked as "finest grade", "household flour", "cake flour" or some designation that has nothing to do with what is in the bag. You would not know whether it was fifth grade northern or frozen wheat or general purpose flour. You would not know anything about that particular flour and certainly would not know whether you were getting your money's worth. This is true of almost everything we have.

Another example is light bulbs. The Ontario Hydro has set standards to a point where they can buy bulbs with a 400, 500, or 1,000 hour life or even a lifetime bulb. I cannot do this. When I buy a bulb there is nothing to indicate whether it is going to last 400 hours, but I think I have a right to know how long it will last. I am willing to pay a premium for the knowledge. I am even prepared to pay a premium for the government to set a standard to enable me to tell.

I am disappointed with the minister, particularly because of his glee at being able to say that this is voluntary, and that he is not going to interfere in the CSA or with the gas or electrical underwriters. Apparently he is not going to interfere with any of the agencies that, in my opinion, may have been acting in a manner detrimental to consumer prices and to our ability to participate effectively in international trade. I am sure, and I think the minister is, that this bill will have to be amended before it is in operation very long.

I think the minister indicated what might have been one of the defences of his position, had he been able to say that the provinces will not allow the federal government to enforce standards on a national basis. But the indication in the letters received from the provinces by the former minister was that the federal government should go ahead. If this is so, I think we should be willing to exert ourselves and move into a field that apparently is vacant in relation to many commodities.

I know the public is waiting for this type of legislation, waiting for an expansion of it into all consumer requirements. I hope by the time the bill comes to committee, the minister will be able to convince himself or his colleagues to give consideration to this point. The government should give consideration to bringing all those agencies which set standards under the umbrella of a national agency. The organizations could use it and the government would have a responsibility to the consumer for the goods which were examined and approved.

The CSA is really not of much interest to people in China. It might not be of much interest any place else, but it certainly is not an international agency that countries will respect. I think it is time we got into this field, and I hope it can be done by the time this bill gets through committee.

[Mr. Peters.]

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, when introducing the bill, the minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) was justified, of course, in saying that the entire Canadian population wishes that, in some fields, we would comply with certain standards.

However, we are wondering whether the government is acting in a normal way with regard to its standards legislation since there is already—as has been pointed out before—a Canadian Standards Association. If the government intends to establish a Standards Council of Canada whose objectives will be exactly the same as those of this association, the Canadian people will have to decide which standards are the best. Therefore, no standardization could be possible.

Are we going to follow the standards set by the Canadian Standards Association or those of the Standards Council of Canada? It seems to me that, right from the start, a detailed study of this matter should have been made. For instance, have the proposed standards been already carefully considered by the existing association?

In a letter sent to us by the association on March 10, and to which reference was made before, we find the following and I quote:

> The yearly budget of the association is about $4.5 million to which the government contributes in a proportion of about 1 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I am not in favour of a pro rata contribution but of a whole contribution. This means that if we allocate thousands of dollars to that association, it is because we consider it satisfactory, otherwise why should we grant it a subsidy. I wonder, since the association is sending a letter of protest to the members, whether this means that the government possibly did not take care to consult this association before introducing Bill C-163. I think that we have here an example of a lack of standardization of the government itself.

This association is either good or not good. I am inclined to think that it is good since it receives a subsidy from the government. If it wants to take charge of standardization in Canada, why did it not resort to the Canadian Standards Association which already exists in order to avoid ambiguity and useless quarrels?

Mr. Pepin: They changed their mind.

Mr. Matte: I did not hear the minister's remark.

Mr. Pepin: They changed their mind.

Mr. Matte: They changed their mind?

Mr. Pepin: Yes.

Mr. Matte: Then I am glad that there were consultations with this association before the bill was drafted.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The previous speaker's argument, to the effect that a private association can protect some private interests at the expense of general interests is valid to some extent, for such a thing is always possible. So it probably behoves the government to concern itself with such standards, in order that they may really be objective. But one could perhaps seriously wonder if it might not be better to alter the existing organization so as to make it more efficient and more or less a Crown corporation. Maybe it could be done.

When referring to the content of the letter sent out by that Association, one can but conclude that the latter seems well-structured and provides several services. Therefore, we could perhaps change it a little.

As far as this bill is concerned, you may say what you like, but if it is the government's intention to have it passed, we know very well it will pass. Therefore, I will allow myself to point out some aspects that could be improved upon or simply deleted. Referring to the bill, I note for instance that the Council would consist of, and I quote:

(a) six members who are employed in the public service of Canada,

(b) ten members, one member to be nominated by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of each of the ten provinces, and

(c) not more than forty-one other members—

Mr. Speaker, that Council will have not more than 57 members and we are sure of one thing, namely that it will have only one representative per province.

Therefore, the following could happen, that Quebec, for instance, would have only one member out of 57 to represent it within that Canadian Council.

I wonder whether it might not be advisable to add to clause 3(c) which reads as follows:

(c) not more than forty-one other members—

—the words: "chosen on a pro rata basis in the provinces", for standardization will affect all sorts of things, weights and measures, the quality and performance of goods, and industrial and commercial methods and practices.

I am still referring to clause 4(c) which reads as follows:

(c) industrial and commercial methods and practices—

It may happen, Mr. Speaker, that some standards are related somewhat to the ethnic groups. Indeed, it is quite possible that in industrial and commercial fields, some standards might be particularly related to Quebec, because that province is in the majority made up of French Canadians. And so, with regard to the number of members on the council which is to be established, the provinces and especially Quebec should be adequately represented. We would thus avoid the differences and quarrels that are always liable to occur.

The bill does, indeed, say "voluntary". These standards should not, however, compel manufacturers to bring about any changes in products which have now caught the fancy of the public.

As for clause 4(a), we certainly agree it is high time to think of changing our present system of weights and measures—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being 5 o'clock and under the special order passed today about tonight's budget speech, Mr. Matte moved, seconded by Mr. Winch, that the House do now adjourn.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being five o'clock the House will proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) we have agreed to stand the first two notices of motions, Nos. 203 and 204. I believe the hon. member sponsoring notice of motion No. 141, the third from the top on the Order Paper, is ready to proceed. Perhaps Your Honour might call that notice of motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

REQUEST FOR CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. John Burton (Regina East) moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan regarding the selection of designed regions under the new Regional Development Incentives Act.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He said: On November 26 last, I placed this notice of motion for papers on the Order Paper in view of my concern about the designated areas program under the Regional Development Incentives Act as it applied to the province of Saskatchewan. Indeed, this concern was shared by many other people in the province of Saskatchewan in view of the state of the Saskatchewan economy, particularly in the past year.

I think it is very useful and timely that we should have an opportunity to discuss the implications of this motion and its import in terms of the current situation. It is also timely and useful to have this discussion in view of the minister's announcement yesterday afternoon. All of us recognize that the programs that are involved are important in fostering and promoting a recovery and improvement in the state of the Saskatchewan economy which has experienced very severe setbacks within the past two to three years in particular. This, of course, marked an interruption of a steady period of growth over the past 25 years or so, from the early forties through to the mid sixties.

Over the past year and a half this growth has shown a very sharp change in direction. There has been a downturn in the state of the Saskatchewan economy. Figures produced by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for 1968, although not published as yet due to a changed reporting system, show personal income per capita in Saskatchewan for the year 1968, the latest year for which figures are available, is almost $300 per capita below the Canadian average. If one excluded the factor of change in farm inventory, and this change in farm inventory and the net addition to farm inventory was included in these personal income figures, we would see that the income per capita in Saskatchewan for 1968 was almost $400 below the national average.

It can also be noted that both of these figures, with or without the change in farm inventory, are below all other Canadian provinces with the exception of the four Atlantic provinces. Indeed, they are below the figure for the province of Quebec where it has often been noted there is a great need for economic stimulus. When the designated regions were first announced last August, many people in Saskatchewan were profoundly concerned. They could not see any rationale in the designation of the particular areas of Saskatchewan which were included under the terms of the new Regional Development Incentives Act. There is a strip across the south of the province which includes such communities as Estevan, Weyburn and Moose Jaw. I have no objection to the inclusion of these communities and I think a good case could be made for their inclusion. There is also an area in the northeastern part of the province which includes the communities of Melfort, Humboldt, Nipawin, Hudson Bay and a few other towns as well.

I have no objection to the inclusion of these communities in the designated areas program. However, if these communities are to be included then I certainly think an equal or better case can be made for the inclusion of many other communities in Saskatchewan. One of the communities in the northeastern block of Saskatchewan, the town of Humboldt, happens to be my home town. I have a certain amount of loyalty and faith in my old home town, but I can say that the town of Humboldt is as prosperous as many other centres in that province. The point I wish to make is that many people in the province of Saskatchewan felt that if it were possible to include a community such as Humboldt, it should be possible to include many other communities and towns such as Wynyard and Melville. There are many such communities that could be named throughout the province.

The Qu'Appelle Valley is one area which is of interest in the province of Saskatchewan. This valley has new potential for development as a result of the completion of the South Saskatchewan dam and the assurance of a more stable water supply for that part of the province since the water supply has been linked with that of the South Saskatchewan River and the waters impounded by the South Saskatchewan dam. Many of us were very much disturbed by the boundaries that were established.

I subsequently corresponded with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). I asked him in particular to include the major cities of the province. I did so, not because I have anything against the inclusion of the smaller centres in the province—I think a very sound case can be made for the inclusion of them—but if any meaningful growth is to be carried out in the province of Saskatchewan it is absolutely necessary to include the major growth centres in the province within the program.

On this basis, I suggested that Regina and Saskatoon should be included in the program. In fact, I suggested the entire province of Saskatchewan should be established as a designated area in view of the economic conditions in that province. I followed up my exchange of correspondence with the minister by placing questions on the Order Paper when the session of the House commenced on October 23. I received some very evasive answers. When I asked what criteria were used by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the selection of designated areas for each province, the answer provided to each question was, weighted measures of representation of economic growth (employment, income and population) and of potential for secondary industry. I suggest that this wording and answer was a clear case of bureaucratic gobbledygook.

I followed this question up with a motion for papers asking for correspondence between the federal government and the governments of the various provinces regarding the consultations that took place prior to the establishment of the designated areas across Canada. I was very much astonished and surprised to learn, in response to my motion, that there was no correspondence with any province except the province of Alberta.

I was supplied with information on the exchange of correspondence between the federal government and the province of Alberta. It was clearly set out in this correspondence just what proposals were made by the federal government and what proposals were made by the province of Alberta. I found that all of the other consultations that were carried on, I might say consultations which are provided for under the legislation, were carried on through what seem to be rather informal discussions. When I attempted to obtain some details of the proposals that were discussed, I was told that the details of such consultations were confidential, except for the information that had been supplied with respect to the province of Alberta.

It is then that I transferred the motion for debate with respect to correspondence between the federal government and the province of Saskatchewan and this is the motion that is now being debated, Mr. Speaker. Further questions were asked regarding the criteria. I tried to obtain more information on what sort of criteria were used in establishing the designated areas across Canada. I obtained a rather vague set of figures dealing with each of the 64 geographic economic regions across Canada.

Subsequently, I privately asked for a map that set out the boundaries of these various regions. The Parliamentary Secretary was kind enough to supply me with such a map. When an analysis was carried out, it was quite clear that on the basis of the information supplied in response to this request there was no meaningful criteria applied in establishing the designated areas across Canada. Indeed, it amounted to little more than an exercise in political manoeuvring which did not take into account the real needs that should have been dealt with under the terms and objectives of the legislation for which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is responsible.

In discussing the programs of that department over the past year, the government has made a case that this is their major program to decrease and eliminate regional economic disparities in Canada. It is a major weapon in dealing with the government's war on poverty. As a result of some of the information that has been supplied, some very serious questions need to be asked about the adequacy of the programs that are being developed by the government. Indeed, we have very serious questions with respect to the application of those programs in the province of Saskatchewan. I do not need to go into detail concerning the state of the Saskatchewan economy at the present time. Whether we look at income, retail sales or investment, we are confronted with a gloomy picture. There has been a distinct decline in population over the past one and a half years. Between October, 1968 and January 1, 1970, the population declined from 962,000 to 948,000. This is a matter which requires urgent public consideration.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. O'Connell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I feel I should bring to Your Honour's attention the fact that the debate concerns the production of certain papers. The hon. member has, himself, noted that the papers do not exist, and I really wonder whether a debate ought to be permitted on a subject which is outside the scope of the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): May I suggest to the hon. member that he attempts to make his remarks as relevant as possible to the debate?

Mr. Burton: I will certainly do that, Mr. Speaker. I was attempting to explain why I was seeking this information—the reasons for the concern which led me to bring this motion before the House and ask for whatever correspondence did exist. We did hear a statement by the Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. O'Connell) and I will be interested in any further explanations he may have to give when he takes part in the debate.

I wish to say this in conclusion. Yesterday we heard an announcement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion with respect to the establishment of 22 special areas across Canada. As far as I am concerned, I welcome the inclusion of the cities of Regina and Saskatoon as well as an area of northwestern Saskatchewan within this program. Questions need to be answered as to the scope of the program envisaged in this regard. Will it be restricted to a few areas of emphasis, as suggested in the minister's announcement, or will its application to areas such as the Saskatchewan communities involved be as broad as was foreseen in the over-all program? We ought to keep in mind the need for an over-all program of massive assistance for the Saskatchewan economy, realizing that the economy of Saskatchewan plays an extremely important role within the whole national framework.

At the present time we are confronted by the lift program—the letters standing for "lower inventory for tomorrow"—as announced by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. This is bound to have a serious impact on the income of Saskatoon people in the coming year. We very much need a program initiated by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to offset the effects of the other programs which adversely affect the province. In fact, the entire province of Saskatchewan should be established as a designated area. This is only fair when one compares the situation in Saskatchewan with that in Manitoba where the entire southern settled region is included as a designated area under the regional development incentives plan, in addition to some of the northern region which is now included as a special area. I have no objection to these boundaries having been chosen, but in justice I believe similar treatment should be accorded to Saskatchewan.

We need extensive public works programs in the province. We certainly need special help in programs of the department to assist the Indian and Métis people. I was pleased to hear the minister announce yesterday that help would be extended to the Indians and Métis in northwestern Saskatchewan. I was glad to note he has adopted some of the proposals made by the hon. members for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) and Skeena (Mr. Howard). They recently made a tour of this area and recommended that certain programs be carried out. I might also say, to their credit, that they carried out their tour of inspection in a much more tasteful and sensitive manner than did some others who recently investigated the social and economic problems of the area.

Earlier, when this question was placed before the House, it was suggested that no correspondence along the lines sought for in the motion did, in fact, exist. I am astounded to think that so little consultation took place with respect to the establishment of designated areas in Saskatchewan that there should not be one scrap of correspondence or one document which could be tabled in answer to my request for papers. I would be interested to hear more about this aspect from the Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I rise to take part in this debate on the production of papers. May I at the outset—

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am surprised that the Parliamentary Secretary should not have been given an opportunity to reply to the observations which were made by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton). It would appear there are no papers and, in these circumstances, it would seem to me that the Parliamentary Secretary should at least be given the opportunity to say so.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The chair has recognized the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Nystrom: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps, when I have finished, the Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. O'Connell) will have a few more questions to which he can reply. The hon. gentleman did say a while ago in this House that there was no correspondence. I am flabbergasted that there should be no correspondence at all between the premier of Saskatchewan and the federal government with regard to federally-designated areas. Did the premier not write even a single letter on this important subject? He has expressed his views about it freely in the Saskatchewan legislature, in the press and over the other media. Did he not write even a brief note mentioning the areas which he believed should be included under the regional development incentive program? Mr. Speaker, I did not ever have very much confidence in the premier of Saskatchewan, but after learning something like this, if the Parliamentary Secretary is telling us the truth, I have even less confidence in him. It seems to me that any premier would be interested enough at least to write to the minister in charge and make known to him the areas which he believes should be included as designated areas in his own province. This is especially important in the case of a province such as Saskatchewan, having regard to developments there during the last two or three years. I do not think the people of our province should forgive the premier if he did not even send a few letters to the minister in charge or to the department.

If there is no correspondence at all, it becomes very difficult to debate this point further. But I think there must be some. All of us will have to demand a good explanation from the Parliamentary Secretary when he rises to take part in the debate. I do not intend to become involved in a long series of suggestions to indicate what ought to be done, in my opinion, or to prove that the government is not doing what I think. The Parliamentary Secretary heard me speak for seven minutes during the late show last Monday night and is familiar with some of my ideas as to what should be done in this area. What is really important in this particular debate is that the government should produce the relevant papers if they exist. I am sure some do exist. I am sure some correspondence must exist. If the Parliamentary Secretary says that it does not, I think the premier of Saskatchewan would be interested to know that.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The Federal government is led by a man who a year and a half ago talked of the new politics of participatory democracy, of opening up government and society for all to participate. Yet when we ask about something as basic as this, it is denied us. The people in my province have the right to know what kind of letters, briefs and communications were exchanged between the two governments before this government made up its mind which areas to include within the regional development incentives program. This is a matter that is basic to parliamentary democracy and to a society that pretends to believe in participatory democracy.

All members from Saskatchewan are very happy at the inclusion of Regina and Saskatoon and the Meadow Lake area in the new plan announced yesterday. I think all of us would be very happy to see the government do something to improve life in these areas. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I and other hon. members have for some time called upon the government to designate all of Saskatchewan a special area which would qualify for government grants under the regional program.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Why not include all of Canada?

Mr. Nystrom: I hear the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) making his usual contribution to the debate, and I shall be interested to hear later what he has to say.

As the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) outlined today, and as I have said on previous occasions, all of the people of Saskatchewan, farmers and others, are affected by the economic recession that has set in. Farm income has fallen drastically; there is no quarrel about that. Non-farm income has gone down. Unemployment is higher now in Saskatchewan than it has been for years. Businesses are closing up; many have gone bankrupt, others are slowing down. Unless some help arrives soon, others will have to pull out. In addition to that, investment has fallen and people are moving out of the province. About 1,800 people moved out of Saskatchewan each month between last April and last October. This alone gives a very good illustration of what is happening in Saskatchewan.

After the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) made his announcement in the House yesterday, I telephoned the mayor of Yorkton. He asked me why Yorkton was left out of the regional economic plan. The city of Yorkton—and Yorkton is but one example—has sent briefs and letters to the minister outlining the economic situation in that city, and asking that Yorkton qualify for additional incentives to attract industry to the area. Yet Yorkton has not been included in the plan.

I should like to know why this is the case. I should like to know also why other communities in Saskatchewan were not included in the plan. Perhaps a little light would be cast on the situation by the correspondence that passed between the provincial and federal governments in relation to regional economic development and the choice of designated areas. But apparently the Provincial Government did not see fit to send any correspondence.

I could go on at great length to talk about different problems in Saskatchewan, and advance further arguments for designating the whole province of Saskatchewan, but in view of the time element and the fact that other people want to participate in the debate I will try to be as brief as possible. I hope that the announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was not mere tokenism on the part of the government. Because if it was, this will mean nothing to the people of Saskatchewan in areas now within the new regional development plan. When the Parliamentary Secretary replies to the debate, perhaps he could tell the House whether or not the new special areas will be treated on the same basis as the old areas originally designated under the plan announced last August. I hope that the announcement that has just been made will not be a paper announcement. These areas need more than that; they need help immediately. Not only is the economic life of the province failing, but the entire way of life of hundreds of thousands of people is being affected.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is a request for the production of papers passing between the government of Canada and the province of Saskatchewan in connection with the designation of certain regions of Saskatchewan under the new incentives plan. There is no such correspondence, Mr. Speaker. I informed the hon. member who raised the question of that some months ago, and I now have to inform him once again that no such correspondence exists.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Some hon. members will probably be surprised to learn that this situation is not unique to Saskatchewan; the same situation obtains in all of the other provinces with regard to designation of various regions, with the exception of the province of Alberta. There was some consultation between officials of the department and their counterparts in each of the provinces. These consultations resulted, not without friction in some cases, in some consensus.

Section 3 of the Regional Development Incentives Act requires consultation in such matters. It does not require agreement between the two governments concerned in any particular case, but it does call for consultation. In this case there was a desire to get on with the job as quickly as possible, to have a rapid commencement in view of the high promise of the programs of this department, and therefore discussions were entered into between the officials. These discussions were oral. I repeat that, except in the case of Alberta where there was some disagreement between the officials and some correspondence did result and was tabled in the House on December 15 in response to a request from the hon. member who moved this motion, there is no other correspondence.

The reason for the lack of correspondence was in order to avoid any sort of confrontation, if at all possible; to avoid the kind of situation where there is proposal and counter-proposal. Many officials of the federal government travelled to the provinces in order to conduct these consultations. In the very co-operative environment that existed, agreement, or at least a consensus, was sufficiently reached to enable the federal government, as was its responsibility, to designate certain regions.

In view of the fact that there is no such correspondence, Mr. Speaker, I feel I ought to ask the hon. member whether he would agree to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat, might I ask him a question? I quite recognize what the Parliamentary Secretary has said about consultations between provinces, the value of discussion, and that no formal agreement following consultation is required. However, in view of the fact that consultations were held and that information about the proposals passed between the federal government and the province of Alberta, why was it that in answer to questions that I placed on the order paper in regard to consultations with other provinces, the only reply given by the government was that consultations did take place, and the whole thing was done by discussion? The government would not even answer my question about when those consultations took place. The government then went on to indicate that the details of those consultations were confidential.

Mr. O'Connell: I think I explained that, Mr. Speaker. The desire was to hold oral consultations, if at all possible, in order to arrive at a rapid resolution of the boundaries in each province. In only one case did they result in correspondence. I ask again whether the hon. member is prepared to withdraw the motion on the basis of that explanation.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. O'Connell: I am not prepared to accept further questions. I think I am entitled to an answer to the explanation I have given the hon. gentleman. I do not think he is prepared to withdraw his motion. I would say in conclusion, since I do not propose at this time to enter into a debate on the motion, that there are a number of appropriate occasions to raise this type of question. The time will soon come when the estimates are before the Standing Committee on Regional Development. I think the hon. member is a member of that committee. With regard to the points raised as to why various matters were not included, let me say that there will be more appropriate opportunities than this to discuss such details and I will be delighted to be in attendance at some of these meetings.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) has before us a Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers. These papers do not exist, yet we continue to debate a matter which has nothing to do with this motion. We are talking about a matter which concerns the incentives program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I am happy to talk about that program at any time, but it seems to me this is nothing but a ruse on the part of the hon. member. In any event, the hon. member refuses to withdraw his Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers which do not exist. He is using this as a ruse in order to do some politicking back home and to talk about the situation in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot impute motives.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): I am sorry if I seemed to impute motives to the hon. member for Regina East, but it is difficult to understand why we must go on with the debate when there are so many other important things to discuss in the House. In any event, we continue to discuss a Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers which do not exist. To me, this is the kind of thing that lowers the whole tenor of the House of Commons. It is the kind of thing that lowers the reputation of this institution in the eyes of people of this country.

I can understand the hon. member's desire to bring this matter before the House. I can understand why everyone would like to have certain parts of the country designated for special consideration. We would all like that, but I suggest this is not the way to go about it. It seems to me this is typical of the kind of method used by a number of members in this House to bring things forward and to talk about situations that are important to them personally and to their constituents, but they are not necessarily matters of importance to the whole country.

The question of regional economic expansion is very close to my heart. I have always been extremely interested in it. Our country is relatively underdeveloped as compared with other countries, but it has a tremendous future. The only way we can become great in the world is by developing our potential. It is rather ridiculous for all of us to come here and say that certain parts of Canada should be considered under this program. Perhaps this is why I said a while ago, out of turn, that the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) was wandering when he suggested that all of Canada should be designated. He suggested that we should designate Yorkton, this place and another place.

I have a sister and a brother-in-law who work in the area of Melville. I am sure they would like to see Melville designated as a special region. We would all like this in all areas of Canada. But let us be practical. As far as Saskatchewan is concerned, I cannot remember when I have heard anything about politics in this country and the Prairies, and particularly Saskatchewan, have not been mentioned in one way or another, usually in connection with wheat. We have had our share of discussion about wheat in this Parliament since I was elected. We have heard nothing but talk about wheat, damp and otherwise. We have heard about the hardships suffered by the people of Saskatchewan and why they should receive special consideration.

We have never heard in past years about the difficulties faced by the people of northern Ontario, and we have heard little about the people in other parts of Canada.

We have now been given a plan for regional economic expansion which will give us the opportunity to develop certain parts of this country which need development and which perhaps have been neglected in the past. That is the importance of this legislation. Now our hon. friend comes along and says: Why not Saskatchewan? The ironic part of the motion before the House is that only yesterday the minister came into the House and announced that two of the major cities in Saskatchewan were to be designated as special areas. What more do they want? Are they talking about welfare? It would appear that the hon. member for Regina East is talking about welfare, because he said a while ago that we need more public works projects and more Indian and Métis programs. What on earth does he want? Is he talking about regional economic expansion, or about welfare?

We must try to develop the whole country. We cannot develop every single community. We must select certain areas for special treatment, perhaps those which have been neglected in the past, in an attempt to bring them up to the standard we want for Canada. My whole riding needs to be developed; there is no doubt about that. We are all trying hard to see that it is developed, but we can hardly expect that every community in the riding of Cochrane will benefit.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) should be dicussing the topic covered by this motion and not wandering off into different areas of the country. He should be talking about the topic at hand.

Mr. Speaker: The point made by the hon. member is well taken. Unfortunately, I missed the first part of this very interesting debate. I have been here for a few minutes and I have the impression that perhaps what has been debated up to now is not what is before the House. Hon. members know that before us at the present time is a Motion for the Production of Papers. According to precedent, the only subject which can be discussed at this time is not whether there should be assistance to Saskatchewan, the area of Cochrane or any other particular place, but whether certain documents should be produced. The limits of debate on a Motion for the Production of Papers are very narrow. Indeed, I have often thought it very difficult to make a 20-minute or a 15-minute speech on such a subject. If I continue, I will be making a 20-minute ruling on the subject.

Let me say to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), and other hon. members who may wish to speak during this hour, that the only point we should be considering at this time is whether or not these papers should be produced.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I note that your ruling is very similar to my suggestion at the beginning of my remarks. I find it rather difficult to understand how we can debate the production of something which does not exist. We have already been told that the papers do not exist, yet the hon. member for Regina East insists that they be produced. I do not know whether he wants the Parliamentary Secretary to perform some kind of hat trick; but if the papers do not exist, they cannot be brought forward.

Obviously, the sponsor of the motion is concerned that in that fictitious correspondence there would be something to indicate that one or another area of Saskatchewan should be designated. This is what seems to bother him. I should like to make the point that we cannot possibly consider each and every community in Canada for special designation. Certain areas have to be singled out for that, because the idea of such designation is not to give welfare but to develop an area for the future and bring in new industry: where you have a one-industry town, for example, you can bring in other industries so that the people do not have to depend strictly on one industry for their living. This is the important part of the legislation.

