THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

At Three o'clock p. m. HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL proceeded in state to the Senate Chamber, in the Parliament Buildings, and took his seat upon the Throne. The members of the Senate being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being present, His Excellency was pleased to open the FOURTH SESSION of the SIXTH PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA, with the following Speech:—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In calling you together again for the consideration of public affairs, I may fairly congratulate you on a continuance of the progress and prosperity of the country.

During the recess I visited Manitoba and the North-West Territories and British Columbia, and everywhere I found myself received with the loyalty and good-will which I have learned to be characteristic of Canada. A comparison of my own observations with those of my predecessors shows clearly the great progress which has marked this part of the Dominion, in the settlement of the country and in the development of its great agricultural capabilities, of its mineral wealth and of its other natural resources.

In consequence of the repeated seizures by cruisers of the United States Navy of Canadian vessels, while employed in the capture of seals in that part of the Northern Pacific Ocean known as Behring Sea, my Government has strongly represented to Her Majesty's Ministers the necessity of protecting our shipping, while engaged in their lawful calling, as well as of guarding against the assumption by any nation of exclusive proprietory rights in those waters. I feel confident that those representations have had due weight, and I hope to be enabled during the present Session to assure you that all differences on this question are in the course of satisfactory adjustment.

Having observed the close attention which has recently been given by the Imperial authorities and on the continent of Europe to the improvement in the methods of catching, curing and packing fish, I deemed it expedient to cause a Commission to be sent to Scotland and Holland to examine and report upon this subject during the fishing season. The report of the delegates will be laid before you; it will, I am sure, give our fishermen most valuable information and instruction as to the best means of improving and developing this important industry.

My Ministers have carefully considered the difficulties which surround the administration of the rights of the Dominion in its foreshores, harbors, lakes and rivers, and a measure will be submitted to you for removing uncertainty as to the respective rights of the Dominion and of the Provinces, and for preventing confusion in the titles thereto.

The report of the Royal Commission on Labor, which was laid before you during the last Session, has been distributed throughout the country. I have reason to believe that the information which it contains will be found eminently useful in suggesting improvements in the administration of the laws which affect the working classes. Measures for the amendment of those laws, so far as they come within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, will be submitted for your consideration.

The early termination of the Acts of incorporation of the principal banking institutions of the Dominion necessitates a review of our present system of banking and an adjustment of the terms under which the Charters of these corporations should be renewed. Your attention will be drawn to this important subject.

Certain amendments to the Acts relating to the North-West Territories, calculated to facilitate the administration of affairs in that region, as also a Bill further to promote the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police, will be submitted for your consideration.

Measures will be laid before you relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes, to improve the laws respecting patents of invention and discovery, to amend the Adulteration Act, and the law respecting the Inland Revenue, to amend also the Act respecting the Geological and Natural History Survey of Canada, and to provide for the better organization of the National Printing Establishment.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the past year will be laid before you. It will be found that the estimates of revenue have been realized, and that after having fully provided for the various public services of the country, a substantial surplus will remain. The Estimates for next year have been framed with a due regard to the requirements of the Public Service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I commit these weighty matters, and all others which may come before you, to your earnest consideration, and I rely upon your wisdom and prudence to deal with them in the manner which, under Divine Providence, may prove most conducive to the happiness and prosperity of Canada.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

HON. MR. BOULTON moved

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the respectful thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious Speech he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament: namely :—

To HIS EXCELLENCY the Right Honorable Sir FREDERICK ARTHUR STANLEY, Baron Stanley of Preston, in the County of Lancaster, in the Peerage of Great Britain; Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honorable Order of the Bath; Governor General of Canada and Vice-Admiral of the same

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :—

We, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly thank Your Excellency for your gracious Speech at the opening of this Session.

We rejoice that Your Excellency on calling us together again for the consideration of Public affairs can with justice congratulate us on a continuance of the progress and prosperity of the country.

It affords us great pleasure to learn that during the recess Your Excellency visited Manitoba, the North-West Territories and British Columbia, and that everywhere Your Excellency found yourself received with the loyalty and good will which you graciously say you have learned to be characteristic of Canada. It is gratifying to us to find that a comparison of Your Excellency's own observations with those of your predecessors shows clearly the great progress which has marked this part of the Dominion, in the settlement of the country and in the development of its great agricultural capabilities, of its mineral wealth and of its other natural resources.

We receive with a full sense of its importance the announcement that, in consequence of the repeated seizures by cruisers of the United States navy of Canadian vessels, while employed in the capture of seals in that part of the Northern Pacific Ocean known as Behring Sea, Your Excellency's Government has strongly represented to Her Majesty's Ministers the necessity of protecting our shipping, while engaged in their lawful calling, as well as guarding against the assumption by any nation of exclusive proprietory rights in those waters. We beg leave to assure Your Excellency of our confidence that those representations have had due weight, and we trust that your hope of being enabled during the present Session to assure us that all differences on this question are in the course of satisfactory adjustment will be realized.

We are glad to learn that, having observed the close attention which has recently been given by the Imperial authorities and on the Continent of Europe to the improvement in the methods of catching, curing and packing fish, Your Excellency deemed it expedient to cause a Commission to be sent to Scotland and Holland to examine and report upon this subject during the fishing season, and that the report of the delegates will be laid before us. It will, we are sure, give our fishermen most valuable information and instruction as to the best means of improving and developing this important industry.

We receive with interest the information that Your Excellency's Ministers have carefully considered the difficulties which surround the administration of the rights of the Dominion in its foreshores, harbors, lakes and rivers, and that a measure will be submitted to us for removing uncertainty as to the respective rights of the Dominion and of the Provinces, and for preventing confusion in the titles thereto.

We thank Your Excellency for informing us that the report of the Royal Commission on Labor, which was laid before us during the last Session, has been distributed throughout the country. We do not doubt that the information which it contains will be found eminently useful in suggesting improvements in the administration of the laws which affect the working classes, and we hear with satisfaction that measures for the amendment of those laws, so far as they come within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, will be submitted for our consideration.

Your Excellency has been pleased to announce to us that the early termination of the Acts of incorporation of the principal banking institutions of the Dominion necessitates a review of our present system of banking and an adjustment of the terms under which the charters of these corporations should be renewed. We beg leave to say that we shall not fail to give our most careful attention to this important subject.

We are gratified to learn that certain amendments to the Acts relating to the North-West Territories, calculated to facilitate the administration of affairs in that region, as also that a Bill further to promote the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police, will be submitted for our consideration.

We also thank Your Excellency for informing us that measures will be laid before us relating to Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes, to improve the laws respecting patents of invention and discovery, to amend the Adulteration Act, and the law respecting the Inland Revenue; to amend also the Act respecting the Geological and Natural History Survey of Canada, and to provide for the better organization of the National Printing Establishment.

We humbly beg leave to assure Your Excellency that these weighty matters, and all others which may come before us, shall receive the careful consideration from us which you have been graciously pleased to invite, and also to assure Your Excellency that you may rely upon our most earnest efforts to deal with them in the manner which, under Divine Providence, may prove most conducive to the happiness and prosperity of Canada.

He said:—It is with a considerable amount of diffidence that I rise to move this resolution. It is a duty that is assigned, as a general rule, I believe, to the junior members of this House, and while it is one of considerable importance, it is also a high honor to be entrusted with the privilege of expounding the policy of the Government so far as it is foreshadowed in the Speech which we have before us. I have to thank the Government for the appointment they have seen fit to make in summoning me to a seat in this House, and that I have been adjudged of sufficient experience to take my seat amongst the public men of the country who have been before me appointed to the Senate. I am specially pleased to follow the late member of the Senate, the Hon. Dr. Schultz, who has been such a pioneer of the North-West Territories—in fact, I may say that he is still one of the pioneers of our North-West country, as the Journals of this House will show by the services he has performed in endeavoring to probe the unknown resources of the Great Mackenzie Basin, which is one of the distant parts of our Dominion. I have much pleasure in expressing the gratification that the visit of His Excellency the Governor General has given to the people of the North-West Territories, where he had the opportunity himself of witnessing the industrious settlers of that country rough-hewing the destinies of that vast territory to which Canada has fallen heir; and also the gratification that His Excellency has himself expressed with all that he saw in that country. It is just thirty-one years ago, this month, since I had the honor of being relieved by His Excellency the Governor General, at the School of Musketry, Hythe, when we were officers together in the British Army—he being in the Guards, and I in Her Majesty's 100th Regiment; and it is with the greatest pleasure that I take the opportunity from my seat in this hon. House to extend a welcome to him to Canada as the constitutional head of the Dominion; and I think that the country is to be congratulated upon the fact that we have a man of experience and talent to assist our Government in maintaining the constitutional privileges that have been handed down to us from the British Crown in all their integrity—a Constitution that contains the elements of freedom, that gives the greatest guarantee for the liberties of the people. Through the appointment of our Governor General we are removed from the turmoil and all the disturbing influences of a general election, and I think that the country, from one end of it to the other, appreciates the value of the services of such a talented and distinguished man as now presides over the destinies of the Dominion. I am sure that every one in Canada will learn with satisfaction that there is likely to be a speedy termination to the International question in regard to the seal fisheries in Behring Sea. It is a question which has been disturbing the people of both countries for some time, and we may congratulate ourselves upon having a Government which can support the rights and interests of the people of Canada with fitting dignity and firmness. We must all feel that it is desirable to unite with the people of Great Britain in maintaining as friendly relations as possible with the people of the United States, compatible, of course, with the dignity of our own country and the welfare of our own citizens. We are two nations, on each side of the Atlantic, numbering upwards of 100,000,000 people, speaking the English language, and in the near future we may reasonably expect that the two nations will number 150,000,000 of people, who are imbued with the same sentiments and principles of civilization, and whose co-operation cannot fail to exercise a beneficial influence in attaining a higher plane of civilization in the world, the foundations of which shall be peace and good will. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that our position in the British Empire is a guarantee that the integrity of the country will be maintained and the welfare of its citizens promoted wherever their enterprise may lead them, and we may all hope and trust that the ties which bind us to the British Empire may be tightened rather than loosened in the future history of the country.

It is very gratifying indeed to find that the Government are thoroughly in advance of the public in everything that adds to the material welfare of the people themselves. We find our Government instituting, all over the country, experimental farms for the promotion of agriculture; we find a Labor Commission appointed for the purpose of ascertaining what is needed for the industrious population of the Dominion, and now we learn that they have been quietly ascertaining, through a Commission sent to Europe, the best methods of curing fish, and thus contributing very materially to the success of that important industry upon our Pacific and our Atlantic coasts. It will be a great advantage indeed to the fishermen of this country to have the difficulties which surround the administration of the rights of the Dominion in its foreshores, harbors, lakes and rivers settled by defining the limits of the administration between the Dominion Government and the Provinces. It is a question that has been surrounded with a great deal of difficulty, and there is no doubt that it will be many years before the constitutional limits between the Dominion and the Provinces will be thoroughly defined. It is important, as time goes on, that they should be clearly and definitely understood.

The Speech tells us that the Government has concluded the work of the Labor Commission, and that legislation will be introduced for the purpose of improving the administration of laws affecting the laboring classes. The question is one of great importance: I think that the fullest opportunity should be given to the laboring classes to co-operate for the protection of their interests, and that the laws should take that form which will tend to educate the laboring population to the responsibility of assuming that position. We witnessed a short time ago one of the greatest efforts ever made in the history of the world by laboring classes for the protection and promotion of their own interests. I refer to the great strike of the dock yard laborers in London. They were supported by public opinion in that instance, because their demands were just. Their strike was eminently successful, for whenever a cause is right and just it receives the support of public opinion. It is worthy of observation, in view of the history of that strike, that the desire of the laboring classes for shorter hours of labor was not so much that they should gain recreation as that there should be a fairer division of the work that had to be done—that it should be more divided up where the laboring population was so excessively large. It is worthy of note, so far as our laboring classes are concerned, because in a new country like this, where we are launching out into the world of manufactures through our National Policy, it is not desirable that the interests of the public should be checked by shortening the hours of labor to any extent. Canada has been brought to the fair position that she occupies by excessively hard work on the part of those who came here and laid the foundations of the country, and who have been building it up ever since, and there is an immense field yet open to everyone who comes to this country or who is now laboring in it. I do not think that it is the part of wisdom altogether, as I have observed it has been the effort in the past, to restrict immigration or to interfere with the work of philanthropy in order to keep laborers out of this country in the interests of our own laboring population, because we have an enormous field from one end of Canada to the other where an industrial population can find work of some kind or other. If there is an idle man in the eastern part of Canada all he has to do is to go to the west and work for himself, where he becomes an independent laborer in the field of industry.

The subject of our banking institutions is to be brought before Parliament this Session, in connection with the measure for renewing the charters of banks. I would take this opportunity of giving one small bit of financial experience that I have had with regard to the banks: our country is very large, and we have local banks in various parts of it. My experience has been that bills which are issued in one part of the country are not payable in other parts of the country at their face value—that they are subject to a discount. I would take this opportunity of expressing the hope that when the new Bank Act is brought up provision will be made for the payment of all bank notes at par in every part of the country.

In reference to the paragraphs relating to the North-West Territories, my hon. colleague from Calgary will dwell upon those matters. I think myself that it would be wiser for the North-West Territories to move slowly in the direction of provincial autonomy, that the co operation of the Dominion Government with the people who are located there in the administration of the affairs of that country is of great value and will be of great assistance in developing the resources that are so largely in their infancy at the present time. I see, also, that it is proposed to bring down a Bill to increase the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police. I think it is worth considering whether the time has not arrived when the efficiency of the North-West Mounted Police would be best promoted by its gradual incorporation into the Militia system of the country. I may be pardoned for expressing such an opinion on account of being military man and having great faith in the organization to which I have been so many years attached. Undoubtedly the Mounted Police have done valuable service to the country in the past. When the Force was first instituted it combined the administration of the affairs of the country with the protection of the people. Now that the country is settled up, it is fair to consider whether the occasion will not soon arise to identify the Police Force somewhat with the Militia system of the country.

I feel pleased, as a settler from the North-West Territories, to be able to say that the progress that those Territories are making is eminently satisfactory, although we have had difficulties to contend with, especially during the last year. Owing to the drought of last summer many parts of the Province of Manitoba have been severely visited, and there has been a dearth of coarse grains and of hay which has affected the interests of a large number of the settlers; but notwithstanding the difficulties which some districts have experienced the past season, the general results, so far as exports of wheat are concerned, have been fully maintained, as compared with the previous years. We have the satisfaction of knowing that there are so many varieties of agriculture in the North-West, such as breaking, back-setting, summer-fallowing, volunteer-crops, and others, that it is hard if a season comes that will entirely destroy our crop. That has been the case this year, and while some districts have been injuriously affected, the general results have been good.

I have to thank this honorable House for the patience they have shown in listening to my remarks, and hope that I shall have an opportunity to discuss the merits and advantages of our great western country and to point out the many benefits that will accrue to the Dominion of Canada from the speedy development of our prairie country and the success and prosperity of its settlers.

HON. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am very much pleased to have the honor of being selected to second an Address containing reference to so many matters of public importance, measures which I am satisfied will receive the hearty support and approval of the country at large. I hope it will be considered pardonable on my part by this honorable House if I manifest a somewhat deeper interest, and touch rather more lengthily upon those questions in the Address referring to North-West matters than on those of a more general character affecting the country at large. Though questions of public policy are always of deep interest to the people of the North-West, yet those matters of vital importance which particularly affect that country very naturally receive a more absorbing attention than subjects of a general character. It is therefore with great pleasure I see a reference made by His Excellency to the importance of the extended trip made by him during the autumn season through the North-West Territories and British Columbia. The experience and knowledge gained by the observations of His Excellency on that occasion, I am satisfied, will prove of incalculable benefit to the settlement and development of the country, by the exercise of the great influence which His Excellency may use in the political and social world of Great Britain, in which His Excellency occupies so important and distinguished a position. The warm and loyal welcome greetings extended to His Excellency in that country, I am satisfied, were of such a character as to justify him in coming to the conclusion that throughout no part of Her Majesty's colonial possessions are hearts that beat more true and loyal to the Crown of Great Britain than those of that people now laying the foundation of a greater Britain on the vast plains of the North-West.

Satisfaction is expressed in the Address at the evidences of settlement which are apparent in that country. I may indulge in the hope, at this juncture, that the Government of the Dominion will yet see its way to the adoption of an exceptionally vigorous immigration policy, which will be commensurate with the resources of our country. I am satisfied it is difficult to secure such a volume of immigration as will be adequate to the settlement of the country, by reason of the American Government, the South American Republics and the Australasian Governments expending such vast sums of money towards turning the tide of European immigration to their respective shores. Yet, I would venture the opinion that the adoption by the Dominion Government of an immigration policy equally vigorous to that adopted by other nations upon this continent would receive the endorsation and support of the Dominion at large, even though it might necessitate the negotiation of a new loan for the more affectual carrying out of that object. It is unnecessary for me to say, because it has been reiterated for years, that our North-West country possesses every inducement for immigration. Using almost the language contained in the Address, we have there incomparable agricultural capabilities ; our mountains, our plains and our rivers teem with mineral wealth ; our grazing lands, in the production of nutritious grasses, are unequalled on the continent, our climatic conditions are most favorable, and these, with other natural advantages, when developed, I am satisfied will eventually result in making that country the dominant portion of this Dominion.

Satisfaction is expressed in the Address at the signs of progress which are there evident. Cities and towns are springing into life where a short time ago lay but silent plains. We find marts of commerce making a chain over the length of that vast Territory; we find industries being gradually established. The plough of the settler is turning the virgin soil in all directions, and now railroads are beginning to precede settlement and are becoming the pioneers of settlement and civilization. This measure of growth in what I might term the last decade of years is a subject for particular pride and satisfaction. It manifests the energy and pluck of Canadian enterprise; it suggests the great possibilities which may be accomplished by the efforts of a united people. Reference is made in the Address to a measure which is calculated to affect the administration of government in the North-West Territories. I find that in the Eastern Provinces misapprehension appears to exist to some extent in respect to what the people of the Territories required and to the slight friction which has recently occurred between the North-West Assembly and the Lieutenant Governor. The opinion appears to prevail that the Territories require all that economy of government which pertains to the Provinces ; but I may safely say that the people and the press of the Territories have expressed themselves as rather contrary to the introduction of an elaborate system of government, but require a rather more extended measure of responsible government than they at present enjoy. Heretofore, there has not been upon our Statute Book any provision whereby the Federal fund could be dealt with by the Local Assembly. The Territorial Fund alone could be dealt with by the Assembly. The Lieutenant Governor, on assuming office in 1888, appeared to labor under the impression that he could submit to the vote of the House the Federal fund. It was afterwards ascertained by His Honor that the Statute did not permit the submission of the fund to the Local Assembly; consequently the concession, or what appeared to be a concession in 1888, was asked for in 1889 by the Local Assembly. The Assembly appeared to ignore the fact that it was not within the discretion of the Lieutenant Governor to submit the Federal fund for their vote, inasmuch as there was a statutory provision providing that he should not do it, but placing it in the hands of the Executive here. Hence arose the difficulty to which some attention has been given within the last few months. I apprehend that the measure foreshadowed in the Address is calculated to deal to some extent with this matter. It has always been a matter of very great satisfaction to the people of the Territories that Session after Session of the Dominion Parliament has found very advanced legislation placed upon our Statute Books to meet the growing wants and requirements and advanced views of the people of the Territories. Hence, I venture the opinion that the action of the North-West Council has been the result of that impatient desire towards a restless progression which is often so characteristic of the whole of western movements. I may state to hon. gentlemen that the situation is not at all serious, and can assuredly express the opinion that a moderate consideration of the problem will result in a satisfactory solution of the difficulty as foreshadowed in the Address.

His Excellency has intimated that the work of the Labor Commission appointed by royal commission to make inquiries touching the laboring classes promises to be productive of results which will be felt and appreciated by the laboring classes throughout the Dominion. Few questions of recent years have received greater prominence and attention from the leading Governments of Europe and America than the adoption of the best means for the improvement of the conditions of the working classes, particularly so far as legislation can touch the question. Particularly on this continent, where the spirit of democracy enters into and largely controls our national institutions, thus permitting the laboring classes to make their impress felt in moulding our national character, it becomes highly desirable on the part of the State to remove many of the abuses of which they have been the victims, and to conserve those rights to which they are intitled but often deprived by combinations of capital, with which the laboring classes cannot successfully combat. All legislation in this direction invariably leads to the higher education of the masses and to an improvement of their conditions, which afterwards finds its reflex in our own national institutions. Universal suffrage has now entered so very largely into government, and has been so recognized by the State, and so fully exercised by the masses, that practically government is very largely in their hands, so that it becomes incumbent and imperative upon the Government to adopt every possible method—to enact wise and salutary laws for the improvement of that important part of the community known as the laboring classes. It is also a matter of very great satisfaction and relief to the public mind that the Behring Sea question at last is to receive that attention which is calculated to quiet public apprehension in respect to it. The public mind on this side of the international boundary line for some years past has been strung to a very high tension upon this subject. During the period of unwarranted interference by the United States with our rights, had not wise counsels and discrete deliberations prevailed on the part of our people and Governments, very serious consequences might have arisen under the affronts and provocations suffered by our sealers on the high seas. For more than three years our rights have been unjustifiably invaded by the United States Government; our sealers have been captured and their cargoes seized in a most piratical manner, and this by a nation which, previous to the acquisition of Alaska, denounced in the very strongest terms the assumptions and pretentions of Russia towards exclusive jurisdiction over that sea. We find that same nation, previous to the cession of Alaska, successfully combating the pretentions of Russia, and for fifty years previous to their acquisition of that territory enjoying all the rights thereon to the high sea. Yet after the cession we find that same nation for more than three years pursuing a course so inconsistent, contradictory and fillibustering in character as to entirely exceed the autocratic policy of Russia, when the Czar, in 1821, issued his Ukase claiming entire jurisdiction over that sea and excluding all vessels from rights within 100 miles of the shore. Now I ask what ground has been urged by the United States for the unjustifiable course pursued? We find in 1887 the United States Government, admitting the error into which they had fallen, by the issuance of an Order of President Cleveland for the discontinuance of those seizures; but we find the United States Government entirely ignoring that Order and continuing the seizures up to last season.

There has been among the other great powers no such staunch or vigorous defenders of the equal rights of all nations on the high seas for all lawful purposes of commerce, navigation, fishing and hunting as the United States. In fact, this principle has become well recognized by all the nations outside the three-mile limit, except where expressly limited by treaty. We find the United States asserting most emphatically their right to fish in Canadian waters outside the three-mile limit during that time. No vindication has been made by the Government in regard to the course they have unwarrantably taken, they have never seriously contended that the Behring Sea was a closed sea; geographical facts are indisputable on this point, and such a contention would be looked upon as ridiculous; therefore, I say it is a matter of satisfaction and relief to the public mind to be assured in His Excellency's Speech that there will be so speedy a settlement of this question as to obviate the necessity of this Dominion requesting the Imperial authorities to exercise that power—that physical power if necessary—to prevent a further invasion of those rights to which we are entitled, and which we will ever assert.

I notice there are other questions in the Address of a special character, which will undoubtedly receive the best consideration of this House, the discussion of which I will not enter into on this occasion. Permit me, in conclusion, to indulge the hope that the prosperity which to-day crowns our common country will increase as the years roll on, so that the name of Canada will become proverbial amongst the nations for progress, prosperity and happiness. I have great pleasure in seconding the resolution in reply to His Excellency's most gracious Speech.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The gentlemen that have been selected by the Government of this country or by the leader of this House to move and second the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne have performed their part with very great credit to themselves, and I am quite sure I speak the sentiments of the Senate when I say that these gentlemen have discharged their duty with much more ability than is usually exhibited on similar occasions. They have spoken with very great point and force on the subject matters with which they are specially conversant. The attention of this country has been for many years called particularly to the newer portions of our Dominion—Manitoba and the North-West. Very great hope and confidence in the return we would receive from that country and the great development that was to take place there have for a long time been experienced. I am glad that two gentlemen, one coming from Manitoba and the other from a distant portion of the Territories, are so familiar with the many questions which are of intense interest at the present moment in discussing subjects germane to the great North-West, and I hope this House will hear their voices very frequently when matters affecting that part of the Dominion come up for discussion here. I share with the mover and seconder the sentiments which they have expressed with reference to His Excellency's visit to the North-West and to the Pacific coast, and I have no doubt we shall be largely benefited by the utterances which His Excellency has already given expression to, and by the future references he will make on many public occasions, when the opportunity offers, to give his views of the capabilities of that country. We know that testimony of that kind is far more valuable than any other that can be conveyed, particularly to those whose good opinion we desire to entertain.

I recognize a very unusual paragraph here, somewhat of a belligerent one—the third paragraph in the Speech—that is, the announcement that negotiations are on foot which will lead to the removal of the differences which have been raised in reference to the Behring Sea outrages. I was very glad indeed to hear the seconder of the Address speak on the subject. He is perfectly familiar with the history of the events which have preceded those of the last few years, and he has very clearly told us that before the acquisition of Alaska by the United States that country not only questioned, but refused to concede the right of Russia to the possession of the fisheries outside of the ordinary three mile limit, though very shortly after the United States acquired that territory she herself set up just such rights. The paragraph introduced in the Speech would lead one to believe that the seizures were of recent date; but we all know that they have been going on for nearly four years. I think it was in 1886 that the first seizures were made by American cruisers in those waters, and the remonstrance by this Government passed through Mr. West's hands at Washington to Secretary Bayard, and to the British Ministry, and that correspondence has continued down to the present moment. I may say that I have as little hope of seeing that question settled now as I had four years ago. One cannot help calling attention to the marked contrast that has attended the result of other negotiations between the two countries. Some twenty-eight years ago two American gentlemen were forcibly taken off a British mail steamer going from the West Indies to an English port by an American cruiser. I refer to the Masson and Slidell affair. Immediately after the outrage Great Britain came down on the United States and ordered that those men should be restored. That was an outrage of far less importance than seizures in after years of Canadian vessels in waters that the Canadians and other nations of the world have just as good a right to occupy as the United States. They might with the same propriety have seized vessels in the middle of the Atlantic; yet this has been going on with impunity for the last four years, in consequence of our inability to act for ourselves, everything having to be filtered through the British Minister at Washington; and we are just in the same position now that we were in four years ago. Again, it was only a few months ago that the little country of Portugal undertook to interfere with British rights on the coast of Africa, and how soon Lord Salisbury brought them to book, and Portugal was asked to make amends. But how different is the conduct of Great Britain towards the United States in her treatment of Canada? It has been one continuous history of wrong going on and increasing year by year. We are a loyal people, we are a forbearing people; but surely it is not quite proper and right that this should continue indefinitely, and that we should be so entirely ignored by the British Government? What deduction does one naturally draw from it? Why, that the friendship of the United States is of such importance to England that Canada must be sacrificed rather than any little friction should arise between Great Britain and the Republic. Great Britain to-day has the United States for her best customer. She buys their natural products, and she sells them the products of her looms and her furnaces. She does the largest portion of the carrying trade of the United States. She builds their railroads and their steamboats and provides money for their private enterprises. British capital is buying up their breweries and their elevators, and every enterprise in the United States finds a ready investment for British capital. One cannot help calling attention to these points and feeling that at this moment Canada is not receiving from the British Crown the attention which her loyalty to the Empire has a right to expect. From my standpoint, and I was very glad to hear the seconder of the Address calling attention to it, it is of the utmost importance to us that there should be a solid and a long and lasting friendship between our people and the people of the United States. Are not our people of the same language, carrying on the same business and accustomed to the same modes of living, with only an imaginary line of 4,000 miles between us? The people of both countries, I believe, are willing under any ordinary circumstances to live on most friendly terms with each other, but those friendly relations cannot be maintained unless we remove the fiscal laws on either side and have freer trade with our neighbors. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen, if their loyalty would permit them, whether they would not say that their natural trade was to the south of us, and that the development of the North-West would proceed with very much greater rapidity if they were enabled to trade freely with the people south of the line? It would not affect their loyalty to the Mother Country in any degree; on the contrary, it would make them more devoted to the institutions of their own land. It in no way affects a man's feeling for his own country that he is permitted to trade freely with a neighboring nation. What has built up the Mother Country so enormously within the last few years but the simple fact that she trades with the world. England has become the trade centre of the world; money has centered there, simply because she has herself established free trade with the universe. I notice that, as a rule, there are commissions expected or to be appointed; a commission is to be appointed, I understand, to proceed abroad to gather opinions and views as to the methods of catching, curing and packing fish. Now, I thought we had as intelligent fishermen on our coasts as there are anywhere on the globe.

I always thought that they were second to none in the world. I doubt if there are any points that can be given to them by the fishermen of Holland, Scotland or any other country in Europe. It would be a much greater advantage to our fishermen if we would give them a free market for their fish—if we could obtain access for their fish to the markets of the United States, where the greater portion of their fish now goes, under serious difficulties. We should then be conferring a much greater advantage upon them. I notice that a number of Bills are to be introduced this Session, having, no doubt, a practical end in view. I would suggest to the leader of the House whether it might not be well to introduce some of those measures in this Chamber. It would give the Senate an opportunity to proceed at once to business, and relieve us from the excuse that naturally arises of having an adjournment because we have no business to do during the early part of the Session. There are several Bills that might properly be considered in the Senate, when we have ample time and opportunity to give them full consideration. I hope that the suggestion will be taken by the leader of the House, and that we shall be advised that some of these measures which are alluded to will be introduced here, in order that we may proceed to the consideration of them without delay.

HON. MR. ARMAND (in French). At the commencement of the debate on the Speech of His Excellency I desire to be just —to give to Cæsar what belongs to Cæsar. I must in the first place congratulate the Government in having called Parliament to meet at a time which is so suitable to most of the members. It is to be presumed that they will hasten the work of the Session in order that those members who are engaged in commercial or agricultural pursuits may be able to leave in time to attend to their various occupations, in order to contribute to the material prosperity of their respective Provinces and of the Dominion in general; for you know, gentlemen, that the prosperity of the Province makes the prosperity of the Dominion, and that the prosperity of the Dominion makes the prosperity of the Provinces. We are proud —we are happy to see that the Governments of the Provinces, as well as the Government of the Dominion, understand that agriculture and commerce are the basis on which society rests—the two most powerful levers of the prosperity of our people. They are, if I may so express myself, the deux sœurs boîteuses who cannot walk the one without the other. Yes; we are proud; we are happy to see that the Government of the Dominion and the Governments of the Provinces understand well the truth of Mentor's saying to Telemachus, "that the more frequent the communications between nations the greater will be the prosperity of the people." As a proof of what I say, were there nothing else in the Speech from the Throne in the present Session of the Parliament of Quebec but the promise to macadamize the roads of the Province, and to do away with the tolls on the roads and bridges, which are real "Chinese walls" in the way of traffic and business, this item alone augurs well for the future of the Province of Quebec.

Hon. gentlemen, with regard to the new Minister, the present President of the Council, the Government could not have done better than to appoint a gentleman of such probity, who, during the last Session, spoke on the part of his countrymen and co-religionists, the noble-minded Englishmen, the brave Scotchmen, and the sons of the beautiful Green Isle, to proclaim in open Parliament of this Dominion the justice, the liberality of his fellow French-Canadian citizens of the Province of Quebec.

Hon. gentlemen, in regard to the present Minister of the Interior, well would it have been if like his estimable, his intelligent, his active, his laborious predecessor, the late Hon. Mr. White, if he were conscious of his duty, conscious of the dignity of his position; if such were the case, we could hope for justice for the people of the far west, particularly for the poor Métis, for those poor savages, those poor children of nature, whom our so-called civilization harasses and plunders, and which is driving them day after day farther north. I desire to render unto Cæsar what belongs to Cæsar. I wish to congratulate the Government for having, during the vacation which preceded the last Session appointed a special Commission to go to the North-West, to see if the grievances of the Indians were real or imaginary. It is my conviction, if a like commission had been named before the 16th of November, 1885, that disaster which befell the North-West and which cast dark clouds over the horizon of the Confederation, would never have taken place; for a like commission is, if I may so express myself, like the sword of Damocles, which hangs over the head of our employés who may attempt to abuse their trust. Yes, hon. gentlemen, if I were called to give advice to the Government, I would say if they are conscious of their duty, that if they have the instinct of self preservation, they should name for public offices only men who are above questions of sect or caste or party, only men who do not belong to any of those secret societies which are the nightmare of Governments; for with some exceptions, to see them and to hear them, one would say that we are not, as they, called to breathe the same air, to drink the same water, to nourish ourselves on the products of the same soil. I know, hon. gentlemen, that in certain questions of detail there can, and there ought to be some diversity of opinion, such as we cannot exchange, but at the same time not of such a kind as would prevent use from walking arm in arm or prevent us all acting everywhere but as one man, or what we call in common parlance, each putting a little water in his own wine. If it were not so, there would not be in any of the parties a spark of that patriotism which shone with such lustre in the ancient citizens of Rome and Carthage. If it were so, I could predict, I could assure both to the governed and to those who govern happy days, days of prosperity, of glory and contentment. Hon. gentlemen, shall I speak of Imperial Federation, for which the present High Commissioner of the Government has just accepted an honorable position in London, perhaps also one more or less lucrative. With regard to this question: Hon. gentlemen, I ought to make you acquainted with my surprise; first, in the Session before the last, I was much astonished to see the young son of the ex-Minister of Finance, who sits in the Commons, near the Ministerial benches, leave the capital of the Dominion to go to advocate in the capital of Ontario the cause of the partisans of Imperial Federation, and that against the clearly expressed ideas of his illustrious father, in a speech which he delivered in London before finishing his first term as High Commissioner of the Dominion to return to take the office of Minister of Finance. Since then I have been surprised to learn from the London journals that the present High Commissioner of the Canadian Government, on arriving in London to begin his second term, had delivered a speech quasi against and quasi in favor of Imperial Federation. Then, I said: Is it possible that Sir Charles Tupper yielded to the favors of Albion's influence, or, rather, it may be that the perfidious advice that Lord Durham gave to England in his pamphlet with regard to his sojourn in Canada could be applied to him? No; I do not believe it; and if ever Sir Charles Tupper did become the victim of that application, perhaps a little too severe, I have the hope that the muse of history will do for him what it did for the Prince of Muscovy, and that she will engrave on his tomb the same redeeming epitaph: "Ci gissent vingt-cinq années de gloire et un jour d'erreur." But, hon. gentlemen, if I had fears and apprehensions at the sight of some of my own compatriots as well as some fellow citizens of foreign origin, who appear to me disposed to follow the example of those members of the Irish Parliament, who eighty-nine years ago sold their autonomy for a mess of lentils, I have been relieved of all fears by the conduct of the late leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, the Hon. Mr. Blake, who peremptorily refused to speak in favor of Imperial Federation, and also by the conduct of the leader of the Ontario Government, that faithful guardian, the father of the provincial autonomy of the Provinces, who, in one of his speeches, which he delivered in London immediately after Sir Charles Tupper, and after that unlucky advocate of our Government, Dalton McCarthy, who for the fourth time had received a castigation before Her Majesty's Privy Council, relative to the violation of provincial rights and privileges, had told them that he could not comprehend, that he could not explain, that he could not conceive how Canadians, who aspired to the greatest liberty, would bury those which they already possess in Imperial Federation. Then he said to the unhappy advocate of the Government, Dalton McCarthy, that the title of colonel of a Canadian regiment had nothing humiliating in it, but that on the contrary it was desirable, that to him it was an enviable title, and that he would consider it more glorious to become the First Minister of the Dominion than to be President of the United States. But hon.

gentlemen, what appears to me acceptable, what appears capable of being realized, for which I feel it a duty to address and to engage my fellow citizens to try to realize, is this proposition which was made to us during the recess which preceded the last Session of Parliament by men of foresight, and thoughtful men, men of judgment, men who occupy in England positions of high social standing. The proposition is this: Let us have the right to make our own treaties of commerce with foreign nations. These hon. gentlemen seem to say to us: While you can profit by the advice and services of our ambassadors, of our consuls for the maintenance of whom you will have nothing to pay, would you, when you could make treaties of commerce with foreign nations, pay us 10 per. cent. we, on our part, when you would make your treaties of commerce with us in preference to other nations, would promise to pay the 10 per. cent. Very well, gentlemen, I understand since our immense country leaves us nothing to desire from our intelligent and industrious neighbors, I can assure the Mother Country that as long as she will be true to her plighted faith, as long as she will be faithful to us, to protect and preserve that which was guaranteed by treaty, we and our successors will be faithful to our allegiance. Let us repeat it, and we will repeat without ceasing that saying of our ancestors so loyal, so sincere, that the last sound of the cannon shall be heard from the French Canadians in defense of England's supremacy. I am persuaded the sons of Ireland, that beautiful gem of the sea, would be found the most loyal of citizens if the Government of Lord Salisbury would give to Ireland such autonomy, such Home Rule as is given to all England's colonies. If the Government of Lord Salisbury would do towards indemnifying the landlords what the Government of Sir George Cartier did to indemnify the seigneurs, to banish feudalism from Canada; if he were to do what was done to secularize the clergy reserves in Ontario, then we would see happiness in Ireland. Then Irishmen would do towards preserving for England her colonies, on which the sun never sets, that which their fathers did to acquire them. For no one is ignorant of the fact that England made her conquests with the blood of the soldiers of Ireland. The great wish throughout the long life of one of England's greatest men, either ancient or modern, is to see this realized. Yes, Gladstone sighs for the moment when the opportunity will be given to him to dispel forever that sombre cloud that has hung so long over the brilliant, the glorious and the powerful empire of our august, and gracious, well beloved sovereign, Empress of India,—an empire which, while it went hand in hand with its natural ally, France, has astonished the world with victories and has caused nations to tremble for their fate. Such we saw in the Crimea at the battles of Balaklava, Inkerman, Alma and in the taking of Sebastopol. The Russians fled before the allied armies as formerly the Scythians fled before Alexander, or later as they fled before Napoleon when he entered Moscow by the light of their city in flames. I now conclude, hon. gentlemen; but in taking my seat I seem to hear the partisans of Lord Salisbury say what was said to me once by an excellent Governor of the Dominion: "It is true," said he, "but remember well that it would require a very large sum to buy out the landlords." "It is very true," I replied, "but remember also it requires large sums to govern and pacify Ireland, and you make of those people who are scattered to all parts of the world irreconcilable enemies, who at every hour of the day and night may be a casus belli in one or the other of your numerous and immense colonies."

HON. MR. POWER—I cordially endorse what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa with regard to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from His Excellency. I shall not undertake to congratulate those two hon. gentlemen; but I congratulate the House. I think that those two hon. gentlemen form a very valuable addition indeed to the debating power of this House, and I have no doubt that we shall hear from them frequently in the future. I may be allowed to say that if the Government continue to appoint gentlemen of their character the Senate will hereafter probably be looked upon as a somewhat livelier body than it occasionally has been called in the past. I naturally concur, too, in the expression of gratification at the fact that His Excellency the Governor General has followed the examples of his distinguished predecessors and traversed the country between this and the Pacific Ocean. It is well that that should be done by the representative of the Queen here; because, although one may hear and read a great deal as to the extent of the country and its varied resources, one realizes them very much more distinctly and fully when one sees them for himself; and, when gentlemen such as our Governors General have thoroughly learned what the character of this country is, and what its resources are, that information gradually filters down through the somewhat dense mass of British intelligence. I say that not in an offensive sense, because everyone knows that the British intellect is very conservative, and takes in new ideas very slowly; and the idea of Canada which permeated the British mind some years ago was that it was altogether a country somewhat like Labrador: and that idea having got possession of the conservative English mind, it takes a good many years to remove it, and there is almost nothing better calculated to remove it than the statements of gentlemen like our Governors General. I notice that, in speaking of his visit to our western regions, His Excellency says that the comparison of his observations with those of his predecessors shows clearly the great progress which has marked that part of the Dominion in the settlement of the country and in the development of its great agricultural capabilities, of its mineral wealth and of its other natural resources.

I am not aware that there has been any great development of the mineral resources of our western country—nothing very remarkable, and I may say that, for myself, my feeling with respect to Manitoba and the North-West Territories is one of disappointment. I think that the natural expectations entertained some years ago have not been realized. I cannot say that the North-West country has not made progress, and very considerable progress; but it has not advanced as I think it ought to have advanced, and as it would have advanced if it had been better administered. I appeal on that subject to an authority which the great majority of the members of this House recognize as a good one. It is now about nine years since the present leader of the Government informed us that by the year 1890 Manitoba and the North-West would by the surplus returns from the sale of lands, have paid the whole cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in addition, I think, to paying the cost of administering the lands. That right hon. gentleman was regarded by hon. members of this House as a prophet, but I think in this case his prophecy has failed utterly. His judgment is reputed to be sound; if so, then his prophecy has proved false, simply because his Government has not administered the affairs of the country properly. Another eminent authority, a late Finance Minister, made a somewhat similar statement about the year 1882. It is not necessary to rest solely upon prophecy or statements made in advance: we can compare the progress of our North-West with that of some of the neighboring Stetes. I do not think that any hon. gentleman here will deny that the natural resources of Manitoba are very considerably superior to those of Dakota; but the increase in the population of Dakota has been of late years something out of all proportion to the increase in Manitoba. When one considers that this country has spent within the last twenty years about $100,000,000 upon that North-West country, he cannot but feel that the development of the country and the increase of population there have not been what we should have expected. The hon. gentleman who seconded the Address proposed to remedy the existing state of things by a vigorous immigration policy. We have had, in former years, vigorous policies in that department—that is, the policies were vigorous to the extent of spending considerable sums of money, but they were not successful in bringing a desirable class of immigrants to the country. I notice that the hon. gentleman who moved the Address said he did not think it was judicious to discourage immigration into this country. No one has ever discouraged the immigration of a desirable class; but, if the hon. gentleman stopped to think, would he recommend the Government of this country to aid in bringing to Canada the off-scourings of European cities. Those are not the kind of settlers that we want to put on the prairies of the North-West; and if they were placed there they would not stay very long. We want immigration, but immigration of a proper character. I am rather surprised that the hon. gentleman from Calgary, when speaking of this matter of immigration to the North-West, did not call attention to the fact that, while the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have received from Canada favors such as no railway company have ever received from any other Government in the world, that company have done almost nothing in the way of promoting immigration, and that in the State of Dakota and other neighboring States of the Republic the immigration is brought about, not by the Government, but by the railway companies. Here is a railway company with immense resources, receiving unparalleled favors from the Government, and they have practically done very little indeed in the way of promoting immigration. I think that the attention of the Government might be very well turned by that hon. gentleman and their other supporters from that part of the country to the desirability of taking some steps to induce the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to bestir themselves more than they have in the past towards introducing a desirable class of immigrants into that part of the country. No doubt the North-West will be peopled before very long: for one reason, that the greater part of the desirable land in the neighboring country has been taken up, and the only large tracts of good land left on the continent will be in Canada, so that the country must necessarily be settled before very long. There was another idea which occurred to me that the hon. gentleman from Calgary might have suggested. We have representing us in London a gentleman whose ability and energy it would be hard to over-estimate, and of whom hon. gentlemen are very fond of boasting. Now, one would suppose that that gentleman, with his great energy and ability, would have been able to do something, during all these years during which he has filled the office of High Commissioner in London, towards directing a stream of desirable immigration into our North-West, a country which is panting for immigration of that character. I do not know why it is that that result has not been brought about, unless it has been that the High Commissioner has been occupied during all the time that he has been able to spare from business on this side of the water in negotiating a commercial treaty with Spain. Ever since about the year 1883 this commercial treaty with Spain, according to the newspapers, has been occupying the earnest attention of the High Commissioner. Perhaps if we have to wait for immigration to the North-West until the High Commissioner has negotiated that treaty I may be nearly as grey as my oldest brother member. I hope that some substantial foundation exists for the congratulatory tone of the paragraph with reference to the Behring's Sea seizures. I do not propose to repeat what has been said on that subject, but I do wish to call attention to the fact the language of this paragraph is very guarded. The hope expressed is of a very indefinite and not very positive character. His Excellency says that he feels confident that the representations already made will have due weight, and he trusts that he may be enabled during the present Session to assure us that all differences on this question are in the course of satisfactory adjustment. His Excellency does not assure us that they are now in the course of satisfactory adjustment, but that he hopes they will be. We have been in that state of hope, as the hon. member from Ottawa has said, for the last four years; and we have not yet begun to enter into the fruition of our hopes. I could not help being struck with the great contrast between the manners in which England has dealt with the United States and with Portugal.

It would be a marvellous thing nowadays to find a Speech from the Throne in which we were not told something about the appointment of a commission. I find this time the Government have been appointing one to inquire into the methods of catching, curing and packing fish in Holland and Scotland. I do not quite agree with the hon. member from Ottawa in thinking that our fishermen know all about it. At any rate, there is perhaps something which they may learn; and there may be some room for improvement in their methods, not perhaps of catching so much as of curing and packing fish. I see that the Commissioners have already acted: the hon. gentleman from Ottawa appeared to be under the impression that they were only about being appointed; but they have been appointed and have made their report. I hope that there will be some practical result to follow from their inquiries. It is doubtful whether those commissions are the best method of acquiring information. Commissions have been appointed in England and other countries with a view of investigating this subject of fishing, and those commissions have made careful and elaborate reports, which I presume are in our Library; and I have an impression that the Government will get about as much information out of those reports as they will from the report of their own Commissioners.

The next paragraph of the Speech declares that it is the intention of the Government to submit a measure with regard to the rights of the Dominion in its foreshores, harbors, lakes and rivers, for the purpose of removing uncertainty as to the respective rights of the Dominion and of the Provinces, and for preventing confusion in the titles thereto. It would be a most desirable thing that all confusion with respect to the titles of the Dominion and the Provinces in these foreshores and waters should be removed; but I fail to see how any measure which emanates from the Dominion Parliament can settle the questions which have arisen. The difficulties with respect to these matters arise under the construction of the British North America Act. The provincial authorities construe the Act in one way and the Dominion authorities construe it in another way; and how a measure passed by this Parliament can materially affect the position I cannot see. The more desirable way would be first to try and secure a decision by the highest tribunals as to the respective rights of the Dominion and Provinces, and then, having got that decision, legislate so as to carry it out; but I fail to see how one party to a litigation can, by passing a resolution or, as in the present instance, a statute, settle the question. The other party can pass an Act settling it the other way; and in the end the question has to be settled by the Privy Council, and the better way would be to settle it there first. I must say that, as regards lands on the sea shore, convenience, cheapness and speed of transacting business are all in favor of leaving those matters in the hands of the provincial Governments, where, until very recently, they were left without any question.

As to the Labor Commission, I have very little to say. I hope that the measure which the Government proposes to introduce in pursuance of the report of the Commission may be of a better character than one of the measures passed here last year, in which a provision was inserted curtailing to a considerable extent the privileges of trades unions. Probably one of the most important paragraphs in the Speech is that which deals with the banking Act. I hope sincerely, and with some confidence, that in dealing with this important matter the Government will act wisely; that while they act in such a way as to guarantee the security of the public, they will do it without locking up too much of the capital of the country.

I am glad to see that the Government propose to do something more for the North-West Territories, in addition to the legislation of former Sessions. The members of the Opposition here and in another place have at different times called attention to the unsatisfactory and piecemeal way in which the Government were doling out self-government to the people of the North-West Territories; and I trust that the occurrences of the past few months will lead them to go a little further than they have heretofore gone, and to let the people of the North-West Territories have true representative government and not sham representative government, as it has been in the past. I hope also that when the measure with respect to the North-West Territories is before Parliament the Government will be good enough to provide that the list of voters in the North-Territories shall not be made up in the manner in which they have been made up hitherto; that the lists will represent the real manhood of that country.

I am pleased to see that the Government propose to go on with a measure respecting the bills of exchange and promissory notes, which, I presume, is practically the same measure as was introduced last year. It is very desirable that the law on that subject should be codified, and the Government cannot do better than to take the existing English law, with possibly a few modifications.

With repect to the Adulteration Act, I hope that the leaders of the House will be able to inform us that the Government propose, having already the means of finding out where adulteration takes place, and to what extent, to impose penalties for those acts of adulteration. It may be in one sense satisfactory to know how much poison is put into our food; but while the people who do that are allowed to go on doing it, without suffering any penalty, the satisfaction is not as unmixed as it might be.

I notice one little paragraph in the Speech which I suppose will lead to some discussion by-and-by, to the effect that the Government propose to provide for the better organization of the National Printing Establishment. This establishment, under certain auspices, might perhaps have been worth something, and might have resulted in a saving to the country; but inasmuch as it was simply intended and was organized, as was generally understood, for the purpose of giving a very active and energetic Minister, who had little patronage in his department, something like the patronage which he thought his consequence in the Cabinet demanded, the experiment has not turned out a triumphant success. I presume, from the manner in which things are done by the Government, that the princi pal effect of the new measure will be to extend the patronage of the department.

I observe with pleasure that for once the estimates of revenue have been realized —that is, once in the past few years— and that, after having fully provided for the various public services of the country, a substantial surplus will remain. I humbly trust that that surplus has been arrived at in a regular and honest way, and that it has not been arrived at by charging to capital numerous large sums which ought, under any honest system of bookkeeping, to be charged to income.

I find also that this year there is a departure from the usual language in the promise with respect to the Estimates for the coming year. We have heretofore been told that those Estimates will be prepared with a due regard to economy and to the requirements of the public service. This year the due regard to economy is omitted; and we are only told that they will be prepared with a due regard to the requirements of the public service. I do not set myself up as a prophet; but I should be disposed, if I did, to say that the omission of the word "economy" from the paragraph in His Excellency's Speech is a slight indication that we may expect before very long another appeal to the electorate.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—I would ask the favor of the House to allow me to make a few observations before the debate is closed. I may say, like those gentlemen who have preceded me, that I have listened with very much pleasure to the speeches of the mover and seconder of this Address. It was a great pleasure to me to see a British uniform in this House, and to know that it was worn by a gentleman who had served Her Majesty in other climes besides Canada.

The Speech of His Excellency, which we have been discussing, is certainly one which comprises a great number of very important paragraphs. Amongst, perhaps, the most important of all, is that which relates to what is now known as the Behring Sea question. That question, if not treated with promptitude and vigor, will inevitably lead to the stamping out of Canadian manhood in this country. If we are to see in future years our vessels—conducting their legitimate business in the open sea, out of sight of land—seized by foreign cruisers and attached, and not even carried before a legal court to be condemned, but made prizes of by their captors, and their cargoes appropriated to the uses of those who did not incur the pains and danger of taking them—I say that if this is to be continued we will find that the manhood of Canada will disappear in the course of a very few generations. There never was a country with a worse case than the United States have upon this occasion. I will venture to say that of all the gentlemen who have spoken in this House on different occasions with regard to our relations with the United States, none have spoken with a greater regard for the preservation of peace with that country than I have myself. I have always believed that there is amongst the people of the United States, especially amongst the more intelligent classes there, a stratum of population decidedly friendly to the English poeple and to English institutions; but unfortunately that class of poeple are less active during election periods than the rougher and more violent classes, and naturally government assumes the character of those who give it the most strenuous and vigorous support. The history of that Territory, as sketched by the hon. gentleman who seconded the Address is, I think, a very instructive one. We know that originally it was in the hands of the Russian Empire, and at a certain period in the earlier part of this century, I think it was in 1820, the Czar issued a Ukase, such as those authorities are in the habit of doing. They are all very well for the subjects of the Czar, but will not be submitted to by countries possessed of constitutional government, energetic seamen and pioneers of commerce and fishing and fur-trading. Amongst the most prominent nations of those days were the British people and the United States. It is not necessary for me to refer to the course Great Britain had taken for some years preceding 1820 with regard to the emancipation of Europe generally, but it is quite in place that a nation having taken that stand in Europe should object strongly to the terms of that Russian Ukase. Accordingly, we find that about the year 1825 an Embassador was sent to Russia, partly with the object of arranging terms upon which Russia should stand with the rest of the world as regards Behring Sea, and also to strike a boundary line between the Russian territory of Alaska and that of the North-West Territories, then in the hands of the Hudson Bay Company. That line was drawn. I saw it to-day myself in a map in one of the committee rooms of this House—a map of American issue. There its stands this day. But that was not the sole object of the visit of that Embassy. The Ambassador was instructed to express the dissent of Great Britain to the extraordinary and unusual demand which Russia made upon all the world which frequented Behring Sea. He did so, and before leaving St. Petersburg the Russians had practically resigned all their extraordinary and unusual claims to those waters. The United States were not behind us. The hon. gentleman who seconded the Address gave them full credit for their promptitude and courage—a young nation in those days—in resisting, very properly too, such pretensions as Russia put forward in Behring Sea; but the strangest part of the whole history is, that that very nation which was so unwilling to submit to Russian pretensions is now attempting to urge the very same thing against this young country living on her borders. I do not know that any gentleman in this House is more impressed with the importance of preserving peace between Canada and the United States, and Great Britain and the United States, than myself. I cannot conceive anything which would be more disastrous to the three countries concerned than a war upon some trivial question of that kind, which really has no foundation whatever. Yet, we have found a great reluctance on the part of the authorities of the United States to admit themselves in any degree in the wrong on this question. I have, in reading over papers submitted to Parliament on the subject, found an occasional reference to what has been passing between the Governments of Canada and Great Britain and the Government of the United States upon this subject, and I observe that in the commencement of this correspondence the United States urge that the transactions occurred in a very remote country, were still before their courts, and that they could not, as yet, give the British Government any satisfaction upon them. But the time for excuses of that sort has long since passed by, and we are fairly, as a colony of Great Britain, entitled to something precise and definite upon this question. Either the United States has to abandon her claim to exclusive jurisdiction in Behring Sea, or we are to know that fact and govern ourselves accordingly. I certainly entertain the hope, which I am glad to find the Government and Her Majesty's representative entertain also, that these unfortunate circumstances are now in a fair way to be arranged and settled. But it is quite necessary, I think, that an emphatic opinion should be expressed by members of this Legislature as to the importance of having a final and definite settlement of the question.

I listened with pleasure to the observations of the hon. mover of this Address, and concurred with his views in regard to the importance of furthering the co-operation of labor. I consider myself that unless liberty on that question is fully allowed to the laboring classes that we live in constant danger. That is the remedy against such outbreaks as continental Europe has seen many times in the course of this century. In England they have been of less importance, because more liberty is allowed to all classes there. I have observed, by reference to the public prints in England, that sometimes when the laboring classes of that country meet the laboring classes of the continent and compare notes that the English find they enjoy a greater proportion of true liberty than the French. A French meeting of workingmen before it convenes must receive the sanction of the municipal authorities. English laborers, provided they make a proper selection of the locus in quo are entitled to meet and discuss matters without disturbing the peace. I fear that on some occasions co-operative labor when defeated in its object in securing greater wages and shorter hours has sometimes indulged in violence. Forgetting its own claim for liberty, it has gone the length of refusing it to other men as needy and as much in want as themselves, and willing to take the work which the strikers had abandoned upon similar terms. It will never do in acknowledging or recognizing the right of co-operative labor to strike when it pleases, to prevent other men from taking the same work. It is very true that strikers receive a great deal of public support and sympathy, but it seems to me that to add anything in the form of violence, being in possession of this sympathy and support, would be unnecessary; yet those who have under the law the right to strike, not merely on the docks in England, but in other parts of Great Britain, have resorted on many occasions to force. This is to be deprecated, because it injures the cause of the laborers themselves. If we want a happy and prosperous country all classes must be happy and contented, and that cannot be as long as we have those conflicts between labor and capital. Those men must fully understand that by interrupting the course of trade and preventing the loading and unloading of vessels in the docks, their actions at once destroy the very fund that supports them at other seasons when, as is sometimes the case, the employers themselves are not doing a profitable business.

Some reference has been made to the fisheries, both as to the commission on the improving of the curing of fish, and otherwise. I dare say that the system of curing can be improved in Canada, but there is one thing we want, and that is, we should know more of the natural history of our fish and the causes that tend to their destruction. With more improved ways of destroying them, our fisheries will be rapidly so impoverished that they will not be worth following as an industry. The people of my Province have been holding meetings during the past summer, and have passed resolutions that some restrictions must be placed upon the methods of fishing, or else our valuable fisheries will very soon be things of the past. Mackerel fishing for instance, according to the recent American system of using purse nets and seines, has a very disastrous effect upon the fish and the fishing grounds. I am not myself conversant with the ordinary routine work of the fisheries, but I have conversed with others who are, and from what I have learned I believe the true policy for Canada to pursue in this respect is to close the three-mile limit against nettings of all kinds, and let us reserve the waters inside of the three-mile limit exclusively for line fishing. In that way the fish which would be taken inside of the three-mile line—mackerel particularly—would be of the very first quality, and the waters of the three-mile limit, being shallow, would no longer be poisoned, as they are now in danger of being poisoned by the heaving overboard of the refuse taken up in the seines. The vessels are fitted out for mackerel, and anything but mackerel is to them useless, and is thrown overboard, to the great detriment of the fisheries. It is a question well worth enquiring into, and I believe myself that the salvation of our fisheries consists in that. I am not one of those in favor of carrying out the Treaty of 1818 in its entirety. I believe it was a good treaty in its day, but that day has passed, and it is less beneficial now to the people of my Province. I am not speaking for those of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but it does seem to me that to trade with the Americans is far more advantageous to us than it is to exclude them. There was a time when we had in operation treaties admitting Americans into our ports, giving them the same privileges that we enjoy ourselves; there was a time also when they were admitted by license, and during those periods our Province made as great progress in wealth and importance as it has done for years. Why should not those times be restored? I believe if the Americans were admitted to the harbors of the Lower Provinces to obtain ice and bait, and some of the minor items of supplies—transhipment, &c.—that they would set in motion a vast amount of labor which is comparatively unemployed in the winter. For instance, in Prince Edward Island there are sheets of beautiful fresh water well adapted to ice cutting. The population have not a great deal to do in winter; they have horses and sleighs, and many a man would be glad to have an opportunity of earning $1 a day in storing ice during the winter time. Another item is bait. A man may have a farm near the seaside partly cleared, but not sufficiently to support his family, and if he had the privilege of cutting ice and selling it to the Americans, and also the privilege of taking bait for them, he would add to the resources of his family, and in due time would become a wealthy man. These are considerations which weigh in favor of relaxing the conditions of the Treaty of 1818. I would not abandon that treaty by any means. It is a strong rock of defence for Canada to fall back upon in case of any of those capricious circumstances which we know, to our cost, so often occur in the United States, particularly when elections are at hand, either presidential or congressional. One of the great difficulties we have to contend with, whether it be in connection with Behring's Sea or the fisheries on the Atlantic coast, is the fact of the President and his Ministry not being in touch with the House and with the Senate. Unhappily the Senate possess a power which very often induces them to upset very promising treaties. It is not a new thing by any means. We saw it happen only a few years ago. We were in hopes that our difficulties were in fair course of settlement, but we were disappointed by the action of the United States Senate. I have read recently of an instance of the same kind which occurred during the time when Mr. Rush was Minister to England and Mr. Munroe was President. At that time there was some outstanding grievances between the United States and England. One of them was with reference to the suppression of the slave trade. I suppose the Americans where then, as afterwards, very often indisposed to allow the right of search, and therefore would not permit British cruisers to stop and search their schooners on the coast of Africa, and there was besides a question with regard to trade between the United States and the West Indies, and another question at the same time with regard to the fisheries of New Brunswick. The two countries were anxious that these questions should be discussed and settled. The President sent a protest from Washington to England, and Mr. Rush was there representing the American Government, and the British Government appointed Mr. Huskinson and Mr. Canning. They discussed these questions between them, and succeeded in making arrangements which were approved of by Mr. Rush, approved of by the British Government and approved by President Monroe; yet, when they were sent to the Senate they were thrown out. The Senate insisted on altering several words in the first clause, and this clause happened to be one which had been originally sent over for the approval of the English by the President himself. I will not attribute any unworthy motive to the Senate in this matter; I only point to it as an instance of the difficulties we have to encounter. I have detained the House longer than I anticipated; at the same time, I felt it necessary that an opinion should be expressed on this subject, and I do hope, as an Englishman jealous of the honor of my country, that she will act up to her standing in regard to this, without at all expecting that it will lead to war between the two countries, or that it will lead to great diplomatic difficulties. The case is so exceedingly simple in itself, also so important to Canada that her independence in this matter should be established, that I do think our Government and our Parliament cannot be too precise and clear in their expression of opinion on this Behring's Sea question.

HON. MR. WARK—I do not intend to discuss the Speech, but I want to make a remark with respect to what has fallen from the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, with regard to the contrast between the conduct of England when two American citizens were taken by force from a British vessel, and what he looks upon as the dilatory course pursued now by the Government on this Behring's Sea question. At the time referred to, England was on the very best terms with France. Napoleon was an ally of England, and while the contest was going on in the United States, if England had gone with them she would have acknowledged the independence of the Southern States.

At that time Russia was looking on with indifference, perhaps with pleasure, at the contest that was going on. The British Government is very differently situated now. France is jealous of the position that England occupies in Egypt. Russia wants nothing more than to see England engage in some difficulty with a foreign power in order to carry out her designs on Constantinople. Now, the Marquis of Salisbury is by no means a timid statesman, but I think everyone must admire his prudence in endeavoring to settle this Behring's Sea question in a peaceable manner.

HON. MR. POWER—What about Portugal?

HON. MR. WARK—There is no danger from Portugal.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friends opposite will not be surprised if I concur entirely in all they have said as to the advantages which we have already derived, and will in the future derive, from the appointments which the Government have made to this House during the interval between last Session and now. I listened with very great pleasure to the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the Address, and was struck with the knowledge of the subjects which they displayed. I congratulated myself not only upon the advantages which the appointments obviously possess, but also, as I listened to hon. gentlemen opposite, on the approbation of the actions of the Government which they displayed in praising these appointments. In fact, that appeared to me to be quite in harmony with a great deal that fell from my hon. friends opposite; but while congratulating ourselves upon those acquisitions to our numbers I think it meet and fitting that we make a passing reference to the losses we have sustained by the hand of death since our last Session. We have had the misfortune to lose two of our most valued members, one (Mr. Hardisty) who was only on the threshold of his duties as a Senator, and had not had sufficient time here to make known to us the ability that he possessed and the patriotism that, I have no doubt, he would have displayed as a member of the Senate. He was cut off in the zenith of his powers, and we have to lament the untimely accident which deprived us of his association with us as our colleague. We must also feel, more strongly if possible, the loss we sustained in the death of our late hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Turner), a man who was and would have continued to be a credit to this House, and to any body of which he was a member. He was cut off while displaying among us the manly vigor both of body and mind which distinguished him above a great many of his fellows. These are losses which we could not contemplate as being probable, and which are irremediable to us, and they very strongly—more strongly almost than any similar misfortune that has occurred to this House—illustrate to most of us—to many of us, at all events—the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death.

With reference to the subject of the Speech which my hon. friends have discussed, as I have said I think we have to congratulate ourselves, and I congratulate the House and those hon. gentlemen upon the moderation which they have displayed in the discussion of those points in the Speech with which they did not altogether agree, or which suggested to them, perhaps, subjects on which they did not altogether agree, with members on this side of the House. I congratulate myself and the House on that, because I think it marks a progress in the career of this House which is likely to prove advantageous to us in the future. It is important that we should be able to eliminate from our discussions any virulence of party feeling that may tend to distort our opinions or prevent a clear view of the subjects that are presented to us. The Senate is eminently a house of deliberation, possessing in its members a degree of experience and also, we may hope, of judgment and wisdom, which their previous training and their previous careers in most instances so well justify, and the position which we hold before the country is likely to be sustained and elevated by a calm and dispassionate consideration of the questions which come before us, rather than by indulging in heated debates or recriminations on matters on which we happen to differ. That, I think, correctly characterizes the discussion which has taken place so far; and I am glad of it, and proud of the House for the applause with which the remarks of hon. gentlemen on both sides have been received. At the same time, as a matter of course, although in so many instances my hon. friends opposite agree with the Government and state their approbation of its conduct, there are one or two points to which in a few words I desire to refer, not intending to raise a debate upon them or to discuss them at any great length, but to express my opinion in as few words as possible, merely to place on record the shades of difference, perhaps, rather than any great difference, which prevail between their views and mine.

With regard to the first subject, and one that has been dilated upon by several members, the question of the Behring Sea outrages, I must say (and I think what I have said before in this House on previous occasions justifies me in saying it now) that I entirely agree with every word that my hon. friends on the other side have said, with the very forcible speech of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, more especially as respects the conduct of the Government of the United States towards us with regard to those fisheries. There is no possibility of question that the United States laid down for themselves, in their contest or dispute with Russia, the doctrine which we now advocate and stand upon, and they did so with a force and clearness—that is to say, in the expression of opinion by their statesmen and jurist-consults, that it appears to me ought to entirely disqualify and prevent them from taking the position which is attributed to them at present of maintaining their right to control over Behring Sea. The opinion of their legal officers—the opinion of Chancellor Kent, one of their greatest writers on international law—was so clear and so strongly expressed, and met with such entire approbation in the United States from the whole of their statesmen of every party—that it is inconceivable to me that at this moment they can hold any different doctrine, and I must say that I have as yet no evidence before me that the United States do enunciate any different doctrine from that propounded by Chancellor Kent. I do not understand that the United States have taken the ground in the controversy which has been going on for some time past, that they have a right to control Behring's Sea. I do not understand that they maintain that they can legally or constitutionally prevent our fishermen from exercising their fishing rights beyond the three-mile limit in Behring's Sea. The precise nature of the discussion which has taken place it is not in my power to state to the House. It is obviously not in the public interest that while a controversy in going on between the two Governments, the reasons and motives of either party to that discussion should be made the subject of public comment, and should be spread over the country in newspapers, and commented upon by public speakers, and feelings aroused which would be detrimental to a free and calm discussion on the subject between the two Governments; but I can state this, from personal knowledge of the subject, and on the very best and highest authority, that England has from the first taken exactly the same view of this Behring's Sea question that my hon. friends who have spoken have, that I do, and that this House does—precisely the same. There has been some delay in the conclusion of the discussion, some delay has taken place in the public declaration of the rights of Canada and the removal of the difficulties which have been suffered by our fishermen on the Pacific coast, but of course to discuss that would be to discuss the correspondence which has not yet been laid before the House, and which, I do not think, is a proper subject of discussion; but I think the Senate may rely upon this, that the correspondence will show that short of taking a position which might provoke a conflict, England has done everything in her power to bring this matter to a favorable conclusion for herself and for us. My hon. friend from Ottawa spoke of the motives which he imagines governed England in not having insisted on a settlement of this question; he attributes it to the market which England has in the United States for her produce, and I think, with a little inconsistency, my hon. friend illustrated his arguments by an instance where England did, with this very same country, whose market she so strongly desires, the very thing which he thinks she ought to do in this instance—in the Mason and Slidell case—where her jurisdiction over her own ships was invaded by the crew of a United States cruiser. In that case she took the strongest possible ground at once, and risked an immediate breach with the United States, and the loss of this market, to retain which, my hon. friend thinks, is her motive for not vindicating our rights in the same manner now. That, I think, shows pretty well that my hon. friend is mistaken as to the motive which governs England in the present instance, and that there is no foundation for the statement that she would neglect any interest of her own or Canada's, any insult to her dignity as a nation, on the ground that she would thereby sacrifice any market which the United States might give her. We, ourselves, I think, have been pretty good customers of hers, and might also have a counterbalancing influence in that particular direction; but I do not think my hon. friend's own illustration of his argument was sufficient to justify the assertion that England had any such motive in allowing this controversy to be protracted. The only reason that England had for allowing the delay was, that she could not bring the dispute to an earlier conclusion without assuming towards our friends on the other side of the border a position which my hon. friend from Ottawa would be the very first to deprecate and condemn. If with a little patience, if with the loss of some time—a good deal of time, I am quite prepared to admit,—England can succeed in bringing about a peaceable and friendly solution of this question, surely the loss of a year or two in the operations of these fishermen on the Pacific coast is nothing to be compared to the misery, the loss and the destruction that would follow any breach between England and the United States. And who would suffer most by such a breach—who but we, that are complaining because we have lost the cargoes of a few small fishing schooners, which after all do not amount to a great deal, and which I am confident will be compensated to the owners at the conclusion of this controversy. What comparison would that bear to the misery, the wretchedness and ruin which would follow a direct breach between England and the United States? I think that my hon. friends who find fault with this delay would do well to exercise some little patience, and entertain some little confidence in the desire and in the ability of England to maintain her own dignity and her own position (for it is her dignity and her position that are just as much assailed as ours), and trust, as I believe they may safely trust, that we shall shortly have, probably, as His Excellency informs us, within the present Session, a solution of the difficulty which will be satisfactory to everyone.

The other subjects which have been discussed will probably not require that I should detain the House so long as I have done on this subject of the seal fisheries in Behring's Sea, because that is certainly a subject which interests us very largely, which in itself possesses intrinsic importance and demands the attention of the Senate, and of any other deliberative body that may be in session. With reference to the other subjects which were brought up by my hon. friend—the question of the fishing industry—it has been ascertained, and it is the fact, that better methods of curing fish, better methods of preparing the packages in which the fish are placed for market, have lately come into use both in Scotland and in Holland—in Holland more especially, where those methods have been better and more successful in capturing the attention and favor of customers than has been the case in Scotland. I am unable to inform the House, and probably it would not greatly interest hon. gentlemen to know, exactly in what particulars these improvements have been made. There is something in the construction of the packages, the mode in which the fish are pickled before they are placed in the barrels and packed in the barrel, the mode in which the packing is finished off—I do not know exactly what it is, but those are the points in which the fishermen, more especially of Holland, have succeeded in placing their goods in a better and more marketable condition than those of our own fishermen. The Government have sent over a commission composed of two men, who are certainly as experienced as could be found in the Dominion, practical fishermen, to investigate those processes and give us the necessary information which will enable us to successfully compete with the fishermen of Scotland and Holland, more especially the latter; and I trust that we shall shortly have their report before us, and judge for ourselves of its merits and the advantages which we may hope to derive from it.

There is another subject, and a very wide one, which I think cannot be successfully debated on this occasion; perhaps we may have a substantive opportunity of debating it during the Session. It has reference to that question which is familiar to this House, and which my hon. friend from Ottawa never fails to remind us of—and he is quite right, because it is an important one—the development and settlement of the North-West. One of my hon. friends opposite quoted the prophecy of Sir John Macdonald in another place as to the probable increase in the settlement of the North-West, as to the probable profits that might be made out of the sale of lands in the North-West, in consequence of that settlement, and very naturally told us that that prophecy had been very far indeed from being fulfilled. Well, Sir John is not the only statesman who has prophesied with regard to our proceedings in the North-West. Other prominent statesmen have prophesied about the Canadian Pacific Railway—one gentleman indulged in remarkable predictions—I do not remember the figures, but they were so large that they were almost beyond the power of man to conceive, certainly beyond the power of man to count—as to the time which would be required for the construction of a railway across the continent, and the amount of money that would be spent in building it. I suppose great statesmen are fallible, like everybody else, and the prophecy which my hon. friends opposite have been criticising has been answered in this way—whether truly or not, I do not know; my hon. friends will say, no doubt, not correctly—that one of the great and most effectual causes which has prevented the settlement of the North-West has been the fault which some of our own people have been in the habit of finding with the prospects of emigrants who should go to the North-West. This proposition has been put before the House on former occasions. We discussed it at considerable length last Session. I do not wish to provoke a discussion on it now; I merely wish to state, as my hon. friends have raised it, in a few words, my position, and the position of our friends on that point. My hon. friends opposite say that the settlement of the North-West is progressing very slowly, that it does not come up to Sir John's prophecy, or to our expectations by any means. Whose fault is it? Who tells the world generally that there is some monopoly in the North-West which would prevent any man making a living there? Then, our land laws were said to be so bad that settlers would not go there, and the people were told that they were worse than the land laws in the States on the other side of the line. It was something like a man who prophesies and goes to work to fulfil his prophecy. In this instance my hon. friends opposite controverted the prophecy of Sir John Macdonald, and then went to work to prevent its realization. That is our view of it. My hon. friends also made some other statements about this question. One hon. gentleman said: "Look at Dakota! Look at those north-western States, how rapid their progress has been compared with ours!" I have no hesitation in saying that it is so: they have made greater progress of late years than we have. They have some advantages.

HON. MR. PERLEY—Half of them are starving to death now.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—In the first place there were no men or body of men who occupied themselves in presenting the disadvantages of taking up land in Dakota. I have not found that it has been the characteristic of any body of men in the United States to find fault with their own country, or try to prevent the prosperity or settlement of any portion of it, whether from a desire to destroy the Government, for instance, or from any motive whatever. No such policy has been developed by any party in the United States. There is another reason, also, which is perhaps stronger than the one I have stated, though the one I have mentioned no doubt has had great influence, and that is that these States are filled by the surplus population of a community of 60,000,000 of people plus what emigration may go to those North-West Territories, and which is distributed more or less all over it. Our settlements in the North-West are formed by the surplus population of a people of 5,000,000 plus the immigration we are able to obtain. I am happy to say, and the census will prove it, that the increase in the population of Manitoba and the North-West has been greater than those two causes could produce—I mean to say, immigration from Europe; because it has been largely increased by immigration from the south side of the line, and that is going on in a greater degree now than it has ever before, because those who found fault with our country and recommended Montana and Dakota as places of settlement by preference over the North-West, because of monopoly, bad land laws and the like—those people who went there on these representations are now coming back to the North-West and settling there, where they find that the expense of carriage and transport is not so great as in their own country, and where they find that the land laws are at least as equitable and as well and honestly administered as in their own country.

Now I am in hopes that with these causes—the removal of the objections or rather of the statement in so great a degree of the objections alleged against the North-West, the greater acquaintance of the rural populations of Europe, more especially of Great Britain, with the North-West and its capacity—will year by year increase immigration and we shall in due course possess the great country there which my hon. friend from Calgary so eloquently described as being justified by the advantages which it possesses. I am in hopes that it will be so, and I believe that it will be so.

With regard to what has been said as to the development of our mineral resources, I think my hon. friend who remarked on that is not keeping himself au courant with the progress of events in that respect. We have in the last two or three years made discoveries of various valuable minerals, and those are being exploited to an immense extent both by our own people and by English and American companies. The whole region which has been opened up by the Canadian Pacific Railway north-west of Lake Nipissing, and by the branch from Sudbury, is found to abound with most valuable minerals—copper and, still more valuable, enormous deposits of nickel, so vast that the world at large will be mainly indebted for its supplies of nickel to the territory west of Lake Nipissing. I find so much occasion constantly to applaud what my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island says that I hope that he is not smiling at my statement as doubting it, because I have a personal knowledge that those mineral deposits are of enormous extent and of equally enormous value. These developments are going on; there are similar projects being commenced and proceeded with in the large deposits of the precious metals to be found mainly south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the Rockies and Cascades Ranges, and I think the results of these projects will be such as to attract an enormous proportion of the enterprise in mineral matters throughout Europe to this country, and a correspondingly large development of those very large mineral resources.

HON. MR. VIDAL—And coal.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend says coal: I had omitted to notice that important mineral. Undoubtedly we are producing enormous quantities of coal. In British Columbia, the consumers of coal have been largely handicapped by the practical monopoly of the coal supply which exists in that region in the hands of one company or one person, but that monopoly will probably shortly be entirely destroyed by a discovery which has been made of valuable coal lying on the far side of the mountains in the plain through which the great Fraser River passes to the sea, and easy of access to the seaboard and to the growing towns in that quarter. So that also will form a very considerable addition to the development which is going on in the mineral resources of that country.

There are two or three minor points that I would like to say a word about. The hon. gentleman from Halifax is inclined to find fault with the Government for the measure, with regard to the foreshores, which His Excellency has promised. I think the hon. gentleman, of course, only expresses that distrust which he thinks is appropriate on such an occasion to his position as one of the leaders of the Opposition in this House; he did not express any opinion as to what the proposed measure of the Government is likely to be. I only hope that when the measure comes down my hon. friend will not suppose that the Government prepared it in consequence of the suggestion which he has just made. I think my hon. friend will find that it affords an excellent solution of the difficulties which have been experienced in connection with the foreshores question. I do not think my hon. friend will feel that the other party, the Province, will be inclined to introduce a Bill to cancel the settlement which the Government propose to make. There is not the slightest danger that any provincial Government will quarrel with the Dominion Government as to the mode of settlement which is to be embodied in the Bill which His Excellency promises. As to other suggestions which hon. gentlemen have made, that we should endeavor to get some of those commercial measures before the Senate, to have an opportunity of employing our time at the beginning of the Session more usefully than we have been able to do on former occasions, I sympathise very strongly indeed with what has been said on this subject. I desire to have an opportunity of proving that this House is as capable of placing in proper form and shape measures affecting the commercial community, and in fact any other measures, but more especially those such as are promised, and I refer to them now—as any other body sitting in any other place can possibly be; and I venture to think, also, that in accordance with the theory expressed a little while ago, in the absence of that political acrimony which some popular assemblies are in the habit of displaying, we can give those measures a greater proportion of time and a more dispassionate and careful and calm consideration than they would receive in another place. I hope that during the present Session we shall have an opportunity of supporting the faith that is in us by taking up some of those very important commercial measures which His Excellency promises us; and I am sure, from what I know of this House and the committees of this House, that the result will be that we shall be found to have done them justice. I believe that last Session the efforts that we made to improve legislation were highly considered in other quarters, and I have no doubt whatever that the same result will follow on this occasion.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF SENATOR TRUDEL.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is my melancholy duty to lay before the House a telegram which I have just received, announcing the fact that our esteemed colleague, Senator Trudel, has just departed this life.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (A), "An Act to amend the Railways Act." (Mr. McCallum.)

The Senate adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, January 20th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (B) "An Act to amend Cap. 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, respecting the improper use of firearms and other weapons." (Mr. Read.)

THE LATE SENATOR TRUDEL.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to express what I am sure must be the sentiments of this House, and which are undoubtedly my own sentiments, as to the untimely and much to be regretted loss which we sustained last week by the death of our late honored colleague, the Hon. Mr. Trudel. Although, doubtless, he and I differed on many points connected with the government of the country, and he and other gentlemen also differed, still no one can deny that whatever position or course he thought fit to assume or advocate in the House, he always acted with the most perfect courtesy, with great ability, and in every respect in a manner to recommend him to his colleagues in the Senate, as a gentleman in every way worthy the distinguished position which he held in this Chamber. Everyone must admit the great ability which distinguished him during a moderately long career in public life as an advocate, as a journalist, and as a public man. We must all feel the deepest regret that the country should be deprived of his valuable services at so early a stage in his career, when he was practically in the prime of life, but such is the dispensation of Providence, and we can only submit. It is only due to his memory that I should say, and I am sure that I express the feelings of everyone here, how much we regret the loss that this House and the country have sustained by his death.

HON. MR. SCOTT. I feel that it is quite unnecessary that I should add anything to what has fallen from the leader of the House. I am sure that the observations which he has made find a ready echo in the breast of every gentleman present. Our lamented friend, Senator Trudel, was a man who was highly respected. As the leader of the House has said, he was a man of very marked individuality, but everyone must have been struck with the very great sincerity of his convictions. He always spoke what he felt; there was no dissimulation in his character. He was a man who acted up to the impulses of his own nature. He was honorable, fair-minded and generous on every occasion, but the marked trait of his character, I think, was the great sincerity that was observable in all that he said and did. I am quite sure that we all feel, equally with the leader of the House, regret at the loss that the country has sustained by the early death of our late colleague.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—(in French)—I am happy to hear the eulogy which the leader of the House has paid to the memory of the late Senator Trudel. I quite agree with all that he has said, but coming from a political adversary, it possesses greater force than anything I could say. The late Senator and I were old and intimate friends. Should I undertake to describe all that Senator Trudel was, I would have to show him as a good citizen, an affectionate father, an able writer, a prominent journalist and an eminent politician. But the prominent trait in Senator Trudel's character was the earnestness of his convictions, for which at any time in his career I am sure he would have been ready to lay down his life. Such sincerity and courage are not usual in our times. While he held tenaciously to his own views and expressed them freely at all times, he was so kindly and courteous that he leaves behind him in the House only friends. I would conclude by thanking the leader of the Senate for the tribute he has paid to our late colleague, and hoping that our lamented friend is now enjoying the reward of a well spent life.

HON. MR. ROSS—(in French)—I desire to add my expressions of regret at the loss of the late Senator Trudel to those which have fallen from my hon. friends who have just spoken. Mr. Trudel was a native of the parish from which I come, and I have known him from his childhood as a member of a numerous and highly respected family of which he was the pride, and to whom his death is a terrible blow. I extend to them my most cordial and sincere sympathy in their bereavement. I have known, as I have said, Mr. Trudel from his infancy, and I fought with him for many years under the same banner and in the same rank. Later on we pursued different courses, but in taking a new departure of late years, I believe he was actuated by the greatest sincerity, and thought that he was doing what was right. He pursued it with the sincerity which was always a prominent characteristic of our late colleague. Mr. Trudel was a man of energy and talent, violent at times, but always sincere, and that sincerity was appreciated by all, and his violence was the more readily pardoned. I concur in the expressions of praise and regret that have fallen from those who have spoken to-day, and I shall not detain the House by repeating what they have said.

The Senate adjourned at 3.35 p.m.

MILL REFUSE IN THE OTTAWA RIVER.

MOTION.

HON. MR. CLEMOW moved—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House, copies of all reports and other communications in reference to the deposit of sawdust, slabs, or other offensive material in the Ottawa, and other rivers of the Dominion.

He said—I regret that it is necessary to bring this matter again before the Senate. As most hon. gentlemen are aware, this matter has already received considerable attention in this House. Two years ago a notice similar to this was submitted, and a large Committee was then appointed, under the able guidance of the hon. member from Richmond, to investigate the matter. An amount of evidence was obtained which certainly showed that the nuisance complained of was of a nature calling for some remedy. It was not to be expected that the Government should act at the moment, but we were informed by the hon. gentleman then leading this House, that during the recess consideration would be given to the question at issue, and that some remedial course would be adopted for the purpose of alleviating the cause of complaint therein referred to. Last Session it was also considered necessary to bring this matter under the consideration of the House, and the leader of the Government told us that he concurred in what had been stated by myself and others on the subject, but that other reports were being made and it was intended to await the result of those inquiries and investigations before the Government could arrive at any conclusion. Another year has passed over, and I do not see that any very great efforts have been made in that direction. The nuisance is still complained of, and has increased to some extent. Last year the Ottawa River was so impeded by this obstruction that it was almost impossible to navigate it. I have known boats to be detained two or three days at the foot of the locks before they could ascend to the basin, and the obstruction became so serious at the latter end of the season that the gentlemen who are chiefly chargeable with the commission of this offence went to the expense of dredging a portion of the channel to enable the vessels to enter the locks. Now, this state of things should not be allowed to continue. It is high time that action should be taken to put a stop to a practice which is ruinous to the navigation of the river. I am in hopes that when the subject has received attention on other rivers, notably in New Brunswick, that some action will be taken. Therefore I have put this notice on the paper with a view of eliciting the opinion of the Government on the question. I may say that this evil has increased from year to year. Hon. gentlemen will understand the serious character of the nuisance when I tell them that last season some four to four-and-a-half millions of sawlogs, producing some eight hundred millions of feet of sawn lumber, were cut in this vicinity, a large portion of these logs, in the shape of sawdust, slabs and other refuse, being deposited in the Ottawa River. If this practice is continued it will, in the course of time, render the river absolutely useless for navigation, and I think it is high time that we should take steps to prevent further damage from this cause. The rivers of the Dominion are the natural highways of the country and nobody should be allowed to obstruct them. I hope that some thing substantial will be done during the present Session for the protection of the public interests. When the sessional papers for which I now move are brought down, and I learn the intentions of the Government, if they are not satisfactory, I intend to submit a short Bill in order to test the feeling of the House on the question at issue. I hope the Government will not object to producing the papers which I wish to obtain, as they may furnish information which will enable the House to arrive at a sound conclusion in the matter. The question is one of very great importance to this section, and I hope that some prompt action will be taken to abate the nuisance and remove the difficulties of which we complain. Something should have been done before now, but when the papers are brought down it may appear that there is good reason for the delay. I recognize the importance of the lumber trade to this section of Canada, but there are other interests to be conserved and protected as well as the lumbering interest. The subject is one of such general importance that no private interest or feeling should be allowed to interfere with a settlement of it in the public interest.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The Government, of course, have no objection whatever to the Address being carried, but I think we might conveniently dispense with a further discussion of the questions which my hon. friend proposes to raise until we have the papers before the House, and can see exactly what these various experts have reported on the matter in question.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The papers I suppose will be brought down at an early date; they must be all ready.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—They will be brought down as soon as possible; I cannot say whether they are ready.

HON. MR. SCOTT—They cannot be very voluminous.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

HON. MR. McCALLUM moved the second reading of Bill (A), "An Act to amend the Railway Act."

He said—This is the same Bill that passed this House last year.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The Bill is not printed; you had better let it stand for a few days.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—If hon. gentlemen persist in the rule being followed, of course I shall not press the Bill until it is printed; but if they will allow it to take a stage, all right, if you do not of course I shall have to withdraw my motion for the second reading at present.

HON. MR. VIDAL—It is better to allow the Bill to stand until it is printed.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I move that the Order of the day be discharged, and that the Bill be read the second time on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—A good many hon. gentlemen have suggested to me that we should have the usual adjournment we have had after the commencement of every Session. I have been endeavoring to see what work could be obtained for the House to take in hand immediately, and there is to be a meeting this afternoon for the purpose of discussing that very subject. At the same time I do not think we can get work enough to keep us going for the first ten days of the Session, any more than they can in another place. I therefore give notice that I shall move to-morrow, if the House will permit me to give that short notice, for an adjournment to a day which can be settled when we discuss the matter. The Committees are all appointed; they will meet to-morrow for organization, and will be ready for work when the House meets again after the adjournment. I do this not with any wish myself to adjourn the House, but a number of members desire not to be detained here unless they have substantial work to do.

HYDRAULIC LOTS AT OTTAWA.

MOTION.

