POETRY.

Why Should We Strive.

If life were a day of pleasure, Closing with festal night, Heaped up with a flowing measure Of blessing and delight.

If death were an endless slumber, Whose undisturbed repose No weary hours might number. Nor fear of waking woes;

If all the pain of living Ceased, when we ceased to weep; If our joyousness and grieving Were "rounded with a sleep-"

Then were useless all the waking, The restless nights of care, All the toil, and all the aching That mortals brave and bear.

But there is within a warning. A consciousness, that we. When life's lamp has ceased its burning, Shall not wholly cease to be.

That a destiny awaits us, Nobler than the paltry life, That in living ever fates us To a ceaseless sound of strife.

To attain such future, surely, Our earnest effort claims; And to live and labor purely For the highest ends and aims.

Love with faithful, firm endeavor, With a purpose high and true, To acquit us nobly ever, In this world of work to do.

The Duke of Edinburgh's Bethrothed.

A correspondent of the Times of India writes:—"The Imperial Princess has a most pleasing expression, and, better still, all persons about the Russian Court concur in expressing their high admiration of her character. She is said to be gentleness and amiability itself, and to be quite as domestic in her tastes and. character as the Princess Royal, or any of our own family. In fact, I am told she is "quite charming," and is beloved by all about the Imperial Court-which is by no means a bad test of the character of a Prince or Princess. The Emperor idolises her, and, seeing that she is his only daughter, this may readily be believed. I was curious to know how the religious difficulty had been settled, as the Russian Court, it is known, are particular on this point, and I therefore, made careful inquiries on the subject. Princess Dagmar. before becoming Czarvena, had to change her religion; but the arrangement that has been come to on the present occasion is different. Neither the Duke nor the Grand Duchess will change their reigion, but if there are any children they will be brought up in the faith of the Church of England, The marriage will take place in January next at St. Petersburg, the capital of the bride's Imperial father, but the Royal pair will reside at Clarance House, St. James; so you see that the Grand Duchess will in future, or at least until the Duke succeeds to the Grand Duchy of Saxe Coberg Gotha, be an English Princess.

Skeick of Don Carlos.

The correspondent of the London Times with the Carlists writes as foilows concerning Don Carlos, the pretender to the Spanish throne:—

The King is a fine-looking man of com-manding presence; and he towers by, at least, a head and shoulders over most of his suite; very dark hair, cut as short as possible, closely cropped whiskers, a large but aquilme noise, with eyes of great brilliancy, and a mouth which slightly deteriorates the effect produced by the Too much money is spent wastefully other features, as both it and the chin do and uselessly, and too little made proon the rest of the face, must complete my We buy too much abroad that we ought very prepossessing, but there is a sad, We buy too much that we do not pay for cash dewn- too much of what we buy careworn expression on his Majesty's count nance, and well, indeed, there may be, for a great cause is at stake. He exposes his life much too We spend too much time learning what is not useful, and too little informing the Windowski to be more careful; but the King wont be denied, and frequently commands in person a battery when under the heaviest fire. He is in consequence idolized by the troops, who adore their leader, and the vivas which greet his appearance are as thrilling as a hearty British cheer. Don Carlos conversed some Our actions are governed too much by more than the King does, but he said so ciety was being sapped to its core by the Socialistic tendencies of the Republie, liberal and patriotic conception of the duties which citizenship involves.

His Majesty, for I suppose he may be entitled so, as he has already been crowned by the Northern Provinces, is not the bigot which he is declared to be by his enemies. He speaks French, German and Italian with fluency, and is a perfect master of that sonorous passionate Castilian oratory which so delights a Spanish audience.

The Angel's Visit.

As the sunset clouds were fading In the west to sombre gray, As the varied hues were paling, And died out the light of day,

Through the pearly gates of heaven Passed a shining angel band, This sad earth of ours to visit-From the far-off "better land."

Swift they came, through evening sh To an humble cottage room, Opened wide the little casement

Left behind the twilight gloom.

Entered in with rustling pinions, Paused between a white draped bed As each angel bowed her head.

Baby face upon the pillow, Oh, so pale and thin from pain; Tiny form in anguish tossing, Seeking rest and ease in vain.

Little pilgrim, said the fairest, As she softly kissed her eyes, Wilt thou leave this world of sorrow For a home beyond the skies?

Leave its earthly cares and pleasures, Leave the parents whom you love; Wilt thou leave them all for Jesus, And go dwell with him above?

1 am coming, whispered Rosie, As the seraph kissed her brow; Mamma, listen, hear the music-See the angels' round me now!

Then the little hands fell nerveless, Lower sank the curly head-And we turned and wept in silence, For our wee white rose was dead.

Vigils.

Softly chanting, toward the sea, Flows the rapid river, And upon the limpid waves Bright the sunbeams quiver. But when shadows fall with night, And the waves are sleeping, In their still and gloomy depths Stars their watch are keeping.

Onward toward the sea of Rest Time is ever gliding, And upon the cheek and lip Joy is sweetly hiding. But when sorrow veils the heart, And the eyes are weeping, In the soul the love of God Heavenly watch is keeping.

SELECT STORY.

The Chatterly Lovers.

CONCLUDED.

USK had fallen on the rectory garden—a purple shadow laden with perfume, and overhung with stars, To and fro between the rose bushes walked a slender gray figure, with delicate hands clasped over a wildly throbbing heart. Tearless eyes, dark with pain, looked pitifully through the twilight, with a mute wonder in them why earth could be so fair and life so utterly

Hark! The girl stopped, trembling like a leaf. A firm, steady step was coming up the path from the gate—coming towards her.

Oh, I cannot—I cannot meet him now! Ada murmured, feeling her own weakness, yet standing still, striving to win strength back to her heart.

A tall dark figure she could see in the gloom—a heavily-bearded face. Presently her hands were caught in a strong, eager clasp, and a voice with all the ring and fire of Edwards in it broke sister, as they drove home through the upon the silence,