It seems to me that the hon. member for Regina East should be aware of that and in agreement with it, since not only this government but previous governments gave special consideration to Saskatchewan and the Prairies. But now the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has given special consideration to Saskatchewan by designating two cities there as special zones. Does the hon. member know what that means? It means that they are not only designated in the way other areas are designated, but they are given special consideration so that even primary industries in most cases can be considered for special help from the federal government. It seems to me this is far more than they could ever want in Saskatchewan or what is implied in the motion of the hon. member. I think that now, in light of this new regulation, the hon. member should be willing to withdraw his motion for the production of fictitious papers.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, what is being debated here is the right to know. That is why there is a Motion for the Production of Papers. In reality, it is for the production of information.

Mr. Pepin: There are no papers.

Mr. Gleave: The people of Saskatchewan whom we represent want to know what has happened over a period of time between two governments, the government of Saskatchewan and the federal government, in respect of the development program that was put into effect. Saskatchewan is staggering under the blows of two Liberal governments, one there and one here. We want to know what they have been doing.

The answer seems to be that they have been doing nothing, because they cannot produce any evidence that anything has happened. If anything has been done, it should be possible to produce some evidence in this House and to say to the House that such and such has happened and that such correspondence or agreements exist. But nothing has happened. This is the real difficulty of the government, that they have to say there is nothing for us. We have to accept it.

Mr. Pepin: Always crying and complaining. The New Cry-baby Party.

Mr. Gleave: When Mr. Speaker calls us to order and asks that we stay on the subject of the Motion for the Production of Papers, I must admit it is hard to discuss something that happened that really did not happen, if you know what I mean. It is a very difficult thing to do, and I admit it. This probably has been the difficulty faced by hon. members who preceded me.

I do not want to disappoint the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) and start speaking about a certain cereal, in which case he would say, "There they go again". So I will disappoint him. I do not know whether so far as this program is concerned we will find ourselves in the same circumstances as befell other programs that have been announced. Perhaps a representative of the government will stand in this House a few months from now and say that this and this happened with the new programs and he can give the House this and that information.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My concern in asking that the motion be transferred for debate was based on the lack of information or correspondence regarding this motion, two other motions and other related motions and questions on the Order Paper. I asked that the motion be transferred for debate because I thought it required further discussion. In view of the further explanation given by the Parliamentary Secretary this afternoon, I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) seeks leave to withdraw the motion now before the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that in another two or three minutes the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod will be knocking at the door of the House requesting our presence in the other place. If hon. members are agreed, we might wait until this important event takes place.

• (5:50 p.m.)

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Lieutenant-Colonel A. Fortier, Assistant Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that this House attend him immediately in the chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (6:00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, Royal Assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act

An act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and other statutory provisions related to the subject matter of certain of those amendments

An act to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act

An act to amend the Trust Companies Act

An act to amend the Loan Companies Act
An act to incorporate Pitts Insurance Company
An act to incorporate Pitts Life Insurance Company
An act to prevent the introduction into Canada of infectious or contagious diseases
An act respecting McOuat Investments Limited
An act respecting Buccaneer Industries Ltd.
An act to incorporate ICG Transmission Limited
An act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act
An act to amend the Railway Act
An act to amend the Canada Student Loans Act
An act to implement a Supplementary Income Tax Agreement between Canada and Sweden
An act to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting the budget to the House last June, I expressed the government's view that a strong fiscal position was essential to check the rise in prices and smooth the way toward more balanced and sustained economic growth. We have maintained that position. Fiscal and monetary policies have worked in tandem to establish conditions which should give us the upper hand in squeezing inflation out of the economy. This year by a national effort we must reduce the rate at which prices are increasing. To accomplish this we must be resolute in continuing to restrain the demands that are made upon the economy. We must also continue to relieve situations where particular economic circumstances and the need to apply the big levers of economic policy may create difficulties. This has already led to several adjustments of our policies.

The Economic Situation in 1969

In the Budget Papers which I tabled in the House on February 27, hon. members will find a comprehensive review of economic developments in the past year. As a background to my remarks on our present situation and to gain perspective on the prospects for the year ahead, I should like briefly to review the highlights of economic development in 1969.

[Mr. Speaker.]

We in Canada have not been alone in confronting entrenched inflation. The United States faces it. Many countries of Europe fight the same fever. The fact that our experience is far from the worst gives us no comfort for we know that the illness, if not corrected, will only deepen. We also know that while the illness is to some extent contagious, every country has to make its own provision for curing it.

The average rise in prices of all the goods and services that enter into the gross national product was of the order of 4.2 per cent last year compared to 4 per cent during 1968. The consumer price index was 4.6 per cent higher in January, 1970, than a year earlier. There are some recent glimmerings of evidence that the rate of increase of prices is no longer rising. But however one interprets these scraps of hopeful news, the hard fact is that both prices and costs—and wages and salaries in particular—are still rising at quite unacceptable rates.

The Canadian economy made notable gains last year both in output and employment. The growth of real output maintained the 1968 rate of 4.8 per cent. Employment grew faster than in the previous year—by 3.2 per cent compared with 2.2 per cent. But after the first quarter, as the restraining policies took hold, the rate of growth of demand slowed down. This development was anticipated although it was delayed longer than we had wished. It is a necessary pre-condition for the moderation of price and cost increases which it is the object of policy to achieve. Unemployment in December, 1969, was 4.8 per cent of the labour force, the same proportion as in December, 1968. Seasonally adjusted, the proportion fell in January to 4.5 per cent.

In the personal sector of the economy, incomes after taxes rose more rapidly than in 1968. Spending on consumers' goods and services rose even more quickly than personal disposable income. Personal saving therefore declined. The balances of consumer credit outstanding rose especially rapidly in the first part of the year. In distributing their increased expenditure among categories of goods and services, consumers favoured services and non-durable goods in general.

Information on business capital expenditures suggests that numerous projects planned for 1969 were postponed or cancelled in the latter part of the year. A fall in profits per unit of output accompanied this apparent change in investment plans. Manufacturers' inventories, especially of finished products, were also building up at a substantial rate in the final months of 1969. Housing starts reached 210,000 units for 1969 as a whole but they declined successively each quarter of the year. The government is now providing a substantially increased flow of funds for low-cost housing projects this coming year. This reflects the high priority we place on meeting the need for housing in general and for low-rental homes in particular.

In our foreign transactions we had in 1969 a rather substantial increase in the deficit on our transactions on goods and services—the current account of the balance of payments. Wheat sales were substantially lower. Other exports increased but at a slower rate than imports, which rose quite strongly early in the year. There was a large inflow of long-term capital including the foreign borrowings of provinces and some municipalities. Once again there was a significant outflow of short-term capital attracted by very high short-term interest rates abroad. The over-all impact of all of these transactions upon our reserves was a modest increase of some $60 million (U.S.) during 1969. The value of the Canadian dollar in foreign exchange markets continues to be very strong, and our reserves have increased by $318 million (U.S.) in January and February. I hope this will decry what many people have said about flights of capital due to our white paper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Financial Markets

Mr. Benson: Financial markets reflected the restraining influence of the monetary authorities in Canada and elsewhere. Interest rates reached record levels by year-end. The growth of the assets of the banking system was about 5 per cent for 1969, and the liquid asset ratio of the banks was pushed to a record low. Net new issues of securities by Canadian borrowers were nearly $850 million lower in 1969 than in 1968, though the issue of securities denominated in foreign currencies rose substantially. Apart from the very successful issue of Canada Savings Bonds the government of Canada was not a net borrower in the bond market in 1969. In fact, the amount of our marketable securities outside government accounts declined somewhat, and there was a reduction in the net public debt for the first time since 1957.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: This feature of our operations helped the monetary authorities in their task of maintaining an appropriate degree of restraint. It also permitted other borrowers—provinces, municipalities and businesses—full access to the funds available. The funds accumulating in the Canada Pension Plan invested by my department in provincial and provincially guaranteed long-term bonds exceeded the total net new marketable bond issues of all kinds taken up by the Canadian bond market. This fund has been a lifesaver in meeting the needs of provinces, municipalities, school boards and other public authorities during a difficult period.

Regional Aspects

Although the various regions of the country had different rates of economic growth in the past year, all of them suffered higher prices. In this sense all regions feel the problem of inflation. Our fiscal and monetary policies have been directed to this general and widespread problem. The government has explicitly recognized, however, that the total spending pressures have not been equally distributed across the country. Accordingly, we have adopted certain measures that differentiate between regions of higher and lower employment. Our tax measure concerning depreciation charges on costs of commercial construction is one example. The request to the chartered banks to have special regard for borrowers in the less prosperous areas of the country is another. In addition, in our expenditure policy, we have given high priority to certain programs which attack specific economic problems of regions of slow growth. Among such programs are those of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Manpower Training Program, the Farm Credit Program and the Wheat Inventory Reduction Program. Equalization grants to the provinces of slower growth amounted to $750 million in the past fiscal year, an increase of 16 per cent over the previous year.

The Fiscal Position in 1969-70

I turn now to the fiscal position for the year 1969-70. Of course, there are some weeks remaining in the fiscal year so that the results I present are the best estimates we are able to make at this juncture. Last June I forecast a budgetary surplus of $250 million. In the Budget Papers tabled February 27 I estimated the surplus at $455 million for the current fiscal year. The difference from the budget arises mainly from the more rapid growth in our tax revenues. Total revenues are expected to be some $245 million above the earlier forecast; expenditures, $40 million above. Since the Budget Papers were printed, the government has decided that the very serious excess of wheat stocks in Canada must be drastically reduced by emergency action. Consequently, Parliament has been asked to appropriate immediately a sum of $100 million to enable Prairie farmers to reduce their acreage planted to grains this year and enable them to adjust to a system of wheat delivery quotas intended to move the existing stocks off the farms. We are proposing to charge this appropriation to this current fiscal year's accounts, increasing budgetary expenditures to $11,915 million in 1969-70, and reducing the budget surplus to $355 million.

Last June I foresaw cash requirements for non-budgetary purposes, apart from exchange transactions, of some $650 million, before allowing for the offset to the write-off of the Expo deficit to expenditures. It now appears that our non-budgetary requirements will be much less than was forecast at that time. A figure of $365 million is implied in the Budget Papers. This figure will be reduced by $100 million, representing a contra non-budgetary credit to the budgetary charge for the appropriation for the wheat inventory reduction program, since the funds will not be disbursed until after the year-end. Other changes in expected year-end items have involved a further reduction to a total net non-budgetary requirement of only $105 million. To this we must add an amount on account of exchange transactions of about $310 million up to the present, somewhat more than was recorded earlier in the Budget Papers. Offsetting these cash requirements on non-budgetary account against the budgetary source of cash, we anticipate that our net over-all cash requirement for the fiscal year ending March 31 next will have been about $60 million. I have already explained that our marketable bonds in the hands of the public decreased slightly. However there was a net increase in Canada Savings Bonds outstanding of $374 million, and small increases in treasury bills outstanding, and in non-marketable securities held by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. These were more than enough to meet the net cash requirements, and should result in an increase in our Canadian dollar cash balances of about $400 million, to a figure which I now forecast at about $1 billion at the year end; that is March 31.

Economic Prospects

Let me turn now to the year behind. I shall speak first of the prospects for the economy and of the fiscal outlook under these circumstances. Then I shall turn to policy issues and proposals.

With the pace of economic activity now somewhat reduced, I expect that the economy will continue to move upward in 1970, but at a lower rate than in 1969. In terms of volume of output, the rate of growth in 1970 may well be 1½ or 2 percentage points lower than last year's 4.8 per cent. Employment will continue to rise, but more slowly than in 1969, and I anticipate some increase in unemployment. There will also be difficult wage negotiations. Some of these negotiations may issue in strikes—perhaps prolonged ones—before settlements are reached. Profits, which have already begun to fall, are likely to fall further in the coming year, in total dollars and per unit of output.

Mr. Speaker, we have a hard task ahead of us in bringing about a significant reduction in the rate of rise of prices and costs. It is the policy of the government to restrain the growth of total spending in the economy, for that is a necessary condition for achieving our primary economic objective. We shall continue to support the work of the Prices and Incomes Commission which is striving to engage business, labour, consumers and governments in a united resistance against inflation. To the extent they succeed, the objective can be reached with less severe fiscal and monetary measures than would otherwise be necessary.

To translate a 3 per cent growth of real output in 1970 into value terms requires a forecast of the success to be achieved in all our efforts to stem inflation. This is particularly hazardous this year. We just cannot tell how soon or how far the slowing of growth in demand and in production will bring about a slowing down in price increases. In forecasting revenues we assumed that prices will increase slightly less than last year. But if we could cut the rise in prices to say three-quarters of the rate last year, and if as the year progresses this trend is clearly evident, we shall have good cause to be pleased. Any shortfall in our revenues for this reason would be welcome.

We have also been encouraged in our efforts to check the inflationary rise of costs and prices by the co-operative approach of the provincial governments. This was made clear, as honourable members will recall, at the conference of first ministers in mid-February. The consensus contained in the conference communique indicated the broad support of the provinces for the program of voluntary restraint, and their own intentions, so far as their particular circumstances permit, to apply the proposals of the Prices and Incomes Commission within their own jurisdictions.

• (8:20 p.m.)

There was, of course, continued emphasis at the conference on the financial pressures facing provinces and municipalities, as projected in the report of the Tax Structure Committee. Much of this emphasis was naturally focused upon the sharing of tax resources. However, there was also evident a deeper awareness of the fact that the demands upon governments at all levels for new and improved services of all kinds—and from all parts of society—are outrunning the growth of revenues. This is the fundamental problem responsible for financial pressures upon governments. It is also true that the brunt of these demands has fallen upon the provinces and municipalities. Their expenditures have been rising rapidly as a percentage of the gross national product during the past dozen years, while those of the federal government, excluding transfers to the provinces, have remained relatively constant. However, there was a clear recognition that in an environment of erosive inflation it is necessary to contain these rising demands. Consequently, even though the projections of provincial budgets for 1970-71 showed a very large increase in potential deficits, most of the provinces indicated their intentions to do everything possible to reduce or eliminate the projected increases. The Ontario government is a particularly significant case in point, having in mind both the size of its budget and the predominant position of the Ontario economy in the total national picture. If Ontario is successful in achieving its stated objective of a balanced budget, the fiscal position of provincial and municipal governments in the aggregate should not be markedly different in 1970-71 from the position achieved in 1969-70. This is an important element in the national struggle to beat inflation.

Fiscal Prospects

What are the prospects for our fiscal position, given our present programs? My colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), has tabled the estimates of expenditure for the coming fiscal year. On the basis of these estimates, and making some modest allowance for contingencies, as well as for lapses in appropriations, I am forecasting budgetary expenditures in 1970-71 of some $12.9 billion. My colleague has drawn the attention of hon. members to the important part of the projected expenditure increase which consists of the items we share with the provinces and over whose magnitudes we do not have much control. Members are aware of our sustained effort to restrain the growth of expenditures over which we do have control, including those to which we attach a particularly high priority at the present time. We have given highest priority to such expenditures as those for regional expansion, for the development of bilingualism, for improvement of technology in industry and for improving the position of Indians and Eskimos.

Our budgetary revenues based on the existing tax law will be higher in 1970-71 than in the past year, as the economy continues to grow. But because growth will be slower our revenues will not be as buoyant as in the past year. The receipts from the corporate income tax will be particularly affected both by the lower levels of profits that we anticipate and by the fact that the revenues have already reflected most of the once-and-for-all gain from the speed-up of corporate tax payments. Moreover, as part of the program of restraint in price and cost increases we have postponed a number of increases in charges for government services, and the implementation of the air fares tax. We are forecasting revenues of $13.2 billion. We expect the budgetary surplus to be $300 million. This is to be compared with the surplus of $355 million in the current fiscal year noted above.

Our net non-budgetary cash requirements, apart from those arising from exchange transactions, are expected in 1970-71 to be approximately $775 million. Of this total, $100 million will arise from the cash outlay for the wheat inventory reduction program. Leaving this wheat item out of account in each year, the increase has been from about $650 million forecast last June for 1969-70 to about $675 million now forecast for 1970-71.

In fact, however, the net amount required for those non-budgetary purposes in 1969-70 has turned out to be much less, for several reasons as I have previously noted. A number of our lending programs, such as those for farm credit and international development, as well as the investment programs of our Crown companies, required less than we forecast. These changes, together with the substantial budgetary surplus, reduced our net cash requirements to an unexpected but welcome low level.

We cannot expect a similar reduction this year. While our estimated non-budgetary requirements include some allowance for contingencies, as they should, they also reflect increases in a number of firmly established programs of high priority. Among these increases are the following:

—nearly $150 million more for loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to assist in offsetting an expected decline in the flow of private funds into financing housing, to give more emphasis to low-cost rental housing, and to finance more municipal sewage plants urgently needed to reduce pollution;

—about $25 million more in mortgage funds for farm credit, chiefly to assist prairie farmers in readjusting to meet the new outlook for grains;

—about $40 million more for Atomic Energy of Canada to invest in advanced power plants and a large heavy water plant to meet the urgent shortage of that important material; —about $40 million more for loans to less developed countries as part of our external aid program;

—about $50 million more for loans for regional economic expansion, on which all of us place high priority.

As a result, the forecast total of our lending programs, net of repayments, will be increased from about $1,150 million in 1969-70 to about $1,675 million in 1970-71.

These loans are important uses of the nation's savings for investment purposes. However, their economic impact must be assessed, and they must be budgeted as carefully as expenditures. Moreover, they have important effects on our government financing program, and on the management of monetary policy.

Taking the projected budgetary surplus and net non-budgetary requirements together, our net cash requirements for the year 1970-71 are expected to be some $475 million—excluding amounts that may be required to finance foreign exchange transactions.

[Mr. Benson.]

• (8:30 p.m.)

In terms of the national income accounts, as compiled by the Bureau of Statistics in recent years and used by economists, we estimate that the federal government sector, excluding the Canada Pension Plan, has had a surplus of $570 million in 1969-70 and, on the forecasts I have given, would show a surplus of $180 million in 1970-71.

General Policy

It is evident that the federal government's fiscal position as a whole in 1970-71 will be exerting somewhat less restraint on the economy than in this year. In part this will be due to the emergency wheat inventory reduction program. I am satisfied that the measure will be in the interest of the nation as well as in the long-term interest of the wheat producers in Canada. In part the change in our fiscal position is due to expenditures, particularly the transfers to the provinces for health and education, rising somewhat more rapidly than revenues. It is also due to our increased lending programs for housing and farm credit where the capital market is not providing an adequate flow of private funds to meet the needs of balanced growth and development. In general, the fiscal effects of our operations will be better distributed regionally than last year. Our regional expansion expenditures, revenue equalization grants and other payments will be higher in the areas of less inflationary pressures. Our revenues, of course, are growing more rapidly where incomes are increasing more rapidly.

These forecasts are based upon expectations of lower rates of growth in employment and production, and an economy operating at a lower percentage of capacity than during 1969-70. If we could be concerned only with the pressure of total demands upon our productive capacity and markets, further action would not be necessary. However, there has been no slowing down in the rate of increase of prices and wages and other incomes. Costs continue to push prices up. Slower real growth has not yet reduced inflation. I sincerely expect it will do so as the year proceeds. The code of price behaviour arranged between the Prices and Incomes Commission and representatives of business and the professions, should assist materially in bringing about some reduction in the rate of price increases. We must give it a chance to take effect. We must also give organized labour time to decide whether and how it should join in some sort of agreed program to moderate the pressure of costs on prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: In these circumstances, I feel some additional specific restraints upon the economy are necessary to maintain the pressure against the price and cost increases. I am not proposing any tax increases in this budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: You have your white paper. What more do you need?

Mr. Benson: I am terribly upset that the opposition wanted tax increases which I have not provided. I am informed that this will be the first budget since 1913 in which there were no Ways and Means motions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When will be the next budget—in six months?

Mr. Benson: I am proposing, however, two measures of a special character that will help to implement our determination to bring inflation under control.

Proposals

The first concerns construction. This industry has been a leader in the inflationary spiral, even though the total volume of construction has not increased substantially since 1966. There are special characteristics of this industry which make it particularly prone to "cost-push" inflation. As a government we are encouraging the construction of housing on a large scale, and also industrial construction in those regions in need of expansion. We think both deserve priority in all parts of Canada. On the other hand we do not wish to aggravate the peculiarly inflationary situation in this industry—which was vividly in evidence last year. Last June we introduced a measure of mild restraint on commercial construction applying to the main urban areas of the three provinces of most rapid economic growth. This appears to have had some effect in deferring projects of lower priority or profitability, though it is hard to disentangle its effects from the many other influences at work.

The recent medium-term survey of the capital investment outlook published by the Economic Council forecasts a rapid expansion of commercial investment in 1970—a rate of increase several times that for business generally. This and other information leads me to the conclusion that we should maintain the force of the depreciation measure we introduced last June. Hon. members will recall that the right to claim depreciation for tax purposes was postponed for two years on commercial construction begun after budget night. The postponement applied only to construction costs incurred on these projects up to the end of 1970. Initially, then, it applied to work done within the following 18 months. However, now, in its present form, it applies only to work done in the nine months until the end of 1970. Consequently, the force of the measure has been reduced by the lapse of time. I am now proposing that, for projects commenced between tonight and the end of 1970, the postponement will apply to construction costs incurred up to the end of 1971. The effect of this change will be to restore approximately the same impact to the measure as it had when it was first introduced. It will apply only to buildings to which the original measure would have applied.

This decision will be implemented, as last year, by a regulation under the Income Tax Act.

The second action I propose is that Parliament enact a control over the terms of consumer credit similar to the act passed in another inflationary situation 20 years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: It would be a temporary anti-inflationary measure, intended, in the national interest, to safeguard the integrity of our currency. It would authorize the government to regulate the terms of credit extended to consumers by various kinds of lending institutions and merchants. It would apply to banks, sales finance companies, consumer loan companies and other lenders, and to department stores, automobile dealers and other merchants. In general, our intention would be to use this act to require a minimum down payment for large purchases being financed by credit extending for more than one year, and to limit the period over which such credits must be repaid. We would not propose to interfere with credit for small purchases—say under $100—nor with ordinary charge accounts, payable within 60 days, nor with revolving credit or budget accounts requiring regular monthly payments that would repay them within 12 months. It would not apply to outstanding loans or the terms of purchases already made on credit.

• (8:40 p.m.)

The purpose of the action proposed is to limit the growth of consumer expenditures in the present inflationary situation. We have in mind not only spending on durable goods but also on other goods and on services such as travel. In recent years the rate of increase of consumer expenditure has been stimulated and supported by substantial, though somewhat uneven, increases in consumer credit outstanding. I can well understand the smile of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who was threatened by a bomb yesterday, and he may not want to travel any more.

Mr. Speaker, the increase in consumer credit was particularly rapid in the first half of last year. It slowed down after mid-year because of the levelling out of unsecured personal loans by the banks, but the latest figures indicate that growth in consumer credit has been resumed. It now seems probable that the expansion of consumer spending this year will be reinforced by a large increase of credit unless some action is taken to check it. We believe that selective action along the lines proposed would be better than more general measures that would interfere with the flow of funds required for housing and for industrial and urban development in our country.

We do not intend to restrict loans for business purposes, including farming, or loans for the acquisition, construction or improvement of houses. Student loans for education would, of course, also be exempt.

It is difficult to forecast the quantitative effect on consumer expenditure of requiring specified down payments and limiting the period of repayment. We are planning to require down payments of 20 per cent where credit is extended for more than a year and to require repayment within 30 months for automobiles and 24 months for other purchases. We think these terms will have only a very moderate impact on the purchases of new cars which are already temporarily low just now. We think it will bear directly somewhat more heavily on other purchases particularly of durable goods and holiday trips. The reduction in spending will probably affect indirectly a wide variety of goods and services, as many consumers can be expected to divert their spending from less desired things in order to make the down payments on what they want most, and to pay off their credit more rapidly than they otherwise would. In all, we think that the total of consumer expenditures might be reduced by $300 million or $400 million a year, which is less than one per cent of the total of consumer purchases.

[Mr. Benson.]

In order that the legislation and regulations can properly take into account the variety of institutions and practices involved in extending credit to consumers, I intend to have my department consult with representatives of those who provide credit or sell on credit. I would expect the government to be in a position to introduce the legislation in about six or eight weeks.

I am not proposing any legislation on taxes or tariffs at this time. We will need to keep a close and continuing watch on the condition of the economy and particularly the success achieved in checking the rate of increase in prices and wages. Possibly legislation will be needed in the autumn. Meanwhile, I do not anticipate any lack of interest in any parliamentary discussion of the subject of taxation.

In regard to tariffs, I should say that since the last Budget I have received a number of requests for amendments to the Customs Tariff, some for increases and some for decreases. I have decided that I would not introduce any changes at this time. This will mean postponing any action on two reports in which the Tariff Board recommended higher duties—in one case on live turkeys, in another on polyethylene.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: How long?

An hon. Member: This budget is a real turkey.

Mr. Benson: I consider that this is not an appropriate time to propose even modest increases in protective tariffs in Canada. I will be prepared to take decisions on these reports at a later date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: I wish to make an important announcement concerning air and water pollution. We have permitted accelerated capital allowances under the Income Tax Act to encourage and assist industry to invest in structures or equipment for the primary purpose of preventing or reducing the pollution of Canadian waters. This section of the regulations expires December 31, 1970. We are now proposing to revise and extend it for another three years. Before it is necessary to extend it beyond 1973, I expect it will be reconsidered in the light of more general policies and programs in respect of pollution.

We have also decided in principle that we should grant a similar special allowance in respect of structures and equipment acquired after tonight primarily for the purpose of preventing or reducing air pollution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: In the case of air pollution, some need to minimize smoke and fumes, however, has usually been taken for granted and regarded as a normal cost of production, while other measures are undertaken in part to improve efficiency or to produce saleable by-products. Therefore, I wish to consider the details that should be included in a regulation on this subject and would welcome receiving the views of those concerned.

This concludes the proposals and announcements I wish to make. Since the proposed measure in regard to consumer credit will reduce consumer expenditures, it will also reduce our various revenues by about $50 million during this coming fiscal year. I do not expect the other proposed changes to have any significant effect on our revenues this coming year. Taking the $50 million into account will reduce our budgetary revenues in 1970-71 to $13,150 million and reduce the prospective budgetary surplus to $250 million.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would ask permission of the House first to insert in Hansard a small table giving the estimated yield of our main categories of budgetary and old age security revenues for 1969-70 and for 1970-71 and secondly, as in recent years, to include with the Budget Papers, as an appendix to Hansard, tables and explanatory notes giving the budget figures for 1968-69, 1969-70 and 1970-71 in terms of the national economic accounts in the form published by the Bureau of Statistics, together with a reconciliation with the budgetary accounts.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister's request agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[1]In the national accounts, budgetary appropriations to various funds and agencies are replaced by the expenditure actually made by these funds and agencies.

