of last week, and at 11 octobes at high, the neighbors were aroused by the loud cries of "murder," proceeding from the house occupied by them in the outskirts of the village. A gentleman ran to the place and found the two quarrelling, and using the most obseene language to each other, and the woman bleeding from a wound in the wrist. Whilst he remained, they became quiet, but shortly after he returned home, the cry of "murder" was again heard; but it not being repeated, no more attention was paid to them. The woman has not since been seen, and no trace can be found of her, although the woods and the swamps around about have been searched by a large number of people. Butler says she has gone away, but he dosen't know where. The children were heard to make some remarks which lead very strongly to the suspicion that she has been murdered, and the body probably buried in the swamps in the rear of their house. Butler was arrested on Saturday evening on a charge of disorderly conduct, and, resisting the constable, was remanded to Stratford jail for six days. It is hoped before the expiration of that time, the mystery will be cleared up in some way. The authorities are determined to investigate the matter, and a large party was organized

CHAPTER VII.

RENNETH MAINTAINS HIS HOUT—THE MYSTERIOUS VISITOR AT THE LUNATUC ASYLUM.

This stranger, whose approach we have described, gave the handle a vigorous pull, which was followed by a loud clanginside, and presently the sound of a lock was heard, a side wicket was opened, and a man's face appeared.

"Well, sir?" was uttered in a tone blunt almost to graffness.

"Could you tell me if the doctor is within?" asked the stranger in a voice of peculiar mildness and unction.

"The doctor—yes. Was you wanting to see him?"

"If you please. That is, if he is not engaged; and if he is, perhaps I shall be allowed to wait til he is at liberty."

The porter, who had hitherto held the door open only so far as to allow of his face being visible, now threw it wide, and motioned to the visitor to enter, which the latter at once did with a meekly uttered "Thank you."

No sooner had he crossed the threshold than the porter closed the wicket and locked it as before. On looking round, the stranger found himself at the door of a small lodge, and from the gate and the lodge a broad well-kept path went straight across the ground to the front entraffec of the building. Substitution of the wind the man.

I shall feel so much obliged."
And as he spoke, the stranger, with voice so meek and air so mild, proffered a card to the porter, accompanied by halfsa-crown. Whereat the immaculate official grinned his thanks, and departed with all readiness to execute his commis-with all readiness to execute his commission.

The stranger drew close to the blazing fire in the porter's lodge, and waited there to the return of his messenger, whom he expected would receive instructions to lead him to the doctor's presence. At the end of five minutes or so, a step was heard outside, and there enterednot the porter, but a smart little man, dressed in black, with a white neck-tic, whom the stranger had no difficulty in recognising as the doctor himself.

The latter had the card in his hand, and he looked first at it, then at the other inquiringly, who, rising up, made a low reverential bow.

"I beg your pardon," he said, in tones of double-distilled meekness, "but may I presume that you are the medical superintendent of this large and important linnatic asylum?"

"Yes sir" was the renty. "I am Doc."

"Yes sir," was the reply. "I am Doc-tor Poorsman. You are, I presume"— (looking at the card)—"Mr Jonas Sweet-bread, although I—have not the honour bread, although I—have not the honour of ——"

"Of knowing me, you say," interrupted the visitor, with the blandest of smiles while his eyes beamed beniguly through his pebble-eyed glasses. "I have not, indeed, the unspeakable privilege of your acquaintance, but I have ventured to seek an interview with you on a matter in which I feel deeply interested. I am an American on a brief visit to this country, and have long made various forms of insanity my study. Now, sir, I am led to understand that you lately received into this establishment a patient whose mental derangement was produced in a singular manner."

"Oh—ah! To what patient do you allude? We receive new ones nearly every week.

"This man as I learn from a newspaper report, was the survivor of a wreck."

"Oh—ah—yes; I know now whom you mean. A very singular case, sir—very singular—produced by horror and terror. Hair white as now—mind entirely gone."

"Entirely gone! Did you say entirely gone?" was the somewhat eager question put by Mr. Jonas Sweetbread.

"Yes, sir, entirely gone. He knows nothing—cannot speake one sontence rationally—takes no notice of anything—but is quite quiet and pleased if his peculiar desire is gratified. If thwarted in that, he becomes violently excited, but we never thwart him now."

"And may I venture to ask what his peculiar desire is?" said the meek Jonas.

"It is to have a bundle of clothes on his knee, which he holds as if he were holding a child. Perhaps you know that when he was found on the rocks the morning after the wreck; he had a child on his knee—the only survivor of the wreck except himself—and which he had probably saved?"

"Oh, dear me, yes; the paper does give an account of that circumstance."

"Well, the maniae is content, only when he has an imaginary child on knee. At first the attendants could not (Continued on fourth page.)