HON. MR. CLEMOW moved—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House, a detailed statement showing the settlement effected with the Lessees of Hydraulic lots at the Chaudière, City of Ottawa, as likewise copies of new leases entered into with the several Lessees of the said Hydraulicl ots.

He said—I have very little to say with respect to this question, only that I am informed that when these papers are brought down they will disclose the satisfactory information that a large sum of money has been obtained by this country from the lessees of the hydraulic lots at the Chaudière. This amount has been in abeyance for a great number of years, and it is gratifying to know that it has at last been collected. My motion also calls for copies of the renewed leases. I hope that the amount payable under these new leases will be commensurate with the value of the privileges enjoyed by the lessees. Heretofore the rental for these lots has been nominal, and in many instances the lessees sublet portions of their water powers for sums which were extravagant compared with the rental they paid to the Government. For instance, a lessee has received from other parties, by sub-letting, over four thousand dollars, whereas the rental paid to the Government was about eighty dollars a year. I hope the conditions of the new leases are such as to give the Government control of any excess of power that may be available at the Chaudière. These water powers are of immense value, and if the Government were in a position to offer them at public competition, they might yield a handsome revenue; but these parties were in possession, I presume, and it is nothing but right that their leases should be extended; but when the current leases expire I think the Government, in the interest of this locality and of the public generally, should offer the hydraulic lots at the Chaudière to public competition. It is a matter for congratulation that this long-standing dispute has been settled. I hope that the papers will show that the settlement which has been effected is advantageous to all the parties concerned.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There is no objection to the Address.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved that when the House adjourns this day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 4th of February, at 8.30 p.m.

HON. MR. WARK—Perhaps the hon. member can inform us whether the Government have decided to introduce any of the important measures referred to in the Speech from the Throne in this House. The Bank Act is a measure which might be discussed with advantage in the Senate. We have in this House not only bank presidents, but bank directors and men engaged extensively in commerce; the leader of the House stands at the head of commercial lawyers, and we have also other members who are eminently qualified to consider such questions. Then there is the measure relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes, which might be brought up with advantage in the Senate, where we have, perhaps, more leisure to deal with such matters than they have in the House of Commons. I should like to know, before the adjournment, whether those measures will be introduced in the Senate or not.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I might object to this motion on the ground that it is irregular, but I waive that objection. I am always opposed to these adjournments except when they are proposed by a member of the Government in this House, who is responsible largely for the progress of legislation. It is unfortunate, when these adjournments are to take place, that sufficient notice is not given, so that members, particularly at a distance, may know whether it is worth while to come to the Capital before the adjournment takes place. If I had had notice in time, I should have remained at home until after the adjournment.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—If my hon. friend had been here yesterday he would have heard the representation that I made to the House, that I was endeavoring to arrange for business for the Senate in this early portion of the Session, but was not aware until yesterday that we could not get a sufficient amount of business to occupy us in any reasonable degree for the next two weeks. That is the reason why I did not give my notice earlier. In the Senate, and in the House of Commons also, important business is not usually introduced for a few days after the opening of the Session. A great many of the important measures must be introduced in the Lower House, and cannot with propriety be introduced here, so that we have even a less proportion of business to do, even if we had all we could do, than the House of Commons. The Banking Act, to which the hon. member from Fredericton referred, is one which lies peculiarly within the functions of the Finance Minister, and we could hardly expect it to be introduced and explained by anybody but himself. The Bill relating to promissory notes and bills of exchange might with propriety be introduced here; I do not know that there is any objection to it, but everyone realizes that we have a Bill just as completely under our control when it comes to us from the Commons as when it is introduced here in the first instance. So that after all, except to enable us to do work at the beginning of the Session when we are not busy, instead of having to hurry it through when we are busy—except for that, which is an important reason, we have all the advantages with respect to these Bills that we would have if they were introduced here in the first place. The Bill relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes was introduced in the House of Commons last Session, and probably there was some consideration arising out of that fact, that it would be better to proceed with it there instead of introducing it in the Senate this Session.

The motion was agreed to.

Bill (F), "An Act respecting offences relating to the Law of Marriage." (Mr. Macdonald, B. C.)

THE LATE SENATOR RODIER.

HON. MR. SMITH—I much regret that it falls to my lot, in the absence of the leader of this House, to announce the death of the late Senator Rodier. I am sure that you will all regret exceedingly, as I do, the loss of our esteemed colleague.

L'HON. M. PAQUET : Je concours de tout cœur dans les observations, si justes et si bien méritées, de l'honorable membre pour Toronto qui m'a précédé. Nos rangs dans cette chambre se sont éclaircs une fois de plus, et la mort vient de nous enlever encore un bon citoyen.

L'honorable M. Rodier était la personnification de tout ce qu'un travail opiniâtre peut opérer, de ce qu'une conduite exemplaire peut créer d'estime et de respect, et de ce qu'une foi sincère peut produire d'exemples à imiter et pour la famille et pour la société. Je m'associe donc aux regrets de toute la chambre et je remercie vivement l'éloquent interprète de notre douleur commune.

READING PETITIONS.

THE SPEAKER having called for the reading of petitions,—

HON. MR. MILLER said: The reading of these petitions is out of order. It is the custom of the House that one sitting day should intervene between the presenting and the reading of a petition. These petitions were only presented yesterday, and in the case of the divorce petitions especially, I think it is highly improper to allow any departure from the strict rules. Four of these petitions are for divorces, and they were only presented yesterday. I do not know that we have any rule of this House on the subject, but the practice is as I have stated it, and it is also the practice of the House of Lords. In the absence of any rule of our own, we are governed by the practice of the House of Lords. I find in the little Manual by Mr. Lemoine the following: "Petitions.—One sitting day must intervene between the presentation and the reading of a petition." Certainly one day has not intervened in this case, and, as I have already said, in the case of the divorce petitions it is highly improper that any departure from the strict practice should be sanctioned or countenanced.

The reading of the petitions was allowed to stand until to-morrow.

DEPARTMENT OF GEOLOGY BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. SMITH moved the second reading of Bill (C), "An Act respecting the Department of Geology, Mining and Natural History." He said: In the absence of our worthy leader, I would suggest that this Bill be read the second time now and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next, with the understanding that nobody will be committed to the principle of the Bill. By Tuesday next we may have the leader of the House present, or some arrangement may be made to carry on the business.

HON. MR. MILLER—I presume there will be no objection to the second reading, on the understanding that the House is not committed to the principle of the Bill. This is a Government measure, and is in a different position from a private Bill. The second reading of a private Bill does not commit anybody to the principle of it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

AGRICULTURAL FERTILIZERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. SMITH moved the second reading of Bill (D), "An Act respecting Agricultural Fertilizers."

HON. MR. SCOTT—This is a Bill of nineteen clauses, which the House has not had an opportunity to read. I have no objection to its taking this stage, on the understanding that the House is not committed to the principle of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

RECEPTION OF PETITIONS FOR DIVORCE.

The Order of the Day having been called for the reading of petitions,—

HON. MR. DICKEY said: Before these petitions are read, it is fit that I should call the attention of the House to the question which arose at our last sitting in reference to the reading of some four or five divorce petitions. My only object, I may say, in calling the attention of the House to the subject is to avoid taking a contradictory course in regard to precedents and the mode of procedure of the Senate. It will be in the remembrance of the House that under the old rules there was a special procedure in divorce cases. One rule was that the petition should be presented in the usual way and, after one sitting day intervening, it should then be read and certain proof made at the bar of the Senate. Proof was required under the old rule, as under the new one, of the service of the notice of the proceedings on the person affected before the petition could be read or received. Every one who hears me, who remembers that mode of procedure, will recollect how excessively inconvenient it was. At all events, in the judgment of the Senate, it was desirable that a more convenient mode of procedure should be adopted, and the result was the establishment of the Divorce Committee, and rules which thereafter would be applicable to all divorce cases; and amongst these rules is one to which I shall call the attention of the House—the rule which governs this particular part of the proceedings. The House will remember that under the old mode of procedure the petition was read, after proof of the service of the notice to which I have referred had been made at the bar of the Senate. In April, 1888, a new mode of procedure was adopted, and Rule "I" is as follows:—

"The petition, when presented (1) shall be accompanied by the evidence of the publication of the notice (2) as required by Rule D, and by declaration in evidence of the service of a copy thereof as provided by Rule E, and by a copy of the proposed Bill; (3) The petition, notice, and evidence of publication and service, the proposed Bill, and all papers connected therewith, shall thereupon stand as referred, without special order to that effect, to 'The Select Committee on Divorce.'"

That appears to be perfectly plain. Then the next rule, "J," is as follows:—

"It shall be the duty of the committee to examine (1) the notice of application to Parliament, the petition, the proposed Bill, the evidence of publication and of the service of the copy of the said notice, and all other papers referred therewith, and if the said notice, petition and proposed Bill are found regular and sufficient, and due proof has been made of the publication and service of the said notice, the committee shall report the same to the Senate."

The committee report to the Senate whether the rules have been complied with, but the matter is still under the control of the House, because Rule "K" provides:—

"Upon the adoption of the report of the committee the Bill may be introduced and read a first time."

That appears to be perfectly plain, and I can only offer an apology to the House for not having looked into the matter before it was brought up yesterday. I had not the rules at my finger ends and there was no copy of them before me. I think, in the interest of the House, it is better to follow the rules as they stand. They only came into force in the latter part of the Session of 1888. Last year we had no less than five divorce cases, in all of which the mode of procedure was adopted which suggests itself to any person who sees that rule—that is to say, upon the presentation of a petition the petition and all the papers should be referred to the Divorce Committee to be reported upon. The petition is not read here at all; it stands as referred, without any order whatever, but in all those cases—the Lowry, the Middleton, the Rosamond, the Bagwell and the Wand—it will be found by reference to our Journals, which I have taken the trouble to look into, that the petition was presented and no order was made—the petition was never read but it stood, in the language of that rule, as referred to the Committee on Divorce. At page 33 the report of that committee to the House appears. When the report of the committee was presented the motion was made for its adoption, and the House in all these cases decided to adopt the report. I simply mention this to show that the matter is still under the control of the House. In all these cases, except the Rosamond case, which was withdrawn, the report was adopted, the proceedings went on and the Bills were passed through their final stages. There are these five precedents to govern us, and I think it is not too strong language to use to say that it is highly inconvenient to establish a contradictory procedure now, unless it is required by the rules. As the rules appear to me to be quite clear, I think I am simply discharging my duty in calling attention to the matter, in order that we may avoid adopting a course this year which we may depart from next Session. I think, therefore, I am entitled to ask that the House will be prepared to express an opinion on the matter, and I hope that that opinion will be to keep us in the line we have been travelling upon—to keep us not only to the letter but to the spirit of that rule, the object of which was, I repeat, to relegate to the Divorce Committee the task of examining the evidence in support of the petition, instead of obtaining it in the inconvenient manner in which it was formerly brought before the House, and allow the committee to report to the House, and the House to take such action as may be deemed advisable upon the report.

HON. MR. MILLER—I think I shall be able to show to the House that the hon. member from Amherst is quite wrong, both in his own interpretation of the rule and in the citation he has made in support of his view. I have to complain, in the first place, that in a matter of this kind he has not thought proper to give me some intimation of his intention to bring the subject before the House to-day. The question is one which requires reference to authorities, and one which I cannot well discuss without preparation. Still, I will answer my hon. friend on the spur of the moment. It is amusing that in bringing this matter before the Senate my hon. friend has been guilty of violating two of our rules. In the first place, he referred to a previous debate; and, in the second place, he has not given such notice as our rules require. I would readily have dispensed with a formal notice if he had not failed to call my attention to the course he intended to take before making the statement which we have heard to-day. The position which I took yesterday was this: I observed that some of the petitions which had been presented the day before were being read. It had been the practice of the Senate, following the practice of the House of Lords, that at least one sitting day should intervene between the presenting and the reading of a petition. I observed among the petitions which were being read that there were some for divorce Bills, and I called the attention of the House to the subject, and, I think, kept the proceedings regular by doing so. My hon. friend has cited Rule "1," and, perhaps, without sufficient research and examination of the question, he might be led to suppose that the intention of that rule was that the petition should be referred to the Committee on Divorce on its presentation. I contend that the word "presented" here is intended to comprise the general proceeding which takes place in regard to petitions presented to the Senate before they are referred to the committee, and that the object of the rule was simply to supersede the necessity of sending the petition, when read, to the Committee on Standing Orders, and send it instead to the Committee on Divorce, which, I think, was a very good change. If my hon. friend will refer to Rule "F," which precedes the one he cited, he will see that the intention of the framer of these rules was that the petition should be received. Now, the petition cannot be received until it is read. Rule "F" says that no petition for divorce should be received after the first thirty days of each Session. You all know that the parliamentary meaning of that term is the reception by the House. Therefore, I contend that this rule requires that the petition should be read and received. Otherwise, the rules would be a jargon. Any gentleman who has given attention to parliamentary proceedings will see at once that it was the intention of the framer of these rules that the petition should be received as well as presented, but what struck me with a great deal of surprise was that my hon. friend completely, though no doubt unintentionally, misrepresented the procedure of the House under these new rules, as I will show, in two at least of the cases to which he has referred. I say that the Journals of the Senate contradict him clearly and emphatically. The hon. gentleman cannot have read the Journals with anything like the care which he generally shows in his citations to the House. These new rules were framed by Senator Gowan, who gave a great deal of attention to the subject and became the first chairman of the Divorce Committee. We all know the legal astuteness and clearness of that hon. gentleman, and the care and circumspection with which he watched every stage of the proceedings in these cases from their initiation under the new rules. I take it for granted that Senator Gowan understood the practice to be pursued under his rules as well as any member of this House, and if any irregularity had occurred he would have corrected it at once. Anyone who knows Senator Gowan does not require to be assured that he would allow no departure from a strict compliance with those rules which he had himself framed, and which he looked upon with the fondness of a father for a cherished bantling. Take the Middleton and Bagwell cases, which my hon. friend has cited. I am astonished that the hon. gentleman should have referred to these cases. I do not charge him with intentional misrepresentation, but I do charge him with carelessness in making his citations. On page 18 of the Journals I find that the petitions in these two cases were presented on the 6th of February, and on page 21 I find that on the 20th of February they were read and received by the House. The entry is: "Pursuant to the Order of the Day the following petitions were severally read:" and among the petitions mentioned are two of those cited by the hon. gentleman. The argument of my hon. friend is not only destitute of foundation, but it is supported by citations which are incorrect.

HON. MR. DICKEY—As to my hon. friend's complaint that I have been guilty of want of courtesy in not mentioning to him my reason for bringing this up, I have simply to say that I could not find the hon. gentleman. I took the very earliest opportunity to show him the rules, and to give him the notice which courtesy required that I should furnish him. I only looked into the matter this morning, and I then took the very earliest opportunity to speak to him on the subject. My only reason for bringing up the matter now is that I do not want the House to fall into an irregular practice. The hon. gentleman has referred to two cases in which the rule has not been followed. If there were two cases one way, and three cases the other way, of course the majority of precedents would govern.

HON. MR. MILLER—I have not had time to look at the other cases.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Neither have I had time. I made my statement of the cases from what I recollected, and I believe I have mentioned the course that was adopted with regard to the three other petitions; but we are now dealing with the question of what the proper course is in such cases, and I leave the matter entirely to the House.

HON. MR. MILLER—The intention of the rule is simply this: Every hon. member knows that petitions in connection with private Bills are referred, as a matter of course, without motion, to the Committee on Standing Orders. The intention of the rule is simply to regulate that petitions for divorce, instead of being sent, as they had been before, to the Committee on Standing Orders, should go, as a matter of course, after being received, to the Committee on Divorce.

HON. MR. VIDAL—As a layman, I find it rather difficult to follow the intricacies of these matters, but I think it is very desirable that the Senate should understand clearly the right course to pursue. It appears to me that the action on the petitions last year was irregular. From the statement made by the hon. member from Amherst it seems to be clear that the new rules which we adopted in 1888 require that a certain form which we had gone through before shall be relegated to the Divorce Committee, and it is only in harmony with that idea that a petition, on being presented should be referred to the Divorce Committee before taking any further action on it.

HON. MR. MILLER—How do you explain Rule "F"?

HON. MR. VIDAL—I cannot say; I have not got it here. If I had one of these petitions in charge I should not know how to proceed under the view taken by the hon. member from Richmond. The old rule was that certain information was to be given to the House before a petition was read. There was no intention whatever to lessen the difficulties which were placed in the way of persons obtaining divorce—there was no desire on the part of the Senate to relieve the petitioner from the necessity of furnishing the necessary information—it was merely for the convenience of the House that the mode of obtaining it was changed. If a petition for a divorce is to be received like any ordinary petition, two days after its presentation, we are dispensing with a safeguard. Before a petition can be read the House must be satisfied that the evidence of the service of the notice is sufficient.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I was not one of those who took part in the framing of those rules, and I am not therefore as competent as others to speak on the subject. I take them as we have them before us. I assume that the petition is subject to the general rule that one day at least shall intervene before it is presented to the House. Rule "D" requires that evidence shall be given of the six months' publication in the Canada Gazette, the service of notice and a variety of other forms gone through with that had previously been furnished at the bar of the House, and occupied considerable time. As I read the rule, it was intended that all this evidence should accompany the petition and should be attached to it. The rule says:

Now, in those petitions there certainly are not to be found the requirements of the clause. There is a declaration, but I do not see a copy of the Bill. I think the intention of the rule was that all these documents should be grouped together and attached to the petition before it could be accepted by the House. That is my reading of the rule. I was named on the committee, but I took no part in drawing the rules and take very little notice of those divorce matters. I merely give my own interpretation of the rule.

HON. MR. MILLER—I was guided by the practice of last year. I perhaps have not paid any more special attention to the subject than the hon. member from Ottawa; but Senator Gowan, who ought to understand these rules, and who took such a deep interest in this question, and was careful that no irregularity should creep into the administration of the rules under his presidency of that committee, was present when the petitions in the two cases which I have cited—I have not had time to look into the others—were presented and received, one day intervening, as in other cases.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I was a member of the committee to which this question was referred, and I remember well the discussion which took place in the committee upon those rules. They were drafted by Mr. Gowan, and referred to the committee. Some amendments were made after a full discussion, and the whole object of the rules was to dispense with this inquiry below the bar. The whole matter was relegated to the committee. I cannot understand why, in those two cases to which the hon. member for Richmond refers, the rule was departed from; but I understood that in all the other cases the petitions, after being presented, were referred naturally under these rules to the Committee on Divorce. I think they were read, but they were not received—they could not be received until all the evidence was in. I have stated what the intention of the framers of the rule was, and it seems to be right and proper that these petitions should be disposed of in that way.

HON. MR. POWER—I regret to say that I have not given any attention to this matter, but I am disposed, on the whole, to agree with the hon. member from Richmond. The mere presentation of a petition by a member hardly gives the House control of it, until the Senate becomes cognizant of its contents. It might be that a petition, when presented, contains something which renders it not proper that it should be received by the House, and I do not think it was contemplated that petitions of that character should be referred to the committee, though I do not speak positively on the subject. As hon. gentlemen who have given this matter some consideration differ diametrically as to the meaning of the rules, the better way is to follow the more prudent course, which is that suggested by the hon. member from Richmond. If we, to-day, read these petitions, and they go then to the Select Committee on Divorce, we are perfectly sure that everything has been done. If we do not read them, and they are held to have gone to the committee yesterday, then if the view of the hon. member from Richmond is correct, the proceedings will be irregular from the beginning, and for that reason the wiser course is the one suggested by the hon. member from Richmond. When other petitions come in afterwards, if it should be discovered on further enquiry that his view is not the correct one, we need not deal with them in the same way.

HON. MR. MILLER—There has been an attempt to make something out of my statement that two of these petitions, which I had time to examine into, were presented and read. I find now, in the Journals under my hand, that four of these petitions were read on the 20th—the petitions in the Middleton, the Lowry, the Rosamond and the Bagwell cases. I have not had time to look up the other.

HON. MR. MACDONALD—Were these petitions received?

HON. MR. MILLER—I have not had time to see if the whole of them were, but here are four of the cases cited by my hon. friend from Amherst, in which the petitions were presented on the 18th and read on the 20th, and I find further that the father of these rules, Mr. Gowan, was present on that occasion. Certainly, the reading of the petitions must have accorded with the interpretation of the rules which he himself had framed. If I am wrong, I err in very good company.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I think that the point raised by the hon. member from Amherst is a very important one, and one that should be settled. I have listened to the discussion, but my opinion is not yet formed. There is much to be said pro and con. My first impression was that my hon. friend from Amherst was right in his interpretation of the rules. Afterwards, on hearing the precedents cited by my hon. friend from Richmond, I came to the conclusion that the House followed another course. Under the circumstances, I think it would be prudent to let the matter stand for a few days. The debate might be adjourned until Tuesday next, by which time we can decide upon the proper course to be followed.

HON. MR. MILLER—The petitions could be read to-day.

HON. MR. POWER—There is this objection to letting the matter stand until Tuesday—the time for receiving petitions will expire on or before next Tuesday.

The petitions were read.

THE LATE SENATOR MACDONALD.

HON. MR. SMITH—It becomes my painful duty to announce to this House the death of one of our most esteemed members, Senator John Macdonald, of Toronto. I am sure that every one who hears me will share my regret at this sad event. Where he was best known the regret will be most deeply felt. He was a good citizen, a useful member of society and a man of great benevolence. I deeply lament his loss as a good friend and neighbor in Toronto, and I sympathize with his family in their bereavement.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I am sure that every member of this Chamber who had the pleasure of knowing the late Senator Macdonald will with great sorrow join in a tribute of respect to his memory. During the time that he was a member of this Chamber we all felt that he possessed a superior mind, that he had calm judgment and great equanimity—that he was a thoroughly benevolent and true Christian in all his characteristics. Though allied to one of the political parties of the country, the late Mr. Macdonald never felt himself tramelled by party political views. As a rule, in giving utterance to his opinions in this Chamber, we all felt that he was exercising an unbiased judgment. He was a man who acted from the very highest impulses of human nature. For some years past it had been Mr. Macdonald's custom, during the summer months, to visit other portions of the world, and he not only gave the public the benefit of his experience through the newspapers, but he also gave to this Chamber, time and again, most valuable opinions as to what was best in the interest of the Dominion to promote trade with the countries that he had visited. Some three years ago he went to the West Indies as a member of the Toronto Chamber of Commerce, and on the assembling of Parliament here afterwards he gave a most interestering speech on the subject of closer trade relations with those islands. The following year, when it was thought possible that Newfoundland would come into the Dominion, he visited that island and published a series of interesting letters in one of the Toronto newspapers, giving his impressions of the country through which he had travelled. Those letters were highly thought of in Newfoundland. The people there received him with open arms, and seemed to quite coincide with the views that he expressed. Last year his travels were in a different direction—over the western part of this continent and northward to Alaska and the disputed sea adjoining. Those who took an interest in Senator Macdonald's letters must have been struck with the kindly, generous, sympathetic Christian spirit which pervaded them. He seemed to be ever anxious to do good. Even in that remote country, Alaska, where his political or national sympathies were not aroused, he took a deep interest in rescuing the native children of the country from barbarism. He headed a subscription to place the native girls of that country in schools, where they would have the benefit of an education and be protected from the evil influences of the white man. Outside of his public life, Senator Macdonald was deeply beloved. He was a man of very benevolent character; his purse was ever open. God blessed him with great wealth, and he distributed it most generously and liberally. His great charities were most unostentatiously given. It is only now discovered, when he has gone, the very many persons who were receiving from his purse. Not this Chamber alone, but this country, has sustainad a great loss in the death of Senator Macdonald.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I would accuse myself of very great ingratitude if I allowed this opportunity to pass without paying my tribute to the memory of the late Senator Macdonald. It was not my good fortune to have a lengthened acquaintance with him. He was a gentleman that I am proud to number among my friends. During the past year it pleased God to visit me with sickness when I was twelve hundred miles away from home. No man was more constant at my bedside than Mr. Macdonald, and his lofty sentiments and the breadth of his mind impressed me very strongly with the nobility of his character. He has left few men behind him like himself. He was a man of deep sympathies, profound thought and earnest convictions, and able at all times to express his views, not only with his pen but with his tongue. In the city of Toronto, where he resided, his loss will be greatly felt. He had been reared as a Canadian, not in the lap of luxury, but supported by his own industry, and he will take his place among those who aided in building up the Dominion. Long after we have passed away, and another generation takes our place, he will be included among those who contributed by their energy, their ability and their moral strength to the greatness of the country. Among them no name will be honored with greater distinction than that of John Macdonald, of Toronto.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—In rising to address the House, I do so with a feeling of the deepest sorrow. I desire to add my humble tribute to the memory of our departed colleague. I was intimately acquainted with the late Senator Macdonald for many years, and learned to know his worth and high character. His appointment to this honorable House, without reference to political or party lines, was a tribute to that high character. His appointment was alike honorable to him and to those who made it, and furnishes a valuable precedent for the future. Hon. gentlemen have been witnesses of the able manner in which he performed his duties in the Senate. In business he was scrupulously honorable and fair in his dealings; by his ability and good management he succeeded in accumulating a handsome fortune, and he has been largely his own administrator during his lifetime in his bountiful bequests to many charities, and he never sent away deserving applicants to his charity empty handed. When I heard of his illness and at about the same time the announcement of his princely charity to the hospital at Toronto, I wrote to congratulate him on his munificence and to say that I hoped he would soon recover his health, and that I should have the pleasure of seeing him here, and I have his reply, which is so characteristic that I will read it. He says:—

"I trust the hospital to which you refer may be made a means of blessing to the great suffering class which need the alleviation which it is designed to afford.

"I have been very ill. I am thankful to say that all the present indications are those of improvement, yet it is very uncertain whether I will be at Ottawa during the present Session, and may not have the pleasure of meeting you and my friends, which I am always pleased to do."

But it has been otherwise ordered. His was home life with his family. He cultivated the home affections. We can all appreciate what a sad bereavement has fallen on those near and dear to him, but it may be some consolation to them to know that they have the sympathy of this House and of all who knew him. Death deprived us lately of others of our colleagues, and I may be permitted to allude especially to the late Senator Turner, whom to know was to like and respect. His death is a great loss to this House and to the community amongst whom he resided, and to me personally the loss is irreparable.

MR. SPEAKER—I am sure the House will permit me to trespass on their time for a few moments to add my humble tribute to what has been so well and ably said in reference to the excellence and worth of our late colleague, Mr. Macdonald. I have known him for so many long years that I could not allow this occasion to pass without expressing to this House my strong sense of the noble character of a man who lived not for himself alone or for his own pleasure and enjoyment, but who lived and labored throughout a long life for the welfare of others, and who by his Christian example and influence, as well as by his munificent generosity, has done so much for his country and left a memory behind him which will long be held in reverence and respect. I shall say nothing of his political career, because that is well known to every one here, but I am sure I shall have the assent of every one who hears me when I say that from the time that Mr. Macdonald took his seat among us until the last time he appeared in this House, in everything he said and in every vote that he gave he was actuated by the highest and most patriotic motives.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. McCALLUM moved the second reading of Bill (A), "An Act to amend the Railway Act." He said: It will not be necessary for me to explain this Bill, because it passed this House last year and was defeated in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons by a very small majority. As it passed through the Senate without opposition last year I take the liberty of moving the second reading without further explanation.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—Is it precisely the same as the Bill that passed through this House last year?

HON. MR. McCALLUM—Yes; precisely the same.

HON. MR. SCOTT—When this Bill was before the Senate, on a former occasion, I took exception to it on several grounds, the principal one being, however, that railway legislation has always emanated from the Government of this country.

The Railway Act is a creature of the Government. Any amendments made to it from time to time have been offered by the Government—any important amendments, at all events. Only two years ago it was revised by the Government, and some very considerable changes were made. This Bill which is now before the House proposes to give the municipalities of the country a jurisdiction not now conferred by the Railway Act. I do not now propose to go into the details of the measure, because I assume that the House will confirm what they did last year when they adopted it. I think the course taken last year was, after reading the Bill the second time, to refer it to a special committee. Whether that should be done now or not I do not pretend to say. In the committee, some very considerable changes were made. I have not had time to analyze this Bill, but I take exception to giving jurisdiction to municipalities in reference to railway crossings, for the reason that every culvert put in a railway bank is an additional element of danger to the travelling public, and the municipalities are very apt to avail themselves of the opportunity to force these ditches through the railway banks when there are other means and methods by which the surface water could be carried off. I quite recognise that no railway bank should be allowed to interrupt the natural flow of the water. It cannot be done under the existing laws, whether it is a creek or a drain which existed at the time of the construction of the railway. Of course, from time to time, new drains are made in the country. In Ontario, very considerable powers are given to municipalities for the purpose of draining, and in that way new rivulets are frequently formed and made to extend for miles and miles. Although I have had some experience in this direction, I have not known of any particular case where the necessity of this Act has arisen. I have known cases were application was made to railway companies for such openings through their embankments, and I have always found the company, where it did not interfere with the safety of the line, willing to provide culverts to assist in the carrying out of the drainage. Of course, the railway bank is benefited by drainage wherever it can be safely done, and the railway companies are, as a rule, most anxious to have their right of way drained, because we know in the spring of the year, when the freshets occur, very serious delay and loss may result if the water is allowed to rise above the railway bank. The railway companies are therefore more interested in having good drainage than even the municipalities. I think the railway ditches should not be used for draining the surrounding country. I do not think it is right and proper, because it forces on the railway companies' right of way a larger volume of water than their drains and culverts are constructed to carry off.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—This Bill is intended to take off the water, not to put it on the right of way.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The railway ditch might not be sufficient to take away the water, and at some seasons of the year the accumulation of water might lead to accidents involving loss of property and even sacrifice of life. Many railway accidents in this country and in the United States have been due to this cause. The purport of this Bill is practically to throw on the railways the necessity of carrying away the water that accumulates on the lands adjoining their lines.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—Not at all.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I do not think it proper that any railway company should obstruct the natural flow of water. Under the law of Ontario, at all events, they cannot do so. If a railway company should in any way obstruct the natural flow of water an injunction can be obtained and the company is liable for damages. It is the natural desire of the land owners whose properties adjoin the railway track, to drain their lands by means of the railway ditches. I do not think it is fair or right that they should do so, unless the municipalities contribute in some degree to make the railway drains deeper and the culverts larger.

When a railway is constructed the drainage is provided for the requirements of the right of way. It a company's line runs through low land they must make their ditches so much deeper and their culverts so much larger, but they should not be required from time to time, as increased danger arises, to deepen their ditches and enlarge their culverts in order that the adjoining lands may be relieved of the surface water.

HON. MR. FLINT—I took particular notice of this measure when it came up last year. I believe it is a Bill in the right direction, and I am as much in favor of railways and will do as much to facilitate their operations as any member of this House; but I am also desirous of protecting the farmers through whose lands the railways pass. There are instances within my own knowledge in which the railway embankments act as dams to hold back the surface water. The result is that the water sours the land and saps the foundation of the road. If the railways would build culverts in such places to carry off the water it would be an advantage to the farmers' lands and to the railway embankment. Therefore I think this legislation is necessary in the interest of the railway companies, as well as in the interest of the farmers whose lands adjoin railway tracks.

HON. MR. POWER—The first objection taken by the hon. member from Ottawa to the second reading of the Bill was that it was a measure which should emanate from the Government. I do not think that is an objection which will have much weight in this House.

HON. MR. MILLER—Coming from the leader of the Opposition!

HON. MR. POWER—The Government are simply a committee of Parliament, rendered necessary because Parliament is too big to sit throughout the year and to do all its business itself; but I do not think that any member of Parliament, who has proper respect for the body to which he belongs, should take the ground that it is not quite proper for a private member of Parliament to introduce any measure which does not tend to impose taxation upon the subject. That is the only limitation to the right of private members to introduce legislation. I regret that the hon. member from Monck, in moving the second reading of this Bill, did not give its history. I suppose he did not consider that it was necessary, not anticipating any opposition to the Bill. The act is that two years ago, when the Bill consolidating and amending the Railway Acts was before this House, the hon. member from Monck urged that the provisions contained in this Bill should be inserted in that measure. The leader of the House intimated that there was not time and opportunity just then to frame the amendment necessary to carry out the views of the hon. member from Monck, but he promised that at the next Session he would assist in perfecting a measure which would do what the hon. member from Monck wishes to accomplish, without unduly interfering with the rights of the railway companies. Last session the hon. member from Monck introduced his measure. It was read the second time, and referred to the Railway Committee, of which the hon. leader of the House was a member. The Railway Committee referred the Bill to a sub-committee, of which the leader of the House was, I think, the chairman. I had the honor of being a member of it, also, and I can testify to the very great pains which the members of that sub-committee, and particularly the leader of the House, took in framing this measure. It cannot be said that the interests of the railway companies were not properly represented; the leader of the House is largely interested in railways, as is the leader of the Opposition, who was also a member of the Railway Committee and of the sub-committee, and was present. This measure was carefully considered by the sub-committee and adopted by the Committee on Railways, reported to the Senate and passed by a very large majority; and, as the hon. gentleman from Monck has informed us, died in the latter part of the Session in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons. Under these circumstances, I do not think that there should be any objection at any rate to the second reading of the Bill. If, after all the labor that was bestowed upon it last Session the Bill is not quite perfect, there will be an opportunity in the committee for removing its defects. If, as I think will be the case, it should be found difficult to improve on the measure, we shall send it to the House of Commons, who are supposed more directly to represent the people, and if they choose to amend or reject it they have a perfect right to do so, and we shall have done our duty. As to the merits of the Bill, it is not perhaps necessary to say much. I understand that in the part of Ontario from which the hon. gentleman from Monck comes the need of this legislation is felt more than in other parts of the Dominion, but I can myself testify to the fact that such a measure is desirable in other parts of the Dominion also. Where a railway embankment is carried along the side of a slope it acts as a dam to all the water flowing down that slope, and it is only reasonable that the railway company, who, by the construction of this immense dam, keep back the water on the adjoining farms, should afford, at reasonable intervals, the means of getting that water off and relieving the land. The Bill takes care, as might be expected (being largely the work of the leader of this House), to protect the interests of the railway companies. In the first place, this Bill does not authorize the municipalities to do the work; it makes provision for the work being done by the railway companies themselves, and if a municipality should demand the construction of a culvert where it is not necessary the railway company will have the right to appeal to the Minister of Railways or the Railway Committee of the Privy Council; and if, on an inspection of the locality, the Minister of Railways is of the opinion, or the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is of the opinion, that a culvert is not necessary, it is not to be constructed. The Bill is a perfectly just and harmless measure.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I am surprised that there should be any opposition to this measure. The leader of the Opposition would drive people to the courts to get an injunction whenever a railway track obstructs the natural flow of water. We know how costly such litigation is and the delay that it entails. It is quite true that under the common law the natural flow of water cannot be stopped by any railway company, but this Bill contains equitable provisions in the interests of the whole public—in the interest of the railway companies as well as of private individuals, and it is applicable not only to Ontario, but also to every Province of the Dominion. I know in the Province of Nova Scotia there are large tracts of land which, if the principle involved in this measure was not recognized, would be of little value to their owners.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Is the Bill which is now before the House in the same form as the Bill which came from the Railway Committee last year?

HON. MR. McCALLUM—Exactly the same Bill, word for word.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I am very glad to hear that, because I hope it will relieve the House of the necessity of sending it back to the Railway Committee. We have no diposition to shirk work; but, at the same time, I see no necessity for taking up this Bill again if it is in the same shape as when it was reported from the committee last year.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I think it is safer to send the Bill to the committee this year. Some of those who approved of it last year may have changed their minds in the meantime; and, besides, it is the regular course.

HON. MR. MILLER—The only course is to send it to the Railway Committee. As the hon. member suggests, some members of the committee may have changed their minds since last year, and if it is not sent to the Railway Committee it will have to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and that certainly would be less convenient than to refer it to the Railway Committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 4:35 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, February 7th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE GLOVER DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Select Committee on Divorce, presented their report on the petition of Christiana F. Glover, praying for a divorce.

HON. MR. SANFORD moved that the report be adopted.

HON. MR. MILLER—I should like to know whether the leader of the House considers it proper that a report on a petition for divorce should be adopted without the ordinary formality of allowing it to stand over for a day in order that members may have an opportunity of examining it. The House should know what it is doing.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—The report has been read at the Table, and it merely states that all the formalities required under our rules have been complied with. This is merely a preliminary report, and I am under the impression that it has been usual, in this House, to adopt such reports when they are presented, unless an objection is raised by some member. If the hon. member objects to the adoption of this report now, it must stand until Monday.

HON. MR. MILLER—I do not object to the motion. I wished to elicit the view of the leader of the House on the question.

HON. MR. VIDAL—This is merely a preliminary report, stating that certain requirements of the House have been complied with. It does not deal at all with the merits of the case. It is simply doing what has hitherto been done, in former Sessions, at the bar of the House. I see no reason, under the circumstances, for delaying the adoption of the report.

HON. MR. MILLER—The report relates to very important matters in connection with the case before us. While I do not question the correctness of the report in any particular, still I think it was only proper that the attention of the House should be called to it, in order that we may know what we are really asked to concur in. The report having been read, I have no objection to its adoption, and I do not care if the same course be followed in all such cases; but let us understand clearly what we are doing.

The motion was agreed to.

THE WALKER DIVORCE CASE.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Select Committee on Divorce, presented their report on the petition of Emily Walker for a divorce.

HON. MR. SANFORD moved the adoption of the report.

HON. MR. MILLER—This is clearly a different case from the others. This report recommends that the petitioner be allowed to withdraw her petition and substitute a new petition. So important a step should not be taken without some explanation in justification of the course. I presume the leader of the House will not allow such a report to be adopted without due notice. I shall object to the adoption of the report to-day, because I desire to know why such a recommendation is made to the House.

HON. MR. SANFORD moved that the report be taken into consideration on Monday next.

HON. MR. ALMON—How will we know more about this report on Monday next than we know now?

HON. MR. MILLER—I presume that the gentleman who makes the motion, or the chairman of the committee, will be prepared to explain to the House why such a course was taken.

HON. MR. DICKEY—An appeal has been made to me to ascertain why this recommendation was made. The petition is irregular. One of the requirements of our rules is wholly absent—that is to say, there was no negativing of any collusion or any connivance; that was the only ground on which we objected to the petition at the moment. That, I apprehend, is the information that my hon. friend requires. All the notices had been given, and if within thirty days the petitioner should bring in a proper petition it would go to the committee, and the House would decide whether the case should proceed any further or not.

The motion was agreed to.

SAFETY OF FISHERMEN BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (E), "An Act for better securing the safety of certain Fishermen."

He said—I do not think it necessary to go into any lengthened explanation of this Bill. The title, I think, will commend it to the House. It is not an unnecessary measure, because every season we read accounts of fishermen who have either lost their lives, or suffered great distress from the absence of the provisions of this Bill. There are certain modifications desired in the measure, which can be made when it comes before the Committee of the whole House. The hon. gentleman from Alberton has called my attention to the fact that they have no fog in the neighborhood of Prince Edward Island, and consequently, as the provisions of this Bill would not be required in the neighborhood of that favored land, it would be unreasonable to require the owners of vessels to go to the small expense which would be necessary to comply with them. The measure was discussed last year, when it passed through this House without a division. The sentiment of the Senate was almost unanimous in its favor. It failed to pass the Commons, because it reached that Chamber too late in the Session to get through. I beg leave, therefore, to move the second reading of the Bill, with the understanding that any objection to it may be dealt with on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I have no objection to the Bill passing, with the understanding that in Committee of the Whole it may be remedied in the direction that my hon. friend has just stated.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 4 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, February 10th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MANAGEMENT OF THE WELLAND CANAL.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. McCALLUM rose to inquire—

What action the Government intends to take on the evidence taken before A. F. Wood, Esquire, commissioner, as to the conduct of the officials on the Welland Canal, in the management of that important public work?

He said: Some of you may remember that I made some remarks in this Chamber last Session about the management of the Welland Canal, and urged the Government to have an investigation into the conduct of Mr. Ellis, the Superintendent, and others in connection with the maintenance and repairs of that important public work; and for having dared to express my views and stated what appeared to me to be facts, I was threatened through the press by the Superintendent with an action for libel, laying the damages at ten thousand dollars. However, the action did not come off. The Government appointed a commissioner to examine and report as to the statements made by me from my place in this Chamber. I attended that investigation, and examined witnesses in behalf of the public and took notes of the evidence taken. I did not argue the question as to the evidence taken before the commissioner for this reason: there was a disagreement between the commissioner and myself as to keeping a record of the arguments, and having them sent along with the evidence to the Government and afterwards to the public. So I left the commission. After I left Mr. Rykert, M. P., argued the case in behalf of the canal officials, and the commissioner sent me a copy of what he, the commissioner, calls the balance of the evidence or testimony and Mr. Rykert's arguments in defence. My reason for alluding to the matter is that what is said to be the balance of the testimony puts me in a false light. I do not like to say it was wilfully done, although it looks like it.

But I consider it my duty to show that what is recorded as having taken place before I left is not correct. I cannot say as to what took place after I left; but what took place before I left is recorded and published by the newspapers that had reporters present.

I was willing to wait patiently to see what course the Government would take on the commissioner's report, but the publication of this pamphlet by Mr. Rykert, who was counsel for the officials, and of the officials themselves, has forced my hand, so to speak. This pamphlet has been scattered broadcast over the country, and a threat was made that I was to be sued for libel. For anything that I should say in this Chamber I could plead parliamentary privilege, but I would not have done so had they brought their action, because whatever I stated I had good reason to believe was founded upon facts, and was prepared to prove in a court of law. I will now read the account of what occurred on the last day of the commission, as published by the newspapers. The reporters representing those papers were present from day to day while the investigation was going on, and one, at least, was not very friendly to me. The Journal report is as follows:—

"THE CANAL INVESTIGATION.

"SENATOR MCCALLUM PICKS UP HIS PAPERS AND LEAVES IN A HUFF.

"Commissioner Wood arrived here this morning, and shortly after 11 a.m. said he was prepared to hear the argument of Senator McCallum and Mr. Rykert. Mr. McCallum found fault with the arrangements where an official reporter was not present to record the statements, and picked up his books and left the room, apparently much annoyed, stating he would have the matter settled by another tribunal. Subsequently the commissioner ascertained that Mr. Ellis had secured a short-hand writer to report Mr. Rykert's speech, and made an arrangement whereby Mr. McCallum's speech would also be reported. This the commissioner was not bound to do; for, as he stated, argument was not statement of facts to be regarded as evidence, and when reported is generally at the expense of litigants."

Well, I was not a litigant: I had no more interest in the result of that investigation than any other person in the 5,000,000 of people who inhabit this country. I was there on behalf of the people—I was not a litigant, though I was treated as one from the beginning to the end of the investigation. Now we will see what the other paper, the Star, says:—

"THE WELLAND CANAL CASE.

"SENATOR MCCALLUM DECLINES TO PUT IN HIS ARGUMENT—MR. RYKERT'S CONTENTION.

"ST. CATHARINES, 13th November.

"The Ellis Commission met this morning to hear the arguments of Senator McCallum and Mr. Charles Rykert on the evidence given in support of the charges and the evidence in defence of Mr. Ellis. At the opening of the commission the Senator enquired if the argument was to be reported and printed in the same manner as the evidence had been, to which the commissioner replied that he had decided not to put the Government to the expense of furnishing a printed report of the argument, as it was simply a matter for his own personal benefit, and should not form part of his report. Mr. McCallum then stated that he wanted his argument reported and made public, bade the commissioner good day and left. The commission adjourned for two hours, and the Commissioner sent a letter to Mr. McCallum, stating that he would have the argument reported and a copy furnished him as he desired; but the Senator decided not to put in an appearance. Owing to the fact that Senator McCallum attached so much importance to the reporting of the argument, the commissioner employed a stenographer, who had been engaged by Mr. Ellis to report the argument, after receiving the communication from the commissioner that he did not intend to have the argument reported, but left it for the press. The commissioner expressed regret that the Senator did not avail himself of the opportunity he expressed such a desire to have. Mr. Rykert's argument, which lasted three hours, was logical and convincing. He reviewed the evidence at length, going through all the charges, all of which, he contended, were disproved; and, in conclusion, he submitted to the commissioner that his report to the Government must be that Mr. Ellis' management of the Welland Canal had been honest, efficient and impartial. The commissioner will to-morrow, weather permitting, take a trip over the canal."

I also remember what was said and what is recorded and put in as balance of testimony must have been got up afterwards from memory to answer a certain purpose, and which has the effect of placing me and my actions in a false position before any one reading what the commissioner is pleased to call the balance of the testimony taken before the commissioner. I think it best at this point to refer to what took place that morning which caused me to leave the commissioner without pointing out what the evidence proved in the investigation. In order to do so it will be necessary to read some correspondence, and you can be the judge of the commissioner's action. In the first place, as to this matter, my understanding with the commissioner was, when I left him on a Friday afternoon, that on the following Tuesday or Wednesday he would hear the arguments at St. Catharines, and Mr. Holland would take them in short-hand and put them in typewriting, and that they would be sent as part of the record, with the evidence, to the Government. But on the morning of the 13th November, the day that the commissioner appointed to hear the arguments, I received a letter from the commissioner dated at Madoc, 11th November, stating that for reasons that he would explain when he would see me that he decided to send away Mr. Holland, the reporter. In the first place, I may say, some time before that I asked the commissioner to recall a certain witness that I thought would give important evidence, that is Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer of Canals. I had Mr. Page's letter to me to say that he was not sent for, and it annoyed me to think that the commissioner had not sent for such an important witness. Here is Mr. Page's letter to me :—

"CHIEF ENGINEER OF CANALS,
"OTTAWA, 5th November, 1889.

"The Hon. L. McCallum, Stromness, Ont.:

"DEAR MR. MCCALLUM,—On my return here this morning I received yours of the 4th instant, in which you mention having learned from the commissioner that I would be at St. Catharines next week to give evidence in the 'Ellis investigation.'

"I have not heard otherwise anything on the subject; no one has asked me. The commissioner has not written or said anything about requiring me, and it is not likely that I will be up at the time mentioned as a matter of choice.

"I suppose the inquiry is drawing pretty near to a close, and it is quite likely you will be glad, as it must have been a heavy tax on your time and patience.

"Yours very truly,
"JOHN PAGE."

I will now read a letter which I received from the commissioner:—

"MADOC, 11th November, 1889.

"Hon. L. McCallum, Senator:

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have not heard from Mr. Page yet. It may be he is away from Ottawa.

"I have decided, for reasons that I will explain when I see you, not to have the argument reported. Of course, I will hear it and take notes for my own assistance. I would suggest that you have a list of points made out that are embraced in your argument, to hand me when you are through.

"We will commence at 11 a.m. Wednesday to hear argument.

"I am, yours truly,
"A. F. WOOD."

Here is the letter which the commissioner wrote to me after I left the room on the last day of the investigation :—

"CUSTOM HOUSE,
"ST. CATHARINES, 13th Nov., 1889.

"Hon. L. McCallum, Senator:

"DEAR SIR,—I have adjourned the proceedings until two o'clock p.m. Taking into consideration your strong feeling as to what you consider important to you, I have decided to employ Mr. Johnson, who is here to take down the evidence and report the same in type-writing for you and Mr. Ellis' benefit.

"I shall be glad to have you present at the hour named, and I shall be glad to hear your argument.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"A. F. WOOD,
"Commissioner."

The following is my reply :—

"WELLAND HOUSE,
"ST. CATHARINES, 13th Nov., 1889.

"A. F. Wood, Esq., Commissioner, etc.:

"DEAR SIR,—Yours is at hand; contents noted. In reply would say that after the strong felling that you exhibited this morning toward me, and I consider without cause, I spoke to you in the kindliest manner and in order to avoid such feeling.

"It will be best for me not to appear before you any longer. The evidence is in; we can all see it.

"I am, yours truly,
"L. McCALLUM."

I will now read the next letter that I received from the commissioner:—

"ST. CATHARINES, 14th Nov., 1889.

"Hon. L. McCallum:

"MY DEAR SIR,—I regret you did not give me the benefit of your argument yesterday.

"The following were my reasons for deciding to have the arguments reported—

"1st—I understood the arguments would be for my benefit.

"2nd—You stated different times to me that your argument would be 'very short.'

"3rd—On Friday last, after evidence closed, Mr. Holland gave a memo. of his account up to that time as about $1,700, and said it would be about $100 more to complete it if Mr. Rykert took all the time he claimed to state his case.

"4th—Intimations had reached me from Ottawa that the investigation was being very much prolonged.

"5th—I had used my best efforts to shorten it, but had no succeeded very much.

"6th—On reflection, at Toronto, I decided to take the points myself—as I suppose it was intended for me—and not add to the reporter's bill, and at once wrote Mr. Holland, and on reaching home wrote to you and Mr. Rykert.

"I was more than surprised at the position you took that your 'argument was wanted for the public.'

"To meet this, though differing entirely from your view as to what an argument is wanted for, I decided to employ stenographer Johnson—who was there at the request of Mr. Ellis for his benefit—and at once secured his services and wrote you, and adjourned until 2 p.m.

"At 2 p.m. proceedings were commenced by having recorded a letter from Mr. Bradley, stating there were 'no contracts for the pontoons, but they were built by agreement;' also a letter from Mr. Page, reiterating his statement that Mr. Ellis had been instructed to look after the Port Colborne gates—and enclosing a copy of such instructions. The date of Smith receipt was corrected from 2nd to 26th. You not being present, Mr. Rykert proceeded with his argument.

"If you will send me a copy of your argument and the points to which you wish to direct attention I will have them incorporated with the proceedings, and give due consideration to your points. In order to do this it must reach me by Tuesday night next— as the type-writer will not close until after that time.

"Conscious of having endeavored to discharge my duty without favor to any,

"I remain, yours truly,
"A. F. WOOD,
"Commissioner."

I replied as follows :—

STROMNESS, 18th November, 1889.

"A. F. Wood, Esq., M.P.P., Commissioner:

"DEAR SIR,—Yours of the 14th I find here to-day on my arrival home after an absence of three days.

"In reply, would say that I regret that you would not allow what I wished to point out to you that I considered had been proven in the canal investigation to go in the record with the evidence.

"You offered by your letter of the 13th to take the arguments and put them in type-writing, as you said, for my benefit and Mr. Ellis', but you did not offer to report it along with the evidence. I, Sir, had no benefit to receive from any course that you might pursue only with the rest of the public.

"The reasons given by you for your actions in the matter in your letter of the 14th I do not consider of any value, particularly the matter of costs.

"You say that you understood that the arguments were to be for your benefit. What right have you to think that what I had given months time to prove in behalf of the public was only to be addressed to you, and for you to treat it as wind afterwards if you thought proper to do so.

"I wanted it for the public, and you refused to have it go with the evidence.

"2nd. You say that I stated to you that my argument would be very short. That is not a good reason, if it was a question of expense, as you say, for it would cost less to put in with the evidence.

"It would have taken me probably two hours or more to point out to you what the evidence shows to have been proven, and I consider that would be a very short time to give to the matter.

"I did not go there to give wind. At the time that I told you that it would not take me long to point out to you what was proven by the evidence I also told you that I would consider it my duty to comment on your ruling.

"Whether that had anything to do with your sudden change to not have the argument reported and put with the evidence or not you know best.

"The first intimation of the change to not have the arguments go with the record was from your letter dated at Madoc, 11th November, which I received at St. Catharines on the morning of the 13th, in which you stated that for reasons that you would explain to me when you would see me? Did you tell me? Yes; you told me after we had had some words about the argument. Then you gave as a reason that it would cost one hundred dollars; you further said that such expenses should be paid by the litigants and not by the Government. You must have forgotten that I was there in behalf of the public, who were paying the expense.

"Then I left you when you showed so much feeling, if not bad temper, as I did not consider I was a litigant, and would do the same again under similar circumstances.

"You also stated in your letter of the 11th from Madoc that you had not heard from Mr. Page. I requested you to send for Mr. Page two or three times, and you told me that you had done so. I have Mr. Page's letter, dated 5th November, stating that you did not send for him and that he was not coming as a matter of choice.

"Your letter to me of the 11th wants an explanation, at least with reference to Mr. Page not being recalled. He did not make his appearance, and he gves the reason why.

"I say to you in all candor that I know that the evidence proves, and further, when you ruled against evidence such as Booth's, Smith's, Bradley's, and when you gave Mr. Abbey a lecture about his evidence, which I spoke to you about privately at the time, that it would have the effect of keeping witnesses from coming to testify.

"I can remember the evidence given without giving it much further consideration; it, and the difficulties I have had to contend with to get it are impressed on my memory strongly.

"I will not now, at the eleventh hour, send you any memorandum that I have taken of evidence, as I would wish to comment on and explain them. You refused to take them once, except on your own conditions; therefore, you could not have considered them of much value, and I refuse to give them to you, except on the conditions then proposed, that my argument and what I would point out to you should go with the evidence to the public.

"You say, enclosing your letter of the 14th, that you are conscious of having endeavored to discharge your duty without favor to any.

"That, Sir, the public will be better able to judge after we see your report, and after that your sayings, rulings, and doings on the Welland Canal investigation will become common property, and until that time arrives I have no desire to discuss the question farther, unless public interest demands me to do so.

"I am, respecfully yours,

"L. McCALLUM."

Then follows this letter from the commissioner.—

"MADOC, 29th Nov., 1889.

"Hon. L. McCallum, Senator:

"DEAR SIR,—When in St. Catharines this week I found a registered letter for me, from you, bearing date 18th November. I received it on the 27th; I suppose it being registered was the reason why it was not forwarded. There are two matters in your letter that appear to need a reply—one a seeming misapprehension of what I meant when I proposed to have your argument 'put in type-writing,' which was that it would not be forwarded with the evidence. I intended it should be forwarded with the evidence and report, and now state, in order to meet your wishes, that if you will furnish me with your argument in manuscript containing whatever you may consider desirable as to my ruling, etc., I will have it put in type-writing and forwarded as a part of the investigation proceedings, to the Department at Ottawa, along with the evidence and my report, and in order to give you plenty of time to furnish it, I will carry out the above proposal if your manuscript is received by me any time before the 15th December next. I trust this will be satisfactory.

"The other matter is your reference to Mr. Page's attendance. I had written him, but receiving no answer as to his coming, and thinking my request was not definite, I wrote him a direct letter on the 7th November, with reference to your requiring him again before the investigation closed, and named Tuesday or Wednesday, the 12th and 13th November, as desirable days on which to take his evidence, and asked for a reply by telegram. I did not receive a reply before the afternoon of the 11th November. Herewith is a copy of my telegram then received, an extract from letter referred to received by me on the 13th at St. Catharines. They speak for themselves.

"It is the source of much satisfaction to me to know that in this investigation the evidence, ruling and argument on the ruling from time to time was taken verbatim by a stenographer.

"I have the honor to be,

"Your obedient servant,

"A. F. WOOD."

I will now read a copy of a letter from Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer of Canals:—

"OTTAWA, 11th November, 1889.

"DEAR SIR,—Your letter of the 7th inst. was received on Saturday last, requesting me to appear before the Canal Commission again to answer certain questions appertaining to canal management. In reference to this matter it may be stated that when before the commission on Wednesday, the 16th of October, I stated it would be well that all the questions intended to be put to me should be asked there, as it would be very difficult for me to put in another appearance, as my duties are of a nature that they cannot be delayed without great loss and inconvenience to the public.

"JOHN PAGE."

Then, follows this telegram, which the commissioner must have had that morning, though he did not say anything to me about it.

"FROM OTTAWA, ONT., 11th Nov., 1889.

"To A. F. Wood, M.P.P.:

"Received your letter requesting my attendance at St. Catharines. I cannot leave here at present without great injury to the public service. Have written you to St. Catharines. Letter may be read in court if thought proper.

"(Signed), JOHN PAGE."

I will now read a brief note that I sent to the commissioner:

"STROMNESS, 5th December, 1889.

"A. F. Wood, Esq., M.P.P., Commissioner, &c., &c.:

"DEAR SIR,—Yours of the 24th ultimo is at hand to-day; contents noted.

"In reply, would say that I have nothing further to add to my letter to you of the 18th ultimo.

"I am, Sir, yours truly,

"L. McCALLUM."

I had nothing further to add to what I had already written the commissioner, as I made it a rule in life that if a man deceives me once I wish to have nothing further to do with him, and I came to the conclusion from the action of the commissioner on the morning of the 13th November, when he wanted to suppress from going to the public what I considered was proven at the canal investigation, he was not treating me properly, and that will explain my short replies to him:

"RE WELLAND CANAL INVESTIGATION.

"MADOC, 24th December, 1889.

"Hon. L. McCallum, Senator:

"MY DEAR SIR,—Herewith, per registered letter, I send you the balance of the testimony taken with Mr. Rykert's argument. I waited until the last available moment, hoping you would have forwarded your argument also. Of course, I have not been awaiting for argument to form an opinion, but it would have assisted me to reach conclusions with less labor. It has been no light task to go through the evidence again. You will find my report at Ottawa in the Department of Railways and Canals, when you desire to see it.

"I have the honor to be,

"Your obedient servant,

"A. F. WOOD."

I hope that the commissioner has arrived at a correct conclusion. I do not know what it is, but I know what it should be, and I think, hon. gentlemen, that you will agree with me what it should be, after I have explained the evidence taken and the commissioner's ruling as to taking evidence.

The following is the last letter that I will read:—

"STROMNESS, 28th December, 1889.

"A. F. Wood, Esq., M.P.P.:

"DEAR SIR,—Yours of the 24th instant is at hand, and also the requested document, which you say is the balance of the testimony taken with Mr. Rykert's argument.

"Thanks for the information as to where I will find your report. Will see it soon, after I get to Ottawa, if permitted to do so before given by the public.

"I am, yours truly,

As to what the commissioner calls "the balance of testimony," it is not a correct report of what took place on the morning of the 13th November, although I under-r stand it is circulated around among members of Parliament by Mr. Ellis and his friends, with a view no doubt to create a favorable impression on his behalf. It is the usual line of creating popularity by deception. My reason for going into an explanation about this matter is to show you, hon. gentlemen, that I am not to blame if I trespass on your time in connection with that canal investigation. The commissioner divided my charges against canal management into sixteen charges. I did not object strongly at the time, as I did not care how he placed what I stated from my seat in the Senate last Session on canal management. But in coming to a conclusion I wish them considered as a whole, because any one of the alleged charges, if proved, should be enough to cause the dismissal of those found guilty. I will endeavor to point out to you as briefly as I can what I consider has been proved by the evidence, and where to find the evidence taken, the witness' name and page as put in type-writing. I have explained to you, and the correspondence between the commissioner and myself shows why I did not argue the question before the commissioner. I did not think I was treated fairly and I left. I refused afterwards to send the commissioner my arguments in writing, and I think that I acted properly in doing so from the sample of what the commissioner calls the balance of testimony. For some reasons that I do not know, the commissioner wanted to rush matters that morning. He was not to pay any money for anyone's arguments; that should be paid by litigants. After I left, you can see by Mr. Rykert's speech and the commissioner's remarks that they had a very pleasant time. Anyone reading it can see that there was a kind of mutual admiration expressed between the defendant's counsel, Mr. Rykert, M.P., and the commissioner. You can see further that for the want of argument Mr. Rykert was paying a great deal of attention to the humble individual that is now addressing you—that is to say, no doubt on the usual line, if he could not say anything good of his clients he would make up the time in abusing those opposed to him. Evidently, he, Mr. Rykert, Q. C., M.P., was displeased in the way that I conducted the case in behalf of the public. He, Mr. Rykert, as you will see, tells the commissioner what I should have done and what I should not have done. But I was not there to please Mr. Rykert, Q. C., M.P. I did know from the first that I would have his opposition—that he, Mr. Rykert, was satisfied as to how matters were conducted on the canal. In fact, I have a letter in my hand and a copy of same in the Government's hands, stating that money was paid to a party by the Government for work that was not performed and that it was brought to Mr. Rykert's notice. But Mr. Rykert's reply was that he was no informer; so from that I took it that Mr. Rykert was satisfied with the canal management. But at the same time I was not then and I am not now prepared to accept his dictation as to what I should do or should not do in the canal investigation in behalf of the public. The commissioner, as you will see, at page 1866, when Mr. Ellis is giving evidence on this question, tells Mr. Ellis that the truth is the best. But he, the commissioner, prevented me from getting the truth by his ruling against me. He was looking for the truth as to the making of arrangements with the employés on the canal to pay Mr. Ellis' debts. Did he want to find it? You, hon. gentlemen, can be the judges of that. I would call your attention to his lecture to Alex. Abbey, his rulings on John Bradley's and R. A. Booth's evidence and his lecture to J. B. Smith, in which the commissioner says that (page 861) if he, Smith, could make such an arrangement with Mr. Abbey to get money that he might operate in a like manner with forty others. But by his ruling he prevented me from showing the others that were operated on in the same way as Mr. Abbey. So much for the commissioner's action in bringing to light the doings on the Welland Canal. No doubt you have heard of tramps looking for work and praying to God that they would not find it. Was the commissioner in this position—looking for money to pay Ellis' debts from the canal employés, and putting the glass to the blind eye, so to speak, like the celebrated Admiral Nelson. When you read the evidence you will be the best judges as to what was done in the way of borrowing money to pay Ellis' debts.

I do not want to say anything against the commissioner. He treated me as a gentleman all the way through, except the last morning. He ruled against me, as I thought, unfairly; but for that ruling he is accountable to the public.

You may remember that I made several charges against Mr. Ellis last Session from my place in this House. The commissioner divided my charges into sixteen, and I will try to deal with them as he has divided them. When I get through with these I will come to what I call maladministration on the canal. The following is the memorandum of charges as divided by the commissioner:—

"1st. Large expenditures for fuel, contrasting 1869-70, 1876-77, 1884-85, 1885-86, 1886-87. (See page 3 of Hansard, with speech.)

"2nd. Spending a large amount of money without authority from the Department—notably, building dock at Port Colborne: cost $4,000.

"3rd. That the location of 'dock' made it of no value. (See first column, page 3, Hansard, near bottom.)

"4th. Built Custom house and post office at Port Colborne, though the Department of Public Works had charge of construction, at a cost of $4,400. (See page 3, 2nd column, Hansard, near top.)

"5th. Allows employés to work for outside parties, and they are paid by the Government. (See page 3, 2nd column, Hansard.)

"6th. Allowed parties to be paid for work not performed. (See page 3, 2nd column, Hansard.)

"7th. Allowed the use of Government property without authority and free of charge. (See page 3, 2nd column, Hansard, bottom page.)

"8th. Moneys received and not returned at proper time, and some moneys retained and not credited. (See page 4, 1st column, Hansard, top page.)

"9th. Charge against J. E. Demare, Assistant Superintendent, causing trouble; questionable management of moneys. (See page 10, 2nd column, Hansard, bottom page.)

"10th. That improper influences are brought to bear upon men who suffer by giving information. (See page 11, 1st column, Hansard.)

"11th. In reply to Order of the House, did not give correct replies; says he could not. (See page 11, 1st column, Hansard.)

"12th. That he is arbitrary in his treatment of the owners of vessels passing this canal—detaining them without good reason. That he fined a tug owner $20 for the reason that he questioned his (Ellis') management. (See page 11, 2nd column, Hansard.)

"13th. Ellis and Demare are charged with having 'friends and pets,' and Demare with being a 'pet of Ellis'.' That in order to get work fitness is not required, but it is essential he should 'belong to the

"14th. The Superintendent increased his favorite's salary (Demare's) without authority by $300 per year, when he was getting enough already, giving as his excuse that Demare had been promised an increase by the Chief Engineer, which the Chief Engineer, he says, denies. (See pages 11 and 12, Hansard, bottom of 11th, top of 12th.)

"15th. That he allowed water to flow into the canal from Lake Erie in January last, though he had plenty of men to prevent it, causing an estimated damage of $25,000, as stated by the Chief Engineer. (See page 12, 1st column, Hansard, bottom.)

"16th. That Mossip could not get work, while less deserving were receiving employment every day. (See page 12, 1st column, Hansard, middle.)"

Of these charges, the 10th is the only one that I have not proven. I have not touched it, and you can readily understand why. You can appreciate the feelings that guided me in this matter. I did not want that any one should suffer for giving me information; I did not desire that any man's family should want for bread. During that investigation men came to me and begged of me not to call them, because if I did so they would be discharged—not only men employed on the canal, but men working for people who were receiving favors from Mr. Ellis. Therefore, I did not touch that charge, and if I had to go through the same thing again I should act in precisely the same way. I did not want to injure any one, and besides, I consider there was sufficient proof elicited during the investigation to render a dismissal of Mr. Ellis and his deputy necessary in the public interest. You cannot imagine the difficulty I had in getting evidence. Just think of it! Here was John Charles Rykert, member for the County of Lincoln, a leading lawyer and Queen's Counsel, and he had appointed pretty nearly all the men in that section of the Welland Canal. I had him, with all his ability and influence, against me. There were Mr. Ellis and his deputy, who had control of most of the men who came to give evidence, and they had to be dragged like cats by the tail to get them before the commissioner. On the other side there was only the poor individual who is now addressing you. When I first went to St. Catharines you would think I was a leper. Nobody would speak to me; there were spies employed to report the names of those who would call on me, and boasts were made that I would be driven out of St. Catharines in twenty-four hours; but I did not run. On the 14th charge I may as well say a few words here. This question of increasing Mr. Demare's salary is an important one. The reason given for doing so was that he would not remain in the employ of the Government unless his salary was increased. If you look at Mr. Rykert's pamphlet you will see that he asserts that Mr. Page swore that the increase of salary to Mr. Demare was settled by an Order in Council, but that pamphlet contains anything but the truth. I do not wish to blame the Government; I did not do so; but so far as I can learn this additional $300 has been given to Mr. Demare without any authority—no Order in Council has ever been passed sanctioning the increase. Mr. Demare had been getting $900 a year, a house, rent free, and an allowance of $100 a year for a horse, although his work did not extend over five or six miles. I said then that it looked to me as though he was getting pickings, and before I get through I will endeavor to show what the pickings were. Although he goes into the witness box and swears that he did not get any, three of his friends swore that he did, and I think their evidence will be believed against his, when he is a witness in his own interest.

Another charge that is proven beyond doubt, on the evidence of Mr. Page, is that Mr. Ellis allowed the waters of Lake Erie to flood the canal when he had plenty of men to prevent it, and through his negligence caused a loss of $25,000 to the country last winter. You may say that was only a blunder, or the result of forgetfulness. I would be just as willing as any one to forgive a man for such an accident, if he was all right otherwise; but when his mismanagement is apparent everywhere along the canal, and when everything is turned to his own interest, he cannot be excused for allowing such a disaster to take place. I have taken a great interest in the Welland Canal. I was one of the first men of the country to urge on the Government the enlargement of the canal and I wanted to see it well managed. Instead of being well managed it has been managed extravagantly. I could show the Government where they could save tens of thousands of dollars. I have no doubt that the Government will yet dismiss these men who are guilty of mismanagement from the public service, but they are slow about it, and an attempt is being made to let them down easy. I intend to take up these charges one after another and deal with them, but I may here say a few words about this man Mossop who has been accused of giving me the information that has led to this investigation. You can readily understand how bitter these people are against Mr. Mossop. They have tried to destroy his character. If you believe the evidence of these self-interested parties you will say that he is a very bad man; but those who worked with Mossop speak very differently of him. However, that has nothing to do with the question. If Mossop was the worst man in this country, that does not excuse the mismanagement on the canal; and I may say further, that Mossop is to-day out of this country, trying to earn bread for his family, while the men who have mismanaged the canal are living on the public money.

I shall deal with these charges seriatim.

As to the first charge, I might say that I have paid but little attention to it; but there is one thing I have proved, and that is that the lock tenders were not thieves before Mr. Ellis came to manage the canal, as was stated by him in his letter to the Department, dated 6th April, 1889. The statement made by me, from my place in the Senate, as to the expenditure for fuel on the Welland Canal, is correct. If you will look through the Public Accounts and Sessional Papers of this country you will find that it costs as much (if not more) to furnish fuel for the Welland Canal as for all the other canals in the Dominion. And if you will take the trouble to do so, you will certainly come to the conclusion that we have a cold climate in the Niagara district. George Longlet, teamster, St. Catharines (see page 1542 of the report), says that:

"One-half a load of coal was delivered in the cellar under the lock house, at the north end of the house—that is Demare's cellar. I was teaming for McCordick. There was coal in the bin where I put it."

Now, if it had been a full load I should not have been able to prove anything. I had not time to follow it up. I gave as much time to the public in that investigation as I could afford, and that is why I was so anxious at St. Catharines that morning to close up the matter. I did not want to have to come here and trespass on the time of this House again, as I am now doing; but no other course is left to me, since the publication and distribution of Mr. Rykert's pamphlet. It is alleged that the cellar of that house at Port Dalhousie was built on a swamp. To my knowledge that house had been built on a rock foundation forty years before. I will touch on this question again before I get through. It was very convenient for these people, as you will see from the evidence, to find a swamp in the cellar when they wanted to cover up a job. The second charge is the expenditure of a large amount of money without authority from Parliament. I shall refer first to the construction of a bridge over Shiner's Creek, at a cost of over $1,000. This expenditure took place after I had called attention to the mismanagement of the canal. It took place without a report in its favor from the Chief Engineer, and without the knowledge of the Government. If Mr. Ellis had any self-respect he would resign his position, in view of the snubs he has received from the Department from time to time; but he hangs on like a burr, and he will not drop off until he is scraped off. Another work on which Government money was expended without authority was the building of the spoke factory bridge. The particulars of it will be found at page 533 of the evidence. The expenditure on that bridge for cement was $84, and for stone $91. I do not know how much labor was employed on it. I would refer you to the evidence of Steven Beatty, at pages 534 and 535 of the evidence. He shows it to be a township bridge. At page 754 of the evidence Mr. James McCoppen, president of the Stone Road Company, says that the Government had always refused to build or repair the bridge over Shiner's Creek, the same place where Mr. Ellis built an expensive bridge without the least authority. This was done in April last. I want to impress that on your minds, because the Government took him to task and asked him why he was spending so much money. He never said a word about it, and when I questioned him before the commissioner as to whether he had reported to the Government what he was doing, he replied: "No; I did not think they would expect it." I then asked him had he any authority for building it, and he replied that he had not. The Government at the same time asked him for an explanation. Now, what was his reason for hiding it from the Government? I do not know as a fact, and I will not give rumors. Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer, at page 1394 of the report, says that he did not authorize any expenditure on Shiner's Creek bridge —that he reported against it—that such a work should be done by a vote of Parliament. I do not think you want any better evidence than that. Mr. Ellis himself, at page 2183, says that he did not report to the Government that he was spending $1,000 out of the canal appropriation to build the Shiner's pond bridge—that he did not think it necessary or that they would expect it. The Government could not have known that he was building that bridge. At page 1891 he says that he got instructions from Dr. Ferguson, M.P., who said that he received the consent of the late Hon. John H. Pope to build the bridge out of the canal appropriation, because he could not go to Parliament and get a vote in the face of the engineer's report. I knew John Henry Pope for a long time, and from my acquaintance with him I know that that is not the way that he did business. He might have said to Mr. Ferguson: "Well, if you can get Mr. Ellis to build it, all right." But when was that? Two or three years ago; and the Hon. John H. Pope had departed this life before the work was commenced. If Mr. Ellis had any authority to build it, if he thought it was right to build it, why should he hide it from the Government? When they asked him why he was spending that money he did not give a straightforward reply. I asked him: "Did you not put it on the margin of the pay list, the same as other matters?" and he said: "No; the Government could not expect it. I got orders from Ottawa to not put it in the margin?" I do not credit that. Last year in this House I made a good deal of fun of his report on the three canals that he had under his charge, that he took care to mention that he drove a spike, that he put a link in a chain, that he put in a window glass, that he caulked a punt, that he filled a crevice in a valve with straw and manure. He loaded down his report with straw and manure, but he could not tell where hundreds of dollars had passed through his foreman's hands. Of course, it is not very pleasant to the Government to have one of their officials shown to the public in that way, and I have every reason to believe that he was instructed not to load down his report in that way again; but they did not tell him to conceal from the Government that he was spending a thousand dollars to build a bridge at Shiner's Creek. At page 134 Nathan Morey gives evidence about building bridges on the stone road and street railway and across mill races, and about building chutes at the hydraulic race. I would refer you to the leases between Calvin Phillips and the Government, and the Hydraulic Company and the Government. Some years ago the Government of Canada leased to Mr. Calvin Phillips sufficient water power on the Welland Canal to drive six run of stone, for which they get the magnificent sum of $150 a year. The balance of the water power from Lock 10 to Lock 2 on the Welland Canal is leased to the Hydraulic Company at $125 a year. It was an improvident bargin, but still it is a bargin and must be carried out to the letter. But the money of the country should not be expended in building structures for the benefit of people who enjoy these rights at such small expense. The least they can do is to make such improvements as those I have been describing. I find they are paying any amount of money to cut ice during the winter for these people—work that they should do themselves. Why does Mr. Ellis do this? To get popularity and to get something else besides, as I will show by-and-by.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—What? Not melted ice?

HON. MR. McCALLUM—A testimonial. At page 552 of the evidence Nathan Morey is recalled, and he says that the bridge on the stone road cost about $285, that it was made wider—that it is 42 feet wide by 24 feet long. This is a bridge across the raceway where some enterprising people in the city of St. Catharines have built a street railway. The chutes at McCormick's he says cost $623.75, and from the second race into the lower race it cost $495 (see pages 1526 and 1527). The first chute (the one which cost $623) I believe the Government had a right to build; but the public had no right to be assessed for building the other one. It should have been constructed by the Hydraulic Company, as I will show further on when we come to that subject. Then there was a bridge built across the race from the stone road to the knitting factory at a cost of $294.33. The man that gave these figures must have intended to create an impression that he was very accurate, but I am a pretty good judge of such work.

I have seen these structures, and I know the cost of them is put down at the very lowest figures that a man's conscience would allow him to give. My conscience would not allow me to put it at so low an estimate, and I know something of carpenter work and am a judge of timber, paint and iron. Whatever the cost may have been, we have no more to do with that work than we have to do with the public works of France.

This man Morey built a boat house for Mr. Ellis. You will say it is all right, that there is no reason why Mr. Ellis should not have a boat house; but he has no less than three on the Welland Canal. I did not take any evidence as to who paid for the boats, but the cost of the boat houses, without taking into account the value of the stone work, was $112. Mr. Ellis has three of them,—one at Port Colborne, one at St. Catharines and one at Port Dalhousie. I would refer you to the evidence of O. J. Phelps, M.P.P., at page 1537 of the report, to show that he built his own bridge. Now that was perfectly right. But when I took the evidence of Mr. Merritt, who is one of the stockholders in the Hydraulic Company, he admitted readily that under their lease they had to build their own structures, all but the upper race, and to pay the Government $500 a year. I do not blame the Government for having leased those valuable water powers for such low figures, but I do blame the Government, if they continue to allow their officials to squander the public money on structures which should be built and maintained by the lessees.

Captain Sylvester Neelon, as respectable a man as there is in this country, says, at page 2334, that the chutes from the upper to the lower race were built by subscriptions from the millers and manufacturers; but since M. Ellis has had control of the canal he does all this sort of work, and considers it beneath him to consult the Chief Engineer of the Department on the subject. He says that he, and he alone, is responsible to the people of this country for the proper administration of the Welland Canal. As I stated before, he constructs these works for the purpose of increasing his popularity, and for something else; and that fact will give you some idea of the difficulties I had to contend with at this investigation. The witnesses who were called were respectable men, but they were opposed to me, and the only reason I can give for their opposition is that they were milking the Dominion cow. One of them, I thought, had a very short memory. I refer to Captain Norris, who came there, and when I asked him who built these chutes formerly, his reply was: "I own the lower race." I asked him who built the chute from the second to the lower race formerly, and he replied that Captain Neelon could tell me that. Of course I asked him no more, because I thought Mr. Neelon's evidence would be quite sufficient. Then Mr. Norris asked permission to make a statement to the commissioner and complained that I joked him on the street that he should be satisfied with Mr. Ellis because Mr. Ellis had cut the ice in his pond. Now, I thought Mr. Norris should have been above retailing a private conversation which was nothing more than a passing joke on the street. However, there is the fact in the evidence, that he could not tell me who built the chute formerly. Now, what does Captain Neelon show? He says that the chutes from the upper to the lower race were built by subscriptions from the millers and manufacturers formerly, and that Mr. Norris was the man that had constructed them. Now Mr. Norris might have answered my question and stated the fact that the chutes were built by himself in the first place, although Mr. Ellis has since kept them in repair at the expense of the country. We have a system of water works at Port Dalhousie. They were built by Mr. Ellis without authority. We have a lot of plant at that place, but there is a watchman there, and I suppose the property is insured. At page 800 of the evidence Jonathan Woodall says that a firecracker set fire to the roof of Mr. Demare's house, and that in order to put out the fire he had to carry the nozzle up to the top of the house. Then at page 1420 Mr. Page says that this inefficient water works was built at a great expense to the country without his authority. At page 1394 the Chief Engineer says that he gave no authority to build the Albert street culvert and the knitting factory bridge. How much do you suppose this Albert street culvert cost the country? Over $6,000; and yet Mr. Ellis built it without any authority. Neither was Mr. Page consulted about the building of the bridge over the stone road for the street railway company or the building of the dock at Port Colborne; he was not consulted about the repairs made to the canal office at St. Catharines. Mr. Ellis says, at page 2318 of the report of the evidence, that he consulted Mr. Carter and Mr. Secord, but did not consult Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer, about the building of the dock at Port Colborne; he consulted his subordinates, but did not think it worth while to consult his chief. Now that dock is of no value to shipping as the evidence clearly shows. It was a pure waste of the public money. I saw the dock last year, and knew all about it, and knew that it was worthless, owing to the place where it was constructed. Charles Carter, the harbor master, in his evidence at page 1291, says he does not know what the dock at Port Colborne was built for, that Mr. Ellis ordered him to have the tugs lay there, and that he made them go there for ten or twelve days until they knocked their wales off, and then they would not remain there any longer. That dock was built at a point where it was exposed to storms on Lake Erie, and when a breeze comes down the lake no craft can lie there. When the dock was built the harbor master wanted to show that it was of some value, and he tried to compel the tugs to remain there, but when they found they were knocking their wales off they had to leave. At page 1292 Mr. Carter says that all parties at Port Colborne interested in tugs remonstrated about it. At page 1293 he says that he carried out Mr. Ellis' orders until the tugs began to knock themselves to pieces. Some of the vessels had to be towed away to save them from destruction. At page 1316 Edward Armstrong stated that if he did not get redress he would go to Ottawa about it.

George Ross, in his evidence at page 1318, also comments on the absurdity of building a dock in such a place for tugs to lie in. I would refer you also to the evidence of Sperry Carter, Daniel McGrath, Edward Armstrong and Henry Mawdsley, all to the same effect, all pointing to the fact that the building of that dock was a pure waste of money. I do not care to go into all the details of this evidence, but I have a copy of it here which was furnished to me by the commissioner and paid for by the country. I have read it over three times to get at the facts, and I have no further use for it. The evidence about the dock at Port Colborne is conclusive that it is of no value whatever to the public.

I come now to the fourth charge, and I turn to the evidence of Mr. Page, which will be found at page 1397 of the report. I put the question to him: "Did Mr. Ellis ever consult you about building a Custom house and post office at Port Colborne out of the canal appropriations?" He answered: "No; if I had been consulted I would not have sanctioned it." Mr. Ellis was not satisfied with trying to control the Department of Railway and Canals, but he must control the Department of Public Works also. If he knew anything at all he must have known that the construction of such a building was within the province of the Department of Public Works.

Now, what was the result of his unauthorized action? Nobody owned the building when it was completed, and the Government had to pass an Order in Council to give it to the Department of Public Works. I have mentioned how the Department of Railways and Canals tried to control this gentleman. I had no evidence taken on this point, but I have documents here to prove what I say. I shall now read some letters from the Department to Mr. Ellis in regard to the expenditure on the Welland Canal in April last, and Mr. Ellis' replies, showing that the Government has been after him with a sharp stick since I last moved in Parliament. The first letter is as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 11th May, 1889.

"SIR,—The pay-lists for the Welland Canal staff and repairs for the past month have been submitted to the Chief Engineer, and for his information I am directed to say that an explanatory letter should accompany pay-list, stating at what work the carpenters and masons named on the list were engaged; where, and at what the laborers were employed; what so many machinists were doing—in fact, full details of the service on which the respective men were engaged; the reason in each case why the men are expected to be paid for more than twenty-six days in a month, and why it was necessary to do the different works undertaken. More details and information should also be given for the supplies furnished, and where used.

"Nothing can be done towards sending the money for April pay-lists until the information asked for is furnished and proved satisfactory.

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"A. P. BRADLEY,
"Secretary.

"W. ELLIS, Esq.,
"Supt. Welland Canal,
"St. Catharines."

The Government ought to be applauded for this attempt to control Mr. Ellis since I brought his conduct under their notice. I think, in the end, he will have to "walk the plank" in the interest of the country. No government can keep him.

Here is Mr. Ellis' explanatory letter:—

"SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE,
"WELLAND CANAL,
"ST. CATHARINES, May 13, 1889.

"A. P. BRADLEY, Esq.,
"Secy. Dept. Railways and Canals.

"SIR,—In reply to your letter No. 78397, I beg to state that I was sorry not to have had the pleasure of the usual visit of the Chief Engineer when the water was drawn off the canal, so that I could have shown all he asks for so much more satisfactorily than by writing. I could have shown him the dangerously rotten condition of things in several places that I dare not any longer postpone renewing and rebuilding, without putting myself in the position of being held accountable for the loss of human lives and the consequences arising therefrom to the Government as well as to myself, and also the possible accidents from rotten gates, lock walls undermined, &c., that might lead to serious accidents and washouts, stopping navigation and throwing hundreds out of employment in the mills and factories.

"I may say that I have made it a rule wherever possible (believing it wise and my duty) in renewing and rebuilding to do so always with stone and iron, instead of wood, thus putting an end to any more decay and expense of repairs.

"The bridge I have just completed across the important raceway that runs alongside Lock 24, Albert street, Thorold, over which a great deal of traffic passes, was built of wood long ago, and has for some time past been a cause of much anxiety to me, having become unsafe, and I provided for its rebuilding last fall by boating down a large quantity of the old surplus stone from Welland that came out of the old lock at that place for the purpose, and attacked the job the moment the water was drawn off, took away the old rotten bridge, and built the present permanent structure. The foundations proved very treacherous and troublesome, and I had to go down deeper than I expected. The banks on each side were consequently high, and threatened to slip, but by putting on a big force and working nights (by electric lights put up on purpose) and days, every available hour, we got the foundations put in, and the masonry built up to the high water mark. Within the two weeks advertised the water would be out of the canal, and the mills above started as usual. Since that I have carried the walls up, put iron girders across (twenty feet width between walls), turned segment brick arches across between the girders, filled up spandrils and flushed all up with concrete, covering same with coal tar, put on the old macadam and allowed traffic over again as usual the end of last week. This bridge has cost a good deal, but it is a permanent structure, and will never cost a dollar any more for renewals or repairs.

"The accompanying photo. was taken when the walls were, say about two-thirds the height.

"It was in building this bridge where all the overtime was made that was enquired about, except by the men on new canal, who had to attend to broken cables and during nights. The temporary bridge that I threw across the Chippewa Creek last year was again utilized in this case across the canal above Lock 24, the same piles and top work being used very advantageously, and without delaying travel a minute.

"I had everything ready to submit for Chief Engineer's approval, expecting him up, as he has always been, every spring since I have been here, and I shall be greatly disappointed if he does not say an excellent and suitable job has been done.

"Masons.—The stone work both sides of entrance to Lock 1, new canal, above the head gates, were seriously displaced. These were all taken up, and put in place, well drivelled and backed up by widening the walls at that point. This was mason's job, also pointing all weirs where needed, some retaining walls were rebuilt, and the walls of the bridge near spoke factory, Merritton, across the wide race there had become unsafe and had to be put in order, and paving done to prevent foundations being seamed under. The weirs along the old canal generally require some pointing every season to keep them in proper order, and masons attended to that work last month.

"The four machinists enquired about (as the accountant designates them) are handy men. Two have the entire and special responsibility of looking after and keeping in order the water wheels and shafts of the locks throughout, and have to examine them all carefully daily; the other two attend to the rest of the lock gates and weir machinery, and cables throughout. Breakages often happen in the night, when overtime is made by them in attending to same.

"The Carpenters are employed at so many different places it is almost impossible to convey by writing, in a letter like this, anything but a mere outline. A great deal of time has been consumed making and putting on new bridge for the lock gates; many binders have been put on gates replacing broken ones; one of our large scows has been partially rebuilt, so as to be ready, when the Chief Engineer proceeds with the concreting work at Port Dalhousie; similar rebuilding of scow is going on at Dunnville. The old bridge across old canal above Lock 2 has had to be partially rebuilt or lives would have been lost. The bridge across Choplin's race had to be overhauled also. New rack about 70 feet long had to be made, and piles driven to support it above Lock 25, old canal. Temporary bridge across canal built above Lock 24; bulkhead built on Lock 23 level. The floats protecting the various bridges, new canal, have required a good deal of attention and are considerably broken up. Carpenters have to attend to a great variety of jobs always, to see that everything is ready for the opening of navigation. The foundation of bridge, Albert street, Thorold, had to be put in; the locks and lock gates examined and faced up in several places and put in working order throughout, also the weirs and aprons throughout, and these latter items consumed a good deal of time.

"The Laborers.—Time has been taken up to a great extent in digging out old or 'started' snubbing posts, and substituting better and stronger; in many places much has to be done in that way to keep safe. Various leaks are generally discovered after frost goes out—there have been a number of these—which have to be properly attended to and puddled; overtime often has to be made at such jobs, stone loaded and unloaded. Welland and Thorold—Stone quarried for backing for Albert street bridge, fences built in several places where notice has been served by adjoining owners of suits for damages unless attended to. The opening of ditches and culverts throughout the entire distance of all three of the canals after the spring and winter floods and freshets requires a large amount of time from all our gangs of laborers; also, filling up slips and washouts, bad ruts in tow-paths and ends of bridges, and culverts which get washed out. Driftwood and logs have to be attended to everywhere before opening of navigation. Floats at Port Colborne and elsewhere—after ice disappears—require attention. The toll house at Dunnville has been removed back some ten feet and made available for lock-tender's residence. Beach gravel has been scowed for lake to Dunnville embankment. The excavating required down to foundation of Albert street bridge and wheeling it away for both the walls and then wheeling it back again as masonry was built up, and ramming the same, &c., required, of course, a great deal of laborers' time, as also the working derricks, and attending upon the masons, &c., &c.