[2]This item mainly consists of revenue from sales of goods and services by the government. These sales appear as final expenditure of the private sector and are deducted to avoid double counting.

[3]This item includes the supplementary period adjustment. In the national accounts, expenditures on goods and services in the supplementary period are divided between adjacent fiscal years; most other expenditure are shifted entirely to the next fiscal year.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the reduction of $50 million in our revenues will also increase our net cash requirements for the year 1970-71 to some $525 million, excluding amounts that may be required to finance foreign exchange transactions.

While our prospective cash requirements for the next fiscal year are higher than those of the fiscal year now closing, I am confident they can be met in a manner consistent with our anti-inflationary policy. We shall, of course, have to enter the market from time to time if only to refund our maturing debt. Our cash balances at the beginning of the year will be about a billion dollars and can safely be reduced somewhat during the year. It should be possible again to raise funds by a Canada Savings Bond campaign.

I would expect that these factors, together with the improved state of the bond market and persistence in our anti-inflationary measures will make possible a smooth and successful debt management program this coming fiscal year.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize several simple points. First, we must continue with firm measures to accomplish our purpose in checking the rise in prices. This is essential in itself to convince those in the capital market, the labour market and the markets for goods and services that they should not expect inflation to continue year after year. Second, we must continue to do what we can to recognize the differences in the various parts of our country and the several sectors of our economy. Third, we must be flexible in our ability to respond to changes in the economic situation. The record of recent years proves that Parliament and the government can act promptly when that is necessary to meet new or changing circumstances.

The Budget—Hon. M. Lambert

• (8:50 p.m.)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks toward the end of his budget address, the minister when referring to tariffs spoke of live turkeys. I think he has one with this budget—it is a real turkey.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: A cold turkey.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Somehow or other we now come back to the philosophy enunciated by the previous Minister of Finance that we would have two budgets a year. Then the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said, "Oh, no; we are going to come back to one budget a year". So now we are back to two a year.

Mr. Benson: No.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am glad to hear the minister say that, because it will kill the 3 per cent surcharge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Unless there is another budget—and obviously the white paper will not come into force by January 1, 1971—the 3 per cent surcharge is gone for some time.

In any event, the minister indicated in a variety of ways that the Canadian economy is on a dangerous knife-edge. He pointed out, quite rightly, that there is a nagging problem of growing unemployment and no real signs of abatement in price increases. On the second page of his speech the minister talks about reductions in business capital expenditures. Some have been postponed, others have been dropped. I am referring to 1969. But the effect of those decisions will become evident in 1970 and 1971. This is what we are concerned with.

There has been a fall in profits per unit of output which has accompanied this change in investment plans. Manufacturers' inventories have increased. Housing starts, which were at a high level in 1969, have now declined dramatically. If hon. members across the way cast their minds back to the conditions in 1956 and mid-1957, they will remember there was at that time a serious accumulation in manufacturers' inventories. We saw a decline in investment plans, and housing in mid-1957 came to a complete stop.

An hon. Member: Now we have pollution.

[Mr. Benson.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Those were the conditions, and the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) might as well cast his mind back to that time. In 1956-57 we were on the eve of a period of recession. The symptoms were all there in 1956 and 1957, and all but those who wanted to be blind could see what was happening. And it did happen.

This is why at this stage, when the government and the country are fighting inflation, we are caught with these nagging symptoms of malaise in the Canadian economy. How ironic it is, Mr. Speaker. I know that this is a joke for many lighthearted people who have never had to face one of these problems before, but how ironic it is that today all Canadians should be forced to concentrate their efforts on fighting inflation after the sloth and idleness in the past four or five years by this administration and its predecessor.

Many of the members of the present administration were members of the preceding one. They had it pointed out to them on many occasions from all sides that because of the lack of priority in spending programs, its unilateral action with regard to certain joint programs would force the federal government and the provinces into a straitjacket. This is what we have now. The minister speaks about it on page 5 where he says:

> This is the fundamental problem responsible for financial pressures upon governments.

Further on on the same page he says:

> My colleague has drawn the attention of hon. members to the important part of the projected expenditure increase which consists of the items we share with the provinces and over whose magnitudes we do not have much control.

This is precisely so. The tax structure committee told the conference two weeks ago that the federal government and the provinces will face an additional expenditure of $1.75 billion by 1972 as a result of four joint programs, three of them rammed willy-nilly down the throats of the provinces. We are fighting the wrong war at the present time, but it is a battle caused by the maladministration of those on the other side of the Chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The monetary and fiscal measures used so far by the government have brought us to the present point, growing unemployment but no real effect on prices and interest rates. As a matter of fact, it is rather ironic—

An hon. Member: What would you do?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What would you do? It is the government that has caused this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is rather ironic that while the government and the Prices and Incomes Commission were holding their conference a few weeks ago, a number of trust companies increased the interest rate on their deposit certificates. Was that a downturn for interest rates? Not at all. As a matter of fact, that was an indication to the government that the public is not yet satisfied that there has been control of inflation. So now we are faced with the highest peacetime taxes merely to meet expenditures—not to reduce the national debt, not to fight inflation, but merely to meet expenditures.

This year expenditures go up some $900 million. Last year they went up $900 million. That is not controlling expenditures. If there were to be control, if there were to be a real fight against inflation by fiscal measures, we would be taxing to defeat inflation, not merely to catch up with the bills that are coming in to the government. In addition to that the minister proposes certain consumer credit controls on certain types of credit transactions, based on amount and the length of repayment. But what are we going to get, Mr. Speaker? The main effect of these consumer credit controls is going to be on durables, automobiles, furniture, white hardware, refrigerators, freezers, washing machines, dryers, ironers, television sets, motorized ski vehicles, boats and trailers, whether they are of the camping or living accommodation type. And where are most of these things made, Mr. Speaker? They are made in Ontario and in Quebec. All of this is designed to reduce consumption of them. The only thing that is at the end of that road is unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is the only thing that is at the end of that road in those industries, depending on the effectiveness of these controls. We know that last year Ontario felt the attention of the Minister of Finance in his June Budget. It was one of the areas selected for cooling off certain types of construction. That is now being continued. But look at Quebec. Last time we were told that there was too much unemployment in Quebec, and that this was not the area in which to impose controls. As a matter of fact, it was indicated that the minister's colleague, through regional expansion and development, would pay particular attention to encouraging development in the province of Quebec. If we look at the amount of loans, and grants and so forth that we made under this program, Quebec is certainly getting the lion's share of that program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is so. The problem is there.

An hon. Member: Per capita?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Of course, by far per capita. Now look at what the effect will be of these consumer credit controls. What is manufactured in Quebec in great quantities? Furniture, white hardware—

An hon. Member: Liberals.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —motorized ski vehicles, boats and trailers. Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to wager that the effect of the consumer credit controls, in so far as they will be effective in reducing consumption in these lines I have mentioned, will be worse in the province of Quebec than in Ontario. So we have the paradox of one minister working to develop the province and the other minister clamping down on it.

The Minister of Finance had an opportunity to assist the province of Quebec and certain parts of Eastern Ontario. There was a recommendation with regard to tariffs on the materials used by textile manufacturers in this country, to allow them a reduction in tariffs in order that they might compete more effectively with imported goods. And what was done? Nothing.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This would have cost the minister relatively little. After all, last June he supported all of the tariff cuts negotiated under the Kennedy Agreement.

Mr. Benson: And you are against it?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, no. This is what the minister did in order to assist in the fight against inflation, but when we are dealing with unemployment in particular provinces, in eastern Ontario and in Quebec, particularly so far as textiles are concerned, here was a golden opportunity to do something and nothing was done.

The Budget—Hon. M. Lambert

Mr. Speaker, there is a strange paradox in the tables put forward by the minister. He estimates an increase of some $20 million under customs tariffs revenue for this coming year, despite the major reductions in tariffs contained in the last budget, which presumably were going to reduce the price of goods to the consumer. Yet we are now going to see more customs revenues.

Mr. Benson: That is prosperity.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Prosperity nothing! That merely means more imports. It means a further increase in imports in competition with Canadian industry. That means more unemployment. Lower tariffs rates mean we will have a much greater volume of imports. That is a simple conclusion—a greater volume of imports.

Mr. Benson: And exports.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But strangely enough, when you bring in imported goods you bring in the other fellow's inflation. With the other chap's imported goods you bring in his inflation, so to the extent that it fights inflation this move is not as effective as it could be, or as it may be thought to be. Of course, there is an old saw that nothing is entirely bad, and I would commend the minister without reservation with regard to the provisions in the budget for an extension of the taxing provisions concerning water pollution and the introduction of some measures as yet undefined for air pollution control. I think there may be some problems with regard to air pollution control incentives, but I feel the minister deserves full marks in this respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But having said that, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —I think this budget has one major omission. I know it has many, but the major one is that there has been no provision at all for the lower income groups.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And I mean particularly those old age pensioners who qualify for a guaranteed income supplement.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Basford: You want to tax their clothing?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) wants to wake up.

An hon. Member: He has to grow up before he can wake up.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if there had been an increase in the GIS of, say, $200 or $300—after all, the government chairman of the committee on poverty announced yesterday as a matter of certainty that there would be an increase—you are not giving him a very good track record for predictions. At least about 50 per cent of old age pension recipients receive, on the present scale, some portion of GIS. Now the 2 per cent increase that they get under the old age security formula is not sufficient to take care of what has happened in regard to the cost of living. In all seriousness I would suggest to the minister, and I know he is fighting inflation, that these are not the people who are causing it. He said this himself in the Finance Committee the other day. This would be a minor transfer—I am not talking about many millions of dollars—to those recipients of GIS to give them some relief.

The minister's proposals with regard to tax exemptions in the lower income groups are at least two years away. Let the minister sit down with pencil and paper and a calendar and study the mechanics of this measure, and he will see that considering the time needed to get legislation drafted, into this House, considered in the other place, and so on, it cannot be effective by January 1 next. That is what I am considering, to give this relief to these people between now and 1972. The same thing could be done with what you would call the working poor through a form of tax credit. My leader has talked about this and we have given figures on it. The minister has it right there and he is talking about budgetary surpluses—

An hon. Member: He doesn't understand that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With $150 million to $175 million we could take care of most of the proposals of which he has spoken. I am not going to complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker, but I just want to finish with this point: The hon. member for Calgary South

(Mr. Mahoney), the seer of the Prairies, the land where the hot winds blow, makes a remark but I shall go on. If we analyse the budgetary surplus for this year, we will see that it is composed of a lot of one-year windfalls.

Mr. Benson: What about next year?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): First of all there was a hurry-up or advance in corporate tax payments. If my memory serves me right, that accounts for about $200 million, and that is only for last year. Then let us look at that portion of the social development tax which was not expended for medicare, part of the year in the province of Ontario, a part for the province of Alberta, all of the year for New Brunswick, all of it for Prince Edward Island and all of last year, plus until next July for the province of Quebec. These are moneys which are not being spent for the purpose for which they were collected. If I were able to collect taxes and not spend them, of course I could build up a surplus. But as soon as these programs come into force in the provinces we will see what happens to the surplus and if there has to be a further tax increase. Of course there has to be. The minister has a built-in tax increase of at least $600 million in his white paper, on his figures and, on figures equally as trustworthy, up to double that amount. Even if we put it half way between, we get to $900 million additional taxes by the end of five years.

Mr. Speaker, may I adjourn the debate?

On motion of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Olson the House adjourned at 9.19 p.m.

BUDGET PAPERS

presented by the Honourable Edgar J. Benson, M.P., Minister of Finance
for the information of Parliament in connection with the Budget for 1970-71

FOREWORD

The purpose of these Papers is twofold:

1. to present a general economic review of 1969, bringing together in one place and in convenient form some of the more comprehensive indicators of economic conditions prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the Bank of Canada and other government agencies, together with some comments;

2. to present a preliminary review of the Government Accounts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1970.

PART I

ECONOMIC WHITE PAPER FOR 1970

THE HIGHLIGHTS OF THE YEAR 1969

In 1969, consumer prices rose more rapidly than in any year since the Korean war inflation of 1951. Inflation has been the chief concern of public opinion and national policy throughout the year and continues to have priority.

Both fiscal and monetary policy have been restrictive in the past year. The strategy has been to slow the growth in demand by government and by the private sector. The retarded growth in demand is expected to make it more difficult to pass increases in costs through to final buyers. This difficulty in turn is expected to diminish the willingness and ability of producers to accept increases in costs. The Prices and Incomes Commission has been developing its program to assist in restraining increases in costs and prices. If cost increases can be restrained until the growth of productivity establishes adequate support for the present high levels of income, and if price increases can be restrained while the remaining demand pressures die out, then orderly, balanced growth of supply and demand without price increases may proceed. This way of subduing inflation permits an adjustment that is more equitable, since all share in it, that is quicker and that affords a higher level of total real output than the alternative way of very severe restrictions of demand, which force some members of the labour force to accept a loss of earnings for a period of time, and which bear more heavily on the less prosperous regions of the country.

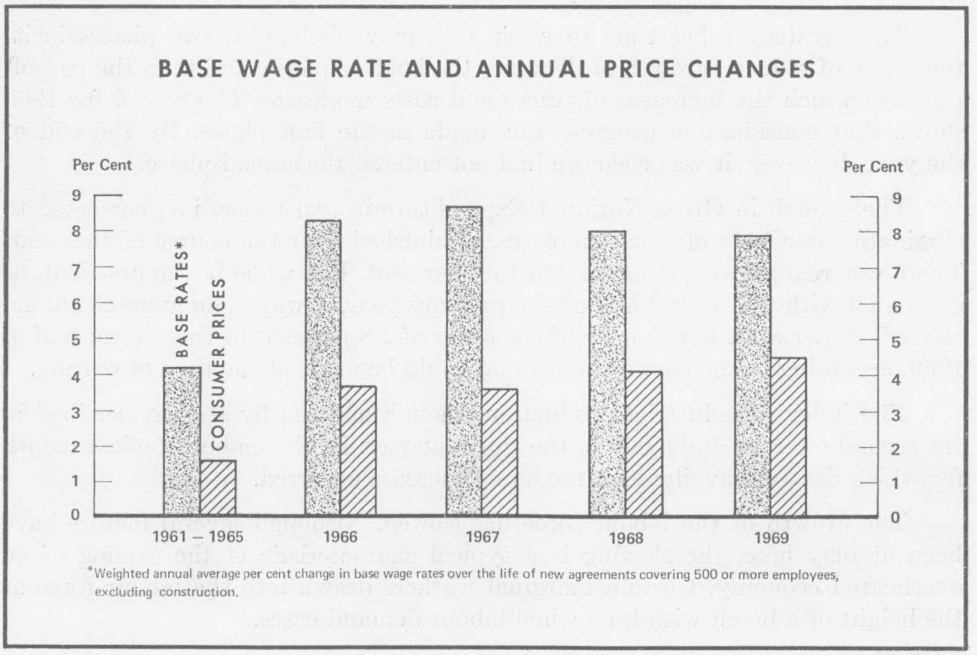
This strategy takes time to work. One may distinguish two phases in it: the phase of reduced growth of demand, the holding phase, and then the pay-off phase in which the increases of prices and costs moderate. The record for 1969 shows that considerable progress was made in the first phase. By the end of the year, however, it was clear we had not entered the second phase.

The growth in Gross National Expenditure in real terms, i.e., corrected to eliminate the effects of price increases, diminished over the course of the year. There was real growth; it amounted to 5 per cent. But while in the first half, as compared with the second half of the previous year, it was at an average annual rate of 5.9 per cent, it was only of the order of 2.8 per cent in the second half of 1969, according to the best estimate that could be made at the time of writing.

The index of industrial production, though affected by strikes, declined in the second quarter, and again in the third quarter. In November, the last month for which data are available, a moderate increase occurred.

The growth of the labour force has slowed. Although several factors have been at play here, the slowing is a typical characteristic of the cooling of an overheated economy. Certain marginal workers drawn into the labour force at the height of a boom withdraw when labour demand eases.

There has also been a slowing in the growth of employment. However, because the labour force, too, has been growing more slowly, the unemployment rate for December 1969 was the same as for December 1968.



Profits have weakened in the course of the year; in fact, on last reading they were falling substantially after rising vigorously in 1968.

Thus, while there are still some strong forces of demand in the economy, such as the demand for capital structures and equipment, the evidence is mounting of a slowing of the overall growth of demand and a reduction of the capacity to pass cost increases forward.

On the other hand, costs and prices are still rising very rapidly. Wage settlements have on the average exceeded productivity gains by a wider margin than in 1968. The increase in the consumer price index from December 1968 to December 1969 was 4.6 per cent. The average value of the GNE price deflator for 1969 was some 4.3 per cent above that for 1968.

All sections of the economy have felt the effects of price increases. In fact, the data do not reveal any substantial differences in the price averages among regions. However, not all regions have had equally high levels of employment, output or demand for goods and services. The government recognizes these differences and policies have been followed which seek to restrain certain classes of expenditures in areas where these were expected to be particularly strong, while other policies have sought to ameliorate the effects of the general policies of restraint in areas where the inflationary impetus is less marked.

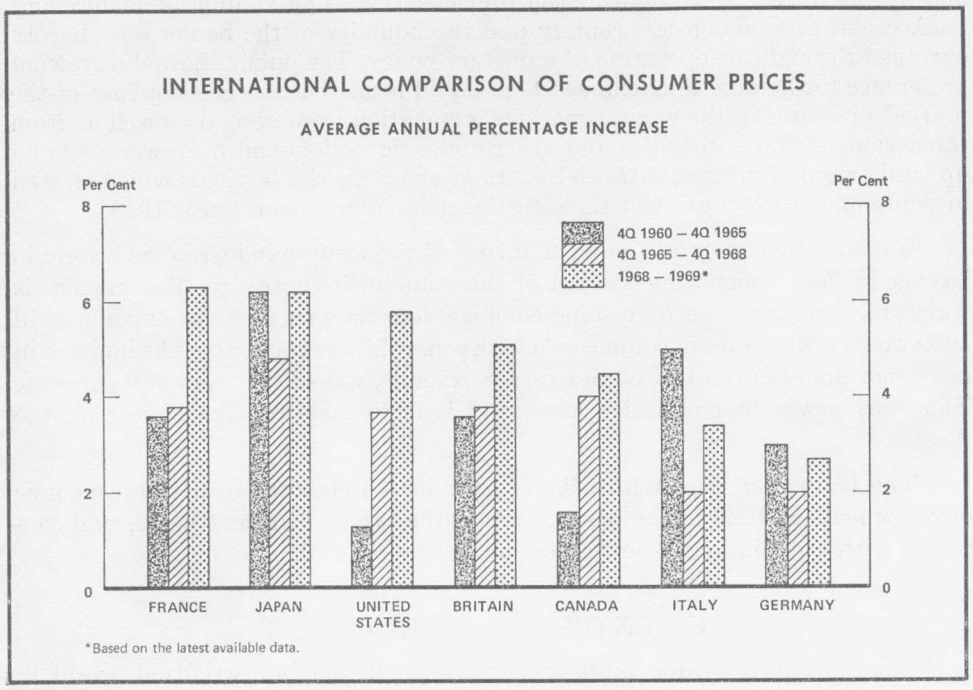
The financial markets absorbed a smaller volume of new issues of bonds and stocks during 1969 than in the previous year. The volume of money and bank credit grew much less rapidly and the liquidity of the banks was sharply curtailed through the operation of monetary policy. The public showed a growing preference for holding financial assets in liquid form. The net consequence of the myriad pressures in the capital markets, emanating from abroad as well as from the actions of the authorities and other domestic lenders and borrowers, was an upward sweep of interest rates to historic peaks. This rise in yields which started in September 1968 continued through the end of the calendar year 1969.

Canada is not unique among countries of the western industrialized world in having to face a menacing erosion of the value of its currency. The malaise is widespread, and we can take some comfort from the fact that our experience in 1969 was not the worst in comparison with some of these countries. The increase in consumer prices in the United States, for example, was of the order of 6 per cent. This fact serves to emphasize how vital it is to maintain the attack on the disease.

The balance of this White Paper contains an elaboration of the economic developments in 1969 in the perspective of the events of recent years, and concludes with a preliminary view about prospects for 1970.

THE EXTERNAL ENVIRONMENT



Inflationary pressures intensified throughout the industrialized world in 1969. Consumer prices in most major countries rose at rates between 4½ per cent and 6 per cent. The rises were smaller in Germany and Italy, but in these countries pronounced increases in wage settlements are viewed as the harbingers of accelerated price increases. The rise in prices in the United States was greater than in any year since the Korean war. The moderation hoped for in the North American trend of prices had not appeared by the turn of the year. The pervasiveness of inflation throughout the industrialized world is illustrated in Chart 2.

The volume of world output remained high in 1969, though its growth slowed to about 5 per cent in the OECD countries[1]. This slowing reflected the gradual impact of anti-inflationary policies in North America and Britain and the attainment of capacity production in much of Continental Europe. Fiscal and monetary policies reinforced each other in the fight against inflation in North America and Britain. Elsewhere, countries started tightening credit conditions significantly, not only to restrain demand but also to defend official reserves against the effects of the massive flows of funds during much of 1969 to Germany and, via the Eurodollar market, to the United States. By early 1970, interest rates throughout much of the industrialized world had reached their highest levels in modern times.

Despite uncertainties over exchange parities, which prevailed until late last year, world trade continued to grow at a greater pace than expected. Exports of OECD countries were about 16 per cent higher than in 1968, a rate of increase nearly double the average of the previous decade. The war in Vietnam and the U.S. investment boom continued to stimulate burgeoning world trade. However, the major stimulus last year was the economic expansion in Continental Europe and Japan.

Expansion in these areas, during a period of gradual slowing in the North American and British economies, was one major factor behind the better balance in the international structure of current payments which became increasingly evident in the latter part of the year. In Britain, too, the combination of the 1967 devaluation and the subsequent fiscal and monetary restraints brought about a marked improvement in the balance of payments. This appears to bring within reach the British target of a U.S. $1.2 billion surplus on current and long-term capital account during the twelve months ending March 31, 1970, and has enabled a start to be made on the repayment of short-term debt. The United States' current balance showed definite signs of an upturn in the latter half of last year, though it still fell far short of a level comparable to its 1960–67 average of over U.S. $3.2 billion. Japan's rapid economic growth has not yet strained its productive capacity, and indeed, has been accompanied by a relative decline in the Japanese propensity to import. The combination of the French and German parity changes has started to work towards a reduction in their payments imbalances. The devaluation of the franc in August and the revaluation of the mark last October have been followed by a very substantial reflux of speculative funds from Germany. There has been a fundamental calming in exchange markets and international payments flows in recent months.

The dramatic increases in international trade and capital flows in recent years have been the mark of a growing economic interdependence in the world community. International monetary co-operation has continued to respond to the problems posed by this evolution. Five years of study and negotiations have resulted in approval of a new international reserve asset to supplement gold and U.S. dollars. The decision by the International Monetary Fund to activate U.S. $9.5 billion in Special Drawing Rights during 1970–72 has helped to ensure that international liquidity will expand appropriately to support further growth in world trade and payments. The amount allocated to the 104 participants in the scheme on January 1, 1970, was $3.4 billion, in proportion to their quotas in the IMF; an additional $3 billion will be allocated in each of the next two years. The first year allocation represents a 4.5 per cent increase over present global reserves of about $75 billion. The historic principle accepted in the new SDR scheme is that there should be deliberate control over the world's supply of reserves through a permanent new fiduciary system.

The price of gold in the free market has fallen back to the neighbourhood of the official price of $35 an ounce from its earlier highs of more than $43 an ounce, as a result of renewed confidence that the monetary price of gold will be maintained and because of the very high yields available on alternative investments. Late in 1969, arrangements for the orderly marketing of South African gold were agreed upon under the auspices of the IMF.

The fifth quinquennial review of quotas in the IMF has resulted in proposals to increase their total by 35.7 per cent. This will keep the financial growth of the Fund in line with the increasing demand made on it. The proposed individual quotas reflect members' changing positions in the world economy and maintain an undiminished share of quotas for the less developed nations in the IMF. (The Canadian quota will increase from U.S. $740 million to U.S. $1.1 billion.)

These responses to the problems of the international monetary system improve the prospects for orderly growth of trade. But the pressing problem of inflation remains. While this problem is now widespread, particular importance attaches to its solution in the United States.

In the United States last year the rate of growth of real output slowed down while that of prices speeded up; by the last quarter of the year real output had in fact ceased to grow while price rises showed no clear sign of slowing. In December 1969 the consumer price index was 6.1 per cent higher than a year earlier.

Most components of demand shared in the deceleration of real growth in the second half of the year. The spending of the U.S. federal government on goods and services levelled out, as a result of a reduction of expenditures related to the Vietnam war and of restrictions in other areas of the military budget. State and local governments have encountered increasing difficulty in borrowing. Residential construction expenditures have been declining since early last year, as restrictive credit policy has made it more difficult for some buyers and builders to raise mortgage money. There has been continued buoyancy in personal spending on non-durable goods and services, but purchases of automobiles and other durable goods softened noticeably in the second half. The advance in retail trade was sluggish, inventories grew and some production cut-backs occurred. After falling sharply in the first half, the ratio of personal saving to income after taxes increased in the latter half of 1969. Surveys at the end of the year indicated a mood of caution among consumers. In real terms, business investment in plant and equipment in the second half of 1969 was running about 7 per cent above the rate in the second half of 1968. Successive surveys late last year showed higher investment intentions for 1970. The explanations offered included fear of higher prices of capital goods.

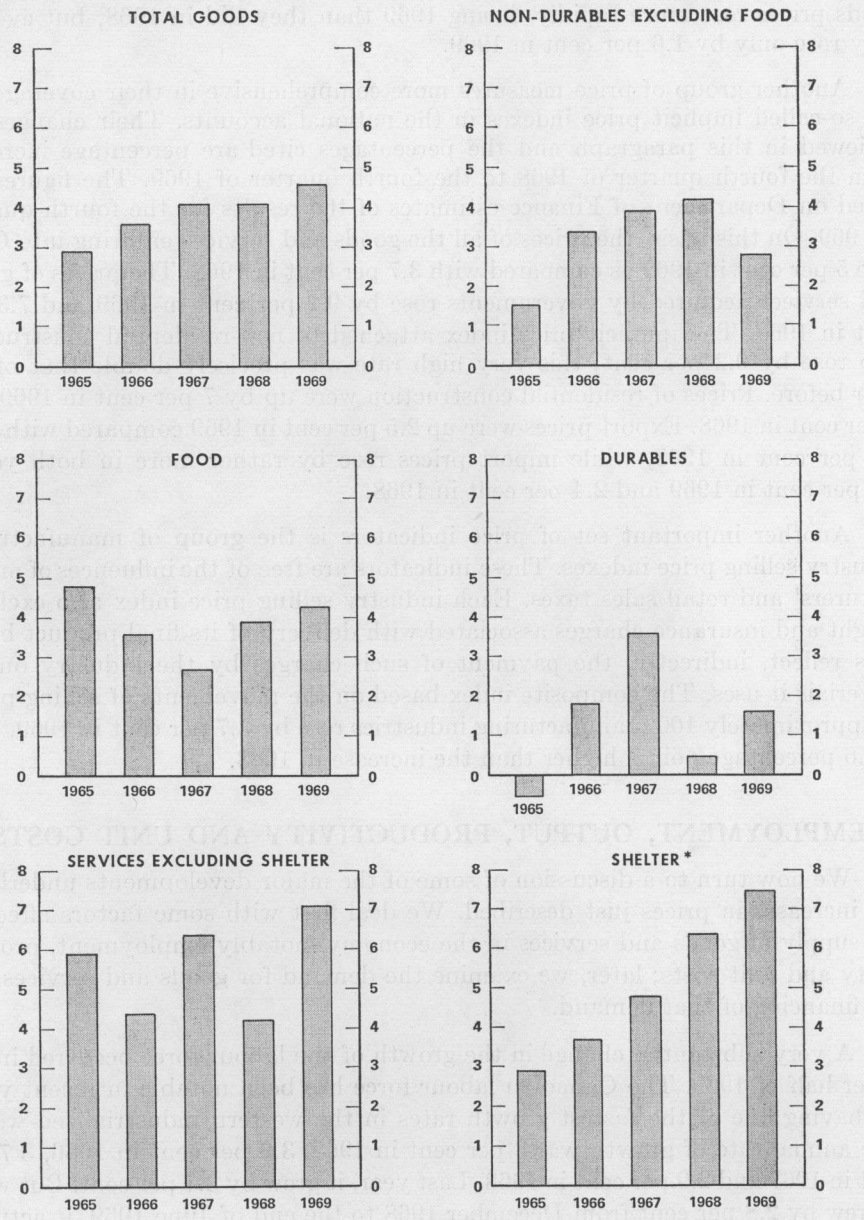
Productivity in the U.S. economy was no higher in 1969 than it had been in 1968. Average earnings continued to increase at a rapid rate, however, and so wage costs per unit of output rose more rapidly. This development, in turn, was reflected in the high rates of price increase in 1969 and the decline in profits per unit of output. In 1970 negotiations will take place on a large number of key wage settlements.

American fiscal and monetary policies were restrictive in 1969, and the effects could be seen in the decline in the growth of demand and production. As in Canada, the results in terms of moderating increases in prices and costs have yet to become evident.

PRICES



We have stated that inflation was our most pressing economic problem in 1969, and that it is a widespread phenomenon. The purpose of this chapter is to provide more detail on the price movements of the last year, before reviewing the underlying cost and demand developments.

Consider first the consumer price index, one of our most widely used indicators of price trends. Figures in this paragraph relate to the percentage changes from December 1968 to December 1969. In this period the total index advanced 4.6 per cent. Over the previous 12 months the advance was 4.1 per cent. Some items in the consumer's standard selection of goods and services rose in price much more rapidly than others. The cost of shelter increased considerably more than any other component; its advance accelerated sharply in 1969, reaching the very high rate of 7.5 per cent, more than a full percentage point greater than the increase during 1968. Shelter costs include such items as rentals, prices of new houses, and related financing and maintenance. The increase in the cost of services (excluding shelter), reflecting closely the increases of wages in the economy, was almost as great as that of shelter, but the acceleration was very much greater. Service prices were up 7.1 per cent during 1969, which is almost three percentage points higher than in the previous year. Notable among the service items where prices increased rapidly were local transportation, rail fares, theatre admissions, postage, and household help. Shelter costs have a weight of 18 per cent in the total consumer price index; costs of services have a weight of 13 per cent. Food prices, though they moved irregularly during the past year, registered a total advance over the year of 4.3 per cent, compared with 3.9 per cent in the previous year. A point of considerable note is that the cost of goods in the consumer's basket, other than food, rose by only 2.5 per cent, which was significantly less than the increase of 3.3 per cent in the previous year. Within this group the slowing down was confined to the non-durables category, which rose by only 2.8 per cent in 1969 compared to 4.2 per cent in 1968. Durable goods prices rose more rapidly during 1969 than they did in 1968, but even so they rose only by 1.6 per cent in 1969.

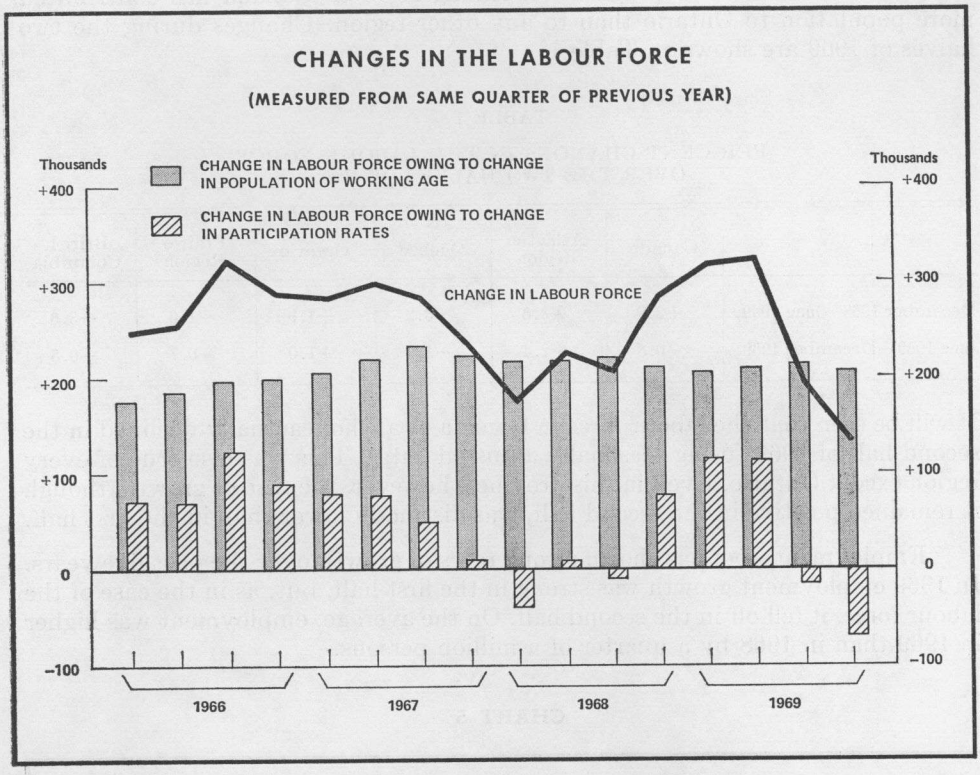
Another group of price measures more comprehensive in their coverage are the so-called implicit price indexes in the national accounts. Their changes are reviewed in this paragraph and the percentages cited are percentage increases from the fourth quarter of 1968 to the fourth quarter of 1969. The figures are based on Department of Finance estimates of the results for the fourth quarter of 1969. On this basis, the prices of all the goods and services entering into GNE rose 5 per cent in 1969 as compared with 3.7 per cent in 1968. The prices of goods and services acquired by governments rose by 9.2 per cent in 1969 and 7.3 per cent in 1968. The implicit price index attached to non-residential construction also rose by 9.2 per cent; this very high rate was precisely double that of the year before. Prices of residential construction were up by 7 per cent in 1969 and 6 per cent in 1968. Export prices were up 2.5 per cent in 1969 compared with only 0.9 per cent in 1968, while import prices rose by rather more in both years: 3.3 per cent in 1969 and 2.4 per cent in 1968.



Another important set of price indicators is the group of manufacturing industry selling price indexes. These indicators are free of the influences of manufacturers' and retail sales taxes. Each industry selling price index also excludes freight and insurance charges associated with delivery of its final product but it does reflect, indirectly, the payment of such charges by the industry on the materials it uses. The composite index based on the movements of selling prices of approximately 100 manufacturing industries rose by 3.7 per cent in 1969. This is 1.6 percentage points higher than the increase in 1968.

EMPLOYMENT, OUTPUT, PRODUCTIVITY AND UNIT COSTS

We now turn to a discussion of some of the major developments underlying the increases in prices just described. We deal first with some factors affecting the supply of goods and services in the economy, notably employment, productivity and unit costs; later, we examine the demand for goods and services and the financing of that demand.

A very substantial change in the growth of the labour force occurred in the latter half of 1969. The Canadian labour force has been notable in recent years for having one of the fastest growth rates in the western industrialized world. The annual rate of growth was 3 per cent in 1965, 3.9 per cent in 1966, 3.7 per cent in 1967 and 2.9 per cent in 1968. Last year, it grew by 3.1 per cent. But while it grew by 2.8 per cent from December 1968 to the end of June 1969, it actually declined by 0.8 per cent from June to the end of the year. (Year-over-year changes by months may be found in reference table 26.)

The changes in the labour force may be viewed as due to changes in the size of the population aged 14 and over, on the one hand, and to changes in the proportion of that population which belongs to the labour force—changes in the participation rate—on the other. Changes in the labour force due to each of these components of change are depicted in Chart 4. In this chart, the changes for each quarter are measured against the comparable quarter of the previous year. The changes due to growth in the population have been fairly regular. On the other hand, changes due to movements in the participation rate show a distinct cyclical pattern. The rate fell during the brief slowdown of 1967, and then picked up after the pace of economic activity quickened once again. In 1969, in the second half, with the slowdown in the rate of expansion the participation rate fell off sharply and induced a very pronounced decline in the growth of the labour force. This development, as was observed earlier, was one of the pieces of evidence of a slowing pace of economic activity in Canada during the last half of 1969.

Regionally, the growth of the labour force in the last five years has been greatest in British Columbia and least in the Atlantic and prairie provinces. There is a continuing net migration of population from both of these latter regions. The growth in Quebec has been slightly below the national average, and the growth in Ontario slightly above. Immigration to Canada has contributed more population to Ontario than to any other region. Changes during the two halves of 1969 are shown in Table 1.

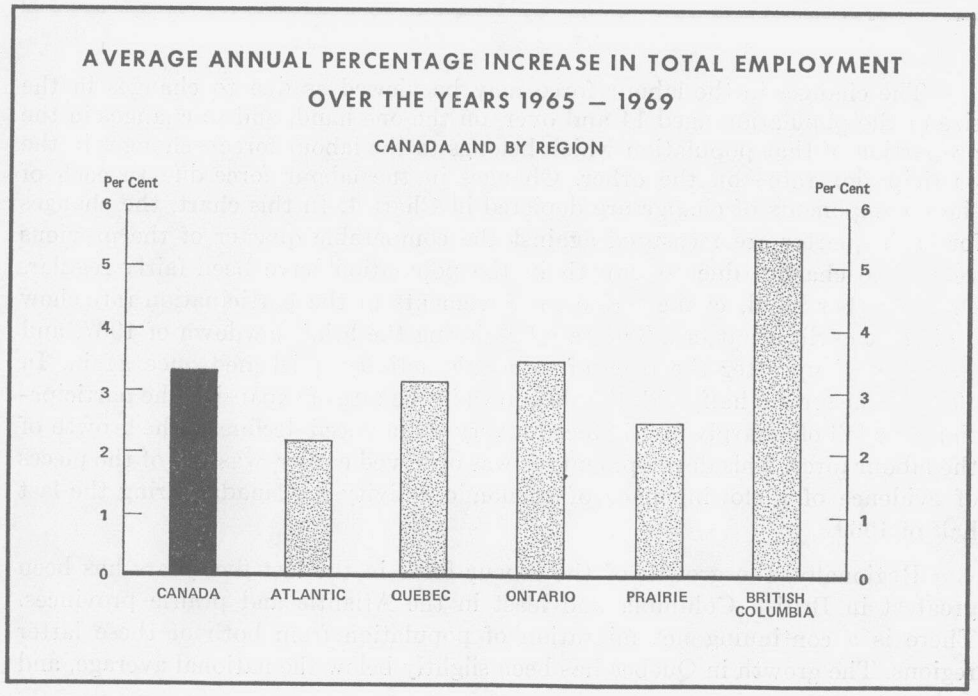
TABLE 1



PER CENT CHANGES IN THE LABOUR FORCE OVER THE TWO HALVES OF 1969

	Canada	Atlantic Region	Quebec	Ontario	Prairie Region	British Columbia

June 1969—December 1969..	−0.8	−2.4	−1.6	+1.0	−0.7	−0.5

It will be seen that the labour force in Canada as a whole actually declined in the second half of 1969 (using seasonally adjusted data). This was also true of every region except Ontario. Even in this province, however, the rate of growth, though it remained positive in the second half, was distinctly lower than in the first half.

Employment, too, has shown strong rates of growth over the past five years. In 1969 employment growth was strong in the first half, but, as in the case of the labour force, it fell off in the second half. On the average, employment was higher in 1969 than in 1968 by a quarter of a million persons.

CHART 5

The strong increase in employment over the last five years has been shared, in varying degrees, by all of Canada's regions, as Chart 5 reveals. In British Columbia, with its rapidly expanding economy, the growth rate of employment was almost double the national rate. Employment in Ontario and Quebec grew at about the national average, while growth in the Atlantic and prairie regions was moderately lower. These lower rates perhaps reflect the relatively larger proportion of primary industries with slower rates of employment growth in the industrial structure of these regions. In 1969, with the exception of the prairie region, all regions experienced employment growth well in excess of the previous year. The present state of the world wheat market has had a significant impact on the economies of both Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The deceleration in the growth in employment opportunities in both of these two prairie provinces was not matched in Alberta, where employment accelerated.

Since mid-year the level of employment, like the level of the labour force, has fallen moderately in all regions of the country save Ontario. In Ontario the rate of growth of employment was distinctly lower in the latter half of 1969 than in the first half.

The unemployment rate in Canada in the last two years has been slightly more than a percentage point higher than in 1966, and a little more than half a point higher than in 1967. The averages for the years 1968 and 1969 were virtually the same, marginally lower in 1969 (4.7 per cent) than in 1968. Chart 6 shows the national and regional unemployment rates. Average unemployment rates for 1969 were higher than in 1968 in the Atlantic region and Quebec, lower in Ontario and British Columbia, and about the same in the prairie region. Chart 7 compares the unemployment rates in the regions with the national average in yet another way. In this chart the pattern of development over the period is particularly noteworthy in the Atlantic region where many regional development programs have been intensified in recent years.

During the course of 1969, in Canada taken as a whole, the decline in the labour force overtook the more moderate decline in employment in the last quarter of the year and consequently unemployment rates registered declines. This was also true in all regions save Ontario and British Columbia, where the unemployment rates were somewhat higher than in the third quarter. (See reference table 32.)

Let us now analyze the relationships between output, employment, incomes, costs and prices during the 1960s.

During the first half of the decade, when economic slack was being taken up, real output in the total economy increased more rapidly than in the second half (see Chart 8). Real output per worker increased nearly twice as fast in the early years as it did during the later 1960s. At the same time, average earnings rose more rapidly in the second half of the decade than in the first half, so that wage and salary costs per unit of output rose more in the latter half of the 1960s. Table 2 illustrates these developments.

The table below shows rates of increase by these broad categories of incomes and costs, and the relative contribution of each category to the total increase. The figures are based upon broad aggregates and describe general trends and developments. More detailed calculations yield figures which are slightly different, but the trends are broadly similar.

This table shows that in the period 1961-1965 unit wage and salary costs increased at an average rate of 2 per cent annually, slightly less than the average price increase of 2.3 per cent. This accounted for about one-half (1.1 percentage points) of the total increase in prices. Corporate profits per unit of output rose more rapidly (5.9 per cent per annum) and accounted for about one-third of the total price increase. By contrast, in the period 1965-1969, unit wage and salary costs accelerated to an average annual rate of 5.8 per cent, compared with an annual increase in prices of 4 per cent, and accounted for about three-quarters (3.1 percentage points) of the total rise in prices. During this time there was little change in corporate profits per unit of output.

In the more recent period, 1968-1969, there have been a number of significant developments. In 1968, output per worker in the economy as a whole increased at a rate slightly above the average achieved in the latter half of the decade, while unit wage and salary costs increased by 4 per cent, the same rate as the general price level. In that year there was a substantial increase in profits, so that profits per unit of output rose more rapidly than the general price level. Taken together, the other elements contributing to the change of prices did not increase as rapidly as the general price level. In 1969, however, the increase in output per worker was less than in 1968, while average wages[1] rose faster than in the previous year, so that unit wage and salary costs accelerated to 6.3 per cent. Meanwhile, the increase in profits for the year 1969 as a whole was less than in 1968, and profits per unit of output rose less than the general price level. In the course of the year, total profits began to turn down and unit profits showed a marked decline (see Chart 9).

[1] Total wage and salary bill divided by the number of employees (labour force basis).

For a more precise analysis of costs, movements in the so-called "commercial non-farm sector" are of interest. These industries account for four-fifths of the output in the economy and are subject to fairly accurate output, productivity and unit cost measurements. Variations in agricultural output arising from year-to-year weather differences can bring about changes in total output and costs which obscure underlying trends in the rest of the economy. In addition, it is difficult to measure productivity in the public administration, community and personal services industries. Output in the agricultural and non-profit service industries has therefore been separated from total output to permit analysis of the commercial non-farm sector. Using the concept commercial non-farm real output also permits analysis as between the various goods-producing and service-producing industries in the economy (see reference tables 34 to 38).

Productivity in the goods-producing industries has been growing much more rapidly than in the service-producing industries. While differences in productivity growth may reflect the difficulties of measuring output in the service industries, it is of significance for developments in costs and prices. To the extent that increases in incomes in those industries where productivity is rising rapidly are emulated in industries where productivity gains are smaller, there will be an upward push on total costs. Complete data for 1969 are not yet available, but preliminary information strongly suggests that costs rose much more rapidly in the service-producing sector than in goods-producing industries. This development appears to have been brought about by broadly similar increases in earnings in both groups of industries, at a time when output per worker in the goods sector was increasing at about average rates, and when in the service sector there may well have been a decline in output per worker.

SPENDING AND FINANCING BY SECTOR

Personal sector

Personal income, including wages and salaries as well as earnings of unincorporated businessmen and farmers, increased by 10.5 per cent in 1969. Even after deducting personal direct taxes, which were 25 per cent higher than 1968, as a result of higher incomes (which accounted for about two-thirds of the increase) and some additional tax measures, income after taxes still rose by 8.2 per cent over the preceding year. Translating this into "real" terms, by allowing for the rapid rise in consumer prices, real disposable income of persons in 1969 was 4.2 per cent higher than in 1968.

About three-quarters of personal income consists of wage and salary income; in 1969 this was 12 per cent higher than in the preceding year. The number of paid workers was about 3.5 per cent above 1968, so that the average increase in employee earnings was about 8.2 per cent, substantially above the estimated gain in output per worker of some 2 per cent[1]. This 8.2 per cent also happens to be about the same rate of increase negotiated for new wage settlements during 1969. Incomes received in the form of returns on capital (i.e., dividends and interest) rose by about the same percentage as total wages and salaries. Transfer payments received from governments also rose at about the same rate. These transfers include not only old age pensions, public assistance, family allowances and veterans benefits, for example, but also grants to institutions such as universities and hospitals. By contrast, incomes of unincorporated businessmen and farmers in total showed little change from 1968. The dominant feature for this group was, of course, the decline in income of farmers. While cash receipts from livestock sales increased, there was a decline in receipts from grain, as lower wheat exports limited the quantity of grain farmers could deliver to elevators, and curtailed their cash receipts from the Canadian Wheat Board. Inventories of wheat were at a very high level. In total, cash receipts from farming declined slightly while operating costs continued to rise. Net income of farmers fell from about $1.7 billion in 1968 to about $1.5 billion in 1969.

By regions, personal income increased more rapidly in Ontario, British Columbia and Quebec than in the other main regions; in the Atlantic region income grew at a lesser rate than elsewhere, while in the Prairie provinces the decline in farm income offset part of the increase in other forms of income.

Canadians increased their spending on consumer goods and services in 1969 at a greater rate than their increase in incomes after taxes. As noted above, income after taxes was 8.2 per cent higher than in 1968. Spending on consumer goods and services was 9 per cent higher than the year before. Accordingly, the ratio of personal saving declined from 7.6 per cent of disposable income in 1968 to 6.8 per cent in 1969. Excluding increases in farm inventories, the personal saving ratio declined last year to 5.7 per cent from 7.1 per cent in 1968; this latter figure was roughly comparable to those of the two preceding years. The decline in the saving ratio appears to have been associated with a smaller accumulation of liquid assets as well as some increase in spending on goods financed by a growth of consumer credit.

Personal spending on services increased more rapidly than did spending on goods. In 1969, spending on services was 10.6 per cent higher than in 1968, while spending on goods rose by about 8 per cent. Part of the difference can be explained by price movements: prices of services (including shelter costs) rose by more than 5 per cent, while prices of all goods increased by about 3 per cent, with the rise in durable goods prices averaging less than 1 per cent. After allowing for different rates of price increase, the volume of goods and services consumed each rose about 5 per cent between 1968 and 1969.

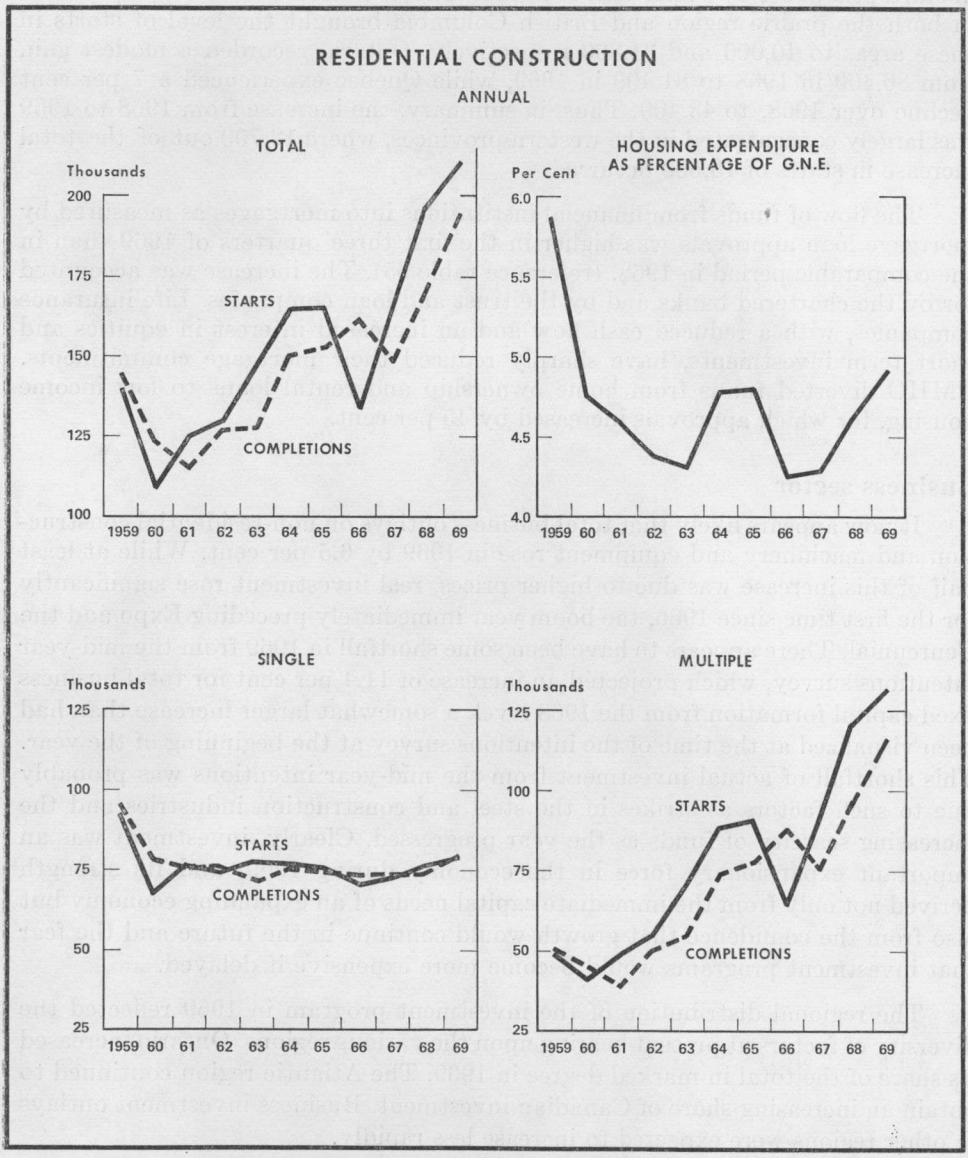
In the latter half of 1969 sales of durable goods levelled off, mainly because of a softening in new car sales. On the basis of preliminary data, car sales in the fourth quarter of 1969 appear to have declined from the third quarter, and sales in December to have fallen below those of one year earlier.

Regional statistics on personal income and spending are still incomplete. The retail sales data show that for the first nine months of 1969 total retail sales in Canada were 7.5 per cent higher than in the same months of 1968. In Ontario and British Columbia, the increases were well above this figure, 9.3 per cent and 9 per cent respectively. In Quebec, the increase was 6.1 per cent, in the prairie region 5.4 per cent and in the Atlantic provinces 4.2 per cent.

In the first quarter of the year, consumer credit granted by the major lenders rose at an annual rate of 20 per cent. This increase decelerated to a rate of 14 per cent in the second quarter and to 9 per cent in the third quarter, which was also the rate reported for October. In November the rate was 2 per cent. Within these totals, there have been some substantial divergences. Chartered banks' consumer loans, which account for about 45 per cent of outstanding credit, grew rapidly by 30 per cent per annum in the first quarter of the year, decelerated to 15 per cent in the second quarter, and showed no gain at all in the third quarter.

The lending activities of sales finance companies accelerated during the course of the year. In the first quarter of 1969 sales finance companies and consumer loan companies increased lending at annual rates of 10 per cent and 11 per cent respectively. By the second quarter the increases had accelerated to 14 and 15 per cent for the two groups and in the third quarter there was a further acceleration to annual rates of 19 and 23 per cent. In November, however, consumer credit issued by sales finance companies declined and that issued by consumer loan companies grew more slowly than in previous months.

At the end of the third quarter of 1969, outstanding consumer credit balances were equivalent to slightly more than 20 per cent of personal disposable income.



Housing sector

Activity in the housing sector remained high during 1969 despite restrictions of credit and rising interest rates. The underlying demand for housing remained strong, even though effective demand was probably limited by high mortgage rates and the restricted credit availability.