"The lock chambers had to be cleared out where necessary. In one case mud 4 feet high on one side of the lock chamber was found and removed; a considerable amount of laborers' time was used in stoning up and facing banks where the water was out and admitted of such necessary protective work being done. The raceways were cleared out everywhere, as usual, where necessary; leaky places attended to and puddled; bulkhead foundation on Lock 23 level was dug and puddled. The above descriptions cover a large amount of absolutely necessary work—nothing has been done anywhere that was not absolutely required to be done, and, I beg to respectfully submit, done without waste or carelessly. Still, many things have been done of course I cannot think of to mention in this letter.

"GENERALLY.

"I see, in referring to previous years' expenditures for the repairs, and for months of April, they have sometimes been above, and sometimes a little below the amount of last month. In 1887-8 they were lower because of deepening and widening going on, which left me much surplus and enabled the erection of the building at Port Colborne so much needed.

"The Albert street bridge is the last of any expensive work required that I know of, and I am sure that cost 25 per cent. less than if done by contract.

"The Bills of Supplies.—As we don't keep copies of these, and they are all down at Ottawa, I am unable to make any special references about them. Our supplies bill, like our pay-rolls, are always necessarily very much larger than at any other time (in the spring month). I need hardly say I shall be pleased to go over the whole of the items, either of supplies or anything else, with the Chief Engineer, whenever he may so desire. I think it will be found the bills for the supplies generally show on the face of them where the goods have been delivered, and what they are required for. I know I have always tried to get that rule observed ever since I came here, so that at any time in the future they would explain themselves.

"I may conclude by remarking I asked, under the head 'Supplementary Estimates required for the year ending 30th June, 1889':

"'To erect permanent stone bridge across raceway under Albert street, town of Thorold, in lieu of existing rotten structure, $2,000.'

"And on page 47 in the Blue Book 'Estimates,' 'Overhauling superstructure of Port Dalhousie pier, removal of shoals, also construction of piers for bridge at Thorold, $30,000.'

"Since the receipt of your letter this morning I have devoted myself every minute of the time since, to the exclusion of everything else, to furnish the information asked for, and hope it may be sufficient and satisfactory, as the time for closing the mails has arrived within a few minutes, and our men are already beginning to call upon the paymaster, as also the merchants—the 13th being the day he usually commences paying.

"Your obedient servant,
"WILLIAM ELLIS,
"Superintendent."

You can see by this letter that the Superintendent does not explain the expenditure of over $1,000 on the Shiner's pond bridge (a township bridge), which was reported against by the Chief Engineer. He built that bridge at the request of a member of Parliament, and by his action in this manner conceals it from the Government.

Further, Mr. Ellis says that the "carpenters are employed at so many different places that it is almost impossible to convey in a letter like this anything but a mere outline."

Could Mr. Ellis have been thinking then of the carpenters that he had employed at his house, as the evidence at the canal investigation shows.

In fact, Mr. Ellis goes over a whole season's business in order to explain his paylists on the Welland Canal for the month of April, and putting in works that has not been performed, and leaving out important works, such as the Shiner's pond bridge, built without authority. But it is a satisfaction for me to know that the Government are looking after him sharp, as to money expended on the Welland Canal lately. They should have done so long ago in the interest of the country.

Whether my action in this House has brought about this result or not, by bringing it to the notice of the Government, you, hon. gentlemen, can judge.

Now, what does Mr. Bradley say:—

"OTTAWA, 20th May, 1889.

"SIR,—The Department has had under consideration your explanatory letter of the 13th instant, with regard to certain heavy expenditure incurred by you in connection with the works under your charge on the Welland Canal.

"While recognizing the necessity for the due maintenance of works and the responsibility resting upon you in the matter, I am at the same time to say that important structures, such as your letter shows you to have built, are of a character exceeding the limits of ordinary repair and maintenance, and involving, as they do, serious cost, should not be undertaken without previous full explanation to the Chief Engineer of Canals and on the special authorization of the Department. The Department is therefore compelled to impress upon you strongly the view that the powers entrusted to you are not unlimited, and that the exercise of those powers must in all important cases be subjected to the decision of this office, upon which the responsibility for the results entailed ultimately falls. It is trusted that you will not fail to guide yourself in the future by those observations.

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"A. P. BRADLEY
"Secretary.

"W. ELLIS, Esq.,
"Supt. Welland Canal,
"St. Catharines."

You would think that ought to be enough, but no! Here is another letter from Mr. Ellis:—

"SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE,
"WELLAND CANAL,
"ST. CATHARINES, 21st May, 1889.

"A. P. BRADLEY, Esq.,
Secy. Dept. Railways and Canals.

"SIR,—In answer to your letter No. 78468 I have to thank you for the directions therein laid down for for my future guidance, which shall be carefully attended to hereafter.

"I have worked very hard ever since I have been here to endeavor to put everything in a safe condition, as far as structures were concerned, and now feel greatly relieved in my mind because that has been at last all but completed throughout. I found the want of very many thing to make our equipment of plant equal to grapple promptly and effectually with accidents on this important work, and in that respect am thankful to say we are now well furnished, and can handle our 60-ton gates and everything else with the greatest ease, and accidents to lock gates on the old canal that used to delay navigation for days, and at very great cost, are now remedied in a few hours and at a very small expense, while in the new and much larger canal our facilities are now such that serious detentions to navigation from the usual and ordinary accidents are hardly any longer possible.

"Your obedient servant,
"WILLIAM ELLIS,
"Superintendent."

Then follows this letter from the Secretary of the Department:—

"OTTAWA, 12th June, 1889.

"SIR,—I am instructed to return to you the accounts (with pay-lists) of the Welland Canal for the month of May, and to request that the proper certificates may be entered on them, as required by clause 33 of the Audit Act. (See the Department circular dated the 5th February, 1886.)

"When sending them back you will please furnish a full explanation of W. B. Allan's account for repairs to Custom house and post office at Port Colborne, included therein.

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"A. P. BRADLEY,
"Secretary.

"W. ELLIS, Esq.,
"Supt. Welland Canal,
"St. Catharines."

You see, Mr. Ellis gets rapped over the knuckles, but he does seem to mind anything of that kind; he hangs on like a burr.

Now we come to the fifth charge—men working for parties outside who are paid by the Government. When I spoke here last year I did not think that the Superintendent of the Welland Canal would so far forget himself as to be guilty of such a thing. It was somebody else I had in my mind; but what did I find when I came to investigate this matter? Look at the evidence—the evidence of men who are controlled by Mr. Ellis, men whose evidence had to be dragged out of them, and I am satisfied that I have not got at 5 per cent. of the truth, owing to the influence that was exerted against me. It could not be expected that a man like myself, without legal training, opposed by a skilful lawyer and dealing with unwilling witnesses, could do much. However, I have got enough to show the people of this country that the Welland Canal is sadly mismanaged. At page 58 of the evidence Walter Chatfield says that he worked at Mr. Ellis' house about three weeks in all, and received his pay from the Government for the time he worked. He is paid $75 per month.

HON. MR. POWER—Who owns this house that Mr. Ellis occupies? Is it a house which belongs to the Government and will be occupied by the next Superintendent?

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I am disposed to be fair to Mr. Ellis, and if this building really belonged to the Government I would state so, but it is Mr Ellis' private house. The Government does not find him a house. He is paid a salary of $2,900 a year, and receives $300 for horse hire. You will see from the evidence that it was a common thing to take men who were paid by the Government to do private work for Mr Ellis. At page 67 of the evidence Mr. Chatfield says that Mr. Laurence wanted him to work at his (Laurence's) house, but he would not go, and Laurence said he might as well work at his house as at Mr. Ellis'. This Chatfield, as you will see from the evidence, is a gentleman of leisure. We pay him $75 a month, and $200 or $300 for horse hire; and Mr. Rykert says in this pamphlet that if Chatfield was not working for Mr. Ellis he would be making picture frames for himself. Thomas J. Hartley was employed four and a-half years as caretaker of the canal office, and he says, at pages 70 to 80, that half of the time or more he worked at Mr. Ellis' private residence. The Government paid him for at least two and a-quarter years for work done by him at Ellis' house, he not receiving as much as 10 cents from Mr. Ellis at that time, but being paid by the Government at the rate of $1.25 a day. He was doing the general work of a man servant. At page 87 C. W. Hellems, a carpenter, states that he worked at Mr. Ellis' house on two different occasions, and received his pay as if working for the Government from R. D. Dunn, the Government paymaster.

He worked at Laurence's house also, and was paid by the paymaster as working for the Government. He says he did not know who kept the time, Mr. Vanderburgh or Mr. Demare. He was paid $2 per day. He adds: "The last time I was there I was ordered to go by Mr. Demare, the foreman, at Port Dalhousie, Mr. Ellis set me to work and showed me what to do. I signed the pay rolls as if working for the Government." Now, I say that the action of Mr. Demare and Mr. Ellis in reference to this man Hellems ought to drive them out of the public service. They are both equally guilty. I would direct your attention to Nathan Morey's evidence, at page 127. You will see at page 139 that Charles Hill, teamster, worked thirty-six half days and one full day for Mr. Ellis, and got his pay as if working for the Government. Mr. Hill did not drive his team all the time; his son, Charlie Hill, junior, drove the team part of the time, and when we wanted the son to give evidence we could not find him. Several men that I wanted as witnesses were away—conveniently away, no doubt. They had an underground telegraph, and when I wanted any one to give evidence he was approached before he came. The evidence was fairly dragged out of them, but it is strong enough to convict Mr. Ellis and his deputy. Charles Hill's evidence commences on page 217. He says he hauled furniture from Norris' storehouse, also from Spring Bank, and a fence from Wilson's foundry, flower pots from the same place, hauled kindling wood for him, and got his pay in the canal office as if working for the Government. He says that he also hauled manure for Mr. Ellis. The furniture was hauled when Mr. Ellis first moved to St. Catharines. He had but one object in view from the beginning, to promote his own interests. George Dalgetty's evidence commences at page 305. He says he got his pay at the canal office as if working for the Government, while he was working for outside parties. Miller was his foreman. Hamilton Page says he hauled a load of iron fence to Mr. Ellis' house and got his pay at the canal office as if he was working for the Government. I would have liked to get evidence on that iron fence, but could not. I understand since that they played sharp on me. I asked the witness : "Did Mr. Ellis pay you for that fence?" He answered : "He gave me a cheque." That was not sufficient. I have found out since that the cheque was given as a blind in case I should call that man to give evidence, and probably the cheque was afterwards returned. That was the way I was treated at St. Catharines while I was endeavoring to do the best I could on behalf of the people of this country. Now they are trying to prejudice the public against me. Even the Empire newspaper says that Mr. Wood, the commissioner, exonerated these parties. Where did that information come from? I have not seen his report; I do not know whether he has made one or two reports, but whatever he may have said, you have the evidence here, and if you will examine it you will find that I had good grounds for the course I have pursued in this matter. Cornelius Reid, at page 259, says that he sent men to work at Mr. Ellis' house—John Merrill, Wm. Hopgood and Daniel Sylvyne. He did not return Sylvyne's time this summer as if working for the Government.

This Port Dalhousie band business is worthy of your attention.

Mr. Demare, the Deputy Superintendent, as they call him now (formerly the man who occupied his position was called the foreman) is president of the Port Dalhousie band. This band is largely composed of men employed on the canal. When they want to get away anywhere Mr. Demare sends men in their places, and if you will read the evidence you will find something amusing in it about the band hall and musicians. I do not say that the public have been taxed to build this band hall, but I know that one of the foremen, the time-keeper, Mr. Vanderburg, when put in the witness box and asked about the band hall, replied that he did not know anything about it—that he had just passed by it and seen it. I had him back three or four times, and the next time when I called him I found that he had a mortgage on that band hall for $800 or $900, though when I first called him he knew nothing about it, except that he had just seen it. John Sexton, a laborer, whose evidence appears at page 195, says he worked six days at Mr. Ellis' house, that Mr. Ellis paid him for four days' work, and that for the other two days he was paid as if working for the Government, and signed the pay-rolls. William Hopgood, a laborer, says, at page 197, that he worked pulling weeds in Mr. Ellis' garden two or three times, and got paid as working for the Government and signed the pay-rolls—that Mr. Reid sent him there. Martin McCormack, a laborer, at page 200 says he helped to load six or seven loads of earth which was taken to Mr. Ellis' house—that it was black earth. He says that he knew it was going there—that he passed by and saw it there. I next come to the evidence of Thomas Bonnville, which will be found at page 468. When Mr. Ellis was appointed Superintendent of the Welland Canal he brought this man with him from Prescott, and gave him a position on the canal, where he receives a salary of $47 per month. This Bonnville acted as Mr. Ellis' cook. He says that he was away twice, by Mr. Ellis' order, cooking in Mr. Ellis' camp, say twenty days in all, during which time he was paid as if working on the canal. There was another lock-tender also who was rowing Mr. Ellis about and helping Bonnville. That is the way Mr. Ellis is spending his time when we are paying him; that is the way Mr. Ellis is spending the public money and neglecting his duty. When this evidence was brought out the commissioner remarked that he did not think that it was anything extraordinary that Mr. Ellis should take some holidays, considering the length of time he had been on the canal. How much did the commissioner know about the time that Mr. Ellis was away from his duties, and how much did he do to get at the facts during the investigation? George Nicholson, whose evidence appears at page 510, says he worked seven weeks in all at Mr. Ellis' house, and was paid by Mr. Ellis for four weeks. For the other three weeks he was paid at the pay office as having worked for the Government. He says that Mr. Ellis sent him there to work, and that he received $2 per day. He says he did a little of everything under Mr. Ellis' orders, and Mr. Fallon. Now, who is this Mr. Fallon? He is an architect from Toronto, who was brought there to do something at the canal office, but the greater part of the time he was employed working at Mr. Ellis' house. I did not care to put the public to the expense of bringing Mr. Fallon from Toronto as a witness, because that sort of thing was going on all the time, as is proved by the other witnesses. Nicholson says that he signed the pay-rolls like all the rest for the time that he was employed at Mr. Ellis' house. I now come to the pontoon which was built under contract by Mr. Miller. George Irving, at page 550 of the evidence, says that he worked on the pontoon for a day and a-half and got paid by the Government; that he helped Johnson to load a load of stone for the band hall at Port Dalhousie, and got his pay from the Government.

I wish to explain about this pontoon that Mr. Miller had a contract from the Government to build it, but the evidence goes to show that men employed on the canal and paid for their time by the Government did a great deal of work on this pontoon.

I did not get half of the evidence I should have elicited in connection with that charge, because some of the men who had been employed on the pontoon were evidently smuggled down to the Cornwall Canal. The Chief Engineer is very seldom able to spend any time on the Welland Canal, having so many important duties to attend to here and at other places, and his subordinates on the canal take advantage of his absence to enrich themselves at the expense of the country. Mr. Miller, in addition to the contract for the pontoon, had a contract to repair Mr. Demare's house. Mr. Ellis, Mr. Demare and Mr. Miller went through the house and agreed upon the repairs and improvements to be made. Mr. Ellis made out the specifications which Mr. Miller accepted, but what do we find? That the men who did that work under Mr. Miller's orders received their pay as if working for the Government. I find the following in the Sessional Papers of 1889, at page 170 (No. 49 d.):—

"To Roger Miller, Port Dalhousie:

"Taking down floors, partitions, stair and doors of overseer's house, Port Dalhousie; removing mud and decayed flooring, laying in 160 feet drain from same to harbor, concreting floor, building cellar, renewing floors, partitions, stairs, doors, &c., throughout, re-arranging windows and door openings, putting in new sash and doors, taking down old stone chimney and building new brick one, repairing outside blinds, plastering, painting, &c., papering, as per agreement, $500.

"Taking out decayed floor of adjoining lock-master's house and mud under concreting, and relaying new floor, laying 160 feet drain from same to harbor, taking off old and putting on new plastering and ceiling, making new window openings and putting in new sash frames and blinds, taking out other decayed sashes and fitting with new, painting and papering where required, as per agreement, $135.

"Taking out floor, partition, stairs, doors of old collector's office, and converting into additional dwelling accommodation for overseer, removing vault and brick division wall and rebuilding in proper position, making new window, opening and fitting with new sash and blinds, renewing of old sashes, fitting storm sash, repairing blinds, removing old chimney, building new one and plastering, painting and papering throughout, as per agreement, $400.

"Painting outside overseer's house and 12 pairs blinds ..... $ 45 00

"Painting outside lockmaster's house and 11 pairs blinds	45 00
"Painting outside collector's office and 8 pairs blinds	30 00
"160 feet eave-trough and continuation pipe, at 15c	20 00
"342 feet gas pipe for railing around old pontoon, at 9c	30 78
"34 elbows and 'T's' for same	3 60

That is a copy of the contract, and Mr. Miller received the amounts which I have read, though most of the work was done by the employés of the Government. Who certified to this account? Mr. Demare and Mr. Ellis. Mr. Demare was keeping the time of the men, and Mr. Ellis must have known what was going on if he was not blind. This is the house that I spoke of, in the foundation of which a swamp was discovered. It was formerly the collector's office, and had a vault in it; but in order to conceal a job they discovered a swamp in the cellar. But if there was a swamp, and the specifications stated that they were to take out the bottom to the depth of 16 inches and pack down 10 inches of clay and put in 6 inches of grout cement on top if it, that is the contract and it should have been carried out by the contractor. The pay-lists were brought down last year, and Mr. Abbott, the leader of the Senate, said jokingly to me that he would send all the papers to the Table if he was able. I went to the Printing Committee and I was afraid to ask for the whole of the papers printed, because if I asked for so much I would not get any. My hon. friend from Quinté (Mr. Read) was the chairman of the Printing Committee, and he is so exceedingly economical that he did not want to give me what I required. He did not want to give me the whole of the return, but if he had done so the public would have saved money. I had a great pile of the pay-lists for the last years and I have gone through them all. I mention this for the benefit of my hon. friend, so that he will not be too economical in the future. On looking over the pay-lists I found that this man who worked at Mr. Demare's house under the contract got paid the full amount of his contract; but I find at page 153 of this same volume of Sessional Papers that the employés of the Government on the canal are paid for doing this same work. If my hon. friend from Quinté had been more liberal with me, and printed a larger number of these returns, I could have elicited a great deal more of just such information in the public interest. However, I have discovered enough to expose Mr. Ellis and his deputy. I come now again to the pontoon, and refer to the evidence of Edward Smilie. At page 678 he says that he worked on the pontoon that Mr. Miller was building and received his pay from the Government, Mr. Demare keeping his time. Henry Vanderburg says that Mr. Miller did not have the contract of caulking, and that it was done by Mr. Ellis himself. Mr. Page does not say so. Can any one believe that the Chief Engineer of Canals, whom I have known for forty years as a practical, honest man, would let a contract to any one to build a float with tongued-and-grooved lumber? I know him too well to believe that he would allow such a structure to be built. Mr. Page has promised to look up the contract for that pontoon and send it to me. I know, however, that the contractor was required to caulk that pontoon; that he was to find the oakum and caulk it, and that he did not do so, but that it was done by the employés on the canal at the expense of the Government. Samuel Houston, at page 896, says that he worked at the schooner "Defiance" with Smilie, and that he and Smilie got paid by the Government. He says, at page 913, that he built a box for the Port Dalhousie band waggon on Demare's orders, and was paid as if working for the Government. Evidence was afterwards given to show that this band box was used on the canal at times, and if that was the only sin Mr. Ellis and his deputy had committed in connection with the band hall they could easily be forgiven. But that is not all: it has been a source of considerable loss to this country in other ways. I know that Mr. Demare's connection with the Port Dalhousie band had the effect of keeping men in the employ of the canal who were unfit for the service. I do not wish to injure any one or prevent him earning his living, but I contend that a man should be something more than a musician to be qualified to work on the Welland Canal. William Tinline, in his evidence on page 925, says that the scow "Mud Hen" was detained at Lock 3 of the old canal, with a crew of three men, for two and a-half hours while Charles Hill hauled a trunk or valise from Mr. Ellis' house to the station.

That is the evidence of the man who is in charge there and this was done by the order of J. B. Smith, foreman of the old canal. Smith has been acting as Mr. Ellis' broker, making arrangements with people on the Welland Canal which would enable Mr. Ellis to pay his debts. I call Mr. J. B. Smith broker Smith, because he acts as Mr. Ellis' broker in sending men to work at Mr. Ellis' house to do his teaming, and in getting money from the employés on the canal to pay Mr. Ellis' debts. I did not ascertain how much money was procured under these arrangements, because the commissioner would not allow me to ask the question. He threw what you may call a mantle of charity over them, but he lectured them, and told Mr. Smith that if Mr. Abbey could be approached in that way hundreds of others might be; but he would not let me pursue the investigation to ascertain whether hundreds of others had been approached or not. When I called upon him to make the witness answer he declined to do so, but said the witness might answer if he liked, and Mr. Rykert advised the witness not to answer. I was obliged to stand that and a great many other indignities while I was endeavoring to do my duty as a public man in the interests of the people. I would not have stood as much for any personal object. Tinline says, at page 926, that he worked twenty-three days on the pontoon and got his pay as if working for the Government. Mr. Marshall was there also building the body of the pontoon. Mr. Marshall was in the hall for two days while the investigation was in progress. He is a ship carpenter, and they wanted to put him in the box, but he was afraid to meet me, knowing my practical knowledge. Although Mr. Miller swore that they put the tongued-and-grooved lumber in the pontoon the man who dressed the lumber swore that it was not tongued-and-grooved. When they wanted to put Mr. Marshall in the box he was not there to respond, and they were afraid to produce him. You will find Miller's contract for repairs on Demare's house in the report of the evidence, pages 822 to 828, and I should like every member of this House to examine that contract, because it shows that there is a swindle on the face of it. Thomas Jones, a lock-tender, says, at page 1025, that he worked at Mr. Demare's house concreting the cellar. That was work that was supposed to be done under Mr. Miller's contract and for which Mr. Miller was paid. John Merrill was there helping him, and the Government paid these men as if they had been employed at their regular work on the canal. Richard Hutton worked one and a-half days at the concreting of Mr. Demare's house, but he says he never got any pay. I doubt that; he must have been paid some way. James Hindson, at page 1155, says that he worked one or two weeks on the new pontoon and was paid by the Government as if he had been employed on the canal. Now this pontoon cost the country $3,200. We paid Mr. Miller so much for building it, and in addition we have been paying the wages of the men that built it. Mr. Rykert, in his effort to get up a breeze in favor of Mr. Ellis, says that I tried to mix up the contract for repairs. I have done nothing of the kind, but I want things to be called by their proper names. Whether this pontoon was constructed out of capital account or not makes no difference. It was done under contract, and the Government should not have been called upon to pay the wages of the men who did the work. Mr. Ellis and Mr. Demare must have known what was going on, particularly Mr. Demare, because he was keeping the men's time. Whether he got any share of the profits or not I cannot say. I do not want to accuse a man of anything except what is proven against him or what must strike every one has evidently taken place. Edward McLaughlin, at page 1192, says that he worked at Riordon's mill pond where vessels come to load at the dock and got his pay in the canal office; that Mr. Riordon did not pay him. Robert Pew, Robert Brick and John J. Giblin gave evidence to the same effect. And here I wish to say something about the Mail newspaper. I found that the Mail was very down on me during that investigation and characterized my inquiry as "fishing." Perhaps Mr. Riordon did not like me to continue fishing, because he knew that I might discover the portion that he received of the swag. I managed to get at some of it. Mr. Riordon subscribed to a testimonial for Mr. Ellis and Mr. Ellis gave him a quid pro quo. That is the way things have been managed on the Welland Canal—"you scratch my back and I will scratch yours." The evidence shows, from beginning to end, that

Mr. Ellis had but one object in view from the day that he was appointed to the present time. For the last ten years he has deceived the Government that trusted him and has been managing the second work in importance in the Dominion of Canada for his own personal interest and advantage. But Mr. Ellis is sometimes quite magnanimous. He is generous when the country pays the expense. He gets religious sometimes, which is a very good thing, and seems disposed to help the church. At page 1222 of the evidence William Chandler swears that he was sent to work at the rink after the festival for St. George's church, that he was there for two or three days and got paid as if working for the Government and signed the pay-rolls. Cornelius Reid, a very decent man—as good a man as there is in the country—who has been employed in the Welland Canal as foreman under Mr. Demare, was examined. He swears, at page 1250, that he sent men to work for Mr. Miller on Mr. Demare's orders—that he did so on the 20th of August and on 14th of September, and that he concreted the cellar in Mr. Woodall's part of the house and returned the time to the canal office; that he dug two drains from Mr. Woodall's and the other from Mr. Demare's house, and that he sent men to take down the vault. Although these men were working for Mr. Miller their time was returned as if they had been working for the Government. At page 1253 he says that he was present when they were sodding Mr. Demare's yard, and Mr. Demare wanted him to keep the men out of the way if Mr. Page or Mr. Ellis should come along. He says further that Mr. Demare knew that he, Mr. Reid and his men, were working at Mr. Demare's house during the time that Mr. Miller's contract was in progress. There can be no doubt about that, because Mr. Demare was keeping the time and returning it to the Government. John Merrill, at page 1585, swore that he was working with Mr. Miller by order of Mr. Reid. I would refer you to the statement of the account rendered to the Government by Mr. Ellis for repairs on overseer's house at Port Dalhousie, and also the printed pay-list in the Sessional Papers from page 43 to 82. You can see by Mr. Ellis' evidence at page 2309 that he let this contract to Roger Miller without any competition. Why should he do that? Why not offer it to public competition? Darby Dockery, at page 1266, says that he worked at Riordon's pond building a dry wall—that Mr. Smith sent him there; that he worked ten or eleven days at $1.50 per day, and got paid at the canal office as if working for the Government. James Hamilton, foreman, worked with twelve or fifteen men on the Riordon pond by orders of J. R. Smith. That is the man I call broker Smith. They were paid out of the public funds. Mr. Ellis could afford to be liberal with the people's money, but he could not afford to pay a cent out of his own pocket to a man who had been working about his own house for two and a-quarter years. F. J. Walton, at page 1517, says that he and a man named Pettigrew worked at the marine hospital by Ellis' orders—in all about three and a-half days; that their time was returned to the canal office and that they were paid by the Government. He also swears that he put a false bottom in A. Bradley's scow "Biggar;" that he did so by J. B. Smith's orders; that his time was returned to the canal office, and that he was paid as if working for the Government. This evidence is uncontradicted. In defence, Mr. Rykert called A. Bradley, the owner of the scow "Biggar." His evidence appears at page 1736. He swears that Walton was the only Government employé that was helping him to put a false bottom in the scow; but I knew better, and in rebuttal I called Edward Smith, a carpenter, who said (page 2360) that he and other Government employés helped Walton to put a false bottom in the scow "Biggar," and got their pay at the canal office as if they had been working for the Government. My statement last Session was that it was alleged that men employed on the Welland Canal were doing work for outside parties and were paid as if working for the Government. I think it is clearly proved by the evidence taken before the commissioner that I was justified in making the charge. I am sorry that the evidence discloses such a state of affairs on the Welland Canal, and I can only hope that no other public work in Canada is mismanaged to a similar extent.

It being six o'clock, Mr. McCallum moved that the debate be adjourned until Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (13) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company." (Mr. Read, in the absence of Mr. Ogilvie).

THE WALKER DIVORCE CASE.

HON. MR. SANFORD moved the adoption of the report of the Select Committee on Divorce re the petition of Emily Walker. He said: In view of the statements made by the chairman of the committee that it merely refers to an omission on the point of collusion and connivance, I ask that the report be adopted.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I was surprised to find that this report did not contain the objection that I made before the committee. Rule "J" requires the committee to report upon "the petition, the proposed Bill, &c." Now, I felt that by concurring in the statement that the Bill was sufficient I would be committing myself to the position that if the allegations in the Bill, as connected with the petition, were proved, the petitioner would be entitled to a divorce. I was not prepared then, and I am not prepared now, to take such a position. It is doubtful, even if the allegations in the Bill can be proved, if we can grant a divorce in this case. I contended in the committee, and I contend now, that when we report that a Bill is not only regular, but sufficient, that we declare that if the allegations of the Bill are sustained it should pass. When persons who are under age choose to go through a mockery of the marriage ceremony they have no right to come to this House and ask us to dissolve the tie when they discover that it is binding. The question is, whether this is not a case which the courts of Ontario should take cognizance of. If they can, this Parliament has no right to interfere. In Ontario there is a court which can grant a divorce a mensa et thoro and also to decree alimony. If they have power to declare that this was no marriage from the beginning we should have a decision on that point from the court. If they should decide that there was no marriage we cannot grant a divorce. I want to keep myself straight on this question. I expected that the report would contain a note of my objection, but as it does not I want to define my position. The report declares that the Bill is regular, and it seems to me that, in a matter of doubt, we are pre-judging the case by saying that if the allegations of the petition and Bill are sustained before the committee a divorce should be granted. I am not prepared to say how I shall vote after a full consideration of the matter, but I wish the House to hesitate before adopting the report. I should like to have the views of the leader of the Senate on the subject. I do not think we intended, when we adopted the new rules, that a preliminary report of the committee, like this before us, should commit the House to the extent that this does. I do not think that the chairman of the committee expressed an opinion on the matter, but under the rules the committee were obliged to report as they have done.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I have no fault to find with the course that my hon. friend has taken, and I am quite sure that he has set himself right, as far as his opinion goes, before the House, differing, as he has correctly stated he did, from the other members of the committee. I am sure he will be satisfied with a statement of his objection and allow this report to be adopted, because it is simply on the defects of the petition. It is merely asking to have the petition made right, according to the rules. If we had not taken that course we should have been receiving a petition and confirming a Bill improperly. Therefore, I think the report should be adopted. We have had two or three cases already of this kind where no objection was taken. Still, I have my own opinion, and I reserve it, as my hon. friend has done. I do not know but we may be found standing together when the case comes before the House; but we have not reached that point yet, and I think I shall be best consulting the convenience of the Senate by saying no more on the subject now. I hope the House will adopt the report.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6:10 p.m.

THE SENATE.

NEW SENATOR.

HON. MR. MASSON was introduced, and having taken the oath and signed the roll, took his seat.

THE HUDSON BAY ROUTE

INQUIRY.

HON. MR. BOULTON rose to—Call the attention of the House and of the Government to the great advantages that would accrue to the Dominion of Canada at large from the construction of a railway from some point on the Canadian Pacific Railway to a terminus on the west coast of Hudson Bay, and to the great desirability of the immediate construction of such an important work; and inquire if it is the intention of the Government to undertake such a work?

He said: In bringing this question before the Senate it is for the purpose, coming, as I do, from the North-West Territories, of pointing out to the people of eastern Canada the importance that is attached to the construction of this road in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, and also to endeavor to disabuse the minds of many of the idea that the construction of the railway will be detrimental to the interest of the eastern Provinces. My opinion of the wisdom of bringing this matter before the Senate was confirmed by a remark made by one of my hon. friends when I told him of the motion I was bringing forward. He said he thought the project of navigating Hudson Bay was one of the greatest chimeras of the time. He followed up his observation by stating that the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway would divert trade from eastern channels into a northern channel. These observations confirmed me more than ever in my opinion that it was necessary to bring the subject before the Senate, through which any legislation must pass in connection with construction or assistance given towards the construction of that road. I shall not go into the early history of the discovery of Hudson Bay and subsequent explorations that have taken place in connection with it, but I may say that the history of that great inland sea is of very great interest indeed. I will merely confine myself to stating that the first mention of Hudson Bay that we have, I believe, in the history of the country, is when Capt. Davis, on his return from the northern straits to which he gave his name, passed the entrance to Hudson Strait and conveyed the information home. That was in 1587. The information that he took home with him brought out Capt. Waymouth in 1602. He did not succeed in penetrating the straits but got sufficient information to know that the straits existed. He was followed by Capt. Hudson in 1610, who successfully passed through the straits and into Hudson Bay. Capt. Hudson's name is indelibly printed upon the geography of this country. To him we owe the name of that great bay which I believe and pray is yet to be the scene of a great hive of industry in the carrying trade of Canada. He gave his name to the great territory east and south of it and to the Hudson Bay Co., which has been trading in that country for 200 years, and he is now about to give his name to the railway which I hope will soon connect the settled portion of Manitoba and the North West, with that inland sea. Capt. Hudson came in a little ship called the "Discovery," a vessel of only 55 tons burden. The name is most euphonic, so far as the discoveries he made in it are concerned, and his sad end will bring tears to the stoutest heart. In the voyage of 1610, while sailing the bay, his crew mutinied and they turned him adrift with his only son in an open boat. Nothing more has been heard from him from that time to this, but his name has been handed down to posterity as one to be honored, representing those daring hearts that did so much for the opening up and civilization of this continent in those early days—daring explorers, whose deeds are paralleled in the present day by those of Stanley in Africa, and, as we have lately seen, by two young ladies who girdled the world in the shortest space of time—72 days. Taking these two different extremes only shows what we have arrived at, so far as civilization and progress are concerned. It is further interesting to know that the Hudson Bay Railway is designed to compete for the traffic which finds its outlet by a route bearing Hudson's name also, in the south. It is designed to compete for the trade that finds its way by the Erie Canal and down to the Hudson River—that beautiful river whose banks are now lined by the handsome villas of the wealthy and cultured people of the United States. Now hardy Canadians are called upon to develop a route for the trade and traffic of this northern country by the northern estuary which bears his name. In bringing this matter before you, hon. gentleman, I will confine myself to certain facts in order that you may draw your own conclusions from them as to the practicability of navigating Hudson Bay. I will take first of all Mr. Gordon's report, and I may say that so far as that report is concerned I consider it as one which was made by an officer who felt that he had the responsibility of a Government upon his shoulders, so far as his statement was concerned, and who felt the necessity of extreme caution in any statements he might make that would have the effect of introducing capital into or keeping it out of the country, so far as this route was concerned, and, therefore, I consider his report was a conservative and cautious one, made after having withdrawn from all the posts of observations placed there for two consecutive years and after he had wound up all the work he was called upon to perform in the exploration of Hudson Bay, in the two vessels the "Neptune" and the "Alert." In his final report he says that in his opinion the navigation of the strait was practicable and available for three months in the year, and possibly four months—from the 15th July to the 15th October—that the first fortnight in July and the last fortnight in October the navigation might be available, but it was risky and doubtful. As I have explained, his report is surrounded with all the caution that a gentleman occupying the position that he did should have observed. We have another report here from one of his observers, a Mr. Tyrrell. It is in the shape of an official report. What he has stated appears in the report of Lieutenant Gordon, and is used in combatting the arguments of a gentleman who was opposing the practicability of navigating Hudson Bay. In a letter to the press, among other things he says:—

"From observations taken at Ashe Inlet, where the channel is narrower than at any other place, and hence where ice jams are most likely to occur, I found nothing to interfere with navigation during the months of July, August, September and October, and that for another month vessels would, with the chance of some delay, be able to make their trips."

That is his evidence; and he was an officer who had spent a year at Ashe Inlet and who is giving his opinion as a private individual, living in Hamilton at the time he wrote this letter. He further goes on to say there would be no unusual danger in navigating those straits at full speed from four to five months in the year. Further, it is mentioned in his report that the steamer "Arctic," one of the whaling steamers that comes from Boston annually, entered the straits by Ashe Inlet on the 5th of June and tied up to the ice in front of the post and reported that they had come in on the 5th of June without any obstruction. The steamer "Arctic" passed into Hudson Bay and went on with its fishing expedition and went out of Hudson Bay on the 2nd week of June without meeting with any mishap, and for aught I know has been doing the same thing from year to year ever since. From that it is clear to my mind that to a properly equipped steamer the navigation of the straits is practicable for a longer period than we have been accustomed to believe in the past. I will take another report, that of Capt. Markham, an able officer, who has his professional reputation at stake, and who was invited by the Hudson Bay Railway Company, to whom the Government had given a promise to send two officers, to accompany the expedition, in order that they might make a report for their own private information. Capt. Markham was one of those officers invited by the president of the Hudson Bay Railway Company, and he went on the steamer "Alert" and made the trip in the year 1886. He has made most voluminous remarks in the report upon the question, not only to the president of the Hudson Bay Railway Company, but in the English magazines, and by reading papers before the Geographical Society in London. But I will confine myself, merely, so far as his report is concerned, to this one point:—

"Looking at it from a perfectly impartial point of view, and having very carefully considered the matter in all its bearings, it appears to be an incontrovertible fact that the establishment of a sea port, some 800 miles nearer to Winnipeg than Montreal (the nearest port at which goods can now be shipped and transhipped), must be of the greatest possible value and importance to the extensive wheat-bearing and cattle-producing country which claims Winnipeg as its commercial centre."

Capt. Markham further goes on to make the following quotation from Sir Edward Parry, who was a noted explorer in 1835 or 1836:—

"Long experience has brought those who frequent this navigation to the conclusion that, in most seasons, no advantage is to be gained by attempting to enter Hudson Strait earlier than the first week in July. The annual disruption of the ice, which occupies the upper and middle parts of the strait, is supposed not to take place till about this time. In the course of one single year's experience in these parts we have seen nothing to recommend a practice different from that at present pursued by the ships of the Hudson Bay Company."

Capt. Markham then adds:

"I heartily concur with every word in this quotation, for it so exactly corresponds with my own experience. But the fact must not be overlooked that this advice is addressed to those who attempt the navigation of the strait in sailing ships. Steam has made a great revolution in ice navigation. A well-found steamer is able to make her way with ease through the ice encountered in Hudson Strait in June and July, when a sailing ship would be hopelessly beset and incapable of pushing on. With regard to the practice pursued by the ships of the Hudson Bay Company, allued to by Sir Edward Parry, it stands to reason that the captains of those ships would actually delay their passage across the Atlantic, so as not to reach the strait before July or August; for they are well aware that every extra day spent on the passage is a day nearer the disruption of the ice. Their experience tells them that a policy of waiting is wisest, until the chances are more in their favor of getting through without hindrance from the ice.

"I have in my possession an official record of the voyages out and home of the Hudson Bay Conpany's ship 'Prince Rupert' for a period of eleven consecutive years, namely, from 1835 to 1846, inclusive. I find that the average time of getting through the strait in the outward voyages during this period (and it must not be forgotten that the strait is 500 miles in length) was 16 days. The longest time was 31 days, when there was probably an exceptionally bad ice year. The shortest time was 8 days. But the delays in getting through the strait were caused by calms and adverse winds, and not by the ice. On the homeward passage no difficulties were met with from ice in the strait, and the vessel usually reached London in about five weeks after leaving York Factory. The earliest date for sailing from York Factory was the 6th of September, and the latest the 3rd of October. In the latter case the 'Prince Rupert' was 38 days on the passage to London; so that it is impossible she could have had any serious detention from ice in the strait.

"It must be remembered that this vessel, and all others then employed by the Hudson Bay Company, were sailing ships, dependent entirely upon sails for their motive power. Without wind they were helpless; with a foul wind their progress was of course proportionately slow. Wind, therefore, was a matter of the first importance in those days, when a vessel was endeavoring to make way through floes of loose ice; for when the wind falls the ice invariably loosens, or, as the technical expression is, 'goes aboard.' But under such circumstances the unfortunate sailing vessel, being deprived of its only propelling force, is unable to take advantage of the ice being loose to push on. On the other hand, when a breeze springs up, which on ordinary occasions would possibly enable her to make good way, the wind has the effect of packing the ice, thus rendering progress nearly impossible.

"Steam has now, however, effected a complete revolution in ice navigation, and the most advantageous time for pushing on is, of course, in calm weather, when the ice is loose. Under similar conditions a sailing vessel would be utterly hopeless. It is, therefore, only reasonable to infer that what has been performed regularly, and year after year, by sailing ships, can be accomplished with greater regularity and certainty by well-found steamers, specially constructed for ice navigation, and provided with powerful machinery. A channel which has been navigated for 270 years, first by the frail little fly-boats of the seventeenth century, then by the bluff-bowed, slow-sailing, exporting vessels of Parry's days, and for a long period by the Hudson Bay Company ships, cannot be very formidable, and if sailing ships can annually pass through it a fortiori steamers will find less difficulty in doing so. But it would, of course, be necessary that such steamers should be specially built and equipped for the service, and it is desirable that despatch should be used in making the voyage.

"The result of all the experience, gathered from voyages during two centuries, and from observation at the stations, is that Hudson Strait is perfectly navigable and free from ice in August and later in the season. It must be remembered that this passage has been successfully accomplished nearly every year for the last two centuries, while the vessels which have been employed on the service have been ordinary sailing ships, dependent entirely on wind and weather. It is very rare indeed that they have failed to get through, and still more rare that any of them have been destroyed by the ice. It appears from the official records of the Hudson Bay Company that Moose Factory, on the southern shore of the bay, has been visited annually by a ship since 1735, with but one exception, namely in 1779, when the vessel for once failed to achieve the passage of the strait. The percentage of losses by wreckage among the vessels employed in the Hudson Bay is far less than would have to be recorded in a like number of ships engaged in general ocean traffic. Since the keel of Hudson's good ship the 'Discovery' ploughed the waters of the strait the passage has been made over 500 times, whilst the losses due to the ice might be summed up on the fingers of one hand; for some of these losses were due to causes with which the ice had nothing to do—for instance, the recent loss of the 'Cams Owen' was in no way connected with the ice."

These two clauses, I think, contain a statement of the main difficulties with which the navigation of Hudson Straits has been surrounded in our minds. As Capt. Markham says there, only sailing vessels have had the experience, so far, of the navigation of these straits, and when it calms and the ice is loose, conditions which would be favorable for a steamer pushing its way through, a sailing vessel, having no propelling force, is stopped. But the steamers that are now to be had would overcome these difficulties, and the very calm which loosens the ice would be the means of enabling them to navigate these straits for a much longer period than we have any idea of. So far as the navigation of James' Bay is concerned, there are difficulties, I believe, in connection with it, on account of the bay being shallow; but the northern portion of Hudson Bay is a deep sea, and one remarkable feature about it is that its temperature is 14 degrees higher than the temperature of Lake Superior. One drawback is that there are not many harbors available on the west coast of the bay, but there is one very fine harbor at the mouth of the Churchill River, which I find is equal to the harbor of St. John, Nfld.—a magnificent harbor with a narrow opening. The difficulties that we will have to contend with in utilizing that harbor are very much reduced, owing to the fact that it is the mouth of one of the great rivers which drain the North-West Territories, and the warmth of its waters keeps the channel open into the harbor very often as late as the month of January. However, such is the experience that Canadians have developed of late years in utilizing winter navigation, and such are the scientific appliances that Canadians have been able to bring to bear to overcome the difficulties of winter navigation, that it removes a great many of the obstacles which we feared we had to deal with in the navigation of Hudson Bay—that is, getting in and out earlier in the season and later in the fall—and we have the experience of the steamer "Stanley," that is now used in the winter navigation of the Northumberland Straits. I understand from Capt. Welsh, who comes from there, and is thoroughly acquainted with the navigation of the Northumberland Straits, that the "Stanley" is capable of breaking ice 2 feet thick and making a speed of 2½ knots an hour at the same time. Now, that is a remarkable instance of what the appliances of science, and experience and pluck on the part of the people who are called upon to face these questions, can accomplish in dealing with physical difficulties. Therefore, I say we will learn still more in the way of navigating our northern waters by applying larger experience and greater enterprise to the question. I hope myself that the day will come when we will have a much longer period of navigation on Lake Superior. It is a matter of enormous importance to the North-West Territories, because we want a cheap mode of getting away the heavy produce which we are capable of producing in such quantities in that country. The development of Manitoba and the North-West Territories depends largely upon the facilities furnished for transportation and the economy with which we can bring our produce to the seaboard. We are an inland country, depending entirely, for a large portion of the distance, on railway communication. We cannot, as you can, for a large portion of the year, avail ourselves of the magnificent inland water communication which enables you to ship such enormous quantities of freight in a short space of time and at low rates. We are dependent upon railway communication for our traffic, and it is therefore of the utmost importance that the cost of carrying our produce should be reduced to as low a limit as possible by legitimate commercial means, which is competition and opposition in the carrying trade of the country. I would here point out to you that the advantages of developing this route have not been lost sight of by our friends south of us, who are deeply interested with us in the question of providing outlets for the produce of our country. Senator Davis, in pressing upon the attention of the United States Senate the necessity of enlarging and improving the Sault St. Marie Canal in order that an outlet might be found for the enormous increasing trade that is annually passing by that route, said :—

"It greatly concerns our own interests in another respect that we promptly second the endeavors of personal and corporate enterprise that I have mentioned, by at once increasing the capacity of the improvements of the St. Mary's River, so that it will not be for the interest of the people of Canada to develop, or for the intetest of our own north-western States to encourage the opening of a new outlet to the markets of the world—an outlet wholly outside our own boundaries, and which, while it will benefit greatly a large portion of our own country, we cannot in the least degree control. I refer to the outlet to tide water on the western coast of the Hudson Bay. This is no mere theory. It has been a demonstrated fact for more than two hundred years. The country north of the international boundary up to the fifty-sixth parallel of north latitude and east of the Rocky Mountains, to and including the Province of Manitoba, contains about one hundred millions of acres, a large portion of which is well suited for the production of cereals. The northern portion, known as the Peace River district, owing to the depression of the Rocky Mountains, has quite the same climate as the southern part, and is equally fertile. Immigration is invading this immense region, and the time is not far distant when it will be enormously productive.

"From the Minnesota line to Churchill, on the western shore of the Hudson Bay, the distance is less than eight hundred miles. Of this distance more than one-third is occupied by Lake Winnipeg, having a navigable area nearly equal to that of Lake Erie. It drains with its tributaries a basin of about four hundred thousand square miles. Churchill has an excellent harbor. It is as near to Liverpool by the way of a ship as is New York city. It is nearer to Liverpool by sixty-four miles than is Montreal. As to the distance from the city of Winnipeg to Liverpool, the saving is therefore substantially the whole distance from Montreal to Winnipeg. It is equal to 1,291 miles by way of Lake Superior, or 1,698 miles by way of Chicago. From Winnipeg south to the international boundary line at Gretna is sixty-nine miles. This is the shortest possible route to tide water for the great wheat-growing regions of the North-West, both in the United States and Canada."

There is one man, amongst our nearest neighbors (who are certainly not behind the world in either intelligence, experience or enterprise) who thinks this project deserves some consideration at the present moment. He was urging upon his friends the necessity of deepening the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, which I consider almost one of the wonders of the world to-day. The traffic on that canal has increased from three and a-half millions of tons in 1885 up to seven and a-half millions of tons in 1889; and not only that, but it exceeds to-day the traffic of the great Suez Canal. Just think of it! That country, west of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, has developed already a greater trade than the world's traffic passing through the Suez Canal. Is it any wonder that those of us who come from the North-West Territories should feel the necessity of bestirring ourselves in order to find suitable outlets for the produce which we are capable of growing, and for the development of an industry which is yet only in its infancy? The traffic of our Territories has been, of course, and is yet very variable. We are the most northern country on this continent that has ventured upon the production of cereals, and we have a great deal to overcome, a great deal to learn, before we perfect our capabilities of producing in that western country. I should like to bring to your notice the fact that when all the conditions were favorable to the production of cereals in that western country, when by the bounty of Providence the greatest advantages were showered upon us to enable us to produce a good crop in 1887, I believe that we produced a crop that had been unheard of in the world's history before. There were 16,000 farmers in that country, many of them, most likely, only homesteaders—men who are put down as farmers, because they are entered in the Dominion land book as homesteaders, and possibly each one of them may not have had more than 5 or 10 acres under cultivation. I do not know what proportion of those 16,000 farmers were in that position, but I can say from my own personal knowledge that very many of them were homesteaders.

Notwithstanding that, these 16,000 farmers produced 12,000,000 bushels of wheat and 2,000,000 bushels of coarse grain, or nearly 1,000 bushels for each farmer in that country. That was sown, reaped, harvested, marketed and, I was going to say, exported; but that is where the rub comes in. We had very great difficulty indeed in exporting our grain that year, because the facilities of the Canadian Pacific Railway were not sufficient at that time to meet the requirements of the people in exporting their produce. I will give the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. credit for making the most noble efforts; all the hon. gentlemen who come from the North-West will bear testimony to that fact. At that time they were having a great fight on the question of monopoly, and it was essential to the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that they should prove that they could carry the crop of the country themselves and that another route was not necessary at the time. But a bounteous Providence and the enterprise of the people were such that grain was shoved on the Canadian Pacific Railway faster than the company were able to take it away. A great deal of that was owing to the difficulties that they had to encounter in the months of January and February from snow storms north of Lake Superior; but still that was the fact, that the Canadian Pacific Railway was not sufficient to meet the requirements of the people in 1887. Then, in addition to that, what do we see now? The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are carrying a very large amount of traffic from Minneapolis—something like 10,000 cars of grain that they are taking from Minneapolis to the seaboard, and therefore they have this additional trade and traffic to tax their energies in carrying the products of that North-West country. I do not mention this in the way of finding fault, as some have done, with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for having penetrated to Minneapolis and taken freight from that point, in order to bring grist to their mill and capture the trade of those western States. I think myself that if they have to cut rates and compete with other corporations in that neighborhood they are perfectly justified in doing so, in order that they may get traffic to support their road for their own benefit and for the benefit of the people of Canada. I know myself in the North-West, if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had to depend on the trade that we are able at the present time to give them, they could not afford the magnificent service that they provide at present—a daily train, splendidly equipped, hardly ever late, from the Atlantic to British Columbia. That is an advantage that we do not overlook, but it is an advantage that is only gained by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company drawing foreign trade to its road. Competition is natural in our country; the enterprise and intelligence of our people will lead them to look for the best and cheapest routes to the seaboard. We are going on developing our country under great difficulties. All of us have many disadvantages to contend with in that western country. Want of experience, want of means and natural conditions keep us back, and we do not go ahead quite as fast as we would like to go; but the country is making good, substantial progress, and we are building comfortable homes for ourselves. New railways are being constructed, and in four or five years hence the trade of that country will have increased enormously. We are now building a line from Regina to Prince Albert. Not a bushel of grain produced at Prince Albert has ever found its way out, because there has been no railway to carry it. We are building 250 or 300 miles of road from Regina to Prince Albert which will open up a tract of land where there is a settlement already that will provide traffic at once. Then there is the North-West Central, and a road which is being built from Calgary to Edmonton, a feeder that will develop a large tract of country in which people will settle. There is also the road which is going down to Montana, and goodness knows how far it will penetrate in that direction, which will be a feeder to the Canadian Pacific Railway. When you consider what the effect of the construction of these feeders will be and the consequent development of the country, and the increase of traffic, you can easily realize what the possibilities will be in the next four or five years. An enormous traffic will be thrown on that road which will be beyond the power and capacity of that road to carry.

HON. MR. READ—Double track, then.

HON. MR. BOULTON—I would be very glad indeed to see the track doubled, but we want to get to navigation. We want to be able to export as much of our traffic by water as possible. We have to utilize the railroads to a certain extent, but the most economical way is by navigation. When we can get our grain to Port Arthur for 8 or 9 cents we can export it by way of Montreal, but not until then. That is why we are pressing the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway on the attention of the country. The Hudson Bay route may not be available early in the spring of the year, but that is not a matter of much importance to us. What we desire is to export as large an amount of our crop in the fall of the year as possible, because by that means we save the cost of storage, interest and shrinkage, which, I believe, will average about 10 cents a bushel. That is a very large percentage of saving to the farmers of the country. It would enable them to distribute amongst themselves 10 cents on every bushel of wheat that they lose now, and they would be so much more prosperous, and through their prosperity the whole country would be benefited. I fully believe that with the scientific applicances that we have for winter navigation, if we had the Hudson Bay Railway we could utilize the route by Hudson Straits well on into the month of November every year. I know that the insurance companies put up their rates after the first of November, and they must realize that up to that date, at all events, the dangers incidental to navigation are not very great. I believe myself that we will be able to utilize the Hudson Bay route up to the middle of November, and possibly latter in the year. Therefore, you can realize the advantage it would be to the North-West Territories and to the Province of Manitoba to find an outlet by which they could transport a portion of their crop in the fall of the year, before heavy loss has to be incurred in holding it over. This year we shipped only three millions of bushels by way of Port Arthur, but even that three millions, so heavy was the traffic on Lake Superior, and so great the demand for vessels engaged in other traffic, we found it difficult to ship. There was almost a block of grain in Port Arthur for want of vessels to take it away, and the capabilities of the Canadian Pacific Railway to carry more than a certain amount of grain to Port Arthur by a stated period (say, the middle of November) are limited; but if we had this other outlet by way of Hudson Bay we could ship probably four or five millions of bushels in the fall of the year. Now, at 10 cents a bushel the saving on five millions of bushels would represent $500,000 a year to the people of the North-West Territories—they would gain that much by being able to transport that quantity of wheat by the northern route, instead of paying all rail rates to the Atlantic ports or holding it over until the opening of navigation in the following spring. That is a most important point to us, and stimulates us to put forth every energy in order to accomplish the object for which we have been working and striving for several years past. We have difficulties to encounter in our Province, because we are not possessed of our Crown lands. We have not the public resources to undertake a work of that kind in the same way that you have down here. We have no revenue of any description, except the income which we are allowed by the law of the country. We have no public resources within ourselves, and, therefore, we have to appeal to the enterprise and generosity of the people in the east to assist us in the construction of this road. All that has been done, so far, is to offer a land grant, amounting to six or eight millions of acres of land, as an assistance to the construction of that road, and so far we have not been able to accomplish anything with that assistance. The railway company has been organized, and has been making an effort to get capital for several years past, but the land grant has not been sufficient. We have not yet found that any land grant in that western country, even when the lands were situated in the most fertile portions of the North-West, has been sufficient to attract capital to build a single mile of railway. The Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company, whose line passes through what I think is the garden of the North-West, and whose lands are situated all along the railway, could not raise money in Europe to build the road. They had to get the Provincial Government to guarantee $6,400 a mile on their bonds, taking the land grant as a security for the repayment of the guarantee, but until the Provincial Government gave that guarantee to the Manitoba and North-Western, the Manitoba and South-Western, and other railways projected there, they were not able to raise money in Europe to build a mile of road, because the capitalists will not take the whole responsibility of developing that country. Similar difficulties present themselves when the gentlemen who are interested in the Hudson Bay Railway make an effort to promote the construction of their road. For that reason, we are al. anxious either that the Dominion Government should undertake the work as a national highway, which it really is, penetrating the interior of the continent and carrying, not only our trade, but traffic from the neighboring Republic; or, if they do not feel in a position to undertake the construction of the road as a national work, they should give assistance of such a practical character that it will enable private capitalists to take hold of it and carry on the construction of the road.

HON. MR. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell me how many miles long the proposed road is?

HON. MR. BOULTON—The proposed road is 700 miles long from Winnipeg to Churchill.

HON. MR. POWER—A little longer than the Intercolonial Railway.

HON. MR. BOULTON—Yes; a little longer. There is just one other point that I wish to dwell upon, and that is that the construction of this road would not be against the interests of the people of eastern Canada.

HON. MR. DEVER—It will be no loss to the eastern Provinces to lose their traffic.

HON. MR. BOULTON—It will not, for this reason: that under the most favorable circumstances, according to all the reports, the navigation of Hudson Straits lasts for about four months of the year, and therefore any development that takes place in consequence of the construction of that road must benefit the eastern Provinces for eight months of the year, because the freight must find its outlet eastward by the Canadian Pacific Railway for two-thirds of the years. If that northern route is developed it will help to build up the North-West Territory, and thereby increase the traffic from that country; and I cannot see, therefore, that the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway can injure the people of eastern Canada. Again, all the money that we earn by our industry in producing wheat, fat cattle, oil cake and other products of that country, is spent down here in eastern Canada. Ninety per cent. of the goods sold in our country stores we purchase in the eastern Provinces.

HON. MR. POWER—But they would not be purchased in the eastern Provinces if this road were constructed.

HON. MR. BOULTON—Why? Of course they would! Do you suppose it is the cost of transportation that keeps foreign goods out? It is the National Policy that keeps them out. We have at present, in exporting grain to Europe, a cheap route by way of Lake Superior, but we cannot get a sufficient amount of grain out by that route to meet our requirements. No competition in traffic will give or deprive you of our trade, because it is preserved to the country by the National Policy. As I said before, the more you develop the North-West, the better the facilities you furnish for promoting its prosperity, the better it will be for the whole Dominion. You must admit that in twenty years we have been trying to develop that country, and though, thank God, we have been able to make comfortable homes for ourselves, we have not done anything that is going to alarm the world, so far as our material prosperity is concerned. It is all to come yet. We hope it will come, but it can only be brought about by the efforts that we want to put forth. I repeat, the development which will result from the opening up of the Hudson Bay route will only deprive these eastern Provinces of any portion of their trade for four months of the year, while they will have the benefit of the extra development of our trade over and above what it is now for eight months of the year. For the Maritime Provinces the opening of that route is of the utmost importance, because it will give them a cheap mode of interchanging trade and traffic with the North-West Territories. A vessel can go from Nova Scotia with iron, coal, or whatever other products they may have to sell us, to Port Churchill, by way of Hudson Straits, and in the most economical way bring back a load of flour, or wheat, or whatever produce of ours they may require. I think I can defy anyone to show that what I say is incorrect—that the cost of taking up the products of the Maritime Provinces to the North-West by way of the Hudson Bay route and bringing back what we are able to produce would be less than by any other route they can find. Although it is the back door of Canada generally, it is going to be the front door for the people of the Maritime Provinces. Although it is the back door, it is, nevertheless, essential to the development of the North-West Territories; and I believe that the time has come when the back door shall be opened, because it will add to the prosperity of the whole country, by drawing through Canadian channels not only the trade of our own country, which is being diverted to foreign channels, but also attracting the trade of the neighboring States to enrich our own people and build up our own country. These are facts that are worthy of consideration in themselves, and as against them you have only to put what you may conceive to be a loss from the diversion of a portion of our trade from your own doors. Although we are all governed more or less by selfish interests and motives, I do not think we should be entirely controlled by them. Whatever tends to benefit any one section of the country is worthy of the consideration of this honorable House. I would, therefore, conclude by expressing the hope that if the Government does not feel disposed to undertake the construction of the Hudson Bay road as a national highway that they may feel able to give such practical assistance to the enterprise as will ensure it construction. I understand from reliable sources that the Hudson Bay Railway Company are in a position to go on with the work, provided they can get practical assistance to enable them to begin the undertaking; and not only are capitalists ready to take hold of the road, but the firm of Millburn & Sons, a steamship company, which does an enormous trade in the Baltic and sends steamers to Archangel, is willing to enter into arrangements with the railway company to provide steamers for the navigation of Hudson Bay, and an insurance company is willing to insure the vessels.

HON. MR. POWER—Where a notice of this sort is given it is not customary to ask the Government to answer the question forthwith. I think that the hon. gentleman, in putting the inquiry in the form in which it is, has opened the subject up for discussion; and it is a question of such importance that it should be discussed before the Government reply. In accordance with the practice of the House, I propose to discuss the matter a little before the leader of the House replies. I think that every hon. gentleman must feel that the remark which I ventured to make at the opening of the Session, that we had in the hon. gentleman who has just sat down a very valuable addition to the speaking power of the House, was well founded. The hon. member has put this case before the House in a very clear and striking way; and if he has failed to carry conviction it is not his fault, but the fault of his case. The hon. gentleman's proposition is that without further inquiry we should forthwith either construct a railway 700 miles long or guarantee the construction of the road—that we should give a guarantee which, under the circumstances, will be equivalent to undertaking to pay for the road. That is the proposition; and, hon. gentlemen who know anything about the Intercolonial Railway and know what it has cost and how it has been regarded in the past by all eastern Canada, can form some idea of what the extent of the hon. gentleman's proposition is. He proposes that we should undertake to spend something like thirty million dollars.

HON. MR. DEVER—Forty millions.

HON. MR. POWER—I wish to be reasonable. It is certainly to spend not less than twenty-five millions, and probably thirty million dollars, in constructing a railway from Winnipeg to Fort Churchill. Now, I think when any company or any member of Parliament makes a proposition of that kind—when he proposes that the Government shall undertake to spend or to guarantee so large a sum of money—he should be prepared with the most conclusive evidence that the scheme upon which that money is to be expended is one which will repay the country for the expenditure. In that point the hon. gentleman has failed. He has not removed doubts which have always existed in the minds of people in eastern Canada as to whether the Hudson Bay route was an available and reliable commercial route. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that a portion of the year's crop might go out each season; and the hon. gentleman, I think, arrived at that conclusion only by straining the evidence which he himself submitted to us. He read the statement of an observer at Ashe Inlet, on the northern side of Hudson Strait. The observer said he thought there was nothing to obstruct the navigation of the strait up to the 1st October, and under favorable circumstances to the 15th October. When the hon. gentleman came later on to practically re-state what he had stated in the beginning of his speech, he said the 1st of November or the middle of November.

HON. MR. BOULTON—I read the months of July, August, September and October.

HON. MR. POWER—I did not so understand the statement of Mr. Tyrrell, whom the hon. gentleman quoted. I thought that the observer spoke in a qualified manner of the latter half of October. As to the evidence of Mr. Tyrrell, I have not examined it very carefully; but it just happens that the observer at Ashe Inlet might not be in a position to speak as conclusively as to the navigation of the strait as an observer at Port Burwell. At Ashe Inlet the ice passing east from Hudson Bay has not been met by the current coming down Davis Strait; and there is a tremendous current and a great deal of ice generally found at the eastern opening of Hudson Strait. The greater part of that ice comes down through Davis Strait, and of course the observer at Ashe Inlet would see very little of that. He would only see the ice from the west go through Hudson Strait. As I have said, the thing which the hon. gentleman is bound to do first, before the Government are in a position to spend any money, or pledge the faith of the country to any expenditure, is to establish the navigability of Hudson Bay and Strait—that is, to establish that they are navigable for practical commercial purposes. In order to do that the hon. member has quoted Mr. Tyrrell, and has given the experience of a steamer called the "Arctic," which I presume from her name was peculiarly fitted to deal with ice, and which got into Hudson Bay during the month of June. He also referred to a report made by Capt. Markham, who appears to have gone in the "Alert," the Canadian Government steamship, as an agent of the promoters of the Hudson Bay Railway Company. We all know that the evidence of a gentleman of that sort is always to be taken with a certain allowance. Without at all saying that Capt. Markham would state what he did not believe to be true, it is always expected that a gentleman who goes out with a strong desire to find a certain thing will generally find that thing. He does not take the impartial view of what he observes that a person should take in a case of this kind. Capt. Markham went to Hudson Bay anxious to find out, if he could, that the route was navigable, so that the company which he represented would be able to place its bonds advantageously in the money markets of the world. Lieut. Parry, afterwards Sir Edward Parry, said that Hudson Straits were open for navigation not earlier than the first week of July. I think that that is probably correct. It is rather singular that the hon. gentleman in submitting to us evidence to show the character of the navigation of Hudson Strait did not submit the report made by the Government officers who were sent out for the express purpose of making enquiry into the subject. The result of these expeditions was felt to be in the negative. The "Neptune" went one year, and the "Alert" I think two years, into Hudson Bay. There were observing stations established at different points, from Port Burwell, at the east end of Hudson Straits, to Churchill; and apparently the net result of all the observations was that this Hudson Bay route was not regarded as a practicable commercial route. The hon. gentleman said that we should remember that the authorities which he cited dealt with sailing vessels, and that steamers could do very much better than sailing vessels. No doubt they can; but we have the experience of the steamer which the Government sent in there. On two occasions, during two voyages, the steamer broke her propeller. On the first voyage of the "Alert"——

HON. MR. BOULTON—It was in consequence of being an auxiliary steamer that the propeller was broken. It was only an auxiliary screw steamer—that is, they pull the screw up and down. The full capacity of the steamer was only 6 knots an hour, in consequence of it having an auxiliary screw; and I believe the accident happened in the pulling of it up and down.

HON. MR. POWER—There was no statement to that effect in the report. The hon. gentleman may have ascertained that the accident happened that way from talking with the commander of the vessel. In reading the report I did not see it so stated. It was said that the propeller was broken in the ice, and the steamer was at the time trying to push her way through the ice; so I presume the propeller must have been in the water and that the hon. gentleman is wrong. In the Spring of 1885, when the "Alert" got to the mouth of Hudson Strait, she found things just as I have stated—that the ice brought down by the Davis Strait current meeting with the ice coming out of Hudson Strait caused such an obstruction that she was not able to get in; and the steamer backed and filled for some weeks off the mouth of the strait, and ultimately, after sustaining damage from ice, was obliged to go to St. John's, Nfld., for repairs.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—When was this?

HON. MR. POWER—In the month of June. This was a steamer that was not constructed for Arctic service, but was a sealer, and constructed with a view of dealing with ice.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The "Alert" was an Arctic steamer. The "Neptune" was a sealing steamer.

HON. MR. POWER—I do not propose to deal with this question of the navigation of Hudson Strait any further, except to say that I think enough has been shown to cause very great doubt as to the practicability of that route for commercial purposes. No doubt, strongly-built vessels can get in and out probably without any reasonable risk, for two months in the year; but beyond that there is no certainty of their getting in and out; and if a vessel cannot get out later than the middle of September, then she is of no use for carrying out that season's crop. That fact must be borne in mind.

Now, let us suppose that the case is as the hon. member puts it. Let us suppose that everything is as he says—that under favorable circumstances the straits can be navigated until the 1st of November, and that a certain portion of crop—I think the hon. gentleman said five million bushels could be taken out; and that—I presume he made a pretty liberal allowance—the saving to the people of the North-West would be about five hundred thousand dollars a year. What would be the cost of the road to the country? If that road cost twenty-five million dollars, as it probably would——

HON. MR. BOULTON—Fifteen millions is the outside estimate.

HON. MR. POWER—No one in Canada pays attention to the estimated cost of railways. A railway of 700 miles long cannot be built in such a country as that for twenty thousand dollars a mile. All North-West railway companies that we incorporate to build railways over the prairie, through good lands, and with a favorable climate, take power to bond their roads for twenty thousand dollars a mile; and it is out of the question to say that a railroad leading through such a country as that which intervenes between Winnipeg and the Hudson Bay coast, where supplies would be so costly and where work could be carried on for such a comparatively short period during each year, could be built for any such price. I am satisfied that the road will cost about as much as the original construction of the Intercolonial Railway. It cannot be built for less than twenty-five million dollars; and that is a large sum to pay for the purpose of saving half a million dollars a year to the people of the North-West. There is another way of looking at the matter. Supposing that the road was built and was operated until, say the 1st of November. Let us consider what the business of that road would be during the months of July and August—that is, if the previous year's crop was carried out during the year in which it was harvested, the road would have little to do in the way of carrying anything to Fort Churchill. It would have something to do probably in September and October. After the 1st of November there would be no business for the road until the 1st of July. Now, I think that if the hon. gentleman and his friends who propose to build that road will stop to inquire they will find that if they wish to make that road pay they will have to charge high rates for the time it will be in operation. To make an investment of twenty-five million dollars in that road profitable they would have to charge such rates that the people of the North-West would find it a good deal cheaper to send their wheat out by the existing routes. But then we do not propose to depend upon existing routes, because—and I was rather surprised that the hon. gentleman did not refer to the fact when speaking of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal—the Canadian Government are now engaged in the construction of a canal at Sault Ste. Marie for the express purpose of affording an outlet, independent of the United States, for the produce of the North-West through our own territory; and the hon. gentleman's proposal is to try and neutralize the work that the Government are doing there by sending grain out by another route.

HON. MR. BOULTON—I propose to increase its outlets.

HON. MR. POWER—That is the way it strikes me. The hon. gentleman has called on us to be up and stirring on behalf of the North-West. I think we have been stirring for a good while, but it is seemingly a case of "hope on, hope ever." We have built the Canadian Pacific Railway; we have given the Northern Pacific admission into that country in order to afford the farmers the competition which they think necessary; we are now engaged in the construction of a canal which will cost us $5,000,000, for the purpose of affording an additional exit for the grain of that country. We have spent altogether, I presume, not less than $100,000,000 on behalf of the North-West. Now, just when we begin to realize some little advantage from this tremendous expenditure, the people of the North-West, through the hon. gentleman, come in and tell us to cut our own throats commercially—to render useless the expenditure which has taken place. The hon. gentleman, by some process of reasoning that I was not quite able to follow, undertook to prove to us that the trade of the remaining eight months, when this route would not be available even if opened, would be greater than the trade of the whole twelve months if the road were not built.

HON. MR. BOULTON—Hear, hear.

HON. MR. POWER—By what process of reasoning he arrived at that conclusion I am not able to understand.

HON. MR. DEVER—The whole is less than its parts.

HON. MR. POWER—It is really a case of the part being greater than the whole. In reply to an inquiry of mine, the hon. gentleman said that the increased importations which the farmers of the North-West would be able to make would benefit the importers of Montreal and other eastern cities. The hon. gentleman said that owing to their increased prosperity the people of the North-West would deal more largely than now with manufacturers and importers of the east. I do not see the thing in that way; because, even though, as the hon. gentleman has said, the National Policy does keep out many English goods, it still lets in many goods from England and the United States; and if we shorten the distance, the lower freight rates from England would render English competition with Canadian manufacturers and dealers much keener, and those ships coming out for grain would carry goods from England to Fort Churchill at very low rates indeed. I fail to see, then, that the hon. gentleman has established that we can get anything in return for the expenditure on this road. I was pained to hear the hon. gentleman tell us that, after twenty years of generous, lavish expenditure by the people of old Canada on behalf of the North-West, so far they have realized nothing.

HON. MR. BOULTON—I did not say that. I said we had realized comfortable homes, but so far as wealth was concerned we had realized nothing.

HON. MR. POWER—I understood the hon. gentleman to intimate that they had not realized what they had expected, and that things were not in the condition in which they ought to be by any means. I am surprised to hear a statement of that kind from him. If it had been made by a member of the party to which I belong he would immediately have been condemned for crying down the country; but when that sentiment is uttered by a loyal Conservative it is considered praiseworthy. I wonder how long this cry is to continue. We have been spending money like water on the North-West—how long is it to continue? I for one feel that, so far as we in the east are concerned, we have done our duty by the North-West, and that we shall continue to do our duty; but that, having given the North-West Territories ample means of access to the Pacific and Atlantic oceans, and to the country east, west and south of themselves, we have done our duty, and we are not bound to give them communication by rail with the North Pole or any region short of the Pole in that direction. I think we are not unfair in assuming that position. I do not know whether or not my sentiments are those of the majority of the people in the east; but my feeling about the matter is, that if by-and-by the population of the North-West increases and feels cabined, cribbed and confined in its trade for want of an outlet by way of the Hudson Bay, then we shall have no objection to that population making an outlet for itself; but why we, whom they propose to injure, should be asked to deprive ourselves of the small results that have accrued from a vast expenditure, is something I cannot understand. We are perfectly willing that they should do it. As one of the members of this House, I shall be prepared to give them all the facilities that Parliament can afford to construct a road; but I think it is a work which should be done at the expense of the people for whose benefit it is intended, and not at our expense. I observed recently that the Manitoba Legislature withdrew the offer of certain aid which they at one time proposed to give this road. That would look as though the people most directly interested in the undertaking had come to the conclusion, either that the scheme was not a practicable one, or that the game was not worth the candle—that it would cost more than it was worth. I think it would. I think to build 700 miles of road in order to give 150,000 people an outlet for two or three months of the year by way of the Hudson Bay would be really a case where the game was not worth the candle; and I do not hesitate to express the hope that the Government do not propose to build the Hudson Bay road themselves or to use the public money of the Dominion for the purpose of subsidizing such a road.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—When the subject of utilizing the Hudson Bay for the purpose of opening up a route to the North-West was discussed in this Chamber, I was quite a strong supporter of the project, and I am yet. I believe it is necessary and that it will be found practicable in the end for commercial purposes. My hon. friend from Halifax is illogical. He first says that this road would be useless—that it would not be practicable for commerce—that it would be spending so much money for nothing—that it would not take the trade which the people of the North-West believe it would; and the next moment he complains that it would divert trade from the Maritime Provinces and take it by that route.

HON. MR. POWER—I said that if it were a practicable scheme that would be the effect of it.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—My hon. friend reasoned that it would have the effect of paralyzing the trade of existing channels. My hon. friend went further, and said that if we had closer commercial relations with Europe it would interfere with the trade of this country. We are trying to get more direct and rapid communication with England, in order to help the trade of this country. Now, if we have spent $100,000,000 on the North-West—and I do not believe we spent two-thirds of that amount—no money was ever invested in any country from which greater advantages have been derived. It has opened up a country with immense capabilities—a country whose future we cannot realize, and whose resources we have not yet appreciated. Not only ourselves, but all Europe and especially England, are alive to the importance of the development of our country, and Canada will never be what it should be until we have a larger population in the North-West Territories. My hon. friend spoke of Manitoba: that is not all of the North-West; it is but a small portion of that vast country, and if Manitoba, out of its small revenue, feels unable to expend the large amount of money which would be necessary to make this undertaking a complete success, it is unfair to say that it is regarded as impracticable there. I believe that Manitoba is now alive to the advantages which would result from the construction of that railway, and is willing to contribute a large proportion of the expense of opening up the route. The hon. gentleman from Halifax says that with our North-West it is "hope on, hope ever." If the hon. gentlemen who are opposed to the Government had succeeded in their policy where would the Pacific Railway be now? They prophesied that the road would not be built for forty years; they said that the resources of the country were not sufficient to complete it, and that if it were built it would not pay for the grease on the wheels. That is what we heard from the hon. gentlemen when the Canadian Pacific Railway was still a projected undertaking. Now the hon. member from Halifax says that after all the Canadian Pacific Railway has done nothing. He does not seem to know that it has attracted the attention of Europe, and of England especially, to the advantages which this country affords for an industrious population. He does not seem to be aware that it has given us a status that we never would have had among the commercial countries of the world if that Pacific Railway had not been built. Now, I believe the North-West country will ere long be filled up with an industrious population. While I was abroad I was asked over and over again for information about our North-West, and the principal objection that I heard made to it as a field for settlement was the difficulty of getting the produce of the country to European markets. Men who have given attention to the subject have expressed a belief that until we do open up the Hudson Bay route for commercial purposes we cannot expect a great influx of people into our North-West Territories. Much depends upon that. My hon. friend who moved this resolution probably took a rosy view of this matter. I believe he made the best of the case—probably he magnified it in his desire to serve his country. I appreciate the position of my hon. friend in that country, and the vast importance of this subject to the people who are struggling to find outlets for their products to the markets of the world. He has put the case forcibly before us, and in a manner creditable to himself and to the country which he represents. On the other side, my hon. friend from Halifax has endeavored to belittle that North-West country and its resources, and the capabilities of the Hudson Bay route for transporting the products of the North-West to Europe. I have not taken the pains that my hon. friend has in looking up this matter, but from the reports I have read of those who have investigated the question of navigating Hudson Bay I have come to the conclusion that we will have that route open for nearly four months every year. My hon. friend spoke of the "Alert," and I asked him what time she was at Hudson Bay? He replied in the month of June. We know that in the early part of June there are large ice floes and small icebergs in that region, but in the autumn of the year, when we most require that communication and when it would be of the greatest advantage to the North-West, those difficulties do not exist. My hon. friend tells us that the temperature of Hudson Bay is 14 degrees higher than the temperature of Lake Superior at the same season of the year. It is a fact of which I was not before aware, and it tends to strongly confirm my belief in the practicability of the Hudson Bay route. Though we in Nova Scotia have no direct interest in opening up the Hudson Bay route—in fact, many people believe that it would divert trade from the Maritime Provinces, though I never could see it—yet at the same time, believing, as I do, that we must legislate here, not in the interest of any one Province, but for the benefit of the whole Dominion, and feeling, as I do, that the opening of this route would rapidly increase the population of the North-West, I shall give it my support, believing it to be in the interests of the whole Dominion. I am proud, as a Canadian, of what the hon. gentleman from Shell River has said about the North-West.

HON. MR. DEVER—Buncombe!

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Although the answer that he may get from the Government to-day may not be all that he desires, yet in bringing the matter before us he has done much towards speeding the time when this project will be accomplished and a route opened for commerce. My hon. friend from St. John says "buncombe," and I do not know where that comes in or to whom he applies it—whether he applies it to myself or to my hon. friend from Shell River. If he applies it to myself, I can regard it with perfect complacency and even with amusement. When we in this country array ourselves, one Province against another, and say that we will not support an undertaking because it may possibly injure the trade of some section of the Dominion, we cease to be patriotic. I believe that the interests of this country do not run in parallel lines, antagonistic to each other, but that they act and re-act upon each other. I believe that the prosperity of any part of Canada must tend to promote the prosperity of all. You cannot depress a portion of the country without affecting the commercial prosperity of the whole Dominion. I have risen on the spur of the moment, not expecting that this matter would go further than the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who puts the question. He has opened up the subject in a manner creditable to himself, and shown us the advantages which the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway will confer upon the whole Dominion, and more particularly upon that part of it from which he comes. If the Hudson Bay route can be made a practicable channel for commerce it will do more than anything else to fill the North-West with a large population, and its benefits will extend to every portion of the Dominion.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I do not rise to prolong this debate further than to congratulate my hon. friend on the very able and distinct manner in which he has brought this matter before the House. We are all indebted to him for the information he has furnished. On the question of the navigation of the Hudson Bay at certain times in the year, I have to differ from the conclusions of my hon. friend from Halifax. We had a parliamentary committee some sessions ago, which took up this question, and examined several witnesses, and had access to the logs of Hudson Bay Company's vessels extending over a period of some thirty-seven years. We had also before us a report of a British Admiral, in which it was gravely stated that the Gulf of St. Lawrence would only be navigable for a much shorter period each year than we know the Hudson Bay to be open to vessels. I am one of those who believe and stoutly maintain that Hudson Bay is navigable for four months of each year, and that a ship designed for those waters must be of a very different character, and be very differently equipped from those vessels which were sent there by the Government. The "Alert," formerly known as the "Arctic," was a very good ship for what she was constructed to do; but ships, like horses, must be selected to suit the purpose that one has in view. You cannot combine in the one animal the qualities of the racer and the cart horse. And so it is with ships: you cannot utilize a vessel for one service which was designed for a totally different service. While the "Arctic," or "Alert," was well fitted for housing men in an Arctic climate, she was not built for speed. She depended more on her sails than on her screw. A very different class of vessels would be required to carry grain on the Hudson Bay route. They would require to have greater capacity and a higher speed. Six knots an hour was the speed of the "Alert." A ship designed for the Hudson Bay trade should have a capacity of about 6,000 tons and a speed of not less than twelve knots an hour. I think the fact that Hudson Straits can be navigated for four months of the year has been pretty clearly demonstrated, but when you come to the question of the Government building a railway 700 miles long at a cost of not less than $20,000 per mile it is asking a good deal. The Government have gone a long way already. They have offered a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile.

HON. MR. BOULTON—The grant is 6,400 acres per mile in the Province of Manitoba and 12,800 acres per mile outside of the Province.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I think, therefore, that the Government must have satisfied themselves, to a certain extent, as to the practicability of this northern route; otherwise, they would not have made such an offer. If those lands in Manitoba are worth $2 per acre that would be a contribution from the Dominion Government of $12,800 per mile for the portion of the road in the Province, or three-fifths of the estimated cost of construction. I am not prepared to estimate the value of the land grant outside of Manitoba, but it must represent a very considerable contribution towards the undertaking. One gratifying feature of this discussion is the statement of the fact that so small a community was able to export in one year 13,000,000 bushels of grain. Nobody could have predicted such an extraordinary result in so short a time from the opening up of that country — nobody could have anticipated that so soon after the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway it would be blocked with grain produced in that sparse settlement. Very soon we may hope to see the export from the North-West doubled and quadrupled. It is no exaggerated estimate of the possibilities of the near future. Last year California exported 32,000,000 bushels of grain, and I think the total production of the State was 61,000,000 bushels. At a very moderate estimate, in twenty years from now the trade of the North-West will exceed the capacity of the existing routes to handle it, and the Government will therefore look favorably upon any project which tends to increase the facilities of transportation in that country. I think we are safe in leaving the matter in their hands. The Government that has grappled successfully with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and made it a success, and promoted the settlement and development of our great North-West, will go forward in the same spirit, and may safely be trusted to provide for the wants of the country which my hon. friend from Shell River so ably represents.

HON. MR. GIRARD—This question has been brought before the House from time to time, and on every occasion has excited deep interest. I did not expect that it would give rise to a long discussion to-day on the probable cost of the undertaking. This House cannot in any way deal with the question of expenditure, and our only object in discussing the matter here is to impress the Senate and the country with the importance of the project. I have no doubt that the Hudson Bay Railway will be constructed before long. The rapid settlement of Manitoba and the North-West will render its construction necessary. We need it in the interests of the Dominion as well as in our own interests. We cannot much longer leave the natural wealth on the shores of the Hudson Bay undeveloped. We must either undertake this work ourselves or it will be undertaken by those who will succeed us ere long. I am surprised at the feeling which has been expressed on the subject of the expense which the construction of that road will entail. I have before me an offer of a gentleman who is in a position to furnish a guarantee of his good faith to build the road for $25,000 a mile, and if he is given the control of the enterprise he and his friends are quite capable of carrying out the engagement. According to that estimate the road would cost about $17,500,000, which is not an excessive sum. I know in Manitoba we want to have the road built at any cost. When the present Manitoba Government came into power they adopted an economical policy, of which I approve; but nevertheless they have been obliged to change their policy, and, what is more, have decided to incur the necessary expense to interest capitalists in the construction of that road. I think it is a project which could not be left to local enterprise. The Imperial Government authorities and the Dominion Government should aid the local Administration in the construction of such an immense work—a road which will certainly be an advantage not only to Canada but to the Empire. From all I can learn, the navigation of Hudson Bay will be open for four or five months of the year. It has been the means of communication between England and the Hudson Bay territories for two centuries, and it was by that route that the first white settlers of the North-West penetrated to the Red River under Lord Selkirk. Some of their descendants are still living in the Province of Manitoba. In all the years that the Hudson Bay has been navigated I have never heard of any great disaster occurring there, such as we hear of continually on other seas. While, therefore, Hudson Straits are closed for a considerable portion of the year, the route has the advantage of being safe while it is open. It has been said that the Dominion has expended a large amount of money for the benefit of Manitoba and the North-West. I am under the impression that we have collected enough within our own limits to pay our way, and many settlers have come from the older Provinces of the Dominion to cast in their lot with us. I do not know that they have all succeeded, but they have taken their chances. I think it is not generous on the part of some members of this House to say that Manitoba is a burden on the Dominion. I do not believe that the Province has failed at any time to contribute its share to the public revenue. Nevertheless, we are a new country, and we are not in a position to prosecute such large works unaided, and we should not be called upon to bear all the risks and expense of opening up that new country alone. We are perfectly within our right in asking for aid from the central Government, and if it cannot be given we are at least entitled to have our demands carefully considered. We don't seek to promote our own interest only; what we demand is assistance for the prosecution of a work which will benefit all Canada. With a view to proving that we take a great interest in the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway, I take the liberty of reading to the House the following article from the Winnipeg daily Tribune of the 8th instant:—

"A petition signed by representatives of Manitoba and the Territories, asking that the Dominion Government will grant a guarantee to land grant bonds for the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway, will be presented to Sir John Macdonald, as Minister of Railways. The petition sets forth that if the Government gives the guarantee that there are capitalists who are ready to go on with the construction of the road. It is not at all unlikely that the representatives of the North-West in the Senate and House of Commons, with Mr. Hugh Sutherland, will form a deputation, and the whole subject will be fully discussed before the Government next week. The general impression by parties who ought to know is that the Government looks favorably upon the scheme, and that the aid asked for may be granted, if not entirely, at least in a modified form."

From what has been said, it seems that the Government are better disposed than many members of this honorable House to grant something in aid of this undertaking. I hope the Senate will give this question the consideration which is due to a work of such importance.