Residential construction outlays totalled about $3.9 billion in 1969. This figure represents an increase of approximately 17 per cent, which is about the same rate of increase as had been achieved in the previous year. However, both of these rates reflect large increases in construction costs. If account is taken of this pronounced rise in construction costs, real outlays are estimated to have increased by 8.8 per cent in 1969 after rising by 10.2 per cent in 1968. This sharp acceleration in housing outlays has made the residential construction sector one of the strongest sectors of the national expenditure accounts, and has raised the ratio of that sector to total GNE to the highest level since 1959. (See Chart 10.)

Housing starts totalled 210,415 units in 1969, up from 196,878 in 1968. In the first quarter of the year starts were exceptionally high for that season, owing to the volume of CMHC direct lending in the last quarter of the previous year and to a surge in the commitment of other funds. By the last quarter of 1969, starts were running well below the levels of the same quarter in the previous year. Almost all of the increase in starts in 1969 was in multiple rather than single housing units. Demographic factors have favored the market for multifamily units, because of the growing relative importance in the population of young families and individuals, who are typically renters, and of older couples, who need less living space. In addition, the cost of apartment renting has been rising much less rapidly in recent years than has the cost of home ownership. In the shelter cost component of the consumer price index, rental costs, which lag somewhat owing to lease arrangements, have risen 16.4 per cent from 1965 to the end of 1969, as compared with a rise of 34.1 per cent for home ownership costs. This has undoubtedly shifted some of the demand, especially that of the low and middle income groups, from single family to multiple units. Finally, the scarcity and cost of suitable land, and the opportunities for equity participation by institutional lenders, have encouraged the building of multiple dwelling units.

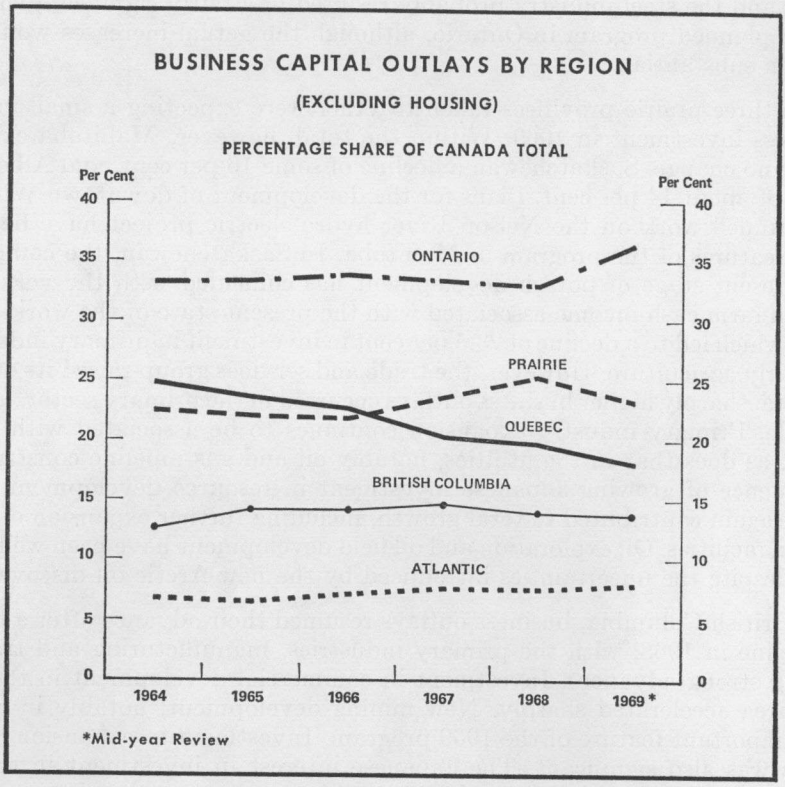
On a regional basis, the Atlantic provinces experienced the largest increase in starts; they rose by 25 per cent to a level of 13,800. An increase of 22 per cent in both the prairie region and British Columbia brought the level of starts in these areas to 40,000 and 31,800 respectively. Ontario recorded a modest gain from 80,400 in 1968 to 81,400 in 1969, while Quebec experienced a 7 per cent decline over 1968, to 43,400. Thus, in summary, the increase from 1968 to 1969 was largely concentrated in the western provinces, where 12,700 out of the total increase in starts of 13,500 occurred.

The flow of funds from financial institutions into mortgages as measured by mortgage loan approvals was higher in the first three quarters of 1969 than in the comparable period in 1968, (reference table 65). The increase was accounted for by the chartered banks and by the trust and loan companies. Life insurance companies, with a reduced cash flow and an increased interest in equities and short term investments, have sharply reduced their mortgage commitments. CMHC diverted funds from home ownership and rental loans to low income housing, for which approvals increased by 45 per cent.



Business sector

It now appears likely that total business outlays on non-residential construction and machinery and equipment rose in 1969 by 6.5 per cent. While at least half of this increase was due to higher prices, real investment rose significantly for the first time since 1966, the boom year immediately preceding Expo and the Centennial. There appears to have been some shortfall in 1969 from the mid-year intentions survey, which projected an increase of 11.4 per cent for total business fixed capital formation from the 1968 level, a somewhat larger increase than had been visualized at the time of the intentions survey at the beginning of the year. This shortfall of actual investment from the mid-year intentions was probably due to such factors as strikes in the steel and construction industries and the increasing scarcity of funds as the year progressed. Clearly, investment was an important expansionary force in the economy during 1969, and its strength derived not only from the immediate capital needs of an expanding economy but also from the confidence that growth would continue in the future and the fear that investment programs would become more expensive if delayed.

The regional distribution of the investment program in 1969 reflected the diversity of factors at present bearing upon the various regions. Ontario increased its share of the total in marked degree in 1969. The Atlantic region continued to obtain an increasing share of Canadian investment. Business investment outlays in other regions were expected to increase less rapidly.

In the Atlantic region, the Churchill Falls development in Labrador has moved forward in accordance with long-term plans, the large-scale financing required being drawn down in accordance with the staged timing of the over-all project. In the manufacturing sector, such large export industries as pulp and paper have added to capacity. Smaller operations with less favorable export prospects, such as fishing and fish processing, have had mixed fortunes and have declined in significance in the capital expenditure picture. Some decline in secondary manufacturing investment has also been associated with a decrease in government participation, partly reflecting the maturing of some incentive programs offered to industry by provincial governments. The increased costs of borrowing by provincial governments and their agencies have probably also affected the investment activity of some smaller utilities.

Business investment in Quebec was expected to rise by 2 per cent at the time of the mid-year review, following two years of decline from the 1966 peak. A number of rubber, textile and metal manufacturing industries increased their investment significantly, but these gains were all but offset by sharp declines in the petroleum and chemical products industries, where existing major developments were nearing completion and work was barely due to begin on new large projects. There was a continued downward drift in the trade, finance and commercial services sector, while utilities raised their expenditures slightly above 1968 levels.

In Ontario, the trade, finance and commercial services group planned capital outlays of $720 million in 1969, an increase of nearly 23 per cent from the previous year. This amount, nearly one-fifth of business capital expenditures in Ontario, represented 42 per cent of all such outlays in Canada. A large part of the total activity reported was located in major metropolitan areas and involved the construction of new business facilities intended for rental. Manufacturing investment was expected to rise by nearly 40 per cent in Ontario. This represented 85 per cent of the increase for Canada as a whole. Strikes in the construction industry and the steel industry probably resulted in a fairly significant shortfall from the planned program in Ontario, although the actual increases would still have been substantial.

The three prairie provinces taken together were expecting a small increase in business investment in 1969. Within the total, however, Manitoba expected virtually no change, Saskatchewan a decline of some 16 per cent, and Alberta an increase of about 14 per cent. Plans for the development of downtown Winnipeg and continued work on the Nelson River hydro-electric project have been important features of the program in Manitoba. In Saskatchewan, the completion of the present stage of potash development has coincided with the very sharp decline in farm cash income associated with the present state of the world wheat market, which led to a decline of 23.5 per cent in investment in primary industries, particularly agriculture. However, the trade and services group raised its outlays. In Alberta, sharply higher business outlays occurred in the primary sector, utilities and trade. Primary industry expansion continues to be associated with export markets, as does that in the utilities, notably oil and gas pipeline construction. The influence of growing Japanese investment in resource development in the province again contributed to total growth, including further expansion of transportation facilities. Oil exploration and oil field development have been well maintained, despite the uncertainties introduced by the new Arctic oil discoveries.

In British Columbia, business outlays resumed their advance after a temporary decline in 1968, with the primary industries, manufacturing and trade all recording strong advances. Investment in commercial development in the Vancouver area accelerated sharply. New mining development, notably in copper, was an important feature of the 1969 program. Investment in expansion of pulp facilities was also significant. The Japanese interest in investment in resource industries is particularly apparent in this province.

A large proportion of investment is financed by internally generated sources of funds, including retained earnings and capital cost allowances. These sources of funds continued to expand in 1969, but their growth was insufficient to finance the increase in investment. This is apparent in Chart 12, which compares saving with investment in fixed assets and inventories of private corporations. Non-farm business inventories increased by about $500 million in 1969 compared with $473 million in 1968. This does not appear to have been disproportionate to the growth of production and trade during the year. Farm inventories and grain in commercial channels rose by about $400 million in 1969 compared with $239 million in 1968; the main factor here is of course the limited level of wheat exports in a year of substantial crops. Less is known about the other uses of funds of the business sector, including the purchase of land and other existing physical assets, which are not included in investment in the national accounts, and the extension of trade credit. In the circumstances prevailing in 1969, one would expect these uses of funds also to have expanded.

It is certainly clear that the business sector as a whole borrowed substantially more in 1969 than in 1968, despite the increasing cost and difficulty of financing as the year progressed. Table 4 brings together some of the more important and readily available statistics on the sources of funds to Canadian business.

This table should be regarded as providing only a general impression of business financing developments; a more precise analysis will only become possible as experience in using the newly published Financial Flow Accounts develops. It is not yet possible to generalize about the liquid asset position of business in 1969. Moreover, this table does not include the major sources of funds to government-owned enterprises which are provided directly or indirectly by their parent governments. The main outlines of private business financing, however, are clear. There was a sharp increase in the total recourse to outside sources of funds in 1969 after a period of little growth. A shift to borrowing on short-term is apparent, owing to the trend of interest rates during the year, and the preferences of investors. Heavy demands were placed upon the chartered banks, which were able to lend large sums to businesses, as their liquid assets were relatively ample at the beginning of the year following the period of monetary easing in mid-1968. The table does not include foreign currency loans to Canadian residents, which also increased in 1969. This situation changed in the course of 1969, however. As bank financing became less readily available, business turned increasingly to other sources, such as the sales finance companies and especially the market for short-term paper and bankers' acceptances. There was no increase in net new issues of corporate bonds in 1969, as a result of the high and rising level of long-term interest rates and the associated expectation of continuing inflation. About half of the issues continued to be placed in foreign capital markets. On the other hand the net new issues of stocks more than doubled in 1969 and surpassed the volume of bond issues. Throughout much of the year it was evident that investors were much more interested in acquiring stocks than bonds. Direct investment from abroad did not increase significantly, reflecting the growing financial pressures on parent corporations, and to some extent the industrial distribution of the 1969 investment program.

Government sector

Perspective on the government sector

The consolidated net general expenditures of all levels of government in Canada have grown from a little less than 29 per cent of GNE in 1960 to close to 32.5 per cent in 1969. The developments over the decade are the result of the responses of the different levels of government to the changing demands upon them, the productivity of the economy, the rising costs of government and the economic stabilization function performed by the Government of Canada.

The real economic growth and stable prices of the early 1960s rapidly increased public revenues relative to expenditure costs. This apparent fiscal dividend, at a time when the demands for education and other public services were multiplying, helped finance a steady growth in the quantity and an improvement in the quality of public services.

The shift to a much higher rate of price increase in late 1964 was more pronounced in the labour-intensive public sector than in the economy as a whole. Over-all expenditure growth, which had averaged 7.6 per cent annually between the fiscal years 1960-61 and 1964-65, grew by over 10 per cent in 1965-66 and by 17.7 per cent in 1966-67. Growth in that year was led by an increase of almost a third in education costs, but all major functions of expenditure increased substantially.

Neither the revenue system nor the capital markets could sustain such rates. While education and welfare grew by a further 25 per cent in 1967-68, and health costs increased by over 15 per cent, the growth of most other areas of expenditure, and particularly the capital-intensive transport and communications sector, was sharply reduced. By 1968-69 the effects of fiscal policies to reduce the growth of public sector demand, limitations on market borrowing, and public reaction to tax increases combined to reduce the growth of spending on health, welfare and education, and maintain the restrictions on other areas. Only public debt charges, reacting to rising interest rates and earlier heavy borrowing, grew substantially faster than in the previous year. This pattern was continued in the 1969-70 spending plans. The spread of provincial medical care insurance plans boosted health spending. However, this largely represented a transfer from private to public spending, rather than a net increase in demand. Salary and wage increases, particularly at the federal and municipal levels, also raised other expenditure growth slightly above the previous year's levels.

[1]Estimated by Department of Finance.

In summary, all sectors of public spending grew in the mid-sixties, but as rapid growth in prices and real demand made it impossible to maintain this pattern, objects of expenditure other than health, welfare and education services were cut back sharply. In the final years of the decade virtually all growth rates were reduced. As Canada enters the 1970s, expenditures related to its people-oriented policies have been growing for two years at rates which maintain established service levels and meet earlier commitments, while the growth of expenditure in other areas of government has been limited to such an extent that real levels of service may have declined.

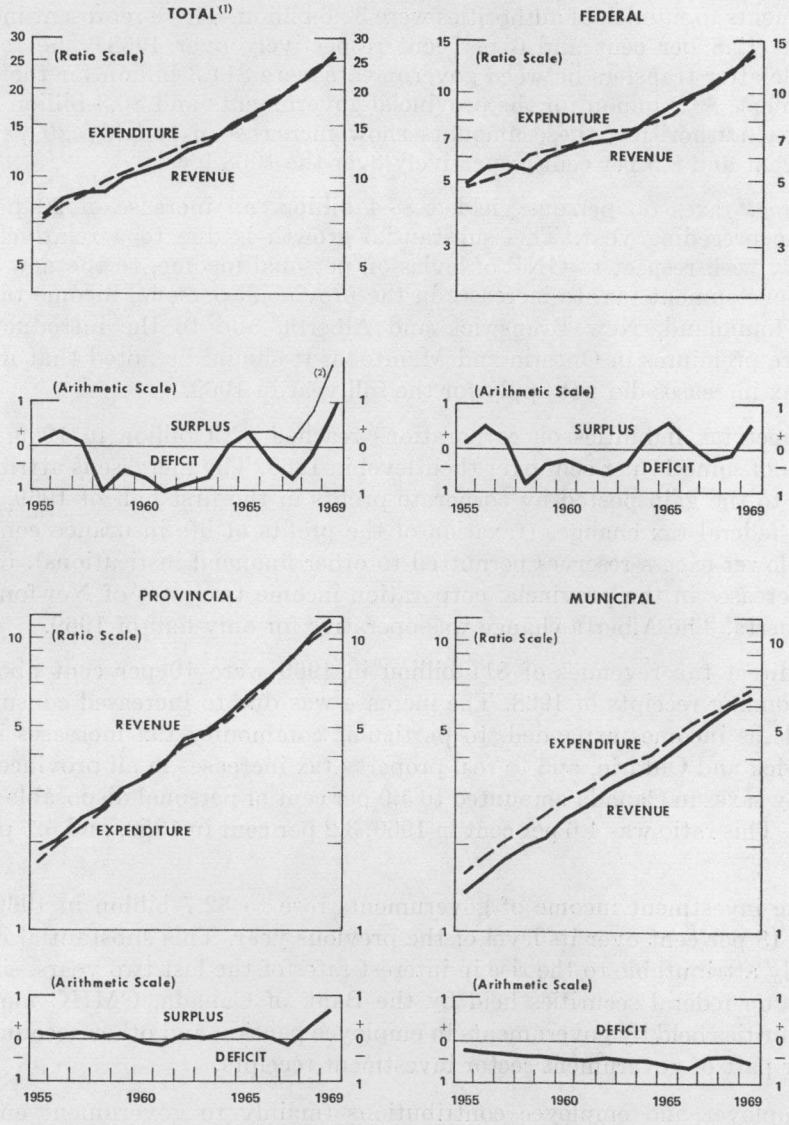
Meeting the growing costs of these levels of services has altered both the revenue structure of governments and their patterns of borrowing. Perhaps the most remarkable change has been in personal income taxes. Changes in rates and, to a greater extent, the combination of rapidly rising incomes and a progressive rate structure have increased the relative importance of this source of revenue. In 1960-61 personal income taxes accounted for just over 20 per cent of all government revenues. By 1969-70 the proportion has become over 30 per cent. Over the decade they have increased to 40 per cent from 30 per cent of federal revenues, and changes in tax-sharing arrangements have increased their importance as a source of provincial revenues to 22 per cent from 2 per cent. Consumption taxes, on the other hand, even with regular rate increases throughout the period, accounted for roughly 20 per cent of total revenues throughout the period. Both corporation income taxes, with relatively fixed rates, and municipal property taxes, whose rates have increased but whose tax base has no automatic relation to economic growth, have declined relatively.

Government borrowing expanded rapidly with growing expenditures in the mid-sixties, reaching a peak in 1967 and 1968 and then declining rapidly. Within this general pattern, however, dramatic changes were taking place. In particular, provinces and municipalities increasingly drew funds from the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans after 1966 and from foreign as opposed to domestic market issues.

Current developments: the net position

The net positions of governments on a national accounts basis, excluding transactions of the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, changed from a deficit of $190 million in 1968 to a surplus of about $1 billion in 1969. The federal government accumulated a surplus of $600 million, from a deficit of $165 million in 1968. The net position of provincial and municipal governments moved from near balance to a $400 million surplus. At the aggregate level, the surplus was mainly the result of a substantial growth in government revenues whereas the rate of growth in public expenditures was restricted to its 1968 level.



Including the operations of the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans, the position of the government sector, on a national accounts basis, showed a change of approximately $1.3 billion, from a net surplus of $800 million to one of about $2.1 billion. Total receipts of the plans from contributions and investments amounted to $1.1 billion in 1969, an increase of 12.9 per cent over the preceding year. Increases in employment and income per employed person were responsible for this gain. Total benefits paid under these plans in 1969 amounted to $50 million.

Revenues of governments

Government revenues, exclusive of intergovernmental transfers and Canada Pension Plan and Quebec Pension Plan contributions, rose to $26.8 billion in 1969, an increase of 15.9 per cent over 1968. This increase was the result of a combination of real economic advance, price increases and tax rate increases. During the year federal government transfers to provincial governments and municipal authorities amounted to $2.7 billion, while net transfers from provincial governments to municipal authorities were $2.6 billion. These represent increases of about 12.8 per cent and 6 per cent respectively over 1968. The revenues available after transfers between governments were $11.3 billion for the federal government, $9.2 billion for the provincial governments and $6.3 billion for the municipal authorities; these amounts show increases of roughly 20 per cent, 17 per cent and 8.5 per cent respectively over the 1968 levels.

Direct taxes on persons yielded $8.4 billion, an increase of 26 per cent over the preceding year. This substantial growth is due to a relatively high elasticity with respect to GNP of levies on personal income, to the new federal social development tax, to increases in the provincial personal income tax rates in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Alberta, and to the introduction of medicare premiums in Ontario and Manitoba. It should be noted that many of these tax increases did not apply for the full year in 1969.

Direct tax liabilities on corporations reached $2.9 billion in 1969, for an increase of some 11 per cent over their level in 1968. The increase is attributable in part to the gain posted by corporate profits in the first half of 1969, and in part to federal tax changes (taxation of the profits of life insurance companies and to lower excess reserves permitted to other financial institutions), together with increases in the provincial corporation income tax rates of Newfoundland and Alberta. The Alberta change was operative for only half of 1969.

Indirect tax revenues of $11 billion in 1969 were 10 per cent above the corresponding receipts of 1968. The increase was due to increased consumption of goods as incomes expanded, to particular commodity tax increases in New Brunswick and Ontario, and to real property tax increases in all provinces. Real property taxes in Canada amounted to 5.9 per cent of personal disposable income in 1969. This ratio was 4.6 per cent in 1960, 3.2 per cent in 1950, and 5.1 per cent in 1940.

The investment income of governments rose to $2.7 billion in 1969, for a gain of 18 per cent over its level of the previous year. This substantial increase is largely attributable to the rise in interest rates of the last two years, since the interest on federal securities held by the Bank of Canada, CMHC mortgages and securities held by governments in employee pension and other accounts form a major part of government sector investment receipts.

Employer and employee contributions (mainly to government employee pension plans, to workmen's compensation and to the Unemployment Insurance Fund) rose by 13 per cent to $1.5 billion in 1969. This substantial increase reflects the first full-year effect of the higher contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Fund which became effective July 1, 1968.

Expenditures of governments

The growth in government expenditures during 1969, excluding intergovernmental transfers, remained at around 11 per cent, despite higher prices and wage costs and growing demand for public goods and services. Federal expenditures totalled $13.4 billion, an increase of some $1.3 billion. The expenditures of provinces and municipalities amounted to $15.1 billion, an increase of about $1.4 billion.

Expenditures on goods and services (as opposed to transfers) by all governments in 1969, at $14.6 billion, accounted for 56.5 per cent of all government expenditures. Their rate of growth amounted to 9 per cent, some 2 per cent more than in 1968. This acceleration is largely attributable to wages and salaries and general government services. Wages and salaries have continued to increase rapidly in 1969, especially at the federal and municipal levels, where increases of 18 per cent and 16 per cent respectively were experienced. Excluding retroactive salary adjustments pertaining to 1967 and 1968, the growth in federal wage payments was around 10 per cent. The dollar amount of general government services increased by 8 per cent in 1969, notably because of the fuller implementation of the Medical Care Insurance Plan. With the entrance of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta into the Medical Care Insurance Plan in the course of 1969, provincial expenditures for medical care amounted to some $225 million, of which $130 million was financed by transfers from the federal government. The growth in government sector capital expenditure slowed to around 2.5 per cent. Federal capital expenditure, which had increased by around 7.5 per cent in 1968, declined by around 10 per cent in 1969, while provincial-municipal capital expenditures increased by between 5 and 6 per cent.

Transfers to persons, excluding debt charges, have continued to represent a substantial portion of the growth in government expenditures. These transfers were increased at the federal level by a further reduction of the minimum age limit for old age security payments, by increased unemployment insurance benefit payments and by additional payments for adult training allowances. Increased transfers for hospital care[1], social services and education account for the major increases in provincial and municipal transfer payments to persons.

Interest on the public debt of all governments increased by 15 per cent over its 1968 level, and now accounts for 10 per cent of all government outlays.

The increase in federal transfers to other levels of government reflects additional contributions to medicare, following the entrance of the five additional provinces into the program, as well as the continuation of rapid increases in the costs of financing federal-provincial shared-cost programs, such as hospital insurance and the Canada Assistance Plan, together with large increases in fiscal transfers for post-secondary education. The increase in net provincial-municipal transfers is largely attributable to the need for more education outlays at the municipal level; it reflects, however, a significant reduction in the rate of growth of general provincial assistance to municipalities.

[1]This treatment of transfers in respect of hospital care is based on the old definition of the personal sector in the national accounts. In the revised national accounts, hospitals will be shown as a separate item in the government sector.

Government financing

Reflecting efforts to restrain expenditures, and the limited availability and high cost of funds in the Canadian bond market, net new direct and guaranteed issues of marketable bonds by all levels of government declined in 1969 to about $1.5 billion, half the level of the previous year. While provincial and municipal governments reduced their reliance on the capital markets, this significant reduction was accounted for almost entirely by the swing in the federal government's position.

In sharp contrast to 1968, when the federal government borrowed heavily in the bond market, in 1969 it was a small net source of funds. The government did, however, receive $330 million from net sales of non-marketable Canada Savings Bonds.

Provincial governments' direct and guaranteed market issues have consistently exceeded $1 billion in the past four years. These governments have significantly increased their recourse to foreign markets in this period. Whereas 70 per cent of provincial bond financing was done in Canada in 1966, in 1969 all but a small proportion was done in the United States and Europe. The other major source of funds for the provinces was the Canada Pension Plan which provided $805 million or almost 40 per cent of their total borrowings in 1969[1]. Provinces also reduced their cash balances by about $200 million, or 50 per cent, over the year.

Total net new issues of securities by municipalities declined by about 14 per cent in 1969, their foreign borrowings declining somewhat more than their new issues in Canada. This is in striking contrast to the provincial experience. Municipalities increased their bank borrowing by about 14 per cent or $95 million to help meet their financial requirements.

The deterioration of the long-term market in Canada as the inflationary psychology retained its control over investors accounted for the increased reliance of provinces and municipalities on foreign markets. It also meant that to the extent that funds were available in Canada, they were for shorter terms. In an attempt to overcome this problem and to attract lenders, the provinces made considerable use of bonds with an extendible feature.

Government of Canada cash requirements

Our discussion of the current developments in the government sector has used the national accounts framework for the presentation of material. We conclude with a statement of Government of Canada cash requirements and a description of recent developments in lending activities, which comprise the main non-budgetary outlays of the Government of Canada.

---

[1]The operations of the Quebec Pension Plan also provide a source of funds to the Quebec government. The funds are managed by "la Caisse de Dépôt et Placement". To the extent that the funds are used to buy issues of the Quebec government these purchases are reflected in the figures of the province's market issues.

[3] Preliminary.

The budgetary position of the Government of Canada swung from a deficit of $733 million in calendar 1968 to a surplus of $441 million in 1969. The deficit on non-budgetary account, which had been halved in 1968, remained virtually unchanged at $336 million in 1969. Taking into account cash requirements for foreign exchange operations, there was a change from a total cash requirement in 1968 of just over $1.3 billion to a cash surplus in 1969 of a little less than $100 million. Main features of the financing of these requirements are exhibited in Table 6.

The non-budgetary accounts of the Government of Canada include some very large receipts deriving, for example, from contributions to the federal employees' pension funds and from taxes credited to the Old Age Security Fund. The details may be found in Part II of this White Paper. The economic significance of the non-budgetary loans and investments has special character and deserves discussion here.

Loans, advances and investments by the federal government to Crown corporations and agencies, other governments and their agencies, and international organizations, but excluding Exchange Fund Account transactions, will amount to about $1.2 billion in fiscal 1969-70 on a net basis, that is after deducting principal repayments. This total compares with $981 million in fiscal 1968-69 and $1,351 million in fiscal 1967-68.

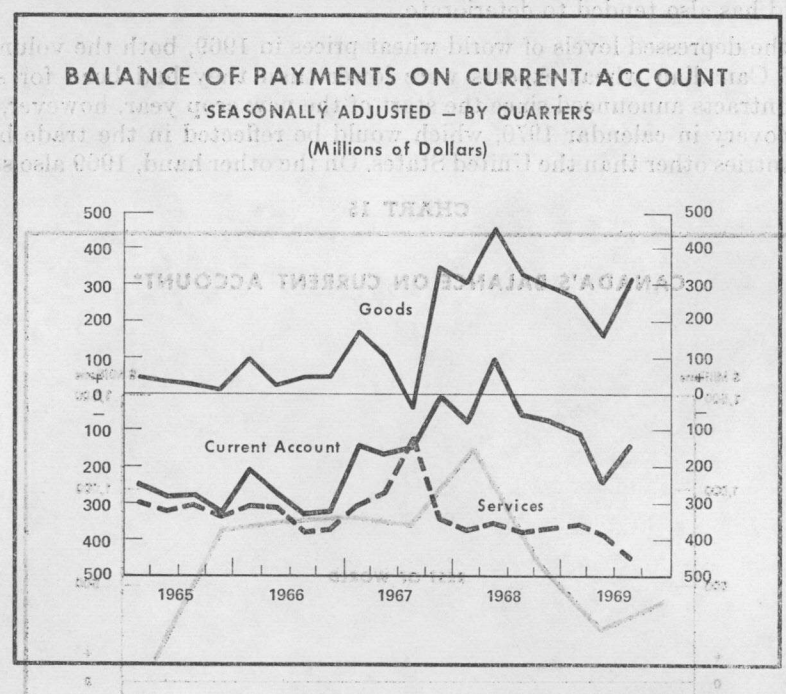
Since fiscal 1963-64, when net non-budgetary expenditures totalled $232 million, there have been sharp increases in the federal government's lending and investment programs. These increases reflect the government's growing role as a financial intermediary. Almost $750 million in direct loans to the private sector will be made, net of principal repayments, in the current fiscal year through government lending agencies such as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Farm Credit Corporation, Export Development Corporation, and the Veterans' Land Act Fund. The rapid expansion in amounts disbursed on these lending operations, from about $227 million in fiscal 1963-64 to current levels of expenditure, has been closely associated with the federal government's support of housing programs through CMHC. For example, in the last three years the federal government has lent an average of $500 million a year to CMHC over and above repayments, compared with about $200 million a year in the previous three years.

Federal government loans to and investments in Crown corporations carrying out commercial operations account for the bulk of other non-budgetary expenditures, which may total about $472 million in fiscal 1969-70 compared with $387 million in fiscal 1968-69 and only $5 million in fiscal 1963-64. Generally speaking, these expenditures involved capital spending programs carried out by Crown corporations such as Air Canada, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and the Canadian National Railways. Advances to CNR are also made to finance maturing CNR loans held by the public.



In addition to its role as a financial intermediary, the federal government assists numerous lending operations in the private sector by guaranteeing or insuring loans made under certain federal government-sponsored programs. While no cash outlay is involved, except in the case of a default, these guarantees have resulted in a rapid increase in contingent liabilities of the federal government. At the end of fiscal 1968-69 these amounted to almost $9 billion and they have been growing at over 6 per cent a year in recent years. These contingent liabilities arise under such programs as National Housing Act insured mortgages, Canadian Wheat Board financing, and Farm Improvement and Student Loans.

The non-resident sector

The current account deficit, that is, the difference between receipts and expenditures in current transactions with other countries, appears to have been about $800 million in 1969, compared with the unusually low figure of $111 million in 1968. This was not quite as rapid a change as in 1965 or as in the period of resource boom of the mid-1950s but is evidence, nevertheless, of both growth and inflation within the Canadian economy. The increase in the deficit occurred between the middle of 1968 and the middle of 1969, as a result of a rapid growth of imports which reflected the continuing expansion of the economy and the consequent upward trend of investment. The growth in both imports and exports flattened out during the course of 1969, but at levels which left the merchandise trade surplus well below the peak attained in 1968. The deficit on non-merchandise transactions continued to increase, with a rather sharper change than usual due to a sizeable increase in the deficit on travel. The inflows of long-term capital remained substantially in excess of the current account deficit. As in 1968, however, this was offset by a large outflow of short-term funds, and the official reserves increased by only $65 million.

Canada's current account balance with the United States has shown a considerable improvement since 1966, reversing the earlier deterioration. This occurred during a period in which the current surplus of the United States with all countries was disappearing. Canadian costs rose slightly less rapidly after 1967 than those in the United States, and Canadian goods continued to share in the growth of U.S. imports through 1969, partly as a result of special factors such as the rapid expansion of bilateral trade in autos and parts, but also because of the general composition and sheer pressure of U.S. demand. Until the second half of 1968, on the other hand, Canadian demand (and more particularly investment demand, with its high import content) lagged sufficiently far behind that in the United States to retard the growth of imports by comparison with that of exports. These were the major causes of the reduction in Canada's own total current account deficit to only $111 million in 1968. Despite the more rapid increase of imports after 1968, there was some further slight improvement in Canada's current account with the United States in 1969, so that the whole of the deterioration in Canada's current account took place in its transactions with other countries. Particularly since mid-1968, Canada's balance with the rest of the world has been showing much more clearly the effects of the cyclical pressures within its own economy, and the effects also of the increase in costs which has been taking place in both Canada and the United States. The current account surplus with the United Kingdom and Continental Europe, which had been $359 million as recently as 1967, gave way to a small deficit in 1969, while the surplus with all other overseas countries, $484 million in 1967, fell to less than $200 million in 1969. In both cases, lower wheat shipments were partly responsible, but Canadian imports from these third countries have risen more sharply than imports from the United States. The non-merchandise balance with the rest of the world has also tended to deteriorate.

At the depressed levels of world wheat prices in 1969, both the volume and value of Canadian wheat exports were lower than they had been for several years; contracts announced since the start of the new crop year, however, imply some recovery in calendar 1970, which would be reflected in the trade balance with countries other than the United States. On the other hand, 1969 also saw the completion of the initial program of rationalization of production and trade under the Canada-U.S. Automotive Products Agreement. A significant sum in potential export earnings was lost to Canada in 1969 through major strikes in the steel and nickel industries. To some extent the lost sales may be recovered in 1970.

The total net inflow of long-term capital into Canada was about $2 billion in 1969 compared with $1.6 billion in 1968. Foreign direct investment in Canada was again in excess of $600 million last year, and there was some growth in investment by other than U.S. residents. Canadian direct investment abroad, the majority of which was in the United States, was at the highest level ever recorded, amounting to well over $200 million. As usual in recent years, by far the greater part of the total net inflow on long-term capital account was accounted for by net sales of market securities. In marked contrast to the experience of 1967 and 1968, there were virtually no net purchases of foreign securities by Canadian residents over the year as a whole, as the earlier substantial outflow of capital for the purchase of U.S. equities dried up by mid-year owing, in part, to differences in stock market conditions in the two countries during the year. There were also some net sales abroad of outstanding Canadian securities and a marked increase in net new issues of Canadian equities to non-residents. The major element in the inflow continued to arise from the net new issue of debt by provinces and their agencies, municipalities and corporations. Total net new bond issues again exceeded $1.5 billion. Net new issues of Canadian bonds in the U.S. market remained close to the $1 billion level first approached in 1966. Canadian bond issues in the European capital markets, which had become a major source of funds for Canadian borrowers in 1968, were again about $500 million. Provinces and municipalities accounted for about two-thirds of total net borrowing abroad in 1969.

The outflows of short-term capital in 1969 may have exceeded $1.1 billion, as they did in 1968. There was a fairly heavy inflow of funds into Canadian finance company short-term obligations in the early months of the year, and some borrowing by Canadian residents from foreign banks in the second quarter. Simultaneously, however, Canadian bank balances abroad increased by well over $500 million in that quarter alone, in response to the rise of 3 per cent or more in Eurodollar rates which occurred between April and June. Identified short-term outflows in the third quarter, prior to the German election and the abandonment of the former parity of the deutsche mark, were more moderate, and little net reflux appears to have taken place in the fourth quarter. But analysis is complicated by large unidentified flows, partly representing changes in leads and lags, which may have been related to the mark crisis. Apart from a minor reflux in the second quarter of 1968, a steady outflow of banking funds has now persisted since the summer of 1967 and there has been an apparent total net build-up of short-term assets held abroad by Canadian residents, over that period, of more than $3 billion. The very duration of this build-up, together with the experience of other countries in recent years, suggests that a large part of the capital concerned may represent, in practice, a significantly longer-term export than is conventionally assumed from the nominal term of the deposits. As described in earlier Budget White Papers, some part of the apparent outflow may be accounted for by essentially permanent "slippage" between the direct measurements of the current and capital accounts. Nevertheless, a substantial short-term foreign currency net asset position clearly exists.

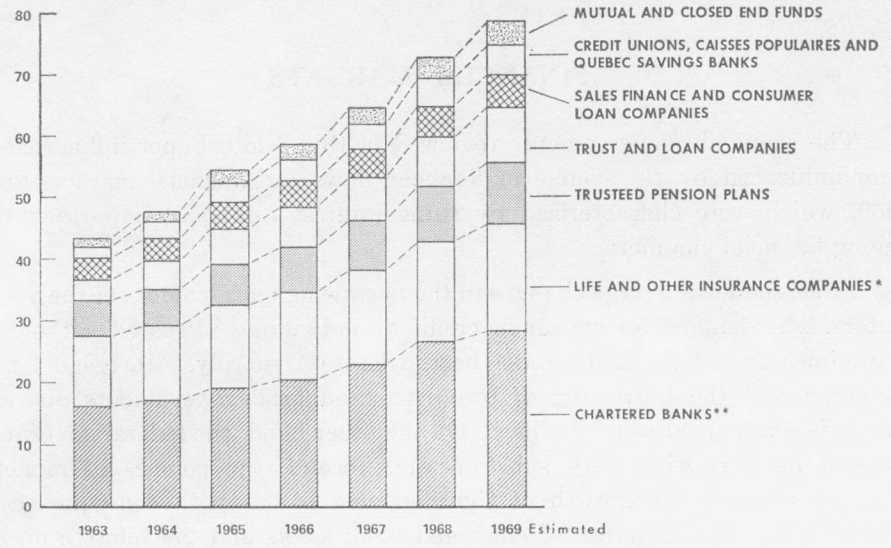
Those short-term flows which can be identified took place chiefly in response to changes in covered interest-rate differentials and to some extent because of speculation on possible parity changes in Europe, but had no seriously weakening effect upon the exchange value of the Canadian dollar during 1969. On the contrary, although the rate fell fairly slowly from the upper intervention point at which it began the year, and hovered around parity from late June through July, it then rose gradually again and at the end of December was virtually against its ceiling. There was a roughly offsetting movement of the forward differential during the year (first a widening and then a narrowing of the discount on the forward U.S. dollar), leaving the actual forward rate for the Canadian dollar fairly flat and close to the ceiling for the spot rate, throughout the year.

All of the net increase in Canada's official reserve assets in 1969 is attributable to the last quarter of the year, as there was a net rundown of $100 million to the end of September. Over the year as a whole, there was a net reduction of U.S. $211 million in official holdings of gold and foreign exchange and an increase of U.S. $272 million in Canada's reserve position in the International Monetary Fund.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

The economic developments reviewed in this White Paper influenced and were influenced by the course of financial flows and financial markets during 1969, which were characterized by rising interest rates and important shifts among financial channels.

First, there were large changes in the borrowing requirements of the various sectors. The demand for consumer credit by individuals increased, although at a diminishing rate, and business borrowing rose sharply. Mortgage lending increased and the borrowing of provincial and local governments and their enterprises remained at a high level. On the other hand, the federal government reduced its borrowing very substantially. Second, the policies of monetary restraint checked the growth of the chartered banks, with consequences for interest rates, the structure of chartered bank assets and the relative position of other financial institutions. Third, the experience and expectation of inflation contributed to the increase in interest rates, encouraged borrowers to borrow for short-term rather than long, and shifted investors' preferences away from long-term bonds and toward liquid assets and equities. A number of these factors were also felt in the rest of the industrialized world, and the rise in interest rates in Canada was equalled or surpassed elsewhere.



The banking system

The Bank of Canada pursued a policy of monetary restraint throughout 1969. The primary way in which this was done was through restricting the growth of the chartered banks' cash reserves. The Bank of Canada also raised the Bank Rate to 7 per cent in March, to 7.5 per cent in June and to 8 per cent in July, and increased the secondary reserve ratio of chartered banks from 7 per cent to 8 per cent in June. Under this monetary policy, chartered banks' total assets grew less rapidly than those of non-bank financial institutions. Over-all, assets of all major financial intermediaries, including the chartered banks, are estimated to have grown by about 8 per cent over 1969. Total assets of the banking system expanded by 5.2 per cent, those of other financial intermediaries by about 9.4 per cent. Further details as to the relative growth of assets of the financial intermediaries are shown in Chart 17.

Monetary policy affected not only the growth of total chartered bank liabilities but also had differential effects on various deposit liabilities and assets. Total Canadian dollar liabilities of the banks continued to expand at relatively high rates early in 1969, but the rate of expansion slowed as the year progressed. Around the middle of the year total liabilities declined, and although they have risen since, they were at year-end only slightly above the level reached at mid-year. Growth of demand deposits was held in check throughout the year while non-personal term and notice deposits declined sharply, the fall being due partly to limitation of the rates that the chartered banks pay on certain large deposit receipts. Foreign currency swapped deposits rose substantially in the first half of the year, but did not grow after July, when the Bank of Canada requested the banks to observe a temporary ceiling on the amounts outstanding.

Marked changes also occurred on the asset side of the chartered banks' balance sheets. The most striking of these was a sharp fall in the liquid asset holdings of the banks in order to meet the demand for loans. Their holdings of Government of Canada bonds fell by $450 million during 1969. The banks also reduced their net foreign currency asset position. Chartered bank loans continued to expand until about mid-1969 at relatively high rates. There was a pause in growth around mid-year, which was followed by a resumption of expansion although at reduced rates of growth. This second-half increase includes loans to grain dealers and to the Canadian Wheat Board, and also reflects advances on grain held in inventory on farms or in storage terminals. Unsecured personal loans have shown only a slight increase since about mid-1969. The banks as a whole have substantially increased their mortgage lending. From the end of 1968 to the end of 1969, their outstanding mortgages rose by $275 million, compared with $199 million over the previous twelve months. There were small reductions in the banks' holdings of provincial, municipal and corporate bonds.

At the beginning of 1969, the more liquid assets of the banking system were some 30 per cent of the total of their major assets. This percentage fell to about 26 per cent at the close of 1969. Hence, while the banking system did offset to some extent the impact of monetary tightness on its lending in 1969, its increasingly illiquid position was reflected in lending policies. The prime loan rate was increased to 7 per cent in January, 7.5 per cent in March, 8 per cent in June, and 8.5 per cent in July. Moreover, it is likely that an increasing number of borrowers were excluded from this preferential rate and accordingly their cost of borrowing increased even more sharply. Others found it difficult to borrow at all and had to seek funds elsewhere, normally at higher cost, or reduce their spending plans. Large borrowers turned increasingly to the market for short-term paper. Others turned to non-bank financial institutions.

Other financial institutions

Borrowing from the sales finance and consumer loan companies increased substantially. Total assets of these institutions rose by $442 million in the first three quarters of 1969 compared to an increase of $232 million during the corresponding period of 1968. Their lending to consumers accelerated until the closing months of 1969, while, as noted, chartered banks' lending slowed down after mid-year. The sales finance and consumer loan companies shifted to alternative sources of funds, reducing their use of domestic and foreign bank credit. Although their short-term market borrowing in Canada expanded at a lower rate than in 1968, they sharply increased their borrowing in the short-term markets in the United States. They have also expanded their long-term debt and have added substantially to their loans from parent and affiliated companies.

The trust and loan companies expanded their financial assets rapidly in 1969. Trust companies' assets rose by $639 million in the first three quarters of 1969 as compared with $501 million in the same period of 1968. The mortgage loan companies' assets rose by $257 million in the first three quarters of 1969 compared with $155 million in the same period a year earlier. Both groups of institutions increased their mortgage lending as mortgage rates rose. The average rate on conventional mortgages rose from 9.1 per cent at the end of 1968 to 10.5 per cent at the end of 1969. In the competition for funds these companies secured a proportionately larger part of the growth of deposits than did the banks. The banks for their part increased their deposit rates and increased the variety of deposits available. By mid-year, rates as high as 7.75 per cent were being offered on certificates of deposit maturing within two years. The Governor of the Bank of Canada has recently stated, however, that in response to a request by the Bank of Canada, the large chartered banks have not been competing aggressively for large blocks of short-term funds through the sale of Canadian dollar instruments. The trust and loan companies have been able to offer terms that many depositors have found more attractive. Thus, for example, rates on trust company guaranteed investment certificates rose from an average of 7.19 per cent in December 1968 to an average of 8.58 per cent in December 1969.

The assets of fire and casualty insurance companies expanded by about the same amount in the first three quarters of 1969 as in the same period of 1968. The assets of the credit unions, caisses populaires and mutual funds rose over the same period. Mutual funds increased their holdings of Canadian stocks, and reduced their holdings of foreign stocks in 1969. This shift was due to the relatively better performance of the Canadian rather than the United States stock market, and to the effect of the Canadian guidelines on overseas investments. Life insurance companies grew somewhat more slowly in 1969 than in 1968, while continuing to shift a part of their resources from fixed income securities to equities, a trend which began late in 1968. They reduced their holdings of bonds and invested less in mortgages.

Securities markets

The net amount of securities issues of all kinds by Canadian borrowers fell off quite sharply in 1969, and there were very significant changes in their composition.

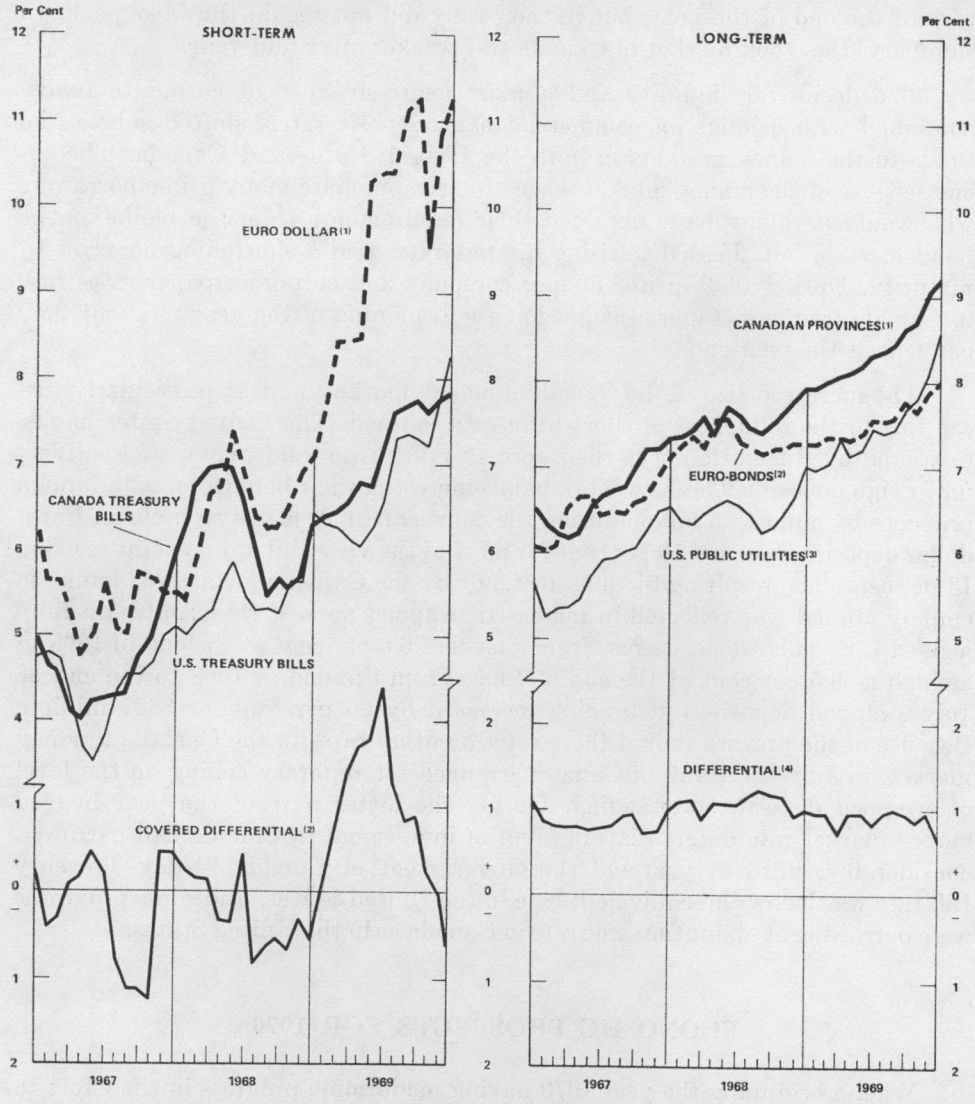
[1] Outside Government Accounts.
[2] Preliminary.

The change in the total is more than accounted for by the decline in new issues by the Government of Canada, since provincial and municipal direct and guaranteed borrowing was well maintained and corporate issues increased. In the case of the Government of Canada, the change took the form principally of a small net retirement of marketable bonds following the large volume of new issues of such securities in 1968. Net new issues of Treasury Bills declined, but there was a larger net sale of Canada Savings Bonds. Provincial and municipal governments and their enterprises obtained more funds from the sale of bonds to the CPP and from foreign currency issues outside Canada, and sharply reduced their market borrowing in Canada. Corporations also reduced their reliance on the Canadian bond market and raised more funds from foreign issues and from the sale of commercial paper. They greatly increased their net new issues of common and preferred stocks.

Whereas in 1968 Canadian governments and corporations raised $2.3 billion in new money in the Canadian bond market, they raised less than half of that amount in 1969 (excluding CSBs and bonds sold to the Canada Pension Plan). This striking decline is accounted for, to a significant extent, by the change in the position of the banks, which were net buyers in 1968 and net sellers in 1969. Canadian marketable bonds taken up by resident investors other than the banking system amounted to nearly $1 billion in 1968 and a little less in 1969, compared with $1.4 billion in both 1966 and 1967. This reduction is impressive in the light of the very high yields obtainable on such investments. The evident preference of investors for short-term liquid assets and equities illustrates the extent to which the bond market was affected by inflation and the persisting inflationary psychology. In these circumstances, Canadian borrowers were fortunate to be able to continue borrowing on a large scale in foreign capital markets, as described in the discussion of the balance of payments.



Bond yields in both Canada and the United States reached historic highs in 1969. The average yield on long-term Canadian Government bonds increased a full percentage point to 8.33 per cent during the course of the year. Provincial yields increased by over $1\frac{1}{4}$ points on average to 9.20 per cent in the same period. In the United States the average yield on long-term Treasury bonds rose over $1\frac{1}{8}$ points to 6.91 per cent and the yield on utility issues, which are comparable in the United States market to Canadian provincial issues, rose from 6.75 per cent to 8.40 per cent.

In April, there was some recovery in bond prices in Canada and the United States, which however proved to be short-lived, partly as a result of liquidation of securities by the commercial banks in both countries. During the summer restrictive credit conditions and a persistent, strong demand for credit combined to bring about a series of increases in interest rates. By the end of September, record yields had been established. In October, further signs of a slowdown in the United States economy, rumors of peace in Vietnam and widespread expectations of lower rates in the future combined to produce a dramatic increase in U.S. bond prices, which was followed to some degree in Canada. However, this rally too proved to be premature and bond prices once again declined, to produce record yields in December. Rates on new prime corporate issues in Canada reached 9.5 per cent in this period, while the United States an "Aaa-rated" utility bond was offered on a 9.10 per cent basis.

In the stock market in Canada, prices of industrial stocks, after some hesitation in February and March, thrust upward to a peak in May, reaching a level in that month some 6½ per cent higher than the average for the previous December. A sharp fall in stock prices then occurred, as interest rates moved to higher ground. The decline continued into August; thereafter prices climbed again until toward the end of the year, but in their rally did not regain the May peak. In summary, the stock market in Canada was weaker after mid-year.

The desire for liquidity and a more aggressive use of corporate funds, combined with ceilings on commercial bank deposit rates, shifted substantial funds to the money markets in both the United States and Canada. The increased size of the money market served to accommodate many prime borrowers who would normally have obtained their requirements from the banks or the bond market, but this led to rising interest rates and a shortening of terms to maturity. During 1969, prime finance company and corporate paper rates rose in Canada from a 6.50 per cent level at the beginning of the year to about 9.50 per cent at the year-end.

The increased size of the Canadian money market made it particularly susceptible to the influences of short-term rates abroad. The United States banks, restricted by Regulation Q in their access to domestic funds, competed actively for foreign deposits. The New York banks increased their balances due to foreign branches by almost $5 billion during the course of 1969. Rates payable on Eurodollar deposits exceeded 10 per cent for most of the year and at one point reached 13 per cent. The resulting bidding for funds by the Canadian chartered banks to employ abroad was reflected in increased swapped deposit rates; rates on fully hedged U.S. dollar deposits rose from a level of 6.5 per cent at the end of 1968 to as high as 9.5 per cent at the end of 1969. From the end of 1968 to the end of July swapped deposits outstanding increased by 96 per cent, or $807 million. Because of the upward pull of these rates on other rates in the Canadian money market, in July the Bank of Canada arranged a temporary ceiling on the level of swapped deposits outstanding. During the latter part of the year hedged money market rate differentials in favor of investment in Canada had narrowed considerably, until at year-end the Government of Canada 91-day Treasury Bill rate was below the equivalent rate in the United States, and some provinces were borrowing at about the same rate in Canada as in the United States.

ECONOMIC PROSPECTS FOR 1970

We are beginning the year 1970 having made some progress in the effort to re-establish the economy on a non-inflationary upward course. We expect further progress this year.

What we have seen so far, briefly, is a slowing of the growth of demand, a more moderate advance of output, and some reduction, recently, in profits. What we have not seen is the hoped-for slowing of the rise of costs and prices. In 1970 we expect to see signs of more moderate rises of costs and prices.

The growth of demand will probably continue to ease gradually throughout 1970 while policies of restraint continue to be applied. The slower growth of the labour force and of employment we have seen in recent months will continue well into 1970. It has to be expected that, in contrast to 1969, some increase in the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment will occur.

This broad picture is not dissimilar from that foreseen for the United States, and also for a number of other industrialized countries where inflation has evoked policies of restraint.

Although we expect the demand for goods and services to grow less rapidly, we expect the moderation to be rather evenly spread. Demand by consumers, supported by high incomes, will continue to move ahead. The slowing in this area will probably be felt most noticeably in the sales of durable goods including automobiles, although the demand for services will be increasingly restrained by higher prices. Although the data on intentions are not yet out, they are expected to indicate a considerable advance in capital investment. Housing starts which were over 210,000 last year are expected to be close to 200,000 in 1970, with a larger portion in the public and other low rent categories. We may be fairly optimistic about exports apart from wheat, automobiles and parts. The slowing down of growth in imports is expected to be greater than that of exports, and consequently the increase of the deficit in the current account of the balance of payments should be much smaller in 1970 than it was last year. Government expenditures will rise in 1970; the rate of increase is expected to be higher in the provincial and municipal sectors than that of the federal government. The Canada Pension Plan will again accumulate a large flow of savings to be lent to provincial governments and their agencies.