HON. MR. SUTHERLAND—It is well known that the Hudson Bay Company have been navigating these northern waters for two centuries and, if I am correctly informed, during all that time only two vessels have been lost. I know that one of them was a miserable ship. I had reason to give more than ordinary attention to the case, having lost something on the vessel myself. This would go far to show that the navigation of Hudson Bay and Straits is not so very dangerous after all. I am informed by a gentleman who has navigated the Hudson Bay that a vessel owned by a friend of his went out through Hudson Straits on the 15th of January, and if that is correct in one instance there is no reason why other vessels should not pass in and out in mid-winter. No doubt there will be some drawback to the navigation of the straits except during three months of the year. One great advantage of the opening up of this route is the facilities it will afford for the settlement of the country. Where could we get a better and safer route than this one for bringing in a population to our vast western territories. I may mention a fact that I had from my father: when he came to this country the vessel in which he sailed was detained two weeks in the same locality by calm weather. There was little or no ice, but there was a dead calm. Another point that I may refer to and explain is about the Hudson Bay Company only sending their vessels out about the 1st July. They do so because it suits them in more ways than one. Their boats from the north would not be down even then. They generally come about 1st the August with their supplies, and consequently the Hudson Bay Company have no reason to send their vessels any earlier than to arrive there about the 1st August. These are the only points I wanted to bring out, as they had not been touched upon by others. The question has been dealt with so fully that I do not believe I could add anything of consequence to what has been already said.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté)—I cannot allow this debate to close without giving my opinion, and I think I should give it with no uncertain sound. We should not allow an impression to go abroad that we would offer any encouragement to this project beyond what has already been done by the Government. Are we to spend an immense sum of money on a chimerical scheme like this at the present time? Do we desire that in the near future we should be taxed beyond endurance to meet this enormous outlay? I do not see what other sources of revenue remain, unless we put a tax on bills of exchange and promissory notes. The interest of our debt has got to be paid, and we must look to see where our revenue is coming from before we incur further expenditure. No doubt the hon. gentleman who has brought this matter up has done what he conceives to be his duty to the people whom he represents; but in Ontario we have all the burdens we are able to bear, and I do not think we are disposed to incur any more indebtedness. We have been doing a great deal to develop the North-West. We have furnished means of communication with the seaboard, and we are now spending a large amount of money on the construction of a canal at Sault Ste. Marie. That is all that is likely to be required for many years to come. The very routes that are open now are nearer to water communication than the proposed railway. From Winnipeg to Port Arthur is a less distance than from Winnipeg to Fort Churchill, while Lake Superior is open for seven months of the year at least. From Port Arthur down to the sea there is an excellent water route, and it will be quite practicable to ship grain from Port Arthur to Liverpool when the deepening and enlarging of the St. Lawrence canals is completed. Vessels drawing 14 feet of water can then pass through from Port Arthur to the sea. I think the means of communication that we already possess will be ample for the requirements of the country for a number of years to come. We are told that $25,000 a mile would be sufficient to construct this road. A different impression prevails in Ontario. To-day I presented a petition for legislation for a road through the heart of Ontario, in which power is asked to borrow to the extent of $30,000 a mile. It is true that the line runs through a wooded country, but I doubt if a road can be built from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay at a less cost. Figures have been furnished to show that this Hudson Bay route would enable the people of Manitoba to ship 5,000,000 bushels of wheat in the fall of the year. I thought I would calculate how many cars it would take. It would take 250 trains of 20 cars each to carry that amount of wheat down to Fort Churchill. They could not do anything of the sort; they could not get the cars. It seems to me that we are asked to provide means to do an injury to ourselves—to spend money to take trade away from ourselves. I am willing to be reasonably liberal to my neighbors, but I think I have a right to look to myself. If we had not already been liberal in the extreme I would not oppose this scheme from any point of view; but the Government have offered a liberal land grant, and that ought to be enough. Let the Government give as much land as they please in that country, but the people there must construct the road without any further aid from the central Government.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I have listened, and I believe every member of this House has listened with very great interest, to the learned and clear statement made by the hon. gentleman from Shell River, and also to the valuable remarks which fell from the lips of the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken. Debates of this kind are not only interesting, but are also fruitful of good results. I have no doubt that the Government will weigh properly the reasons given on both sides; but in answer to the inquiry made by the hon. gentleman, I have to say that the Government have not yet come to any conclusion on this subject.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (J) "An Act respecting the Great North-West Central Railway Company." He said: The objects sought by this Bill are of a domestic character, rendered necessary by the fact that English capitalists have taken up this road and desire to have the number of directors increased. The existing Act restricts the number to five; this Bill proposes to increase the number to seven, with power to diminish the number at the option of the company. I am happy to inform the House that fifty miles of the road have been constructed and equipped, and that the company intend to complete the line in the spring, furnishing railway communication to the whole country between Brandon and Battleford. This road has been long sought for and desired by that important section of the country, and I am glad to be able to inform the House that the work is to be carried to completion in so short a space of time.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

TORONTO BOARD OF TRADE BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. McKINDSEY moved the second reading of Bill (K) "An Act respecting the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto." He said: The Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, by its Act of incorporation and amendments thereto, has power to hold property to the extent of $500,000 and to create a bonded debt of $300,000. The rapid increase of Toronto in population, and in the value and importance of the Board of Trade, renders it necessary that they should have a building for their accommodation which will cost more than the amount authorized by their Act of incorporation. They have purchased land in a very central part of the city and have commenced the erection of a very large building, and they ask by this Bill to be authorized to hold property to the value of $750,000, and to exercise bonding powers to the extent of $500,000, and to be allowed to issue first, second and third-class bonds, and to give a mortgage as collateral security for the payment of the bonds. The building which they are erecting will be a credit to the city of Toronto and in harmony with the public buildings which surround it. They also ask that the provisions of Cap. 127, Sec. 7, of the Revised Statutes of Canada shall not apply to the debentures or securities referred to in the Bill. They want to be able to call in the bonds at any time they may choose to do so, on giving notice in two of the Toronto daily papers. Last year the Board of Trade entered into an agreement with certain persons, who furnished money to purchase the land and erect the building which is now in course of construction. This agreement is made an appendix to the Bill for the purpose of ratifying it, and making it a portion of this legislation.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

IMPROPER USE OF WEAPONS BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté) moved the second reading of Bill (B) "An Act respecting the improper use of Firearms and other Weapons." He said: This is exactly like the Bill which passed through this House last Session. It being late in the Session when it went to the House of Commons it was not reached before prorogation. It is not necessary to explain the Bill; it was before the Senate last year, and was then discussed and thoroughly understood.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Are there no changes in the Bill?

HON. MR. READ—No changes.

HON. MR. GIRARD—These small bills should not be adopted without careful consideration. They may interfere whith the rights and privileges of the subject. The first clause provides a penalty for any one carrying a pistol or air-gun, unless he has a certificate exempting him from the operation of the Act. I think the air-gun should be prohibited; it is the murderer's weapon; but I do not think that a man who carries a revolver on his own premises should be subject to this penalty. I think the second line of the clause should be struck out, because, if any one fears an assault or injury to himself or his family or property, he can go to a magistrate and make a declaration and get a certificate, as provided for in the Bill.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I fear that my hon. friend from Quinté will not accept the suggestion. I moved in the same direction last year, and not only he, but the leader of the House also, opposed me. At home we practise with pistols and air-guns for amusement, and would come within the scope of this Bill and be liable to a fine. There is no intention, according to the view taken by the House last year, to modify the Bill in any way. You cannot carry a pistol even on your own grounds.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—These details can be discussed when we consider the Bill in Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 6 p.m.

THE SENATE.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (M) "An Act to authorise the Toronto Savings Bank Charitable Trust to invest certain Funds." (Mr. Sullivan.)

Bill (L) "An Act to amend the Railway Act as respects running powers." (Mr. Lougheed.)

BETTER SECURITY OF FISHERMEN BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (E) "An Act for better securing the safety of certain Fishermen."

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause—

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I regret that my hon. friend did not delay the second reading of this Bill until I was in my place in the House. I opposed this Bill last year, as I did not believe that itafforded the protection which the preamble would lead the House to believe it did. I consider it a useless measure, but I cannot very well, at this stage, oppose the principle of the Bill.

HON. MR. POWER—The Bill was read the second time with the express understanding that the right was reserved to every hon. gentleman to oppose it at the committee stage if he chose.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Unless some necessity is shown for the legislation, it is worse than useless to encumber our statute books with such enacments. My hon. friend failed to show any necessity for this Bill. I come from a county which is more deeply interested in fishing than all the rest of the Province of Nova Scotia together. Interested, as I am personally, in that enterprise, I would be the last man in this House to object to any reasonable protection which could be afforded to the hardy race of men whose employment is so greatly in the interest of the Dominion. Although I have not been home since last Session, yet I have questioned men who are engaged largely in this enterprise in the county of Lunenburg, and they reply that the Bill will do no harm, but it will do no good. The men engaged in the fishing industry in my county actually do what this Bill proposes that they should do. Our fishermen are no hired laborers, but have an interest in the vessels in which they are engaged. A number of them club together and build a vessel, and select their leader, and they are not like hired servants, obliged to obey the orders of masters. They are very intelligent men, and know better what is required for their own protection than any one less interested in their calling. It seems to me rather a stigma on these people to say that they tare so utterly lost to their own interes and so devoid of the instinct of self-preservation that they must be compelled to take a compass and supply of provisions and water in their boats. Sometimes the men down there like something more stimulating than water.

HON. MR. POWER—Well, let them take something to mix with their water.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—If this Bill were applied to the deep-sea fisheries there might be some reason in it, but it is not confined to deep-sea fishing. It would apply also to a boat going into a harbor to set a net, or into the mouth of a bay to catch alewives. I do not think that my hon. friend intended his Bill to include such boats, but that he had in view the deep-sea and bank fisheries, to which it might properly apply. If the House passes this Bill as it is now, it will apply to every vessel engaged in the fisheries, and I hope that my hon. friend will amend it in the direction I have indicated. If my hon. friend can suggest some means by which it could be made to apply to our hardy firshermen who are engaged on American fishing vessels, and many of whom are lost every season for want of just such precautions as this Bill provides for, I could see the value of this legislation. The Bill does not provide for supplying a fog-horn or trumpet for each boat, though I think it would be more important than some of the things that they are obliged to carry. This legislation is not necessary in the waters adjacent to the island of Prince Edward, and it certainly is not wanted along the coast of Nova Scotia. It would be an advantage for deep-sea and bank fisheries. Instead of benefiting the fishermen of Nova Scotia, this Bill would be doing them an injury. It is not only useless; it is worse than useless—it is a positive injury. I would suggest to my hon. friend to include with the articles specified in the clause a fog-trumpet, which is even more important than water and provisions, and that he alter it so as to make it apply only to deep-sea and bank fishing, and not to shore fishing or vessels that simply go to a creek or harbor to set nets. With these changes, I would not have such a strong objection to the Bill.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The Bill as it stands does not refer to net fishing.

HON. MR. POWER—Certainly not; that is not the intention or meaning of the Bill.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—So far as the Bill applies to deep-sea fishing, it is in the right direction. The bank fishing is a most important and valuable industry, and must continue, and be more so in the future. The people that my hon. friend from Lunenburg represents are entitled to the greatest respect for the ability and energy they have shown in prosecuting that industry. They have one of the largest fleets that sail under our flag. I think he voiced the opinion of those fishermen when he said that the Bill would do no harm, and that it might do good. There is no doubt that when a vessel sends out boats to fish there should be a compass, provisions and water in each boat, so that if they should go astray in the fog the crews will not suffer.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—They have already.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I had occasion to buy a dory that was picked up some four years ago on the Banks, and brought to Charlottetown, and I bought the whole thing as it was. There was no compass in the boat, and I do not think it is usual to carry one.

HON. MR. MACFARLANE—Probably it was an American fisherman.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—If boats engaged in fishing from vessels that sail from Lunenburg harbor take the precautions that are provided for in this Bill it can do them no harm to say by Act of Parliament that they shall do so. I take it, the reason the Bill is introduced is to require the same thing to be done in all cases where vessels are engaged in deep-sea fishing. Where I take exception to the Bill is that it is unnecessary in the Straits of Northumberland, where a vessel is always in sight of the island and the main shore. It would only be a waste of time and money to supply the fishing boats in those waters in the manner required by this Bill. But it is quite another matter when a vessel goes six or seven hundred miles away to the banks and remains there fishing day after day. The Bill, as applied to such cases, is legislation in the right direction, and I shall support it if the Island of Prince Edward is excepted from its operation.

HON. MR. POWER—I informed the hon. gentleman at the second reading of the Bill that I had no objection to adding a rider to meet his views. I should like to do anything in my power to meet the views of my hon. friend from Lunenburg, but I am afraid I could not by any possibility so amend the Bill as to satisfy him. I shall only try to indicate that there is no very great substance in his objections, and then leave the Bill to the committee. The hon. gentleman tells us that he had information from persons interested in the fishery in his own county last year to the effect that the Bill could do no harm. Then why does the hon. gentleman oppose a Bill which can do no harm? He tells us further that the fishermen of his county actually do the things that this Bill requires. It cannot therefore injure anybody in his county. His argument is very like that of a man who should say that because here, in the Senate, we do not commit murder, therefore the commandment which says "Thou shalt do no murder" should be done away with. It does not follow because vessel owners in Lunenburg do their duty that it should not be done everywhere else. This Bill is intended to compel fishermen in other parts of the Dominion to do what the fishermen of Lunenburg already do. I am informed by a gentleman who fits out a great many of these fishing vessels in Lunenburg county that he does supply a compass for each boat, and I hope his example will be followed all over the country. The hon. member from Lunenburg went so far as to say that this Bill was not only useless but injurious, involving unnecessary expense. Are the fishermen of Lunenburg in the habit of going to unnecessary expense in the fitting out of their vessels? I think they are too shrewd for that; and the hon. gentleman does not give the people of his county credit for their sagacity and intelligence when he makes a statement of that sort. Another of his objections to the Bill is that it would apply to a boat going out to set a net in a bay. Now, this Bill does not apply at all to nets. The hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and has been sufficiently engaged in construing statutes to know that the language of the clause clearly applies only to line fishing. This Bill is not intended and does not apply to net fishing at all. The hon. gentleman made one suggestion which I think was a sound one, and I propose to amend the clause in the direction he desires. He said that perhaps fishermen might prefer to take some other liquid with them instead of water, and to meet that objection I move that the words "drinking water" be stricken out and that the words "liquid suitable for drinking purposes" be substituted.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I reget that I did not manage to make myself understood. I declare as a lawyer that the words of this clause do not make it apply exclusively to deep-sea fishing, but that it applies to any boat that is launched for the purpose of fishing. The words are as plain as anything could be. When I said that this legislation was useless I meant as far as the county of Lunenburg was concerned, and the hon. gentleman has not shown that the fishermen of other parts of Nova Scotia are less careful and intelligent than those with whom I am acquainted. This Bill applies to all kinds of fishing.

HON. MR. POWER—The language of the clause shows that it does not.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Then why object to stating that it applies to deep-sea fishing?

HON. MR. POIRIER—I should like to support this Bill, and I will, to a certain extent, because I believe there is some merit in it, or at least in the intention of the hon. gentleman who promotes it; but I don't care to see our criminal statutes loaded with a Bill drafted as this one is. I should like to have it made clear that the Bill applies only to deep-sea fishing. As it stands now, it might apply to boats engaged in catching mackerel along the coast. If it is not intended to include such boats it is certainly open to that interpretation. There are two distinct clauses, and I say the words "other appliances" may mean nets. Certainly, there is no lawyer that would not take that point, and there are many judges and magistrates who would interpret the phrase as including nets. I would request the hon. gentleman to amend the Bill so as to make it clearly apply only to deep-sea fishing. As it stands now, it would lead to a good deal of petty persecution and trouble, and it certainly is not the intention of my hon. friend to produce any such result.

HON. MR. POWER—With respect to the necessity of this Bill, I presume that the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, like other members of the Senate, is in the habit of reading the newspapers, and he must have seen that every year fishermen in dories have lost their vessels, and sometimes have reached land after suffering severe privations, and in some instances have not reached land at all, but have been found dead in their boats. The object of the Bill is to prevent the occurrence of these misfortunes—at all events, with respect to vessels owned in Canada. All our legislation with respect to sailors is more or less of a paternal character. Sailors are looked upon almost as children, and are protected by Parliament. Sailors resemble fishermen, in that they are unselfish people, and do not look out for their own interest, as they should. I am quite satisfied to leave the question of construction to the hon. leader of the House. If he says that any court would raise a question about the construction of this Bill I am perfectly satisfied that it should be amended in the way suggested. The Bill was submitted to the inspection of the Law Clerk and amended by him; and I am satisfied that it expresses just what I say, and is not open to the objection taken by the hon. members from Lunenburg and Acadie.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I do not see what objection the hon. gentleman from Halifax could have to inserting the amendment proposed. There is room for a doubt, which I think it would be well to remove.

HON. MR. POWER—Then I have no objection to the amendment.

The clause was amended at the end of the 8th line by inserting the word "similar."

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Would not my hon. friend insert the words "deep-sea fishing?"

HON. MR. POWER—No; I move that in the 12th line drinking water be struck out, and that the words "liquids suitable for drinking purposes" be substituted. (Cries of No, no.) The fishermen might pree r to take tea or coffee with them.

HON. MR. PROWSE—I do not think we need put ambiguous words in a clause of this kind. It would be almost an intimation to the fishermen that they could take spirituous liquors with them. If they want to take oatmeal with them to mix with the water there is nothing in this clause to prevent them. In my experience there is nothing worse for fishermen than to take intoxicating liquors to be used as an ordinary beverage while fishing. In my opinion, the clause as it stands cannot be improved by inserting the proposed words.

The amendment was rejected.

HON. MR. KAULBACH moved to insert the words "bank or deep-sea fishing."

HON. MR. POWER—The amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman is unnecessary and mischievous. In the first place, it will be observed that the Bill only applies to the case of dories and other boats sent out from vessels which go fishing. When a schooner goes fishing with a number of dories she does not lie ashore; she goes some miles from the shore and fishes on the banks.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Not always.

HON. MR. POWER—My view is, that whether a schooner goes out on the banks 150 miles away or fishes 30 miles from the shore, which might possibly not be called deep-sea fishing in some instances, she should come under this Bill. In every case where boats are sent from a schooner to fish there is a risk of a fog coming on and boats being lost, whether a schooner is fishing on the banks or somewhere else. There is no object in the amendment of the hon. gentleman, except to raise some question as to the meaning of the Bill.

If this measure does not apply to the county of Lunenberg, if fishermen of that county have been intelligent and wise enough to take the steps recommended by this Bill, why does the hon. gentleman seek now to hinder the people of other counties, who have not been as wise, from having the benefit of this Bill? Last year the Senate passed this Bill unanimously, the then leader of the House concurring in it, and in effect the whole House approving, with the exception of the hon. gentleman and one other member; and I fail to see why we should now undertake to mutilate and destroy the measure, and render it practically useless.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman talks about the wisdom of our fishermen: I believe they are wise enough to know how to take care of their interests without being told how to do it. It is for the hon. gentleman to show where there is a less intelligent community of fishermen in the Province for whose benefit this Bill is necessary. Until he can do so, I do not see any necessity for the measure.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I do not see any objection to the amendment.

HON. MR. POWER—I pointed out the objection. I have shown that it is necessary, in case of a fishing schooner which sends out small boats, whether engaged on the banks or deep-sea fishing. Whenever a vessel goes for such fishing these precautions ought to be taken.

HON. MR. POIRIER—If this Bill is to apply, as I thought at first it would, to smacks going along our shores for mackerel fishing, I will oppose it. I will support it if it applies only to deep-sea and bank fishing, and I will support the amendment which would make it applicable only to such cases.

HON. MR. SCOTT—As I read the Bill, it seems to be plain and easily understood. Small smacks and boats going out from the shore individually are not within the purview of this Bill. It only applies to dories attached to larger vessels going out. Larger vessels sometimes tow out small boats which they send out to fish, and it is to such boats that this Bill is intended to appply. Surely the argument is just as strong whether they are engaged in deep-sea fishing or shallow-water fishing. If they are enveloped in a fog, surely it is a wise precaution to furnish them with a compass, and provisions and water. The Bill applies to boats which are sent out from the shooners.

HON. MR. POIRIER—I apprehend that the hon. leader of the Opposition is not familiar with our fisheries. If he were, he would know that mackerel fishing is carried on in just such a way as he describes. The big vessel comes along the shores and sends out small boats, for the purpose of seining, for example. Now, those boats would be included in this Bill. Yet what I wish to make clear is, that they should not be included.

HON. MR. POWER—This Bill does not apply to seining or net fishing at all.

HON. MR. POIRIER—It might apply.

HON. MR. PROWSE—The general practice among fishermen during the fishing season is that they make their homes on board their vessels. They live on board day and night, whether they are in the harbor or out at sea, and they have their dories or boats attached to their vessels. When they want to set a net or catch bait they take their boats from the vessel, and therefore the objection of the hon. member for Acadie is well founded, that this Bill would apply to cases of seine fishing. The dories and boats are not on board the vessel, but in tow of the vessel, and the owner and crew live on board the vessel during the entire fishing season.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—When I read this Bill without the amendment suggested I thought it applied only to boats engaged in bank and deep-sea fishing.

HON. MR. POWER—That is what is intended.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—Then there can be no objection to making it clearer.

HON. MR. POWER—I am perfectly willing that the Bill should be confined to the purpose for which it is intended. It was not intended to apply to cases such as those mentioned by the hon. member from Shediac. There is just this difficulty: suppose a schooner is 30 miles off the shore fishing in soundings, the question is, whether she would be held to be engaged in deep-sea fishing. She is not fishing on what are generally known as banks.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Yes; she is.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I should think it was deep-sea fishing if it was 30 miles from the coast.

HON. MR. POWER—If it does not raise a doubt as to the meaning, I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

On sub-section 2,—

HON. MR. KAULBACH suggested to include fog-horns.

The Bill was amended by inserting after the word "water," "and a fog-horn or trumpet."

HON. MR. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

AGRICULTURAL FERTILIZERS BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (B) "An Act respecting Agricultural Fertilizers."

(In the Committee.)

HON. MR. LACOSTE explained that the object of the Bill was to render the inspection more accurate, and to give the Government better control over the sale of fertilizers.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE, from the committee, reported the Bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

THE WELLAND CANAL INVESTIGATION.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. McCALLUM resumed his speech on his enquiry as to—

What action the Government intends to take on the evidence taken before A. F. Wood, Esquire, Commissioner, as to the conduct of the officials on the Welland Canal, in the management of that important public work.

He said: The day before yesterday, when I was addressing the House on this important matter, I had reached what is called charge 5, as divided by the commissioner appointed by the Government to examine into the management of the Welland Canal. I spoke of the pontoon, and I wish now to impress on your minds the fact that this pontoon was built under an agreement with the Government by a private individual, and that the employés of the Welland Canal who worked on that pontoon were paid by the Government at the canal office. This country paid for that work twice—to the contractor and to the men who worked on the pontoon. But I did not get at all the facts. Some of the witnesses that I wanted were away down the St. Lawrence at Cornwall. I would not like to say that they were smuggled away, although I accused people on the streets of St. Catharines of having done so. I had my own opinion, but I had no evidence to support it. There were men who had been at work on that pontoon who would have been glad to give their evidence. One man gave me his pass-book—I have it in my possession yet—showing how long he had worked there for outside parties, but when we wanted him he was away. I do not know who induced him to go; I cannot put my finger on any one. The commissioner, of course, told everybody, "You have nothing to fear; you can give evidence freely;" but, as I said to him, he was not there all the time to protect these people. This Mr. Mossop says that he got his pay while working on that pontoon as if he had been working for the Government. I will now proceed to what is called charge 6—allowing parties to be paid for work that was not performed. I said last year, when making my statement, from my place in the Senate, that it was alleged that parties were paid for work on the Welland Canal that was not performed. I had at that time letters in my hand showing that such was the case. One witness that I relied upon at that time has since died, and I was not able to call him; but I have a copy of a letter which was then in the hands of the Government and which is in my hands—a letter which was placed I presume in the possession of the commissioner during the investigation, and on which I was not permitted to take evidence. The following is the letter:—

"PORT DALHOUSIE, 10th April, 1888.

"MR. WILLIAM MOSSIP.

"Joseph Johnson came to me last summer wanting me to go and see Mr. Rykert with him respecting the discharging of his team by Miller. I being one of the committee went with him, as I could not see what the team was discharged for, only to make room for one of the most extreme Grit teams that there is in this place by the name of Wright. After a time the team was discharged and Johnson taken back. On the way to St. Catharines Mr. Johnson told me that his stepson was working on the spile-driver with one of his horses, and Miller had returned twenty dollars to the canal office more than was coming to him, saying to give it to him, the boy not knowing anything about the transaction. They asked him in the office how long he had worked; he said three days, which was the time he had worked. Miller went to Johnson for the money; Johnson told him the boy collected the money and did not get it; he told Johnson to go and get the money, and tell them he had done the work, or it would get him into a scrape, which he did. Miller not being on hand when he got the money he handed it to Demare. All this I explained to Mr. Rykert at the time. The answer I got from Mr. Rykert was that he was no informer. Demare wanted to know from Johnson what he would do with the money. He said, give it to Miller. Those gentlemen have got their own clerk whom Miller fetched from the West. I think we have plenty good men in our own county to fill the position.

"Yours respectfully,
"HUMPHREY JULIAN."

It only shows that the question was brought before the gentleman that was defending the canal officials before this, and that he did not take any notice of it—that he was no informer. I will now read a letter from Mr. Julian, who is an honest, respectable man, that was published in the St. Catharines Star while the investigation was going on:

"To the Editor of the Star:

"I see by your paper that Mr. Rykert has a good deal to say respecting a conversation that took place between himself, Johnson and myself. He says no such conversation took place "in his office or on the street." I agree with him there; but a certain conversation did take place in his back yard respecting Miller, not Demare. Before Mr. Rykert accuses me of saying anything that is not true he should have waited to hear my evidence, which they did not take. Neither did I expect them to take it. I told Mr. McCallum so, before being called, that my evidence would not be taken. I am prepared to swear what did take place between us, also Mr. Rykert's reply, before any magistrate.

"Yours truly,
"HUMPHREY JULIAN.

"PORT DALHOUSIE, Oct. 5, 1889."

Charge 6 is a very serious one, and you will see by the time I get through that I have proved it beyond the slightest doubt. When I first made this charge I said that the amount might be small. That letter shows that it was only $20, but even that amount of money should not be paid without the public getting some value for it. But when I came to examine the pay-lists of the Welland Canal I found that $817.50 had been paid to a man who never did anything for it. Thomas O'Neil, whose evidence commences at page 1131, says that Wm. Assell never worked a day with him. My statement on this case will be confirmed by the evidence of R. D. Dunn, the paymaster, and James Laurence, the clerk. The one put his name on the list as working, and the other paid him. Mr. Dunn's evidence will be found on pages 1447 to 1455, inclusive. You will see by the pay-lists that Wm. Assell is put down as working under different foremen, although for over three years and a-half he was doing no work. He was put down during this time as working under Thomas O'Neil, James Edgar, Benjamin Johnson, Wm. Cook, Nathan Morey and Cornelius Reid. Why does he appear in the pay-lists as working under all these foremen? No doubt, to hide the transaction from the Government. Mr. Ellis was paying out the public money to this man, and he was the guilty party, but he made the paymaster and the clerk by his actions parties to the fraud. Jas. Laurence, the canal clerk, says, at page 1466 of the evidence, that Wm. Assell has been paid for three years and seven months' time (or half time), and that he, Laurence, knew that he was not working at all. Mr. Laurence swears that Mr. Ellis ordered him to put Assell's name on the pay-list. You can see therefore that this man Assell has been paid at the rate of $1.25 a day for 654 days' work that he never performed. Wm. Ellis, himself, was examined on this point. He was put on the witness stand by Mr. Rykert to try and swear himself through. He was called no less than seventeen times; and what does he say? At pages 2187 to 2193 he says that the only mistake that he made in this case was that he did not put Assell on the sick list. I pushed him further on the matter; I wanted to know who established this sick list rule on the canal, but he could not tell me. Just fancy, the manager of a great work like the Welland Canal putting a man's name on the sick list when there was no sick fund to pay him, and keeping him on the pay-lists for three years and seven months to deceive the Government. I know, as a matter of fact, having lived for many years on the Welland Canal, that there is no such thing as a sick fund recognized by the Government of this country. If there was, there should be a medical examination before a man could be appointed to office, or receive pay out of it. My opinion is that the Government of Canada has lost thousands of dollars through this putting men on the sick list. Lock-tenders and bridge-tenders have from time to time been put on what is called the "sick rule." That came out in the evidence. Some of them have been on the sick list for months—one of them, in 1887, I was told was away for five months attending chicken shows and other pleasures while the Government of Canada was paying him his regular wages, and paying another man to do his work; but he had a friend at court that could get him through. I find that this pamphlet of Mr. Rykert's is being circulated extensively in order to prejudice the public in favor of Mr Ellis and to deceive the Government. That has been done on more than one occasion. See how nicely Mr. Rykert slides over the Assell case. In this pamphlet he says: "No doubt at all Mr. Ellis gave way to some of his friends to put this man Mr. Assell on half pay." I doubt if Parliament is aware that this man Assell was pensioned on the country. I did not know that we had a treasury board on the Welland Canal, composed of Mr. Ellis, Superintendent; Mr. Dunn, Paymaster; and Mr. Laurence, Clerk. Is the country ready to submit to that? If so, I am not. Even taking their own view of it, the transaction was something worse than a blunder. They say this Assell was an old man. So he was, and I don't doubt that he was a deserving man. He was an old soldier—a pensioner on the British Government. He used to be messenger in the canal office, but he got too old to work in Mr. Ellis' house and garden, and therefore another man had to be put in his place. Assell could not be discharged without raising a row, and Mr. Ellis had to provide for him in some way. They employed Thomas Hartley, and that was the object of pensioning Assell—they employed him because this man Assell was too old to do the work, so they pensioned him on the country at a cost of $817.50. I now come to the 7th charge—allowing the use of Government property without authority. I would refer you to Edward Smilie's evidence, page 669. He says he worked on the schooner "Defiance," and was paid for that work at the canal office as if working for the Government, and that he had Samuel Houston helping him. Mr. Demare kept his time always. Smilie, I may explain, was the diver. At page 672 he states that he worked on the schooner "James R. Benson" at Rondeau Point, which is situated on Lake Erie, 147 miles from Port Colborne. He was sent away from the canal with the diving armor, and that is what Mr. Ellis calls "popularizing the Welland Canal." Mr. Demare sent the diver with the diving armor 147 miles from Port Colborne, and you will see by the evidence of Samuel Houston, at page 895, that the Welland Canal was left without a diver from Tuesday till Saturday night. It is considered necessary to have a diver and diving armor constantly on the Welland Canal to protect the interests of the country and in case a stone gets into the canal it is necessary to remove it, to prevent damage to shipping, or in case something gets under the gates to prevent them from mitreing but here Mr. Ellis sends away the diver and divng apparatus 147 miles from the Welland Canal for days without fee or reward, and he calls that popularizing the canal. On this point I would refer you to Edward Smilie's evidence. The same witness says, at page 673, that he worked on the schooner "Oliver Mowat," owned by Folger Bros., Kingston. They charged for this work, and were paid by draft but they did not send the draft to Folger Bros., and when the vessel was returning down the canal they detained her from 8 o'clock in the evening until 6 next morning, in order to compel the master to pay the money, while in other cases no charge was made. The evidence I got upon this point was that the master of the "Oliver Mowat" was said to have been a little saucy to Mr. Demare, and he wanted to punish him.

HON. MR. POWER—Perhaps the master of the "Oliver Mowat" was a Liberal.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I don't think that had anything to do with it. I must not say what I think about it, because I am here to state only facts, and not my own surmises. At page 669 Smilie says that he worked on the barge "Hall," and at page 671 that he worked on the schooner "F. T. Leighton," and that Houston and others helped him. At page 673 he says he worked on the propeller "Haskell," and got his pay from Mr. Demare. He got $10 for that work, and says he got discharged for asking for it. At page 674 he says he worked on the schooner "Leadville," having the diving armor. He does not know whether the Government was paid for the armor or not. At page 676 he states that he worked on the barge "Manitowoc," and that he was paid by Mr. Demare $6; that Houston was paid $4, and that the bill was $18 for the use of the armor. There is no return of the $8, and Mr. Demare must have paid that money to himself, because there is nothing said about it. This man Smilie must have given truthful evidence, because the counsel for the canal officials did not ask him one single question in the cross-examination. Why? Because he was afraid to ask him. He said he would call him some other day. I did not quite get through with Mr. Smilie, but Mr. Rykert thought he was not a good witness for his side, so he was not recalled. At page 667 Smilie says that he was receiving pay from the Government and from outside parties at the same time—at least, when he was working for outside parties and receiving pay from them he was getting pay from the Government also. At page 677 he says he worked on the schooner "J. P. Beals," and that Mr. Demare paid him. Mr. Demare, he says, ordered him to do this work and was always his boss or foreman. He says, on page 678, that he worked on the barge "Tecumseh." Mr. Demare, at page 2221, says he collected no money from the schooners "J. P. Beals," "Haskell," "Leadville," "Norwood," "Tecumseh," "F. J. King" or "James R. Benson." In none of these cases did the country get any money for the use of the diving armor, and Mr. Demare swears that he collected nothing. Can you credit the evidence of Mr. Demare after what he swore about the farming land? Can you believe his evidence and refuse to credit other witnesses who swore to the contrary? This man Demare was, I think, twelve or fifteen times on the witness stand, and I refer to the fact in order that you may judge of his credibility. If you find one man contradicted by three others who are his own friends you would be inclined to believe the majority of the witnesses. As far as the Superintendent of the canal is concerned, he was discredited by documentary evidence that he cannot get over, as well as by his own testimony. In the case of the farming lands, Mr. Demare denied that he got any share of the crops grown on the canal lands, but he is contradicted by McGrath, Moriarty and Brownlee, who swore that they gave him a share of the crop. In this House last year, in speaking of this Demare, I ventured the assertion that he was getting pickings. Well, it appears from the evidence that my charge was well founded. If I had been a prophet I could not have come nearer it.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—What do you mean by pickings?

HON. MR. MCCALLUM—Anything that you can catch—anything that you can get, honestly if possibly, or get anyhow. I now come to the evidence of William Mossop, a man that I shall have occasion to say a good deal about before I get through, and who is dealt with in a very harsh manner in the pamphlet circulated by Mr. Rykert. A determined effort has been made to destroy his character—and why? Because I wrote a letter to Mr. Ellis asking him to give Mossop continuous employment, and now they blame Mossop for having brought about this canal investigation. They say I have a spite against them because they refused to give Mossop employment. Mossop is no more to me than any other poor man who is trying to earn a living for his family. I hope I shall always be ready to assist any poor man to get employment; when I wrote that letter that was the only object I had in view. My only feeling in this matter is that the country should have full value for the money that it expends on the Welland Canal and that the canal should be managed properly. At page 965 William Mossop says that the steam pump was at the rubber factory four or five days. He took the scow "Sir John" to Thorold for a load of stone for the rubber factory. The stone went through the canal as Government stone and there was no let pass. He says Mr. Demare ordered him to do this, and that Mr. Ridgeway paid him for his work on the scow "Sir John." He says also that he worked on the pontoon, to which I have already referred, for Mr. Miller four or five days and got his pay as if he had been working for the Government. Mossip further swears, at page 975, that he brought the scow "Mud Hen" from Battle's quarry, with a load of stone for Richard Hutton, lock tender; that the scow was occupied for about three days on this job and that he got orders from Demare to do so. I did not offer any evidence on this point as to who paid for the stone and cement. I think it was the duty of the men who defended the canal officials to show that the Government did not furnish the stone and cement for the use of private individuals. The presumption is strong that the public furnished the stone and cement that went into the bottom of the rubber factory, and it is no small amount. Mr. Rykert in defending Mr. Ellis was either trying to mislead the commissioner or arguing dishonestly when he said that no cement went into the foundation of the rubber factory. What does the evidence prove? It shows that two lock tenders were farmed out by Mr. Demare to do that work and one of them swears that there was cement used in the bottom of the rubber factory. Mr. Demare says that there are no returns of the money paid for the use of the scow "Sir John" to bring stone from Thorold to the rubber factory. The scow paid no toll going through the canal, and so it was their duty to prove that the stone was not public property. Richard Hutton, at page 1032, states that he got the Government scow free of charge to take stone from Battle's quarry to Port Dalhousie, and had her for about three days. That the stone passed through the canal as Government property and there was no let pass. He says he got the scow from Demare. Whether we furnished the stone in that case or not we found the scow to freight it. George W. Reid, at page 1839, says he got screws and tackle and blocks to use at the rubber factory—that they were furnished by Mr. Demare and he paid nothing for the use of them. Remember these are hydraulic jacks which cost $100 or $200 apiece and are very easily injured. He also swears that they had the Government steam pump because they found a leak. It was the easiest thing in the world to find a leak on that canal wherever they wanted to cover up a job. They found a leak in the bottom of the rubber factory, they say, and that was the excuse they offered for working the pump there for four or five days. Before I close, I can show you that they found a leak somewhere else, in order to cover up another dirty transaction. You will find, before I get through, that the bottom of that rubber factory was a sink hole for the money of this country. The scow, "Sir John" carried forty cords of stone and twenty barrels of cement that went into that hole in the rubber factory, and I don't know how much more besides. We will come now to the eighth charge: moneys received and not returned at the proper time, and some moneys retained and not credited. This is money collected for the use of diving armor and steam pumps, and moneys collected as fines from vessels going through the canal. I must refer to these printed pay-lists in the Sessional Papers, pages 42 to 82. The following are the amounts collected:—

RECEIPTS for Hire or Use of Steam Wrecking Pump from the Parties mentioned below.

18th August, 1884, Graham, Horne & Co.—
2 days, steam wrecking pump, at $45	$90 00
Plank and lard oil	4 25
		$94 25
1st October, 1884, Sylvester Neelon—
2½ days, steam wrecking pump, at $45	$112 50
2½ days, wrecker, at $3	7 50
2½ days, engineer, at $1.75	4 38
		124 38
Total		$218 63

They kept that money one year and ten months, before they paid it into the Government. Here is the book to prove it. No further evidence is necessary; whether that money was taken to pay Mr. Ellis' debts, like the money borrowed from the canal employés, I cannot say, but he had the use of the money. R. D. Dunn, at page 1456, says that Mr. Ellis had the use of all such money. The money was not returned at the proper time, as is shown by comparison with Mr. Collier's books. I examined them on the first day of the investigation. That was the time when the canal officials and their counsel made their boast that they would run me—the "old woman" as they called me—out of St. Catharines in less than two days, but the "old woman" did not go. I knew what I was about, and I commenced slowly and exercised all the faculties that I had. I worked very hard and you will see by the time I get through, that I worked against great odds: I was handicapped from the start. Charles Smilie, ship carpenter, says, at page 1022, that he paid $38 for the use of the pontoon to take the engine out of a propeller, the money being stopped by Mr. Murray, by order of the canal office. This money was not accounted for; where has it gone? I never could find an account of it in the public accounts. It never was paid. I may surmise where it went, but I cannot tell.

It being near six o'clock, Mr. McCallum asked that the question be adjourned until to-morrow, and that the inquiry be the first Order of the day.

Agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

THE SENATE.

THE MANAGEMENT OF THE WELLAND CANAL.

INQUIRY.

HON. MR. MCCALLUM resumed his speech on his notice—

That he will inquire what action the Government intends to take on the evidence taken before A. F. Wood, Esq., Commissioner, as to the conduct of the officials on the Welland Canal, in the management of that important public work.

He said: When the House adjourned yesterday I had just finished my remarks on what the commissioner calls Charge 8, regarding canal management. Now, I proceed with the 9th charge against J. E. Demare, Assistant Superintendent, causing trouble, and the question of the management of moneys. This Mr. Demare's name has been before the House several times. He is called Deputy Superintendent of the Welland Canal. He was formerly foreman, but since Mr. Ellis has taken charge he calls him the Deputy Superintendent, and we have several of them on the canal. I would call your attention to the evidence of James Bradley, page 206. He was discharged because he would not make a false report against a brother lock-tender, George Milward, at Mr. Demare's request. Demare wanted to put Milward off the canal and get rid of him, and Bradley reported to Milward what Demare wanted him to do. This is a serious matter. I said last Session, when addressing the House, that I considered that Demare was giving more trouble than any other man on the canal. Here he wants to make this lock-keeper, Bradley, report against another employé. There is also another lock-keeper who was discharged in very much the same way. (See Charles Collier's evidence, page 235.) He says he got discharged from his lock for refusing to go into a dirty place to work, off his division, when working on repairs. That he was ordered to do so by Messrs. Demare and Miller. Collier paid to the superrannuation list for fourteen years and has received no redress to this day. Mr. Ellis told him that he was discharged because he would not obey Mr. Demare's and Mr. Miller's orders. But this man Miller was working on construction, as they call it, under Mr. Page, and it is a question why this man, who was a permanent officer, was discharged for refusing to obey the orders of Mr. Miller, a man who had nothing to do with the matter at all. This is a case in which I consider a gross injustice has been done. I believe Collier to be an honest man, who ought to be reinstated. John Sutton says (page 776) that Mr. Demare called into his office one morning and asked him to sign a receipt. Then Demare changed his mind and wanted to see Mr. Ellis first. Now, what was this receipt? It purports to have been taken from one Johnston for work done on the steamer "Haskell." In my speech of last year you will find reference to this. Mr. Demare puts in this receipt, in answer to a letter of mine to the Department, when called upon to do it. It is supposed to be signed by this man Johnston, but the man is dead, and was dead at the time of the transaction; and Demare calls this man Sutton into his office before the investigation takes place and wants him to sign this receipt to show that he had paid Johnston. The papers as handed in by me last year are correct, except that there is a mistake in copying, changing $3 to $13. (See letter from Mr. Ellis—a copy to be found in the Senate Debates of last year—to A. P. Bradley, Esq., Secretary Department of Railways and Canals, dated 6th April, 1889, and receipts attached thereto). You will find some explanation of how this money was retained and not paid into the Government in the Debates of last year, and also moneys collected from the schooner "F. C. Leighton," $64.75. Demare paid himself $10 which he should have paid to the Government. Section 31 of the canal regulations provides that no officer employed on the public works of this country shall receive anything from the annual expenditure excepting his salary as a just compensation. These are the regulations which govern the canal, and under them people who are going through the canalare being fined. This a part of the evidence. This man Demare pays money to himself that should have been paid to the credit of the Government; also moneys collected from the barge "Hall." Demare says that he sent $10 in a letter to R. D. Dunn, but that letter was never received. Why should he send this letter to the paymaster at all? He was not the proper officer to receive the money. The collector of canal tolls was the proper officer to send it to, and the paymaster was not instructed to receive any moneys. If Demare desired to act honestly in the matter, all he had to do was to step across the street to the office of the collector of canal tolls; but he prefers to send the money by letter to the paymaster, and the letter is never received. (See Mr. Dunn's evidence about this $10, pages 21 and 22 of the evidence). Mr. Dunn swears that Demare was at the canal office every day, but said nothing until the matter was brought up in Parliament. If I had not referred to it, this and many other things would still be going on. I am not saying that they are going on now, but these men are still in power on the canal, and there is no guarantee that they will not begin again. They boast that they are stronger than ever, that they will be more popular than ever: but are the Government going to keep them in power? I say they should not. The Government of this country ought to clean out these men who are mismanaging the canal. They should weed them out, and put honest men in their place, and we will have proper management on the canal. The revenue would then cover the expenditure. The Welland Canal can be managed to-day for $12,000 less than is the case, and better managed, saying nothing of the pickings (I will not say stealings), and the money wasted besides, which no doubt would be equal to another $12,000. There is no doubt at all in my mind that this saving could be made. I do not want to cut down the salaries of officers. I want every man to be well paid; I want every man to do a good day's work and to receive for it a good day's pay; to attend to his business properly, and not come to work at ten o'clock. What do we see? There are three or four deputy superintendents who come with their horses to report to their chief. You would think you were at a fair. We are paying Mr. Ellis $300 a year for his expenses for horse hire, but he does not go to the men: the men come to him and report to him, and each one gets $150 a year for horse hire, merely for reporting to Mr. Ellis every day. This is the way that business is conducted on the Welland Canal, and the sooner it is stopped the better. Mr. Demare says that he collected from the barge, "Manitowoc" $12 or $15. The evidence shows that he collected $18; that he paid in $10, and consequently he must have kept the other $8. These are some of the pickings I spoke about the other day. Take Mr. Smilie's evidence, page 176: this shows that Mr. Demare collected $18 and paid in $10 only. Smilie is a truthful witness. He must be so, because the gentleman defending the canal officials did not ask him a single question. He did not think it advisable to do so in their interests. He sent him away because he thought he knew too much. For this reason, I consider that anything Smilie says may be depended upon.

Bradley, of whom I spoke a little while ago, was discharged for refusing to make a false report against a brother lock-keeper. Mr. Demare's reason for discharging him does not appear to be anything else than that he would not make the false report required of him; he would not carry out Demare's request, and of course he must go. If this man Bradley did not give correct evidence why did they not impugn it, and bring evidence to show that he was not telling the truth? They tried to do so, but they found out that any evidence which they could bring would only confirm what Bradley said. His evidence to-day stands unimpeached, except by the statements of Demare himself,—and how much are they worth? Three of his friends swear one thing and he swears another? Can you believe his word, when it conflicts with that of a man whose evidence is unimpeached? Demare was in the witness stand ten or twelve times; his evidence is discredited; I do not believe him; I have given my reasons.

Well, so much for that charge. Now for the 10th charge: "That improper influences are brought to bear upon men, who suffer by giving information." I consider this a somewhat foolish charge. I think that hon. gentlemen can appreciate my feelings when I say that I would not put in the witness box any poor man who had to work for bread for his family, and incur the risk of being discharged. I did not do so; therefore, I do not offer any evidence on this point. I believe that hon. gentlemen will credit me when I say that men came to me and begged of me not to summon them, because they were afraid of being dismissed. In fact, in one or two instances they told me that they were threatened with dismissal if they had too much to do with me. I was a leper, who was going to destroy any one who came into contact with me. Men came to me who where employed by manufacturers on the canal, who were getting favors from the Superintendent, and begged of me not to call them as witnesses. What favors were these manufacturers getting? No doubt, they would be given a share of the pickings. This is all I will say on this charge. The 11th charge is: "In reply to Order of the House, did not give correct replies; says he could not." This is in reference to the arbitrary treatment meted out to owners of vessels. Last year, Mr. Ellis said, in regard to this matter, when I wrote a letter to the Department asking for information as to the number of vessels assisted with the diving apparatus and pumps, that he could not give a correct account of what he did do, as they did not keep the time. Therefore, he did not comply with the Order of the Senate. Of course, he could not, if it is true that he did not keep a record of the time. This is in reference to giving assistance to vessels; giving the diving apparatus and steam pumps to vessels, in competition with citizens of this country, who had provided themselves with means to render such assistance to vessels. Even since this investigation has closed they made use, at Port Dalhousie, on the Welland Canal, of the Government pump and diver. I do not know whether this service is to be paid for or not; I suppose it will be paid for now, because the thing is exposed. But before this, and while there was private plant which could have been secured to do the work, men went to the Superintendent, because they said: We can get the canal plant much cheaper, and if nobody is around we can get it for nothing." This, I think, it will be admitted, is not a very desirable state of things. When men invest their money, from $20,000 to $40,000, in plant, for the purpose of doing such work, it is not desirable that the Government should be allowed to go into competition with them. But I believe the Superintendent of the Canal has got a rap over the knuckles for this; I believe he has instructions from the Department that he must not do it again. At the time of the investigation he swears: "I am of the opinion that I should give the use of the diving armor free of charge, if I choose to do so." Of course, the Superintendent is the man that is responsible to the people of this country for the proper administration of the canal, as he tells me in his letter of last year, and adds: "I must be a terror to evil doers. I have made a cast iron rule that once a man is discharged he can never get back again." He has disregarded this rule dozens of times. If a man disagrees with his chief, and is discharged, the power behind the throne can put him back, as I will show you. Mr. Ellis says that he should give the use of the apparatus to anyone he may think proper, if not instructed to the contrary; and he says also, at page 2322: "I allow Mr. Demare to send it to whom he likes." Mr. Demare does just as he likes; Mr. Ellis lets him. But here is the funny part of it: Mr. Ellis (page 2323) says: "When we make a charge we keep the time." That is to say, if Mr. Demare makes a charge he keeps the time. How are we to depend upon Mr. Demare or find out how much work was done? I found out a good deal last year by writing all over Canada and part of the United States. I wrote a good many letters last year, because I was bound to probe this question. I was satisfied that the Government was not being fairly dealt with in this matter, but of course Mr. Demare is the sole judge of whether a man is to have this apparatus free, or whether he will make a charge. If he lets a man have it free on condition of keeping the matter quiet there is no return made to the Government. There is no check on Demare at all; he is the sole judge of how this property is to be used. It is really amusing. What did they want a pump at all for. I tried to prove to the Department of Railways and Canals, when they were getting that pump, that it was unnecessary. They have had it five or six years now, with a man taking care of it, and as far as I know to-day, they have only used it once or twice on Government work, and then they had to send for a private individual with his pump to help them. That is all the work they have done for the Government. I do not know what has been done for outside parties; and it is a question in my mind whether the Government has ever got a proper amount for this outside work. But why should the Government have a pump at all to lend to anyone at the pleasure of Mr. Demare? To one person he may say: "You cannot have it till you pay for it;" and perhaps not then, either, if he does not choose to do so, while others can get it for nothing. I would ask, is it in the interest of the country that we should have these things continue? It may be thought that I am putting it strongly—but I call your attention in every instance to the page in the evidence. It is an easy matter for anybody to correct me if I am wrong. I should be very sorry to misrepresent anything, and I will not misrepresent anything here or elsewhere. So far as this charge is concerned, I think it is proved beyond a doubt, as are most of the charges that I have made in this House.

Now, it will be my duty to tell you the circumstances disclosed by the evidence of Capt. John Ross. (See page 332 of the evidence). He went to see Mr. Ellis, and was ordered out of the office by him. He says: "I went to see him in the fall and in the spring, and the last time he ordered me out of the office, and told me if I repeated the offence he would stop me from going through the canal?" Of course Ellis was king. He said he was judge and jury. This is what the men swear to as to stopping vessels: Capt. Ross says that he stopped at the acqueduct four or five hours and when he went through the water was lower than when he came there first.

Now, about this aqueduct. When the Government of this country decided to deepen the Welland Canal to 14 feet we had an aqueduct across the Welland River which was only 12 feet deep. It was therefore necessary to build a new one; but first they cleaned out the bottom of the old one, and used it for some time, until the new one was completed, and after that we had 14 feet draft. While it was necessary, it was undesirable that vessels should stop in the aqueduct. Of course, during the investigation the gentleman defending the canal officials wanted to make out it was a terrible thing if a vessel stopped in the aqueduct, but Mr. Page settles that question. He says there is no danger to the aqueduct, though it might be bad for the vessel. There has been a great deal of delay at this place on the canal, and it has had the effect of driving business away from the canal and the St. Lawrence route and of sending it through the United States. Take the case of Capt. James Saurien (page 392). See how kind Mr. Ellis was to him. He says: "I have known vessels to be detained at the aqueduct for two days, and then to go through with less water than there was when they first came there." This is the kind of treatment that the people trading through the canal receive—vessels and their crew detained for two days at the aqueduct,—and why? You will see in the pamphlet which is sent here to prejudice the case. Mr. Rykert, Q.C., M.P., puts the question to the commissioner. "Are you satisfied with Morrison's evidence?" "Yes," says the commissioner, "if he erred at all he erred on the right side." Now, what is the right side? Is it right, when there is plenty of water for vessels to get through to keep them for forty-eight hours? Is that erring on the right side? That is the way the Mr. Ellis was popularizing the canal. This man swears that his tug was fined because he dared to speak to the man in charge,—because he dared to express an unfavorable opinion of Mr. Ellis' management. He says he came there from Port Colborne, which is eight miles from the aqueduct, to see why his tug was detained. His tug had just gone, and he spoke to the man at the aqueduct, and for daring to find fault with the management of the canal his tug is fined $20. That is the way Mr. Ellis administers the canal. If this man had said anything disagreeable or used bad language to Mr. Morrison the law of the country would have protected Morrison. Why should Mr. Ellis follow, and seize his boat, insead of taking his person for the offence? But Mr. Ellis calls himself the judge and jury. This man says that Mr. Ellis treated him very severely, and told him if he repeated the offence he would not allow his tug to go through the canal at all. The language that Capt. Saurien used was: "What could Mr. Ellis know of the management of this aqueduct, sitting in his office at St. Catharines?" And for this Mr. Ellis fines the tug $20. He knew that he could get nothing by prosecuting the man himself, but he follows his property and fines it: and Capt. Saurien has not got redress to this day. When he went to see Mr. Ellis about it the excuse given was that he had returned the money to the Government. I say the Government does not want to punish any man in that way, and the Government officer that will act as Mr. Ellis did should be punished, and not only punished, but dismissed from the public service. Take the evidence of Robert Simpson, page 1269. He has known vessels to be detained at the aqueduct when there was plenty of water to let them through. At page 1271 he says that he was present when Capt. Saurien and Morrison had some words about detaining the vessels. Mr. Morrison would not allow some vessels through unless there was at least 6 inches more water in the aqueduct than the vessel was drawing. On this point, let us look at Mr. Page's evidence, and it will be seen that if the officer in charge had shown any judgment he could have allowed the vessels to proceed slowly until they grounded. As the space is narrow, there would be no difficulty then by backing the wheel in, raising the water and floating the vessel. But the orders were that there must be a certain depth of water in excess of the draft of the vessel; and vessels must be kept for forty-eight hours, if necessary, though it would appear that after keeping them for this length of time they were allowed to go through with less water than was in the aqueduct when they arrived there. This is what is driving business away from the canal, though the commissioner says that it is erring on the right side. I have nothing to say against Mr. Morrison; I believe his evidence is all right, but the instructions he received were not all right. Take the evidence of Charles Carter, who was harbor master at Port Colborne: he says that the management of the aqueduct was destroying the trade on the canal. Mr. Carter is a good authority, or ought to be, seeing that he is a Government official, and was formerly a vessel owner, and has been a sailor all his life. A son of this Mr. Carter, Mr. Sperry Carter, who was also a sailor, gives it as his opinion that at the time these vessels were at the aqueduct for two days there was plenty of water to allow them to go through: but the orders were specific, and of course Mr. Morrison had to carry them out. I gather from the commissioner's remarks during the investigation that he was satisfied with Mr. Morrison's evidence. He (the commissioner) said that if Morrison erred at all it was on the safe side. Was it on the safe side to drive the business of the country from the canal?

Charge 13 — Ellis and Demare are charged with having friends and pets, and Demare with being a pet of Ellis'—that in order to get work, fitness is not required, but it is essential that he should belong to the clique—that is to say, should be friendly with Ellis and Demare, or belong to the Port Dalhousie band. I suppose that is the meaning of it. I said something about this the other day. There are a good many musicians employed on the Welland Canal. They have a band hall at Port Dalhousie, and a great many employés belong to the band. Mr. Demare is the president, and of course he sees that the band boys have the plums, if there are any going. If they want to get away to play anywhere he allows them to go, and puts men in their places, and if there is any extra work going the band boys get it. They have an original character there called Daly, a drummer. You will see by the evidence that Mr. Demare is very favorable to drummers. On page 816 Daniel Sylvain's evidence as to drummer Daly is that he was drunk. (See also page 1015, where we find that drummer Daly was drunk at Waite's house and unfit for work). Page 1016: "Saw Daly drunk at Lock 5 and unable to do his work." Albert Johnston was expelled from Government employ for being drunk, but the cast iron rule did not apply in his case, for he was leader in the band, next to the bandmaster, and he was restored to employment. John House, lock-keeper (see page 1644) was favored as being a member of the band, and Mr. Demare's body servant. This man was also a drummer, and gets $43 a month as lockmaster. By the pay-list for July, 1885, we see that he was paid for 15 days' extra time; in August was paid for six days extra; in September, 7½ days extra; in July, 1888, was paid for extra work, $22.75; in August, 1888, for extra work, $16.63 (page 946); in September, 1886, was paid extra $17.36. Now, these drummers, Daly and House, seem to have been great favorites with the president of the band at Port Dalhousie. Cornelius Reid, the foreman, says at page 1257, that he found fault with Daly to Mr. Demare on account of his drinking; that he was twice so drunk that he could not work: but he did not discharge Daly, because Demare said that the band boys wanted him to keep him on. He said he wanted Daly because the band boys wanted him. He says: "I went down on the scow, and this man dared me to discharge him. I did not discharge him, on account of what Mr. Demare had said to me." When Demare is called, he says (page 1618), that he had not the slightest recollection of saying "the band boys," but he spoke of the "boys;" but nobody should place much reliance on anything that Mr. Demare would say, who knows how his evidence as to farming lands on shares was contradicted.

To show that Mr. Demare is a pet of Ellis', Mr. Ellis recommended that the Government should pay him, Demare, $100 extra, and he returned it in pay-lists, March, 1887. (See p. 132, Sessional Papers, 43 to 82, last Session). Mr. Ellis wishes to pay his pet on repairs, although working under Mr. Page on construction, and getting a salary of $1,200 per year. The Government refused to pay him that. (See letter from Department, 14th April, 1887, requesting Mr. Ellis to report the facts, and instructing Mr. R. D. Dunn not to pay the $100). He receives $1,200, $150 horse hire, rent free, and land farmed on shares for his benefit.

This $300 increase he got in March, 1886; I see it in the pay-lists. There is no authority for paying him this money. I am of opinion that he is receiving it illegally to this day. If there is an Order in Council authorizing the payment I should like to see it; and if the Government have got it let them produce it. Here is this man on the Welland Canal who raises a subordinate's salary by $300 a year, while the Prime Minister of this country cannot increase the salary of one of his clerks $50 a year without going to Parliament for authority to do so. But Mr. Ellis says that he and he alone is responsible to the people of Canada for the management of the Welland Canal. He is like Alexander Selkirk: he is monarch of all he surveys; his right there is none to dispute, and all along the Welland Canal he thinks he can do just as he pleases. I will pass charge 14 and come now to the 15th charge. This is a very serious matter. The facts that I am about to dwell upon have been proved by the report of the Chief Engineer, Mr. Page, which was submitted to this House last Session and can be found in the Senate Debates of last year. I refer particularly to the fact that the Welland Canal sustained damage to the extent of $25,000 a year ago last January from a storm. Mr. Ellis had plenty of men and means at his disposal to prevent that loss. The Government had primâ facie evidence of this man's incapacity and negligence. Why did they not suspend him during the investigation? I asked the Government to do so, but they thought it would be unjust to Mr. Ellis and contrary to British fair play to suspend a man with such a grave charge hanging over him. But I had made my statement publicly in Parliament, and I was responsible for it. They might have known that I would not have taken such a step without having abundant evidence to sustain me. The Government said, in their kindness of heart: "We will not suspend these men, we will give them a fair trial." Well, they have had more than a fair trial, and by the time I get through you will agree with me that sufficient evidence has been elicted to justify the Government in dismissing them from their positions on the Welland Canal. It is unnecessary to refer to the evidence on the 15th charge, you have all seen or can see the report of the Chief Engineer in the Senate Debates of last Session. I would refer you to Mr. Page's evidence on pages 1400 to 1427. The country has lost $25,000 through the negligence of Mr. Ellis, who, according to Mr. Page's statement, had plenty of men and means at his disposal to prevent it.

I come now to the last charge in this list. It refers to William Mossop. This is the gentleman who is represented as being a very bad man. He has been guilty of the greatest sin he could commit in their estimation: they accuse him of giving me the information that led to the investigation. Now let us see what the men who worked with Mossop have to say as to his character. Of course Mr. Rykert brought any number of witnesses to swear away Mossop's character. They thought if they could only blacken his reputation that it would save themselves. They were under the impression that I was prosecuting the case on behalf of this man Mossop; but Mr. Mossop is nothing to me more than any other poor man. I have known him, it is true, since he was a child, and I know him to be an honest, industrious man. I do not deny that Mr. Ellis had a right to discharge him if he committed any offence: all that I did was to write to Mr. Ellis requesting him, as Mossop had a large family, to provide for him continuous employment on the canal during the winter. I read to the House last Session the correspondence that passed between Mr. Ellis and myself. As I said then, I say now, that when a public servant in this country has the cheek to write such a letter as Mr. Ellis wrote to me, and say that he alone was responsible for the management of a great public work like the Welland Canal, I consider it my duty to see how far he is deserving of a position in which he assumes such a large responsibility. This is what led me to look into his management. When he tells me that he makes it a cast-iron rule not to reinstate a man who has been dismissed, and that he must be a terror to evil-doers, I like to see whether he has been consistent in the course he has pursued. It is amusing to think of William Ellis, the Superintendent of the Welland Canal, being a terror to anybody in any shape. I thought if I could get half a dozen witnesses to prove Mr. Mossop's character it would be enough, and I ask you to examine the evidence on this point and judge for yourselves what manner of man Mr. Mossop is. I ask you also to look at the evidence given against him. They say that because he would not work for a man because he wanted a quarter of a dollar a day more than they were willing to give him he is a bad man. Was it such a sin for a man to try to make the best bargain he could to try to support his family? In the letter which appears in last year's Debates, Mr. Ellis tells me that Mossop was a quarrelsome man, that he had fights with him. It is a terrible thing to have a box-to strike back when one is struck; why, even a worm will turn when it is trampled upon! His boss struck him, and Mossop struck back, and he would have been less than a man if he had failed to do so. He would have been a slouch to submit to such treatment.

HON. Mr. KAULBACH — He should turn the other cheek.

HON. Mr. McCALLUM — Mossop did not do that. I suppose if he had turned the other cheek and held his tongue, he would have been employed on the Welland Canal to-day; but he is an Irishman, or rather of Irish descent, and he was not the man to submit to that. I have known him from childhood, and I knew his father before him, and I know that he comes of good stock. Now let us see what the evidence is. Walter Chatfield, the gentleman of leisure of whom I spoke the other day, says that Mossop was civil in every respect while working with him. Cornelius Reid says that he has known Mossop for 8 years, that he is not quarrelsome; that his reputation is good; that he is sober, civil and industrious. George Nicholson says that he worked with Mossop who was his boss, and that he was an agreeable man to work under. The principal grievance against Mossop was that he wanted the men to work too long hours. Of course, the men did not like that, but no doubt he had his instructions from the Deputy Superintendent and had to do as he was told. That was the only fault that Nicholson had to find with him. Edward Smilie said that he had known Mossop since he was a boy, and had always found him to be civil, industrious and agreeable, and not quarrelsome. Humphrey Julian's evidence will be found on page 763. I want to repeat that this man Julian is as honest and respectable a man as stands in Canada to-day. He had known Mossop from boyhood, and he says that Mossop was an industrious and steady man, and that he is raising a respectable family. That is the character he gives him. William M. Jones said that he has known Mossop since he was going to school, and has worked with him a good deal; has always found him to be quiet and not quarrelsome. He was a witness of the fight at Port Dalhousie, and says that Marshall struck Mossop first and that Mossop struck back. That is the fight that Mr. Ellis talks about. This man Jones is employed on the canal, and when he was brought to give evidence had the courage to tell the truth, whether it resulted in his being dismissed or not. Jonathan Woodall stated that he had known Mossop ever since he was a child, and never knew him to be quarrelsome; that he is industrious, sober and hard-working. William Tinline had worked with him, and had always found him an agreable man to work with, and never heard him give a man an uncivil word in his life. The only disagreeable thing he had ever known about Mossop was that he wanted to get the men to work at 7 in the morning while working for Miller. Joseph Culp stated that he had known Mossop, and never knew him to be quarrelsome; that he was always a quiet, good natured man. Thomas Ryan, who worked with Mossop at different times for about twelve years, said he had always found him to be an agreable man to work with for the time that he was under his charge. Cornelius Reid said he had always found Mossop to be a good, peaceable, kind man, and had never heard any complaints against him. That is the character that Mossop gets from those who have worked with him and under him, and known him from boyhood. But whatever Mossop's character may have been, whatever he may have said or done, does not palliate or justify the conduct of the officials as exposed in the investigation. Mossop is to-day in a foreign country, endeavoring to earn bread for his family, who are still in Canada, living at section No. 1 on the Welland Canal. There are plenty of men working on the canal, such as the drummers I have spoken of, who are kept there simply because they are pets of Demare's—men who are working extra time and getting $20 or $30 a month in addition to their regular wages It seems that the principal qualification that is required for a man to obtain work on the canal is to belong to the clique at Port Dalhousie, and to the band particularly; and I think by the time I get through you will find that this band and the band hall at Port Dalhousie are quite an institution. I could mention some of the entertainments they give there; I could mention something also about instruments that came into this country free of duty. I could refer to clogs which are admitted duty free, and which, I presume, are used for clog dances at the Port Dalhousie band entertainments. I have now concluded the list of charges as divided by the commissioner, and I propose to take up the question of maladministration of the canal It is very important and desirable that a public official, occupying such a responsible position as that of Superintendent of the Welland Canal, should be civil and obliging to every one that approaches him on business, and the Government and the people of this country expect that to be part of his qualifications. Whatever else he may lack, he should at least possess that. I shall now give you the evidence of witnesses as to Mr. Ellis' manner of treating people who had business to do at his office. At page 313 Nelson Current says: "I was treated rudely and shabbily by Mr. Ellis when I went to see him on business." At page 320 Alexander Stuart, a bridge-tender, says that Mr. Ellis discharged him because he did not run to open the gate for J. B. Smith. That was the trouble: he did not run when Mr. Ellis snapped his fingers. I have seen Alexander Stuart, and he is as good a specimen of a man as stands in Canada to-day, but he was taken back again—the cast iron rule did not work there. The power behind the throne got him back; Mr. Rykert had him put on again. As Stuart says in his evidence: "I got a letter a few days afterwards from Mr. Ellis by Mr. Demare that I was to go to work again." When I asked him why he was discharged, he said: "Because I did not run he discharged me, and I had a pair of knee boots on my feet. We were puddling clay when he called me." That was not a very good reason for discharging a man, because when he had a large pair of knee boots on his feet he did not run to please Mr. Ellis. If Mr. Ellis had been a good judge of human nature he would have said to Stuart: "I see you have a heavy pair of boots on; give me the key and I will open the gates myself." He would have made a friend of that man for life; but no, the tyrant showed itself when the occasion occured, and because Mr. Stuart would not run to open the gate for J. B. Smith, Mr. Ellis' broker, he was discharged. There is another gentleman, Mr. John McDonagh, of Thorold, who gave evidence which will be found at page 342. He says that he was treated rudely by Mr. Ellis because he refused to lend him $800 and also refused to endorse his paper. Mr. McDonagh is respected wherever he is known. He was councillor of his own town for three years, reeve of his town for four years, mayor of his town for four years, magistrate of his county for twenty years; and last, though not least, he is president of the Conservative Association of Welland, a position he has occupied for the last eighteen years.

HON. MR. READ—That is a good recommendation.

HON. MR. McKAY (C.B.)—Why did he dismiss him?

HON. MR. McCALLUM—He did not dismiss Mr. McDonagh, because he was not employed on the canal, but he treated Mr. McDonagh rudely. Mr. Ellis, as the evidence shows, is a very nice, civil man when he is paid for his civility, but Mr. McDonagh did not bleed: he would not lend Mr. Ellis the money. But Mr. McDonagh's principal offence was that he did not copy and send this celebrated letter for Mr. Ellis to Sir Charles Tupper:—

"Please copy and forward.

"THOROLD, 30th April, 1880.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

"DEAR SIR,—I have only recently heard Mr. Ellis, our new Canal Superintendent, is only receiving $2,000 a year salary, $900 a year less than Mr. Bodwell, his predecessor—and I feel it only an act of justice to him to say that Mr. Ellis has worked very hard and done more judicious well-done and much-needed work along the canal already than has been done for years—and the improvements he has made are so important, and so much appreciated by all the captains, vessel owners and citizens generally, that everybody is sounding his praises in the highest terms, and it will afford the greatest satisfaction, I am sure, to everybody, irrespective of politics, to hear that the salary of so deserving and efficient an officer is at least raised to the full amount received by his incompetent predecessor.

"Yours respectfully,

"JOHN McDONAGH.

"P. S.—Of course, I intend to ask Mr. Rykert, McCallum and Bunting to try and help me before they leave Ottawa."

I have got the original of this letter, and I think it ought to be lithographed and put in a frame. Although this letter is signed with John McDonagh's name he never wrote it or signed it—it is in Mr. Ellis' handwriting. I have stood a great deal of the expense, so far, in connection with this investigation, and I think for the benefit of posterity this letter ought to be lithographed at the expense of the country. Was there ever such a letter written? The object was to deceive the Government in this instance, as he has been doing in other directions. If ever there was a case of a man blowing his own horn I think you will say it is this. I repeat, Mr Ellis is always civil when there is anything to be gained for himself by his civility, but he is violent and rude when people refuse his requests. Mr. Ellis says that he ordered Mr. McDonagh out of his office and threatened to kick him out; but if he had attempted to do so he would have had the biggest contract on hand that he ever undertook. He knew better than that. When he had the protection of the court as a witness he was not afraid to say that he threatened to kick Mr. McDonagh, but he would take good care not to say it elsewhere in Mr. McDonagh's presence. The fact is, when he ordered Mr. McDonagh out of his office the reply was: "Yes; I am always ready to go out of a gentleman's office when I am told to do so, but come outside with me." Mr. Ellis did not follow him. Mr. Ellis gets free gas on the Welland Canal from the gas company of St. Catharines, who have a bulk sum contract with the Government to supply gas on the Welland Canal for $10,000 a year. We find that the company made a present to Mr. Ellis—that by a resolution of the board they gave him free gas for light and fuel. What do they give it to him for? Is it for his good looks? He is a pretty good looking man, but I do not think they give him free gas light and free fuel because of his attractive appearance. I have already read to you section 31 of the canal regulations, which forbids any man employed on the canal receiving directly or indirectly anything more than his salary. The intention of the Parliament of Canada is that every man employed on that great work should be honest, and should depend upon his salary alone for a living. If any man does not get salary enough the proper course is to raise the salary, and not have him looking around for testimonials and bonuses and favors from the people who want special advantages on the canal. We commenced to take evidence on this gas question early in the investigation. I had a good deal of trouble to get evidence on the subject, and had some difficulty in getting the commissioner to admit the letter that I have just read. We got it in one day, and the next day the commissioner wanted to take it out, and I, on behalf of the people, protested. He said he would expunge it out of the evidence. I asked him how he could do that? I said: "I have a copy of the evidence; are you going to take me by the throat and force me to give it up? I should like to see the man that would undertake to do that." He said he would expunge it from the copy he sent to the Government. I said: "You can expunge the whole evidence if you like, but anything I have got you cannot get." What was the result? He sent to Toronto to the Chief Justice to get his opinion; and what was the reply? I did not see the letter, but I take the commissioner's word for it. He said: "Take all the evidence you can get." Did he take the advice of the Chief Justice? Not at all, as I shall show before I get through. On the subject of free gas to Mr. Ellis, Mr. Francis Timmins, secretary and a director of the gas company at St. Catharines, was examined. His evidence will be found at page 94. Mr. Timmins said: "We gave Mr. Ellis free gas by a resolution of the board, and the reason stated for giving Mr. Ellis free gas is that we have always been treated gentlemanly by Mr. Ellis, and on account of his courtesy and civility." I have shown you how courteous he was to Mr. McDonagh, Mr. Current, Capt. Saurien and Capt. Ross. But then they had no free gas to give. Mr. Timmins further said that Mr. Ellis had control of the gas on the canal—that is, he had the control of the consumption of the gas on the canal. He can order the lock-tenders to turn down the gas and, as a matter of fact, that is the practice that has been followed on the canal for some time. But the commissioner says there is nothing in the gas question so far as the canal is concerned. I will endeavor to show that there is. According to the evidence of Mr. Chatfield, the gentleman of leisure that I have been speaking about, Mr. Ellis burns gas for fuel in his house. He ought to know, because he is a gas-fitter, and put in the gas fixtures and gas stoves in Mr. Ellis' house. I believe the Government can demonstrate, if they choose, though no evidence was taken on the subject, that Mr. Demare burns gas in his house which is charged to the Government. I intended to give the commissioner an occular demonstration of the fact, but owing to the disagreement between us towards the end of the investigation I was unable to do so. The gas that Mr. Demare consumes passes through a meter and is charged to the Government; and then, as I understand, Mr. Demare has got a meter that was used in the old canal office as a blind, Mr. Timmins said, that they collected bills every month; but if they collected bills every month, is it likely that they would let this man's bill stand for three years? If he was burning five gas jets for three years, is it likely that the meter would record it? I think they gave themselves away on that question. I am satisfied if the Government will send a man there to investigate the matter they will find that what I say is true, especially if the frost is deep enough in the ground to prevent them changing the pipe; and now I shall endeavor to show you what the saving is to the gas company by having the gas turned down, as it has been for years on the Welland Canal. The evidence goes to show that except while a vessel is passing through the gas is turned down three-quarters. In fact, it is turned out altogether on moonlight nights. Now, I have made a calculation of the saving effected by the company in return for giving Mr. Ellis free gas and free fuel, and a subscription of $100 to a testimonial. It is as follows:—

Memo. of vessels going through the Welland Canal per published returns:—

1887—Down, at Port Colborne.....	892
Say the same number up.....	892
	1,784
1888—Down, at Port Colborne..... ...	914
Say the same number up.....	914
	1,828

Or say, in round numbers, about 1,800 up and down per year—about seven months and twenty-five days, less thirty-four Sundays, at twenty hours each, which leaves 205 days or, say, 5,056 hours, leaving each vessel an average time of two hours and forty-eight minutes to lock. The evidence shows that it takes on an average twenty-five minutes to lock a vessel. But allowing them twenty-three minutes more, that will make it forty-eight minutes that the gas is burnt at full flare. Now if the gas is turned three-quarters down for the other two hours, as the evidence shows, Mr. Ellis saves for the gas company one-half of the gas by his orders, while the business of the country suffers. (See Donald McPhee's evidence on pages 777 to 779). So the gas company made a good investment for the stockholders when they gave Mr. Ellis free gas and allowed him to use it for fuel, and also gave him $100 in cash besides. He (Ellis) gives the gas company more than he takes by turning down the gas. While we are paying for gas that we do not get, the business of the country suffers, and people get drowned in the Welland Canal. I do not mean to accuse Mr. Ellis or the gas company of being the cause of the unfortunate drowning accident by which a young man and a young woman lost their lives; but it is a question for you to consider, when I get through, whether they did not contribute, to a certain extent, to the death of those two people. A young man named Clark and a young lady named Miss Kennedy left St. Catharines on the evening of the 18th of August, 1885, for a drive along the bank of the canal. They had a perfect right to expect to find the gas burning. The canal bank is a road used by the public. At each gate, wherever a bridge crosses the canal, every bridge-tender has a key, and he locks the gate if the road is not open to the public. When Mr. Clark and Miss Kennedy drove along the canal bank they had a right to expect that the gas would be burning full flare, because they knew the country was paying for it. The evidence goes to show that the gas was turned down at the time the drowning accident occurred. I took the evidence of Mr. Donald McPhee, an expert, and it goes to show that where Mr. Clark and the young lady were drowned, if the gas had been turned full flare a hole in the sidewalk could have been seen. No inquest was held. I do not like to say that the influence of the gas company prevented an inquest, but Edward Goodman, who is the coroner, and who is also a director in the gas company, was on the spot after the accident. However, no inquest was held. I remember the lock-tender gave evidence on this question; he was the only person during the whole of the investigation to whom I said an unkind word. He could not tell me, though he was within a few hundred feet of where Mr. Clark was drowned, and was the lock-tender at that lock, whether the gas was burning that night or not; and I said to him: "You are a know-nothing." The evidence of Mr. Goodman, the coroner, will be found on pages 1531 to 1537. He says that the gas company gave Mr. Ellis free gas and $100 towards his testimonial because they thought he was worthy of it. Joseph D. Carroll, the old gentleman that tried to prove that Mr. Demare pays for the gas in his house, says that he has nothing to do with the gas metres—that his son does that business. He says further, at page 93, that he has nothing to do with the accounts. I remember, at the time I asked him the name of his son, and he said Joseph, and I said: "We have got the wrong Joseph." But this old gentleman is recalled for the defence, and his evidence will be found at page 2325. He says he took the record of the meter at Mr. Demare's house and found that he had used 25 or 30 cents worth of gas. When first called he knew nothing at all about this—said that his son attended to the matter; but when he comes to give his evidence later on he knows all about it. I think it will be found that Mr. Demare gets his gas free, because the Government pays for it. Mr. Carroll says that he never rendered Mr. Demare an account. Why should he render him an account? Mr. Demare takes his gas after it goes through the Government metre, and he has burnt it for three years in his house, using five jets, as can be seen from Mr. C. Demare's evidence. Mr. Carroll further remarks that he never rendered an account to Mr. Demare although Mr. Demare had asked for it. It is very strange and very improbable evidence. There was a witness named Vanderburg, a very important individual, who gave evidence at the investigation. He is the gentleman who, when first called, knew nothing about the band hall—had only seen it in passing by it; but when re-called remembered that he had a mortgage on the property. This man's evidence, as you will see by reading it, at page 490, was most unsatisfactory as to the management of repairs and works on the Welland Canal, the manner in which the time is kept and also his charges for travelling expenses. He charges as high as $205.90 in one year for railway fares. The first time he was called he swore that he paid full fare, but I got out of him when he was re-called that he only paid between $32 and $36. I refer you to his evidence, pages 1548 to 1559. You will also observe that his mode of keeping time was very unsatisfactory: he mixed red and black marks, writing one over the other—the red marks were in mourning, at times. There ought to be a different system of time-keeping, Now, it is strange that Mr. Ellis would certify to this man's account when he must have known, or ought to have known, that he had not been paying any such sum for railway fares; but it is easily explained if you will look over the pay-lists. You can see, almost invariably, that whenever Mr.

Vanderburg is paid so much per month for travelling expenses Mr. Ellis is paid nearly as much more, and he could not very well check Mr. Vanderburg under the circumstances. Although the country pays Mr. Ellis $300 a year for horse hire, Mr. Ellis charges the country with a large sum for horse hire paid to Mr. Foster, a livery man in St. Catharines. It is hard to tell how much Mr. Foster was paid—I do not believe the Department even knows. It was mixed up with the accounts of that gentleman of leisure, Walter Chatfield. At pages 1556 to 1559 of the evidence you will see Mr. Vanderburg's statement about measuring plank. You will find it interesting reading. At page 286 Thomas O'Neil, a foreman, describes how a dry wall was built at Neelon's mill and McCordick's tannery. The wall is about 200 feet long, and this man, O'Neil, worked at the spoke factory and at the bridge across the race, and got his pay at the canal office. He also swears that he returned to the canal office as work done for the Government the expense of liquid refreshments—lager beer. Mr. J. B. Smith certified to the list, knowing that this represented an expenditure for beer and not for work done. If it was thought necessary to furnish men with lager beer, why was it not properly returned? Why should it be concealed in this way? But the fact is, the employés on the canal paid for their beer by returning time to the Government for work which was not done. I would like to call your attention next to the fact the we have a storekeeper on the Welland Canal, Mr. W. W. Wait. There is about as much use for a storekeeper on the canal as there is for the fifth wheel to a waggon. It costs more to deliver the goods on the canal than their original value, and there are teams going along the canal all the time in the employ of the Government, which could deliver any good required. I had Wait's books before me, and such a set of books I never saw. I had him under examination three times, and he could not make anything out of his own books. The first time he was examined I asked him why it was necessary to build weighs cales there? I was of an inquiring turn of mind, and I wanted to know everything. He told me that he weighed 20 tons of scrap iron that was on its way to Wilson's foundry. I said to the commissioner, if he would follow this scrap iron further he would see it grow smaller and beautifully less, as it did. The Government pays Wait $1,020 a year, furnishes him a house and a piece of land rent free. Mr. Wait in his evidence, at page 628, says that he ordered people to vacate land at Lock 6 for the personal benefit of Mr. Ellis. As I said before, this storekeeper is a useless official; he is not wanted at all; he is only a bill of expense; and he is not the only one—there are several of them. Such officials should be dispensed with; idle men we do not want. Now, on the subject of the detention of vessels on the canal, I would ask you to read the evidence of Capt. James C. Hume, at page 448. His steamboat was detained in the canal for over an hour by getting on the bank, the canal not being properly lighted. Here, you see, a loss was sustained by the owner of the vessel through the turning down of the gas. If Mr. Ellis is to get free gas and free fuel, and a handsome testimonial, he must make some return to the gas company, though the business of the country should suffer. I want now to direct your attention to a case of tyranny on the canal. Martin Nestor, at page 338, says. "I was threatened to be discharged from the canal by Mr. Smith and Mr. Ellis because I was unfortunate, and got into debt through sickness in my family. I was told I would be discharged if I did not pay so much a month. By an order of the judge I was paying $2 or $3 a month, and Mr. Ellis wanted to stop $5 or $10 a month from me at the canal office." And they did stop it. They were not satisfied that this poor man, who had got behind through sickness and death in his family, should pay so much under the order of the court, but they wanted to deduct a further sum from his wages. Mr. Dunn said that Mr. Ellis would not be satisfied unless the money was paid to him, when Nestor wanted to pay it on the judgment. Mr. Ellis forgot the time he was in difficulties himself, when he sent his broker Smith around among the employés of the canal to raise funds to get himself out of trouble. He was not satisfied with the order of the judge compelling Nestor to pay so much a month on the judgment, but used his power as Superintendent of the Welland Canal to tyrannize over this poor man. Another case of tyranny is stated by John Clark, whose evidence will be found at page 483. Clark was a bridge-tender and a lock-tender on the canal. He said he was discharged off his bridge to make a place for a man named Secord, who had a broken foot; he was asked to go to the lock to make room for this lame man, but he could not go, as he had himself a lame back. Neither Mr. Ellis nor Mr. Demare spoke to him, and he has had no redress to this day. He had no friend at court, and of course he had to suffer. What did Mr. Ellis and Mr. Demare care for this poor man—what did they care if his family suffered through their tyranny? We use a good deal of paint on the Welland Canal. F. T. Walton, at page 540, describes this beautiful paint procured from Battle & Smith, that the lock-tenders stuck fast to. That paint costs $1.90 per gallon, while good white lead could have been had for $1.40 per gallon. Now, why do we use this poor paint on the canal when good paint can be purchased much cheaper? I cannot say; but I may mention the fact that Mr. Smith, of the firm of Battle & Smith, is a son of J. B. Smith, Mr. Ellis' broker. As for the quality of this paint, Charles Newbold speaks at page 599. He says they had to put canvas over the shanties to keep themselves from sticking to the paint. James Reynolds, at page 713, says that his clothes stuck to the paint, and he covered it with cotton. I inquired who had put on this paint, and learned that it was John Doig and Robert Johnson, members of the Port Dalhousie band. I knew it must either be the fault of the paint or the painters. On the subject of deficient light on the canal, I would direct your attention to the evidence of Isaac Johnson, at page 578. He was not on his lock the night young Clark and Miss Kennedy were drowned, but at Lock No. 4. His evidence is very unsatisfactory on that matter, but evidently from what he says the gas was either turned down or not burning at all. Had it been burning he would have told me that it was. Another matter to which I wish to refer while speaking of the maladministration on the canal, is the statement made by Charles Newbold in his evidence, at page 598, that a boy of 16 years of age was put on a lock to relieve a man that was sick, both drawing pay, no doubt. That I think you will agree with me is a very bad practice. I would now direct your attention to Roebrt Foster's evidence, which will be found at page 211. Foster is the livery man of whom I spoke a few minutes ago. It was impossible to find out from him the amount which he received for livery rigs furnished to Mr. Ellis, because his books had been destroyed. However, we learn this fact, that although Mr. Ellis is allowed $300 a year for horse hire the Government pay his livery bills. I would direct your attention on this point to page 67 of the evidence, and also to the account of the money received by Mr. Foster and to the report of the Auditor General and the pay-lists. Mr. Foster's account in 1888 was $291.50, and in 1889 it was $454.50, divided between Mr. Chatfield and Mr. Ellis.

John Ferguson gives evidence at page 642 as to the drowning of young Clark and Miss Kennedy. He says that he went to Lock 3, and then he had to run to Lock 4 before he could get any assistance to take these people out of the canal. This man Johnson was at Lock 4 instead of being at his own lock. John Wilde, a lock-tender, says at page 640 that he met Ferguson coming after a light and knew he was a stranger. This shows plainly that the gas was not burning at the time young Clark and Miss Kennedy were drowned, although the people of this country pay the gas company of St. Catharines $10,000 a year for lighting the canal. I said a while ago that I did not like to assert that the transactions between Mr. Ellis and the gas company caused the loss of these two lives, but it is for the House to say how far they are responsible for that disaster. Taking all the facts in connection with the case, it seems clear that the gas was not burning on the night of that accident and that these lives might not have been lost if the gas had been burning at full flare.

Edward Smilie, referring to Mr. Miller's contract for building the pontoon, says at page 679 that they took six or eight sticks of timber to use in the building of the pontoon. Mr. Rykert did not ask Mr. Smilie a single question, because he felt that the witness knew too much about what had been going on.

Smilie also says that they took Government spikes in the presence of Vanderburg, and that after that they used Government spikes altogether for the pontoon. I have spoken already about the case of Alex. Abbey, from whom they collected money to pay Mr. Ellis' debts, on the condition that he should be employed on the canal at a certain rate per day. They said to him: "We want to hire your horse," and Abbey replied: "What will you pay me?" They said: "$1 a day," but Mr. Abbey refused to work for that and demanded $1.25. Then they said: "If you will allow 50 cents a day to go towards the payment of Mr. Ellis' debts we will pay you $1.50." That is the evidence of Mr. Abbey, and it gives some idea of what has been going on in connection with the management of this canal for some years.

At the request of the leader of the House, the conclusion of Mr. McCallum's speech was postponed to the 21st instant.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE moved—

That when the House adjourns this day it do stand adjourned until Thursday, the 20th instant, at 8:30 in the evening.

He said: In making this motion, I am following a practice which has for a long time prevailed in the Senate. In this instance, we lose but two working days, Monday and Tuesday. I should like to know from the Government if any pressing business is likely to present itself before next Thursday that might be retarded in any way by this adjournment? However, it is perhaps unnecessary to ask the question, because sufficient notice has been given of my intention to move for this adjournment, and there is no doubt that if it would in any way interfere with the business of the House the representatives of the Government in this Chamber would have intimated the fact to me. Under the circumstances, I think there is not likely to be any opposition to the motion.

HON. MR. ALMON—I should like to know from the leader of the House if the adoption of this motion will interfere with the public business in this Chamber. If they think it will not, I shall vote for the motion.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I may state that the adjournment will not interfere with the Government business in the Senate. In the Commons the discussion which is now in progress on Mr. McCarthy's Bill is likely to continue for two or three days longer, so that I can see no objection to this brief adjournment.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—My hon. friend says that this motion is in accordance with the practice of the House. I know it is in accordance with the hon. gentleman's habit to ask for these adjournments.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—My hon. friend is in error; this is the first motion of the kind that I have ever proposed.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—It seems to me that the hon. gentleman displays a good deal of temerity in bringing this matter before the House. Of course, it is within his right, but one who devotes so little attention to the business of the Senate, and so seldom appears in his place here, can hardly form an opinion of the state of the public business, and should hesitate before asking for such an adjournment as this. I thought we had come to the conclusion, in the early portion of the Session, when we adjourned for nearly two weeks, that there would be no more adjournments this Session.

More than that: I was under the impression that every proposition for such an adjournment should come from our leader, who should be responsible for the business of the House; and if the leader of the Senate has evaded his position, and allowed the matter to come from my hon. friend from Toronto, I consider that he has shirked his responsibility. Some hon. gentlemen here, in anticipation of this adjournment, have put their Bills off until the latter part of next week. Some eight or ten Bills have thus been postponed, among them a very important Bill, introduced by the hon. member from Monck, affecting the whole of the Dominion, which has been stopped in committee in expectation that this adjournment would be granted. It is virtually an adjournment for ten days, Friday excepted, that is proposed; because we know that any Bill coming up on Thursday night will receive no consideration. It is a sham day, because we come here late in the evening, and after routine proceedings nothing is done. Next week there is only one holiday, Ash Wednesday. If my hon. friend is religiously disposed, let him go home and attend to his religious duties, but it is not necessary that the whole House should adjourn for Ash Wednesday.

In my opinion, when members absent themselves on these holidays they should lose a day's pay, and if they did we would not hear of so many adjournments. (Oh! oh!) I say it is so. Some hon. gentlemen move in this matter simply to get so many more holidays at the expense of the public. That is the amount of it. (Cries of "Oh! oh!" and "order"). We hold responsible positions here, and we are supposed to sacrifice something for the public good and to come here to transact the public business. But when we take these long holidays we are neglecting the public business. We have as good a right to be here as the members of the House of Commons. The people come to the Capital expecting to find us here, and on their arrival learn that we have gone away on holidays. Now, that is not in the public interest. It is unquestionably derogatory to our position in the eyes of the public. I have referred to one important Bill that is postponed because of these holidays, and there are other Bills besides, the passage of which is imperilled because some members want to go home for a few days. There are half a dozen notices on the Order Paper which, if properly discussed, will occupy all the time included in the holidays. It is deluding the public to say that we propose to sit on Thursday next. When the Senate meets at 8:30 in the evening after an adjournment no business is transacted. I know there are Government measures and private measures that ought to be on the Paper, and would be if this adjournment had not been proposed; but they are all staved off on account of this adjournment. I am doing my duty to the public and to the Senate when I protest against this practice continuing If we must have an adjournment, let the proposal come from the leader of the House, and let him take the responsibility. If he does, and can show that it does not interfere with the public business I should not have the same objections that I have to this motion. We have plenty of business before us, and, as a fact, we rush through the business every day in order to clear the Order Paper by 6 o'clock. We sometimes accuse the Government of not having measures ready for us. They should be ready, and the Government deserve censure if we are without work. We have been here nearly four weeks, and if the leader of the House tells us that there is no Government measure to engage our attention, and that we can practically adjourn for ten days without injury to the public interest, he condemns himself and his colleagues. We should have something to do; otherwise we have no right to be here at all. I feel warm on this matter. This motion is brought up to accommodate a few members who live within a short distance of the Capital. If they want to go home, why not let them go, and take the consequence of their absence. If they wish to remain here, there is nothing to prevent them keeping Ash Wednesday at the Capital. Merchants and others can attend to their business and properly observe the holiday; but the main object of this motion is that the members may retain as much of their pay as possible. (Cries of "Oh! oh!" and "order"). I believe the hon. gentleman opposite who says "Oh! oh!" is governed by just these motives. I am sorry if I have trampled on his corns. When I was asked to join this honorable body I felt, as I believe every member of the Senate should feel, that in order to discharge my duties properly here I should be prepared to sacrifice, to some extent, my private interest and my personal convenience. I protest against this adjournment, because we are imperiling the passage of important measures; and, in view of all the facts, I ask the House to hesitate before consenting to the motion.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté)—There are few members of this House who can go home as easily as I can, and very often I have supported motions for adjournments; but in this instance I think it my duty to vote against the proposal, for this reason: I am in charge of a Bill, and there are parties here watching its progress who are waiting to telegraph to Europe if it should become law, so that the enterprise may go on without delay. I was so informed this morning by one of its directors. It is only a few days since I was home. My seat has hardly got warm since my return, and we are asked to adjourn again and take another jaunt. If we are to adjourn every few days the people of the country will never know when to find us here. During the Session our place should be here. I can go home in seven hours, and I can leave my house at lunch time and get here at 8:30 p.m. the same day. So I have no personal reason for opposing the adjournment, but I think at this period of the Session it is contrary to the public interest to lose so much time.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—In answer to the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, I think he is wrong in throwing the responsibility of this motion on the Government. Every member of the Senate has a right to make a motion of the kind if he pleases. Last year, or the year before, the hon. gentleman from Delanaudière made such a motion and it was accepted by the House. The position the Government takes is this: the question has been put to me, as representing the Government, whether this adjournment would interfere with the Government business. In reply, I say it will not. It is for the House to declare whether an adjournment would interfere with the business of the House. If it will, the motion should be rejected.

HON. MR. DEVER—I do not think anybody will find fault with the representatives of the Government in this House as matters stand at present. They are doing their duty; but there is another view of the subject which is worthy of consideration—that the representatives of the Lower Provinces and British Columbia are unable to avail themselves of this proposed adjournment to visit their homes. They are kept here idle and under expense, and that is why we complain. It is not necessary that those who wish to observe Ash Wednesday should visit their respective homes. There are very good and commodious churches in this city, and the gentlemen who wish to put ashes on their foreheads can do it quite as well in Ottawa as anywhere else.

HON. MR. ALMON—According to my calculations, by this adjournment we will lose only 2½ days. Saturday is not a sitting day, neither is Sunday—at least it ought not to be. Monday and Tuesday are not holidays, but Wednesday is a statutory holiday, and the House will meet on Thursday evening. I may be mixed in my arithmetic, but it seems to me that the loss of time will not exceed 2½ days. The hon. member from Lunenburg objects to the adjournment because people will come here to see us on business, and will be disappointed when they find we are away from the Capital. Well, anybody from Lunenburg will find the hon. member here, and any one from Halifax will find me or my colleague. I am perfectly disinterested in this matter, but I think when there are only 2½ days lost there can be no reasonable ground for opposing the motion. The leader of the Senate tells us that the adjournment will not interfere with the Government measures, and I know that the passage of private Bills will not be imperilled. I can see no objection, therefore, to the motion.

HON. MR. COCHRANE—The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg referred to me, I suppose, when he spoke of tramping on somebody's corns—at all events, he looked at me when he spoke. If so, his remarks are unjust and incorrect. When the hon. gentleman arrived here the morning before the last adjournment I heard him say: "It is mighty lucky for me that I got here before this adjournment." Why was it lucky for him? Because he would get the benefit of the adjournment; and I heard the same gentleman remark, when the adjournment was proposed: "If I had known of this I should have stayed at home with my family."

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I was not alluding to my hon. friend at all.

HON. Mr. COCHRANE—Then to whom did you refer?

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I can assure the hon. gentleman that he is the last person in the House that I would think of. He is wrong in supposing that it was any benefit to me to arrive here before the last adjournment. What benefit could it be to me? Was it a pecuniary benefit to me to come here and remain idle through the holidays or return home? The hon. gentleman has so muddled the thing that he cannot make us understand what he is driving at. It was not in my interest to come here just on the eve of the ajournment and have to go back home again.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was rejected by the following vote:—

THE CATTLE EXPORT TRADE.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. READ rose to—Call the attention of the House and of the Government to the proposal to ship United States cattle from Canadian ports for Europe, without being subjected to the now existing quarantine regulations, and inquire whether or not it is the intention of the Government to carry out such proposal?

He said: I bring this matter before the Senate in consequence of a proposition that has been made in some parts of this country to allow United States cattle to be exported from Canadian ports. I object to anything of the kind, on the ground that it will interfere with our cattle trade. I think I will be able to show that it would be exceedingly unwise to permit anything of the kind, and that it would be very detrimental to the interest of the farming community of Canada. As the House is no doubt aware, our Canadian cattle are not scheduled in England, while American cattle are. Cattle when scheduled must be slaughtered immediately on being landed; cattle that are not scheduled can be taken to the different markets of the United Kingdom, or fed, as may be desired. Consequently, our cattle are worth more per head than American cattle in the English market. Some time ago I made up my mind to meet Mr. Wiman at two or three meetings that he was holding in our part of the country, to get information from him and to give the people the information that I thought I possessed. Before doing so I put a series of questions to some gentlemen who are largely engaged in this cattle trade. The questions and replies were as follows:—

"Q.—Were you amongst the first shippers of cattle from America to England? A. We were.

"Q. Have you continued in that business ever since? A. We have.

"Q. What number of cattle have you shipped? A. About 250,000 head. (His clerks told me that he was wrong as to that, the shipments having been over 300,000).

"Q. What was the largest number you shipped in one year? A. Forty-five thousand head.

"Q. Have you shipped largely United States and Canadian cattle? A. We have.

"Q. What is the relative value of the Canadian and United States ox in England of the same weight and quality? A. The Canadian ox is worth from $2 to $4 a hundred more, or from $10 to $20 a head, or thereabouts."

Not satisfied with that, I enquired of another exporter who is largely engaged in the trade, and particularly in the Canadian trade. He did not deal in American cattle so much, and he did not give the difference in value at such high figures as that. He knew to whom he was talking, and possibly he did not wish to tell too much. I asked him, then, as to the difference in the value between Canadian and United States sheep in England. He said that Canadian sheep were worth 1½d. or 3 cents per pound more than United States sheep—equal to about $2 a head difference in our favor. He said to me, in a conversation I had with him a year or two ago: "I got into a great mess in England; they stopped my cattle from landing. I called upon Sir Charles Tupper, and he took hold of the matter and handled it in such a manner, bringing experts from Edinburgh and other parts of the country, and slaughtering some of the cattle, and investigating the question, that within a very short time I was relieved and saved from ruin. If it ever comes in my way to thank Sir Charles Tupper I shall certainly do so. He saved me and others from severe loss." I said: "It would not hurt you very much; you are rich." He said: "I have cattle landing every few days." It shows that we have a very great advantage under the existing regulations. I see by the returns of 1888–89 that we shipped to England 60,000 head, at the value of $4,888,101, and about 37,000 head to the United States, valued at $484,000. In other words, the cattle that we shipped to England averaged a little over $83.20 a head, while the cattle we shipped to the United States averaged a little over $13 a head. Now, if the United States cattle are allowed to be shipped from Canadian ports the first thing we may expect is that the English farmer, with whom we are competing, will call upon the British Government to place Canadian cattle on the same list as American cattle. I am told by the hon. member from Compton that, according to the Montreal trade returns, we shipped last year nearly 90,000 head of cattle. If you estimate the advantage we have in the English market by not having our cattle scheduled at $10 per head, we have a benefit from the existing regulations of $900,000 a year. That is the advantage we have in the English market above what we would have if our cattle were scheduled. Everyone who has cattle to sell in this country realizes the importance of maintaining the favorable position in which we are situated. There is another fact which I wish to bring to the notice of the House: The exporters of cattle, as a general thing, contract for their space early in the season—in the latter part of the winter or towards spring they contract for this space on certain lines of ships for exporting cattle. They are shrewd and intelligent men and work together. Having contracted for the space they must fill it. What is more natural than for these shippers to say: "We know that there are 47,000 head of Canadian cattle that have to be shipped by July, because all the distillers' cattle and most of the best stock of the farmers must be shipped by that date. The shippers, knowing these facts, and having secured the space, go into the markets early and buy our cattle. It is not unreasonable to say that if the regulations were relaxed, in the manner proposed by some interested parties, these shippers would fill their ships with American cattle for three or four weeks, until the price of Canadian cattle would fall, and then go into the market and buy at reduced figures. Others could not get the space, because they would have contracted for it and the Canadian farmers would be at their mercy. There would also be the danger of bringing disease into the country, which would injure our interests very seriously and reduce the value of our cattle. Shippers are comparatively indifferent about the prices they get, whether it is four or five dollars a hundred, but it makes a great difference to the producer what price he can get for his cattle. This proposition to which my enquiry refers comes entirely from the shippers. They say: "We will be able to ship 100,000 head of cattle from Montreal if the Government will relax these regulations, and a larger number of ships will come to Montreal." That is all very well, but at whose expense would the increased shipments be? I claim and know that it would be at the expense of the Canadian producers, and I feel that the Government will not relax the regulations; but I think it my duty to call their attention to the matter, and to show the importance to Canada of the advantages that we now possess. The prices of cattle in the United States are low at present. American dead meat is being sent from Chicago to all the principal markets of the Lower Provinces paying 1 cent a pound duty and competing with Canadian meats in our own markets. Nothing would be more natural, if these regulations were relaxed, than to find our shippers going to the cheapest markets and purchasing cattle, but they cannot do so under the existing regulations. I think I have said sufficient to satisfy the House and country that we are deriving a great advantage now from the existing regulations and that it will be in the interest of the Canadian farmer to maintain them.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The Maritime Provinces being largely interested in shipping, it might be supposed that the position taken by my hon. friend is antagonistic to our interests, but even though it were, my views coincide with those expressed by him. Our ships might carry more American cattle if these restrictions were removed, but if it would have a tendency to diminish the profits of our farming community to the extent of $15 or $20 on each head of cattle they export it would not be in the interest of the Dominion. In the end it would diminish the shipping trade from our own ports. My hon. friend has shown the great advantage which our farmers enjoy through their cattle not being scheduled in the English market. It is a great advantage to them, and through them to the whole country, because the wealth of the Dominion is based on the prosperity of the farming community. Therefore, even though it should deprive our shippers of a trade which they might hope to secure, it will, on the whole, benefit the Dominion. With regard to American meat coming down to the Maritime Provinces, I may say that the Americans purchase our eggs, and in this way make up fully for the loss that the farmers sustain by the competition in the meat trade.

HON. MR. DEVER—Every thoughtful man in this country must sympathize with my hon. friend's desire to promote the interests of the farming community. The internal wealth of the country is dependent upon the success of the farmers. We all sympathize with the hon. gentleman, and I feel that it is our duty in every way to encourage the farming industry. One of the objects in bringing about the confederation of the Provinces was to benefit the shipping interests of the Maritime Provinces by employing them in the trade of the St. Lawrence valley. It was represented to us that the great St. Lawrence River was the natural highway for the commerce of the west of Canada and the western States. We believed that our ships would get the benefit of that great trade, especially after the enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals and the construction of railways in the west. The hon. member must expect that we are excessively loyal to the Confederation if we are to forego that advantage which was held out to us as an inducement to enter the Confederation. While the farmers of the Dominion should be assisted to every reasonable extent in the shipment of their cattle, still it would be a great loss to the commercial cities that are dependent upon the trade of the west which these regulations impede. A considerable portion of that trade must necessarily be cut off from us, but I do not wish this House to feel that we are so selfish as to demand that these restrictions shall be relaxed for our benefit, to the detriment of the farming community of western Canada. At the same time, I wish it to be understood that their benefit can only be secured by our loss.

HON. MR. SMITH—In answer to the hon. gentleman's inquiry, I may inform him that there is no intention to allow the shipment of United States cattle from Canadian ports for Europe with or without being subjected to any quarantine regulations. The present quarantine regulations, established under the Animals Contagious Diseases Act, absolutely forbid the exportation of United States cattle from Canadian ports, and there is no intention to make any relaxation.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (28) "An Act to incorporate the Ottawa, Morrisburg and New York Railway Company." (Mr. Read.)

Bill (22) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Belleville and Lake Nipissing Railway Company." (Mr. McKindsey.)

Bill (21) "An Act to incorporate the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company." (Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (14) "An Act respecting the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway Company." (Mr. MacInnes.)

MARRIAGE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B. C.) moved the second reading of Bill (F) "An Act to amend an Act respecting offences relating to the Law of Marriage." He said: Hon. gentlemen are, no doubt, aware that the Government promise legislation of some kind on this subject, and I propose to ask the House to allow this Bill to be read the second time and referred to a committee. In the meantime we can confer with the Government and ascertain what course should be pursued, whether the Bill should be dropped altogether or not. I hope, in moving the second reading of this Bill I shall carry with me the feeling of the members of the Senate that such a measure is necessary. If there are Mormons in the North-West Territories, wherever they settle they will practise the tenets and customs of their sect. It is, therefore, necessary and wise that we should at once prevent the spread of this canker in our country. I am not in possession of any figures bearing on this subject. I do not know how many Mormons there are in the North-West Territories, or to what extent they practise their peculiar customs, but it is said, wherever they are they are sure to practise polygamy. I think the best feature of the Bill is that which disqualifies offenders from being candidates for election to serve as members of the House of Commons of Canada, or Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories, to serve as jurors, or to hold any office under the Crown or any public or municipal office in the North-West Territories. It will be one of the chief means of obtaining information and securing convictions under the Act. At election time, no doubt those people will take different sides, and their opponents will find out all the weak spots in their characters.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DEPARTMENT OF GEOLOGY BILL.

POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called, Committee of the Whole House on Bill (C) "An Act respecting the Department of Geology, Mining and Natural History,"

HON. MR. LACOSTE moved that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I should like to ask the leader of the House if he is aware that a copy of the Bill has been placed on our tables, professing to embody a number of clauses that are not in the Bill introduced by the Government, the proposed changes being printed in different type? I should like to know whether these amendments are proposed by the authority of the Government or by officers of the Department.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I have seen a copy of these proposed amendments, prepared by the officers of the Department. Several of these amendments will be proposed, and some will not.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 9 p.m.

THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

SIXTH REPORT ADOPTED.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their sixth report. He said: I may explain that this report refers merely to the preliminary procedure in these three cases. By our rules, before a Bill can be read the second time proof must be furnished of the service upon the respondent of a notice, with a copy of the Bill. The duty is relegated to the Divorce Committee of inquiring into that matter, and the committee have so inquired into these three cases and found the notice and the service regular and sufficient. The precedent, in cases where the preliminary proceedings have been regular, is to move the adoption of the report. I therefore move that the report be concurred in presently.

The motion was agreed to.

GAELIC LANGUAGE BILL.

FIRST READING.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.) introduced a Bill entitled "An Act to provide for the use of Gaelic in official proceedings."

The Bill was read the first time.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I should like to ask my hon. friend if that is to be a dual language?

HON. MR. McINNES—Triple language.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman might also include German; it is more important.

HON. MR. McINNES—I move that the Bill be read the second time on the 11th of March. When the Bill is before the House my hon. friend from Lunenburg, and others who are equally interested in the language of their ancestors, can move such amendments as they may think fit.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (M) "An Act to authorize the Toronto Savings Bank Charitable Trust to invest certain Funds." (Mr. McKindsey, in the absence of Mr. Sullivan).

The Senate adjourned at 3:45 p.m.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (Q) "An Act further to amend the General Inspection Act, Cap. 99 of the Revised Statutes." (Mr. Lacoste.)

Bill (R) "An Act further to amend the Acts respecting the Quebec Harbor Commission." (Mr. Lacoste.)

THE WELLAND CANAL INVESTIGATION.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. McCALLUM resumed his speech on his notice to—Enquire what action the Government intends to take on the evidence taken before A. F. Wood, Esquire, Commissioner, as to the conduct of the officials on the Welland Canal, in the management of that important public work.

He said: When last I addressed you on this question I was speaking about the evidence of Mr. Alexander Abbey, regarding an arrangement made with him by one of the deputy superintendents of the Welland Canal, about getting a certain amount of money towards the payment of the Superintendent's debts. I wish you particularly to read this evidence if it is published, as I hope it will be. (See page 697.) This is a most extraordinary arrangement; Mr. Ellis must have known about it, because he asked Mr. Smith—told him he was in trouble—in fact, that the sheriff was after him. Mr. John B. Smith, whom I will call Mr. Ellis' broker, was sent to make this arrangement. See what Mr. Abbey says: he was employed to go as master of a scow to do some work on the canal; he was told to get a horse. Mr. Abbey asked him to say what amount would be given for the horse. The reply was, we will pay you $1 a day; but that was not enough for Abbey; he would not furnish a horse for that. Then, on condition that he would allow one-half dollar of the horse's hire to go to the payment of Mr. Ellis' debts they agreed to give him $1.50 a day, and every month this gentleman, John B. Smith, came around regularly and got this money to pay Mr. Ellis' debts. And there are several others, I am satisfied—I was told so, and I told the commissioner so— in the same position as Mr. Abbey; but the commissioner would not allow me to prove it, as I will show you by his ruling. He did not want it shown what this money was got for; that is why I call this gentleman, John B. Smith, a broker of Mr. Ellis, because he was negotiating for Ellis with employés of the canal to draw money to pay his debts. Here is a man getting $1,450 a year of the money of this country to manage a canal through which but one vessel a week passes. That is the evidence of Mr Thos. R. Merritt, of St. Catharines, and we are paying this man $1,450 a year to superintend this canal, and he has got two or three foremen under him. That is the way the money of this country is being paid out. They are not doing their duty, they are looking after themselves, as I will show you. Abbey swears that Mr. Smith took him aside and made a private arrangement with him, and if you will look at John Smith's evidence he confirms Mr. Abbey's statement in every particular but one. But when Mr. Abbey gave this evidence, what did the commissioner do? He gave him a lecture—such a lecture as I have never known a witness get in this world before. He told him the "receiver was as bad as the thief:" but I see it is put down in the type-written copy of the evidence—I suppose my friend Holland was not unkind enough to put it in "thief," he calls it a "third." But any man can see what is meant; I spoke to the commissioner privately after the proceedings were over that evening, and told him if he lectured witnesses in that way it would keep them from testifying, and I would not be able to get anything out of them. You will see by his rulings on this question of borrowing money to pay Ellis' debts that when I told him there were others who could swear to the same effect as Abbey he did not allow me to ask any questions about it.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—I rise to a question of order. My hon. friend is speaking, and has spoken for days, on this subject. He simply is giving us a commentary upon evidence that was taken in court, which is not before us. We cannot form any opinion or judgment until the report and the evidence are laid on the Table here. When this is done, and the evidence is before this House, we will be in a position to form a judgment in the matter; but I submit that with this commentary we have nothing to do. What Mr. McCallum refers to is only a copy of the evidence. It is the rule of every court, and especially of the court of Parliament, that the best evidence must be produced. The best evidence in this case is what was taken at the investigation, and we should have no debate upon this subject until such time as the report and the evidence upon which it is based have been laid upon the Table of the House. What object can we have in considering the matter? We have no evidence—only a copy, which is not admissible. All the authorities of Parliament agree upon this point, that the best evidence must be produced; and, therefore, I say, with the greatest deference and friendliness towards my hon. friend, that he is putting the patience of this House to a severe test. It is impossible to come to a conclusion upon what he is laying before them. His efforts should be directed, in the first place, towards having the evidence and the reports brought down, and then we will be in a position to look at them, and form a judgment on the matter. I submit that he should bring his observations to a close until that has been done. I do not say this to obstruct my hon. friend in any way, but as a suggestion in the interest of his own case, and in all friendliness and with due deference to him.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I have no case. It is the case of the public. If my hon. friend had been in his place in the House when I spoke on this question before he would have known that the evidence is before the House.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—The evidence is not here.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I am in the hands of the House. I could have put myself in order at any time, but I put it off from time to time. My hon. friend, who comes in occasionally, says I ought to do so-and-so, but if he had been here and heard what I said he would not have raised the question.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—The evidence is not before the House.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—It is here.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—That is a copy of the evidence.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—Yes.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—That is no evidence.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—There is the evidence taken by the official stenographer at the investigation; five copies were made. One copy is with the commissioner, one with Mr. Ellis, one with Mr. Rykert, the Government has another, and I have one copy here. Is not that official evidence?

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—I insist that this report should be before the House.

Several HON. MEMBERS—Go on; go on.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—Mr. Smith took Abbey aside and made a private arrangement. Of course, Mr. Rykert says in his pamphlet, which is in the hands of every member of this House, that Ellis did not know anything about it. He says this, no doubt, for the purpose of trying to prejudice the case and to preserve the popularity of the officials of the Welland Canal. Well, Mr. Abbey says he got most of his pay back, but he swears distinctly that he would rather work his horse for $1.25 a day than get $1.50 on these conditions. Why? Because when he gave this money monthly he received nothing to show that he was giving it. If anything had happened J. B. Smith he would have lost the whole thing, because he had nothing to show what payments he had made. We find that they paid him $75 in the second year. There are others who were in the same position as Abbey. The commissioner himself, in speaking of this matter and lecturing Smith afterwards, practically admits that there might be others. He said: "If you could make this arrangement with Abbey, what was there to hinder you from making the same arrangement with forty others?" I told the commissioner there were others. I did not say there were forty, though he said there was nothing to prevent it; but he prevented me from showing who the others were by his ruling. Why did he gag me when I wanted to bring out the truth? I desire particularly to bring this to the notice of the Government. On page 2 of the pamphlet he thought he was clear, but he gave himself away. It is stated on page 2 of the pamphlet "Balance of the Testimony." I said the other day that this was not correct. The commissioner says: "The decision was reached after I left here. I wrote you immediately, Mr. McCallum; I got your letter of yesterday." I did say that I got the letter that morning. Here is what he states: "I wrote you yesterday informing you (the commissioner) of the fact that the Government gave me to understand that the summing up is a matter for my personal benefit." I want to know if the Government told him that—if the Government told him to put the gag on me; that I should not argue the question. I do not believe it. I have been a supporter of this Government all my life, and I have nothing to hide. I do not believe the Government gave him that instruction, but he did it nevertheless, and why? Because on the Friday before he asked me if I would take much time. I said: "No; not very long." But I told him I would consider it my duty to comment on his rulings, and that is probably what caused this sudden change of front. That is why he would not allow me to comment on the evidence and go with the report, and explains why I am here to justify myself. He says he got an intimation from the Government. Fancy a commissioner appointed with the powers of a Superior Court judge receiving intimations of this character from the Government! Is it true? No; I cannot believe it. If they did give him an intimation of this kind to put the gag on me and hinder me from proving what I wanted to prove in the public interest, I want to know it, because I gave a good deal of time and went to some expense trying to get to the bottom of this case. It is not, as Mr. Rykert says, on account of spleen and spite. I have no spite against anybody. So much for the commissioner and his actions. I shall deal with his rulings, because I said, in addressing you the other day, that he treated me kindly and smoothly, as smoothly as you please, but he ruled against me, and he exceeded his powers in doing so. I maintain there were others who could give evidence of transactions such as that proved by Abbey, but the commissioner thought by not allowing me to bring forward other evidence that he was going to carry the thing by force. He thought that with Rykert, Q.C., M.P., he would overpower me. They thought they would make themselves all right by circulating this pamphlet. I do not know whether my friend from Erie Division has a copy of it. If he has, he certainly would not attack me for defending myself. I am put in a false position, and that is why I bring up the question here. I was willing to wait. I waited eleven months in the matter. I brought it before the Government last year. Did they suspend the Superintendent? No. I have waited three months longer, and if the report of the investigation is not here it is not my fault. On the 13th November this investigation was closed at St. Catharines. If the report is not here I am not to blame. After the commissioner ruled against me I asked Mr. J. B. Smith the question: "Did you borrow any money from anybody else, in the same manner, to pay debts?" The commissioner did not want him to answer. He wanted to add the word "corruptly." I told him: "You should be the judge in the first instance, the Government next, and then the people." Then he said, when I urged him, that the witness might answer if he liked. I asked the witness to answer but what do we find? We find that the gentleman defending the canal officials advised the witness not to answer, but shortly afterwards the commissioner, when Mr. Ellis came up to give evidence, said to him: "Truth will hurt nobody; truth is always best." He was looking for the truth but he did not want to find it. He put me in mind of the tramp who was looking for work, but hoped to God he would not find any. The commissioner ruled that I should not ask the same question of John Bradley. He would not let me ask Richard A. Booth as to whether he had given any portion of his horse-hire towards the payment of the Superintendent's debts. Here is a one-armed man, working on the canal as a foreman, working one horse and driving another, getting paid $1.50 a day for each horse and $2 a day for himself. That is the way business is done on the Welland Canal; but this is a friend of Ellis', and has done him some favor on the Intercolonial, and of course he wished to pay him back with the money of the country. Now, we will give this thing another turn, and talk about rubber boots. This is a strange thing to talk about in the Senate of Canada, but people on the Welland Canal brought 241 pairs of rubber boots into Canada without paying any duty, and sold them to the employés of the canal, and every man who bought a pair of boots had two days' time that he never worked returned to him to pay for them. That is in the evidence. It is true, I will admit, that Mr. Ellis had nothing to do with that. I do not hold him guilty of the rubber boots transaction, but I want to show the character of this man Roger Miller, who was put in the witness box twelve or thirteen times to try and swear Ellis and the rest out. I want to discredit his evidence as to these rubber boots. He swears that Mr. Page told him it was a good plan to return two days' time that the people did not work to pay for the boots.

Mr. Page swears to the contrary. He swears that when he gave Mr. Miller ten pairs of boots which, by the way, are not included in these 241 pairs, that Miller told him, "I will keep two days back from each man's pay to whom I give a pair of boots until the work is done, in order to make him take care of the boots." But what did he do instead? He sold the boots, and to every man that bought a pair he returned two days' time that he had not worked at all. Then Mr. Miller swears that the boots cost $3.80 a pair in Buffalo. I will put in an invoice of the boots to show what they cost. They cost $3.13½ per pair. Mr. Miller sells them to the canal employés at $3.80 and $4.00 per pair, and he makes from 60 to 80 cents a pair. Before I stop I will prove this from the evidence. We had considerable evidence about these rubber boots until the commissioner said "enough." James Reynolds said: "I paid $4 in cash for a pair of rubber boots and Lawrence collected it, but was allowed one and a-half days extra that he did not work to help pay for the boots." Now we come to the charge of maladministration. Last year, when speaking here, I said that I spoke about a gentleman who was getting pickings, and who, I stated, was giving more trouble than any other man on the canal—Mr. Demare. Of course Mr. Rykert makes fun of me in his pamphlet, saying that the pickings must have come out of coal. I paid very little attention to the fuel. The evidence shows that this man Demare, who went a dozen times in the witness box to swear himself and Ellis clear, is discredited by his old friends—men who were dragged into the witness stand against their will, and coached by the counsel of the canal officials before I got a chance of examining them. Here is the evidence of Michael Moriarty. He says (see page 830) that he farmed Government land on shares for Mr. Demare and gave him one-third of the crop. (See page 832). He says he got rubber boots, the Government paying half the price of them, and he paid for the other half. (See page 833). He says he raised 140 or 150 bushels of potatoes, and 80 or 90 bushels of corn, and Mr. Demare got one-third of the crop. (See page 839). Bernard McGrath says he farms 14 or 15 acres of land on shares for Mr. Demare; he raised about 400 bushels of corn and some 100 odd bushels of potatoes, and 170 bushels of oats, and Mr. Demare got half of the crop. (See page 848). George Brownlee says he farms for Mr. Demare on shares; he raised 140 or 150 bushels of potatoes, 50 or 60 bushels of corn and gave Mr. Demare one-third of all. (See page 873). John Cushman says that he farms for Mr. W. W. Waite—raised potatoes and gave Waite one-half. That shows some of Mr. Demare's pickings that I spoke of last Session. This Waite is the storekeeper, the man I said was of as much use on the canal as the fifth wheel on a Government coach. Now, here is what I would impress on the House: Demare gets a share of the crop, yet at page 1672 he swears, in answer to a question put to him by the commissioner, that no man gave him a share of his produce of any kind. Here are three men who swore that he did get a share. These are his own friends. I would ask you to look at the evidence. They very reluctantly admitted this. I dragged it out of them, and this is the gentleman that Mr. Rykert says goes out of a court with a certificate of character. If that is a certificate of character it cannot be of much value. Can you believe such evidence as that of Roger Miller about the boots, for instance. Mr. Miller's evidence is discredited by Mr. Page, and also by documentary evidence, because he says the boots cost $3.80 in Buffalo, and they only cost $3.13½. They are the gentlemen who came into the box to swear each other out. If you look at the evidence you will see that they were in the box thirteen, fourteen and fifteen times to try and swear themselves out.

Wm. Wilkinson, at page 835, says that Thomas Hastings paid him for work he did on the Forks Road bridge $3 per day and board; and at page 887 he says that he worked at J. B. Smith's and was paid by the Government—that he did plastering there. I should have mentioned this when speaking on charge 5. At page 894 Mr. Wilkinson mentions the relations which existed between him and Mr. Hastings and the Government. Mr. Walton keeps his time and is foreman, but Hastings pays the men for the work and makes 50 cents a day on every man, although he was not near the work. Now that is strictly under Mr. Ellis. I said before that Mr. Ellis had nothing to do with the rubber boots, but I do say that he had everything to do with this case. At page 905 Samuel Houston says that he returned time enough to half pay for the boots, as if the men had been working for the Government—paying the men for rubber boots—hiding it from the Government and returning time for the men, to pay for the boots, that they never worked. This is the evidence of the foreman. The Government did not know that these boots were bought until the question came up in the investigation, because the men were given extra time that they did not work in order to pay for the boots, and they were paid at the canal office. It is little short of a conspiracy against the Government. Adam Flood, at page 1014, says that he had two days extra time allowed him to help to pay for the rubber boots. Robert Secord, at page 930, says that he got two pairs of boots and paid for one pair to Mr. Demare at the canal office, and he was allowed extra time to pay for half of the price of one pair. Conflicting evidence is given on this point. Some of the witnesses stated that they were allowed one day, others that they were allowed two days, but it was not likely that I could elicit straightforward evidence with Mr. Rykert, who had got these men appointed, and Mr. Ellis and Mr. Demare, who had the power of dismissing them sitting opposite them at the table. Of course, in the official report you will find the remarks which passed between Mr. Rykert and myself, because they form no part of the evidence: but if you would look at the newspapers of that time you would find some interesting reading. You will find that Mr. Rykert openly abused witnesses who did not give evidence to suit him. James Hindson, at page 1157, says that he got two pairs of boots, and paid for one pair in cash himself. He was allowed one day's time—$2—to help pay for the other pair. At page 1883 Roger Miller, the contractor, says that J. & R. Miller got paid $55 for rubber boots in 1888. He knows all about that. He was repairing the pier at Port Dalhousie, under Mr. Page's instructions. Now, if the Government paid J. & R. Miller $55 for these rubber boots, why should the men have extra time allowed them to pay for half of them, and Miller get the balance? On the subject of maladministration, I would call your attention to the evidence of Thomas Jones, a lock-tender, at page 1026. He was allowed to leave his lock for six weeks to work for other parties, and put another man in his place. He was allowed to work at the rubber factory that I spoke of the other day—that sink hole into which so much of the public money no doubt has gone. He was also allowed to work at the band hall three or four days while he should have been on his lock, and he worked at Demare's house also. Richard Hutton, who is also a lock-tender, worked at the rubber factory about six weeks. I would refer you to the evidence at pages 1406, 1407 and 1423, for Mr. Page's opinion about farming out lock-tenders. He says that it is a very bad practice and should not be allowed—that it is not safe to let these experienced men leave their locks and put green hands in their places. Now, these lock-tenders were sent away from the canal by Mr. Demare to work for private parties. I would refer you also to the evidence of Volney Mann at page 1089. He says he got orders from Mr. Dell, Deputy Superintendent, to take some pine plank from the Government yard to Mr. Dell's barn, and that he took twelve or fourteen in all. James Dell himself, at page 1106, says that the plank were new plank—Government plank, remember—and that he has them in his stable yet in the floor. Thomas Ryan, at page 1114, says that there were twelve or fourteen planks taken to Dell's place by Volney Mann. I come now to the evidence of Chester Demare, father of the deputy superintendent. He lives with his son, and is, therefore, in a position to know what he speaks of. At page 1140 of the evidence, he says that the deputy superintendent burns gas in his house—five jets—and to the best of his knowledge he has burned it for two or three years. Chester Demare, though an old man, is employed on the canal. He has been a good man in his day, and if I referred to the fact that he had been dismissed from the canal because of his dissipated habits, and was afterwards taken back, it was to show that Mr. Ellis did not always adhere to his cast-iron rule. Of course, it was natural that the son should take care of his father, but he should have been ashamed to pension him off on this country when he was able to take care of him himself. Chester Demare has been employed making wheelbarrows all winter, and has been drawing pay at $2 a day. Francis Timmons says, in his evidence, that Mr. Demare had no authority from the gas company to burn gas in his house.

What do the people and the Government think about allowing this man to supply himself with gas at the public expense? As I have explained already, although he has a meter in his house, it is only for a blind. The gas passes through the Government meter, and is measured there before it is consumed in his house, the Government paying for it. Alphonse Kelly, a lock-tender, at page 1158, states that he is a member of the Port Dalhousie band, and when he goes away to play he has a man put in his place by Demare's orders. He says also that he was taken from his lock and put as foreman on the floats, although drawing pay as lock-tender all the time. Whether he was paid in both capacities or not, it is a bad practice, as I have shown, to allow an experienced man to leave his post and put a green hand in his place. If anything goes wrong on the canal in the absence of the regular employé nobody is responsible. Edward Armstrong, a tug captain, at pages 1364 and 1372, mentioned the fact that he was detained at a lock while going through the canal on account of the gas being turned down and the locks not being ready. Adam Kennedy says, at page 1472, that he was wheelsman aboard of the propellor "Armenia," of which Capt. Hume was the master. He has known the boat to be detained in the canal on account of the gas being turned down and the locks not being ready. He has known the boat to get on the bank and has had to get out lines and heave her off. He could not work the engine because he was afraid of breaking the screw. Now, there is direct evidence of loss being sustained by vessel owners through defective light on the canal; but somebody must suffer in order that Mr. Ellis may get free gas in his house. This same witness, Adam Kennedy, gives a good deal more evidence on that subject. I remember he said he thought the Government of the country was buying the gas by the thousand from the gas company—that he could not otherwise account for the deficiency of light at the locks. He did not know the Government were paying a bulk sum, and he thought that they were economizing in the gas. I would now direct your attention to the contract of McCleary & McLean for lumber. I do not say that these men are getting more than their lumber is worth, but I do say that their contract is not honestly drawn. Amongst the items is one for balance beams at $15 each, while, as a fact, they cannot be supplied for less than $60 or $75 apiece. They are not used on the canal now, although they are mentioned in the contract, and the effect of it is to enable the firm to get higher prices for the kinds of lumber that they are required to supply. I did not get in all the evidence on that point that I wished to submit, because the commissioner said that he had intimations that it was time to close up the investigation. F. T. Walton's evidence commences at page 1502. He says he was ordered to hire masons, by Mr. Ellis, to work on the Fork's road and Chippewa bridges at $3 a day and board themselves. Thos. Hastings came at the end of the month and asked for their time, and said he would get $3.50 a day for them. Hastings did not work there at all. Now, this Thos. Hastings was a great friend of Mr. Ellis. When he was examined on this matter himself he said that he did no work there at all. At page 1511 you will see further about Mr. Hastings' transactions. Hastings wanted Walton to certify to a bill for work he did not do at all. At page 1767 Hastings confirms the statement that Walton refused to certify to this bill. I come now to a matter which is very small, but I want to refer to it to show you the size of the man that has been managing the Welland Canal for the last ten years. I was almost ashamed myself to dwell upon such trifling transaction, but it is an indication of the character of the Superintendent, and shows what a very small man he is. Thomas Smith, at page 429, says that he signed a receipt or paper to Mr. Ellis on the day he got an order for some gravel. At page 1772 Mr. Ellis puts in a receipt signed by Smith with a cross, and dated 26th November, 1885. Mr. Ellis, at page 2123, says that this is the only receipt that Smith ever signed for him. When Smith, who had given his evidence somewhat reluctantly in the first instance, saw in the papers that Mr. Ellis was trying to make him out a liar, he came running to me with an order which he had been given for the gravel, and which had not been taken from him when he got the gravel. This proves beyond a doubt that the man that has been managing the Welland Canal for the last ten years simply traded off the Government gravel for $1.50 worth of vegetables. There is no doubt in my mind but that Mr. Ellis could have produced the receipt signed by Mr. Smith for the vegetables if he had chosen to do so, but instead of that he produces a paper signed with a "X," manufactured for the occasion, as the evidence shows, for the purpose of covering up this gravel transaction. What an exhibition of meanness on the part of the man who is trusted by the Government to manage such an important work as the Welland Canal! Can you credit his evidence on any point after hearing the details of this petty transaction? I have already referred, at some length, to the pontoon which was constructed by Mr. Miller, under a contract, but in which a great deal of material purchased by the Government was used. Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer, swears that Roger Miller was to do all the work, but the evidence goes to show that the employés on the canal did a very considerable portion of it, and received their pay at the canal office, when they ought to have been paid by Roger Miller himself. Mr. Miller says that an improvement was put on the pontoon, and that it was necessary to add to its buoyancy, and his contract did not include the caulking of the pontoon. Does anyone who knows Mr. Page imagine for a moment that he would make a contract for a pontoon without specifying that it must be caulked? Roger Miller swears that the pontoon was to be tongued and grooved, but the man who runs the planing mill at Port Dalhousie swears that he prepared the lumber, and that it was not tongued and grooved. Can anybody believe that John Page would make a contract for the construction of a sieve or a basket under the name of a pontoon? Mr. Page is very little there, and they take advantage of his absence to perpetrate a job and feather their own nests. At page 1663 Mr. Demare swears that Mr. Page never said anything to him about Miller having the contract—that is the way Demare tries to get out of the matter, but if Mr. Page did not tell him that Miller had the contract, who told him? Did anybody tell him? The men that were under his charge were doing the work on this pontoon, and he certified to the time as if the work had been done for the Government, while Mr. Miller had the contract. Do you credit that. Mr. Page did not know how much buoyancy this pontoon needed in order to perform the work it was intended for, without this tool box, that Mr. Demare says he put on? Do you credit it, that the contract made by Roger Miller with Mr. Page was to build a pontoon with groove and tongue? It is an unwarrantable act for Mr. Ellis and Mr. Demare to interfere with Mr. Page's contract for building this pontoon without letting him know about it. Who is this Roger Miller? The gentleman who gets the contract from Mr. Ellis to repair the overseer's house without any competition, he is the gentleman that dealt in rubber boots to the extent of 241 pairs, and returned two days' extra time that the men did not work, to pay for the boots; but the Government knew nothing about it. You will, by the invoice in the record, see that the average price of the boots was $3.13½, the freight not included, and that he made from 60 to 80 cents a pair on them. I mention this to show that he must have been a great favorite of Mr. Ellis and Mr. Demare on the canal. When Mr. Ellis was addressing the commissioner at St. Catharines he remarked that he understood this pontoon question. When we see the report of the commission we will know how he understood it. I consider that the commissioner gave himself away a good deal there, because he thought when I was gone there would be a fair field to do just as he liked. They did not think of the hereafter. You will notice in the invoice that there are some clogs charged. For what were they required? For a dance or entertainment at the band hall at Port Dalhousie? The people of this country are paying for these clogs to enable some of the employés of the canal to have an entertainment. What else could they be for? All these things, remember, come into the country free of duty. The following is the invoice:—

See pay-list of November, 1888.—J. & R. Miller got paid for rubber boots on repair $55.

November pay-list for 1887.—Paid Rubber Co. of Buffalo for 15 pairs rubber boots, $53.70.

You will see throughout all these transactions that there is a tendency to hide these things from the Government. At the investigation they contended I had no right to look into this matter, because it came under the head of construction, and had nothing to do with repairs. If you will look at Mr. Rykert's pamphlet you will see that he charges me with trying to confuse the commissioner by mixing construction and repairs up altogether. I did nothing of the kind. I like to call a spade a spade. How could it be work done on construction when the water had been in the canal for years? The mitre sills happen to rise up and you bolt them down. Is that construction? No; it is repairs. In examining one of the witnesses whom they had posted before he came in to give his evidence—he claimed that this was work done on construction. I said to him: If you have a coat, and it wears out at the elbows, and you put a patch on it, do you call that construction or repairs? He said: "I would call it repairs;" and he had to admit that the work done on the canal after its completion was repairs. As far as these rubber boots are concerned, I do not hold Mr. Ellis responsible. I am only looking to Mr. Miller, the man who had the contract for building the pontoon, the man who had the contract for repairing the overseer's house and who got it without competition. The employés on the canal did most of the work under these contracts. They concreted the cellar of the overseer's house, they caulked the pontoon, and the Government found the timber and spikes, all of which went to Mr. Miller's benefit, according to the evidence. I have pointed out to you that Mr. Ellis is a gentleman who gets free light and fuel from the gas company for his civility and courteous conduct. What about his courteous conduct to Mr. McDonagh? He said that he gets free gas for his courteous conduct. Such an excuse to cover up this species of bribery, to save the consumption of gas on the canal to the gas company, is rather transparent. We can all see it, and the civil conduct of Mr. Ellis does not cover up that transaction. It is the same thing in building the structures for the manufacturers, and in regard to the testimonial. The idea of Mr. Ellis being courteous or civil to any one who knows him—except when he has something to gain, as in this case—is amusing. I venture to say that the country looses ten dollars for every dollar of advantage that Mr. Ellis gets from the gas company and others to whom he is courteous for favors received. Now, we will see how kind and courteous Mr. Ellis was to poor Nestor, who, as the evidence shows, was unfortunate through sickness and death in his family. He got into debt and was taken before the judge on a judgment summons and ordered to pay $2 a month. Mr. Smith and Mr. Ellis told him that he must pay more or he must leave the canal, and they left orders with R. D. Dunn, the paymaster, that Nestor should pay an additional $5 or $10 a month. Poor Nestor had no broker who could go to the canal employés and get money when he was in trouble, as Mr. Ellis had done. Martin Nestor did not have the power to have Mr. Demare send carpenters to work at his house and get them paid by the Government, as Mr. Ellis had. Nestor did not have Government employés to raise his cabbages and potatoes and have them paid with Government money, as Mr. Ellis had. Nestor did not receive light and fuel in the shape of free gas, or get a testimonial from the manufacturers for favors past and prospective, but had to stand the tyranny of the man who was enabled to get fat by the receipt of these favors. This is a sample of the conduct of the gentleman who gets his light and fuel free for his civility, and who lords it over the poor lock-tenders such as Martin Nestor. This is the character of the man who has been entrusted by the Government with the management of the Welland Canal. Now, we will have a word to say about his deputy, Smythe, the one that I call his broker. Deputy J. B. Smythe made conditions in employing men to contribute a certain amount towards the payment of the debts of Mr. Ellis—for whom he was acting as broker—by raising loans from the employés, as in Abbey's case; also, in the way of getting teaming done, by sending teamsters on the Canal to do Mr. Ellis' work, such as Chas. Hill and Hamilton Page. Mr. Ellis has Mr. Demare sending Charles Hill, carpenter, to work at his house, and he has Mr. Demare sending laborers to work in his garden, and has their time certified to as if they were working for the Government. Mr. Ellis himself also takes Walter Chatfield to work for three weeks, we paying him at the rate of $75 a month. Mr. Rykert's says that that gentleman of leisure if not working for Mr. Ellis would be making picture frames for himself. Mr. Ellis takes Geo. Nicholson for three weeks to work at his house and the Government pays him say $36. Mr. Ellis takes Lock-tender Bonnewell for twenty days to cook for him, at a cost to the country of $30. Mr. Ellis says he is managing a great public work, and that he alone is responsible to the country for what he does. Mr. Ellis receives money which they call a testimonial from the manufacturers on the canal; and in return Mr. Ellis builds the manufacturers' structures, digs their ponds and keeps their races clear of ice. Mr. Ellis considers it beneath him to consult the Department or the Chief Engineer about Port Colborne dock, but he consults his subordinate, and he builds the Shiner Pond bridge against the report of the Chief Engineer and hides it from the Government. Mr. Ellis receives gas from the gas company for light and fuel and $100 in cash, and gives the company a quid pro quo or equivalent, as you may see by the evidence. He pays them back by turning down the gas on the canal to the injury of the trade of the country. Mr. Ellis certified to Mr. Vanderburg's bill for railway fare for $170 a year more than he paid, and he certainly could not help knowing it if he was doing his duty in this. Mr. Ellis certifies to his own livery bill to Foster, and the Government pays it, though Ellis is allowed $300 a year for that purpose. Look at the pay-lists and you will find Ellis' accounts and Vanderburg's with Foster close together on them. Mr. Ellis could not reduce Mr. Vanderburg's account when he was taking more for livery monthly than Mr. Vanderburg. Mr. Ellis certified the Department that William Assell worked on the canal 654 days, when he knew that he did not work a day at that time. The paymaster and clerk knew it also, and that the country paid Mr. Assell $817.50 for work that he never performed. We built Mr. Ellis' house, we raised his cabbages and potatoes, we did his teaming, we built his fences, we built his walks, we find him a man servant, we pay for his light and fuel, at a great cost to the country, and we even black his boots. And what is more, this man who is trusted by the Government of this country—I am almost ashamed to tell it—traded a yard of gravel to pay for $1.50 worth of vegetables, and in trying to hide it produced a false receipt, but got caught. Although he swears the receipt was got a month before he gave Smith the order, look at the date of the receipt and the order for the gravel and you will find they are the same date. That is the size of the man who has been managing, or, I may say, mis-managing the Welland Canal for the last nine years. Can you credit a man who gives such evidence about a yard of gravel and $1.50 worth of vegetables? That is the size of the man who threatened me through the press with an action for libel, and who put the amount of damages at $10,000 for having expressed my opinion of his doings on the Welland Canal. What I said is proven beyond a doubt by the evidence, that these men should be dismissed from the public service. I must now say something with reference to this pamphlet of Mr. Rykert. He must have thought it required a great effort on his part to defend the canal officials. Why should they require any defence at all? Why was it necessary that they should have a lawyer? Defend them—defend them from what? If they had done their work, if they had discharged their duties properly, why did they want any defence at all from me? Did the Government and the country prosecute them—did they send any one to get at the facts? What was the necessity to employ this lawyer—this Q. C., M. P.—to defend them from my attacks? The Government sent nobody to prosecute—took no part in the investigation, although I must do them the justice to say that they sent me all the papers that I wanted; but that is all the assistance they gave me, and I had none from the commissioner, but I had his opposition, as I will show you by his ruling. Mr. Rykert says in his pamphlet:

"From the commencement I had no idea that Mr. McCallum could lay his finger upon a single act of maladministration upon the part of Mr. Ellis or his employés, or his deputy superintendents, or upon any one single thing which would satisfy you that they would act dishonestly or corruptly."

You can form your own judgment whether the Q.C., M.P., the counsel for the canal officials, is a proper judge of dishonesty and corruption. Does he know what it implies? He says that these charges are "of a stale character, dating back to 1880-81, down to three or four years ago." The hon. gentleman can judge whether they are of a stale character or not. It may be very desirable for some parties engaged in public as well as in private life to clear their slates once a year if it is possible to do so. But such an operation as rubbing off the slate cannot be done even in this world, no matter what one does to cover up his shortcomings. It is an old saying and a true one that "Chickens come home to roost," and it was never more exemplified than in this case of the commissioner, the Q. C., M.P., and the canal officials. The Q.C., M.P., says: "I would not wish to say anything that would reflect upon Mr. McCallum or any other person." Oh, no! Of course that hon. gentleman would not say anything to reflect upon any one, except that he was personally interested, or well paid, as in this case, in which he receives for his services $1,675. He accuses the humble individual now addressing you of showing venom and spite, but that does not apply to me. I was neither pulling wires nor strings, nor working for money, nor to serve any private interest or gratify any personal feeling, but I am one of the five millions of people in Canada, and a member of this Senate, and as far as possible my services, humble though they be, were given and are now given in behalf of the country and good government. I have acted the part of a self-constituted public prosecutor without fee or reward, only having the satisfaction to know that I was working in the interest of the country, and not to serve any personal spite, as stated by the Q. C., M. P. The counsel of the canal officials complained that I received some of my information through anonymous letters. I stated before the commission that I had received information that way, and for saying so I was rebuked by the commissioner, as he did not consider such information of any value. But the information that was received in that way was followed up by me, and I can say to you I found it almost invariably correct in every instance. The people that gave me information were no doubt employés of the canal, and were afraid to sign their names to any letters that they sent me, as it might lead to their dismissal—at least, that is the only way I can account for it. You can draw your own inference. The Q. C., M. P., misquotes the evidence taken before the commissioner, as appears by this pamphlet, circulated, as I must say, to create a wrong impression.

The Q. C., M. P., states in his pamphlet that "Mr. Abbey swore that Mr. Ellis knew nothing at all" about getting this money from Abbey to pay his debts. By referring to Mr. Abbey's evidence you will see that he says nothing of the kind. He swore that J. B. Smith told him that the 50 cents a day was to pay Mr. Ellis' debts; that was when he (Smith) was making the arrangements with Abbey about hiring his horse. The Q. C., M. P., also states that "Smith swears the same thing." Mr. J. B. Smith, the broker, does nothing of the kind. He (Smith) swears that he told Mr. Ellis about a month or a month and a-half after he made the arrangement with Abbey how he was raising the money. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that Mr. Ellis knew how his broker was raising the money. This pamphlet states that "Mr. Abbey got his money back," but the true answer of Mr. Abbey was that he got it "mostly back." The pamphlet also states that "it was an action away back in 1883," and should never be brought here. As I have said, it is very desirable to clear the slate every year, but that cannot be done even in this world, and I believe that it cannot be done in the next. People will talk, and people will remember and bring these things home to the offenders. The canal officials and Superintendent should have thought of that. If they had kept that in mind they would have acted differently at the investigation. The commissioner, in speaking about the aqueduct, says there is no evidence to show the canal officials erred in its management; that if they erred at all they erred on the right side. If it is on the right side to drive business away from the Welland Canal and send it through the Erie Canal, the commissioner gives himself away, and he could not have read the evidence before Mr. Rykert brought this question up, or he would not have given himself away as he did. He may want to hedge now if it is not too late. Then, on the gas question, what does he say? "I think it has been so thoroughly investigated, so far as the effect on the canal itself is concerned, the supply of lights and its management, that there can be no possible question to my mind that there is anything to complain of." What do you think of such evidence, and the commissioner who expresses such an opinion? What is his object? Is he acting in the interest of the people of this country? I should say not. Is he acting in the interest of the canal officials? I do not say that he is; I do not say that they paid him one dollar, but they did pay $1,675 to Mr. Rykert to defend them from this old man. The commissioner, with regard to the borrowing of this money, said (see page 1426): "I could fancy such a story as this coming to the ears of Senator McCallum, and I must confess that it created an unfavorable impression in my own mind, as I did not know where it would end;" but mark, hon. gentlemen, he ended this question when he would not allow me to examine Booth, Bradley, Smith and others. Anybody may read the evidence for himself. The commissioner is responsible to the people—if they will take the trouble to read the evidence. I will now give a list of his rulings against me. He rules against me, and allows evidence to be taken about the practice on the canal as to teaming, although he formerly ruled that Mr. McCallum should not be allowed to show that former superintendents on the canal did not get free gas. He did this because he wanted to protect Mr. Ellis. Any one can see how the commissioner, by his rulings, tries to cover Mr. Ellis' conduct. Then the commissioner ruled, in the case of the witness R. B. Dunn, that he would not allow me to prove how much money Mr. Ellis got as testimonial; that was Mr. Ellis' private affairs, but I venture to say that every dollar Mr. Ellis got cost us $10. At page 102, Timmons' evidence, the commissioner ruled out the questions: "Did you give other Superintendents free gas?" "Did you give him anything else?" At page 109: "Do you make it a practice to give every person free gas who is civil and courteous?" Ruled out. At page 123, statement of the gas furnished free, pages 1458 and 1459, the commissioner refuses to allow me to prove a letter that is in the record sent by Mr. Ellis to Mr. McDonagh to be copied by him and sent to Sir Charles Tupper (see page 346). That is the letter in John McDonagh's evidence, that notorious letter written by Mr. Ellis in praise of himself, to be sent to Sir Charles Tupper, as if it came from Mr. McDonagh. At page 1499 in John Bradley's evidence the Commissioner ruled out the question whether witness had contributed any money towards the payment of Mr. Ellis' debts. The question following, by the commissioner, made the witness the judge whether the bargain was corrupt or not. He ruled out the question: "Did you ever tell anybody that you advanced a sum of money that way?" At page 1502, in Richard A. Booth's evidence, he ruled out the question: "Did you give any portion of your horse hire at any time as a loan to Mr. Smith or Mr. Ellis to pay Ellis' debts?" At page 1857, in John B. Smith's evidence, this question was ruled out: "Did you borrow any money from anybody else just in that way to pay debts? Did you borrow some from John Bradley?" The commissioner asked if it was money for any corrupt purpose? In reply I said that he, the commissioner, should be the judge whether it was corrupt or not, that we did not want to make the witness the judge. The commissioner said that Mr. Smith might answer the question if he liked, but he would not insist upon it. Mr. Rykert advised the witness not to answer it. That is a sample of the rulings of the commissioner on the canal investigation. I made up my mind that he did not want any more evidence on this point of borrowing money from the employés on the canal to pay Mr. Ellis' debts by such private arrangements as those made with Mr. Abbey. He lectured Mr. Smith on misconduct, and I take it from his remarks that their actions in that matter alone ought to be enough to relieve Mr. Ellis and Mr. Smith from performing any further duties for the Government, and should lead to their dismissal from the public service.

At page 1867 the commissioner says: "I can readily understand such a story as I have heard coming to the ears of Mr. McCallum, and I confess that it created an unfavorable impression on me, for I did not know where it would end." The commissioner ended it, as you will see by his ruling, by not allowing me to examine witnesses on the matter.

The hon. member for Lincoln tried to belittle my efforts on behalf of the public in this investigation. He says the amount taken from the public is only $118. He admits a misappropriation to that extent. It reminds me of the excuse of the poor girl who had met with a misfortune, for which she was rebuked by her mistress. "It is true," she said, "but after all it is only a very little one." But in this case, when we come to dress up Mr. Ellis' bantling, we find it to be as follows:—

MEMO.

Mr. Ellis takes to his own use, as proven approximately, Chatfield's services for 3 weeks, as proven by Chatfield's evidence, at $75 per month	$ 55 00
Services of Hartley, acting as man servant for over half of the time, for over 4½ yrs.	1,000 00
Chas. Hill, teaming, as per Morey's evidence	60 00
Chas. Hill, as per his own evidence	16 00
Chas. Hellenus, carpenter, 8 days, $2 a day.	16 00
Hamilton Page, hauling iron fence	1 00
John Sexton, 2 days at $2 a day	4 00
William Hopgood	2 25
Martin MacCormack	1 00
Thomas Bonwell, 20 days	30 00
George Nickolson, carpenter, 18 days	36 00
Detention of scow "Mud Hen," and crew, while taking baggage to station	4 00
Monies certified to by himself, say, horse-hire to Foster, the same being paid by the Government—put it at the low figure of $100 a year, making	800 00
Free gas, and using it for fuel for 4 years, at $150 a year	600 00
Testimonial for his good looks and civility.	600 00
Money collected from Smiley and Dickson for use of pontoon and not accounted for,	38 00
Total	$3,263 25

This is approximately what Mr. Ellis received as his share of the plunder, as shown by the evidence; and I am satisfied that the evidence shows but little of the wrong-doings on the Welland Canal.

This $3,263.25 is the sum that he has had for his own use, without saying anything about what others got. Mr. Rykert says I got annoyed at the Mail because they said so-and-so about me. It is true that I showed the Mail up; I did not show all that they got, because I did not have an opportunity of doing so: but let us see what the Mail did say. They did not want this inquiry to go on; they wanted to throw cold water on my efforts, and said:

"The Welland Canal investigation will cost the country fully ten thousand dollars. Its origin was a series of charges made by Senator McCallum on the floor of the Upper House against the canal Superintendent. When the commission opened its proceedings in St. Catharines, Senator McCallum was invited to establish his charges. He essayed to do so, but without success. Thereupon the scope of the commission was enlarged."

That is false; it was never enlarged, but this was intended to throw cold water on me:

"Instead of being an enquiry into the specific charges, it developed into a fishing expedition. The only persons who profit by the enquiry are the commissioner, the official reporter, and Mr. Rykert.

"No public good has as yet been derived from the investigation, and if, as is probable, Mr. McCallum puts his best foot forward at the early stages of the proceedings, it is apparant that no advantage will be scored in the near future. This observation must be accompanied by the saving clause that the public interests may have been served indirectly by the testimony Messrs. McCallum and Rykert have given touching their own characters as statesmen. Mr. McCallum, during the fits of candor which are produced by his frequent animated controversies with the other side on the subject of the reception of testimony, is wont to fall into an audible contemplation of Mr. Rykert's political record, while Mr. Rykert, in retaliation, gives descriptive accounts of Mr. McCallum calculated to reduce that gentleman, though one of our local peers, to the level of an ordinary Grit."

I would say on behalf of the commissioner that he did not hold back. The Mail's article would create the impression that he was profiting by the length of the investigation. I will take the blame of its length. I was there alone, without assistance, and had to examine all the pay-lists for the last ten years. I will say, in justice to the commissioner, that however he may have acted since the 13th November, up to that time he occasioned no delay. Mr. Rykert had two adjournments, which I did not want. I had to come thirty-six miles every Monday morning to attend the investigation. I do not want the commissioner to be answerable for my sins; he has enough of his own to answer for. Mr. Ellis gets religious sometimes, as long as he can help the church at the expense of the country, but he is very penurious with his own money.

This is what he did for outside parties to gain popularity:

I should say that a baby of such dimensions is a bouncer, and gives every evidence of having been liberally fed with pap. If you will read the evidence you will get well acquainted with the officers on the Welland Canal and their doings. You will know the storekeeper and his books, and the duties he performs—he that weighs the scrap iron, and does little else but receive his pay and allowance, which is equal to $1,200 a year. You will know the official that keeps the time at Port Dalhousie but lives at Allanburg; who buys a commutation ticket for from $32 to $36, and charges the Government as high as $205, and certifies to the blacksmith's bills, lumber bills, and castings; who carries the accounts on scraps of paper in his pockets, until he sees the persons that furnish the material and puts them in his scratch book. I have seen his scratch book. I have seen, and you can see from the evidence before you, that the deputy superintendent of the old canal pays for liquid refreshments with the Government money, and orders that beautiful paint that the lock-tenders stick fast to, that is good to catch flies; that he collects money from employés on the canal to pay Mr. Ellis' debts, and acts as Mr. Ellis' broker in getting him money and in sending teams to do his work. By the evidence you will become acquainted with the deputy superintendent, Mr. J. C. Demare, president of the Port Dalhousie band. You will know from the evidence produced that he gets Government lands farmed on shares; takes free gas; pays money to himself; sends money through the post office and it is lost; gives Government property free of charge to work at his friend's rubber factory; farms out lock-tenders. He is the modest man that happens to be sick if anything is wrong—such as finding a swamp in his cellar, as happened in the case of Miller's contract. He is the official that wants a lock-tender to make a false report in order to get his brother lock-tender discharged; who sends carpenters and laborers to work at Mr. Ellis' house, and certifies to their time as if working for the Government; and who sends the scow "Sir John" for stone and cement free of charge for the rubber factory. The stone and cement came through the canal as Government property and was used in the rubber factory. You will know the other deputy, Mr. Dell, the overseer on the canal since 1850, as per his first evidence. But when he was re-called he had to take twenty years off the time. He is the man that wanted old plank, but kept the new ones. You will know the Superintendent, the paymaster and the clerk, who compose the treasury board. The clerk is ordered by Mr. Ellis to put down so many days on the time-list, and the entry is made accordingly, Mr. Ellis certifying to the time as being correct, when he knew that he did no work, and he ordered the paymaster to pay it, and by such conduct deceived the Government, the country paying the money. He, the Superintendent, makes the clerk and paymaster parties to the fraud perpetrated on the public. Is the paymaster an independent officer? If he is not he should be. Why should the paymaster pay the money when he knew that this man Assell did not work? As you look over the evidence you must get well acquainted with the Superintendent, who accepts free gas from the gas company and burns it for fuel; who receives a testimonial from the manufacturers and builds their structures—such as bridges and chutes, and digs their ponds, without any authority from the Department; who built a Custom house and post office at Port Colborne out of canal maintenance without any authority; who constructs a dock at Port Colborne that proves a failure, without consulting the Chief Engineer; who takes laborers, carpenters and gasfitters to do his private work, and they get paid with Government money at the canal office; who charges his horse-hire to the Government, although he is allowed $300 a year for that purpose; who has his own private teaming done by teamsters on the canal and they are paid by Government money; who borrows money from the employés on the canal through his deputy, J. B. Smith; who builds a township bridge with canal funds at a cost of over $1,000, contrary to the report of the Chief Engineer, to please a member of Parliament; who neglects his duty to close the gates at Port Colborne, and occasions a loss to the country of $25,000; who threatens to kick respectable gentlemen out of his office because they do not grant his requests; who gets his fence pickets from the Government yard at Port Dalhousie; who acts so meanly as to pay for $1.50 worth of vegetables with one yard of Government gravel; who put in a receipt signed with a "X" to hide it—this is the gentleman that threatens me with an action for slander for $10,000 for daring to speak about his conduct. He was playing bluff, so to speak. You will know the gentleman that appoints the employés on the canal, that is the Q.C., M.P.; he that is not an informer, but pleads the cause of the canal officials with great ability; he that has been the advocate and would like to be the judge before this case is ended. The commissioner, at page 33 of the pamphlet says, on the increase of $300 to Mr. Demare's salary, that if he, the commissioner, believes the evidence, Mr. Demare deserves the money. Mr. Page says that Demare is "skilful and energetic"—skilful and energetic? Yes; in sending men to work at Mr. Ellis' private residence and returning their time as if working for the Government and the men paid by Government money. Skilful in paying himself money that he ought to pay to the credit of the country; skilful and energetic in giving the use of Government property to his friends free of charge; skilful and energetic in finding a leak under the rubber factory to cover up a corrupt job; skilful and energetic to farm out lock-tenders to work at his friend's rubber factory; skilful and energetic to have men to work on Miller's contract for building the pontoon and returning their time as if working for the Government, and the men get paid by the Government, when Mr. Miller should have paid them; skilful and energetic to send men to work on R. Miller's contract for repairs on overseer's house, and in returning the time as working for the Government, and have them paid by the Government, instead of Mr. Miller paying them; skilful and energetic in getting free gas and making the Government pay for it by having the gas measured in the Government meter and charged to the Government before it goes to his house; skilful and energetic in trying to get Lock-tender Bradley to make a false report against Lock-tender Millward; skilful and energetic in having his salary increased $300 a year and no Order-in-Council to sanction the increase; skilful and energetic to assist Mr. Roger Miller to speculate in rubber boots to the injury of the country; skilful and energetic to get Government land farmed on shares for his benefit. Yes: this is a skilful and energetic man for his own benefit, but not for the public. The commissioner could not have read or considered the evidence when he was, as I consider, giving himself away to the Q.C., M.P., when addressing him on this point and many others. That, hon. gentlemen, is the most charitable construction that I can put on his replies to the Q.C., M.P., when arguing the case. Or, otherwise, did he think he had got the gag on Senator McCallum and that he could do what he liked, and there would be nothing more about it? In conclusion, I would say that I hope for the sake of my country that there is no other public work in the Dominion that is managed as the Welland Canal is, particularly in the matter of supplies and repairs under Mr. Ellis, Mr. Demare, Mr. Vanderburg, Storekeeper Waite, Overseer Dell and Broker Smith. Anyone that will look at the evidence taken at the investigation can see how that work is managed, although I am free to confess, and give it as my opinion, that the investigation has shown but little of the irregularities in the management and repairs of that important work. We use thousands of dollars worth of iron work on the canal every year, but there is no account kept of it, except what the blacksmith keeps, and of a little cast iron kept by Mr. Vanderburg in his scratch book. If hon. gentlemen will look at the Auditor-General's report and pay-lists for the last three years they will see that we have construction going on all the time—in fact, we have repairs going on, and called construction—and why is this? The only reason I can give for it is that the Engineer-in-Chief has no confidence in the Superintendent, and cannot trust him with any important repairs. Whether this state of affairs is in the interest of the country or not you can judge best. By reading the evidence you will see that from the actions of Mr. Roger Miller in the case of the construction of the pontoon, the repairs to overseer's house and the rubber boots, Mr. Page being there but little to look after them, they take advantage of his absence to advance their own interests to the injury of the country. It was hard to get at the facts. The commissioner looked on me as a litigant from the beginning to the close of the investigation, as any one can see by his ruling out of questions and his lectures to witnesses, even expressing himself that he did not see any harm in Mr. Ellis taking Lock-tender Bonnewell with him to the Lake Shore to rusticate and have a jamboree for twenty days when the country was paying Bonnewell $47 per month. Mr. Ellis, in reply to my letter to the Department last Session, as you see by the Debates, says that Mr. Bonnewell paid the man in his place while he was away with him (Ellis); but Bonnewell swears that he did not pay any man in his place, and that the Government paid him (Bonnewell) for twenty days that he was away. He was cooking for Mr. Ellis, and he had another lock-tender helping him. I did not enquire who paid the other lock-tender: the country paid him, no doubt. Mr. Demare gives the Government scow "Sir John" to freight stone to Port Dalhousie for the rubber factory. The stone comes through the canal as Government stone, and pays no tolls—no let pass; and when asked if he charged for the scow or got paid, his answer was that he did not know. He also gives a Government scow to a lock-tender free of charge to freight stone, and the stone comes through the canal as Government stone—no let pass. He also gives steam pump, blocks and tackle, and jack screws for the use of the rubber factory free of charge—at least, there is no return of money collected. He gives diving armor and men free to some parties and in other cases he ties up vessels for refusing his demand until they pay his charges. He farms out lock-tenders to work at the foundation of the rubber factory for six weeks at a time, in order that they can make more money. These two lock-tenders were receiving $47 each per month from the Government.

I said last Session, when requesting an investigation into canal management, that I considered Mr. Demare to be the cause of more trouble than any other man on the canal, and I think that the evidence taken at the investigation has proven what I said then to be correct. Mr. Demare goes to a lock-tender, James Bradley, and requests him to make a false report against a brother lock-tender, George Millward, on the same lock, and gives as a reason that he wants to put him, Millward, off the canal—that he wants to get rid of him. Lock-tender Bradley's evidence stands unimpeached in every respect. Mr. Demare swears that he did not do so, but his evidence is discredited, and I consider cannot have any force. What do we find to have taken place shortly afterwards. We find that this Lock-tender Bradley was dismissed on some trifling charge which he refuted, but he did not get placed back on the lock, so Mr. Bradley got dismissed because he refused to make a false report about Lock-tender Millward. Bradley warned Millward and put him on his guard. This man Demare pays money to himself that should be paid to the credit of the country —from the schooner "Leighton" $10, from the barge "Hall" $10, and money collected from Smilie and Kelly for use of the pontoon by Capt. Murray, $38. According to C. Smilie's evidence, the men at Port Dalhousie must get well paid for anything in the shape of work. Did this money, the $38 collected from Smilie and Kelly, go to pay for the cement and stone for the band hall at Port Dalhousie? The $38 is not accounted for. Messrs. Murray and Cleveland collected the money, and the evidence shows that Mr. Demare got the material for the band hall from them. The evidence taken at the investigation proves much more than I charged last Session, and shows a state of affairs that should not exist in the management of a great public work. I wish hon. gentlemen to read the evidence and deal out the punishment by the dismissal of these men from the Government employment—what I expected to be done under the circumstances. We cannot expect to get the money back that has been wasted by those managing the Welland Canal, but we can dismiss from the service those found and proven guilty by the evidence. Last Session the leader of the House, Mr. Abbott, promised that there should be an immediate and searching investigation. An investigation has taken place; but, as I have shown, it was not searching or thorough; but enough has been proved to justify the Government in promptly dismissing from the public service the men who have been mismanaging the Welland Canal. I beg to inquire, therefore, what action the Government intend to take on the evidence taken before A. F. Wood, Esq., Commissioner, as to the conduct of the officials on the Welland Canal in the management of that important work.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—In answer to the inquiry made by the hon. gentleman, I have the honor to state that Mr. Wood's report has been received but recently, and has not yet reached the Privy Council.

SAULT STE. MARIE RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. READ moved the second reading of Bill (27) "An Act to incorporate the Sault Ste. Marie Railway Company." He said: This Bill asks for authority to build a railway from Sault Ste. Marie to Hudson's Bay, with power also to issue debentures or bonds to a certain amount.

HON. MR. POWER—I am surprised to hear my hon. friend from Quinté asking the House to endorse the principle of this Bill. Do I understand that this railway is to run to Hudson's Bay or to James' Bay?

HON. MR. READ—It says Hudson's Bay in the title, but it says James' Bay in the Bill.

HON. MR. POWER—That makes the matter rather worse.

HON. MR. READ—It is called the Sault Ste. Marie and Hudson's Bay Railway; but it is to construct a railway from Sault Ste. Marie to Moose Factory, on James' Bay.

HON. MR. POWER—Every one who knows anything about that part of the country is aware of the fact that James' Bay is not navigable for vessels of any size, and that it freezes over in the winter, and I really do not think it is right for this House to endorse the principle of such a Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

OTTAWA, MORRISBURG AND NEW YORK RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. READ moved the second reading of Bill (28) "An Act to incorporate the Ottawa, Morrisburg and New York Railway Company." He said: I need not dwell on this Bill, because it has been before this House for three or four years in succession.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I think it right that the attention of the House should be called to the fact that this is a measure which has been twice before the Senate and rejected. I certainly expected that there would have been some information given to the House to-day to guide us with reference to taking it up a third time—that we would have had some explanation of the difficulties being removed or reasons furnished why the former action of the Chamber should be reversed. There is no time now to enter into details, and I do not feel disposed to move a six months' hoist to the Bill, but it is well that the House should know that this is a Bill that has been twice rejected by the Senate.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Not on the second reading.

HON. MR. VIDAL—Not on the second reading, but on the report of the committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

THE SENATE STATIONERY.

MOTION.

A Message was received from the House of Commons asking that the officials of the Senate in charge of the stationery be permitted to give evidence before the Public Accounts Committee.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I believe this is a very important question. It has to be considered, and I move that the Message be taken into consideration on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 6 p.m.

THE SENATE

Ottawa, Tuesday, February 25th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills, reported from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, without amendment, were read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (J) "An Act respecting the Great North-Western Railway Company." (Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (13) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company." (Mr. Girard.)

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (A) "An Act to amend the Railway Act," without amendment.

HON. MR. McCALLUM moved that the Bill be read the third time presently.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—I move that the Bill be not read the third time presently, but that it be read the third time this day six months. My reasons for moving the six months hoist are various. In the first place, for a great many years a number of amendments were made to the Railway Act. These amendments were consolidated a few years ago, and we thought we had an Act that was pretty nearly perfect; but I suppose, like all legislation framed by mankind, the Railway Act is not perfect. Nevertheless, if it is not perfect, I do not think that the members of this House, when they look into this matter thoroughly, will pass the Bill that is now before us. In the first place, it is the business of the Government to attend to such matters. We have the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, who are perfectly able to take hold of this kind of work and ready to do it; and I am informed on the very best authority that there are no complaints against the working of the Act on the part of our principal railways. If this Bill is passed in the shape in which it is now—we passed it last year, but it was thrown out in the other branch of Parliament—it will simply cause a good deal of trouble to the railway companies from those who may happen to have ill-feeling against them—either by individuals making complaint to the municipality or by the municipality applying to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and putting the companies to a great deal of trouble without accomplishing any good. The principal feature of the Bill relates to drainage. It provides that municipalities or individuals shall have the power to compel railways to make culverts through their roads wherever there may appear to be reasonable ground to do so. Now, culverts are all very well where they are absolutely necessary to carry off the water, but the municipalities take care that the railway companies provide culverts when they are building their lines. A great many railway accidents arise from the fact that culverts, either from the nature of the soil or other causes, sink after freshets. The water carries away the earth from the culvert and the road-bed subsides two or three inches. The rails spread, a train goes over the bank, and we never hear of the cause of the accident, because railway companies are disinclined to give details of accidents. I am informed on the best authority that a very large number of railway accidents have happened from the cause I have mentioned. I do not think that we want to put into the hands of individuals or municipalities the power to cause an extra amount of danger to passenger traffic. Besides that, we have spent in Canada a great many millions of dollars and granted large tracts of land to get railways, and now we are asked to pass a Bill that may do the railway companies as much harm as we have done good by our money and land grants to the companies. Any person who will take the trouble to look into the Bill thoroughly, and into the Railway Act, will see that we have all the legislation that is necessary at present. If any amendment is required, the proper way to get it is to appeal to the Government to amend the existing law, and not pass new Acts that may not be workable and certainly will be a source of annoyance to the railway companies, without doing the country any good. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council is as good a safeguard as could be provided. It is more anxious to look after the interests of the public than the interests of railway companies, because it is amenable to the public. To say the least of it, if this legislation is not vicious it is certainly unnecessary, and we should be very careful how we go further with it. I hope the good sense of this House will be opposed to this Bill. Year after year it has been introduced, only to be thrown out in the other branch of Parliament. I feel very strongly on this question, because I took some trouble about it last year and have given it some attention since then, to find out whether there was any serious grievance or complaint. The engineers of the principal railway companies within the last ten days have told me that they had not a single complaint that they knew of, and that in case any such complaint should arise they are particularly anxious to attend to it as quickly as possible, as it is in their own interest to keep on good terms with the inhabitants through whose country they pass. These are the reasons why I have moved the six months hoist, not in a spirit of opposition or obstruction at all, but in good faith, and I have hopes that it will be carried to-day.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—Last year I was rather favorable to this Bill, but on listening to the arguments against it to-day I changed my mind. The hon. member from Sarnia asked the promoter of the Bill whether any demands came in from the public for a Bill of this kind. There was no answer but one, and that one answer contained 1,100½ reasons which confirmed me in opposing this Bill. These 1,100½ reasons given by the promoter of the Bill were that he had that many acres of land that the railway drained to some extent for him, but did not drain to the extent that he thought he was entitled to, and I concluded that such a Bill as this, without any complaint made against the railways by those who lived in their vicinity, was unnecessary. If my hon. friend had not owned 1,100 acres of land which required more drainage, I do not think that this Bill would have come before the House. I am not in favor of a Bill which tends to unsettle an established Act of Parliament for the benefit of any individual. It is rather hard to advert to such a matter, especially when the Bill is introduced by an hon. gentleman whom I look upon as a friend, and with whom I never had anything disturbing or annoying; but when no other reason can be given to this House but the one I have mentioned for the introduction of this Bill, I think it is not a sufficient ground to ensure my support of the measure. There is already a forum to which people can go if they are at all injured through failure of the railway companies to perform their duties. Those who are injured can go to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and they have their surveyors and engineers and means of deciding those questions. If we leave such matters to be dealt with by the municipalities we throw upon the railway companies a most complex and disagreeable duty. The municipality is composed of one set of men to-day and another set of men to-morrow, and if we bring the railways within their power we throw on the railway companies a burden both vexatious and troublesome. Unless there is a good reason in the public interest for bringing in Bills interfering with established Acts, I hold that it is a bad practice to adopt such legislation. Where an Act is established and has been found satisfactory for years it should not be repealed or amended unless there is a demand for legislation in the public interest. For these reasons, I shall vote for the six months hoist.

HON. MR. POWER.—I should be disposed to take the same view as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. If there was no demand for this Bill, then probably we might be moving too rapidly to pass it; but the hon. gentleman could not have been paying attention to what took place at the Table of the House, or he would have heard a petition in favor of this very measure read here within the last few minutes. I am also informed, on the very best authority, that petitions which have been signed in nearly all the counties of the Province of Ontario are now finding their way before the other Chamber, and that more of them will get there within the next day or two. The probabilities are that the people interested in this matter did not think it necessary to present petitions to the Senate, because this House last year passed this Bill by an almost unanimous vote. Consequently, I do not think there is very much in the objection raised by the hon. gentleman from Toronto. That hon. gentleman was a little facetious, at the expense of the promoter of this Bill. He said that there were no grievances suffered by anyone, and no reasons put forward in favor of this Bill, except the 1,100 of the honorable introducer. I do not believe in personal legislation. It is objectionable; but, if it happens that the gentleman who introduces the Bill suffers in common with a number of his neighbors from the unsatisfactory condition of the law, that does not render his connection with the measure objectionable. The hon. member from Monck is not alone in this matter, and his case is the case of hundreds of others who have signed these petitions, one of which has been presented to the Senate and several to the House of Commons; and further, my own feeling is that it is not well to discuss in the House everything which takes place in the Committee. The hon. gentleman from Monck did not give the fact which has been put forward by the hon. member from Toronto as the principal reason why the Bill should pass. He said there were scores of people throughout Ontario suffering from the want of this Bill, and mentioned some townships in which there were a number of instances, and then added: "I am one of the sufferers myself." Was there anything wrong or improper in the connection of the hon. gentleman from Monck with this Bill under the circumstances? I think we should dismiss these 1,100 reasons at once from our minds and deal with the Bill on its merits. The hon. gentleman from Alma division said that one of the fundamental reasons why this Bill should not pass was that it was a Bill which amended the Railway Act; and he said we have amended this Railway Act several times, and we think we have got it nearly perfect now and should leave it alone. It has become now, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman and I presume in the opinion of a number of other hon. gentlemen who are interested in railways, nearly perfect, and we should let it alone, and for the future it must be like the laws of the Medes and Persians, but it happens that in the opinion of the petitioners who have come to this House and the House of Commons, and of many who have not signed the petitions, the Railway Act is not perfect now; and I should like to ask the hon. gentleman from Alma why we are here? It is not chiefly to take care of the railway companies, for they have generally taken very good care of their own interests, and we have taken care of their interests in the legislation which has been passed; but our business is to take care of the people at large. We represent them. They are not represented by counsel and by influential boards of directors, and we are supposed to represent them. If it is found that, looking at the interests of the public, the Railway Act is not quite perfect, then it is our duty, representing the public, to make the Act more perfect, if possible. There is not the slightest objection to altering the law, if we make the law better. That is what we are doing every year. What is our Statute book every year but simply an illustration of the fact that the laws have not been perfect, that we are trying to make them better. I think the Railway Act would bear amendment in other particulars besides that before the House; but I think this Bill—which, by the way, is largely the result of the painstaking efforts of the hon. gentleman who led this House last Session—is a great improvement in the law. The hon. gentleman spoke of it as being the business of the Government to introduce such a measure; but it is not the business of the Government to do all the legislating. We are here to represent the people and to legislate; and, when we are satisfied that amendments to the law are necessary, the Government have no right to dictate to us as to what we should do. Of course, if legislation that is proposed by any member of this House is repugnant to common sense, or calculated to be injurious to the public interests, then the Government will have no difficulty, if they are hostile to it, in securing a majority to defeat it; but, if the legislation proposed by a member of this House is in the public interest, I think it would be very much to the discredit of this House if they should reject that legislation, simply because the Government do not happen to fancy it. But, in the present instance, I do not understand that the Government are hostile to the proposed legislation. The hon. gentleman from Alma says that we have a Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and if there is anything wrong about the law they can make it all right, but the Railway Committee of the Privy Council cannot alter the law; they simply act under the law. The hon. gentleman, at a later stage, undertook to say that the present plan of doing things was quite satisfactory—that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council would look after the public interest in every case. That may be perfectly true where the country affected is in the vicinity of the capital; but it is not true as to more remote portions of the Dominion. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to talk about coming to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council; but suppose a difficulty arises in British Columbia, it is a very serious thing for a municipality to send a delegate or professional man all the way to Ottawa for the purpose of presenting their view of the matter before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. It is not difficult for the railway company, because the railway companies, as a rule, have their solicitors on the spot. There is no gentleman here who has so little experience as not to know that the idea of any private individual or any poor municipality undertaking to go into litigation with a powerful railway company is almost absurd. It means entering upon interminable litigation. The hon. gentlemen who are opposed to this Bill have not put the matter fairly before the House. Their speeches leave the impression that the Bill enables municipalities to worry and annoy railway companies. If any hon.

gentleman will take the trouble to read this Bill through he will find that it does not empower municipalities to do anything of the sort. As it is now, the municipality can bring the railway company to Ottawa. Under this Bill, the municipality in the first instance gives the company notice that, in the opinion of the municipal council, there should be a culvert at or near a certain point on the line. I dare say that in most cases the railway company, when they come to look at the matter, will be satisfied that the municipal council is right, and there will be no more litigation or trouble about it; the railway company will put in the culvert. If, on the other hand, the municipal council happen to be unreasonable in their demand, then the railway company, under this Bill, can go to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and if the demand of the municipality is unreasonable, that committee will not grant it. I think the rights of the railway companies are amply protected. Further, this Bill does not apply to cases where the expenditure involved will be large. It only applies to cases where the expenditure will be under $800. I fail to see how the Bill can injure seriously any railway company; and I do not see any serious objection to it all. The hon. gentleman from Alma division, with great impressiveness and with a certain mystery of manner, intimated that he had from the very best authority information that a large number of railway accidents occurred from defective culverts. My own impression is that if such is the case it is little to the credit of the railway companies. It is their duty to construct the culverts in a workmanlike manner, as they construct the remainder of their roads. If the road is not properly ballasted or the sleepers are too old accidents will happen just as readily as from inferior culverts; and it is the duty of the railway company to have not only the culverts but the sleepers and track in a proper condition.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—They can see one; they cannot see the other.

HON. MR. POWER—It is the duty of the track-master to examine the culverts as well as the track. The hon. gentleman spoke as though the effect of this Bill would be to increase the risk of accident.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

HON. MR. POWER—I hear indications of approval of that sentiment from the hon. member from Ottawa. I think both these hon. gentlemen know enough about railways to be aware that all accidents which happen from too much water are not from the falling in of culverts, but that washouts often happen, and that they are likely to happen, because there is not any culvert and no outlet for the water. A washout is just as likely to happen from that cause as from the falling in of a culvert. The hon. gentleman from Alma division spoke as though we were under a very great obligation to the railway companies here.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—No; I did not.