It is impossible to be precise about the likely course of costs and prices. The government has indicated its determination to slow down the inflationary increases, but a sudden end to the problem of inflation is not to be expected There are important wage settlements to be made this year. Many of these negotiations will be difficult and some strikes must be expected. A moderation of the rise in wage costs and continued declines in profits per unit of output are likely. It is expected that before the end of the year the continued effect of the slow-down in the growth of demand, the much less buoyant profit situation, and more moderate advances in wage costs will be beginning to show in smaller rates of price increase.

NOTE: These are revised National Accounts figures. Quarterly revised figures prior to 1968 are not available.

[1]The book value of inventories is deflated to remove the effect of price changes, and the derived "physical" change is then valued at average prices of the current period to obtain the value of physical change. The difference between this value of physical change and the change in book value is called the inventory valuation adjustment.

NOTE: These are revised National Accounts figures. Quarterly revised figures prior to 1968 are not available.

(1)Includes military pay and allowances.

(2)Includes the withholding tax applicable to this item.

(3)Includes an arbitrary smoothing of crop production and standard seasonal adjustments for withdrawals of grain from farm stocks and the change in livestock items. Because of the arbitrary elements, too precise an interpretation should not be given the seasonally adjusted figures of accrued net income of farm operators.

(4)Includes net income of independent professional practitioners.

(5)In the seasonally adjusted series, the value of grain production in each quarter is taken as one-fourth of the estimated value of crop production for the year as a whole. All other items in the farm inventories series are seasonally adjusted by standard techniques.

(6)Estimated by the Department of Finance.

NOTE: These are revised national accounts figures. Quarterly revised figures prior to 1968 are not available.

[1]These implicit price indexes are currently weighted price indexes. They reflect not only pure price change, but also changing expenditure patterns within and between major groups. The implicit price index for gross national expenditure is derived by dividing the total of current dollars by the total of constant dollars.

[1]Exclusive of Newfoundland. Western grain prices used in the construction of the index prior to August 1, 1967 are final prices. From August 1, 1968 to date, the western grain prices used in the index are initial prices only for wheat, oats and barley. For the period August 1, 1967 to July 31, 1968, the western grain prices used in the construction of the index are final prices for oats and barley and initial prices for wheat.

[2]These two series comprise the general wholesale price index.

[3]The index of the ratio of merchandise export prices to merchandise import prices.

[1]The break down of currency and bank deposits is based on the average of Wednesdays in the last month of the quarter. The difference between these data and the month-end data used in the financial flows is shown in the item "adjustment".

[2]Part of the discrepancy is due to the fact that the banks' earnings are reflected both in the savings and investments accounts of the Chartered Bank sector. Double counting is inevitable because the "balance of revenue", as indicated by the banks, is not allocable to a specific item on a uniform basis during their fiscal year.

PART II
REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS
1969-70

INTRODUCTION

This Part of the Budget Papers presents in summary form a review of the accounts of the Government of Canada for the fiscal year 1969-70.

Although the fiscal year of the government ends on March 31, the books must remain open for some time after that date to record adjusting entries and to take into account payments during the thirty days after March 31 pursuant to section 35 of the Financial Administration Act which provides that for thirty days after the end of each fiscal year payments for the discharge of debts properly applicable to the old year may be made and charged to that year.

Consequently the figures used in this report are estimated and are based on ten months actual and two months estimated and the final figures when they become available next July or August will vary to some extent from those given in the following pages.

The presentation of expenditures in this report follows the departmental structure as set out in The Government Organization Act, 1969.

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE GOVERNMENT'S FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1969-70

This section outlines the financial operations of the government in 1969-70 giving a brief summary of the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions, the unmatured debt transactions and the changes in the cash position and the debt position during the fiscal year. More detailed explanations are given in subsequent sections of this review.

The following table summarizes the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions for 1969-70 with comparative figures for 1968-69 and indicates how these transactions affected the government's cash balances.

Budgetary transactions

The budgetary revenue, expenditure and surplus as forecast in the budget speech of June 3, 1969 and the actual figures as now estimated are shown in the following table:

TABLE 2

(in millions of dollars)

Budgetary Transactions for Fiscal Year 1969-70	Budget forecast June 3, 1969	Actual (estimated)	Increase or decrease (−) compared with June 3, 1969 forecast
			Amount	Per cent
Revenue	12,025	12,270	245	2.04
Expenditure	11,775	11,815	40	0.34
Surplus	250	455	205

Revenue

Budgetary revenue is estimated at $12,270 million for 1969-70. This is $245 million or approximately two per cent more than the figure of $12,025 million forecast on June 3, 1969 and $2,079 million or 20 per cent more than the total collected in 1968-69.

Tax revenue accounted for $2,001 million of the increase and non-tax revenue accounted for $78 million of the increase over 1968-69 receipts.

The yield from personal income taxes was $759 million higher, from corporation income tax $575 million higher, and from return on investments $106 million higher than in 1968-69.

Expenditure

Budgetary expenditure is estimated at $11,815 million, $40 million or one-third of one per cent more than forecast on June 3, 1969 and $1,048 million or 10 per cent higher than expenditure in 1968-69.

The main changes over 1968-69 expenditure were increases of $224 million in public debt charges, $83 million in payments to provinces, $148 million in respect of the Medical Care Act, $40 million for regional economic expansion and a charge of $123 million in respect of the EXPO deficit.

Surplus

On the basis of these estimated figures, revenue of $12,270 million and expenditure of $11,815 million, there will be a surplus of $455 million compared with a surplus of $250 million as forecast on June 3, 1969 and a deficit of $576 million in 1968-69.

Non-budgetary transactions (excluding unmatured debt transactions)

Non-budgetary transactions are those which increase or decrease the government's asset and liability accounts and do not enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit.

In 1969-70 it is estimated that net disbursements and charges of $2,812 million will exceed net receipts and credits of $2,233 million, resulting in a net requirement of $579 million. In 1968-69 net disbursements and charges were $3,357 million and net receipts and credits were $1,996 million resulting in a net requirement of $1,361 million.

Old age security fund

Receipts by the fund in 1969-70 are estimated at $1,823 million and payments are estimated at $1,719 million resulting in a net gain in the fund of $104 million. In 1968-69 receipts of $1,626 million exceeded payments of $1,541 million by $85 million.

The transactions in the fund during 1969-70 compared with those for 1968-69 are shown in the following table:

	Fiscal year ending March 31 1970 (estimated)	1969
	(in millions of dollars)

	2,444	2,162
Disbursements—
Pension payments	−1,450	−1,297
Guaranteed income supplement	−269	−244
Balance in fund at end of fiscal year	725	621

Canada pension plan account

Receipts during 1969-70 are estimated at $889 million and disbursements at $68 million resulting in a net gain of $821 million. In 1968-69 receipts of $785 million exceeded disbursements of $30 million by $755 million.

The transactions in the fund for 1969-70 compared with those for 1968-69 are shown in the following table:

	Fiscal year ending March 31 1970 (estimated)	1969
	(in millions of dollars)
Balance at beginning of fiscal year	2,108	1,353
Receipts	889	785
Disbursements—
Benefit payments	−50	−16
Administrative expenses	−18	−14
Balance at end of fiscal year	2,929	2,108

The balance in the fund at March 31, 1970 includes investments of $2,809 million in provincial government securities, $15 million in federal government securities and an operating balance of $105 million on deposit with the Receiver General for Canada.

Unmatured debt transactions

It is estimated that these transactions will result in an increase of $463 million in unmatured debt outstanding in the hands of the public compared with an increase of $1,523 million in 1968-69.

Change in cash position

Receiver General bank balances in current deposits including those in foreign currencies are estimated to be $939 million at March 31, 1970 compared with $600 million at March 31, 1969.

The budgetary surplus of $455 million plus the increase of $463 million in outstanding unmatured debt exceeded non-budgetary requirements of $579 million by $339 million.

The implication of the level of government balances at any given time can be misinterpreted because of their wide fluctuations throughout the year, as is illustrated in the following table. Furthermore, because many cheques are issued at the end of a month and are redeemed in the first few days of the following month, whereas the largest percentage of receipts are not received until later, cash balances may drop in the early days of each month by as much as $125 million to $300 million.

Revenue

Budgetary revenue is estimated at $12,270 million, $2,079 million or 20 per cent over the total of $10,191 million received in 1968-69. Tax revenue at $10,987 million accounted for 89 per cent of the total revenue for the year and non-tax revenue at $1,283 million accounted for 11 per cent.

Increases of $759 million in the yield from personal income taxes, $575 million in the yield from corporation income taxes, $414 million in the yield from the social development tax, $155 million from the yield from the sales tax and $106 million in returns from investments are the main items resulting in the higher total in 1969-70.

TAX REVENUE

Federal-provincial fiscal arrangements

Under fiscal arrangements, that became operative in 1962, the federal government withdrew in part from the field of direct taxation and left the vacated area to the provinces. The federal government offered to collect the provincial income taxes without charge provided that provincial personal income tax was expressed as a percentage of federal personal income tax otherwise payable and provincial corporation income tax applied to taxable income calculated in the same way as for federal income tax purposes. To allow for the imposition of the provincial income taxes, the Income Tax Act was amended to abate the federal income tax otherwise payable by individuals in all provinces. The abatement in 1967, 1968, 1969 and 1970 was 28 per cent for taxpayers in all provinces except Quebec and 50 per cent for taxpayers in the Province of Quebec. The higher abatement for Quebec is in compensation of the fact that the payment of youth allowances and full cost of certain programs which are supported jointly by federal and provincial governments in the other provinces have been assumed by Quebec. The federal corporation income tax rates were abated by 10 percentage points for taxable income earned in all provinces in the years 1967, 1968, 1969 and 1970. The federal government has entered into tax-collection agreements under which it collects the provincial personal income taxes of all provinces except Quebec and the provincial corporation income taxes of all provinces except Ontario and Quebec.

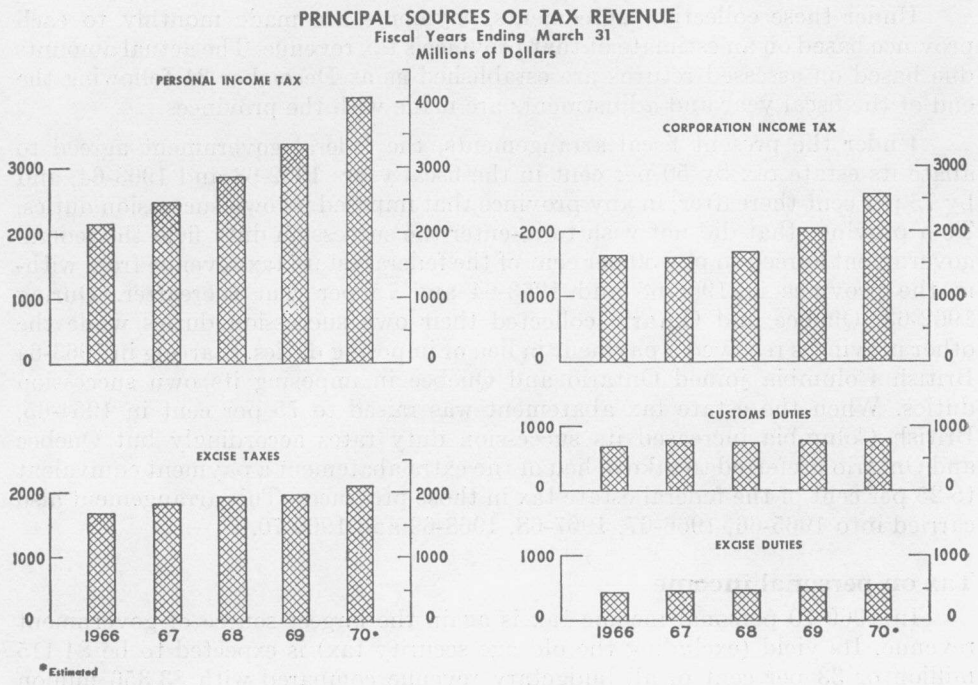
Under these collection agreements, payments are made monthly to each province based on an estimate of that province's tax revenue. The actual amounts due based on assessed returns are established as at December 31 following the end of the fiscal year and adjustments are made with the provinces.

Under the present fiscal arrangements, the federal government agreed to abate its estate tax by 50 per cent in the fiscal years 1962-63 and 1963-64, and by 75 per cent thereafter, in any province that imposed its own succession duties. To a province that did not wish to re-enter the succession duty field the federal government agreed to pay 50 per cent of the federal estate tax revenue from within the province in 1962-63 and 1963-64 and 75 per cent thereafter. During 1962-63, Quebec and Ontario collected their own succession duties while the other provinces received a payment in lieu of imposing duties. Starting in 1963-64 British Columbia joined Ontario and Quebec in imposing its own succession duties. When the estate tax abatement was raised to 75 per cent in 1964-65, British Columbia increased its succession duty rates accordingly but Quebec and Ontario preferred to take in lieu of the extra abatement a payment equivalent to 25 per cent of the federal estate tax in those provinces. This arrangement also carried into 1965-66, 1966-67, 1967-68, 1968-69 and 1969-70.

Tax on personal income

In 1969-70 personal income tax is again the largest source of government revenue. Its yield (excluding the old age security tax) is expected to be $4,115 million or 33 per cent of all budgetary revenue compared with $3,356 million or 33 per cent in 1968-69. The increase of $759 million was due mainly to a higher level of personal incomes in 1969-70 and partly due to a temporary surtax of 3 per cent on the basic tax in excess of $200 applied in respect of tax imposed on 1968 and 1969 income. A full year's yield from the tax was not received in 1968-69.

In addition to the federal revenue, it is estimated that $1,312 million will be allocated to the provincial tax collection agreements account under the terms of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements compared with $1,089 million in 1968-69.



The tax on personal incomes levied under the Old Age Security Act and credited to the old age security fund is estimated at $1,027 million compared with $915 million in 1968-69. This increase of $112 million is due mainly to higher levels of personal income in 1969-70.

Corporation income tax

Corporation income tax was the second largest source of government revenue. The yield (excluding the old age security tax) is estimated at $2,605 million or 21 per cent of total budgetary revenue compared with $2,030 million or 20 per cent in 1968-69. The increase of $575 million was due to higher corporation incomes during the year.

In addition to the federal revenue, it is estimated that $249 million will be allocated to the provincial tax collection agreements account under terms of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements compared with $171 million in 1968-69.

The tax on incomes of corporations levied under the Old Age Security Act and credited to the old age security fund is estimated at $227 million compared with $183 million in 1968-69.

Taxes on dividends, interest, etc., going abroad

Revenue in this category is derived from taxes withheld from dividends, interest, rents, royalties, alimony and income from estates and trusts paid to non-residents.

Collections of $240 million are $34 million higher than in 1968-69.

Social development tax

This is a new tax which first took effect for the taxation year 1969. The tax, which is imposed on individuals, is the lesser of 2 per cent of the taxable income or $120. During 1969-70, its yield is expected to be $477 million compared with $63 million in 1968-69.

Excise taxes

From a revenue standpoint the general sales tax is the most important tax levied under the Excise Tax Act. Receipts (excluding the old age security tax) are estimated at $1,725 million compared with $1,570 million in 1968-69.

The sales tax levied under the Old Age Security Act and credited to the old age security fund is expected to be $569 million compared with $528 million in 1968-69.

The yield of $380 million from other excise taxes is $2 million more than in 1968-69.

Customs import duties

Receipts from this source in the amount of $815 million are $53 million more than in 1968-69.

Excise duties

Excise duties are levied on alcoholic beverages (other than wines) and tobacco products. (Additional taxes on tobacco products are levied under the Excise Tax Act.) Net receipts of $525 million are $16 million higher than in 1968-69.

Gross receipts of $334 million from duties on alcoholic beverages consist of $195 million in respect of spirits and $139 million in respect of beer and are $14 million higher than collections of $320 million in 1968-69 of which $185 million was in respect of spirits and $135 million in respect of beer.

Gross receipts of $199 million from duties on tobacco products are $3 million more than in 1968-69.

Refunds and drawbacks of $9 million bring net excise duty collections to $525 million. In 1968-69 refunds and drawbacks were $8 million and net receipts were $509 million.

Estate tax

Revenue in this category is derived under the Estate Tax Act. Net receipts of $105 million are $7 million less than receipts of $112 million in 1968-69.

Other taxes

Revenue under this heading of $200 thousand is approximately the same as in 1968-69.

NON-TAX REVENUE

Non-tax revenue in the amount of $1,283 million is $78 million more than in 1968-69. The main changes are increases of $106 million in return on investments and $42 million in post office revenue and a decrease of $67 million in bullion and coinage.

[1] Formerly the Export Credits Insurance Corporation.

Receipts from Crown corporations at $615 million are $86 million more than in 1968-69. The main changes are increases of $43 million in Bank of Canada profits paid to the government and $35 million in payments by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The yield from other loans and investments at $186 million is $20 million more than in 1968-69. The main changes are increases of $20 million in interest in Receiver General deposits with chartered banks and $18 million in interest received on the loan to the United Kingdom. In 1968-69 the interest due on that loan was deferred in accordance with a special agreement.

Post office revenue

Gross receipts from post office operations are estimated at $407 million for 1969-70 but authorized disbursements from revenue, for salaries and allowances at semi-staff and revenue offices, transit charges on Canadian mail forwarded through and delivered in foreign countries, in the amount of $54 million resulted in net receipts of $353 million. In 1968-69 gross receipts were $363 million, authorized disbursements were $53 million and net receipts were $310 million.

Net costs of operating the Post Office for 1969-70 are expected to be $350 million (excluding the $54 million charged to revenue). As net revenue is expected to be $353 million there is an estimated operating surplus of $3 million. In 1968-69 net costs of $342 million exceeded net receipts of $310 million by $32 million.

It should be noted that the total shown for post office revenue does not reflect any payment for the franking privilege covering parliamentary and departmental mail or for certain miscellaneous services provided for other government departments and agencies nor do the operating costs include any charges for premises occupied by the Post Office or for accounting and special services provided by other departments.

Refunds of previous years' expenditure

Revenue under this heading in the amount of $24 million includes $7 million in receipts by the Department of National Defence, mainly from adjustments to cost audits and to adjustments on contracts with the United States government, and $5 million in receipts by the Department of Veterans Affairs mainly from refunds of veterans pensions, allowances and re-establishment credits. In 1968-69 receipts totalled $24 million.

Services and service fees

Revenue from this source of $29 million includes $10 million in receipts by the Department of Agriculture mainly for services in connection with the inspection, weighing, storage and elevation of grain and $3 million in receipts by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for electricity, gas, weights and measures inspection fees. In 1968-69 receipts totalled $31 million.

Proceeds from sales

Revenue of $18 million includes receipts of $5 million by the Department of Supply and Services mainly from the sale of surplus Crown assets and $3 million in receipts by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation from the sales of properties. In 1968-69 receipts totalled $17 million.

Privileges, licences and permits

Revenue of $34 million from this category includes $13 million in receipts by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development from fees, leases and royalties in respect of oil, gas and gold and receipts of $6 million by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs from patents, trade marks, charters, etc. and $5 million in receipts by the Department of Public Works for rental of public buildings and sites. In 1968-69 receipts totalled $35 million.

Bullion and coinage

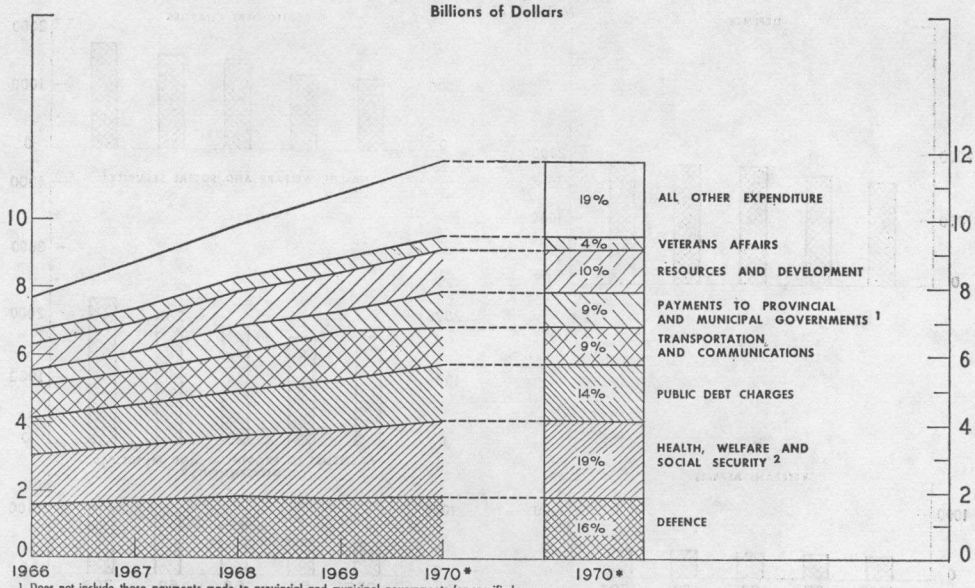
This revenue which is derived from the operation of the Royal Canadian Mint is $8 million compared with $75 million in 1968-69. The decrease is due to the fact that the 1968-69 total included a net gain of $66 million in nickel coinage mainly accounted for by the change in the composition of the 10 cent, 25 cent and 50 cent coins.

Premium, discount and exchange

These transactions reflect a net expenditure of $5 million compared with net revenue of $500 thousand in 1968-69.

Other non-tax revenue

Other non-tax revenue in the amount of $17 million is approximately the same as in 1968-69.



EXPENDITURE

Budgetary expenditure for 1969-70 is estimated at $11,815 million, an increase of $1,048 million over the 1968-69 total of $10,767 million.

Expenditures for mines, minerals, energy and geosciences amount to $53 million, of which $15 million was emergency gold mining assistance, $11 million was for field and air surveys and $10 million for geological research. In 1968-69 expenditures of $55 million included $15 million for emergency gold mining assistance, $12 million for field and air surveys and $11 million for geological research.

Expenditures for water and co-ordination of renewable resources programs of $44 million include $20 million for marine surveys and research and $18 million for research and investigations on water resources. In 1968-69 expenditures of $39 million included $18 million for marine surveys and research and $16 million for research and investigations on water resources.

Expenditures for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited amount to $69 million, compared with $69 million in 1968-69, for Atomic Energy Control Board $6 million, compared with $4 million and for the Dominion Coal Board $8 million, compared with $7 million.

External Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs, including the Canadian International Development Agency and the International Joint Commission, in the amount of $248 million are $22 million more than the total for the previous year.

Expenditures of the Canadian International Development Agency are $175 million compared with $157 million in 1968-69. Included in these expenditures are $82 million for the international food aid program ($69 million in 1968-69), $57 million for the international development assistance ($63 million in 1968-69) and $25 million for grants to international organizations ($15 million in 1968-69).

Public debt charges

Public debt charges consist of interest on the public debt, the annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions, the cost of issuing new loans and other costs incurred in servicing the public debt. These charges in the amount of $1,704 million include interest on public debt of $1,663 million of which $1,284 million is in respect of unmatured debt and $379 million in respect of other liabilities.

The increase of $148 million in interest on unmatured debt reflects an increase in unmatured debt and higher interest rates. The increase in interest on other liabilities is attributable mainly to the superannuation accounts.

Other public debt charges of $41 million are $4 million higher than in 1968-69.

When considering the magnitude of these public debt charges and the burden they place upon the public treasury, it must be borne in mind that a substantial portion of the debt is attributable to, or is invested in, productive or earning assets. Therefore, in calculating the net burden of the government's annual interest charges, the income derived from loans, investments and other productive assets must be taken into account. For 1969-70 this income is estimated at $801 million as shown in the non-tax revenue section under the heading "return on investments". This amount deducted from the gross total of $1,663 million for interest as shown in the table leaves a net amount of $862 million compared with a net of $747 million in 1968-69. Measured as a percentage of the net debt the burden of the net annual interest charges is 5.10 per cent in 1969-70 compared with 4.31 per cent in 1968-69. As a percentage of the gross national product for the calendar year ending within the fiscal year, the relative burden is 1.17 per cent compared with 1.11 per cent in 1968-69.

Fiscal, subsidy and other payments to provinces

Budgetary expenditure for payments to the provinces is $950 million, $83 million more than in 1968-69.

Payments of $751 million under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act are $107 million higher than in 1968-69.

Payments of $167 million under the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act to the Province of Quebec are in compensation to that province for its opting out of the following programs: hospital insurance and diagnostic services, old age assistance, disabled persons allowances, blind persons allowances, unemployment assistance and Canada assistance plan; and in part, the general health grants program. Payments totalled $187 million in 1968-69.

Subsidies to provinces payable under the British North America Acts and other statutory authority are $32 million, the same as in 1968-69.

The transfers of certain public utility tax receipts of $24 million in 1969-70, are $3 million more than in 1968-69 and represent the transferable portion of income tax received from corporations whose main business is the distribution to, or generation for distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas and steam.

The Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964, provides that where, in any fiscal year commencing on or after April 1, 1964, the federal savings in respect of a province providing schooling allowances exceeds the federal revenue abatement in respect of that province for the taxation year ending in that fiscal year, the Minister of Finance may, out of the consolidated revenue fund, pay to that province in respect of that fiscal year an amount equal to the excess and where for a taxation year ending in any fiscal year commencing on or after April 1, 1964 the federal revenue abatement in respect of a province providing schooling allowances exceeds the federal savings in that fiscal year in respect of that province, the amount of the excess may be deducted from any payment to that province under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act or under any subsequent act of the Parliament of Canada substituted therefor, or may be otherwise recovered as a debt due to Canada by that province. The abatement for the taxation year 1969 and the revised abatement for the taxation year 1968 in respect of the Province of Quebec exceeds the federal savings by $24 million which has been recovered from payments to the province under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act; in 1968-69 the abatement for the taxation year 1968 exceeded the federal savings by $17 million and was recovered.

Expenditures of $1,534 million for defence services include $1,293 million for administration, operation and maintenance, $226 million for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment and $15 million for development. In 1968-69 expenditure of $1,508 million included $1,227 million for operation and maintenance, $261 million for construction or acquisition and $18 million for development.

Expenditures for pensions and other benefits are $174 million and include $156 million in respect of the Canadian forces superannuation account, $8 million for the government's contribution as an employer to the Canada pension plan and the Quebec pension plan and $10 million in payments under Parts I–IV of the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act. In 1968-69 expenditures totalled $179 million of which $161 million was in respect of the superannuation account, $8 million for the government's contribution as an employer to the Canada pension plan and the Quebec pension plan and $9 million for payments under Parts I–IV of the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act.