HON. MR. POWER—It may be that a number of these railway companies have gone into the business of railway construction from purely philanthropic motives, but I do not know that any one has seriously alleged that. If the railway companies have benefited Canada, they have, as a rule, benefited themselves; and, at any rate, if we have railways in this country, if we subsidize railway companies and give them important privileges, is it not for the benefit of this country? We do not do that for the benefit of the railway companies, but in the public interest. There is not the slightest doubt that, when a railway runs through a country where there is a large fall of water, it is necessary that there should be culverts at reasonable intervals, and that is about all that this Bill provides—that the railway company should not unreasonably refuse to make culverts. If a municipality out in British Columbia, or down in the Island of Cape Breton, finds that the water has been dammed back on the lands of the farmers by the railway, the railway company feel that they can, to a certain extent, defy these people, because they are not likely to come to Ottawa to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and the railway company calculates on that. The argument was used that the Bill had been thrown out in the House of Commons last year, and therefore we should not pass it again. I think that is a most extraordinary doctrine. We passed it here last year almost unanimously; it went down to the other House at a rather late period of the Session; it was defeated there—not in the House, but in the Railway Committee—largely because the members of the Railway Committee did not understand the exact nature of this Bill; they were misled—I do not mean to say deliberately misled—but misled by statements like those made by the hon. member from Alma to-day. The impression was left on their minds that this was a measure which placed the railway companies in the hands of any ill-natured individual. That is not the case. There is one fact which the hon. gentleman has not adverted to, that in his own Province the substance of this Bill is law to-day; and the hon. gentleman gets up here and says that a law which is good and beneficial, and in the public interests of the Province of Quebec——

HON. MR. OGILVIE—I did not say so.

HON. MR. POWER—That is practically what the hon. gentleman says.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—Do not put words into my mouth; you have been doing so ever since you rose.

HON. MR. POWER—I simply give the substance of what the hon. gentleman's argument is. The substance of this Bill is law to-day in the Province of Quebec, under the Consolidated Statutes of Old Canada, and under the Code of Quebec; and the hon. gentleman, representing a division of the Province of Quebec, rises here and asks us not to extend this law, which is, as I said, useful and beneficial and proper in Quebec, to the whole Dominion. I hope the House will not, after having passed this Bill almost unanimously last year, and read it the second time this year without any division, at the last stage stultify itself by throwing it out to-day.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I do not think my hon. friend from Halifax has seen the arguments that have been advanced against the passage of this Bill. I concur very largely in the statements made by the hon. member from Algoma, with reference to there being no necessity for this Bill, and I think there is also some very serious question whether it would not be injurious rather than helpful to the public interest. My hon. friend spoke as though we, in this House, were in a very especial manner the representatives and guardians of the people's rights. I trust we are so. Although not directly responsible to the people in the positions we hold here, I believe every member of this House has a sincere and earnest desire to advance the general interest of the community, and guard private interests—just as much so as members of the other House. But a contrast is drawn between our position and that of the Railway Committee. I hold that it entirely fails.

HON. MR. POWER—I did not draw any contrast at all.

HON. MR. VIDAL—The hon. gentleman certainly drew the contrast most decidedly—that we were responsible, but that the Railway Committee was not responsible.

HON. MR. POWER—I did not say anything of the sort.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I understood the hon. gentleman to say so. I am very glad to hear I was mistaken. I think that the Railway Committee is more responsible to the people than even this House is, and I think that the Railway Committee in all their past acts have shown a strong desire to maintain the interests of the public, even against those of the Railway Committee. In the committee a reference was made to a question which I put to the promoter of the Bill. I should like to explain to the House my motive for doing so, because on it hangs the only question which we ought to decide. Is this a Bill that ought to carry in this House? In the committee we had the advantage of the presence, the information and the advice of an experienced lawyer, a gentleman who has had great legislative experience both in the Provincial and Dominion Legislatures, who has had a great deal to do with railway legislation and railway cases in the country, and who was himself for a time a member of the Executive, having authority over these things. He told us, and stated most distinctly, that the present law meets every requirement which is supposed to be met by the Bill that is now before the House. That is a very important statement—that everything which is attempted to be obtained by this Bill now presented to the House is already attainable by proper process under the existing law. That led me to ask the question where this law failed, and I asked the promoter of the Bill: "Can you name to me a single instance where the present law has been found insufficient to meet a case of this kind?" I wanted to know whether there was any truth that additional legislation was needed. I got no answer to that question. A long address about generalities was, of course, delivered, and a statement made about these petitions. Hon. gentlemen know what these petitions mean. It is not difficult to get petitions signed when they are presented by influential persons, and especially when they ask for increased privileges and powers, as these do, for the municipalities. But I hold that these petitions are no proof, such as the House requires, of any public demand for a change in the statute. We want proof that the statute has failed in any case. That proof has not been brought forward in a single instance. I think in the Bill itself there are elements of what will probably lead to confusion and litigation. For instance, very large power is given under this Bill to the municipalities. Now we all know what municipalities are composed of: they are, no doubt, intelligent men, but they are not familiar with engineering questions, and yet they may pass resolutions and impose restrictions which this House is not cognizant of, and the railway companies will be brought under these restrictions, however absurd or injurious they may be. Surely that is something that should not be done. We ought not to delegate power to municipal bodies—excellent bodies, no doubt, but not possessed of the knowledge and information which would enable them to legislate for the country and control the railway companies. I think that is an element of danger; but my main objection to the Bill is that it is unnecessary, that it interferes with the statute now on our books, which it is a great deal better to keep intact. I am persuaded, if the promoter of the Bill and those working with him could show to the Railway Committee a single instance in which a thing of this kind had been sought and refused, which should have been granted, they themselves would take care that the law should be so amended that it should not occur in the future. This is one of the Bills which ought to be admittedly under the special care of the Government. I think the Railway Act which we now have—while, of course, it is susceptible, as any human legislation is, of improvement and amendment—works satisfactorily, and that any improvements and amendments that may be required should only be obtained when a necessity for them is made apparent, and when that necessity has been properly brought before the Government.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:—

HON. MR. SCOTT—I wish to say one word to remove a serious misconception from the minds of some hon. gentlemen. It is conceded that the Railway Committee have the widest possible power. The argument that has been used is that it is unfair that municipalities in remote parts of the country should be obliged to come to Ottawa or be represented before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council in order to obtain what they consider fair and equal justice. Now, I beg to assure hon. gentlemen that I am not aware that the Railway Committee have ever required a municipality to be represented here. One hon. gentleman who spoke in support of the Bill said, by way of illustration: Suppose a grievance arose in British Columbia, would it not be reasonable that the party or municipality making the application should be obliged to attend here or be represented by counsel. Now, it just so happens that, either at the last meeting of the Railway Committee, or the meeting immediately preceding that, an application came from the municipality of New Westminster. They were very much opposed to the work that was going on there by a railway company, and a fierce contest arose between them. The railway was ably represented on this occasion by counsel, but the municipality was represented by nothing else than a letter; yet the Railway Committee decided in favor of the municipality, showing that the idea that it is necessary to be represented at Ottawa is entirely erroneous. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council are exceedingly careful to guard the rights of those who are not represented—much more careful and cautious than if those rights are represented by counsel. With a knowledge of that whereof I am speaking, having considerable experience in these matters, all I can say is that to settle a grievance of this kind—an application for a culvert or deepening a drain—it will involve very much less time and labor to make application to Mr. Trudeau, Secretary of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, than to apply under this Bill, and I do not think it is likely that a solitary case will arise under this Bill in the next ten years.

HON. MR. POWER—Then why oppose it?

HON. MR. SCOTT—Because it is a disturbing Bill. Under the existing law, if any grievance arises it is a very simple matter to communicate with Mr. Trudeau and have it dealt with by the Railway Committee. There is an officer whose duty it is to attend to such matters—Mr. Ridout—and he is constantly travelling over the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific to inquire into just such cases, and I think one could fairly throw out the challenge that an authenticated case of hardship under the Railway Act as it now exists cannot be pointed out. Is it wise or prudent that we should throw on the country a Bill of this kind? It either has a meaning, or it has not a meaning. It is a Bill that is difficult in its intrepretation and would be a prolific source of litigation. It must be patent to hon. gentlemen when they read it that in every case under this Bill the parties will still have a right to appeal to the Railway Committee, and they have all this complicated machinery, in the first instance. The railway companies will probably resist a Bill of this kind. They do not think it reasonable; they do not think it is demanded or necessary. They will simply dispute the propriety of putting a culvert in a particular place. Then, after the plans have been prepared, the municipality appealed to and the order made, they will come to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, where the question will have to be finally decided, because there is a clause in this Bill which gives either party the right to appeal to that tribunal. It is a very simple matter to communicate by letter with the Secretary of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to question the propriety of putting a culvert at the point indicated. The Railway Committee still has to deal with it. You will impose all that trouble by the machinery provided in this Bill, and give these imaginary powers—because, after all, they ar only imaginary—to the municipality, when they can accomplish nothing by means of them.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I am very much surprised to hear my hon. friend saying that the railway companies are so arbitrary and despotic that they will resist a demand, whether reasonable or unreasonable. I do not suppose what I am saying will have any effect on the Bill, because the House has given its decision. The hon. gentleman mentions one case where a railway company was defeated on an application to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. It shows how arbitrary the railway company must have been to let the case come before that tribunal when there were no grounds for resisting the demand. Under the Bill the Railway Committee are judges, but only in certain cases. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa says that a case can be fairly and reasonably discussed and decided with the counsel for the railway company there to press the claims of the railway and nobody present to represent the interest of the other side; but I do not think there would be the same probability of having a proper decision as there would be under this Bill. I contend that the proposed legislation is in the interest of the country, and there will not be any dispute between the railway companies and the municipalities. This will prevent rather than cause dissensions in the country. It will in many cases improve the railway tracks; because, as my hon. friend from Halifax has shown, there are more accidents caused by the want of culverts than by the existence of such structures. If a culvert breaks down it shows that there has been bad engineering. Most of the damage I have seen on railways—and I have travelled on a good many—have occurred from washouts because there were not sufficient culverts. I consider the Bill is in the public interest, and the public interest should be considered in a matter of this kind. When we talk about millions of money spent on railways we know that the expenditure has been for the public benefit. The public should be considered in the matter. The railway companies are quite able to take care of themselves.

HON. MR. ALMON—I do not think it is much use shooting a dead Indian, but if this Bill is wanted very much it is very unfortunate that it only applies to the older Provinces. In the North-West they have no municipal councils, and therefore that part of the Dominion cannot derive any advantage from this Bill. They must require drainage in the North-West, and if this measure is so absolutely necessary, why does it not apply to the Territories as well as to the older Provinces? I say that culverts are a cause of serious danger on railways. Accidents happen every year from culverts weakening the bed of the railway. In Nova Scotia a number of railways are cut through solid rock. Say a municipal council, whose members, as my hon. friend from Sarnia says, are no doubt very good men, but not engineers, and certainly not familiar with hydraulics—decide that a hole must be made through such an embankment, this Bill empowers them to call in, not an engineer, but a land surveyor.

HON. MR. READ—He can take the levels.

HON. MR. ALMON—Yes; he can take the levels, but you would not think of employing a land surveyor to build a railroad. My hon. friend might like to travel on a line constructed under such an engineer, but I would not. Very often, as I have said, the railway lines pass through solid rock, and this surveyor says that a culvert must be made. It must be done by blasting the rock. You can easily understand if a rock is blasted what the effect will be. The sleepers will be raised and the rails put out of order, and in all probability accidents will happen. There is a railway in Nova Scotia which my hon. friend, the senior member from Halifax, may remember was called the "Grit Railway." It was built from Yarmouth to Digby, and was to be finished by a certain time. It was stated by some—though I did not see it myself—that the bed of this road was built of brush-wood, with frozen earth thrown over it. Fancy what the effect would be if culverts were put through such an embankment! It would have gone to pieces. As we are talking about many things, I will compliment the hon. member from Sarnia on having discovered that petitions are easily got up and do not amount to much. There was a time when he thought differently. When this House was flooded with petitions in favor of the Canada Temperance Act he thought they were an indication of public opinion, but now he thinks they do not amount to anything.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—I move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that the same be amended by adding the following to the seventh clause:

Where in any Province or Territory a railway passes through a tract of country which has not been erected into a municipality, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, of such Province or Territory, shall, for the purpose of this Act, be substituted for a Municipal Council.

The words The Lieutenant-Governor in Council, so far as this Act relates to the North-West Territories, shall mean the Lieutenant-Governor, by and with the advice and consent of his Advisory Council.

I may say, in justification of this amendment, that the principle of the Bill appears to contemplate giving certain advantages to the Provinces, but the construction of the measure is such that it cannot be made applicable to the North-West Territories by reason of the fact that the greater portion of the Territories has not been erected into municipalities. There are, however, few rural municipalities in that vast country. There are some urban municipalities adjoining the line of railways, but very few rural municipalities. There is a general aversion in the North-West to municipalities, owing to the fact that we have excellent roadways there, and we do not want to incur taxation which municipal government would involve. There is no reason why the advantages which this Bill proposes to offer to the Provinces should not be extended to the Territories.

It is no argument to say that there are no municipalities in the North-West Territories. The same want that demands the passage of this Bill in the Provinces exists in the Territories, and consequently I submit that a provision should be made to extend the advantages contemplated in this Bill to the Territories. The contention can scarcely be admitted to be a strong one, that municipalities can deal more ably with the provisions of this Bill than the Lieutenant-Governor, with the advice and consent of his advisory board. The rights of the railway company will be quite as much guarded by the Lieutenant-Governor and his advisory board as they can be by the municipalities. I am not casting any reflection on the ability displayed by the municipalities in dealing with such questions as this; but certainly railway companies can thoroughly depend on this fact, that they will receive as much consideration, and as much ability will be displayed by the Lieutenant-Governor as by any municipality in dealing with these cases. Therefore, I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read a third time, and passed, on a division.

NAVIGATION OF THE RED RIVER.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. SUTHERLAND rose to inquire—

Whether it is the intention of the Government, at an early day, to supplement the improvement of navigation about completed at the outlet of the Red River, into Lake Winnipeg, and that by also improving that part known as the St. Andrew's Rapids, which will materially enhance the improvements already made?

He said: I will briefly refer to the advantages of the navigation of the Red River in the early settlement of the country, and show that it still continues to be advantageous to the people of the North-West, as it was in the early days. Although we have railways in the neighborhood running parrallel with the river, in some parts there are sections of the country where the railways do not touch on the river. To give some idea of the immense value of the river, I may be permitted to state the distances which are navigable. There were originally two obstructions to the navigation of the Red River. One was at the mouth of the river near Lake Winnipeg. That obstruction, I believe, has been about removed. The other, to which my motion more particularly refers is St. Andrews Rapids. These two obstructions were originally the only serious barriers to the navigation of the river. The St. Andrews Rapids are about thirty-five or forty miles south of the mouth of the river, and from that point to the international boundary the navigation is not seriously interrupted, so that St. Andrews Rapids are the only obstruction in the river at present. Some few years ago, the Red River was our only channel of commerce. Immediately after Manitoba was made a Province of Canada our whole traffic was carried down the Red River through the United States. Most hon. gentlemen are aware of the fact that the Red River is the boundary line between Minnesota and Dakota, and that the river is navigable for some 300 miles south of the boundary line. There is some local traffic still on the river, with the prospect that it will be increased. Therefore, I think it is very desirable that the St. Andrews Rapids, the only existing obstacle to the navigation, should be improved as early as possible. I say as early as possible, because we have had very dry seasons for the last three or four years especially, and I expect that the next season will be equally dry. There is no doubt that any work undertaken for the improvement of these rapids could be done much cheaper during the incoming season than probably for some time afterwards, because I think we are entering upon wet seasons again, and we may expect that the water in the river will be higher in the future. There are several saw-mills on the shores of Lake Winnipeg and on the islands, and there is a very considerable amount of timber and lumber brought to Winnipeg by way of the Red River. Of course, they are obliged to break bulk at the rapids. The best building stone we have in all the Territories—granite, sandstone and limestone—can be had with very little trouble along the shores of the islands, as well as along the shores of the lake itself. I therefore ask the question which appears on the Order Paper, and I hope to receive a favorable reply.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—In answer to the inquiry made by the hon. gentleman from Kildonan, I have the honor to state that that subject is engaging the attention of the Government now.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (45) "An Act to incorporate the Tilsonburg, Lake Erie and Pacific Railway Company." (Mr. McKindsey.)

Bill (23) "An Act to incorporate the Belding, Paul & Company (Limited)." (Mr. Ogilvie.)

IMPROPER USE OF WEAPONS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (B) "An Act respecting the improper use of Fire-arms and other Weapons."

(In the Committee.)

On the 2nd sub-section of the 1st clause,—

HON. MR. KAULBACH said: This sub-section gives to the magistrate a great deal of power. He may grant an exemption to extend to any part of the Dominion of Canada. It seems to me that the power should not extend beyond the Province in which he is appointed to act. The hon. gentleman who leads the House might look into this matter.

The clause was adopted.

On the 2nd clause,—

HON. MR. READ said: It has been suggested to me by a gentleman in the other House that provision should be made against selling ammunition to boys. A case which occurred in St. John was mentioned, where a boy had found a pistol and bought ammunition and shot another boy on a wharf. I move that the words "or any ammunition therefor," be added after the word "air-gun."

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. ALMON—I should like to add to that, "or any toy pistol with fulminating caps." I have known in my practice two cases of accidents occurring through the use of such toys. Boys put stones in these toy pistols, and fulminating caps have sufficient explosive force to do considerable damage.

HON. MR. POWER—The first clause of the Bill, I think, covers the ground reasonably well. It covers any kind of weapons that is calculated to do mischief, and there is no reason why we should ruin the trade of people who deal in toy pistols.

HON. MR. DICKEY—The first clause of this Bill is applicable to the case of a person who is found with a pistol on his person. This clause is intended to reach the person who sells. It is a good provision.

HON. MR. POWER—If an instrument is harmless, why should it be prohibited?

The committee divided on the amendment, which was rejected.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—It seems to me a clause should be added to this Bill, requiring merchants who sell pistols and air-guns to keep a record of each sale, giving the name of the purchaser, the date of the sale, and the number or other mark of the weapon, so that it could be identified. Very frequently such a record would be of service in the detection of crime. It would cause very little trouble to the merchant to register these sales.

HON. MR. DEVER—What would prevent a person who bought a pistol from transferring it to another?

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—This record would always show who had bought the pistol in the first place.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—But the purchaser might give a wrong name.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—That might occur in any transaction of life, but it seems to me that a record such as I have mentioned might prove very useful in the detection of crime. I move that the following words be added as a sub-section: "Every one who sells any pistol or air-gun shall keep a record of such sale, the date thereof, name of the purchaser and the number or other mark by which such arm may be identified, under the penalty in the preceding section mentioned."

HON. MR. DICKEY—I should like to point out to the committee the very absurd position in which this clause will go to the House of Commons with that amendment. We first prevent the sale of fire-arms under the head of a penalty, and then we say that the person who sells fire-arms should keep a record of each sale. If that amendment is made it will be entirely inconsistent with the first clause of the Bill.

HON. MR. VIDAL—The first clause relates to selling to minors; the other relates to the sale of fire-arms to anybody.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—The amendment should be a separate section. It has no connection at all with the matter in section 2.

HON. MR. GIRARD—I would suggest that the word "air" be struck out of every section of the Bill where it occurs. I think the air-gun should be prohibited for any purpose. It is, as I said on a former occasion, the murderer's weapon.

HON. MR. DICKEY—If the amendment of the hon. member from Toronto should be adopted, the effect of the Bill will be this, that no person can sell a pistol or air-gun to any one to whom he can now lawfully sell it without registering it. I think that would be an interference with trade which would not do the Bill much good in another place, and I do not think it will help to meet the object which my hon. friend from Quinté had in view when he drafted the Bill, namely, to protect the public against the sale of those weapons to minors.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The object of the Bill is to restrict the sale of those deadly weapons, and the trade in them will necessarily be diminished as a result of this legislation.

HON. MR. POWER—After all, it is only putting dangerous weapons in the same position as noxious drugs. According to the laws of some countries any apothecary who sells poison is obliged to make an entry, in a book kept for the purpose, of the name of the person to whom the poison was sold and the nature of the poison. I do not think there is anything very unreasonable in requiring that a gunsmith should make an entry of the name of the purchaser of the gun and the number or other mark on the gun for the purpose of identification. With respect to the suggestion made by the hon. member from St. Boniface, I should be very glad, for one, to try to do what he wishes, but his suggestion, if adopted, would have a totally different effect, and if he strikes out the word "air" from the Bill it will have the effect of preventing the sale of any other kind of gun whatever.

The committee divided on the amendmont, which was adopted. Contents, 18; non-contents, 8.

HON. MR. KAULBACH.—I observe that the schedule limits the power of a magistrate to issue certificates. The second clause of the Bill gives him a general power, but the schedule says that the certificate should state the limits to which it is applied.

HON. MR. POWER—I think the position taken by my hon. friend from Lunenburg is perfectly sound, and I understand that the introducer of the Bill proposes to let the third reading stand, in order that he may have an opportunity to consult the leader of the House as to whether an amendment to limit the jurisdiction of a magistrate under this Bill is desirable or not.

HON. MR. McCLELAN, from the committee, reported the Bill, with amendments.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. LACOSTE moved the second reading of Bill (O) "An Act to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, Cap 78 of the Revised Statutes." He said: The main object of this Bill is to take out of the Act the rules and regulations concerning the inspection of boilers and safety valves of steamboats, and also relating to the construction of boilers, and to put this into the hands of the Governor-in-Council for the purpose of following the progress of science, and making those rules and regulations more in accord with modern scientific construction. There are some other changes of minor importance relating to certificates.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE LAW OF MARRIAGE BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill (F) "An Act respecting offences against the Law of Marriage."

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause,—

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.) said. I will ask the House to adopt the first clause, and then rise and report progress. I have an intimation from the Minister fo Justice that he intends to embody this Bil[in a measure which he is about to introduce to amend the criminal law. In that case this Bill is likely to be dropped altogether. I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, on Tuesday next.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I should like to direct the attention of my hon. friend publicly, as I have already done privately, to sub-section 4 of section 1, which is as follows:—

"This section shall not apply to any Indian belonging to a tribe or band among whom polygamy is not contrary to law, nor to any person not a subject of Her Majesty, and not resident in Canada."

I think that is a very dangerous exception to make, because it may have the effect of excepting the very class to whom the Bill is intended to apply.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That part is to be struck out, and there is another part—the disqualification of persons convicted under this Act from voting in elections. That also is omitted.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—This is a question which requires a great deal of consideration. These Mormons appear to be a respectable community, and are progressing rapidly in the North-West.

It is a question whether these people should be driven out of the country for having performed their religious duties in a way they believe is right—it is a question whether this Bill should have a retroactive effect, and deprive these people of the rights which they possess under the laws as they exist to-day, and as they existed at the time when they settled in the country. It is a serious matter to say whether they should be driven out of Canada when we are anxious to settle that country as rapidly as possible in every legitimate way.

The first clause was adopted, and the motion to rise was agreed to.

HON. MR. DEVER, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill (C) "An Act respecting the Department of Geology, Mining and Natural History."

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause,—

HON. MR. POWER—I was under the impression, from an expression of opinion which I heard outside this House, that the Government had decided that they would not change the name of this department or sub-department, inasmuch as it has been known for fifty years as the Geological Survey of Canada. I understood that the Government still proposed to call it by that name. I regret, however, that they have not come to that conclusion. In England a similar body has been known for a great many years as the Geological Survey. There are departments of a similar kind in Australia, which are also known by the same name. They have also one in the United States for the whole Union, which is known by that name, and in several of the States they have departments of the same kind which are known as Geological Surveys. I think it is not now desirable that we should adopt a name different from that which has been used in Canada for so long a time, and different from that now used in other countries. It really does not make any difference what you call the department. If you call it the Geological Survey it will amount to just the same thing as if you call it the Department of Geology, Mining and Natural History; but, I think it should be called the Geological Survey, as in the past, because it indicates the connection with the previous fifty years, which is a desirable thing. There is just one other circumstance in connection with the title of this department which I think is worthy of some consideration. It is said there is very little in a name, but I think there is often a good deal in a name, and in the present instance the name counts for something. If we call this department the Geological Survey, the name carries us back to the fifty years' service which this department has had. If we change the name as proposed, the first impression is, not that it is a scientific body, but that it is a department, and immediately you will cause a tendency on the part of a large number of office seekers who have not scientific qualifications to apply for positions. The general feeling will be that here is a new department, here is a chance to get some one in. I feel satisfied that if the name of the department is changed the heads of the department will be worried with applications from all manner of applicants. If we do not change the name, that difficulty will be avoided.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I think we would have no objection to allowing the old name to remain, providing it is understood that this department will include natural history, mining, &c.

HON. MR. POWER—The old Geological Survey included all that.

HON. MR. POIRIER—I would like to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that if you begin to alter the name of this department so as to include all the subjects dealt with there you would have a very long name in a very short time.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—In this Act the expression department means the Department of Geological Survey—that is, it includes mining, natural history, surveying, &c. I have no objections to striking out the words "mining and natural history."

HON. MR. POWER—I should like to get an expression of opinion from some other members of the House upon this point. I think the better way would be to retain the historic name of the Geological Survey of Canada, and then you can include in that department anything you please. If you say that it is the Department of Geology, the title is open to the objection that it gives office seekers the idea that a new department is being organized. If you continue the old title, you give no such invitations to office seekers, and you can include under the name anything that you please.

HON. MR. DEVER—I think it is more expressive to say Department of Geology, Mining and Natural History, which includes every branch.

HON. MR. SCOTT—There is a good deal that is misleading in all these titles. Not only are the branches of geology, mining and natural history dealt with here, but there are other subjects also—for instance, the subject of ornithology is taken up and dealt with quite extensively. Therefore, I think that in any title that is given to the department the name ought to show that it includes and embraces something outside of geology. It would be misleading to narrow down the name to Geological Survey.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—The intention of the Government was to have the name or title as it appears in the Bill. It has been said to the Minister of the Interior that the old title should not be left out, but he has no objection to the change of the name. The title, as it now is, according to this Bill, shows that the department is not purely one of geology. At the same time, if the desire of the hon. members of this House is that the change should not be made, we will keep it as it is.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I do not feel at all convinced by the arguments presented by my hon. friend from Halifax.

HON. MR. POWER—They do not generally convince you.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I think it is rather to my credit. He seems to lay great stress on the argument that there is a possibility that office seekers will be led to make applications for positions in this department. I do not think that is any reason why we should not change the name. What is it to the Legislature if people make mistakes and apply for positions in this department? I think it is very desirable that the name should convey to the public some idea of the work in which the department is engaged. We know that the word geology conveys to the average mind nothing more than an impression of strata, &c. It does not indicate in any way that the department is engaged in natural history. I think we ought to leave the name as it is in the Bill.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I understand the reason why my hon. friend from Halifax is desirous that the title should remain as it is. e feelings which prompt him to continue to use the old name. I think it is in memory of Sir William Logan, who founded the department about fifty years ago. I can remember when it was a very small Survey, and when Sir William Logan had the whole thing in a small room in Montreal. In that way it was called the Geological Survey of Canada; it was intended only for geological survey work; but naturally, as the country opened up and grew, additional branches had to be added. More information was needed about other things than geology alone, particularly about that important branch, mining. Of course, from year to year other branches of natural science have been added; therefore, while I would like to retain the name of Geological Survey I cannot close my eyes to the fact that the department is one of natural science. This particular department takes in a great many subjects. While I am not pledged to any name, I rather think the title of Geological Survey ought to give place to the name in the Bill. Of course, in a few years the other name will be forgotten. It is now remembered because Sir William Logan gave it that name.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—As I said before, we have no objections to the name being changed, or being left as it is in the Bill. I think, however, that the name had better remain as we have now put it in this Bill.

On the 3rd clause,—

HON. MR. POWER said—I should like to know whether the Government intend to take on a large number of employés or not?

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I believe it is the intention of the Government to have only the necessary employés. If any new ones are required in the public interest, I suppose they will have to appoint them.

The clause was adopted.

On the 5th clause,—

HON. MR. DICKEY said—I think this is the most important section in the whole Bill, because it is the only one that appears to have any practical bearing on the future service of this department to the country. The complaint has hitherto been made that it was the Geological Survey only in name, and that we derive really very little advantage from it. This clause for the first time seems to specify the particular character of business of this department, and I must say that it is very much needed, because we have had numerous and expensive surveys made and work done, and very few practical results to show for it. I do not say that they have been of no benefit, but I do think we might have had much more practical results from the service. We have had annually many surveys, and a large amount of money has been expended for the information which has so far been very limited. There is a great need that these changes should be carried out. I hope the result of this Bill will be such as the Government now hope for.

HON. MR. POWER—I am disposed to agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down as to the desirability of making this department more practical. While it is of course desirable that we should get all the information we can, still I do not think that it is necessary that the country should be put to any unnecessary expenditure. With respect to sub-section (d), I don't know how it may be in other Provinces, but in the Province of Nova Scotia the Government has an inspector of mines, and publishes statistics of the mining industries, and the report of the inspector of mines on the condition of mining in the Province. If this work is being done by the other Provinces, and at the provincial expense, it does not seem to me that there is any necessity of having it duplicated here. The Government ought to make some arrangement which will avoid duplicating any expenditure that the Government of any of the Provinces have taken upon themselves in connection with the work done in publishing these statistics and reports. The language in the last two lines of sub-section (d) is rather vague.

I presume the intention is that the department shall preserve records of the locations of artesian wells, &c., but the language which is used in the Bill does not seem to me to express what is required, but to imply something more extensive. These records would be for a great number of years back, and if it is the intention of the Government to collect them, they will have to erect a very large building for the purpose of holding these records. I think that the language or wording of that section should be altered so that it would provide only for the preservation of all desirable information for the purpose of identifying those artesian wells and mines.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—The intention is to preserve what records are necessary for scientific work. I may state, as to the adoption of the scientific publications and reports of the Provinces, that it is proposed by this Bill that the Geological Department shall publish only the results of their own work. I do not see that they can duplicate any of the work of the Provinces. The statistics may or may not agree. As to the other suggestion of the hon. member from Halifax, I believe that it is the intention not merely to preserve records of where artesian wells, mines, &c., are, but also to describe the nature of the well, or the mine, and to keep all the records that are important. I think we can leave it to the department to keep only such records as are necessary.

HON. MR. VIDAL—With reference to the artesian wells, it is important to preserve not only the records of their location, but also information as to the strata through which they are bored. Very often valuable information is obtained in this way.

On the 9th clause,—

HON. MR. POWER—I should like to have an explanation of this clause.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—This clause has been in the Act since 1868, and that is why we read in this clause that it only applies to railways incorporated after May, 1868.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Perhaps my hon. friend can tell me whether the law has been observed. I cannot conceive what benefit it will be to anybody to file plans of some of the railways with the Geological Survey. Take, for instance, this road running to Prescott: it runs through a flat country, and it would put the company to a good deal of expense to furnish plans of the line, and it would be of no value.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—It is not to be supposed that plans will be asked for unless they are necessary. Sometimes the Department may require a copy of a section where they are going to work. Then the company is obliged to give that information, and this clause, as I said before, has been in the law since 1868.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It has been a dead letter.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—Perhaps some demands of that kind have been made by the Minister of the Interior, but very few. I do not think it can weigh much on the railway companies.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—It is a very serious matter to a long railway, such as the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway, to furnish such plans as are called for here. It strikes me that the clause is quite unnecessary if it has been a dead letter. If it were not a dead letter it would be excessively onerous on a long line of railway to be called upon to furnish plans.

HON. MR. POWER—I think that the reason for the existence of this clause is clearing up. There must have been some necessity for such a provision or it would not have been inserted in the original Act.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It has never been in force.

HON. MR. POWER—It may not have been put in force; but, as the hon. gentleman who leads the House says, the Department are not likely to put any railway company to unnecessary expense. The fact that they have not done so in the past is the best evidence that they will not do so in the future. I can understand that if a railway runs three or four miles through an important mining district it would be very desirable that the department should have the benefit of the surveys which have been made by railway engineers previously, and should not have to do that work over again, and that the information should be placed at the disposal of the department. I think it is a very proper thing.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The common sense natural language of the paragraph is that any railway should be compelled to furnish plans from time to time of such portions of their lines as the department thought fit to ask for. That is really what would be wise and prudent; but to have a clause which compels all railways in this country to file plans with the Department of Geology is anything but desirable. The department would not know what to do with them, they would be so cumbrous. There are thousands of miles of railway in this country that run over dead flats, where the plans would give no indication of what was beneath them. You might as well draw a line over a blank sheet of paper. Of course, where there is a rock cutting, some information might be gained from a section of the road, but there is no necessity for enacting such a stupid clause as this.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—It amounts to the same thing, if the hon. gentlemen will read the clause: these plans have to be furnished only at the demand of the Minister.

HON. MR. DICKEY—That only applies to railways constructed before 1868.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I have no objection to amending the clause so that it will read in the manner suggested by the hon. member from Ottawa. The amendment can be made at the third reading of the Bill.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—I believe that all those plans are deposited already with the Department of Railways and Canals, and I see no necessity for this clause.

HON. MR. DICKEY—If that is the case, there is no necessity for this clause; and there is another reason why it should not be in the Bill. There must be some sort of penalty attached to violations of the clause; at all events, the railways would be put, as it were, into coventry if they failed to furnish the plans. How are they to know about this legislation? They certainly would not look into this Act to ascertain what returns they should make. They would naturally look to the Railway Act. If the plans are to be found in the Department of Railways, this sister department of the public service can get information there, without imposing the additional burden on the railways of duplicating that information and transferring it to the Department of the Interior.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I think the criticism of the hon. member for Amherst is perfectly just, but it would be better to strike out the clause altogether.

HON. MR. POWER—The better way is to do as the Minister has suggested—amend the Bill at the third reading.

HON. MR. DICKEY—If the Minister finds on examination that the law already requires that these returns shall be made to the Department of Railways and the plans are filed there, surely my hon. friend the senior member from Halifax will not be anxious to duplicate the service.

HON. MR. POWER—I am willing to accept suggestions from the hon. member from Amherst or any one else, but I do not think this suggestion which he makes is as valuable as he fancies. These plans and surveys of railways are filed in the Department of Railways as records, and have to be kept there; and it will cost the Department of Geology just as much to have them copied for their own use as if those plans were filed somewhere else. Inasmuch as the law for twenty-two years has compelled the railways to furnish these returns, it may as well continue to do so.

HON. MR. DICKEY—The information is there, and if these railway companies have complied with the law and gone to the expense of furnishing these reports they should not now be called upon to go to additional expense.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It should also be remembered that all plans of railways are filed in the registry offices of the counties through which they pass, so that the plans are available in every locality.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—The clause might be adopted now, and afterwards dealt with at the third reading.

The clause was adopted.

On the title,—

HON. MR. KAULBACH said—I was in hopes that there would be a clause in the Bill to put this important department in the best working condition possible. Now this Bill gives to the department extensive powers and duties, and it seems to me that something should be done to arrange for the working of the surveys. There seems to be no clause here for the proper organization of the work of the surveys and for the proper distribution of the geologists over this big country. As far as Nova Scotia is concerned, though it is small in area, it is of vast importance. There is probably no part of Canada that possesses such wealth in minerals. Some provision should be made in this Bill by which the geologists should be distributed over the various sections of this Dominion, and not left, as it is now, entirely in the hands of the department to do as they think proper. My hon. friend might take this into consideration when he moves the third reading of the Bill.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—It is better to leave this to the department. They are much better judges than this House can be of where the services of the geologists are most required. They have all the records of the department, and we might very properly leave the matter to them.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I believe it is a matter of internal administration of the department.

HON. MR. POWER—I wish to call attention to the fact that the chapter which we are repealing contained this provision, which is not embodied in the Bill. I do not mean to say that it is necessary, but I do not see that there is any provision made in this direction in the Bill. The Act says that the museum shall be kept open to the public every day of the week except Sundays, for a certain number of hours. Now there is no such provision in this Bill. I presume the Government will see that the museum shall still be kept open to the public.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—It is one of the regulations that can be adopted by the department itself.

HON. MR. SCOTT—In the memo. left on our desks I see a recommendation was made that the annual report should be distributed liberally, more particularly among the educational establishments of the country, and also that copies should be furnished to the newspapers. Perhaps the Minister, before the third reading, will be in a position to advise the House as to whether it is proposed to increase the distribution or confine it as it is now. I think it is desirable that this annual report should be circulated in quarters where it does not now go.

HON. MR. POWER—The suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa opens up a question of very consideradle importance. The reports on the geological survey are very expensive. There are a great many tables in them and illustrations, and they are very expensive publications. Last Session I called the attention of the House to the fact that, in countries which are much richer than Canada, there is no such lavish gratuitous distribution of public documents as there is here. In England the rule is that public documents are sold for cost and charges, and they are on sale in places where the public can get them. Any one who needs a report of any kind can get it at a very low figure; and I think it would be very much better that we, in Canada, should adopt that system to a very much greater extent than we have. In that case, any one who needed a copy of the report would go and buy it. We spend an immense sum of money in distributing reports all over the country, most of which are not read at all.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—This department would involve a large expense, no doubt, but after that expenditure has been incurred the distribution of a few additional copies of the annual report will add very little to the expense. There is nothing I have been asked for more than for copies of this Geological Survey report. Many persons with whom I am acquainted are anxious to get it, and I cannot procure it for them. It is not on sale, and it cannot be had from the department. After going to all the expense of having these surveys made and reports printed, we should not hesitate at the trifling expense of printing a larger edition of the report for more general distribution.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—By the seventh clause of the Bill the distribution is left to the Governor in Council. I see the opinions of members of this House are not the same on the subject. The Government will consider the matter and make a wise distribution.

HON. MR. READ, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

IMPROPER USE OF FIREARMS BILL.

TRIRD READING.

HON. MR. READ moved the adoption of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole to Bill (B) "An Act respecting the improper use of Firearms and other Weapons."

HON. MR. ALMON—Before that motion is agreed to I should like to make a few observations. When the Bill was first introduced by the hon. member from Quinté I was very much pleased with it indeed. I had hoped that the sale of firearms to children would not be confined to pistols, but would also be extended to toy cannons and pistols with fulminating caps. An amendment was proposed by the hon. member from Toronto (Mr. O'Donohoe), which was a very desirable one, and would have been all right if my hon. colleague from Halifax had not spoiled it. He also told us that when druggists sell poisons they are required to make an entry of the name of the person to whom the sales are made, and the character of the poisons. Now he is mistaken in that point. Almost any liniment taken internally is a poison. If a child buys a liniment at an apothecary shop the druggist does not ask the name or enter it in a book. Another thing, saltpetre, nitrate of potash, when taken in a dose of an ounce, is likely to prove fatal. Does the hon. member mean to say that a druggist who sells an ounce of saltpetre makes an entry of it? There are many things that the hon. member from Halifax is not acquainted with, although he is not aware of the fact. The amendment, as originally proposed by the hon. member from Toronto, was a very sensible one indeed. But the senior member from Halifax, who belongs to those who can "divide a hair twixt the south and south-west side" had it amended, and it reads now that any person who sells a pistol must make an entry of the sale. If a man has a pistol which he sells to somebody on the street, is he obliged to make an entry of that? It was a very good amendment, as it was introduced by the hon. member from Toronto, but it has been changed, owing to that unfortunate tendency of the hon. member from Halifax to alter everything until it has become arrant nonsense. I am glad indeed that the hon. member from Halifax is not here when the Lord's Prayer is read, because I am sure if he were present he would agree with the prayer of the petition, but move an amendment to its title. The hon. gentleman also propounded a strange rule, that what takes place in the Railway Committee is secret, and not to be spoken of in this House. I belong to no secret society. I am here as a representative of the people, and whatever I do in committee I should speak of whenever I choose. Nothing should prevent me from telling what I say or do in committee to the world. The hon. gentleman and I differ in that as we do in a great many things. I would not have mentioned this if the hon. gentleman had not cast ridicule on my proposition to include in this Bill toy pistols with fulminating caps.

HON. MR. POWER—My hon. colleague from Halifax seem to be under the impression that there are some things that I do not know. I quite agree with him that the number of things which I do not know would fill a very large library. I do not pretend to any very extensive knowledge of any subject, not even of the senatorial nature. The hon. gentleman referred to something which I said yesterday. He was out of order in doing so. He referred to something that I said in the course of debate yesterday with respect to the fact that it was undesirable that what takes place in a committee should be discussed in the House. I think the hon. gentleman will see that my view is perfectly sound. The rule of the House forbids reference to previous debates; and if such a reference is objectionable in the House, surely there is a strong objection to referring to what has occurred in the comparative privacy of a committee meeting.

HON. MR. MILLER—Would the hon. gentleman hold that with respect to a debate on the same Bill?

HON. MR. POWER—My remark is not intended to apply in a general way. There are things said in a committee which are not exactly intended for publication, and when a thing of that sort has been said, it is undesirable that it should be made public by being repeated in the House. That was about all I meant, and I think that is a correct view of the matter.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

On the reading of petitions,—

HON. MR. DEVER said—While reading petitions, I wish to call the special attention of the hon. gentlemen of this House to a petition read yesterday from the city of St. John, largely signed by prominent citizens of that place, praying for the passage of an Act for the further prevention of cruelty to animals. I wish to call your attention to this, because I perceive on it the names of some of the most prominent men of that city, and it deserves more than a passing notice.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (K) "An Act respecting the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto." (Mr. McKindsey.)

Bill (33) "An Act respecting the Peoples Bank of New Brunswick." (Mr. Botsford.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (O) "An Act further to amend 'The General Inspection Act,' Cap. 99 of the Revised Statutes." (Mr. Lacoste.)

Bill (45) "An Act to incorporate the Tilsonburg, Lake Erie and Pacific Railway Company." (Mr. McKindsey).

Bill (23) "An Act to incorporate Belding, Paul & Company (Limited)." (Mr. Ogilvie.)

QUEBEC HARBOR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. LACOSTE moved the second reading of Bill (R) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Quebec Harbor Commissioners." He said: This Bill is merely to give power to the Harbor Commissioners of Quebec to issue certificates. It has been the custom to issue the certificates, and lately the question was put to the solicitor of the commission to know if they really had the right to do that, and his opinion was that they had no right. It is for the benefit of the traders and merchants of Quebec, and at their request, that this Bill is now presented.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE STATIONERY AND CONTINGENCIES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—A message has been sent by the House of Commons to this House, asking us to grant leave to our officers in charge of stationery and contingencies to appear before the Select Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Public Accounts to give information and evidence respecting the distribution of such stationery, and the expenditure for contingencies, as set out upon pages D. 17 and D. 18 of the report of the Auditor General, and also to bring with them all records relating to such items. I believe that it has always been the desire of this House to give as full information as we can in regard to our expenditure. If we refer to precedent we will find that in 1870 an account for mileage and indemnity of the members of this House was forwarded to the House of Commons at their request. We find also that in 1872 a similar demand was made, and that on the 27th of May of that year the Hon. Mr. Campbell, now Sir Alexander Campbell, moved that the Clerk be instructed to lay before the Senate every session a statement of the mileage and indemnity paid to Senators, and to deliver, until further orders, a copy of the same to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons, whenever he might ask for them.

Again, in the year 1880, we find that Mr. Kirkpatrick, in the House of Commons, moved, seconded by Mr. McCarthy, that the Clerk of the Senate be requested to furnish details of the mileage and indemnity accounts of Senators, also details of sittings, number of days' attendance, etc., and this demand was complied with and a statement sent to the House of Commons. But by this Message we are asked not only to send a statement, but also to send our officers to be examined on the items, to oblige them to appear before the Public Accounts Committee, so that they can be examined as to the details of our expenditure. I believe that that is a question of privilege for this House. It came before the House before in 1870, when a similar demand was made.

The House of Commons then asked that Mr. Taylor be sent before the Public Accounts Committee to give evidence concerning mileage and indemnity. This was explicitly refused by this House, and instead of sending Mr. Taylor to give the information asked for, a statement was sent to the Commons. I have made search in "May on Parliamentary Practice," and also in Hansard, which is considered, I believe, in parliamentary procedure, as a bible. I could not find one precedent for a case of this kind in the House of Lords. The only precedent I find, and I think there is no analogy between that precedent and this case, was a message sent by the House of Lords and agreed to by the Commons, asking that the Clerk and Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons be allowed to attend a committee of the House of Lords for the purpose of giving evidence respecting the mode of keeping records and of conducting public business—not to enquire into the expenditure of the House, but to enquire into the method of keeping the records and of conducting public business? This was agreed to, and we find that in England the House of Lords have always had control and exclusive supervision of their accounts. Since 1869, I believe, in England estimates are sent by the House of Lords to the House of Commons. These estimates may be refused, and they can be reduced, but the House of Commons have always thought it their duty to grant all estimates asked for by the House of Lords, leaving it to that House to use its own discretion. In the year 1887 there was a Royal Commission appointed to investigate all the public offices, and this commission did not think it proper to investigate the offices of the House of Lords. The examination of the expenditure of the House of Lords was made by a Select Standing Committee appointed by that House. I believe if we follow all these precedents we will come to the conclusion that the control and supervision of our expenditure is left to this House, and at the same time this House must give all proper information that may be asked for. This we are willing to do. We have nothing to hide, and I think that under these circumstances it would be well for the House to pass unanimously the resolution which I now propose, as follows:—

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons, to inform that House, in answer to its Message requesting the Senate to grant leave to the officers in charge of the stationery and contingencies of the Senate to attend before the Select Standing Committee of the Commons on Public Accounts, at their next meeting, to give information respecting the distribution of such stationery and the expenditure for contingencies, as set out on pages D. 17 and 18 of the Report of the Auditor General on Appropriation Accounts, for the year ended 30th June, 1889; and to bring with them all records relating to such items;—that all matters in relation to the internal economy of this House are under the control and supervision of its Committee on Contingent Accounts, subject to approval of the Senate; that the said committee is now engaged in examining the accounts and vouchers of the Clerk, including the distribution of stationery and expenditure referred to in the said Message, and that as soon as the report is submitted by the said committee to this House it will be transmitted to the House of Commons for the use of its Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 5 p.m.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills, reported from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, without amendment, were read the third time and passed:

Bill (No. 27) "An Act to incorporate the Sault Ste. Marie and Hudson's Bay Railway Company." (Mr. Read.)

Bill (No. 22) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Belleville and Lake Nipissing Railway Company." (Mr. McKindsey.)

Bill (No. 21) "An Act to incorporate the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company." (Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (No. 14) "An Act respecting the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway Company." (Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

Bill (No. 20) "An Act respecting the Goderich and Canadian Pacific Junction Railway Company, and to change the name of the Company to the Goderich and Wingham Railway Company." (Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

OTTAWA, MORRISBURG AND NEW YORK RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (28) "An Act to incorporate the Ottawa, Morrisburg and New York Railway Company," with several amendments. He said: I may explain that these amendments relate chiefly to an important provision of the Bill which proposed to give the company power to bridge the Ottawa River. This was struck out, and there were a great many consequential amendments resulting from that. As these will be printed, I move that the report of the committee be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

THE KEEFER DIVORCE CASE.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their fifth report. He said: I may explain that this is a majority report of the committee, and it became my duty, as chairmam, to submit the report. Although some of the committee had doubts about the propriety of that report, they will have an opportunity, with the other members of the House, to consider it more fully when the evidence is brought down. The evidence only having been completed within an hour or two, there is no probability that this could be in the possession of the House, so that they could intelligently examine it before Tuesday next. I therefore move that the report be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (56) "An Act to amend the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1889, and for other purposes."

The Bill was read the first time.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the 41st rule of the House be suspended so far as it relates to this Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of the Bill.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B. C.) Explain.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington). I may state that my reason for asking for the suspension of the rule is that the object of this Bill is mainly a financial one, and it is of great importance that the Bill should pass through its final stages as rapidly as possible, because it can be availed of before it receives the Royal Assent. The company are building steamers, for which they are paying weekly, and the passage of this Bill is important to them for financial reasons.

HON. MR. SCOTT. I may say, in addition to what has fallen from my hon. friend opposite, that the Act of Parliament that this Bill is intended to amend is one which authorizes the company to issue bonds, those bonds to be secured on the steamers. Last session Parliament also authorized the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to substitute for their existing bonds on the railways that they controlled what is known as debenture stock, that class of security having become of recent years a favorite on the London market, and commanding a higher price than what are known as ordinary debentures or bonds. They now ask for permission to issue debenture stock secured on the whole of the company's property rather than on the steamers only, as they believe they will obtain a larger sum for the stock than for the debentures on steamers. The debentures on steamers are now in the hands of friends of the company, but they are waiting for this legislation to release them and take this new stock. Certain lines of railway are authorized to enter into arrangements with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but special authority is also required by the latter to perfect those arrangements, and they seek by this Bill that authority.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (50) "An Act respecting the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company of Canada." (Mr. Girard.)

Bill (48) "An Act respecting the Northern and Western Railway Company of New Brunswick, and to change the name of the company to the Canada Eastern Railway Company." (Mr. Botsford.)

Bill (46) "An Act to incorporate the Mount Forest, Markdale and Meaford Railway Company," (Mr. Dever.)

Bill (26) "An Act relating to the Canada Southern Bridge Company."—Mr. MacInnes, Burlington).

Bill (25) "An Act respecting the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, Limited." (Mr. Ogilvie.)

Bill (51) "An Act respecting the Hereford Railway Company." (Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (41) "An Act to incorporate the Canada Cable Company." (Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

PUBLIC STORES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. LACOSTE moved the second reading of Bill (53), "An Act to amend the Public Stores Act." He said: By section 3, any public stores belonging to Her Majesty must be marked, and to this effect a schedule of marks has been added to the Act. The said schedule, which it is proposed to amend, provides that hempen cordage and wire rope are to bear the following marks:—"White, black or colored worsted threads laid up with the yarn and the wire respectively."

The proposed modification is the expunging of the word "worsted" from the schedule.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 4.10 p.m.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. LACOSTE moved the second reading of Bill (19) "An Act to amend the Copyright Act." He said: This Bill is merely to give to the Exchequer Court of Canada concurrent jurisdiction with the other courts in cases of conflicting claims.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

TRADE MARKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. LACOSTE moved the second reading of Bill (18) "An Act to amend the Act respecting Trade Marks and Industrial designs." He said: This Bill is for the same purpose as the preceding one. Its object is to give jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court in cases of conflicting claims.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE DEBATES OF THE SENATE.

SECOND REPORT OF THE DEBATES COMMITTEE REJECTED.

The Order of the Day—"Consideration of the second report of the Select Committee on the Debates and Proceedings of the Senate"—being called,

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE said: It is my duty to explain to the House how it happened that a debate which occurred quite a fortnight ago should be brought forward for consideration to-day. The circumstance occurred in this way: a debate arose on the report of the Committee on Contigencies, which was referred back to that committee. On the following day, or the day after, a meeting of the Debates Committee was called on quite different business, when the question came up as to whether that report should be published in the Debates or not. The majority of the committee present—there was a bare quorum at the time—recommended that it should not be printed, and orders were given to the reporter accordingly. But, as chairman of the committee, and thinking that that might give rise to a question upon which there would be great difference of opinion, I directed that the short-hand notes of that debate should be preserved, and I have a transcript of them here in my hand. Immediately after that meeting of the committee there was an adjournment of the House, and consequently nothing could be done until after the re-assembling of the Senate the following week. Then, finding that considerable dissatisfaction was expressed in some quarters because the report of the debate had not been published in its regular order, I took steps to call the committee together a second time. Owing, I suppose, to the recent adjournment which had taken place, there was considerable pressure on the different committees and in the different rooms, and the consequence was that we could not find an open day and an open room until last Friday. Then the committee met and took up this question as the first part of their business, and had it pretty well discussed and ready to vote upon when it became necessary to adjourn. However, the question had been put to the members present and had been decided against printing the debate. Now, whether it is a judicious thing for any committee to possess the power to order a debate of this House to be printed or not printed is a question, I think, of very considerable importance, and it is highly necessary that it should be settled by this House. The report of the Contingent Accounts Committee, to which this debate relates, has only this day been presented to the House. It was referred back to that committee to reconsider certain paragraphs, and if anything could justify the withholding of the debate for a time it is the fact that these paragraphs which were referred back to the Committee on Contingencies have only this day been presented to the House again. Even now the consideration of that report has not yet taken place, and consequently, if the debate which took place on the 14th of February, before the House adjourned, is published, it will relate to certain paragraphs of the report which were referred back to the Committee on Contingencies and which have not as yet been considered by the House. That is the state of the case as regards that particular debate, and I certainly think it would not be an undesirable thing for the House to express an opinion as to whether committees ought to be allowed to order the non-publication of a debate. It is true, I anticipated that a difference of opinion would occur, and I had the report of the debate type-written, and it is now in my hands, subject to the order of the House.

HON. MR. MILLER—What is the authority given to the committee?

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—The usual authority.

HON. MR. MILLER—Have you got it there?

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—You will find it on page 16 of the minutes. That is how the matter stands with regard to this report, and I think I cannot explain it any further than this, that the delay, in the first place, was in consequence of the adjournment of the House, and in the second place, in consequence of the pressure in the various committees and committee rooms of the Senate. But as to the other, whether the committee exceeded their powers or not in directing the reporter to withhold the report of that debate until further instructions, I appeal to the House for its decision. If the House desires that any of its debates should not be printed, it seems to me that it would be more becoming to direct the attention of the committee to that particular debate and give them instructions accordingly.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I pass by the question which has been raised by my hon. friend, and on which he desires to have the sense of the House, as to the power of the committee to deal with this matter, because I think there is a much more serious question lying behind it, and that is the propriety of the exercise of the power—assuming that they have it—to make such a recommendation as appears in the report. The hon. gentleman from Charlottetown suggests that the committee might not have the power to interfere with the publication of a debate, but I do think that at the present moment, in the condition in which this House stands, it is of all times and all periods in its history the most untimely for suppressing a report on the contingent accounts of this House. I think, and I hope that my hon. friend, after the expression of the opinion of the House, will come to the same conclusion, that there is grave doubt as to the propriety of this report. We have been discussing these matters in connection with a Message from another place, and we may yet require to have further discussion to relieve ourselves of the imputation that we do not wish the public to know the grounds on which matters connected with the contingencies of the Senate rest. Our desire to give full information has been frequently expressed. We have already said it in the Message, that we wish to give the fullest and fairest information possible on the subject. We have nothing to conceal. If we have nothing to conceal, why omit the report of this debate? I take the opportunity now of making an appeal to our respected leader, whom I am quite sure we are all glad to welcome back with renovated health, to state what he thinks about the course that is recommended by the committee. The House has interfered in regard to debates involving personal matters and recriminations which were not creditable, perhaps, to any person who had taken part in them, and omitted them for the sake of common decency. But this is not such a report, and I trust the committee will receive a hint that if they have the power to act they must exercise it better. I hope the House will refuse to suppress this debate.

HON. MR. MACDONALD—Having been one of the first to move in this matter, I asked the question of the chairman of the committee the other day about it. Finding, to my great surprise, that the debate of that day was omitted from the official report, I made the enquiry how it happened, and learned that a member of the Debates Committee had instructed the reporter to withhold that portion of the report. Now, I consider this a very important thing, and a thing that strikes at the rights and privileges of members of this House. I consider it highly improper that any single member of a committee of this House should take it upon himself to ask a reporter to hold back a report of the speeches of members in this House. We are allowed a certain control over our own speeches, to amend or correct them, but it would be a greater liberty to withhold the speech of any member, and it is something that I believe is unprecedented. The hon. chairman of the committee tried to justify the withholding the report on the ground that the report of the Committee on Contingencies was not complete yet. That has nothing to do with the question. The question is, whether the committee should have a right to take such action upon a debate of this House, without any reference to it by the House. I contend they have not, and I am very much surprised that gentlemen of parliamentary experience should not have kept within the scope of their authority. It is a dangerous principle, which this House will not tolerate for a moment. Hon. gentlemen who have been in Parliament for long years, and who are familiar with the procedure and the powers of committees should have hesitated before declaring that the speeches of members of this House should be eliminated from the final report. It is a monstrous thing that gentlemen who have struggled with May, Todd and Bourinot for years, and who have no doubt familiarized themselves with every authority on the subject of the rights and privileges of the House, and the powers of the committees, should raise a question of this kind. If they would only look at the resolution under which the Debates Committee was appointed, they would find its scope laid down very clearly. Certain gentlemen were appointed a committee to enquire into the best means to be adopted to obtain correct reports of the debates and proceedings of the Senate, and for the publication of the same, not to eliminate certain portions of the debates, or say what should be published, but to provide for the publication of the debates.

HON. MR. DICKEY—And report their views to the House.

HON. MR. MACDONALD—And to report their views to the House on this subject. I contend that they have gone entirely beyond the scope of their authority, and the best thing would be to withdraw the report of the committee altogether. This House, I think, ought to give some definite expression of opinion on that subject. I have here, by the courtesy of the chairman, the speeches proposed to be eliminated. There is not a single harsh word in that report, nothing which should be cancelled, no charge against anybody, and there are reports in our books of debates ten times more bitter and objectionable than the one in question. This debate simply refers to a certain portion of the report of the Contingencies Committee. The hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Dever) is the only member of the House who made a slight insinuation that the recommendation of the Contingencies Committee was made for the benefit of a certain person. That does not tax or accuse anybody of doing anything wrong. I have prepared a resolution here which I hope will meet with the approval of hon. gentlemen. It is as follows:—

RESOLVED,—That the functions and authority of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the best means to be adopted to obtain correct report of the debates and proceedings in the Senate, and for the publication of the same are defined and limited by the resolution of the Senate under which it was appointed, in the following words, viz.:—

"To inquire into the best means to be adopted to obtain correct report of the debates and proceedings in the Senate, and for the publication of the same, and to report from time to time their views to the House."

That is no part of the duty of that committee, nor is it within the scope of its authority—without special reference by the House—to take into consideration, or report to the House whether any of the debates in the House shall be printed in the official Debates of the Senate, or shall be totally or partially eliminated from the same.

That the report of the committee be not now adopted, but that it be referred back, with an instruction to the committee to have the debate alluded to printed in official report of the debates in the Senate.

HON. MR. MILLER—Do you move that as an amendment?

HON. MR. MACDONALD—Yes.

HON. MR. MILLER—You cannot amend the report of the committee. It is out of order.

HON. MR. POWER—Particularly as the adoption of the report has not been moved.

HON. MR. MILLER—Even though it had been, the amendment would be out of order. For the purpose of keeping our proceedings regular, I raise the point of order.

HON. MR. DICKEY—This amendment has no reference to the question before the House. The question before the House is consistent with the idea that they have the power. My hon. friend's resolution, as a substantive one, is very good, and probably I might be induced to vote for it if he would bring it up in the ordinary way by giving notice of motion, but the question before this House now is, whether we should accept or reject this report—a report which, for that purpose, we may assume that the committee have or have not the power to make.

THE SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman from British Columbia is clearly out of order in moving this amendment. The question before the House is the consideration of the report.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I wish to make an explanation, as I am a member of the committee on reporting debates.

HON. MR. MILLER—There is no motion before the House. If the hon. gentleman wishes to speak on the subject he should move the adoption of the report.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I move the adoption of the report, and I wish to put myself right with regard to the report. The hon. gentleman from British Columbia has endeavored to impress this House with the idea that the committee tried to eliminate something from the official report of the debates. That is not the state of the case. What are the committee appointed for? To do a certain thing. Now, have they done anything to take away the powers of the House? The hon. gentleman from Charlottetown has stated that by his own wish the notes of the debate were preserved. Not at all. They were preserved at the instance of the members of the committee, so that the House might do as they thought fit after they read the report. Now, what does the report of the committee say? It recommends to the House a certain course, which the House can adopt if they like. We do not take the power into our own hands to say that one man's speech should be omitted and another's published. The debate related to a question which might properly be called one of domestic concern, and it would be wiser, in our judgment, to omit the report, as we recommended the House to do. So far from taking the power from the House we left it in the hands of the House. Our powers, as a committee, are to report from time to time to the House and to arrange that the debates of the House shall be properly reported.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Not suppressed.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—There was nothing suppressed. We recommended that the debate referred to should not be printed in the official report of the debates of the Senate.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.). Who referred the debate to the Committee? Where is the reference?

HON. MR. HOWLAN — The chairman has explained. The reporters came and asked, as they have often done, what they should do, and the report was withheld until our recommendation to the House is acted upon. We have taken nothing from the House; we have suppressed nothing. We merely recommend that the debate on a certain subject should be omitted. Now, the House can accept or reject that report if they see fit. I do not see how any blame can be attached to the committee. I stoutly express the same opinion here that I did in the committee. Notwithstanding all that I have heard to the contrary, I think it would be much better not to put that debate on the records of the Senate.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—As a member of this House, I moved on the 14th February that the report of the Contingencies Committee be referred back for reconsideration. I have looked into this matter. As the official report appears, no reason is given for the action of the House on that occasion. The question which was then dealt with was whether we should superannuate one of our servants. The question was calmly deliberated on here, and there is nothing in that debate which would justify its suppression or delay in its publication. The report should have been published in order to justify the action of those who voted with the majority. When the members of the Debates Committee took it upon themselves then to delay the publication of the debate they went far beyond their authority.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—We did not delay it.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The result of the action of the committee was to delay the publication. Our reporters would not of their own will suppress or delay any report unless they had the authority of the committee, or some member of it, for doing so. It is some seventeen days since the debate took place, and it is not yet published.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The House adjourned in the mean time.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—We are informed by the chairman of the committee that the day after the debate took place a meeting of the committee was held to deal with an entirely different matter. The committee consists of fifteen members, but there were only five present, and these dwindled down to three.

HON. MR. POWER—No.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The chairman of the committee so informed me. He said that only three members were present. The report has been delayed and the delay has occurred through the action of the committee. There is no good ground for the decision at which the committee arrived. Any one who heard the debate in question must have been struck with the manifest desire on all sides to avoid reflecting on the character of the parties affected by the report of the Committee on Contingencies. I repeat the Debates Committee exceeded their authority in the course they have taken. They were appointed to inquire into the best means to be adopted to obtain correct reports of the debates of the Senate and for the publication of the same, not for the suppression or delay of the debates. I say if they can do so in one case they can do so in any case.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The hon. gentleman has stated that we suppressed the report of the debate; he has no right to say that. We did not suppress anything.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The committee have held back the report, and that is virtually suppressing it.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—We did not hold it back either.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Through the action of the committee the publication of the debate has been delayed. Generally when a debate has been suppressed it has been by an expression of opinion from the House, and not by the authority of the Debates Committee. It makes no difference to me personally whether my remarks on the occasion referred to appear in the official report or not, but it is important that we should have some expression of opinion from the House as to the extent of the committee's powers. As the hon. gentleman from Amherst says, at this time, when the Senate is accused of extravagance in our contingent accounts, and when we are desirous that no ground shall be given for any such imputations, it is most desirable that full reports of all the questions debated in this House should appear in the official report. I am sure that there is nothing in the debate which occurred on the 14th of February that could reflect on the character of the Senate or of any of its members or employés. There was a desire on all hands to avoid anything of the kind, and the reasons for recommending the superannuation of one of our employés were not as fully given as they should have been for that very reason. Had they been more fully stated I think the House would have considered that the reasons were not sufficient to justify the recommendation. I hope, therefore, that the report of the Debates Committed will be rejected. It would be a dangerous precedent to establish, to give the committee authority to suppress or delay the report of any debate of this House.

HON. MR. MILLER—This is a very small matter, and has already occupied a good deal of the time of the House. I think it can be settled without much difficulty. The report involves two points: first, the power of the committee with regard to delaying the publication of the debates; and secondly, the wisdom of the recommendation conveyed in the second clause. I do not think the committee had any intention to interfere with the privileges of the House or unfairly to interfere with the publication of the debates, but they presumed it would be a wise course on their part to withhold for a while the publication of the particular debate in question. For my own part, I think that they rather mistook the course which is sanctioned by precedent in this House on that point. Where there has been an objectionable debate it has been usual to refer it to the committee, and the committee has then been asked to consider the question and report to the House, and generally that report has been adopted by the House. The sending of the debate to the committee has been tantamount to an instruction from the House. I think the committee has a perfect right to make a recommendation, and the hon. gentleman from Alberton correctly states the fact when he says the committee has only made a recommendation. It has not attempted to usurp the powers of the House, but has made a recommendation, whether wise or unwise it is for the House to judge. With regard to the second point, I desire to say I think the recommendation of the committee is an unwise one. I agree perfectly with what has fallen from my hon. friend from Amherst, that with regard to the question of our contingencies we have nothing to conceal, and that any discussion taking place on that question should have the utmost publicity. The debate in question was one of those which should particularly have appeared in our debates, because at the present time there is a very unfair agitation being started in another place with regard to the alleged axtravagance of our expenditures. The very appearance, therefore, of suppressing a discussion of anything taking place on that subject might be injurious to this body. I therefore intend to vote against the report as a whole, in consequence of the second part, because I believe the debate in question should take its proper place in the official report, and that any debate of that kind should have the greatest publicity that could be given to it, because I believe this House has nothing to lose by the freest and fullest publication of debates of that kind.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I scarcely need rise to say anything on this subject, because I might be content with saying simply that I concur in what has fallen from my hon. friend from Richmond. The most courteous way of dealing with the incident before us, which is not all disclosed, as I understand, by the report, is simply to decline to adopt the report if we are of opinion, as I am of opinion, and I suppose as hon. gentlemen who have spoken think, that the recommendation is not a judicious one. I see that the debate in question does not appear in our official report and the House has given no order, I understand, restraining its publication. Therefore, in some way or other the report does not find its proper place in our Debates, and we have not yet pronounced any opinion as to whether it should or should not. We have given no order in that respect. The omission of the report is a mistake. I think it should not have occurred.

HON. MR. MILLER—If the House does not order that that debate shall not appear it must, as a matter of course, appear.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I quite agree with my hon. friend. It is unnecessary for us to make any substantive motion on the subject, because under the arrangement we have made for the reporting of the debates it must appear. It has not yet appeared, and subsequent debates have been published. It does not take its usual place. When the House has declared that it does not concur in the recommendation of the committee that report will find its way, I presume, into the Debates in the ordinary course of things; so the main thing we have to do now is to say whether or not we concur in the recommendation of the committee not to publish this report. I am quite prepared to go the entire length that my hon. friend has done in stating my opinion that the report ought to go to the public. Not only have we nothing to fear by a comparison of our expenditure with the expenditures in other places, but as a result of the investigation before the committee last winter, it is proved that we have every reason to be satisfied with our position as compared with that of any other legislative chamber. There is probaly something to be desired yet in that respect, but we are quite competent to do whatever may be necessary in that way, and I only regret—and I mention it incidentally—that the comparative statements which were prepared last year of the contingent expenditures of the two Houses were not published in their entirety as they were laid before the committee, because the mere publication of the statement laid before the committee, made from authentic sources, of the comparative expenditure and the comparative increases of expenditure of the two Houses, would have been an answer to a great deal of the foolish calumnies and slanders that are published about the Senate on this particular subject. I therefore entirely concur in the views that have been stated by different hon. members that the debate in question ought to appear and that everything which we find it necessary to say in discussing these contingencies should be published, and I do not believe that anything that is said on that subject can produce any other effect than to add to the credit and standing of this honorable House in the eyes of the people.

HON. MR. POWER—If the hon. gentleman had been present at the debate to which reference has been made I do not think he would have applied the language to it which we have just heard. It was a debate which was anything but calculated to elevate this House in the eyes of the public and further; it was a debate which conveyed no valuable information to the public. It was a debate in which a good deal was said as to the character of one of the subordinate employés of the Senate. Was that the sort of thing which should go to the public upon our records? That is the only reason why these domestic matters are referred to committees, that they are not subjects of a kind which should be discussed in public. Men make statements with respect to the characters of employés which may be altogether wrong, a which may turn out, upon further investigation, not to be well founded; but still, when cases of that kind are brought up, there must be a certain liberty of discussion, otherwise the truth is not to be arrived at. Hon. gentlemen must see that the floor of this House is not the place where such discussions should take place. That was the principle on which the committee recommended the non-publication of the debate in question. The hon. gentleman from Amherst and the hon. leader of the House both spoke a good deal of valuable truth as to our not being ashamed that the details of our expenditure should be made public. There was no question of making public the details of our expenditure. The debate did not deal with that at all, but dealt with the characters of certain employés.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I understand from what is told me that the discussion turned to some extent upon the merits or demerits of some employé of the House, as to the propriety of continuing him in the service of the Senate. One of the calumnies circulated freely about the Senate is that we retain in our employ persons who are unfit for their duties, and that in this way we are squandering the public money. Is there anything more calculated to aid this House than to show that there is nothing of the kind?

HON. MR. MILLER—The question of superannuation was involved in the discussion.

HON. MR. POWER—The question is whether a debate which dealt with purely domestic matters of that kind and did not deal with the subject of our expenditure directly should be published. Now, what took place in this matter? There must have been something a little unusual in the character of the debate when the reporter himself asked the question of the chairman of the Debates Committee whether this particular report should be published or not. A good deal has been said, particularly by the hon. gentleman from Victoria, as to the great liberty—the unpardonable liberty—taken by one member of the committee with this debate. Now, I happen to be the member of the committee who took this unpardonable liberty, and I may state what the liberty consisted of. The reporter himself was under the impression that this debate was not one that it was desirable to publish, and spoke to the chairman of the committee in that sense. I afterwards, in the course of the evening, happened to see the reporter. I did not go to see him about this special thing; but I suggested to him that, as the committee were to meet the following morning, it might be as well to defer the publication of this particular debate until the committee met and had a chance to deal with it. Accordingly, the committee met the next morning and did recommend that this part of the debate be not published, and now the question for the House is, whether the committee were right or wrong. It is absurd to talk about an outrage upon the liberties and privileges of the House, and to speak as though the whole British constitution were coming down in battered fragments about our ears, because we postponed the publication of a debate until the House has an opportunity to decide whether it should appear or not. Suppose that in the course of a debate some very scandalous thing had been said—and there are hon. gentlemen here who remember debates that took place in past years, when very objectionable language was used—and suppose that no notice happened to be taken of that at the time, is it contended that the committee would have no right, when they came to realize, afterwards, what the effect of this language was, to recommend to the House that that debate should not appear, or that a particular speech should not be published? There is this fact, that more than once—and the hon. gentleman from Victoria must know it quite as well as I do—there have been instances in which speeches, and portions of speeches, have been suppressed, on the recommendation of the chairman of the committee alone, and no question was raised about it. We were not told that the British Constitution was going to pieces.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—That is all wrong, though.

HON. MR. POWER—It may or may not be; the thing had been done before and in a more aggravated form than it has been in this case, and I fail to see that any very serious injury has been done. Of course, if we could have foreseen that the non-publication of that interesting debate was going to excite so much feeling amongst the members of the House who are such warm lovers of British liberty, the committee probably would not have made the recommendation that they did; but it may be that some gentlemen may have occasion to regret that the House has taken the position which is now suggested with respect to this matter. If it is said that the committee which is appointed to supervise the publication of our debates has not the right of reserving the publication of one speech, or a number of speeches, until the House has decided upon the question, I think that occasions may arise when that will be found to be a bad rule.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am bound to believe that the committee acted with the best intentions. There is nothing personal to them in the opposition to this report, but at the same time, I think they acted injudiciously, and exceeded their authority. The statement of the hon. gentleman from Halifax that the reporter met him and suggested to him to withhold the report——

HON. MR. POWER—I never said anything of the sort. I said that the reporter made the suggestion to the chairman of the committee.

HON. MR. MACDONALD—The reporter's duty was to report the debates of the House, and he had no right to make a suggestion of the kind. It makes the matter ten times worse if there has been collusion between the official reporter and any member of the committee.

HON. MR. BOTSFORD—There is no question in my opinion but that the committee had a right to recommend, as they have recommended, that a certain portion of a debate be omitted; the only question is, whether it was judicious to delay the publication of the report, as has been done. The House has power to decide the question, it is true, but the committee have power to recommend to the House to suppress or delay the publication of any particular report. The difficulty has arisen mainly from the adjournment of the Senate. If the opinion of the Senate could have been got in a reasonable time there would have been very little delay. Under the circumstances, the question before us is simply whether the report should be adopted or not.

HON. MR. ALMON—I want to know if any person thinks that a private member of a committee has a right to meet one of the official reporters and tell him to suppress a report of a debate until the decision of the House is obtained? I do not think any one should undertake to do so.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was rejected by the following vote:—

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved that the House do now adjourn.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—Before the House adjourns I want to show that there is a precedent for the course which the Debates Committee have taken in this matter. On reference to the first volume of the Senate Debates, Session of 1885, it will be seen that a similar question to this was before the House. Mr. Vidal then occupied the position of chairman of the Debates Committee. I find on page 239 the following:—

"HON. MR. ALEXANDER—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege. I learn that orders have been given to the reporters of this House to expunge a certain speech delivered in this House by a member. The orders were conveyed I understand, to the reporters by the hon. senator from Sarnia (Mr. Vidal). I desire to ask by what authority that senator gave or conveyed such orders? My reading of parliamentary practice is that no speech of any member can be omitted from the official report of the debates without an order of the House conveyed by resolution duly passed.

"HON. MR. VIDAL—As the hon. member has called upon me by name to explain this matter, I must endeavor to do so, although laboring under very considerable difficulty on account of a severe cold. As he has been pleased to term it, the order that has been given the reporters is not, correctly called, an order. I received from the official reporters, in the absence of the chairman of the committee on the reporting of the debates, a brief memorandum asking what was to be done with the debate of Friday last in connection with the disorderly conduct and remarks of the hon. senator from Woodstock. The reporters understood, as I think it was generally understood in the House, that his remarks and the speeches referring to those remarks, should not find a place in the record of the Debates of this House. That was the understanding by myself, and I think by the other senators, of what was the desire and intention of the House in this matter. I have no authority to suppress any debate, much less to do what has been incorrectly charged to have been done—expunge it from the record, because it has never been on the record, and consequently could not have been expunged. I had no authority for directing that this speech should not be placed in the record; and I therefore took the opportunity of consulting other members of the Debates Committee. There was no time to call the committee together, but I took the opportunity of consulting such members as I could conveniently see. Every one of them understood the sense of the House that those speeches — not merely the speech of the hon. member from Woodstock, but all the speeches based upon his remarks — should not be inserted in the official report of the debates. I conveyed this information to the reporters, and they very naturally asked the question as to where the omission was to commence and how far it was to extend? I gave to them what I understood to be the decision of the Senate, and as I thought a very natural and very proper decision, especially when the hon. gentleman from Woodstock had professed to make an apology to the House, I considered, that being the case, that was the admission that he had done wrong, that his remarks were entirely out of order and should not, therefore, on that account be placed on record; so I gave, as I thought, very simple and proper instructions to the reporters to go on with the hon. gentleman's remarks just so long as he was speaking on the subject before the House—that is, the Bill respecting the transfer of lands in the North-West Territories—but so soon as he departed from that and began to use these inexcusable imputations, and when he undertook to express himself in a manner entirely unbecoming in a member of this honorable body, that those remarks should not appear—that that should be the special point at which the reporters should not record the debate, and as a natural consequence, not only the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Woodstock, but the remarks of the hon. gentlemen who spoke after him in reference to this matter, should disappear altogether, so that there should be no record in our official report of that very unpleasant debate. I think the hon. gentleman's remarks were very derogatory to the character and honor of this House, and calculated to lower us very much in the estimation of the country. There is no hon. gentleman who professes to have greater respect for the dignity of this body or greater desire that it should stand well in the eyes of the community than the hon. member from Woodstock, and I venture to say that the remarks such as he had made in this House during this session have done more to lower it in public estimation than anything that has been done within these walls. Not only should the Senate sanction what has been done, perhaps somewhat irregularly, with reference to these remarks, but in my judgment the Senate would act wisely and well if they would expunge from the record the remarks made by the hon. gentleman on a former occasion, when he indulged in unjustifiable imputations upon the character, honesty and integrity of this body. I trust the House will sustain the somewhat irregular action taken by me, and will affirm the principles and motives which actuated me in adopting the course which I have taken."

Now, we did not go so far as that: we merely recommended to the House what we thought would be in the interest of the Senate, and still we are accused of robbing hon. gentlemen of their rights, and as the hon. member for Halifax has well put it, of tumbling down the whole British constitution on their heads. On the occasion in 1885 to which I have just referred the House supported the chairman of the Debates Committee in the course he pursued. Taking that view of the matter, I ask the leader of the House to be allowed to withdraw my name from the Debates Committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned at 5:10 p.m.

THE CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

The following is the report referred to above:—

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I should like to know why Thos. Davis, a messenger, is superannuated? He is a young man, and seems to be quite fit to discharge his duties. I should like to have that part of the report suspended and referred back to the committee to enquire further into this matter. I should like to know if they had this man Davis before them, and why they have decided to superannuate him?

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I am not possessed of the facts which led the committee to recommend that this young man be superannuated. Some reasons should be given for such an unusual recommendation. It seems to me that it would be a bad precedent, unless a man has been for a long time in the public service and has reached an advanced age, to superannuate him. If Davis is not over age and not incapacitated from performing his duties I should like to know why he is to be superannuated. It is unjust to the young man himself to shove him out of the position he is holding, if it is merely to make place for some other person. I should think that the committee would not yield to pressure to recommend the superannuation of a comparatively young man, to make room for another person. Unless the chairman of the committee can justify this recommendation, I must oppose the report.

HON. MR. POWER—I think it would not be at all desirable that such a matter as this should be discussed in this Chamber. There were as many members present at the meeting of the committee as are present in the house now. The matter was discussed and the committee arrived almost unanimously at the conclusion to make the recommendation contained in the report. The hon. member from New Westminster did not concur in the recommendation to superannuate Davis, but my recollection is that he did concur in the proposition to dispense with his services. Satisfactory reasons were furnished to the committee why this man should not be continued in his present position, and I think it would be an unfortunate precedent if, in a thin House, we were to undertake to discuss before the whole country the reasons why the committee have recommended that a certain course be taken in dealing with an inferior officer of the House. There is this objection to referring back the paragraph of the report containing the recommendation: the action which the committee took on several other applications would be influenced by the action taken in this particular case, and we should be obliged to refer back a large portion of the report. I have not the slightest interest in the matter, good, bad or indifferent, except that the right thing should be done, and I think that it would be a very unwise thing to refer this paragraph of the report back. There is no object in prosecuting the enquiry any further.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—My hon. friend has rather excited my curiosity. Does he tell us that when a report comes from a committee we must adopt it blindly without discussion? Is the House not to be the judge of all circumstances connected with the recommendation? When such a new departure is taken as the superannuation of a young man we should have a reason for it. We must know the ground on which this recommendation is made. There should be no hesitation on the part of the House in demanding all the information that is necessary to enable us to arrive at a correct judgment on the matter. It is a new departure, and I can only say, as my hon. friend beside me has said, that I can see but one reason for making such a recommendation—that there is a desire to give the position to somebody else.

HON. MR. POWER—Nothing of the sort.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—If that is not the reason, then we ought to know what is the real ground for making the recommendation. If this man has not performed his duty, if he is incapacitated in any way, if he has been an unfaithful servant, he should be dismissed and not superannuated. Until some explanation is given by the chairman of the committee, I shall be disposed to oppose this paragraph of the report.

HON. MR. DEVER—I have no interest in this matter, and did not hear it discussed until just now. It is something new in this House that a Star Chamber committee should consider a matter of this kind and recommend a certain course to the House, without giving any explanation for taking the course recommended. I protest against such a doctrine. I do not want to vote for anything or be considered as voting for anything that I do not understand. I question very much the wisdom or propriety of doing anything here that we are afraid should get out to the public. What will the public think we are doing when they read the speech of my hon. friend from Halifax? They will think that we are wasting public money for the purpose of finding a position for some individual in whom certain members are interested. That is not an impression which should be allowed to go abroad, and I do not think it will be tolerated by the House or the country. I propose, for one, that all the facts connected with this matter shall be made public. If the recommendation is right, we will endorse it, and if it is wrong let us reject it.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—As one of that committee, I wish to say to the hon. gentleman from St. John that the committee is not a Star Chamber at all. It is composed of a large number of members of this House and is the very opposite of a Star Chamber committee. I am satisfied if the hon. gentleman had been there and heard the discussion he would not have made the remarks he has just made. At the meeting of that committee we had the leader of the Opposition and a member of the Government present to see that nothing wrong was done. The matter was discussed fully, and the conclusion arrived at is the recommendation contained in the report which is now before us. Unless there is some good reason for rejecting the report it should be accepted by the House. I admit that every report of a committee is subject to discussion in the House, but at the same time the House should credit the committee with having discharged its duty. If they think that the committee has been influenced by improper considerations they should appoint another committee. This young man Davis has contributed to the superannuation fund, and the recommendation is merely to give him back his money. I cannot see how any public money is misappropriated in superannuating this man. I may say that more than three-fourths of the members of the committee approved of the recommendation in this report, and I think it would be better to adopt the report than to send it back for further consideration.

HON. MR. ALMON—When I first heard that an employé was to be superannuated I enquired how old he was, and I learned he was about 35 years old. I think, therefore, that superannuation does not apply in this case. I was told the young man had bodily infirmities which prevented him from discharging his duties. I asked if he had a certificate from a medicial man stating what his bodily infirmities were, and I was informed by the chairman of the committee that he had not. Now, in Nova Scotia, and I fancy in other parts of Canada, there is no charge made against the Government of this Dominion which is more injurious to them than the charge that they superannuate people who are quite competent to discharge their duty in order that they may make room for favorites of the Government. Whether that is the case or not in the higher and more remunerative offices, we should be careful that no such charge can be laid against us. If this young man is to be pensioned for bodily infirmities there ought to be a medicial certificate showing the cause; but I believe that is not the reason at all why he is unfit for his duties. However, I will not enter into particulars, as I will not make charges that I cannot substantiate, but if what I have heard is true, he ought to be reprimanded, and told that if he has to be superannuated again he will not get another chance, but will be discharged. If I could move an amendment to the report I should like to move that he be reprimanded and told that if it is necessary to deal with his case again he will be discharged.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—Since my name has been mentioned in connection with the proposed superannuation of Davis, I may say that as a member of the committee I took very strong grounds against the recommendation of the Housekeeper to have this man superannuated.

HON. MR. POWER—This illustrates the objection to which I refer, that a domestic arrangement of the Senate should be discussed, and these little details go on our record. I think it is highly objectionable that we should be discussing what the Housekeeper said and what other employés said. It is very improper and undignified. If the recommendation is not approved of, it is much better to refer the paragraph back to the committee.

HON. MR. McINNES—I owe it to myself and the House as a member of that committee to make this explanation, that I took strong grounds against this man Davis being superannuated at the early age of 35, and I asked the reasons why the recommedation was made. I will not mention to the House what information I received, but I may simply state that I took strong grounds against the recommendation. I thought the committee were acting wrongly in asking the Senate of the country to establish such a precedent. I hold the same view yet. I am more than surprised at my hon. friend from Alberton, when he insists that this House should accept the report of the Contingent Committee without a thorough investigation. I remember, and others will remember in this House, that only two or three years ago, when the hon. gentleman himself was chairman of the Contingent Committee, and that committee, by a majority of three to one, recommended granting gratuities on the Jubilee year to certain officers in connection with the Senate, he disapproved of the recommendation. The hon. gentleman from Richmond, who, I am sorry to see, is not in his seat to-day, moved that that portion of the report be expunged or referred back to the committee for reconsideration. The motion was agreed to and the report was expunged. In view of that fact, I am rather surprised to hear my hon. friend lay down the doctrine which he has stated to-day.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I did not establish such a precedent; it was the hon. member from Richmond.

HON. MR. McINNES—If I am wrong I accept the explanation; but my recollection of the incident is, that when it came to a vote the hon. gentleman from Alberton supported the amendment. However, I am not going into a discussion on this point. I can only say that if we adopt this recommendation we will be doing something which we will regret in the future.

HON. MR. POWER—The better way would be for some gentleman who objects to this paragraph of the report to move that paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 be referred back to the committee.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—In order to justify myself I may say I have been approached by a dozen members asking me to move that the report be rejected. I refused to do so. I said I had done my duty in the committee room and I would take no further part in the matter. I would not have referred to it now if it had not been brought up by the hon. member from Halifax.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I may explain, in reply to my hon. friend from British Columbia, that in the case to which he referred a few moments ago I was chairman of the Contingent Accounts Committee and introduced the report. Would my hon. friend believe that I would have voted against my own report? The thing is absurd.

HON. MR. McINNES—My recollection is that the hon. member made an explanation in which he demurred to the report.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The hon. gentleman is astray; I would not oppose my own report.

HON. MR. McINNES—On referring to the minutes I find that I was perfectly correct in my statement. My hon. friend from Alberton not only spoke against the report when he presented it to the House, but I find his name here among those who voted against it.

HON. MR. POIRIER—If what I hear about Davis is true, he ought not to be continued in his present position. However, what I wish to bring to the notice of the House is, that the First Clerk of English Journals, who died recently—Mr. Peter Miller—was appointed at confederation as coming from New Brunswick. While I do not believe in making it a strict rule that every vacancy should be filled by the appointment of a successor from the same Province, the rule has been followed to a certain extent, and I am sorry that the members of the committee who come from New Brunswick did not advocate the claim of their own Province.

HON. MR. McCLELAN—They did.

HON. MR. POIRIER—Then they did not succeed in carrying their point. A New Brunswick man should have been appointed, beginning, of course, at the foot, because I believe in promotion. I have no objection to the gentleman who received the appointment. I do not know him, but I have no doubt he is equal to the position. I am sorry to see that in this House, of late years, appointments have been made in a vicious circle and that due regard has not been paid to the claims of the different Provinces; but other influences have been allowed to prevail. I do not intend this as a protest, but I am sorry that the old rule and precedents were not followed in this instance, and that a gentleman from New Brunswick was not allowed to come in at the foot of the ladder to replace that efficient deceased servant, Mr. Miller.

HON. MR. McCLELAN—My hon. friend from Acadia brings a charge against myself, as a member from New Brunswick, and a little later justifies the course that I took. There was an application for the position from New Bruswick by a gentleman who, for a time, faithfully filled an office on the staff of the House of Commons, and who would have been very glad to have taken the position made vacant by the lamented death of Mr. Miller, who had been appointed in recognition of the claims of New Brunswick at the time of the Confederation. I attempted to set forth at the meeting of the committee that the vacancy really belonged, according to the old order of things, to the Province of New Brunswick, provided a proper application was received. A proper applicant did present his claims—Mr. Richardson, of Richibucto. These claims were ignored by the almost unanimous voice of the committee, on the ground very properly taken by the hon. member from Acadia—that is, the ground of promotion. The position formerly occupied by Mr Miller was filled up in this way and other officials promoted, and hence there was no place left for the applicant from New Brunswick, because when a real vacancy came to be filled the salary being only $600 the applicant could not accept it.

HON. MR. POIRIER—I would ask the hon. gentleman if the applicant would not accept the position at that salary.

HON. MR. McCLELAN—I had no instruction to press the application at that salary. I had a letter from him fixing a minimum amount, and consequently I felt myself entirely justified in not pressing his application any further. I took the only course I could on the committee under the circumstances, while I think the claims of New Brunswick have not been fairly considered in all respects. With reference to the matter before the House, although I took no particular part upon the committee on the question of superannuation as it is termed—and wrongfully termed in my judgment—I felt it was an exceedingly difficult and delicate case. Had there been a division on the committee I should certainly have voted against superannuating a young man 35 years of age without any proofs before us that he was suffering from any infirmity which would justify such a course. I do not think we have any clear proof of inefficiency or misconduct; but certainly if it was either, we would be laying down a a very bad precedent if we superannuated for such a cause.

HON. MR. DEVER—With reference to this matter, I feel that there has been more than one injustice done. This case I must consider as a shuffle of the cards in favor of certain parties.

The Senate divided on the amendment to refer back paragraphs 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 of the report, which was adopted: Contents, 18; non-contents, 12.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 4th, 1890.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (23) "An Act to incorporate the Belding, Paul & Company, Limited." (Mr. Vidal.)

Bill (M) "An Act to authorize the Toronto Savings Bank Charitable Trust to invest certain funds." (Mr. Sullivan.)

PRIVATE BILLS.

TIME FOR PRESENTING EXTENDED.

HON. MR. HOWLAN, from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bill, presented their Sixteenth Report, recommending that the time for presenting reports on Private Bills be extended to the 25th inst. He moved the adoption of the report.

HON. MR. POWER—I think that, as this report is of some importance, it had better stand over till to-morrow, because I think the better way would be for the House to strike from our rules the one which provides for the presenting of Private Bills at a certain time subsequent to the meeting of the House each year. The better way will be to have no rule on the subject at all, or have it read this way—the time for the introduction and presentation of Private Bills shall be that adopted by the House of Commons each Session. I think that the present mode of procedure is simply absurd and altogether inconsistent with the dignity of the House.

HON. MR. DICKEY. I quite concur in what my hon. friend has said as to the farce of constantly extending the rules; but, on this question, I hope he will not oppose the adoption of this report, for the reason that we have been acting as if these teports were made in good time, and it is resirable that nothing should take place do invalidate the proceedings of the House. I think in this case it would be better to adopt the report.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW SENATOR.

HON. PETER MCLAREN was introduced, and having taken the oath and signed the roll, took his seat.

BANKING SECURITY IN THE NORTH-WEST.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. BOULTON rose to call

The attention of this House to the advantage of granting to the corporate Banks power to take security upon real estate, or personal estate, or both, for the advance of loans, as a measure that will increase circulation, and materially assist in the development of our agricultural interests by giving to the farmers cheap money for temporary requirements; and ask the Government if they will take the question into their consideration in the framing of the new Bank Act?

He said—I think that an apology is due from me to this honorable House and to the Government for having allowed this notice of motion to remain so long on the paper. The reason of its being so is that I was compelled to go up to the North-West, and not knowing the exact day on which I would return, I was obliged to put it off to a sufficiently distant day to warrant me in being here. In bringing up this question before the notice of the Government I am not doing so at the request of the banks, nor do I know that the banks are asking the power which I have thought it advisable to suggest for the consideration of the Government to-day. At the present moment, the banks have not power to take security upon real estate or personal estate. Although the law does not give the banks power to take security on real or personal property, there is still a way in which they can do so by what I call evading the law; that is to say, if the banks desire to make a loan and take security for that loan, they have the power to accept a draft at a day's date and let it go to protest and then take security. That is one way in which it can be done, but it is not a way which is at all conducive either to the interest of the banks or of the people themselves, to obtain a loan, because the very fact of the note going to protest and of having to give security for it, is an evidence of discredit on the part of the borrower. More than that, the provincial laws, in Ontario at least, and I know in Manitoba, also, provide that the bank which takes a preferential security on a loan in that manner shall not become a preference creditor, but shall rank with all the other creditors of the individual; and, therefore, it is an insecure way for a bank to deal with the matter so far as taking security on personal or real estate is concerned. The interest in which I have brought this question before the notice of this honorable House is that of our North-West farmers. There is a great scope for the use of capital in the North-West, and there is a very great dearth of capital, indeed, in that country. The ordinary system of settlement in that country is such that more capital is very desirable in the interest of the development of our western country. Most of the settlers who go up there are men without means, but with plenty of muscle and physical power to develop the resources of that western country. They go up there without any means beyond a sufficient amount to purchase a yoke of cattle, a plough, and a few months' provisions, and they find there, ready at their hand, an enormous field of fertile prairie; all they have to do is to turn up the soil and produce a crop. The power of turning up the soil is only limited to the settler by his physical capacity to undertake the work. It is quite possible for him to turn over 40 acres, or 50 acres, as the case may be, and the enterprise of most settlers is such that they frequently turn over more soil than their means will enable them to cultivate properly, and therefore, when they come to put in their crop and harvest it, they are cramped for want of means. It is for the purpose of meeting that practical phase of our western life that I desire that greater banking facilities should be available for the settlers in the west.

Then there is another view with regard to our life in that country; we are only beginning farming there, I may say. The farmer comes up there with nothing but a yoke of cattle and a plough—I mean to say it is so with a large number of our settlers. The other class form an exception to the general rule. These farmers have not been able to pursue mixed farming yet; they have no income except what they get from the annual return by the sale of their grain; they have not begun to cultivate the soil as the farmers in the Eastern Provinces do; they have not the wool harvest in the spring, the lamb harvest in the fall, the Christmas and Easter harvest of cattle, and the grain crop in the fall and monthly harvests during the dairy season. These are all monthly returns which enable the farmer to carry on his work without the necessity of banking capital or advances which we in the west feel are absolutely necessary for the proper development and progress of our western country. As I have said, our farmers are limited to an annual income, and are dependent upon sales of grain alone. At the present moment and under the present circumstances the only available source to which the farmer can go to relieve himself from a temporary necessity, perhaps an absolute requirement in the conduct of his operations, is either to go to one of the private banks, which, I am sorry to say, are increasing rapidly in our western country, or go to a loan company and obtain a loan. Now, both of these are objectionable sources of capital for various reasons. So far as the private banks are concerned, they charge a high rate of interest. Their mode of operating, I believe, is to start in with a small capital, perhaps $4,000 or $5,000, and have an arrangement with one of the incorporated banks to obtain advances, to discount the notes they send in, and leave the margin of $4,000 or $5,000 capital as a security. The bank has to receive its interest, and the banker charges a considerable amount in addition to recoup himself.

Under the circumstances, the undesirable character of that system, and also, I suppose, the monopoly of privileges, so far as private bankers are concerned, the farmers are charged very high rates of interest, running up to 12, 15, and even 20 per cent. That is a great drawback to the farming community. Then, with regard to loans, a farmer will perhaps only require a loan for a temporary purpose, such as purchasing binder twine, or seed for his crop, or temporary assistance to get in his harvest, or he may want to buy four or five steers in order to consume the feed he has and fatten them for sale in the spring of the year, or in some other way to enhance his produce and pursue his industry with the small amount of capital that he has at his disposal, when he has the security to obtain it.

But the loan company will not lend him money for less than a term of three or five years; three years is the lowest that any loan company will advance money for. Then the farmer, in order to secure temporary accommodation, is compelled to put a permanent charge upon his farm, which is undesirable in that country, so long as it can possibly be avoided. Therefore, in that respect, I say that obtaining the capital for temporary purposes through the loan company is an objectionable way, so far as the interests of the farmer are concerned. In addition to this, the farmer may require only $100 or $150, or perhaps only $50 for his accommodation. It is not worth while to put a loan on his farm for that small amount, because the expense of the mortgage ranges from $10 to $25, according to the nature of the title, and therefore, instead of borrowing only $50, or $100, that he really requires, he borrows $300 or $400, and finds himself in possession of capital that he does not know how to use advantageously. This borrowed money is likely to become a fixed charge upon his farm, and will probably continue to grow until it becomes too great for him to bear; whereas, if he could have borrowed the small sum required for his temporary purposes he would make an effort to pay it off, out of the revenue of his farm, at the end of three or four months. It is under these circumstances that I have brought this subject before the Senate, in the interests of the farming population in the North-West. In that country we have a very valuable law, called the law of exemptions, under which every man who takes up his 160 acres of land is protected in his holding. That was done for the purpose of preserving their homes for the settlers and their families, so long as they choose to remain in the country. It is, as I have said, a valuable law; but it has the effect of diminishing the security of the farmer, so far as his borrowing power is concerned; and that is an additional reason why it is very difficult indeed for farmers to get accommodation or capital to any extent without being able to give some security or obtain some commercial name, which is a very difficult thing indeed to do in our western country. I think, myself, that it is not an objectionable thing in the interests of the farming community that we should extend to them the same privileges and advantages that the commercial community at large possess with regard to banking facilities. It is very necessary that the farmers should be educated to the proper use of their money in their daily avocation. They should be educated with regard to the management of their income and the way of spending it. Some farmers, when the crop is good, will spend the whole of their money, and the consequence is that when the crop is bad they have perhaps contracted extravagant habits and they feel the hard times pinch them. A system which would educate them to distribute their income over a series of years, according to what they believe the capacity of their farms will produce in an average year, or anything that will conduce to that, is an advantage to the farming community, especially of the west, which we are establishing there on those broad prairies, and which is growing to such enormous proportions. I find, myself, from my experience in that country, that there are farmers who come up from the Eastern Provinces—good, able men—who have accumulated large sums of money, or rather accumulated valuable property in the east, and in consequence of their experience have been able to put into their calling $4,000 or $5,000—many of these people come to the North-West and find themselves quite at sea as to the best way of investing their money. It melts from them much more rapidly than they have any idea of, and soon they are left without any of the resources accumulated in the east, and they have to commence over again. That is because most farmers have not been educated to the ordinary commercial value of money.

Another view is this: out in our western country the loan companies are exceedingly conservative in their operations. They have certain rules which they will not depart from, and one of these rules is, that they will make no loan to a farmer unless he is within a certain distance of railway communication. The consequence is, that there is a very large class of people in the North-West that are entirely cut off from any facility to assist them in their operations or to tide them over a difficult period. The hardest time in a farmer's life in a western country is the first five or six years that he is residing there. According to our experience, it takes a man in that country, who has had very little experience in farming, very nearly ten years to become what you might call a prosperous and self-sustaining farmer, in the general sense of the word. Nearly all the farmers and settlers who come out to that country want assistance for four or five years; they generally exhaust the whole of their means in reaching the country and establishing themselves upon their farms, and after they have been there a couple of years almost every farmer in the country, from one reason or another—often for want of experience with regard to the country or want of assistance of one kind or another—may need to borrow.

A failure of the crops will come and catch every farmer in a bad time. The drought of last year brought about quite a failure of some crops, and many of our farmers are left there without means to support themselves and tide over a very difficult period in their lives. It is to meet these difficulties and assist farmers in that respect that I bring this question before the Government, as one of very great importance to our western country and its proper development, and the success of the farming community which is established there. The security upon real estate and personal estate is a system which is in vogue in England. I know that an argument that is used in opposition to the proposal that I have the honor to make is that it has been tried before in this country and has proved a failure. Well, I think there are various reasons why we might consider that that failure would not occur again, because it was in the early development of Canada, when the people who had the management of our banks, and put their capital into our banks, had very little experience in commercial operations in Canada and they locked up a large amount of money in real estate, which brought disaster upon some of the banks. But I think that that period has passed by. The same reason is not a valid one now, because we have in Canada a very large staff of bankers who are thoroughly posted and thoroughly acquainted with all the operations necessary to carry on a sound banking institution upon. The danger that arose in those days I think will not arise again. In fact, I think that withholding the power from the banks is a reflection upon the capacity of our bank managers and a reflection also upon the capacity of the farming community generally. It is tantamount to saying that they are not fit to be entrusted with the management of money, as other commercial industries in the country are. For that reason, I feel, that it would be a very great advantage to our farmers in the west if the Government would take this matter into their consideration. There is room at present in the North-West, for at least $2,000,000 additional banking capital, which can be used with profit to the bank and to the capitalist, and to the farmers themselves. But the farmers are excluded entirely from the use of any banking capital, in consequence of the fact that the banks will not loan to farmers upon their personal security unless they get a commercial endorser to assist them. As I said before, this is of great importance in our North-West country, because our commercial industries are in their infancy at the present moment. Our system of land titles there is what is called the Torrens system. A man obtains the Torrens title from the provincial Government for his lands and the character of this Torrens title makes it an evidence of security in itself.

In order to transfer, or mortgage, or deal with that land in any way, the title itself must be produced, and therefore under these circumstances a farmer who is in fair standing and to whom the banks would be willing to loan money has only to bring his Torrens title to the bank and deposit it in the safe, with some short formula, which shows the purpose for which it is deposited, and he obtains his loan of $100, $150 or $200, as the case may be. As that can be done without any legal expense to the farmer of any kind or description, it would be easy and a very great advantage to extend that privilege to the farming community in our North-West country. It might be limited in the same way that our chattle mortgages are limited. They are no security if they have been one year in existence without renewal. The security might be put in that way, or might be surrounded with any safeguards considered necessary in the commercial interests of the country; but at the same time I would like the Government to take into consideration the question I have brought before them. Knowing that country and the needs of its people, I am confident that it would add greatly to the prosperity of the farmers who are there, that it would greatly develop the country itself, and this development would react upon the whole Dominion through the increased production of Manitoba and the North-West.

It would not be an injury to the loan companies, because anything that would increase our prosperity would add to the prosperity of every one who conducts commercial transactions of any kind in the country. At the end of five or six months, if a farmer found he was not able to pay the loan, he could then apply to a loan company and put a fixed charge on his farm. Anything that will help to give our young men a taste for the noblest pursuit the country has to offer to its industrial population is to be commended, and when a young man sees before him the opportunity to raise himself from a 50 acre farm to a 500 acre farm by using the resources of the country in a thrifty and industrious manner, with good judgment, many will commence to follow the plough who now wander off to the cities of the United States. All that I am asking for is that some facilities may be given to our western country to enable the farmers to obtain small loans for short periods at a moderate rate of interest, and I therefore respectfully ask the Government if they will kindly take into consideration the suggestion I have made, on behalf of the farmers in the North-West, in dealing with the Banking Act this session.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I can assure my hon. friend that the important subject to which he has called the attention of the House has received, and is receiving, the most careful consideration of the Government; but as my hon. friend knows, this is one of the decennial crises in the banking interests of the country. A Bill is being prepared and will very shortly be introduced into the House of Commons by the Finance Minister. The Government consider that it would be inexpedient at the present moment, before the Finance Minister is prepared to develop his plans in the House, to disclose the principles which will govern them in the preparation of the legislation which they propose to place before the House on this subject.

GOLD COINAGE IN CANADA.

MOTION.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.) moved the following resolution:—

Resolved, as the opinion of this House, that it is both desirable and expedient that the Government should immediately pass a coinage Act and establish a mint.

He said: I am sorry that the duty of calling the attention of this House and of the Government to this most important subject has not fallen to some one else better qualified to do it the justice it demands. However, as no one else has seen fit to suggest the propriety of establishing a mint and having a gold coinage of our own, I take the liberty of doing so, coming as I do from the great gold and silver producing Province of the Dominion. Naturally I take, probably, a deeper interest in this subject than hon. gentlemen coming from the Provinces that are non-producers of the precious metals. I hope to place before the House such data as will cause them to agree—if they are not already prepared to agree—with the resolution now before the House, and to support me to the utmost extent. However, before I do that I must deal with the question of the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada with reference to coinage. A few days after I gave notice of this motion several hon. gentlemen in this House, among the number the hon. member who has been leading the Senate for the last two or three weeks in the absence of our respected leader—who I am very glad, and I am sure all of us are glad, to see back amongst us again—who expressed a doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament on this subject. Up to that time it had never occurred to me that we had not the power under the 14th subsection of the 91st section of the British North America Act. However, that induced me to look into the matter more carefully and consult all the authorities with respect to coinage that I could get. The result of my investigation is as follows: I find that the first attempt made to pass a coinage Act by the Parliament of Canada was in 1850. That Act received the assent of the Governor General contrary to the instructions from the Crown, and the consequence was that that Act was disallowed. Hon. gentlemen will find it in the Sessional Papers of 1851, in Appendix YY of that year. I find that the next step taken towards the passing of a coinage and currency Act by the Parliament of Canada was in 1868, and in 1871 the Parliament of Canada passed Acts expressly reserving the prerogatives of the Crown. I will ask hon. gentlemen to refer to 31 Vic., chap. 46, and 34 Vic., chap. 4, respectively. Again the next step that I find taken by the Parliament of Canada was in 1887. This was in connection with the proclamation of 1877, to be found in the Statutes at page 61, with respect to bronze coinage, and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, who was then Secretary of State, signed that proclamation. That was allowed. The next thing I will call your attention to is section 91 of the British North America Act, which undoubtedly gives jurisdiction to the Parliament of Canada to establish a mint and to issue any coin they see fit. The question is now, what rights have the Canadian Parliament under section 91 of the British North America Act? Can the Parliament of Canada interfere with the Queen's prerogative in this particular? I think that they can, for the following reasons: In 1888 the Canadian Parliament passed an Act providing that no appeal should be brought in criminal cases from a Canadian court to any British court of appeal, notwithstanding any royal prerogative—and I would in this connection refer hon. gentlemen to Bourinot's "Federal Government in Canada," page 66. This Act, in consequence of a most able appeal and the powerful arguments of the present Minister of Justice, was allowed. I would refer hon. gentlemen to the Paper No. 77, especially pages 4 and 5, of 1888. Another evidence that we possess the undoubted privilege is in the fact that no instructions are now given to the Governor General, as was the case previous to 1867, when the British North America Act was passed. In that connection, I would refer hon. gentlemen to "Bourinot's Procedure," pages 569 and 574, and also Sir John Thompson's argument on the Canadian Copyright Act of 1889, where he shows the complete jurisdiction of the Canadian Parliament over all subjects in section 91. I have not seen the report itself, but have read the substance of it in the Toronto Empire of the 11th February last. Now, under the British North America Act, we have much wider and larger privileges than we had previous to Confederation; and so satisfied is Dr. Bourinot—and I think you will agree with me that he is as well qualified as any gentleman in this country to express an opinion on a constitutional question—that I have his authority to use the following to which he has attached his name: He says: "In view of all the arguments contained in the foregoing authorities as to the large powers given the Canadian Parliament under section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, it seems clear that Parliament can legislate freely on the subject of currency and coinage subject, of course, to the general power of disallowance by the Crown over all colonial legislation." I hope that that will remove any doubts as to the constitutional question. The next thing I shall call your attention to is the fact that as early as 1862 the then Crown colony of British Columbia had a mint in New Westminster. That mint was established there under Imperial authority; but I am sorry to say that through the jealousy of the late Sir James Douglas, then Governor of the colony, influenced by the residents of Victoria, the Imperial authorities were prevailed upon to discontinue the minting. A few coins were struck off, and it is only within the last seven or eight years that the balance of the plant in connection with that mint was removed. In Australia, nearly thirty years ago, two mints were established—one in Sydney, in the colony of New South Wales, and the other in Melbourne, in the colony of Victoria. These mints, I believe, have received their authority from the Imperial Parliament to coin. However, it is quite evident that we have the power, irrespective of any reference to the Imperial Parliament, to establish a mint; and I think, in view of the fact that we had a mint in British Columbia when there were only a mere handful of people at the time, we ought to exercise that power and establish a mint and have a Canadian gold coin. In the United States they have three mints. The main one is at Philadelphia, and two branches—one in San Francisco and the other in New Orleans. I will now refer to the very large amount of gold that Canada has produced within the last thirty years. The Province that I have the honor of coming from—British Columbia—has within the last twenty-nine years produced, according to the Sessional Journals of the Legislature of British Columbia, $51,599,957. I find according to the early Journals of the Legislature of Nova Scotia—where gold was discovered early in the winter of 1860—that previous to Confederation and from Confederation up to the present time the Province has produced about ten millions of gold. Now, here we have no less than sixty-one or sixty-two millions of dollars that this country has produced which has been exported, and not one ounce of which has been coined and put in circulation in our country. I learn from most reliable information that our gold miners out in British Columbia, who produce that gold, lose from 5 to 6 per cent. on all their gold dust and nuggets by the cost of transportation down to San Francisco, where they sell it. Now, I contend that such should not be the case. I contend that as we acknowledge gold to be a legal tender here—not only British gold, but United States gold—it is too bad that the country like Canada, extending over the greater portion of the continent of North America, with an area nearly as large as the whole continent of Europe, and with possibilities almost as great as those of Europe, should be dependent upon other countries for its gold coin.

I will now refer to the very large profits that the Government of the United States, and even the Government of Canada, make on coinage. I will refer you to the Public Accounts ending the 30th June last, and to the report of the Deputy Minister of Finance. In examining the report you will find, at page 10, the following:—

"The cost of the management of the Department during the year was as follows:—

Salary of the head of Department....	$ 7,000 00
Salaries of the departmental staff.....	52,090 71
Contingencies.....	10,749 73
	$69,840 44

"The profit derived from the silver coined amounted to $52,774.21, an amount more than sufficient to cover the salaries of the staff."

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Is that the Finance Department that is referred to?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes; the Finance Department. So that on the Canadian silver that we have in circulation the annual profits made by this Government amount to over $52,000, or enough to cover the entire cost of the Finance Department, with the exception of the salary of the Finance Minister.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—This coinage would not be every year.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.) — They make that profit every year. If it is not so, I hope hon. gentlemen will look into the matter and put me right, because I do not wish to give the House anything that is not strictly correct. Now, I will also refer the House to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, and we will see what has been done there.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—For what year?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Last year. I think their year is the calendar year, and does not end in June, as our financial year does. However, it is for 1889. It states, on page 72 of that report, that the profit on the coinage of silver for ten years to the close of the fiscal year 1889 aggregated $57,378,524.18. The prices of silver, the earnings and the expenditure, are given. The earnings of the mints from all sources during the fiscal year aggregated $10,351,701.47, while the expenditure and losses of all kinds amounted to $1,502,665.60 leaving a net profit of $8,849,035.87. In another portion of the work (I cannot lay my hand on it just now) it is stated that within the last eleven years the Government of the United States, on coinage alone, without any reference, it appears, to copper or bronze, has saved $80,000,000. For instance, it gives here the product of the mints of the United States for last year. The value in gold was $33,175,000 and in silver $43,020,000. The commercial value of that silver was $43,020,000, but the coined value was $59,195,000.

HON. MR. WARK—Is that silver in circulation?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes; silver in circulation.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I think the silver coined at the mints in the United States costs about 80 cents, and is issued at $1.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes; that is the idea.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—That is not wholly in circulation. As I have said, in the United States they get 100 cents for what costs them 80 cents, by means of silver certificates, and this silver currency is placed in the United States vaults, silver certificates being issued against the silver so deposited. There are about three hundred millions of their silver certificates now in circulation in the United States and pass current at their face value.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I am not prepared to say whether that is owing to the silver certificates or not, but as a fact I may tell the hon. gentleman that American silver coin is just as pure as British or Canadian silver coin. The intrinsic value of our own silver coin is eighty cents to the dollar, coin value. But how will any hon. gentleman here get over the fact that our own Deputy Finance Minister, in making his report to the Finance Minister, states that there was a net profit to the Dominion Government of $52,774, last year. We have certainly no silver certificates in Canada. I find in another place here it is stated that the gold and silver in the world is estimated by the Directors of the Mint to have been for the same year: in gold, $105,994,150; in silver the commercial value was $103,556,260, and in the coin it was $152,457,000. On that sum alone it is reckoned that the coined silver is worth nearly $40,000,000 more than the commercial value. I have not been able to ascertain what the profit on our copper or bronze coin has been, but if it is great on silver and gold, especially silver, it must be still greater on copper. Now, the possibilities—not only possibilities, but probabilities, of the output of gold and silver in the Province of British Columbia in the near future, say five years, I believe, will amount to four or five millions of dollars, or probably ten millions of dollars a year.

HON. MR. SCOTT—That is a broad statement.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.) — Hon. gentlemen may think so, but by reference to this Blue Book, it will be seen that the production of gold in British Columbia in the early years of gold mining was about four millions of dollars annually, and now that our gold and silver quartz ledges are being developed under a new system and the mining industry being assisted by the Local Government, I believe it is no stretch of imagination to say that we will be producing four or five millions of dollars, or probably more, of gold and silver every year.

HON. MR. POWER—Might I ask the hon. gentleman does he propose to coin all that?

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.) — No; there would be no necessity to coin all, but I certainly think we ought to coin as much of it as the commercial necessities of our country demand. Even if we do not coin all, yet our mint would buy up our own gold and silver, and give the producers very much more for it than if it were shipped to foreign countries for them to make a profit out of them.

HON. MR. DEVER—Had we not better issue paper, that does not cost us anything?

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.) — I may be allowed to digress for a moment, and call the attention of the leader of the Government to the necessity of admitting all gold mining and silver mining machinery free of duty, until such time as we develop our quartz mines in British Columbia to such an extent that Canadians will go into manufacturing mining machinery, which is not made in this country at the present time. I know that in stating this I have the full endorsation of every representative of British Columbia, who has any knowledge at all of mining, and I hope that my hon. friend from Cariboo, who lives right in the very centre of the great gold-producing region, will say a few words in endorsation of what I have stated.

HON. MR. McKAY — What will the Nova Scotians say about that?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I think Nova Scotia is quite able to take care of herself, as she has always been able to do in the past. I want the Government now to extend a little encouragement to an industry that promises to develop to almost any extent on the Pacific coast. There is no country worthy of the name of a nation that is without its own gold coin. In Canada, with a population of over five millions, and producing the precious metals in large quantities, we have no mint and no gold coin of our own. A Canadian gold coin would be one of the best advertisements we could have. At the present time, as I have stated, we are entirely dependent for our gold coin upon Great Britain and the United States. I am informed that most of the banks do not care about having British gold if they can get American gold. Whether that is owing to the fact that the American currency is similiar to our own or not, the fact remains that nearly all the gold in the vaults of our Canadian banks is of American coinage. We should not be in that position. We should have our own gold in the vaults of our banks. Again, I contend that by establishing a mint in Canada it would be only in the line of carrying out still further the National Policy adopted in 1879. I see no good reason why we should not establish a mint and give employment to our own people, and whatever profits may accrue from the mintage should go to the Government of this country. As far as the cost of establishing a mint is concerned, I may say that the one we had in New Westminster cost only $35,000—a mere bagatelle—and if a mint, with its building and everything complete, would cost only that much, or say even $50,000, the Government could not appropriate that amount of money to a better purpose.

HON. MR. POWER—We could turn over the printing building to them.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—No; I have no desire to turn over the printing building here in Ottawa to them. I contend that where the precious metals are found in such quantities is the place where the mint should be. It should be established in the very town that had the honor of having the first and only mint that ever existed in a Canadian Province. However, that is a matter of detail. I am anxious to see a mint established, no matter where we have it, in the Dominion of Canada. If we have it out in British Columbia so much the better. But let us show the world what we are doing here, and that we are assuming the proportions and responsibilities of a nation. By endorsing the resolution that I now submit to the House you will contribute very largely to that end.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I was asked this morning by my hon. friend from British Columbia to second his motion, and I have done so. At the same time, there is an objection to increasing any further the Government departments or institutions of the Dominion, and more especially with regard to a mint, which requires, no doubt, very great safeguards. It would involve not only great safeguards, but supervisory powers and the employment of highly skilled labor. If established at all, it should be under the supervision and control of the Government. Our paper notes are printed by contract, and the work is done, I believe, in a satisfactory way; but coinage could only be done properly under the supervision and responsibility of the Government. My hon. friend suggested to me the question whether this was a subject that ought to come up in the Senate—whether it might not come more appropriately from those who have more to do with the money of the country. But it is before us now, and I am in favor of the suggestion that my hon. friend makes, that we should have in this great country, which produces the precious metals in such abundance, a coinage of our own. Anything that will tend to advance the price of gold in this country shall receive my hearty support. My hon. friend has done justice to his own Province in describing the production of gold there, but he has not done equal justice to Nova Scotia. I have figures here to show that last year Nova Scotia produced more gold than British Columbia. We know in our Province that there is a great loss, not only in the transhipment of the gold to the United States, where all of it goes, but in passing through the hands of brokers and others on the way. The loss to the gold-producer is about 5 per cent. If the gold could be coined in Canada it would be a saving, not only to the Province, but also to the miner. If it is true, as the report of the Deputy Minister of Finance states, that the saving to this country on the coinage of silver is $53,000 a year, that is an advantage which ought to be well considered by our Government in deciding whether we should establish a mint. I agree with my hon. friend that nothing will confer a greater advantage to Canada and prove a better means of advertising the importance of this country abroad than the establishing of a mint. It will show that we are not only able to produce our own metals but to coin them ourselves. It will greatly increase the importance of this country. I am glad that my hon. friend is coming to share our views of the importance of the resources, the capabilities and the future prospects of Canada, and that he is to some extent a strong supporter of the National Policy. I thought my hon. friend was wavering on that question of late years, but I am glad to see that he is returning to his first love. I hope he is sincere, and that by his actions he will prove his fidelity to the sound policy on which the prosperity of the country is based. The hon. gentleman has put this question before the House in a clear and forcible manner, and I hope that his views will prevail. I admit that it would be more appropriately brought up in the other House, but since it has not been forced upon the attention of the Government where it should have been, I am glad that it has been introduced here. The Finance Department should have moved in this matter and suggested some policy, and I shall therefore support the motion.

HON. MR. BOULTON—I should like to endorse the motion of my hon. friend from British Columbia in so far as it relates to the admission of mining machinery free of duty. We have in the Province of Manitoba valuable mining districts which are receiving a great deal of attention, and there is a considerable amount of machinery being imported. When I was in that district the other day, I was requested to press on the attention of the Government the subject of admitting mining machinery free of duty. Such machinery is not manufactured in Canada, and the revenue of the country is fortunately in that position that it can do without the duty levied on that particular branch of our industries. The development of our mining industries is a most important question. We have an enormous amount of hidden wealth in the country, and every encouragement should be given to those who are taking part in the development of our mining industries. So far as the question of coinage is concerned, I cannot express an opinion upon it, but anything that would promote the mining industry is, I think, worthy of the consideration of the Government.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I do not rise to make any speech on this subject, but I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that a large part of the profit made by the United States on the coinage of silver is by the issuing of a debased coinage. I think the House is indebted to the hon. gentleman for the very interesting speech he has made. It is a most interesting subject. What the profits would be on the coinage of silver or gold in this country I am not in a position to say. With reference to the other subject to which he alludes—that of the admission of mining machinery free of duty—I know that a very large part—in fact, nearly the whole of the machinery—that is required for mining purposes is manufactured in Canada. It is true that our manufacturers do not keep a stock of this machinery on hand, but they are always prepared and ready to accept an order to manufacture it. I believe there are one or two of the articles required for mining purposes which are not made in this country, and perhaps it would be advisable to make an exception in favor of such machinery as we cannot and do not make in Canada.

HON. MR. REID (B.C.)—After the remarks of the hon. gentleman from New Westminster, I desire to say a few words on one of the subjects to which he has referred. I am glad that he has brought this matter up, and I can support what he has said, not because of any great necessity for a mint, but for what the discussion may lead up to—that is, drawing the attention of this House and the country to the importance of the mining industries, not only of British Columbia, but of all the Provinces of this Dominion. More especially I will endorse the remarks he addressed to the leader of the Government as to admitting mining machinery free of duty for a short period. As to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Burlington about the manufacture of mining machinery in Canada, I have made inquiry, being more or less interested in that industry, and I find that there are some kinds of machinery manufactured in Canada; but if I were to give an order to anyone in Canada for plant to reduce the gold ore in British Columbia I would have to come over here and superintendent the whole matter myself. I know that I would not get what I require unless I came. When I send to San Francisco for plant for certain kinds of ores, that is all that is necessary. I get the machine in its entirety—there is not a piece lacking. I have been for the last year trying to get the prices of different mining machinery. There are some articles that are known in British Columbia by their own peculiar names, and if I should send an order to manufacture them in this part of the country the manufacturer would not know what I wanted at all. For instance, in hydraulic mining, if I were to ask for a monitor of a certain size they would ask me what a monitor was; they would think it was something used in naval warfare. I would have to go and explain. In fact, they do not know anything about it. It is true they manufacture ordinary gold stamp mills. I do not know even in Ontario where they are manufactured. I think the least the Government could do to encourage this industry, which is a very large one and has not had the attention of this House and the country that it deserves, is to admit mining machinery free of duty. I fully endorse the remarks of the hon. gentleman from New Westminster, not, as I said before, because of any immediate necessity of a mint, but as a means to an end.

HON. Mr. ABBOTT—I must confess that I do not myself feel competent to discuss the effect that might be produced upon the financial system of the country by the establishment of a mint and the creation of a gold coinage. It seems to me that the motion of my hon. friend from British Columbia opens a very wide field of consideration on financial questions, which, I must confess, I do not fully understand myself, and would not undertake to discuss in this House before so many gentlemen who have a thorough training in banking and financial matters. I should have been very much pleased if some of these gentlemen had expressed their opinions on the subject. However, I must say that one of the most important features of our financial system is the issue of Dominion currency. This Dominion currency, it seems to me, if we were to coin gold, would either be largely replaced by that gold coinage, or the coinage itself would be useless. If we had enough gold coinage to make it worth while to establish a mint —which I agree with my hon. friend from Nova Scotia would have to be under the management and control of the Government itself—if there was any amount of coinage, such as would suggest the necessity of establishing a mint, it is plain that it would be a substitute to a large extent for the Dominion currency which is now being issued by the Government, and which, of course, it is an advantage to the Government to have in circulation. There are several momentous questions that turn upon that, it seems to me, which my hon. friend has not discussed, and which I think would require very careful and mature consideration and discussion. He thinks that the coinage of gold in this country would increase the value of gold. I think—and I say it with deference to hon. gentlemen that I see around me and before me who understand financial questions better than I do —that it would have no effect whatever on the value of gold, because that is not determined by any nominal value we might choose to give it in a coinage that we might issue. There would not be enough gold consumed in that coinage to raise the price of gold over the globe, and that is the only way in which the issue of gold coins in this country could raise the price of gold for the benefit of its producers—that is to say, so much of it would be taken out of industrial use and placed in circulation as to raise the price of gold over the face of the earth. Again, I say I am not competent to discuss a question of that description. It appears to me that the answer to the suggestion is plain, that we could not use, and would not require to put in circulation, gold enough to affect the price of gold throughout the world—that is to say, to diminish the supply of the metal for industrial purposes throughout the world. There are other considerations. What is the object of tying up our gold in tokens for circulation, when we issue tokens for circulation which are of equal value, equally useful, more portable, and which do not render entirely useless and unproductive a large quantity of valuable material? Four or five millions of gold coinage would simply render that much material useless and valueless, except as a token in exchange for merchandise or compensation for services. Our Dominion notes suffice for that purpose, and the gold can be used for industrial purposes, for the production of things which are valuable, and in the production of those things a great number of people can be employed and thus add, of course, to the resources of a vast number of persons. As a gold coinage it is no more than buttons or chips. It serves as a conventional equivalent for an equal amount of merchandise, or an equal amount of indebtedness, for which purpose our Dominion notes, which cost nothing more than the production of them, are equally valuable.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—What is the amount of gold required by the Government to be held in the banks at the present time—foreign gold? My proposition was, that the foreign gold should be replaced by gold of our own—gold of Canadian coinage.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend says he wishes to replace foreign gold in our banks by gold of our own. If we get foreign gold and put it in our banks we have to pay for it, and we would have to pay for our own gold. I do not see what advantage is to be gained by the substitution of a coinage of our own for a foreign coinage in the banks, unless, as I said before, the coinage of so much gold would take out of the markets so much gold as to increase the value of gold in the world. Then it would be of use to the miners in British Columbia and Nova Scotia, but unless it does, I cannot myself see what advantage there would be in going to the large expense of establishing a mint for the purpose of coining four or five millions of gold, or more—I do not know exactly how much is held by the banks and by the Government—but whatever the amount may be, it cannot be very enormous, and the expense of establishing a mint would undoubtedly be large, and unless we issue a debased coinage, as the United States did with reference to their silver, every dollar of which is worth really (intrinsically) only 80 cents, I do not see where we could make any profit in coining gold. However, these are only very crude and probably very absurd ideas of mine on the subject. It is one so large and so important that it would require careful discussion and consideration with reference to a great many subjects which my hon. friend has entirely omitted to notice. The subject is one that is peculiarly within the province of the gentleman who has charge of the financial interests of the Dominion, and on which it would be well, if the idea were seriously entertained, that we should have his views at length; and probably the proper source from which we should take this subject for consideration would be from another House, which is peculiary charged with the financial business of the country, and where persons have made that financial business their study, of whose opinions we might avail ourselves, to greater advantage, perhaps, than by discussing the subject in this House, which is not competent to initiate financial matters, and does not usually deal at any length with such matters. I may say that the Government have had the question of the establishment of a mint under their consideration, and that they are decidedly of opinion that it would not be expedient, or in the interests of the country at this moment, to take the step which my hon. friend suggests in his motion. Perhaps my hon. friend would not press the resolution.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I just want to make a remark or two in reply to what has fallen from the leader of the Government. He wishes this House to believe that this matter is really not within our prerogative—that this subject of coinage peculiarly belongs to the other House. I certainly cannot take that view. In the other House, as a general thing, the members are much younger in years and in experience than in the Senate. I believe if there is a body at all competent to deal with a question of this nature it is to be found within these walls. I am sorry that the leader of the Government has taken the view that it is inexpedient to proceed with this motion. However, I feel that I have done my duty and I hope that the hon. gentleman who leads this House so ably will, before another year rolls by, change his views on the subject.

HON. MR. POWER—It is possible that there may be a change of Government.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Possibly; but I think that is scarcely probable in another year. However, as I find that the leader of the Government is opposed to it for the present, I ask permission to withdraw the resolution, but I do not intend to let this matter drop. I shall add to the little knowledge I have on the question, and if I am spared another year I shall re-introduce it in some form, unless the Government in the meantime become converted to my view and adopt it.

The motion was withdrawn.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (32) "An Act to incorporate the Grand Orange Lodge of British America." (Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (72) "An Act respecting the Summerside Bank." (Mr. Howlan.)

VAUDREUIL AND PRESCOTT RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (58) "An Act to change the name of the Vaudreuil and Prescott Railway Company to the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company."

The Bill was read the first time.

HON. MR. LACOSTE moved that the 41st Rule of the House be suspended so far as it relates to this Bill. He said: My reason for making this motion is to expedite the passage of the Bill, the object of which is merely to change the name of the company. The Bill is of very little importance to the public, but very important to the railway company itself. Part of the road is now built, and the company is very anxious to have its debentures issued. I am told that in a few days His Excellency, or the Deputy Governor, will come to sanction some Bills that have already passed this Session, and the promoters of this Bill would like to have it passed, so that it may be sanctioned at that time, and enable them to negotiate their debentures on the London market.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time, under a suspension of the rules.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE LAW OF MARRIAGE BILL.

WITHDRAWN.

The Order of the Day being called—House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (F) "An Act respecting Offences against the Law of Marriage," MACDONALD (B. C.) said: In view of the legislation promised by the Minister of Justice in another place, I ask permission to withdraw this Bill.

The Bill was withdrawn.

LAND SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAY COMPANIES AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (43) "An Act to amend the Act 52nd Victoria, Cap. 4, intituled: 'An Act to authorize the granting of Subsidies in Land to certain Railway Companies.'" He said: this Bill is simply to correct an error in an Act of last Session, in the name of the company to which the land grant was to be given. The subsidy was intended to be given to the Alberta Railway and Coal Company, and the words "North-Western Coal and Navigation Company" were used in error. It arose from the ignorance of the person framing the Bill, of the country through which the railway is to run.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—This is an extraordinary Bill. It gives a large quantity of land to one company when the land grant was intended to be given to another. Here is an Act that has been before the Railway Committees of the two Houses, and before both Houses, and received the sanction of the Governor General; and now, twelve months after its passage, we are called upon to declare that the land grant was not intended to be given to the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company. There must be some shareholders of the former company who have some interest in this land; and yet, without any previous notice or explanation, beyond the explanation we have heard from the leader of the Government, we are asked to convey this land to the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I should like to ask the leader of the Government if I am correct in my knowledge of this matter as Chairman of the Railway Committee. I am under the impression that this Alberta Railway and Coal Company is substantially the same line of railway, and that the company is now acting under a different name. The point is this: whether this is an additional subsidy, or whether it is merely a substitution for a subsidy that was granted last year to another company under a different name.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will perceive, by looking at the Bill, that this is not a new subsidy. Whether these two railway companies are identical as to their incorporation or as to the locality through which they pass I am really not in a position to say; but when the Bill comes before the House in committee I will be in a position to answer the question that my hon. friend raises.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING.

Bill (53) "An Act to amend the Public Stores Act," passed through Committee of the Whole without amendment, and was read the third time, and passed.

NEW BRUNSWICK RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. BOTSFORD moved the second reading of Bill (49) "An Act respecting the New Brunswick Railway Company." He said: This a Bill to authorize this company to issue consolidated debenture stock for the reasons mentioned in the preamble. They have acquired some five railways connected with their line, assuming their liabilities. They ask for power to issue a certain amount of consolidated debenture stock, and provision is made to secure the creditors of those several lines. The mileage of lines under the control of the New Brunswick Railway Company is about 440 miles. The Bill does not interfere in any way with the security which the parties have who hold the debentures of these several railways. Every precaution is taken to protect all private rights and promote the public interest. I may add that the New Brunswick Railway Company has conducted its business in the most regular manner, and in the interests of the part of the country through which its line runs.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 5th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills, reported without amendment from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, were read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (46) "An Act to incorporate the Mount Forest, Markdale and Meaford Railway Company." (Mr. Dever.)

Bill (26) "An Act relating to the Canada Southern Bridge Company." (Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

Bill (25) "An Act respecting the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, Limited." (Mr. Vidal.)

Bill (51) "An Act respecting the Hereford Railway Company." (Mr. Cochrane.)

Bill (59) "An Act to change the name of the Vaudreuil Railway Company to the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company." (Mr. Lacoste.)

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (50) "An Act respecting the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company of Canada," with amendments.

He said: The head office of the company, by the original charter, is at Winnipeg, but the company have been in the habit, having given due notice, of holding meetings there and then adjourning occasionally to one of these three cities that are named in the amendment—that is to say, Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto. But having no power to do so specially by the charter, they desire that this power be given, and by the first of these amendments the power is given, for the reason that a great many of the shareholders of the company live in these cities, Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. Then the company ask that the proceedings which have hitherto taken place be rendered valid. We passed that clause, but validating so far as these proceedings may have been invalidated in consequence of the meetings having been held at other cities than Winnipeg. We were careful in the committee not to have any retroactive legislation, except to the extent I have mentioned. The amendments received the unanimous consent of the committee, and I see no objection to the House adopting them.

HON. MR. PERLEY moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time, and passed.

THE CANADA EASTERN RAILWAY CO'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (48) "An Act respecting the Northern and Western Railway Company of New Brunswick, and to change the name of the company to the Canada Eastern Railway Company," with amendments.

He said: The first of these amendments is to strike out four unnecessary words which were put into the Bill and which would rather tend to make confusion. The second amendment arises in the clause which continues the liability of the new company under the change of name for all the acts of the old company. The Bill, as it came to us from another place, contained no clause preserving the rights of parties under agreements made by the company, and we were asked to do that, and supply the deficiency in the Act as it came from the House of Commons, a not unfrequent occurrence, I am bound to say, with regard to these Bills when they come to us. This is a very important point, and the Bill has been altered so as to protect the interests of the public. There should not be any hesitation in adopting the amendments.

HON. MR. BOTSFORD moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amendment, was read the third time, and passed.

IRRIGATION IN THE NORTH-WEST.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) rose to—

Call the attention of the House to the importance of making preliminary surveys in that part of the North-West Territories lying immediately to the east of the Rocky Mountains, and in the neighborhood of the Cypress Hills and Wood Mountains, with a view to its irrigation; and enquire whether it is the intention of the Government to make such surveys, and also for the purpose of locating artesian wells, for farm and domestic purposes, in districts where they may be required?

He said: I rise to make a few observations on the motion of which I have given notice. There is doubtless a general lack of information in this country respecting the subject of irrigation. This is due to the fact that agricultural pursuits have been successfully carried on without it. We have no regions which can be called arid or come under the designation of arid regions. The subject may therefore be said to be a novel one in this country. It is of course well known that it has been, and is practised in some of the countries of Europe and in India, from the earliest times, and also on this continent, in Mexico, at an early period of its history, and the south-western states of the Union, in Utah some forty or fifty years ago in a primitive sort of way, but it is only within the last ten or fifteen years that any real developments may be said to have taken place.

Irrigation developments within a comparatively recent period have taken place in Australia, and a representative from the colony of Victoria recently paid a visit to the United States for the purpose of investigating their methods. It may be of interest to us also to take a glance at the developments which are now continuously taking place in that country—the United States. They classify their lands as humid, sub-humid, pastoral and arid. The humid are lands on which agriculture can be carried on by means of the natural rainfall. The sub-humid are lands on which production, mainly grazing, can be greatly increased by the help of irrigation. The pastoral are range or ranching lands, on which the nutritious grasses thrive without the help of irrigation, although in some parts it is applied with advantage. The discovery was accidentally made about twenty-five years ago that the nutritious grasses which grow on the plains and foot hills of mountains, which cure so perfectly in the open air and without cultivation, are available for raising cattle, horses and sheep with no care save that of herding. This was how the discovery was made: Late in the fall of 1864 a waggon train hauled by oxen on its way to a military post in Utah was arrested in its progress by a severe snow storm, which compelled the people in charge to go into winter quarters. The oxen were turned loose to die, but instead of perishing, they grew fat during the winter months on the bunch grass, nature's hay, which covered the hills and valleys.

The knowledge of this fact was the beginning of ranching in the Western States, and which has since assumed such gigantic proportions, not only there, but in Canada also.

On the arid lands agriculture cannot be carried on without irrigation. They comprise four-tenths of their whole territory, and it has only been recently discovered that a certain percentage of these lands is susceptible of reclamation by means of irrigation, and that every acre of irrigated land is twice as productive as land depending on the natural rainfalls. This applies, I believe, to about 10 per cent. of this area for crop growing. The remainder, or a large part of it (depending, of course, on the character of the country), is benefited and made available for grazing purposes. Since the importance of this discovery has been realized by the people of the United States, irrigation has made wonderful strides, and there are now said to be twelve thousand miles of irrigation canals in the West; and the capital invested is enormous, and it is wholly due to private enterprise. But, the National Government, realizing how important it is that their irrigation works and developments should be connected with science and skill, has recently, after much discussion, appropriated a quarter of a million of dollars per annum for preliminary surveys of the country requiring irrigation, with a view of the locating of reservoirs and canals. This work has been placed under the charge of Major J. W. Powell, Director of the United States Geological Survey, who has made the subject a special study. The methods, briefly stated, are to impound or conserve the waters of rivers or streams into reservoirs erected to receive them, from which they are directed by means of canals and ditches, and also by flooding to the districts required to be irrigated. Boring for artesian wells are carried on more or less in nearly all the States and Territories, but mainly for farm and domestic uses.

Practically, the United States has disposed of all the lands of any value within the humid regions, that is, lands where crops can be grown advantageously by means of the natural rainfall. The importance and necessity to that country for the reclamation of lands not so situated is manifest. This is in striking contrast with our North-West as regards the position of our fertile lands. The fertile belt of the North-West was described in the deed of surrender made by the Hudson Bay Company, at the time the country was transferred to Canada, as bounded on the south by the international boundary, on the west by the Rocky Mountains, and on the north by the North Saskatchewan, and on the east by Lake Winnipeg, Lake of the Woods and the waters connecting them, but it is now established beyond a doubt that this fertile belt extends an average of 100 miles north of the North Saskatchewan, along its whole length, and that as we proceed westward along the river the fertile agricultural area extends much farther in a northerly direction, reaching the Peace River and the Athabasca valleys, as the mountains are approached, an area sufficient to support a farming and pastoral population of more than double the present population of old Canada. It contains within it no less than 270 millions acres of land susceptible of cultivation, and with a propitious climate. In all this vast domain there are no arid lands, and there is but a comparatively small area of sub-humid lands, lying immediately to the east of the Rocky Mountains and the neighborhood of the Cypress Hills and Wood Mountains, and nature seems to have fitted this portion of the country for economical irrigation.

Practically, the greater part of these fertile lands are yet to be disposed of, and in no other country on this continent is there such an inviting field for immigration. The climate is healthy, and it would be difficult to find a country where the soil is so uniformly fertile. The immigrant will find himself settled in a country where the laws enacted by the will of the people are administered with justice and fairness, where there is perfect freedom with security to life and property. The question may be asked, and is frequently asked, why our North-West is not filling up more rapidly. We have been probably too sanguine in our expectations, and have overlooked the fact that it takes time to fill up a country as large as Russia in Europe. Experience teaches that the settlement of all new countries is slow in the beginning and their early years. I might instance Dakota, of which we have heard so much: it contains an area of prairie lands resembling our own, but in extent is a flea-bite compared with ours. In 1870 it had only a population of 14,000, and for many succeeding years settlement was very slow, until the fertility of its soil had been demonstrated by the growth of abundant harvests. It will doubtless be the same in our North-West, where the soil is equally fertile, and the climatic conditions more favorable. I recently made two visits to the North-West. My first visit was during the harvest time, and although the season had been an abnormaly dry one, the yield and quality of the crops were surprisingly good. The fertility of the soil largely compensated for the usual moisture, the quality of the wheat could not be surpassed, if equalled, in any part of the world. The cattle and horses roaming over the prairies and feeding on the nutritious bunch grass were in the most perfect condition, requiring no care except that of herding. At Regina, I visited several farmers, among them Mr. McIntyre, who came from Ontario and owns a farm of 2,000 acres. Mrs. McIntyre, when offering me a glass of milk, informed me that she could get as much milk and butter from five cows as she could from eight in Ontario. This statement was corroborated everywhere. Artesian wells are necessary for farm and domestic purposes, and will doubtless prove to be of great service to the present settlers in districts where they are required, and will also tend to promote the settlement of the country. The early settlers, as a rule, cannot afford the expense of boring, especially where great depths have to be reached to find water. I wrote to Dr. Selwyn, the Director of the Geological Survey, and I have his reply here:

"OTTAWA, 6th Feb., 1890.

"DEAR SIR,—I have received your note of the 4th instant. Yesterday I called on you at the Senate, but found you had left town. I, however, left a pamphlet for you with Mr. Creighton, in which I think you will find much of the information you seek. I visited the Dakota wells last summer, or at least some of them, and what I learned induced me to recommend the Government to assist the Deloraine people to continue the well there to a depth not less than that at which the great water-bearing stratum has been struck in the wells to the south, viz., about 1,800 feet. I have no official report on the Dakota wells, but nearly the same geological structure prevails through Kansas, Nebraska and Dakota, into Canada.

"I am, dear Sir,
"Yours faithfully,
"ALFRED R. C. SELWYN."

By means of geological science the location where water is to be found can be accurately indicated. Hon. gentlemen have no doubt read of the renowned application of geological science in France over fifty years ago. If I am not trespassing too much on the patience of the House I will read a short account of it:

"Renowned application of geological science: Arago's prediction of a store of pure potable water in the deep dipping green sand stratum beneath the city of Paris was one of the most brilliant applications of geological science to useful purposes. He felt keenly that a multitude of his fellow citizens were suffering general physical deterioration for want of wholesome water, for which the splendors of the magnificent capital were no antidote. With a foresight and energy such as display that kind of genius that Cicero believed to be in some degree inspired, he prevailed on the Public Minister to inaugurate in the year 1833 that notable deep subterranean exploration at Grenelle. By his eloquent persuasion he maintained and defended the enterprise, notwithstanding the eight years of labor, to a successful issue, were beset with discouragements; and all manners of sarcasms were showered on the promoters. In February, 1844, the auger, cutting an 8 inch bore, reached a depth of 1,806 feet 9 inches, when it suddenly fell 18 inches, and whizzing now announced that a stream of water was rising and the well overflowed."

It appears to me to be the fitting work of the Government to help the settlers, and also to promote settlement, to make these borings for artesians wells, not for irrigation purposes, but for farm and domestic use. The irrigation of the district to which I have alluded should be left to private enterprise and individual effort, the surveys to be placed under the charge of a competent scientific officer. Grants of land might be made in the same way as is done for railways. The American Government and our own Government also seem to regard the public lands, not so much as a source of revenue, but a public trust, with the object steadily in view of transferring them to actual settlers at the lowest possible cost. I trust that what I have so far stated will convey to the hon. gentlemen who have not had the good fortune to visit it some idea of the vastness of the country and its capabilities. But beside this great domain of agricultural and pastoral lands to the east of the Rocky Mountains our possessions extend westward to the Pacific Ocean, including the Rocky Mountains, British Columbia and the Island of Vancouver. The mountains are known to contain rich deposits of the precious metals, and in the valleys or glens between mountain ranges there are arable plains, which can be easily irrigated, where required, by the mountain streams, on which grain and vegetables can be grown. The foot-hills of the mountains are covered with a nutritious bunch grass, furnishing food for domestic animals. The wants of the mining population are thus provided for. I myself passed through these mountains—a distance of three hundred miles—from Gold, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, to Kootenay, in Idaho, on the Northern Pacific. I have seen what I am endeavoring to describe. British Columbia and the Island of Vancouver are well known to contain valuable forests, coal mines, and a considerable area of agricultural pastoral lands. Before taking my seat, I cannot help alluding to the rocky and inhospitable region to the north of Lake Superior, which was believed to offer insurmountable difficulties to the construction and operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I confess to having been one of the doubters; and it is a remarkable commentary on our own foreboding that it is the only transcontinental line which has not been blocked by snow. It shows how mistaken we were; and these rugged regions of rock and stone are found to abound in rich mines of silver, copper, nickel and iron. I dislike exaggeration, or even the appearance of it, but is it possible to exaggerate the value of this great heritage wich is ours?

HON. MR. DICKEY—Before the leader of the House answers this enquiry I desire to say that I have listened with pleasure and interest to the statement which has just been made by my hon. friend on this important subject. I would not now trouble the House, even for a few minutes, were it not that this discussion revives an interesting reminiscence, on my part, of a curious fact in natural history which came to my notice on the first of my three visits to the North-West Territories, about eight years ago, which relates to a subject which has formed part of the discussion on this occasion. Many hon. gentlemen from the Eastern Provinces are scarcely aware—I certainly was not until I visited the North-West—of the great difference in the nutritive qualities of the prairie grasses of the North-West and the grasses of our rich alluvial marshes in the Eastern Provinces. It is a curious fact that in chemical constitutents I believe there is scarcely any difference between the prairie soil, which is simply an alluvial deposit, and the soil of the great marshes which has been formed from the deposits that are carried backward and forward by the tides in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The difference in the grasses grown on the two soils is this: in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick when the hay is cut from the marshes it has to be "cured," as it is called; and if it were not cured in that way, once it has been exposed to the frost and snow of the winter it contains no more nutriment than so many shavings cut from a stick of wood. But in the great North-West I found to my surprise all those grasses, though frozen and covered with snow during the winter, came out in the spring with all their nutritive qualities perfectly preserved. This is the reason why cattle and horses are enabled to live and fatten upon the prairie grasses even in the coldest winter, and they can do so until the spring has come again. I recollect taking the trouble to bring a bundle of this grass with me, after it had been frozen, to Nova Scotia, and showing it to a friend there as one of the remarkable things from the North-West, and I asked him to test it. On doing so he was perfectly surprised, being accustomed to our native grasses, which we, in our innocence, thought the finest in the world, and which under similar treatment have been a comparatively hard and indigestible fodder, to find that it was perfectly full of nutriment and had the taste of fresh grass. I hope my hon. friend's remarks may find their way abroad to other countries, and that they will have a beneficial effect on the immigration to this country. I thought it might possibly add to their usefulness if I made this statement, because the fact which I have stated will have an important bearing on the future of that great country, for it is a well known fact that these prairie grasses continue from one end of the year to the other to be in a nutritious condition.

With regard to the subject of artesian wells, which my hon. friend has touched upon, I think there is also a great possibility there for the improvement of the country, for the obvious reason that on the east of this great plateau of low ground, eight hundred miles wide, you have the height of land, as it is called, at the termination of the Laurentian range; and on the west you have these enormous ridges, the back-bone of the continent—the Rockys and the Selkirks—forming immense natural reservoirs of water; and I have no doubt that the effect of artesian borings in that part of the great country between Winnipeg and Calgary will yet be found to develop springs which have their source in those immense reservoirs, which of themselves are nearly as large as the whole of England. Under these circumstances, I think that my hon. friend has performed an important duty in calling the attention of the House, and of the Government, to this matter, and the Government would do a great work for that country if they adopt his suggestion and see whether, for irrigation or domestic purposes, it is not quite within possibility that we may be able to get an abundant water supply in the dryest parts of the prairies. If secured it will be something that, I think, the Government may be proud of, and will place us all under a deep debt of gratitude to my hon. friend.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I do not agree with the conclusions or remarks of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, and doubt whether the Government will find it necessary that this expenditure of money should be made. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Burlington, who has, to some extent, provided an antidote for the proposition he has placed before us, because I agree with my hon. friend in what he has stated about the vast agricultural resources, and capabilities, and natural wealth of our North-West country. I hope that his remarks will be published, not only throughout Canada, but in other countries as well, as they will no doubt be an inducement to emigrants to go and settle in the North-West country. I must say, when I saw, a few days ago, this notice on the Paper calling the attention of the Government and of the House to this question, and asking the Government to provide for these surveys, I asked myself the question: Is this the land flowing with milk and honey, the country that we believe it is? Is this the country possessing the rich virgin soil which we all believe it has, or is it an arid country, so dry and barren that we are obliged to resort to the means which are adopted only in tropical climates? I say, with such a notice before me, I do not believe a greater libel could be cast upon our fair virgin soil in the North-West than that contains.

HON. MR. POWER—Hear, hear; and by a good Tory, too.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Had this notice come from a gentleman from the North-West, acquainted with the characteristics of the country and the necessity there may be for irrigation, canals and reservoirs, I would suppose that there was something in it, but when it comes from an hon. gentleman who does not reside there, and who has probably not more knowledge of the country than I possess myself, I must confess that I continue to believe that the North-West is not of that sterile character which requires the Government to spend large sums of money to irrigate it and prepare it for settlement. I believe there is no part of the United States so well provided with water or has such natural advantages as are to be found in the Canadian North-West. I agree with my hon. friend that probably four-tenths of the unsettled territory of the United States is of an arid character, and requires all these appliances advocated by my hon. friend for the North-West in order to bring it to its full development and enable it to produce crops; but I contend that in our prairie country there is no necessity for anything of that kind, and I look at the proposition in this notice as being entirely out of place. It suggests:

"The importance of making preliminary surveys in the North-West, with the view of locating reservoirs for water, to be obtained by means of artesian wells, and by conserving the waters of rivers and streams, for the irrigation of districts which suffer from drought in dry seasons; and will enquire whether it is the intention of the Government to make much surveys?"

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—You have got the wrong notice.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Then my hon. friend has changed the notice.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I gave notice to the House that I would do so.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Then the hon. gentleman has only done it within the last day or two. The position he takes now is that the country is of such a nature that it requires irrigation only in certain localities. I notice now that it reads:

"That he will call the attention of the House to the importance of making preliminary surveys in that part of the North-West Territories lying immediately to the east of the Rocky Mountains, and in the neighborhood of the Cypress Hills and Wood Mountains, with a view to its irrigation; and will enquire whether it is the intention of the Government to make such surveys, and also for the purpose of locating artesian wells, for farm and domestic purposes, in districts where they may be required."

I am glad to find, from this amended notice, that instead of making irrigation necessary for all the North-West, he confines it to the Cypress Hills and the Wood Mountains. Still, he wants to go further than he has done in the original notice—to provide artesian wells for farm and domestic purposes. I do not think our country needs anything of the kind. We have plenty of productive virgin soil still throughout the North-West, and plenty of places for people to go and settle where there is sufficient moisture naturally, without requiring irrigation, to produce crops. My hon. friend may have an interest himself in some part of the country which is not of that character. If so, it is unfortunate for him; but I do not believe that he himself declares that irrigation is necessary, except for small portions of the country. The inclemency of the climate there has been spoken of as a drawback to settlement. I have been asked myself, more than once, how about our winters, and I have always endeavored to convince people that our winter was one of the great advantages of our country. The severe frosts of the winter stores in the soil a large amount of moisture in the shape of ice, which is brought to the surface at the time it is most required to promote vegetation, and especially the wheat crop.

That was my impression, that it was largely of that character; that unlike the conditions in warm climates, these crops were sustained by a regular supply of moisture that was permanently in the soil. I say it is a wise provision of nature. In the United States it may be necessary, in some parts of the country, to have artesian wells and reservoirs and great "bores" to maintain a supply of water, but I do not think our House should be bored with anything of this kind. The resources of the country are sufficiently "bored" already, without calling upon the Government to make this lavish expenditure for a purpose which I believe is wholly unnecessary. There is no country in the world with such a fertile virgin soil as we have. For growing crops of all kinds the soil of the North-West naturally surpasses that of any other country in the world, without any of those artificial means for promoting the growth of vegetation. Kind nature has provided everything for settlers to make themselves prosperous and happy in almost any part of the North-West. Surely this libel on the North-West, which the hon. gentleman from Burlington has, I am sure, unintentionally, put upon the Paper, and the remarks with which he has supported it, do not justify or sustain the Government in incurring the expense of making this survey. Before I take my seat I wish to quote a remark of a friend of mine, a descendant of one of the oldest families in the country from which I come, the Rev. Leonard Gaetz, who was before the Colonization Committee of the House of Commons the other day. He said that in North Alberta he has never heard, even from the oldest settlers in that country, of any necessity for irrigation there. The soil has sufficient moisture to nourish and produce luxurious grass and grain crops. My hon. friend himself has admitted to-day that while he was in that country last year, even though it was an abnormally dry season, he found there was an average crop of grain. If that is the case in the North-West in an abnormally dry season, there is no necessity for irrigation under ordinary circumstances. There is no doubt that in the United States, where the desirable agricultural lands are all taken up, there is a necessity for reclaiming their arid lands to make them attractive for settlement by means of irrigation. Canada is now about the only place left on the continent in which people can make a choice of rich, cultivable soil which they can cultivate with a prospect of success. I hope the Government will not entertain this motion. I do not believe that the present position of the country warrants the Government incurring such an expenditure as this motion would require, to make reservoirs and artesian wells.

HON. MR. PERLEY—Being a resident of that country to which this motion refers, it may not appear amiss if I should say a word or two on the subject. When I made up my mind to leave my native home in New Brunswick and go to the North-West, I naturally made some inquiries about the prairie country, and I may say that I had no favorable report given to me of it at all. A man who had been all over that country said that I could not raise potatoes there bigger than marbles, on account of the frost. However, I went out there, and it was only after mature consideration. I may say that from the start I took particular pains to look into and examine the different characteristics of that country. When I made up my mind to settle in the country I commenced to make a study of it, and I have discovered that the country is different from what it had been represented to me to be, and it is not without some cause that this motion has been made by my hon. friend from Burlington. I went to the North-West, where I now live, in the spring of 1883, and I found on the way there, and all through the prairies, there were large ponds of water in every low place. Any man in that country who had a dry section boasted of it. The paths wound about ponds and sloughs of water. You could not get a straight road on account of them. Certainly there was no scarcity of water in that country in 1883. Hay was abundant, the pastures were luxuriant and the cattle did remarkably well everywhere. I also discovered that in the spring we had heavy frosts. The first morning in June, when I got up, I found the water frozen in the wash dish at the door. It made me timid, and I thought that what the man had said about the country was only too true. However, I watched carefully. I got up night after night, betwen 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning, to see if there were any frosts, and I discovered that these spring frosts did not hurt the grain. I never saw anything grow like the crops did. We grow the largest and best potatoes I have ever seen in any country, and I was a farmer for several years in New Brunswick, besides having been raised on a farm before starting farming for myself. With regard to the prairie grass, I may say also that I discovered from the start that it was the best grass I had ever seen for fattening animals. I used to live in the garden of New Brunswick, and I never saw grass that cattle would thrive and fatten on, or grass on which cattle would give so much milk, as our own prairie grass. It astonished me beyond measure, and I enquired the cause of it, because the grass itself is poor looking trash. To see it growing you would not put much value on it, or think of comparing it with our English grass in eastern Canada. The slough grass is just such hay as I used to throw out in the barn-yard for bedding. That grass can be cut anywhere, even in water knee-deep, and it is better hay than the best English hay I have cut on my farm in New Brunswick. It will make more beef; it will keep horses in finer condition, and will feed animals better than any hay I have ever seen. I know that from my own personal experience. I have discovered the reason why this prairie grass is so nutritious in the spring, and in fact all the year round. It cures all the year round. That is the grass that grows on the arable land, which cures before the frost of September comes. It is then much better than ordinary hay, because it has a green pith at the bottom of it. To illustrate the quality of this grass, I may mention that I have three horses that have been living out all through the winter, though the snow is 2 or 3 feet deep on the plains. These horses worked hard until the 26th October, when I turned out two of them. After they had been out a fortnight I took one of them in and put out the other, and then after a fortnight I turned out the three of them, and they have not had either hay or grain this winter, yet they are as fat as seals. That I know of my own personal knowledge, because before I left home I went to see the horses and found them in good condition, and my son writes me that they are still thriving. Moreover, my neighbors keep their horses in the same way—they feed on the grass. It grows like hay, with this advantage, as I have said before, that there is a green pith to it that is sappy and nutritious. Until the snow comes in December, or whenever it falls, the cattle live on that dry grass better than they could on hay. My cows, that we milked all summer, and some of which I took from Ontario this spring, that were eight days on the road and got very poor, have fattened up and have done first rate. The moment the snow begins to disappear in the spring—and that was what drew my attention to it first in 1883—it is difficult to get the cattle home at night. The moment a knoll the size of this chamber became bare the cattle went to it for feed. The grass preserves its nutritious qualities through the winter, and the moment the cattle can get to it in the spring they feed on it. I will now speak about the frosts. In the summer of 1883 the frost came the night of the 7th September, and did the damage. In 1884 the frost came on the night of the 6th September. I was keeping a diary in those years, and watched these matters carefully, because I was deeply interested in the subject. In 1885 the frost came on the night of the 22nd August, yet we had two bushels of wheat that year for the one we had the two preceding years, notwithstanding the fact that the frost came earlier. The reason of that is clear to me. Any farmer coming to that country—I do not care how good a farmer he may have been in Ontario—knows as little about the system to be adopted in the cultivation of that prairie country as if he had never held a plough or reaped a crop. They know how to plough, drive horses and harvest grain, but still they do not understand the peculiar character of the country, and do not know how to cultivate the soil properly. They came there with their sulky ploughs and expected, by ploughing 2 inches deep, to raise a crop and make money. In the fall, when the frost came, they went home to Ontario and returned in the spring late, because they did not seem to know that the spring sets in earlier there than it does in the Eastern Provinces. Then they harrowed the land they had ploughed in the fall. They found that the roots of the grass were so matted together and so tough that you could hitch a mass of them as long as this building on the harrow and drag it about. To harrow land ploughed as that had been so as to get the soil into condition to cover the seed took six harrowings, and then half the grain remained on top of the ground. The consequence was, that when the warm weather came the land soon dried out, so that there was not vegetation until the June rain came. The result was, that before the grain could ripen, in consequence of this late start, it was caught by the frost. Experience has taught farmers in that country to summer fallow entirely—that is to say, they will prepare 50 or 100 acres of land and after they have got that seeded they will plough for next year. That land works up into a good, deep seed bed, and in the spring, after the snow disappears and the surface of the ground thaws to a depth of 2 or 3 inches, you can put on your seeder. I never saw a country like it for growing crops. You do not have to wait until the frost is out of the ground. You just sow the grain, and the frost underneath it, instead of injuring the crop, keeps the grain growing as the frost thaws, and even though we have no rainfalls the grain keeps on growing. The result of adapting our system of farming to the character of the country is that even last year, dry as it was, the farmers raised a great deal of wheat. They put the wheat on the land that had been summer fallowed, and the oats and barley on the spring-ploughed land, and the result was that while the latter crops were very light, there were good crops of wheat—I mean fairly good, under the circumstances. Now, the farmers are getting into the habit of cultivating the soil in that way. It has taken them quite a while to get that experience, but they have learned the proper system now, and there is no doubt that they will make more rapid progress in the future than they made in the past. Every farmer going into that country had the idea that he would get rich by raising grain. I discovered very soon that that was wrong, and I told them on one occasion, when somebody had advised them to keep only one cow and tether her in a slough, and feed her on straw or at the hay stack, that it was the worst advice that could be given to the people. I said: "Sell your horses and get cows. The frost will not kill them, and you will have more products, and a greater variety of them, to sell, that cannot be affected by summer frosts." The farmers are getting into that system, and those who commenced that way and followed that system from the start are comfortable now, and are making as good a living as any farmers in Canada to-day. I could name plenty of farmers around my own town who have done well by following that system. For the first three years that I was in that country, 1883-84-85, there was sufficient rainfall, and if the land had been in readiness for the seed in the spring, as it is now under a better system of farming, there would have been marvellous crops for those three seasons. The straw grew first rate—there was an immense burden of straw, and everything was all right, but the frost, even at a late period, destroyed the grain, so that it was unmarketable. It would not pay to take it from the country and it was a burden on the farmers' hands. They never got a market for any of it until the spring of 1885, when the demand created by the Rebellion enabled them to sell a portion of it. In 1866 we had a dry year, the dryest that I have ever seen, except last year. The year 1887 was a fair one, and 1888 was an immense year. I never saw it rain so much in New Brunswick as it did in the North-West that summer. There was as much rain as the country required, and we had good crops of grain and hay everywhere. In those dry years that I have spoken about, the sloughs dried up. Places where there had been ponds when I went into the country, they are cutting hay on now. You bore down where those sloughs have dried up, and the land is so hard that you could run a railway train over it, and you would not find an impression after taking off the sod, so hard is the subsoil. I have known a farmer to dig a well 108 feet deep without getting water. The same man dug two wells, and was quite disgusted at his failure. He had to pay $2 a day for the use of the machine, and board the man. He dug two wells without succeeding in getting water, and then commenced to dig a little piece off, and got water. The water does not percolate through the soil, it is so hard. This resolution of my hon. friend does not go far enough. He confines himself to a portion of that country where there are no people. My idea would be to confine himself to that part of the country where there are people—that is, eastern and western Assiniboia. We find great difficulty in getting water there. We do not require it for irrigation purposes, for five out of seven years there has been an abundance of rain. Everything grows well, but we require water for our cattle and for domestic purposes. We have the Qu'Appelle River north of the railway, and we have the Souris River south towards the boundary, and running into each of these rivers there are brooks such as you have in eastern Canada—or rather they are brooks in the spring of the year when the snow is going off. It is a great level prairie country, but everybody will concede this fact, that a prairie country, where there is no forest, is a dry country, because there is no protection, no mulch by the trees to keep the water on the land. It is very hot in the summer time, and naturally the moisture dries out of the soil. The snow drifts into the ravines in the winter season and in the spring of the year it melts away and runs off towards the ocean. It is hardly to be expected that the farmers of that country will undertake any extensive work, but if the Government would grant a sum of money to build dams to make reservoirs in those ravines, and retain the water, it would be of use in dry years and would largely help the settlement of that country. It would be a benefit to the settlers in watering their cattle, besides being useful for domestic purposes. At present the farmers have frequently to haul water three or four miles in dry seasons. Many of them have dug three and four wells without finding water, though it might be procurable if they only knew the right place to dig for it. After living eight years in that country I have more faith in it to-day than I ever had before. It is bound to become—I do not care who says no—the greatest country in the world, because it has the resources in the soil to make it that. All that is necessary is that the people learn how to work it, and they are beginning to understand the proper system now, so that in the near future you may be sure it will develop into a great country. I had a contract a few years ago to supply beef to the Indian Department—it was in that dry year, 1886. I had undertaken to fatten old oxen in New Brunswick and almost lost money on them, but in the North-West I have seen cattle feed on straw or hay in the winter time and fatten without any other feed. I have bought steers and oxen, and they were in better condition than I have been able to fatten them on the best hay and roots and mill feed that I could procure for them in the east. They get as fat as you can desire to have them in that country on the grass alone. I have bought two steers that weighed 785 lbs. apiece at two years and five months, a three-year-old that weighed 630 lbs., while yearlings commonly weigh from 400 to 500 lbs. That is the sort of country we have in the North-West. No man thinks of feeding a steer anything but grass. You can get a steer anywhere you like in the country and he is ready for the knife; there is no such thing as having to fatten cattle in the North-West, because they are always fat. The grass in the wet places is not so good. It is just like your hay in eastern Canada after it gets a certain age because the frost kills it; but on the arable lands, the broad prairies, the grass is good at any time of the year when the cattle can get at it. In the sloughs the frost takes the substance out of it. I think it is very desirable that the Government should appropriate a sum of money and make some effort to get a water supply for the people in that country in the dry years. It is a serious disappointment to the settler to have to be without water at any time of the year. I know people who have had to go four miles for water this year. They are satisfied with the country, but disappointed, after digging for water, not to be able to get it. It takes money to build a dam, though some of the people built dams last year; but a great many are not able to do so, and any assistance that the Government could give to supply water that way would be a great benefit to the North-West and to the whole country, because as the North-West prospers so will the Dominion prosper. I wish the hon. genleman therefore would add Assiniboia to his list, because in the section that he refers to there are no people, except those who are engaged in ranching. Down at Wood Mountain, where there are some half-breeds, there is plenty of water, but out West there are no people, and his inquiry is not as applicable to that section as to the country I have been speaking of.

HON. MR. POWER—I desire to express my surprise that the hon. gentleman who brought this question before the House should have done so in the way he did. Of course, as the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg remarked, a portion of the speech of the hon. gentleman from Burlington would serve as an antidote to the poison contained in his notice; but unfortunately this notice, in one form or another, has been on the paper several weeks; and in its original form it was calculated to leave the impression on the mind of any person not as well informed as the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg or the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia that all through our North-West Territories people could not live, unless they were furnished with water by artificial means. I think that is a most unfortunate circumstance; and I am pleased, as a humble representative of the Liberal party, to think that notice has not been given to the world by a member of the party to which I belong. If it had been given by a member of the Liberal party I have no doubt the hon. gentleman would have been one of the very first to denounce the unpatriotic conduct of that party and to state that it was in keeping with their conduct through a long series of years. I must say this for the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, that he is always consistently patriotic. He has always maintained that Canada was the finest country in the world, that her hills and her people—no, I shall not say her people, but her hills, at any rate, were the greenest, her soil the best, and her crops the biggest in the world; and the hon. gentleman is consistent with himself. He says, and he says truly, that our North-West is one of the finest countries in the world, and that it is not necessary that those works should be undertaken in order to enable people to live there. The hon. gentleman from Assiniboia confirmed the statements made by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg to a very considerable extent; but I was rather surprised to hear from him that the ground was so hard out West that one could run a locomotive over it without breaking through the crust.

HON. MR. BOTSFORD—The sub-soil, he said.

HON. MR. POWER—I understood that the hard soil was very close to the surface. One good effect the inquiry of the hon. gentleman from Burlington has had is, that it has given the House the very valuable information communicated by the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia. I feel this way about the matter: that there are several millions of acres of good arable land in the North-West, land which calls for settlers, which is ready for settlers to-day; and I think our wisest plan is to let the settlers come in and settle on the land which is fit for cultivation; and when that land is exhausted, or nearly so, then it will be time enough to spend money to fit by artificial means lands for settlement. We should not resort to artificial means until they become necessary; and I hope the hon. gentleman from Burlington, if he will excuse me for saying so, will be more cautious in the future how he gives notices like this, which are calculated to damage the character of Canada all over the world. I do not mean to say, as I presume would have been said if this notice had been given by myself, that he is in league with the enemies of our country or acting in the interest of Yankee speculators, with a view of deterring people from settling in the North-West. I do not think the hon. gentleman intended to do anything of that kind; but the wording of his notice is calculated to have that effect. I hope that the Government, who are truly patriotic, if the hon. gentleman from Burlington is mistaken in his ideas of patriotism, will show their patriotism by declaring that our North-West is nothing of the sort indicated by his inquiry, and that they do not propose to spend money where it is not needed.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is really gratifying to see my hon. friend taking such interest in the character of our country. I must say, however, for him, to do him justice, that he has not usually been one of those who decry it, and I take his remarks to be what one might familiarly call poking a little fun at my hon. friend behind me, rather than sneering in any respect at the country, or as invoking what he thinks he finds in my hon. friend's notice as evidence that the country is not as good as those who live there think it is. I do not see in my hon. friend's notice anything so depreciatory of the country as my hon. friends from Lunenburg and Halifax find, and his speech certainly made perfectly clear anything that might be considered ambiguous in the notice itself. In the first notice that he gave he said that he would :

"Call the attention of the House to the importance of making preliminary surveys in the North-West, with the view of locating reservoirs for water, to be obtained by means of artesian wells, and by conserving the waters of rivers and streams, for the irrigation of districts which suffer from drought in dry seasons; and will enquire whether it is the intention of the Government to make such surveys ?"

Now, this is not an imputation on the North-West generally. My hon. friend indicates by this that he thinks there are sections of the country which suffer from drought in dry seasons, and we do not deny that there are. My hon. friend from Assiniboia, who spoke so ably and forcibly from personal knowledge of the country, does not deny that there are sections which do suffer in dry seasons from drought, so I do not see anything so very injurious to the character of the country in asserting what we all know, that there is a section of the extreme North-West where they do occasionally suffer from want of sufficient water. The modified notice which my hon. friend put on the Paper, after consideration of the first, was still more precise ; because while he spoke only of surveys in the North-West, he did not speak of surveys all over the North-West. In this he specifies the portion of the North-West where he thinks a survey might be of use. I must say, however, that the whole discussion has been an instructive one. We have learned from the speech of the hon. member from Burlington the extent to which he thinks this irrigation might be required, and we find it to be very small and modified indeed. That impression is fully confirmed by my hon. friend from the North-West, who spoke on the same subject, and we have had a deal of valuable information from all who have dealt with the subject. The answer which I have to give to my hon. friend is, that the irrigation of the territory referred to could only be attained either by utilizing the surplus water of the streams having their sources in the Rocky Mountains, or by artesian wells. The former method has been the subject of a good deal of attention at the hands of the hon. Minister who was himself an engineer of many years experience in British Columbia, where irrigation on a limited scale has been tried upon the same class of lands with some success. He has not only considered this question himself, but he has consulted with the officers of his Department, from whom he has received valuable reports and suggestions. After full inquiry and examination, some scheme for utilizing the waters of the streams referred to and applying them to adjacent lands by a well-planned system, supplementing the rainfall, may be adopted, if found of sufficient advantage to warrant the expense. The rainfall, however, is usually quite sufficient, and the exceptions to this rule are so few that the consideration of the question of irrigation in relation to this section of the country becomes desirable chiefly because the natural facilities for applying the system are so great that it would cost very little. Indeed, the chief use of irrigation in that region would be as an aid in growing hay.

As to artesian wells, they would be needed, if at all, in the prairie country lying east of the mountains. But it must be remembered that in average years the rainfall is sufficient for the requirements of ordinary agriculture. There are seasons, like that of 1889, when portions of the country suffer from drought ; but even in those portions deep and thorough cultivation produced an average crop of wheat last season. But dry seasons are the exception, not the rule ; and in relation to the agricultural regions, where there is occasional drought, the Government have authorized a considerable sum of money, under the supervision of the Director of the Geological Survey, with the object of discovering whether there is a considerable artesian basin from which a supply of water could be depended upon for the ordinary purposes of the farm, and specially for stock-watering in any year. When these tests have been made the Government will consider how and to what extent the water supply can be utilized.

TORONTO SAVINGS BANK AND CHARITABLE TRUST CO.

MOTION.

HON. MR. MCKINDSEY, in the absence of HON. MR. SULLIVAN, moved that the fees, less the printing and other necessary expenses incurred, be remitted to the Toronto Savings Bank and Charitable Trust Company.

HON. MR. POWER—I should like to know from the hon. gentleman if this is really a charitable institution. A private savings bank is not necessarily a charitable association, and the fact that the word "charitable" appears in the name may only mean that this company is empowered to hold the funds of charitable trusts. Of course, if it is a charitable institution the motion is unobjectionable.

HON. MR. MCKINDSEY—I was informed that it was a savings bank in connection with a church.

The motion was agreed to.

OTTAWA, MORRISBURG AND NEW YORK RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté) moved that the amendments made by the Committee on Railway, Telegraphs and Harbors to Bill (28) "An Act to incorporate the Ottawa, Morrisburg and New York Railway Company," be concurred in. He said: These amendments are all in connection with the Ottawa bridge. In the Bill they ask for power to bridge the Ottawa, but as another company is about receiving a charter for the same purpose, it was thought best to eliminate that part from the Bill, and all these amendments are to have that effect. The chairman of the Railway Commmittee will correct me if that is not the full object of the amendments.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Yes; that is.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. READ moved that the Bill be now read the third time.

HON. MR. VIDAL moved that section 18 be amended by adding thereto a clause in the words following, viz.:

"It shall be the duty of the directors of the company, out of the first issue of bonds, debentures or other securities on the said railway, to transfer and pay over fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000) thereof to the then surviving directors of the present board of the Ottawa, Waddington and New York Railway and Bridge Company, to be by them applied pro rata in payment of the present liabilities of the latter company."

He said: I take it for granted that hon. members in this House concur in the view which I entertain with respect to our functions, that one of the most important of the functions allotted to this Senate is the revision of legislation of the other House, which may be so influenced there by party spirit or by any other improper motive as to be considered by us hurtful to the general interests of the community, or as affecting injuriously existing rights. Now, in my opinion the Bill before us does this; therefore, I think it is a matter which should receive the very serious consideration of this House, and should not be adopted without looking carefully into it and seeing if we are not called upon to protect vested rights which are jeopardized by the Bill as it stands. I would beg to remind the House that on two separate occasions our Railway Committee have already protected those vested rights. They have recognized their existence, and on account of those vested rights have twice rejected the very Bill which is now before us for adoption. Surely then we ought to consider whether there is not the same reason why the House ought to take into consideration those vested rights, when its committee, with witnesses before it, looking carefully into all the details, weighing all the evidence which has been submitted, has twice come to the conclusion that those vested rights should be protected by refusing to pass a Bill like the present. It is quite true that the committee has now changed its opinion, not upon those vested rights, I take it, but rather upon this question, that sufficient time has been given to the original company to have commenced operations, and to have gone on with their work; that they have not done so, and that, therefore, the public interests require that permission to build this road shall be given to this new company. I take it for granted that this is the reason which influenced the committee in reporting this Bill. If that is the case—if the public interest is to be served by granting this charter to this new company, surely if vested rights are affected by it—if the old company have expended money and undertaken a vast amount of work, and the benefit of this work and the benefit of their expenditure is to be taken advantage of by the new company, the old company ought to have some compensation for it. That such a claim exists is, I think, very fairly indicated, even by the action of the gentleman himself, who is the promoter of the Bill, and chief promoter, in fact, of the new company, to incorporate which this Bill is now before us. I have before me, in his own handwriting, a proposition made by him to capitalists when he was president of the old company. In that proposition he states clearly and distinctly a sum which I venture to suggest here as the amount which in all fairness ought to be given by those capitalists who are willing to sign the charter to enable them to build the road should pay as compensation for claims under the old charter. So, in fixing this amount, I am guided really by Dr. Hickey's own estimate of it. He made it a first condition with the capitalists proposing to build the road——

HON. MR. McMILLAN — When was that?