The government's contribution to the Canadian forces superannuation account, of an amount equal to $1\frac{2}{3}$ times the contributions of the permanent services personnel for the first quarter of 1969-70 and at $1\frac{4}{5}$ times commencing with the second quarter, was $63 million compared with $57 million in 1968-69. An amount of $93 million, in respect of the actuarial deficiency arising out of pay increases was also charged to budgetary expenditure in 1969-70.

Defence research costs of $47 million are $3 million more than in 1968-69.

Mutual aid to NATO countries including contributions towards military costs of NATO at $14 million are $1 million less than 1968-69.

Expenditures in respect of the Canada Emergency Measures Organization are $5 million, a decrease of $1 million from the previous fiscal year.

National Health and Welfare

Expenditures of the Department of National Health and Welfare including the Medical Research Council are $1,950 million compared with $1,669 million in 1968-69.

Outlays for welfare services amount to $938 million compared with $901 million in 1968-69; outlays for health insurance and resources are $913 million compared with $674 million; outlays for medical services are $43 million compared with $45 million; and outlays in respect of the medical research council are $31 million compared with $27 million.

Family allowances, family assistance and youth allowances

These expenditures total $618 million of which $560 million is family allowances, $55 million is youth allowances and $3 million is family assistance. In 1968-69 the total was $616 million of which $560 million was family allowances, $52 million was youth allowances and $4 million was family assistance.

Family allowances are payable in respect of all children under sixteen years of age, resident in Canada, with minor exceptions such as in the case of children of immigrants who must reside in Canada one year before family allowance is payable. The monthly allowance is $6 if the child is under 10 years of age and $8 in the age group 10 to 15.

Family assistance is payable at the same rates to children of immigrants and settlers during their first year of residence in Canada.

Youth allowances are payable at the rate of $10 per month in respect of persons resident in Canada who have attained the age of 16 years and have not attained the age of 18 years and who are in full-time attendance at a school or university or are by reason of mental or physical infirmity precluded from attending school or university. No payments were made in respect of persons resident in the Province of Quebec. However, under authority of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964, abatements in federal income tax otherwise payable by individuals resident in that province were allowed in compensation of the fact that the payment of youth allowances had been assumed by the province and to allow for the imposition of the required provincial income taxes.

Canada assistance plan

Payments to provinces under the Canada assistance plan totalled $295 million compared with $258 million in 1968-69. The Canada Assistance Plan Act which was enacted in 1966 authorized the federal government to enter into agreements with the provinces for sharing the costs of assistance and welfare services provided by the provinces, territories and municipalities to persons in need, including the costs of food, shelter, clothing, fuel and utilities, essential household supplies, expenses incidental to a trade, care in a home for special care, travel and transportation, funerals and burials, health care services, prescribed welfare services including rehabilitation, and comfort allowances. The rate of federal contribution is 50 per cent of the shareable costs; the rates of assistance granted and the specific conditions of eligibility applied are determined by the provinces and their municipalities and take into account the budgetary requirements as well as the income and resources of the applicants. Contributions under this plan have replaced certain contributions which formerly had been made under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Disabled Persons Act, the Blind Persons Act and the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Under federal-provincial agreement the Province of Quebec has opted out of this program.

Old age assistance, disabled persons allowances and blind persons allowances

Contributions to the provinces for old age assistance total $1 million in 1969-70 compared with $3 million in 1968-69, for disabled persons allowances $4 million compared with $6 million and for blind persons allowances $1 million compared with $2 million.

The decreases noted above are due mainly to the fact that certain contributions to the provinces which in prior years were made under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act are now being made under the Canada assistance plan. The decrease in old age assistance payments was also due to the lowering of the age limit for old age security benefits.

Under the Old Age Assistance Act, the federal government reimburses the provinces by paying 50 per cent of the lesser of $75 monthly or the amount of assistance given by the provinces in the form of monthly pensions to eligible persons in need who have attained the age of 65 years. (Under the Old Age Security Act, all persons who satisfy the residence requirements of the act may receive a pension of $79.58 ($75 up to January 1, 1968, $76.50 to January 1, 1969, and $78 to January 1, 1970) per month from the federal government out of the old age security fund provided that no pension is paid in any month before January 1966 in which the person had not attained 70 years of age, the age limit being reduced by one in each subsequent year until 1970. An amendment to the Old Age Security Act authorizes the payment of a monthly guaranteed income supplement to eligible pensioners. The amount of the supplement that may be paid to a pensioner for a month is (a) in the year 1967, $30 and (b) in any year after 1967, 40 per cent of the amount of the pension that may be paid to him for that month, dependent upon the amount of his income for the preceding year.)

Similarly, the federal government reimburses the provinces under the Blind Persons Act for allowances of not more than $75 per month to blind persons in need 18 years of age or over by paying 75 per cent of the total payments, and under the Disabled Persons Act by paying 50 per cent of not more than $75 per month for allowances to disabled persons in need 18 years of age or over.

Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act

Contributions of $625 million to the provinces in 1969-70 under this act are $63 million more than in 1968-69. Under federal-provincial agreement the Province of Quebec has opted out of this program.

SUMMARY

The gross liabilities of the government are estimated at $38,018 million as at March 31, 1970 compared with $35,919 million at March 31, 1969. The increase of $2,099 million is due mainly to annuity, insurance and pension accounts which are $1,698 million higher than at March 31, 1969.

Net recorded assets at $21,137 million are $2,554 million higher than the previous year-end total of $18,583 million. The main changes are increases of $868 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations and $801 million in the Canada pension plan investment fund.

The net debt of Canada, or the excess of liabilities over net recorded assets, is estimated at $16,881 million as at March 31, 1970 compared with $17,336 million at March 31, 1969.

Liability Accounts

Current and demand liabilities

These liabilities, which consist of obligations of the government payable currently or on demand, in the amount of $2,322 million are $103 million more than the total at March 31, 1969.

There are increases of $15 million in outstanding cheques and $135 million in accounts payable and a decrease of $223 million in non-interest-bearing notes.

Non-interest-bearing notes represent those portions of Canada's equities in the capital of certain international agencies which are not covered by cash or gold. Notes in respect of the international monetary fund in the amount of $361 million are $191 million less and those in respect of the international development association at $11 million are $34 million less than at March 31, 1969.

Special Drawing Rights in the international monetary fund represent an allocation of the equivalent of U.S. $124 million = Can. $134 million to Canada by the international monetary fund of a newly created international reserve asset. These Special Drawing Rights have been advanced to the exchange fund account and are included therein.

Public service superannuation account

The balance of $3,648 million in this account is $470 million higher than at March 31, 1969. Receipts of $564 million include employee contributions of $94 million, the government's contribution of $73 million, interest of $131 million, an actuarial liability adjustment of $260 million and a contribution of $6 million by Crown corporations. Contributions by the government and Crown corporations are equal to the estimated current and prior service payments by individuals in 1968-69.

The actuarial adjustment of $260 million is comprised of $51 million to cover the deficit revealed by the quinquennial valuation of the account as at December 31, 1967 and $209 million to provide for additional liabilities arising out of salary increases in 1969-70.

Disbursements of $94 million include $82 million for annuities and $10 million for withdrawals of contributions.

In 1968-69 receipts were $390 million and disbursements were $87 million.

Government annuities account

The balance of $1,321 million in this account is $4 million less than the balance at March 31, 1969.

Receipts of $64 million include $13 million from premiums and $51 million in interest. Disbursements of $68 million consist mainly of vested annuity and commuted value payments and refunds of premiums.

In 1968-69 receipts totalled $66 million and disbursements were $67 million.

Old age security fund

The Old Age Security Act, 1951 directed that this fund be established and that credits to the fund should consist of a 2 per cent sales tax, a 2 per cent tax (maximum $60) on individual incomes and a 2 per cent tax on corporation incomes, and that pension payments of $40 per month be paid to all eligible persons over 70 years of age. Payments were effective from January 1, 1952.

Amendments to the act have increased the tax rates: on individual incomes to 3 per cent effective January 1, 1959 and to 4 per cent effective January 1, 1964 (maximum tax $120 increased to $240 effective January 1, 1967); on corporation incomes to 3 per cent effective January 1, 1959; and on sales to 3 per cent effective April 10, 1959.

Pension rates have also been increased by amendments to the act to $75 per month effective October 1, 1963; to $76.50 per month effective January 1, 1968; to $78 per month effective January 1, 1969; and to $79.58 effective January 1, 1970.

The act was further amended to authorize pension payments effective January 1, 1966 to all persons who satisfied the residence requirements of the act who had attained the age of 69 years on or before January 1, 1966; the age limit being reduced by one year on January 1 of each subsequent year until 1970. A further amendment to the act in 1966-67 authorized the payment of a monthly guaranteed income supplement to eligible pensioners. The amount of the supplement that may be paid to a pensioner for a month is 40 per cent of the amount of the pension that may be paid to him for that month dependent upon the amount of his income for the preceding year.

Receipts of $1,823 million include $569 million from sales tax, $1,027 million from the tax on personal incomes and $227 million from the tax on corporation incomes.

Payments of $1,719 million consist of $1,450 million in pension payments and $269 million in guaranteed income supplements.

In 1968-69 receipts were $1,626 million and payments were $1,541 million.

Undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts

This category records the undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts from which disbursements may be made for authorized purposes. They fall into two classes. The first of these, comprising the majority of the accounts, consists of those cases where parliament has appropriated moneys for specific purposes. The other class consists of accounts to which is credited moneys received from the sale of materials, supplies, equipment, land, works and buildings and which are available for purposes of the Department of National Defence.

The balance of $128 million is $108 million less than the balance of $236 million at March 31, 1969.

The main change was a decrease of $86 million in the reserve for salary revisions.

Refundable corporation tax

This account records the refundable corporation tax on cash profits of businesses that is payable by all corporations not exempt from tax under section 62 of the Income Tax Act and by certain types of trusts on specified types of income.

The balance of $27 million is $114 million less than the balance at March 31, 1969. The decrease represents refunds made during the year.

Provision for compound interest on Canada savings bonds

This account records the estimated amount for the prorated provision for the special compound interest feature applicable to certain Canada savings bonds.

The balance of $20 million is $8 million higher than the balance at March 31, 1969.

Deferred credits

Recorded in these accounts are amounts due the government in respect of which payment is deferred. These are contra accounts to corresponding items under the asset categories: "loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations", "loans to national governments" and "other loans and investments".

The balance of $183 million is $9 million more than at March 31, 1969.

Also included in this category are premiums, received on the issue of Government of Canada bonds, which are being credited to public debt charges on a monthly amortization basis.

Deferred interest of $70 million in respect of The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority is $9 million higher than at March 31, 1969.

The agricultural commodities stabilization account records the operations of the agricultural stabilization board which was established under provisions of the Agricultural Stabilization Act to take such action as necessary to stabilize the price of agricultural commodities at their respective prescribed prices. It is estimated that the Board's operations will result in a net increase of $1 million in the account during 1969-70.

The stockpiling of uranium concentrates account records the acquisition of uranium concentrates in accordance with contracts entered into with the approval of the Governor in Council by Eldorado Nuclear Limited on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada with certain mining companies. The balance of $91 million is $4 million higher than the balance at March 31, 1969.

The defence production revolving fund records the cost of materials procured for use in the manufacture of defence equipment until such time as they are billed to the Department of National Defence or sold to defence contractors for use in the manufacture of defence equipment, as well as working capital loans and advances for their production. The balance of $33 million in the account is $2 million less than at the previous year end.

Cash in blocked currency

The balance of $2 million in the account is slightly less than the balance at the end of the previous fiscal year.

Notes of Industrias Forestales, S.A. and Compania Manufacturera de Papeles y Cartones, S.A., held by the Export Development Corporation (formerly the Export Credits Insurance Corporation) and which were due in 1965 and 1966, could not be paid in accordance with their terms because the Chilean Government was unable to make available the necessary Canadian currency. An alternate scheme was devised whereby the debtors could make their payments on the notes.

The corporation received the payments in Chile in Canadian dollars and the amount upon receipt was paid into a blocked account established by the Receiver General for Canada with the Central Bank of Chile, the Government of Chile to pay in Canadian dollars interest at 6 per cent per annum on the sums held in this account directly to the Receiver General in Ottawa.

The Government of Chile agreed to the withdrawal of 20 per cent of the deposits made to the account in 1965 in each of the years 1968 to 1972 and 20 per cent of the deposits made to the account in 1966 in each of the years 1969 to 1973.

Advances to the exchange fund

Advances during the year to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange are estimated at $1,471 million and repayments are estimated at $1,342 million resulting in a balance of $2,996 million in the account at March 31, 1970. Included in these advances is $134 million (U.S. $124 million) in special drawing rights issued by the international monetary fund.

Investments in special United States of America securities issued by other than the Government of Canada

This account records the special securities issued by the Government of the United States of America and purchased by Canada pursuant to agreements made to carry out the Columbia River Treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada. During 1969-70 securities in the amount of $32 million have been redeemed leaving a balance of $58 million in the account at March 31, 1970.

Canada pension plan investment fund

This account records securities purchased under the Canada Pension Plan Act and the sale of these securities. The amount by which the operating balance of the Canada pension plan fund in any month exceeds the estimated amount required to meet all payments in the following three-month period is available for the purchase of securities of participating provinces. Securities of Canada shall be purchased with the excess remaining after purchasing securities of each province as required. The estimated holdings in the account as at March 31, 1970 are $2,824 million of which $2,809 million is provincial government securities and $15 million is federal government securities.

During the year 1969-70 the government will have made advances in an estimated amount of $76 million to the Canadian National Railways for capital purposes and the refunding of debt in the hands of the public and loans of $91 million to Air Canada for capital purposes.

To assist the railway company to finance further capital expenditure the government will have purchased $32 million of the 4 per cent preferred stock of the company. This stock is issued under the authority of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952 in an amount equal to 3 per cent of the gross revenue of the company.

At March 31, 1969 temporary loans of $5 million were outstanding to the railway company in respect of its 1969 deficit. Additional loans of $20 million were advanced during the year for its 1969 operations. These will be charged to 1969-70 budgetary expenditures on parliamentary approval.

At March 31, 1969 temporary loans of $3 million were outstanding to Air Canada in respect of its 1969 operations. An additional $13 million was advanced during the year for its 1969 operations. These have been repaid by the company.

Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition

This account recorded the purchase by the federal government of securities issued by the corporation in accordance with the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act. The balance at March 31, 1969 was $148 million of which $123 million was guaranteed by the federal government, $14 million was guaranteed by the City of Montreal and $11 million by the Province of Quebec.

The Expo Winding-up Act passed by the House of Commons on November 24, 1969 provided for the dissolution of the corporation and the write-off of Canada's share of the deficit of the corporation.

Also during the year the loans guaranteed by the Province of Quebec have been transferred to the asset category "loans to provinces" and those guaranteed by the City of Montreal have been transferred to the asset category "miscellaneous loans and investments".

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation

The balance shown in this account at March 31, 1970 is $4,437 million, $476 million higher than at March 31, 1969.

Loans and advances of $608 million are partly offset by repayments of $132 million.

Advances include $457 million for direct lending, limited dividend and public housing, $39 million for sewage treatment projects, $57 million for university housing projects, $49 million for federal-provincial projects and $7 million for urban renewal.

Repayments include $113 million for direct lending, limited dividend and public housing, $10 million for sewage treatment projects, $5 million for federal-provincial projects and $2 million for acquisition or construction of real estate.

Export Development Corporation (formerly Export Credits Insurance Corporation)

The Export Development Corporation was established by the Export Development Act as passed by the House of Commons on June 5, 1969.

The Export Development Act as passed by the House of Commons on June 5, 1969 established the Export Development Corporation and declared it to be the successor to the Export Credits Insurance Corporation and transferred all property rights, obligations and liabilities of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation to the Export Development Corporation; and that upon surrender by the Minister of shares in the Export Credits Insurance Corporation the Minister shall be issued an equivalent number of shares in the Export Development Corporation.

The authorized capital of the new corporation is $25 million (250,000 shares at the par value of $100 each) and the Minister of Finance shall subscribe for all the shares of the corporation at par and shall pay to the corporation the amount of such subscriptions out of the consolidated revenue fund at such times and in such amounts as the board requires.

Whenever the Minister of Finance pays any part of a subscription for shares he shall in addition pay to the corporation out of the consolidated revenue fund an equal amount to be credited to the capital surplus account of the corporation, which account shall not exceed in the aggregate $25 million.

The balance of $281 million consists of $5 million in capital shares, $5 million in the capital surplus account and $271 million in loans.

Farm Credit Corporation

The government provides loans to the corporation which makes loans on farm property. The balance of $1,140 million shown in the account consists of the Crown's investment of $40 million in the capital of the corporation and $1,100 million in loans. At March 31, 1969 the balance of $1,050 million consisted of $40 million capital and $1,010 million in loans.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority

Outstanding obligations in this account in the amount of $549 million consist of $404 million in interest-bearing loans, $75 million in interest-free loans and $70 million in deferred interest. At March 31, 1969 outstanding obligations were $521 million of which $386 million were interest-bearing loans, $75 million were interest-free loans and $60 million was deferred interest.

Loans to national governments

It is expected that these loans will increase by $64 million during the year bringing the balance to $1,333 million at March 31, 1970.

An increase of $86 million in special loan assistance to developing countries was partly offset by repayments of $20 million by the United Kingdom and $2 million by Belgium.

Canada's subscriptions to the capital of international organizations at $1,029 million are $30 million higher, due mainly to additional subscriptions to the international development association.

Loans to provincial governments at $281 million are $11 million higher due in part to the fact that the federal government accepted notes in the amount of $11 million from the Province of Quebec to cover the provinces share of the EXPO deficit.

Advances under the Veterans Land Act at $482 million are $60 million higher and advances under the Municipal Development and Loan Act at $273 million are $8 million less than at March 31, 1969.

Miscellaneous loans and advances in the amount of $181 million are $39 million higher than at the previous year-end, due mainly to increases of $9 million for loans for defence plant modernization and $11 million for loans to manufacturers of automotive products in Canada.

Securities held in trust

Recorded herein are the security holdings in connection with various deposit and trust accounts and annuity, insurance and pension accounts. Bonds and certified cheques held in connection with contractors securities are also recorded under this heading. The balance at March 31, 1970 is estimated at $130 million compared with $112 million at March 31, 1969.

Deferred charges

These consist of the unamortized balances of actuarial deficiencies in the superannuation accounts and the outstanding unamortized loan flotation costs.

The balances in these accounts in the amount of $784 million are $171 million more than at March 31, 1969.

Unamortized portions of actuarial deficiencies

Any actuarial deficiency revealed by quinquennial valuations is credited to the superannuation accounts and charged to these accounts and amortized to budgetary expenditure in five equal annual instalments commencing in the fiscal year in which the report is laid before Parliament. Also the cost of benefits payable under the superannuation acts as a result of the authorization of salary increases are credited to the superannuation accounts and charged to these accounts and amortized to budgetary expenditure over a period of five years commencing in the year in which the increase is authorized.

The unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the Canadian forces superannuation account is expected to be $255 million at March 31, 1970 compared with $243 million at March 31, 1969. During the year $129 million was charged thereto as a result of salary increases and $117 million was amortized to budgetary expenditure of which $24 million was charged to interest on public debt.

The unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the public service superannuation account is expected to be $320 million at March 31, 1970 compared with $187 million at March 31, 1969. During the year $209 million as a result of salary increases and $51 million as a result of the quinquennial valuation as at December 31, 1967 was charged thereto and $127 million was amortized to budgetary expenditure of which $25 million was charged to interest on public debt.

The unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account is expected to be $29 million compared with $21 million at March 31, 1969. During the year $19 million was charged thereto as a result of salary increases and $11 million was amortized to budgetary expenditure of which $1 million was charged to interest on public debt.

Unamortized loan flotation costs

This account records the residual balances of discounts, commissions, redemption bonuses and conversion premiums on loan flotations that have not been charged to budgetary expenditure. The balance of $182 million is $18 million higher than at March 31, 1969.

Cost of new loans issued during 1969-70 and charged to this account is $85 million, of which $38 million is in respect of treasury bills discounts which will be charged to interest on public debt in 1970-71. Credits of $67 million to the account include $33 million (representing discount applicable to 1969-70 on treasury bills sold in 1968-69) charged to the budgetary item "interest on public debt".

Treasury bills discounts applicable to the current fiscal year are charged to interest on public debt at the time of sale. That portion of the discounts applicable to the subsequent fiscal year is charged to this account and transferred to interest on public debt in the following year.

Capital assets

Assets of the government such as land, buildings, works and equipment, etc. that are charged to budgetary expenditure at the time of acquisition or construction, are included in this category and are shown on the statement of assets and liabilities at a nominal value of $1.

Inactive loans and investments

Loans and investments which are not currently revenue-producing or realizable are recorded herein. Included are the loan of $49 million to China under the Export Credits Insurance Act, loans totalling $24 million and $7 million made to Roumania and Greece, respectively, in 1919-20 and 1920-21 and advances of $15 million in respect of the implementation of guarantees (Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited).

Reserve for losses on realization of assets

There has been no change in this reserve since the fiscal year 1956-57. The balance is $546 million.

Net Debt

The net debt of Canada, or the excess of liabilities over net recorded assets, is estimated at $16,881 million as at March 31, 1970 compared with $17,336 million at March 31, 1969. The decrease of $455 million reflects the estimated 1969-70 budgetary surplus.

THE CASH POSITION

The government's cash account represents balances of current and special deposits to the credit of the Receiver General for Canada in the Bank of Canada, chartered banks in Canada and certain banks in London, New York, Brussels, Bonn, Frankfurt and Rome. These balances are expected to amount to $941 million at March 31, 1970 an increase of $339 million over the balance at March 31, 1969.

The following statement summarizes both the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions in 1969-70 and indicates how they affected the government's cash position. For purposes of comparison the corresponding figures for 1968-69 are also shown.

The cash position of the government is affected not only by budgetary transactions but also by changes in the government's unmatured debt and other non-budgetary transactions. Non-budgetary transactions are those which affect the government's asset and liability accounts and must be taken into account when considering the full scope of the government's financial operations and their effect on the economy of the country.

On the asset side, the non-budgetary transactions consist, for the most part, of loans and advances to, and repayments by, Crown corporations and other government agencies and funds, national, provincial and municipal governments, international organizations, veterans and other borrowers. On the liability side they relate mainly to receipts and payments in connection with the many deposit and trust accounts, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the government.

In 1969-70 an estimated surplus of $455 million in budgetary transactions and an estimated net requirement of $579 million for non-budgetary transactions (excluding unmatured debt transactions) will result in a net cash requirement of $124 million. As transactions in unmatured debt during the year are expected to result in an increase of $463 million in outstanding unmatured debt as at March 31, 1970, Receiver General bank balances will increase by $339 million. In 1968-69 the budgetary deficit of $576 million and net requirements of $1,361 million for non-budgetary transactions resulted in a cash requirement of $1,937 million which was financed by an increase of $1,523 million in outstanding unmatured debt and a decrease of $414 million in Receiver General bank balances.

Non-budgetary receipts and credits (excluding unmatured debt transactions)

Non-budgetary receipts and credits of $2,233 million include $1,698 million in respect of annuity, insurance and pension accounts, $195 million in repayments of loans, investments and advances and $340 million in sundry other accounts.

Further details are given in the following table:

THE PUBLIC DEBT

Gross and net debt

The gross debt of Canada, or the total of liabilities as recorded on the statement of assets and liabilities, is estimated to be $38,018 million as at March 31, 1970, an increase of $2,099 million over the total at March 31, 1969. The main changes are increases of $1,698 million in annuity, insurance and pension accounts and $512 million in unmatured debt and decreases of $108 million in undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts and $114 million in refundable corporation tax. Unmatured debt at $22,613 million represents 60 per cent of the total and annuity, insurance and pension accounts at $12,218 million represents 32 per cent. At March 31, 1969 unmatured debt was $22,101 million or 61 per cent and annuity, insurance and pension accounts in the amount of $10,520 million were 29 per cent of total liabilities.

The government's net recorded assets are estimated to amount to $21,137 million as at March 31, 1970 an increase of $2,554 million over the total at March 31, 1969. The main changes are increases of $868 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations, $801 million in the Canada pension plan investment fund, $132 million in other loans and investments, $389 million in current assets, $129 million in advances to the exchange fund account and $171 million in deferred charges. Loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations at $9,636 million represent 46 per cent, the Canada pension plan investment fund at $2,824 million represents 13 per cent and advances to the exchange fund account at $2,996 million represents 13 per cent. At March 31, 1969, loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations were $8,768 million or 47 per cent, the Canada pension plan investment fund was $2,023 million or 11 per cent and advances to the exchange fund account at $2,867 million was 15 per cent of the total.

Based on the above figures the net debt of Canada will be $16,881 million at March 31, 1970 reflecting a decrease of $455 million, equivalent to the 1969-70 estimated surplus.

Unmatured debt

Total unmatured debt of $22,613 million is $512 million more than at March 31, 1969.

The government's holdings of its own securities as at March 31, 1970 are estimated to be $101 million comprised of $95 million in the securities investment account (of which $43 million is Canada savings bonds held in respect of the employees instalment purchase plan) and $6 million in investments held for retirement of unmatured debt. This is an increase of $51 million over the previous year-end total, when holdings were $44 million in the securities investment account ($41 million in investments in the employees instalment purchase plan account) and $6 million in investments held for retirement of unmatured debt.

Of the total unmatured debt, $22,166 million is payable in Canadian dollars, $265 million in United States dollars, $108 million in Italian lire and $74 million in German deutsche marks. Securities payable in foreign currencies have been valued at official parity rates.

Summary of security issues, maturities, cancellations and redemptions

Excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature weekly, it is expected that the government will issue securities in an amount of $6,632 million and maturities, cancellations and redemptions will total $6,120 million.

Net sales of Canada savings bonds series 24 of $4,704 million and additional net sales of series 23 of $29 million exceed maturities and redemptions of $4,359 million by $374 million bringing the total to $6,542 million at March 31, 1970.

Treasury bills in the amount of $2,895 million are $55 million more than at March 31, 1969 and consist of $1,755 million in three-month bills, $870 million in six-month bills and $270 million in special bills.

Indirect debt or contingent liabilities

In addition to the direct debt set out in the statement of assets and liabilities, the government has assumed certain indirect or contingent obligations. These consist of securities of the Canadian National Railways, guaranteed as to principal and interest, and a number of miscellaneous guarantees, the chief of which are the guarantee of insured loans made by chartered banks and other approved lending institutions under the National Housing Act, 1954, deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada, advances under the Export Credits Insurance Act, bank loans under the Canada Student Loans Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act and bank loans to the Canadian Wheat Board.