HON. MR. VIDAL—In 1886. He said: "We must have $15,000, payable to the order of our president, Charles C. Hickey, to pay or settle with directors and pay other honorable engagements, all of which will be accounted for." Now, that is his own statement four years ago, and I may remark that during the four years that have elapsed the old directors have undertaken more work, and have increased rather than diminished the liabilities which he freely and frankly admitted had been incurred up to that time. Then, further on, I find that this was not the only compensation which he contemplated, and which he thought was fair and just to ask from the capitalists who proposed to build the road. Further on he required that $50,000 should be deposited with the chartered company as a guarantee that the road would be gone on with, and if there was a failure to do so that this $50,000 should be forfeited to Mr. Hickey and the other gentlemen connected with him. I find a little further on that a still further compensation, thought by him and others to be just and fair, was that in the event of this being done they should have "a liberal bonus in bonds of the first issue, or cash, for the seven promoters of the road for later expenses and good will." A good bonus in bonds! I am not paying any attention to that: I am not asking for anything more than he himself fixed as a sum to which he contends he had a just claim in 1886. I cannot conceive it possible that that hon. gentleman will say that this should be turned aside as though the old company had no existence at all. I know very well that when the matter was brought before the committee and full details were gone into, and when we learned there were even two widows greatly interested in the matter, who had no one to protect their rights, but who looked to us to guard these rights as far as we could, it had some influence on the minds of the committee, as no doubt it will have on the minds of the Senate. If I were asking anything that I did not consider perfectly justified by what has taken place I would hesitate to make such a motion as this. I know nothing about the incorporators. They were perfect strangers to me until this Bill was brought before Parliament. I am as much a stranger to Mr. Hickey as I was to Mr. Odell, the first president. I have no other feelings than the desire to do right, and I ask this House to guard interests which will be jeopardized, as I know interests can be easily jeopardized by a Bill brought into Parliament by a prominent and popular member who has great influence in the House. I shall simply content myself in making this motion by calling attention to the fact that I do not ask that any payment shall be made under this motion until the new company is fully organized and issues its bonds, and that this payment shall be then made in bonds. Some gentlemen have said that if the company want to get the plans and specifications of the old company that the new company will have to pay for them. That is not so. These plans and specifications are public property. The new company can get them at the registry office if they are required; they can go to the Public Works or to the Railways Department and get all the plans or specifications of the old company. The old company cannot keep them back; they are there. I think that under these circumstances they really have a fair claim to consideration, and that this amendment ought to meet with the sanction of this chamber.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté)—It seems to me that a new doctrine has just been laid down by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat—that bad legislation can be easily obtained in the other branch of the Legislature. To my mind that is a very serious and sweeping assertion. I consider that most of the people who have Bills before Parliament do not find that it is so easy to obtain the sanction of the Legislature, and while it might be easily obtained in the Commons, it certainly is not easily obtained here; for this Bill—I may say to hon. gentlemen who, perhaps, do not know the history of it—has been three times passed by the other branch of the Legislature and twice refused by the Senate. The duty of this House is to prevent hasty legislation, and I think that in this instance it has certainly performed the functions that devolve upon it. It is a strange thing that this resolution should be brought in at this late stage of the Bill. We heard nothing of it before the committee. Nothing of this sort was suggested where it could have been discussed and properly inquired into. The committee reported without a division, and I think I am not out of order in saying so; consequently this is a very late hour to bring forward a motion to load down this Bill with $15,000. The company that asked for this money was incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1882. Their charter was further amended in 1884, the work to commence in 1887 and be completed in 1890. As yet there has been no work of construction done. There was a subsidy granted in 1885, work under it to be commenced in 1887, and the road to be finished in four years—in 1891. Now, we have it on the best authority that the subsidy has lapsed, and that the road is stricken out of the list of railways to which subsidies have been granted. I have now before me evidence to that effect. The subsidy is lost, the charter is lost, and the hon. gentleman is simply preventing another company from constructing a road which is demanded by the public in the counties through which it passes. I have now before me a resolution passed by the corporation of the city of Ottawa during the present year. The city of Ottawa rather sympathized with the old company, and last year passed a resolution in their favor. I have now in my hand a resolution passed by the corporation of Ottawa a few weeks ago, which is as follows:—

"Moved by Alderman MacLean, and seconded by Alderman Henderson, that this council having heard the communication of Dr. Dickey, M. P., in reference to the application for a charter on behalf of the Ottawa, Morrisburg and New York Railway Company, and the opinion of the Honorable the Minister of Justice in regard to the charter of the Ottawa, Waddington and New York Railway Company, and recognizing the importance to this city of the early construction of a line of railway such as the one now contemplated, would respectfully urge upon the House of Commons and Senate of Canada the advisability of granting a charter to the present applicants.

"And that this council, in view of the fact that nothing has been done by the Ottawa, Waddington and New York Railway Company to preserve their charter during the past year, hereby rescinds the resolution passed by this council on the 25th day of March, 1889, with reference to the Ottawa, Morrisburgh and New York Railway Company.—Carried.

JACOB ERRATT,
Mayor.

Signed,
WM. P. LETT, [Seal].
City Clerk.

I have also another petition from the county of Carleton, through which this road is to pass, upon the same subject. I have also a petition from the township of West Winchester; also one from East Winchester; also one from the township of Osnabruck, and one from the township of Gloucester, which I would read only it would weary the House to do so. Now would it not be hard to refuse a charter to this company in the face of all these petitions, or to load the charter down with something that is of no use to it all? If the plans and specifications are of any value the proper time to have brought up a claim for them was before the committee, where it could have been discussed, where all parties could have been heard, and the validity of the claim inquired into, and not at this last stage of the Bill. I may say that I have the opinion of the Minister of Justice—which it is as well to read, because there are hon. gentlemen here who have not heard it—that the old charter has lapsed. I have also from the Secretary of the Railway Department a statement that the subsidy has lapsed.

HON. MR. McMILLAN—Will the hon. gentleman tell us the grounds on which the charter was granted to the Ottawa and Waddington road last year, and the extension given to them?

HON. MR. READ—They said they would commence construction at once, and go on with the work.

HON. MR. McMILLAN—Have they commenced? Or have they done anything?

HON. MR. READ—I will read an affidavit that they have not, if necessary, but I think it is hardly worth while occupying the time of the House with doing it.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I think the fair question for us to consider is, whether it is just or equitable that, in granting a charter to a new company we should in any degree disregard rights that my hon. friend who moved this amendment has properly considered vested rights? We are not going to saddle this new charter with anything heavy or burdensome; but we should do what is fair and equitable. We should remember that when Parliament granted a charter to the Ottawa, Waddington and New York Railway and Bridge Company the promoter of the Bill before us was one of the principal parties in the promotion of the other Bill. The people who were associated with him got on very well. They agitated for the construction of the road. They got out plans, and did the preliminary work that all companies have to do in the initiation of such projects. In 1886 they unfortunately had dissensions amongst themselves. Who is to blame for it I am not now going to say; but they did quarrel amongst themselves, and it became, therefore, perfectly apparent to everybody that it was utterly hopeless for either party to obtain money or float the scheme successfully while these dissensions lasted. They did last, however, one party, the majority of the stockholders, opposing the proposition to grant a charter to the other party. It must be quite obvious to any gentleman who has experience in these matters that the effect of all was simply to destroy the possibilities of either company taking action. This House thought that the promoters of this Bill were the principal parties to blame. I am not now going to join in that censure, but there is the fact, that for two years that was the position we took. Now, we remove this opposition and say: Give these gentlemen an opportunity to try their skill; give them a new charter, ignoring entirely the rights of those who obtained the former charter. It is a recognized practice in Parliament, and a recognized principle, that if you are doing away with any vested rights in a project the successors who take up that project have to adopt them. That is a well recognized principle, and I think one that is eminently fair.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Are we taking away the charter from the original company?

Hon. Mr SCOTT—Practically we are. The moment we grant this charter the other is utterly hopeless. There is no intention to renew the other charter, because it would simply destroy the chances either company would have to build the road. I would rather now see the new company have an opportunity of building the road. It would be still better if the two companies would combine, but it appears to be utterly impossible to have a fusion of the two interests. We are therefore practically destroying the old charter. Whether it has a life of a year and a-half or a year I cannot say, but we are practically superseding the old charter by this new one. Hon. gentlemen will agree with me, if a new Bill were not before us, and the promoters of the old company should come before us for a renewal of their charter we would grant it. We have done such things every session. Companies come to us with the simple proposal that they require a renewal of their charter, because they have some prospect of building their road, and it is always granted. We are not going to do that again in this case; we are giving it to an entirely new company, and therefore I say it is eminently a fair and reasonable proposition to say to these gentlemen who are getting the new charter: Your predecessors have incurred certain expenditures which must be reimbursed to them. The president of the road, Mr. Hickey, at an earlier date than my hon. friend's quotation, placed those expenditures at $12,000—not of bonuses or presents, but the actual cash expenditure, and any gentleman who is at all familiar with placing such a charter before the public and getting bonuses and assistance for it must be aware that very considerable sums of money have to be spent in promoting it. This company was acting in concert with a company known as the Ottawa, Waddington and New York Railway and Bridge Company. Authority had to be obtained at Washington for the bridge across the St. Lawrence; frequent visits had to be made there; the Secretary of War had to be consulted. It took two or three years before all this could be done, and it will be seen that $12,000 or $15,000 is a small item to cover that expenditure. The new company are not asked to pay that; they are simply asked that when they issue their bonds they shall hand over $15,000 of those bonds to meet the actual disbursements of the people who were connected with the first venture. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider a moment whether that is a fair or reasonable proposition. There is no embarrassment about it. It does not saddle the company with any new debts. The new Board under the Bill are simply trustees or testators for the old, and it will not affect the credit of the company or embarrass it in any degree. I do not hesitate to say that there are widows interested in this case. If hon. gentlemen only knew the circumstance of this case——

HON. MR. ALMON—Are there any children?

HON. MR. SCOTT—No. Hon. gentlemen may smile, but if they knew the particulars—if they knew the circumstances of those widows of the two gentlemen who were connected with this road first, who for year in and year out worked hard for this enterprise to place it before the public, agitating for bonuses from the municipalities, and for right of way, and all these facts, surely they would consider them enough to justify the appeal that I now make to the House to consider whether my hon. friend's amendment is not a reasonable, fair and just proposition. The company are not asked to pay any money if the road does not go on; they do not contribute anything; but if they do issue their bonds, that they shall contribute $15,000 of the bonds to these parties. For this the promoters of the new charters will have obtained from the old company more than an equivalent.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division:—

MARRIAGE WITH DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.

FIRST READING.

HON. MR. ALMON introduced Bill (U) "An Act to amend the Act respecting Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister."

He said: The object of this Bill is, whereas a man is now allowed to marry his deceased wife's sister, that he may be allowed to marry his deceased wife's sister's daughter.

The Bill was read the first time.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called—, Third reading of Bill (C) "An Act respecting the Department of Mining and Natural History."

HON. MR. ABBOTT said: I understand from my hon. friend that at the third reading of this Bill it was expected that some slight changes would be needed to meet the suggestions of persons interested in this Survey and in the business connected with it, with reference to two subjects, but mainly as to the name which is to be given to this new Department, and as to the position of the scientific gentlemen who do the original scientific work and investigation connected with it. It was thought that these gentlemen did require some consideration, as their functions are quite different from those of an ordinary clerk in a Department. That subject has received the careful consideration of the Government. The question of name also, though resting more upon sentiment than anything else, appeared to deserve attention. The Geological Survey of Canada is the first systematic and permanent Geological Survey in the world, I believe, except that of England, and the name has by its antiquity acquired a sort of historical interest which those connected with the Survey very naturally and very properly desire to preserve. I do not think anything conduces more to the efficiency of the public service than to keep up the esprit de corps and the interest in its success of those concerned in it; and for that reason, that question appeared also to deserve careful consideration, and it has received it. I propose now, before reading the Bill a third time, to ask the House to amend the Bill in these two particulars. I propose to preserve the original name and call it the Department of the Geological Survey. I propose to give to those employés of this Survey who are engaged in original scientific work of investigation the rank or class of technical officers, which is provided for by the Civil Service Act. I do not propose to introduce anything new. The Civil Service Act provides for such a class of civil servants, and it is proposed to give to those persons who are engaged in original scientific work in this Department the position in Class B, under the Civil Service Act, of technical officers. For that purpose, I move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House, for further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

HON. MR. ABBOTT said: I move to strike out section 9. This clause was inserted because it was in the original Act authorizing this Survey, but since that period the requirements of the laws with regard to railway companies have been made much more stringent; and now a copy or duplicate of every map and plan of every railway is deposited in the Department of Railways; and it is very seldom that such maps or plans are required, because they do not suit the requirements of the Geological Survey as a rule. They merely indicate the route and the adjoining lots. They are of no value for the purposes of this Survey; the making of them involves a great deal of labor, and they are very voluminous. This clause has never been acted upon; but at all events, if these maps are required there is one Department of the Government which will be in possession of a duplicate of them; and it is considered unnecessary to impose upon the railway companies the additional trouble and expense of procuring a third copy of their maps and plans. I therefore move to strike out the clause.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. POWER—There is just one point in connection with the Department to which I desire to call the attention of the leader of the House, with a view, perhaps, if he thinks the suggestion one of value, to having it communicated to the Minister of the Interior. Hon. gentlemen are aware that the reports of this Department now appear in two different forms. At one time the reports appeared in only one form. That was a large volume published at the close of the year, or some time after the close of the year, and each large volume embodied the transactions of the whole year and of all the officers in the employ of the Survey whose reports were thought worthy of being made public. During the last two or three years a different system has been adopted, and there are several reports of individual officers now published. For instance, there are very valuable reports of the officer who has been at work in British Columbia for the last two or three years, which have been published by themselves; and the reports of other officers employed in different sections of the Dominion, the North West and, I think, the Maritime Provinces, have been published separately. These reports are necessarily smaller volumes than the one which embodies them all, as well as the report of the Director. They are comparatively cheap, and they are of very great interest to people in those regions to which they relate. Now, I have been informed that heretofore these individual reports, if one may so call them, which have been printed, one would suppose, for the purpose of being distributed in the places where they would be most valuable, have nearly all been stored in the rooms of the Geological Survey at Ottawa, and have not got to the people for whom they were intended. I should suggest that a better way would be to cause these individual reports to be distributed in the places where they are calculated to do the most good. They cost very little, and they are more likely to be read than the large book. The report with respect to British Columbia, for instance, would probably be read by thousands in that Province, and the same would be the case with reports which relate to other Provinces. Instead of distributing the large volumes and not distributing the small ones, I think the better way would be to issue the smaller volumes and distribute them where they are most needed. That would apply not only to the future; but a few of the several thousands lying in the vaults of the Geological Survey might be distributed in the near future in the Provinces to which they relate.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I shall have great pleasure in bringing the matter to which my hon. friend refers to the notice of the Minister of the Interior. I am sure that he will cause enquiries to be made, and if there are copies available for distribution I think he will consider my hon. friend's suggestion a very judicious one.

HON. MR. READ, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committe of the Whole on Bill (O) "An Act to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, Chap. 78, Revised Statutes."

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There have been numerous complaints with reference to these certificates, on the ground that an inferior class of engineers from over the line have flocked into this country and have been certificated. In fact, numbers finding some difficulty perhaps in getting employment in their own country, get certificates here, so supplanting our own people, and diminishing the chances of employment which they perhaps have a right to possess, more especially as they are unable to retort in kind upon their southern competitors, as no Canadian engineer can be certificated in the United States without taking the oath of allegiance there. At present there is no restriction whatever upon foreign engineers coming into this country and being certificated or employed here, without any such ceremony at all. The subject has been under the notice of the Government, and it has been very carefully considered, but it is not proposed to make a rule so stringent as that which is applied to our people on the other side. We possess in our Masters and Mates Qualification Act a provision that a man shall not receive his certificate as a master or mate of a vessel unless he shall have been three years domiciled in Canada. In that Act, however, it is provided that employment on a Canadian vessel shall be equivalent to a domicile, so that he may either live in Canada for three years, or may be employed on a Canadian vessel for three years, or he may have part of one and part of the other qualification. I propose simply to adapt to this Act the same provision which has existed for some time, and is now on our Statute-book with reference to masters and mates. With that view, I shall propose to the committee to amend this Act by inserting, as a second sub-section to section 1 of the Bill: "But such applicant, if not a British subject, shall only be entitled to a certificate if, in addition to the qualification required by this Act, he shall have been domiciled in Canada for at least three years; and service as an engineer of any class upon any Canadian steamboat shall be deemed to constitute a domicile in Canada while so serving." This is exactly the provision I find in the Revised Statutes with reference to masters.

HON. MR. POWER—Would not service on any British vessel do as well as service on a vessel in Canada?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—We thought it better to confine it to steamers.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I think this is an important alteration, and on the second reading I suggested some amendment of this kind when the House would go into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill. We find in Nova Scotia this grievance has been very great. Our men there, who are loyal subjects of Canada, have gone over to the United States and have been refused employment, and have been dismissed from service there in consequence of not being naturalized citizens of the Republic. It has had this bad effect, that in order to obtain employment it has induced some of our subjects to transfer their allegiance to the United States. On the other hand, American engineers can come over to Canada, serve for the season on Canadian vessels and afterwards return to the United States. The amendment proposed is in the line of what I suggested to the House. It is certainly an improvement, and it will be an inducement for American engineers who come over from the United States to serve in Canada to become residents for three years, and subsequently become citizens of our country. It does not deprive any citizens of the United States from coming into this country. I know that the laws of the United States are very stringent against Canadians going over there and getting employment, but I do not think it would be wise for us to adopt the same rule. However, this is a wise provision, and I think it is in the right direction.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I think there is no valid reason why service on a ship should not create domicile, as well as service on a steamboat and I am inclined to take the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman opposite that it be extended to ships.

HON. MR. POWER—My suggestion was to include service on a British ship as creating domicile.

HON. MR. MILLER—I think it should be service on board one of our own vessels to create domicile.

HON. MR. POWER—I see that subsection 2 of section 41 of the existing Act says: "If the report of the inspector or inspectors certifying to the fitness of the applicant is made at the time when the Board of Steamboat Inspection is not sitting it may be signed by such inspector or inspectors, who may grant a certificate to the applicant, to be in force only until the then next meeting of the Board." I presume there is some reason for making the change in the present Bill.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The reason is one of convenience rather than anything else. There seems to be no possible object, after a man has gone through the proper examination, in compelling him to seek for two certificates when one would answer every purpose. The certificate of the Minister is substituted for the certificate of the Board, and the former practice of requiring an engineer to come before the Board again for another certificate, which would be practically based upon the certificate already issued, is done away with.

HON. MR. POWER—The explanation seems reasonable.

The clause was agreed to.

HON. MR. REID (B. C.), from the committee, reported the Bill as amended.

The amendements were concurred in, and the Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (19) "An Act to amend the Copyright Act.'

(In the Committee.)

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This Act is, as the House already knows, intended to bring or place the Exchequer Courts amongst those courts which may try questions arising under the Copyright Act. The Copyright Act provides that if there be a dispute with respect to any copyright it shall be referred to a competent court, and that the decision of the court shall govern the Minister in his action upon the application for a copyright. As the clause stands, upon a careful consideration of it, I have not been able to satisfy myself that it might not be construed to give to the Exchequer Court exclusive jurisdiction, which is not the intention.

HON. MR. MILLER—"May" is the word used. It is not imperative.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The word "may" might be construed in the imperative mood when applied to an official of a court, and I have thought it best to ask the House to to put it beyond the possibility of a doubt. I have submitted the point to the Minister of Justice, and he is of the same opinion as myself, that it would be better to clear up this doubt in the Bill. I would therefore propose to strike out the words in clause 3: "Any question arising under this section may be adjudicated upon by the Exchequer Court of Canada," and substitute the following: "The Exchequer Court of Canada shall be a competent court within the meaning of this Act, and shall have jurisdiction to adjudicate on any question arising under this section."

The amendment was agreed to.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington), from the committee, reported the Bill as amended.

The amendment was concurred in, and the Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

THE INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (Q) "An Act to amend the General Inspection Act, Chapter 99, Revised Statutes."

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT said—Section 1 is intended to change the classification of pease. Now, I find under the General Inspection Act the Governor in Council has power to classify or change the classification of grains of all kinds, and that power is frequently exercised, and the Governor in Council can do precisely, by the exercise of that power, what it is proposed to do by this clause 1. On the attention of the Minister being called to that fact, he agreed with me in thinking that it was inexpedient to multiply the clauses in the Statute-book to regulate minor matters of this description which are expressly placed within the purview of the powers of the Governor in Council, and that this clause is wholly unnecessary. I therefore move that it be struck out.

The motion was agreed to.

On the 2nd clause,—

HON. MR. KAULBACH said—It seems to me that to put this clause into operation at once would not be advisable. Some time should be allowed to elapse, so that parties putting up pork would have sufficient knowledge of the law to pack as provided for by this section.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend is quite right, and I hold in my hand an amendment which I propose to move before the committee rises, retarding the operation of this section until after the 1st of September. It will not apply to any pork presented for inspection until after September.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—Why are there so many classifications?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The hon. gentleman must not suppose the knowledge of a Minister to be universal. I cannot give the reasons for it. I can say this much, that it is on the suggestion of the trade, and after very full consultation with persons engaged in the trade and with the inspectors, that these changes have been made. They are entirely satisfactory—in fact, desired and asked for by the trade—but the precise reason I am quite unable to give.

HON. MR. POWER—The same reason exists for striking out this rather complicated provision that existed for striking out the first clause of the Bill, because under the fifteenth section of the Act the Governor in Council may change or modify the classification. That is exactly what we are doing now; we are providing for a new classification of all pork, and why should we put that in the statute any more than the provision contained in the first clause? I think the better way would be to strike out this second clause, too.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend's suggestion is one that has a certain plausibility, and has been discussed, but this section does not confine itself to saying what shall be the classes, but makes the specific provision as to how the pork shall be cut up. It does not decide so much on the classification as on the mode in which the pork shall be packed, and it is thought desirable to put this in the Act, as it does not come literally under the clause my hon. friend has referred to, and it would be more extensively known and more easily referred to, and perhaps be past the possibility of any question of jurisdiction, which the other might not be.

HON. MR. POWER—There is one thing that strikes me about this clause. I do not know very much about the pork business, but there does not appear to be any provision for classifying such pork as is not cut up in the manner provided for in this clause.

HON. MR. DICKEY—That only applies to mess pork.

HON. MR. POWER—There does not appear to be any special reason why it should be cut up into pieces of that size, and it is not always so packed. There ought to be some way of classifying pork that is not cut up in that way.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is well understood that pork which does not come under that classification cannot be inspected. It is then what is called amongst lumbermen "cull" pork.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The Act as it stands is taken from the English law, and the classification as it stands includes all portions of the hog except the head and feet. I can see no good reason for this provision requiring the pork to be cut into pieces of from 4 to 6 lbs, except that it must be for parties camping in the woods, and can be conveniently dealt out to the different camps or to parties who wish to purchase in small quantities. It cannot be intended for house or ship use.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—That must be the reason.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—Mess pork, which is generally used on board ship, is left as it is in the Act. The extra prime mess is for house use. While extra cuts of mess are the best pieces of the hog, prime mess is the next best, and prime may possibly be called the offal of the hog; so I can see no reason for this provision except the one I have suggested, that it is to accommodate those who work in the woods.

HON. MR. DICKEY—We have already cut out one clause of the Bill, and if we cut out another we may be open to the charge of cutting up the Bill.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The hon. leader of the House informs us that the trade is in favor of this Bill. I think that he must mean those who sell the pork, and not those who pack it.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved to amend the third clause by providing that the Act should only apply to pork submitted for inspection after the first day of September next.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—That is too soon, because a great deal of pork will be on hand then.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—We want to have this come into force in time for the new crop. There are parts of the country where pork is cured in September. The old pork would be inspected before that time.

The motion was agreed to.

On the last clause,—

HON. MR. POWER—I see that this is re-enacting the old Inspection Act. Last year we amended the Inspection Act, and we are now striking out that amendment and going back to the old Act.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—We are never too old to learn.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—It seems to me that the amendments are all in favor of the large packers. In Prince Edward Island there are men engaged in the trade who have produced pickled pork of the finest quality possible. I do not think they always use these small cuts. I am inclined to think the contrary, that they try to do with as few cuts as possible, believing that the cuts conduce sooner or later to the spoiling of the pork.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The best class of pork is mess pork, and it can be cut into any size that the packers please. These amendments do not apply to mess pork.

HON. MR. POWER—With respect to the suggestion of the hon. leader, about never being too old to learn, there is another construction to be put on the conduct of the Government—that they passed the legislation last year without due consideration.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend must see that this is a very complicated department. The Government are standing alone against the ingenuity of the traders throughout the country, and they are obliged to get their knowledge of the details of the system by experience. They can hardly be accused of ignorance of the subject because they find one way of a complishing a thing is better than another way.

HON. MR. PROWSE, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the third reading of the Bill, as amended.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—I accept the statement made by the leader of the Government, that the trade have asked for these amendments, but so far as my small experience goes, they are quite opposed to the practice in Prince Edward Island, where, as I have said, they have produced perhaps as fine and as well-cured pork as in any other part of Canada. The experience of packers in Prince Edward Island is against cutting the pork into such small pieces. On the contrary, their cuts pursue the rib of the animal, and are packed in the casks the whole way round the carcass. It seems to be quite incompatible with the demands of the trade. The leader of the Government has said very confidently that the trade demand this change, and that therefore it is in their interests. All I can say is, that it is opposed to the practice of the Prince Edward Island packers.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is explained by gentlemen who understand the matter better than I do, that these changes are made in the interests of the greatest consumers of pork, the lumbering population of the country, and I suppose there is not a large lumbering population in Prince Edward Island. I hope it will not prove inconvenient to any extent to the packers in Prince Edward Island. It is possible that it may be so, but I have stated what I am informed is actually the case, that the great consumers, purchasers, and dealers in pork desire these alterations, and it is for that reason that the Bill has been brought in.

HON. MR. PROWSE—It would almost appear from the wording of the Bill that it will be optional with the packer whether he shall have his pork inspected or not. If it were compulsory it would be a hardship to the packers of pork on the Island. There is a good deal of pork packed in the Province, for which a ready market is found in Halifax, and there is no objection raised to it. The practice in Prince Edward Island is to cut the pork in pieces running from the back half round the carcass, and 6 inches deep. That is the way they pack mess and prime mess.

HON. MR. DEVER—There is no doubt that is the usual practice of packing in the east. American pork is packed as the hon. gentleman has described it. With reference to the Prince Edward Island pork, it is not consumed in the Province, but is exported. I am not prepared to say whether this alteration in the law is desirable or objectionable, but I know the practice in the past has been to take the half carcass, from the spine round to the belly of the animal, and, as the hon. gentleman has said, 6 or 8 inches wide. That has been the system of packing mess and prime mess. There was, I think, another grade called "clear"—that is, pork without the bone. I do not see that mentioned at all.

HON. MR. POWER—I find, looking carefully at the section of the Inspection Act which this Bill is intended to amend, that the Bill does not deal with mess or prime mess pork at all. What is now the firstsection of the Bill deals only with sub-section 1 of section 52, and if the hon. gentleman will look at the Inspection Act he will find that sub-section 2 of section 52 deals with mess pork, and describes what it shall be. Sub-section 3 deals with extra prime pork, and describes what it shall be; sub-section 4 with prime mess pork and sub-section 5 with prime pork. The law is not altered as to these at all. What is now clause 2 of this Bill adds two new sub-sections between sub-sections 6 and 7 of this section of the Act. It does not apply to Prince Edward Island pork at all, as far as I can gather.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This present Bill does not make any difference in the size of the peices into which the pork is to be cut. It appears from a cursory glance at it that under the law as it stands in the Statute-book it is to be cut certain sizes. There is a difference in the number of grades, apparently, as these are only five by the General Inspection Act and they are made seven by this Bill, so there is not so great a change as my hon. friend supposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

THE CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

THIRD REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

The Order of the Day being called,—Consideration of the Third Report of the Select Committee appointed to examine and report upon the Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

HON. MR. READ said—This report recommends that a person named Davis be superannuated for physical incapacity, and also that certain appointments be made.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I rise with some hesitancy to speak on this matter. I see that the committee has not changed in effect the report made to the House on the 14th of February, and which did not meet with approval, or rather was sent back to the committee for further consideration. I see no alteration in the report except, as has been remarked to me, that it gives the ground why Davis should be superannuated, which was not mentioned on the former occasion. I do not approve of this report, because I see that Davis is employed in the House yet, and there is no appearance of physical incapacity about him. He appears to be as capable now as he ever was. I never heard of a man being superannuated who was doing his work satisfactorily and when he did not want to be superannuated. Unless some reason better than any that has yet been furnished is given for taking this course, I must disapprove of the report. I believe there is something behind this recommendation. It is said that Davis has been injured in some way that would incapacitate him from heavy lifting or anything of that kind, but I think he is capable of performing the duties imposed upon him in this House. It is a dangerous precedent to establish to superannuate a young man. Why should we pay two men for doing the work of one? Why should we put a charge of $250 a year on the contingencies of the Senate without cause? I am told that this young man's habits have not been good. Has he been admonished with regard to any weakness of that kind, and put on probation, and given to understand that unless he pursues a better course he will be summarily dismissed? It seems that nothing of the kind has been done—that he has not been cautioned by the committee, but is to be superannuated, while to all appearances he is as capable of performing his duties here as he ever was. It seems to me that to take the course recommended by the committee is to offer a premium to men in our employ to neglect their duties and to fall into evil habits in order to be superannuated. It is not fair to the other servants of this House that we should, because this young man has been guilty of some indiscretion, superannuate him and put an unnecessary charge on the Senate. I understand that the young man has taken the pledge and promised to do his work faithfully and well. He knows what the consequences of any violation of that pledge would be, and therefore I think that he ought to be placed on probation, and not superannuated while he is yet young and able to discharge his duties.

HON. MR. MILLER—I feel very little personal interest in the question under consideration, and but for one thing I would be very indifferent whether the report is adopted or rejected. However, I would ask the House to consider that the Contingent Committee is a very large body; that this subject has gone twice before it; that a similar report came in with reference to these items some weeks ago, and that that report was sent back again to the Contingent committee; and the Committee, after full consideration, has re-reported to the same effect as on the first occasion. I think the House ought to take it for granted that a committee so large as that, after considering a question twice, and reporting again to the House——

HON. MR. BOTSFORD—Where it was fully discussed.

HON. MR. MILLER—Yes; where it was fully discussed, have not been hasty or unwise in the conclusion at which they have arrived. The question with regard to Davis is one possessing some rather delicate features, and the facts and details of it cannot be as well discussed in this House as they could be in committee. For my own part, I am not willing to repeat the arguements and statements made before the committee, and which were undoubtedley true, in reference to this young man; therefore, I do not think the House is in as good a position to form a conclusion on this question as the committee who had it under consideration. I wish the House to recollect that the Contingent Committee is a large committee, and they should also know this fact, that on the only division in that committee, on this report in connection with Davis, there were but five of a minority, and that after full discussion of the question. The hon. gentleman says we had no evidence. We had the best evidence before us of the physical incapacity of this messenger.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I did not say the committee had no evidence. I said we have evidence of his apparent capacity to attend to his duties.

HON. MR. MILLER—The evidence before the hon. gentleman has proved very deceptive on occasion after occasion. That is all the length I desire to go on that view of the case; but we have had the evidence of a medical man of high standing, a member of this House and of the committee, Dr. Paquet, that the messenger Davis is physically unable to discharge his duties. I venture to say that all who know Dr. Paquet will feel satisfied that he would not make such a statement before the committee, as a professional man, unless he had good reasons for doing so. There is another question in connection with this subject that I wish to allude to. The Chief Messenger, who is not harsh, and who is known as a kind-hearted man, has recommended, for what I consider good cause, the superannuation of this messenger. If against that recommendation, and against the recommendation of the large committee of this House, Davis is kept on now, it will be a triumph for him over the Chief Messenger and over the committee. I do not wish the House or the Chief Messenger to be placed in a humiliating position in connection with so trivial a matter. We have regulated our staff on the assumption that this young man should be superannuated, and it would disturb the whole arrangement which we have made, and which has been going on during the Session, if we now refuse to adopt this report. Under all the circumstances, I think the House should hesitate before rejecting a report of a committee such as the Contingent Committee on a question of this kind, and for various reasons: first, because it would be for no good cause; secondly, because the conduct of the young man has not been such as it should be, though we are willing to superannuate him when it is shown from the testimony of a medical man that he was unable from physical incapacity to do his work. We were willing to take the kindest view of the matter on that evidence rather than dismiss him for a cause which long ago perhaps rendered him liable to dismissal. As for taking him on again on probation, I don't want to refer to that matter. It has been done before. I think the wisest course is to adopt the report of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of (Bill 7) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Elections Act, Cap. 8, of the Revised Statutes of Canada." He said: I hope my hon. friend from Halifax will deal tenderly with me now, because I am about to propose a similar thing to that which he complained of a few minutes ago. I am about to ask the House to pass a Bill which is intended to remedy a difficulty which has arisen under the last Dominion Elections Act, and which was caused by the fact that by that Act something was undone, and we have got to do it again, because we find it necessary and expedient, and in the public interest to do it, and we are not afraid or ashamed to come before the House and say we think it better to go back to what we had before, after giving both systems a fair trial. It is with reference to the nominations in the district of Gaspé. By the original Act the nominations for the district of Gaspé, as well as for the district of Algoma, were not necessarily fixed for the same day as the nominations in other parts of the Provinces. It was thought that in Gaspé this exception might be done away with—that there might be time enough in Gaspé, notwithstanding the extent of the county, to have the nomination on the same day as the nominations in the rest of the Dominion; but unfortunately it has been found that it is not praticable. The county is too large to be able to give the requisite notice for the polling, and therefore this Bill is introduced to bring us back to the position we occupied before the last Act, to have the nominations in Gaspé fixed for a special date.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—Does not the same reason apply to the districts of Cariboo and Yale, in British Columbia.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I could not tell my hon. friend.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Those districts are certainly as large as Gaspé, and it is as difficult to have notices distributed there in time.

HON. MR. POWER—I think they were excepted also.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend must know that the Magdalen Islands are included in the Gaspé district.

HON. MR. MILLER—It is peculiarly a Bill for the House of Commons to deal with.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (43) "An Act to amend the Act 52 Vic., Cap. 4, intituled: 'An Act to authorize the granting of Subsidies in Land to certain Railway Companies.'"

(In the Committee).

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I promised an explanation with regard to this Bill when it was read the second time, which explanation I am now in a position to give. It appears that these two companies are authorised to construct a railway from the Canadian Pacific Railway to a point south of it, each having a portion of the railway to construct. The North-Western Coal and Navigation Company (Limited) has already constructed the first portion, and the Alberta Railway and Coal Company is authorised to construct the second portion. They are both under the control of the same parties, practically, and have in fact power to amalgamate afterwards; but in the meantime, the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, to which this land was given, has no power to construct the piece of railway in aid of which the the grant was made, while the Albert Railway and Coal Company was incorporated for the purpose of making that section, and it was to that company the subsidy was promised. Now, the error, if it was an error, which occurred in the office of the Department of the Interior, or in the office of the draughtsman who drew the Bill—it is not known exactly how it occurred—was not rectified, because Sir Alexander Galt, who is the main promoter of the scheme, and through whose energy the first portion of the railway has already been constructed, left Canada immediately upon the passing of the Bill, and before the subsidy which had been promised to this railway had been put of record in the Act. He, therefore, knew nothing about the mistake. If he had been here, undoubtedly it would have been corrected. No one else outside of the draughtsman or the people connected with the Government Department knew that the error had occurred, or knew anything about it, and he did not discover it until after the Session was over. Upon his ascertaining that the error had been committed he represented the case to the Government, and an Order in Council was passed last October correcting the mistake, and it is to enable that Order in Council to be put in force that the present Bill is introduced to substitute the name of the company which is to build the road and has the power to build the road for the name of the company which is not to build the road and has no power to do it.

HON. MR. MURPHY, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was read the third time, and passed.

ERIE AND HURON RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.), in the absence of MR. VIDAL, moved the second reading of Bill (57) "An Act respecting the Erie and Huron Railway Company." He said: This Bill is an ordinary railway Bill, asking for power to extend the railway from Dresden, in the county of Bothwell, to Oil Springs, Petrolia and Sarnia. I do not think the Bill contains any unusual clauses—at least, if it does I am not aware of it, and my hon. friend gave me to understand before he left for home that he thought there would be no objection to it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

WITHDRAWN.

The Order of the Day being called,—Second reading Bill (L) "An Act to amend the Railway Act as respects running powers."

HON. MR. BOULTON said, With the permission of the House, I shall withdraw this Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was withdrawn.

TRADE MARKS AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (18) "An Act to amend the Act respecting Trade Marks and Industrial Designs."

(In the Committee.)

HON. MR. MILLER—Is is intended here to give the Echequer Court exclusive jurisdiction in these matters?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Yes; the Exchequer Court, which is a much better tribunal to decide important questions of law, is substituted for the Minister.

HON. MR. MILLER—It is not exclusive jurisdiction under the 3rd section.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Only on one subject.

HON. MR. BOULTON, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (H) "An Act for the relief of Christiana Filman Glover." (Mr. Clemow.)

DISCLOSURE OF OFFICIAL INFORMATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (T) "An Act to prevent the disclosure of Official Documents and Information." He said: This is a Bill, introduced for the purpose of preventing and punishing misconduct in the disclosure, by persons in positions of trust, of important information respecting public matters, which comes to them by virtue of the trust reposed in them. It is a subject which has attracted a good deal of attention in England and Europe the last three or four years in connection with some extraordinary disclosures which were made there of public documents of the very highest national importance. I am informed that this Bill is very nearly an exact copy of the English Act passed on the subject, and I hope the House will agree with me in thinking that it covers every possible case, and is not of undue severity in its provisions. It has no other object than what I have stated. It appears to be somewhat long, but it is necessary to specify every particular offence that can be committed within the purview of the Act.

HON. MR. POWER—The Bill is all right in principle, but as the details are numerous, and are such as require rather careful looking into, I hope the leader of the House will not ask for committee before Tuesday.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SUMMERSIDE BANK BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. HOWLAN moved the second reading of Bill (72) "An Act respecting the Summerside Bank." He said: This Bill is for the purpose of enabling the Summerside Bank, whose charter expires on the 1st of May coming, to extend its operations until the 1st of July, 1891, so that by that time it may come under the new banking law.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 5.10 p.m.

WELLAND CANAL INVESTIGAION.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. McCALLUM rose to—

Enquire of the Government if A. F. Wood, Esq., Commissioner on the Welland Canal Investigation, has made a further report, and, if so, will the Government lay the same on the Table of this House?

He said: I gave notice of this enquiry on the 4th of this month. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that on the 3rd instant there was a report laid on the Table of this House, made by A. F. Wood, Esq., Commissioner on the Welland Canal Investigation. I am led to believe there was a further report, and that is why I make this enquiry of the Government. If there is a second report, I want to ask that it be laid on the Table of this House. To my great surprise I found, on the evening of the 4th, in one of the newspapers published in Toronto, what purported to be a report made by Mr. Wood. I hold it in my hand, and, to my mind, it is surprising that the press of the country should get such a document before it is laid on the Table of this House. Of course, there was one report laid before Parliament, but not this one, and, with the permission of the House, I shall read it:

"OTTAWA, March 3.—The report of Commissioner A. F. Wood, who was appointed to investigate into the management of the Welland Canal last summer, was presented to the Senate to-day."

This report was not "presented to the Senate to-day:"

"The evidence is very voluminous, and the report bears indications that Mr. Wood has made a searching and painstaking enquiry. He makes the following suggestions as to changes in the present management of the canal, which he considers essential, not only in the interests of the public service, but in the interests of economy:

"'The investigation disclosed an unnecessary multiplication of offices. In my opinion, there are too many 'overseers;' more foremen than necessary; no use for the harbor masters, and the office of storekeeper, as now utilised, unnecessary.

"'A report, ordered by me, from the canal office, and forming part of the evidence, gives four overseers to the 'new' canal, and two to the 'old'—six in all. It gives sixteen foremen.

"'One superintendent is enough for a canal twenty-seven miles long, if he confines himself to the duties of that office.'"

I don't think my friend, the commissioner, knows the length of the Welland Canal, or he would not have put it at that. When he makes such a report to the Government he is endeavoring to teach ducks how to swim. I can tell the length of the Welland Canal as well as I can tell the number of fingers on my hand. Instead of the Welland Canal being twenty-seven miles long, it is more than fifty miles long, taking all its branches.

"'As the system is being operated on the Welland Canal, Mr. Ellis occupies very much the position of the head of a department, with six superintendents under him; each over a division, of which there are four on the 'new canal,' and two on the 'old.'

"'These superintendents, called 'overseers,' look after the 'divisions,' and communicate with the 'head' superintendent, at his office, in the canal office buildings, and are often brought there on very trivial business. His office hours are from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

"'If the superintendent devotes himself to the actual work of his office, coming in contact with the men and work two or three times per week (for doing which he now receives an allowance of $300 per annum for horse hire), the 'overseers' could confine themselves to their legitimate duties on the canal, and two would be sufficient on the 'new,' and one on the 'old' canal

"'And as evidence that I am correct in so stating, I would call attention to the fact that J. G. Demare, 'overseer' of No. 1 Division, which is one of the most important, has been put in general charge of the whole of the 'new' canal, in addition, and attends to both satisfactorily. In his 'second' office he is doing what the superintendent should do personally.'"

This is news to me, though I live along the canal, and, I believe, it is news to every man, woman and child in the country. This man, Demare, has forced himself, because he is a pet of Mr. Ellis', to think that he has charge over the canal; but, when the commissioner reports this to the House, he states what is not correct. He is the man of whom I spoke the other day as being so skilful and energetic in his own interests. Mr. Page said, in the witness stand, that Mr. Demare was skilful and energetic. I think I explained to the House the other day how skilled and energetic he was, and I am not going to trouble hon. gentlemen by repeating it to-day. When this document is laid before the House I shall some day consider the whole report—commissioner, officials and all. I shall do so, if it takes two days, or a week. I am willing to devote my time to it, in the interests of the country, until those barnacles are all scraped from the bottom of the ship.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—You will not succeed.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I will; because, I do not take up a cause until I am satisfied that it is a good one. Over two years ago I brought this matter to the notice of the House and of the Government.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—You will not succeed.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I believe I shall succeed. I am satisfied that the Government is anxious to do only what is right in this business, and that they will make those people "walk the plank:"

"'There are too many foremen. The report referred to gives sixteen. Some of these now in the employ of the canal are not competent for the duties of such a position. The evidence disclosed a want of definite duties to these men. One-half the number, composed of active, energetic men, suited to act in that capacity with well-defined duties, would be more effective for the purposes for which they are employed, in my opinion, than the present staff. It was difficult in the evidence given to fix blame for irregularities, for the reason that the work of the foremen clashed with each other, and responsibility was easily shifted on to other shoulders.'"

I fix the responsibility where it ought to be, on behalf of the people of this country. I put it on the right shoulders, and if the Government will publish the evidence taken at that enquiry every man in the Dominion will see that I put the responsibility on the right shoulders. I said the other day, from my place in this Chamber, that I hoped no other public work in this country is conducted in the way the Welland Canal has been, and I gave the names of the parties who comprise a ring formed, not for the good of the country, but for their own individual benefit:

"'The harbor-masters have very light duties to perform, which can be readily done by the overseers at each end of the canal and not interfere with their present duties, providing they are not required to leave their work and wait on the superintendent at the canal office, where they are now frequently kept for hours, often, I think, needlessly.'"

The commissioner gives his opinion of harbor-masters. I differ from him there. Harbor-masters should be sailors, and should know how to handle vessels. A man may do very well as a foreman on the canal, and know nothing of how to handle a vessel in the harbor. There is another way that can be done away with, and that is by not imposing the duties of harbor-master on the overseer of the canal:

"The storekeeper's office, as now carried out, is no use to the service, either for the work performed or as a check. He has only a portion of the supplies under his charge. He should either have full charge, if such an office is decided necessary, or the office abolished.'

He is the gentleman that I said the other day was of as much use on the canal as a fifth wheel is to a coach. You can see that the commissioner is coming down in his report. If the Government will get him to make one or two more reports he will come down to the evidence, and I have not the slightest doubt if they pay him he will make one or two more. He is coming down now. You will see that the last one is coming more to what I stated in the House, and if they pay him for one or two more he will agree with me exactly.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—How much will it require?

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I do not know; I guess he charges pretty high.

"An active qualified clerk, directly responsible to the superintendent (and whose duty it should be to look after him) would be far more efficient."

Not one in whose books the red figures are in mourning to cover up railway fares for which the people of this country pay $205, while the actual cost was only $32:

"A better system of checks for 'time' and 'supplies' is necessary, and should extend to 'livery service,' railroad fares—in fact, to every branch of the canal service, and there should be some person responsible to see that it is properly performed.

"As the present system is carried out, the superintendent has undertaken at various times expensive works, such as the post office, Custom house and dock at Port Colborne, and large bridges, such as 'Dishers' and 'Shiners' without authority from the Department, and without consulting the Chief Engineer. I am satisfied from enquiry that it was never intended to put the superintendent of the Welland canal in the position of an administrative officer. Clearly his duties are executive, and should be confined to them.

"The present system seems to have grown up from the necessity of an increased force during the construction of the new canal—repairs and construction running close together, and not since reduced."

I do not see why it should. It did not grow from that at all, because the construction of the canal was carried on under contract, independent of the management of the canal altogether. The commissioner is wrong there, as he is in a good many instances. He is mistaken more than half of the time:

"In brief, I think the superintendent should resume the duties appertaining to that office, coming personally in contact two or three times per week with the men and work, at least (for which he has an allowance now of $300), and confine himself strictly to the duties of that office.

"Reduce the number of overseers to three on the new canal and one on the old canal. If necessary, make a deputy of one of the three on the new canal to assist (not to take the place of) the superintendent. Have the overseer at each end of the canal discharge the duties of harbor-masters, whose office should be abolished."

Mark the contrast! He said before that one superintendent is enough for the canal, but here he recommends a deputy. There are plenty of lock-tenders on the canal that know more than Mr. Ellis does, though he is managing the canal, and this man took advantage of it. He was "skilful and energetic" for his own interest, and, of course, assumed more than he should in the management of the work. The commissioner comes to this conclusion, how I do not know, except that he had a pleasure trip through the Welland Canal, and had this man Demare to be his guide and attendant. The report continues:

"Reduce the staff of foremen; have only active and efficient men in such positions. Abolish the storekeeper's office; introduce a better system of checks and extend it to the whole service. In fact, have a live system of internal management, embracing the spirit of the changes I have indicated, and I am prepared to say there will be, not only a direct saving of from $8,000 to $10,000 annually, and an indirect saving equally as large, but the service will be more effective in the public interest."

Now, what did I say the other day? I said that with proper management on the Welland Canal the country could save $12,000 a year in expenditure, and could save as much more that is now lost through mismanagement, making in all $24,000. The commissioner and I almost agree on that. He says that the saving would be from $16,000 to $20,000; I say it would be from $20,000 to $24,000; and I claim that I know as much as the commissioner does about the Welland Canal:

"An unnecessary multiplicity of offices always has a tendency to weaken any service, and on the Welland Canal such is the result beyond a doubt.

"A superintendent, to be effective, must feel the pulse of the work over which he is an overseer, by continually coming in contact with the men and work. On the Welland Canal there will be plenty to occupy his time and attention if he discharges his duties faithfully, without meddling with what belongs to another branch of the service.

"While the present general management meets, as I have before stated, the demands of shippers and commercial men so far as the transit of goods and vessels are concerned, at the same time there can be no doubt in my opinion but that it is accomplished at too much expense and unnecessary waste of time and labor.

"The Chief Engineer and Deputy Minister of Canals are men of large experience, and I respectfully submit these suggestions for re-organization for your consideration, with a proper deference to their judgment, but fully impressed with the importance of changes in the present management."

It is true that Mr. Wood has not signed this report, but how does it come to get to the press before being submitted to this House? Who gave it to the Empire? Was it Mr. Wood or the Department? I do not want to quarrel with the newspapers, but they appear to have a knowledge about these things sooner than Parliament. On the occasion of the first report, in fact the day that the commissioner gave it in, the Empire contained the following:—

"Mr. A. F. Wood, M.P.P., was here to-day, handing in his report on the recent Welland Canal investigation. It is understood that the result of the enquiry exonerates Mr. Ellis from the charges preferred against him."

Where did the Empire get that information? It happens that the correspondent was mistaken that time, and he may be mistaken now, in representing this as a second report from Mr. Wood. If the Government would take my suggestion, I would advise them to get Mr. Wood to make one or two more reports, and he will get somewhere near the truth. In his former report he said the charges were frivolous. Let him look at what I have stated to this House—and I stand by every word I said then—and show where I was incorrect. I know that I spoke a long time and tired the patience of my brother senators, but they will admit that I was warranted in all that I said when they consider the amount of public money that is wasted on the Welland Canal, and when I say that I know, from facts that have come to my knowledge since, that I did not get at 5 per cent. of the truth. I can tell the leader of the Government in this House that the sooner the Department acts in the direction I have indicated the better it will be for the country. I can tell him further, that since this investigation has taken place the officials have been wasting the public money and destroying public property. I have evidence to show it. I hope that even without moving for this report the Government will lay it on the Table, and will have the evidence published, so that the people can see what has been taking place on the Welland Canal. They may say that it will involve expense, that it will cost money; but I can tell them to-day that the Welland Canal investigation has saved more money already than it has cost, and if for no other reason than to be a warning to evil-doers hereafter, the evidence and the report should be published and distributed through the country. The Government have nothing to hide in this matter. I am perfectly satisfied that they want to show the world what is going on, and they will give evidence of their good faith by so doing. They never can satisfy the people along the Welland Canal that they do not want to smother up things when they lay one report on the Table to-day and give another report to the press to-morrow. Let them lay the whole matter before the people, so that they can judge between my statements in the Senate and the commissioner's report, and I am ready to stand by public opinion on this matter.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I hope my hon. friend will dismiss from his own mind, and will also assist me in removing the impression from the minds of hon. members, that the Government is acting, or feels in any way different from what he says it ought to act and feel. The Government has nothing to conceal in this matter; it has no feeling on the subject at all. It desires solely to do justice, and if this official has been guilty of wrong-doing, of course they will punish him for it. I said so when my hon. friend brought this matter up a year ago; I say so still, but my hon. friend has been, I venture to say, without offence to him, a little premature in this discussion. When my hon. friend made the remarks with which he favored the House some time ago, the report was not then before the Senate. It was almost impossible for members to know of what he was speaking, and they certainly could not apply what he was saying to the substance of the report, because the report had not been laid before the House, and none of the members had seen it. My hon. friend now complains, as a serious wrong—and in that respect, to some extent, what he says is plausible—that this report first appeared in the public press before it was submitted to this House—this so-called second report. Now, the facts concerning that so-called second report are these: when the first report was laid before this House there was no knowledge on the part of the Government that there was any second report. In fact, when the commissioner made his report, which was laid before this House, he became functus officio. He had no right to make any other report; he was not called upon to do so, if this be a report at all, which is somewhat questionable from my hon. friend's statement, since it seems to be an unsigned memorandum made after the report was submitted to the Government—if it be a report at all, I would say with regard to it that the Government have only lately received it, and they are now considering what they will do with it. It is now under their consideration, whether they will take any notice of it at all, and if they consider that it is proper that it should be dealt with as an official report, it will at once be laid on the Table of this House. My hon. friend seems to think that the Empire had some special means of getting a knowledge on this subject.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—I gave my reasons.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—When the first report came out it was published in all the newspapers, except the Empire.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—That was after it was laid on the Table here.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—In this case the Empire was the only paper that published it. Now the Empire did not receive that report from the Government or any of their officials, so far as the Government know. The Empire acquired it in some way, but in what way I do not know. We have no idea in what way it came into their possession at all. Some enquiry has been made, but it has not been ascertained how it came into possession of this paper, and therefore no slight was intended to the House and no slight has occurred. The simple answer to my hon. friend's question is this: that this official has made what he calls a supplementary or second report, which report was made after his functions had ceased—after he had performed all that his commission required him to do, by sending in his report, and the evidence taken. The Government are yet considering what to do with this report. If they determine to treat it as an official report it will be laid before the House. In a few days the decision will be arrived at on the subject. When these reports are before the House, or when it is determined to disregard the second report, or whatever may be the official decision, and the papers are before the House for discussion of the subject, of course it will be my duty, if the matter is brought up, to discuss it with my hon. friend, and if this gentleman whom he accuses of impropriety of a very gross character has really been guilty and deserves punishment, he will most certainly receive it without fear or favor.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—My hon. friend says that I was premature in this matter. He did not know the provocation——

HON. MR. ABBOTT—What I meant to say was, that a discussion on the merits of this question was perhaps a little premature—I qualified what I was saying as much as I could—because the House was not in possession of these reports or papers.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—The report has been laid before the House, and members have had the same chance of getting it that I had. Does my hon. friend say that there is a second report?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I say that there is a paper which was sent in by this official after he was functus officio, and the Government are considering whether they will treat it as an official report and deal with it, or whether they will pay no attention to it whatever.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—The leader of the Government can understand that when he says I am premature in this matter he forgets that I have waited a long time. I brought this matter before the Government two years ago, and last year I made my statement in this House. The investigation closed on the 13th of November last, and the report is before them now. I am satisfied that there is another report from the commissioner, whether the Government asked him to make it or not. It is strange that he should make a report if they did not ask him to do so, and if he made a report for which the public money has been paid, it is a public document, and should be laid before this House. I, therefore, urge strongly upon the leader of the Government to bring down this second report and the evidence taken during the investigation, and let it be given to the public. I do not for a moment say that the Government has anything to hide in this matter. The hon. leader of the House speaks as though only one individual is involved in this matter. If he will look at the evidence he will see that there are half a dozen officials in the ring. I want to see the public works of this country carried on efficiently and honestly. I must discuss this second report further, because it is contrary to the evidence where it says that Mr. Ellis did not hide anything from the Government. If the House will look at the explanatory letter from Mr. Ellis to the Government, on the 13th of May last, they can see that while he was building a bridge over Shiner's Creek, at a cost to the country of over $1,000, he hid it from the Government. He built this bridge for the township to please a member of Parliament, and hid the fact from the Government. Yet the commissioner has the audacity to say in his report that Mr.

Ellis did not hide anything from the Government, and he says many other things of a like character. He passes over important evidence which he should have taken into consideration. His first report states that Mr. Ellis did wrong, but that he did not mean to do it. How does the commissioner know whether these officials meant to do wrong or not? We should have the evidence before us, and then we can judge for ourselves what they meant to do. In his report, the commissioner says that the loss to the country is very trifling, but I have shown that Mr. Ellis took for his own benefit over $3,000, and that he squandered altogether over $37,000 of the public money that we know of, and I did not get at 5 per cent. of the loss. Therefore, I ask the leader of the House to have the whole of the evidence and the reports printed, to be an example to all evil-doers hereafter.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (69) "An Act respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Co." (Mr. McCallum.)

Bill (55) "An Act to incorporate the Shore Line Railway Bridge Co." (Mr. Botsford.)

Bill (54) "An Act to incorporate the Interprovincial Bridge Co." (Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (64) "An Act to incorporate the Moncton and Prince Edward Island Railway and Ferry Co." (Mr. Poirier.)

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

HON. MR. MILLER—I rise to call the attention of the House to a paragraph published in the Evening Journal which has reference to myself. The matter is not of much importance, but one does not like to see himself pilloried in the press falsely. I shall read the paragraph to which I refer:

"SENATE AND COMMONS.

"The Senate sat with closed doors yesterday afternoon, the subject of debate being the new rules respecting the galleries made by the House of Commons. On Tuesday night Senator Sanford introduced three ladies into the gallery in which he used to be privileged. The Usher requested him to place them in the Senator's gallery, and he then found the Senate only had thirty seats in the Commons gallery. Senator Miller also made a similar mistake and was corrected. It is understood the Senate will demand more ample and more suitable accommodation."

Now, I may say in self-defence, that a greater untruth could not be uttered in reference to any member of this House than this when applied to me; for although over twenty years a member of the Senate, I can say unhesitatingly that I never once violated the rules of the gallery in the House of Commons, and perhaps very few members of the Senate can say as much for themselves. What I feel rather annoyed about is this. The discussion took place with closed doors. The paper must have manufactured that statement, or it must have received the false information from some member or some officer of the House. While I am loth to believe that any member of the House would wilfully misrepresent me in the manner in which I am misrepresented in that paragraph, or that any officer of the House would do so; still, I find it very difficult to escape from the dilemma of fixing the author as some one, I fear a Senator, within the Chamber at the time of the debate. There is a marked difference in the way Senator Sanford and myself are referred to in the quotation, although he had really been guilty of a violation of the rules. He admitted his guilt, and is not corrected; but the harshest language is applied to me in the same paragraph. The House is aware that all my remarks, in the discussion which took place with closed doors, strongly insisted on the observance of the rules of the Senate and that every word in the Journal's paragraph referring to me is an unmitigated untruth, concocted and circulated by some individual on whose corns I had trodden.

HON. MR. POIRIER—While we are on the question of privilege, I should like to know what are the positive instructions with regard to those galleries. I was this afternoon——

THE SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman is out of order.

The matter then dropped.

QU'APPELLE, LONG LAKE AND SASKATCHEWAN RAILROAD AND STEAMBOAT AGREEMENT BILL.

HON. MR. PERLEY moved the second reading of (Bill 36) "The Qu'Apelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company Agreement."

He said: The object of this Bill is to confirm an agreement entered into between the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. There has been an agreement for the running of the road after it is built by the former company, and while there is no doubt about that company having the power to make the agreement, there is some doubt about the Canadian Pacific Railway Company having the power, and this Bill is to confirm the agreement.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 4:15 p.m.

KEEFER DIVORCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY moved the adoption of the report of the Select Committee on Divorce on Bill (G) "An Act for the relief of Hugh Forbes Keefer." He said: It may be convenient to the House that I should, as chairman of the committee, tell exactly what the situation of this matter is, and what are the points that will arise for the consideration of the House. These parties married in the year 1871 and lived peacefully together until the year 1880. In the spring of that year the petitioner—the husband—removed, in the course of his business, to a portion of the United States, in order to get employment, and remained there five months, returning in the autumn of the same year. He remained until April of the following year, 1881, and then went off seeking employment, ultimately reaching British Columbia on the 1st January, 1882. While there he received information of the birth of a child, which he says, in the course of the evidence, he was quite satisfied he was not the father of, and I assume that this action was predicated on that supposition; because I find by the Bill that the complainant says: "In or about the year 1883 the said Rebecca Ann Keefer deserted her said husband, and has not since resided with the said Hugh Forbes Keefer; that after she deserted her said husband as aforesaid he discovered, as the fact was, that the said Rebecca Ann Keefer had been leading an irregular life, and had committed adultery in or about the year 1883, and on divers occasions subsequently to the said last mentioned year."

Acting upon that supposition the petitioner sent a sum of money to his wife to pay off debts, with the intimation that that was the last she was to see of him. Things went on in that way until ultimately, in the year 1883, there being no correspondence between the parties whatever—I may say there was no cohabitation between them—when the applicant learned that a divorce had been applied for by his wife, in the State of New York, from himself, on the ground of adultery committed by him. Papers were served on him, but he paid no attention to them, and took no action whatever, although he denies the fact that he was guilty of adultery. No proceedings on that application for divorce were brought before the committee, for the reason, as he says, that the papers he received were burnt in the great fire in Vancouver, and that is a satisfactory reason, perhaps, why he could not produce the papers. It will be seen, by referring to the report, that subsequently to his having ascertained in 1883 to his own satisfaction that his wife was living an irregular life, and particularly with a person whose name is mentioned in these proceedings—the man Simpson—he took no steps whatever until proceedings were taken in this case, and she appears on the scene afterwards as the wife of this person, how or under what circumstances there is no evidence before the committee; but all this is brought out in examination on the part of the promoter of the Bill. There was no opposition to the Bill. The consideration of this matter involves a series of complications, I am sorry to say, and as this is a majority report it is but right I should explain what these complications are. The position of the promoter is this: that she, having lived with another man, in the year 1883 and subsequently, there can be no question about the subsequent acts of adultery, whatever may be the impression as to the birth of the child, which necessarily involved adultery with some person, according to his view of the case. The claim is, that although there might not have been any ground for divorce in the first instance, that with regard to the subsequent acts of adultery—that is to say, living as the wife of another man—it is clearly a case for relief. But it ignores altogether the preceding circumstances. These circumstances are the delay in taking action with reference to the matter in regard to the birth of this child, which he assumes to have involved an act of adultery. The delay has taken place since the 1st day of January, 1882, when he admits that he first formed the conclusion that that child was not his. I think he is under a mistake as regards that. At all events, that was his impression, and he acted upon that impression, and I assume that it is a mistake, because he fixed the date he left himself as April, 1881, and he got the information of the birth of the child by letters which came over the plains, and which necessarily took some time. I need not go into the matter further than to say that the child may have been, and probably was, within the proper limit. It is stated in the evidence —on what authority I do not know—that the child was born nine months and two weeks after the petitioner's separation from his wife. Under these circumstances, there is a doubt that the child is the child of the husband. Two years afterwards he heard that his wife was living an irregular life, and he then sent her $500; and there is some importance attached to this by the petitioner himself, from the fact that there was a mistake in the evidence when the question was asked him, was this before he heard of the birth of the child; he said yes. When he read over his evidence he desired to correct that answer, and the House will see by referring to the minutes that in the attestation of the minutes at the very bottom of his deposition he gave us his corrected answer, which was that it was not before, but after. After all these facts, he sleeps upon the matter and lets it go until the proceedings are taken in the court of New York. He does not defend the proceedings against himself, and we can only assume that the proceedings were taken and the divorce granted in consequence of the application being unopposed. The question narrows itself down to this: was this delay and the subsequent proceeding in any way a condonation, or, can it be construed into collusion or connivance between the parties? The rule as regards delay is laid down very clearly by authority. It is laid down in Dixon's "Law and Practice of Divorce," page 206, where it is stated:

"Unreasonable delay is another ground for the exercise of the discretion of the court. It is such as makes it appear that the petitioner is insensible to the loss of his wife, and it might also be be said to be equivalent to condonation. Again, it has been spoken of as meaning culpable delay, somewhat in the nature of connivance or acquiescence. What delay is unreasonable or capable of explanation is purely a question of fact, and will be decided solely upon the evidence."

Then it is laid down in MacQueen's Law of Husband and Wife that a delay of two years, after knowledge of all the facts, requires explanation. It is also laid down in the same work that a husband may still be guilty of desertion so as to connive at her committing adultery even though he supports the wife while absent from her. On the same page it says, where there has been no bargain or consent, absence may constitute desertion, even though an allowance has been made. The authorities are very strong upon that point, and the reason of it is stated here in larger form:

"A husband cannot neglect and throw aside his wife and afterwards, if she is unfaithful to him, obtain a divorce on the ground of her infidelity. If chastity be the duty of the wife, protection is no less the duty of the husband. The wife has a right to the comfort and support of her husband's society, the security of his house and name, and his protection, as far as circumstances permit. If he falls short of this he is not wholly blameless if she fall, and though not justifying her fall, he has so far compromised himself as to forfeit his claim for a divorce."

These are plain principles, upon which, I fancy, there will be no difference of opinion in this House. They are founded upon reason, because a husband may, by living away from his wife and keeping away from her, place her in the position that when she is neglected she cannot be made responsible if she does fall; and it is a protection to the bond of marriage between the parties in itself, that if a husband acts so, and waits for years and years, he need not afterwards come to this court for relief. The petitioner says that, in the year 1883, he wrote to his wife and informed her that if she did not come at once and live with him that that was the last she should ever see of him. So it seems to have been a somewhat mutual bargain that they should live apart. Under these circumstances, it is for the House to decide what course should be taken. This is a majority report, and having acted as chairman of the committee, though unfortunately differing from the majority of the committee in the decision they arrived at, I may say, in justice to myself, that the general rule for condonation, apart from the circumstances themselves, is that there must not only be a condonation, but there must be cohabitation afterwards. That is the general rule. Apart from the special circumstances of this case, that would be the rule that would govern with regard to condonation, and that is the contention of the other side.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—In a matter of this kind, involving the severing of the most sacred of human ties, we should act with great care and deliberation. Our decision must stamp one or the other of the parties with the greatest infamy; and we must exercise all the more caution in this case in view of the fact that the application has not been opposed by the respondent. I shall not go over the grounds which have been stated by my hon. friend from Amherst, but I may say that I have never known a case where the evidence has been placed so imperfectly before the Senate—evidence which would have an important bearing on the case, and which the petitioner could have produced had he chosen to do so. The petitioner himself states that the last child was born some ten or eleven months after his departure from home.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That was his suspicion.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—He says so positively, and he says that he came to the conclusion from the time he received the last letter from his wife that the child was not his, and upon that he condones or connives at it by sending her a large sum of money—$500. If he wished to produce reliable evidence on that point it was easy for him to have obtained from the register of births and deaths the date of the birth of the child, but he never got any information of that kind at all. He is therefore clearly guilty of neglect, which must enure to his own disadvantage in this case. Not only did he leave his wife in the manner that my hon. friend has described, but we have evidence here which cannot be very readily got over, that he, in 1883, was served with regular papers for a divorce, on the ground that he had been guilty of adultery with a woman whose name was given. That divorce suit was brought in the State of New York, which is the only state in the Union that grants divorces only on the ground that we recognize here. The petitioner in this case admits that he was served with these papers, that he never made any opposition, and in fact took no notice whatever of the proceedings. He said, in giving his evidence, that if she did not wish to live with him she could go. The evidence shows that the respondent in this case obtained a divorce from her husband in the State of New York on the ground alleged, and that she is now living with a man named Simpson as his wife. I ask you if there has not been a laxity, a carelessness and an indifference on his part which would justify us in refusing to grant him a divorce? It is a question in my mind now whether we should, by granting this Bill, declare that the divorce granted in the State of New York was improperly obtained—whether we would not be acting in defiance of a court of competent jurisdiction in a State where the grounds of divorce that are recognized are the same as in this country. If we grant this Bill, we declare that the respondent has been living in adultery since 1883. The petitioner could not have been a poor man, because after he believed that his wife had been unfaithful to him he sent her $500.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté)—The evidence is to the contrary.

HON. MR. KAULBACH.—I will read the evidence. At Page 4 his counsel asked the question: "You sent the $500 before you heard of the birth of this child?" The reply is: "Yes" Then, when he comes to have the evidence read over to him he says as to his answer to the first question on page 11, as to sending the $500, before hearing of the birth of the child, which answer he declares should be "No" instead of "Yes." There he corrects the evidence himself, and says that he sent this $500 to her after he believed she had been untrue to him. Therefore, we are justified in refusing this Bill, because this man has connived at his wife's conduct: he has, by failing to defend the suit in the court of New York, admitted that his wife was justified in applying for a divorce. If he had been innocent, can we imagine that he would have allowed the case to go unopposed? Would he not have used every means in his power to protest his innocence and relieve his wife from the illusion that he was unfaithful to her? He does nothing of the kind; he remains away from her, and allows her to get a divorce on the ground of his adultery with another woman, and the judgment in that case is binding on us. Since 1883 he has taken no action in this matter until he comes forward at this late hour and asks this House to dissolve his marriage and to stamp the respondent with infamy and disgrace.

HON. MR. MCKAY—She has married again.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—You say, if you adopt this report, that she is not married to the man with whom she is now living, and with whom she has been living since 1883. The divorce was obtained from a court of competent jurisdiction for a cause which we would consider sufficient here, and he having by his negligence allowed his wife to get a divorce on that ground, it would be unwise for us to sever the tie that exists between the parties.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B. C.)—We have no evidence before us of what was done in the divorce court in the United States when the wife of the petitioner obtained a divorce. We have evidence to show that this petitioner could not defend that action. He was a poor man at the time, living three thousand miles away, and after he was first told that his wife had been guilty of indiscretions he wrote to her asking her to come to him. She replied that she was married when she was very young, and did not know her own mind, and that she had no more affection for him. He was not satisfied to let it stop even there. Her father was with him at Vancouver, and this petitioner gave him money to return to Ontario, and see why his wife would not come to him. What more could the man have done? After the father left for Ontario he heard no more of him or from his wife. After spending all this money, he had not the means to go to New York and defend the divorce case. The only ground for opposing this Bill is that the petitioner had a suspicion in his mind that the child that was born after his departure from Ontario was not his, but that suspicion was not confirmed at the time he forwarded the money, and could not be construed into a condonation of the offence. Condonation must be a forgiveness, a restoring of the wife to where she was before in his affections: but there was nothing of that kind. There was a mere suspicion, and the money was sent before her guilt was established. As the question of condonation has been raised, I will read from Dixon on Divorce what condonation is:

"Condonation, as applied to matrimonial causes, had its origin in the Ecclesiastical courts, and it is obivious, on an examination of the cases subsequent to the Divorce Act, that it still bears its original signification. The whole doctrine is a structure of the courts, founded on the necessities of the case. It means a blotting out of the offence, so as to restore the offending party to the position which he or she occupied before the offence was committed. It is a conditional forgiveness on a full knowledge of all antecedent guilt, the condition being that the offence shall not be repeated. In order to found it, there must be a complete knowledge of all the adulterous connection, and a condonation subsequent to it. In other words, it is 'forgiveness of a conjugal offence, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances,' i. e., those relating to the guilt of the erring party.

"It must be marked by a return to matrimonial cohabitation. It is, of course, in the power of the party to annex a condition precedent to an offer of condonation. If this condition is not complied with there is no condonation of the offence, and it cannot afterwards be pleaded in a suit in which the offence is charged."

But even if he had condoned her first offence, he did not condone her second offence of getting married.

HON. MR. MCMILLAN—What was the first offence? Was it that child?

HON. MR. READ—Yes.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C)—Supposing he had condoned the first offence, he did not forgive her for her marriage with another man, with whom she is now living in this Province.

HON. MR. MCMILLAN—Did the petitioner establish that the child was really not his?

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B. C.)—He did not establish it.

HON. MR. MCMILLAN—He certainly did not in the evidence. We know the period for which a woman should carry a child is two hundred and eighty days, and as I

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I never was there—I cannot tell. I think the House will have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that this man was entitled to a divorce. There has been no condonation.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—It appears to me that there is a probability of some of the hon. gentlemen arriving at a conclusion from what I take to be a misapprehension of the doctrine of condonation. The law appears to be perfectly clear on that point, and there appears to be a tendency to ignore what really constitutes condonation. The hon. gentleman from Victoria has just cited Dixon on Divorce. It may be considered pardonable on my part should I again refer to that work, with the object of making a few comments upon the discussion of that doctrine as laid down in Dixon. He says: "Condonation as applied to matrimonial causes had its origin in the ecclesiastical courts, and it is obvious, on examination of the cases subsequent to the Divorce Act, that it still bears its original signification. The whole doctrine is a structure of the courts, founded on the necessities of the case. It means a blotting out of the offence, so as to restore the offending party to the position which he or she occupied before the offence was committed."

In connection with this, let me remark that there was a suspicion. The petitioner stated that a suspicion entered his mind at the time he received this letter that possibly the child might not be his. It is quite evident from the subsequent evidence, and I think the minds of the committee were made perfectly clear on that point, that the child was his, and the subsequent evidence established that fact. There is nothing proven to the contrary, I submit. Now, he might have had a very vague suspicion at the time he received this letter that the child was not his, but it did not resolve itself into such a fact as would satisfy a court of law that the child was any other than the petitioner's; so that at the utmost, if we take this point as against the petitioner, it must resolve itself into a suspicion as distinguished from a fact. Now, it could not be said that when he entertained that suspicion that it blotted out the facts that constitute this case, and which make it a very clear case, to my mind, that this honorable House should grant relief to the petitioner, because the facts upon which he relied to establish his case were facts which occurred subsequent to the reception of that letter. There could not be a blotting out or condonation of the conduct of his wife, for the simple reason that the wife had the audacity to marry another man before she was absolved from her marriage with the petitioner, and is to-day living in Canada married to a man named Simpson. It cannot be contended by the hon. gentlemen opposing this Bill that there should be a condonation of that particular act, or that there ever was such a condonation. The evidence is clear on that point, that if there ever was a condonation of a first offence it was a condonation based on a suspicion that entered into his own mind; and I think it was to his credit if he gave his wife the benefit of the doubt. It would be a dangerous doctrine to lay down, that because a man has a suspicion in his mind he must at once cast his wife away from his door, lest it should turn out on evidence that that suspicion was true, and resolve itself, perchance, into a fact, that would, at some long subsequent date, preclude him getting the relief to which he would be entitled. Such a doctrine would require a man who entertained a suspicion of his wife's infidelity to spurn her from his door. That is the doctrine we are asked to accept here, as submitted by the hon. gentlemen from Lunenburg and Amherst. I contend that there was no evidence whatever as to the divorce in the United States. It must be quite clear to hon. gentlemen on that committee that they refused to accept any evidence of that divorce, and quite properly so. Whatever evidence was submitted, there was merely a bald statement of facts, and the chairman of the committee absolutely refused to allow evidence to be put in as to that divorce, other than a mere statement of fact that a divorce was obtained by her, and which, I say, is a fact that should at once establish the case against her, and would justify us in granting relief to the petitioner. But now let me proceed with the authority which I was reading: "It means a blotting out of the offence, so as to restore the offending party to the position which he or she occupied before the offence was committed."

The offence was committed long subsequent to that first suspicion, and the suspicion was not the ground on which relief is sougnt. The facts on which the petitioner comes to this House for relief are facts which occurred long subsequent to that first suspicion. Dixon continues: "It is an additional forgiveness on a full knowledge of all antecedent guilt—." Now, there is no evidence, as hon. gentlemen will see from a perusal of the report, that the petitioner had any knowledge whatever of antecedent guilt on his wife's part—"the condition being that the offence shall not be repeated. In order to found it there must be a complete knowledge of all the adulterous connection and a condonation subsequent to it."

Now, I do not think there is an hon. gentleman in this House who will for one moment say that this case is one in which the doctrine of condonation can be made applicable; for here we find it laid down and particularly emphasized in this book, which I take to be the standard work on the question, that there must be complete knowledge of all the adulterous acts and a subsequent forgiveness of them. It is a condonation of the conjugal offence with a full knowlege of all the circumstances. Now, what are the facts? If ever there was a case of an audacious contravention or violation of law it is in this particular case on the part of the petitioner's wife, in the fact of her being married to this Mr. Simpson without having obtained a divorce in this country, and that she is living at the present time with this Mr. Simpson as her husband,—her husband, the petitioner, being still a resident of this country and not divorced from her——

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Having obtained a divorce.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg appears to lay considerable stress on the fact that there was a divorce in the United States. As I understand, this House does not recognize that divorce one way or the other. So far as this House is concerned, the decree of divorce obtained in the United States is in this chamber so much waste paper, and the committee very properly refused to consider the evidence of that divorce.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—No evidence was tendered.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED.—I am quite correct in saying that the evidence was excluded by the chairman of the committee as to this particular divorce. Now, as to the ground of delay, very great stress has been laid on that by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, but there was a very clear and distinct explanation of this delay. We find that this petitioner was insolvent in 1880, and to such an extent had he failed that he had to leave his home in 1881 and go out on the Northern Pacific and work, as I take it, as a railway navvy. In 1882 and 1883 we find him drifting to British Columbia and there working on the railway.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—As a contractor.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—There was no evidence before the committee that he had any means by which he could prosecute a case for obtaining relief. On the contrary, he states very emphatically that he was not in a position to furnish the necessary means to obtain this legislation. Those of us who are acquainted with the circumstances of such a man know perfectly well that when he was living at a distance nearly 3,000 miles from Ottawa he was not in a position to provide the necessary means, under the circumstances related by him as to his occupation, for the purpose of prosecuting his case. He states most emphatically, in evidence, that he was not in a position to do so. I take that to be a most satisfactory explanation as to the delay. Now, let me cite to hon. gentlemen from the same authority that I have already been quoting from:

"Unreasonable delay is another ground for the exercise of the discretion of the court. It is such as makes it appear that the petitioner is insensible to the loss of his wife, and it might almost be said to be equivalent to condonation. Again, it has been spoken of as meaning culpable delay, somewhat in the nature of connivance or acquiescence."

Can it be said there is one scintilla of evidence as to this man's conniving at the marriage of his wife at the time he left? There was not a shadow of doubt that his wife had any improper dealings with Simpson. This authority continues:

"A husband whose pecuniary circumstances were embarrassed postponed proceeding until he could bring forward conclusive evidence of his wife's guilt. Delay held reasonable.

"Lack of means to proceed earlier, though a long time has elapsed since the commission of the acts complained of, will be a satisfactory explanation of the delay."

I think that this case comes within the particular illustration I have cited; and again:

"A desire to avoid public exposure of the scandal at a mother's wish, and a forbearance of twenty years, though an unreasonable delay, have not been considered sufficient grounds for barring a decree.

"An impression that by the elopement of his wife to America and residence there a divorce would be unnecessary, and mental prostration due to his wife's misconduct, has been held a sufficient explanation of the petitioner's delay. Hence the explanation of the delay may be various, and it is manifest that their force or weakness depends entirely upon the facts of the case."

I assert that there could not be a condonation in this particular case on the point of delay, for the simple reason that the wife had married another man, and there could have been no hope in the petitioner's mind that by condonation he could have effected a reconciliation with his wife, because she was married to another, and living with him as her husband. The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg has referred in the most pathetic terms to the dissolution of the marriage tie, and to its sacred character. From the evidence here it is quite apparent that the sympathy should be with the petitioner in this case, for the wife entirely ignores the marriage tie, and violates the solemn contract of matrimony, and marries another, and lives with him as her husband. Therefore, I think it would not be justifiable in this case to refuse the extension of sympathy to this petitioner, if such is proper in the consideration of such a case. He ought to have sympathy, so far as sentiment can be introduced into a case of this kind, and on these grounds I am of opinion that we are perfectly justified in supporting this Bill.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—It seems that the only objections to this Bill are that in one instance there has been a condonation of the wife's offence and that there has been delay in making this application. The hon. gentlemen who oppose this Bill do not altogether agree on these points. So far as condonation is concerned, I cannot see how this petitioner has condoned his wife's guilt, and I fail to see how he can be condemned for having delayed his application. He is a poor man, who failed in business and went quarrying stone for the Welland Canal. He afterwards went away for two years, and finally went to work on the Canadian Pacific Railway. During all this time, it is shown by the evidence, he repeatedly sent home money to his wife for her support and for the support of the family. After getting a letter from a friend stating that she was not behaving herself properly in her relations with Simpson, he immediately telegraphed $500 to bring her and the children to him. Connivance would be a bar to divorce, but it is quite evident that this man did not connive at his wife's offence. If she was in the way of temptation he did all in his power to remove her from the temptation. Consequently, there is nothing to be said on the subject of condonation. Then, as to the delay, we have this very Session granted a divorce for an offence committed sixteen years ago, and there was not a word said about the delay of the petitioner in making application to this House for relief—the same committee, the same chairman—and sixteen years after the event the action was carried through. This man, in the year 1883, heard that his wife was applying for a divorce. That was late in the fall of that year. Six years have elapsed since. He was 3,000 miles away, and had to earn the money to enter this suit, and certainly he should not be barred from getting a divorce when he made enough money to apply to this court, which is no trifling matter. He prosecuted his claim, to my mind, at as early a date as it was possible to do, and it should be no bar to him that there was delay. I am quite prepared to support the report of the committee, and I hope the House will do the same.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think the principal cause of the difficulty in this matter is the charge of condonation. As I understood the evidence, when he remitted the money to his wife he had no knowledge that she was acting improperly. It was long subsequent to this that he received a letter from some of his friends in this country that his wife was unfaithful, and it was then he opened his eyes to the fact that she was not a suitable companion for him, and he telegraphed her that from that time out he would have nothing more to do with her. At the time he sent the $500 to his wife he had no knowledge that she was acting improperly, and to my mind it would not amount to condonation in this case. He has been employed in different parts of the country, had been burnt out and lost all his papers, and had a great many difficulties to contend with. I do not think it should be a bar to getting relief in this action that there was delay. He seemed to have a great desire to support his wife, until he heard from his sister that she was acting in an improper manner. It was brought out in evidence that he had only heard incidentally that she had applied for a divorce.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Not incidentally. There was a legal process served upon him, charging him with adultery.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—He admits that. But about that time the great fire in Vancouver took place, and all his papers were burned, and I do not know that he was aware of the contents of those papers.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—He swears that he did know—that he had read them.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—Possibly he had, but paid very little attention to them, as he had found out at that time that she had acted improperly.

HON. MR. McMILLAN—He admitted the charge.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B. C.)—No; he denied the charge against himself.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—I do not think he admitted any specific knowledge of the contents of those papers, and as far as I understand from what he said upon that occasion, he simply admitted there were papers served on him.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—He admitted that the papers were served upon him, and that a divorce suit was to be prosecuted in New York. He also admitted that the papers served upon him charged him with adultery with a certain woman, and that he knew she had got a divorce; but he denied before us in committee that he was guilty himself of adultery.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—That denial ought to go as far in his favor as the knowledge of the service of those papers should go against him. We know, from the evidence, that the woman committed adultery, and the petitioner should get relief.

HON. MR. McCLELAN—As a member of the committee to whom this matter was referred, I endeavored to give close attention to the case, and I was unable to come to any other conclusion than that to which the majority of the committee came —that the Bill should be granted. Although there was some little objection taken to some points, it did not occur to me that it was sufficiently strong to justify the committee in refusing to grant the Bill. As to the charge of condonation, it appeared to me that the husband, situated as he was, so many thousand miles away, and hearing rumors of scandal from something that was written to him, it was eminently proper for the husband to do under the circumstances what he did do, with a view to rescuing his wife from the dangers which appeared to beset her, and if possible put her in a position where she would be beyond suspicion; and I do not think the steps he took on that occasion would amount to condonation of her offence. It was not that he was cognizant of certain facts, but that his suspicions merely were aroused, and although he had his suspicions he was quite willing to supply all the spare money he had in order that his wife might be removed to where he was, and they might live happily together. Subsequently, as he told us, his means became more limited, and he was not able to defend the case brought against him in New York, but he was afterwards enabled to spare means to prosecute the divorce, which subsequent events proved to him was necessary. Consequently, this should not be brought against him as any objection against the passing of this Bill. It has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg that the divorce obtained by the wife in the United States was not recognized by the committee in any way, because it has become pretty well established, in this Chamber at any rate, that divorces obtained in the different states of the Union are not such divorces as can be recognized as legal and proper here, so that the evidence of that proceeding was not developed before the committee to any extent. The mere fact was brought out, and nothing more. Not only did we fail to secure any evidence to support the view that the husband had committed adultery, as was alleged, but we had his own evidence completely contradicting the charge, and we have other evidence inferentially to the same effect. I call the attention of hon. members to the evidence given by J. P. Tisdale, who is a brother of this woman, and who gave testimony as to her living with Simpson. The question put by the hon. gentleman from Victoria was: "Did your sister give you any reason for getting a divorce?" The answer was: "I had no communication with her at all."

"Q. She never told you why she got a divorce?
"A. No; she gave me the divorce papers. I had no communication with her.
"Q. She gave you no ground for seeking a divorce?
"A. I never spoke to her on the subject at all. We were living some distance from each other."

That would indicate that if there had been any serious matter for divorce proven against her husband it would have been, under the circumstances of the case, communicated to her brother. But it was not so communicated, and therefore I say we have not only the direct statement made by him that the charge was false, but we have also the conclusion which we can inferentially draw from the testimony given by the brother of this woman, that the charge was unfounded, that adultery was not the reason why she got what she called a divorce in the State of New York. So, looking at all the points developed in this case, I may say that, so far as my humble judgment goes, it is as clear a case as any that has ever come before us in which relief should be granted.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I do not propose to argue the matter in any way, but I think it would be well for the House to look at the evidence, rather than to the arguments which are advanced, and which I deem to be rather contradictory. In answer to the question as to the birth of this child, a question put by the petitioner's own counsel, as follows: "Since you left your wife the last time (that was in the spring of 1881) had you any intimation of other children being born?" He says:

"A. Yes; there was another child born after I left her.
"Q. How long after you left?
"A. Ten or eleven months after my leaving home.
"Q. Have you ever disclaimed the paternity of that child?
"A. Yes.
"Q. For what reason?
"A. Well, on account of the child being born the time it was. I knew that unless it was something out of the ordinary, that I was not the father of the child."

Then one of the members of the committee seems not to have been satisfied with the answer to that question, and the question is put by Mr. Ogilvie:

"Q. You cannot fix the month. How can you tell that the child was born ten months after you left?
"A. Because when I got news of the birth of the child I knew the dates then. You see my letters that I had were all burned at the fire in Vancouver, and I was away, too, at the time."

That is his answer. Now, as to the other point, the evidence has not been adverted to. It is an answer to a question put by myself, and will be found on page 2 of the evidence. After he had stated that he had sent $250 to pay outstanding accounts, he was asked:

"Q. That was in the summer of 1882, was it?
"A. 1883, I think. Then a little while afterwards I got an intimation from a friend at Thorold that my wife was not behaving herself in a very proper manner with a Mr. Simpson there, and I telegraphed her $500 through the bank, and told her to take the children and come out at once, and if she did not, that that was the last she would see of me."

That is the evidence, and it will be for the House to decide upon the evidence.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—I think that the last remark from the hon. gentleman from Amherst is the best proof that we could have that the petitioner did not condone any offence, but was trying to save his wife if he could do so. It was not only his wife that was being supported by this money that he sent: the children had to be supported as well, and that was one of the reasons. Then the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg seems to have directed the principal part of his remarks to that divorce from New York, and he gave great weight to that incident. Hon. gentlemen who were sitting in this House three or four years ago would have thought the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg had got enough of New York divorce at that time, when we had a week's fight over it, and it was then the opinion of this House and the vote of this House that we should pay no attention to foreign divorce at all.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—No.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—I beg the hon. gentlemen's pardon; I say, yes, it was. When the different States of the Union will not recognize divorce among themselves, I should like to know why we should recognize their divorces in this country? That was the understanding come to then, and hon. gentlemen should remember that divorce in the State of New York has no recognition here; and as truly remarked by my hon. friend opposite, we pay no attention to it. The gentlemen who did sign this report were unanimous, and some of them spoke out very clearly, and said that they never saw a clearer case for divorce—that this petitioner did more than most men would have done under the circumstances. He is a poor man, working on sub-contracts out in British Columbia. It was not very easy then to go round by San Francisco and up here to Ottawa to get a divorce if he had not the money. He did the best he could as soon as he got the means. Every member of the committee but two thought it was a perfectly clear case, and I hope that this House will consider it a clear case also.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was adopted, on a division.

HON. MR. CLEMOW moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ALMON moved the second reading of Bill (U) "An Act to amend an Act concerning Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister." He said: In moving the second reading of the Bill I should apologise to this House for introducing a measure of this kind, that I did not leave it in the hands of the lawyers. But lawyers, although very necessary in framing Bills, sometimes muddle them, and make them less clear than they should be. I think this Bill is so clear that it speaks for it self. I will read it:

"Whereas, by An Act passed in the forty-fifth year of Her Majesty's reign, chapter forty-two, intituled: 'An Act concerning Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister,' all laws prohibiting a marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister were repealed; and whereas it is desirable likewise to remove all prohibition against marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister's daughter: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

"1. All laws prohibiting marriage between a man and the daughter of his deceased wife's sister are hereby repealed, both as to past and future marriages, and as regards past marriages, as if such laws had never existed.

"2. This Act shall not affect, in any manner, any case decided by or pending before any court of justice; nor shall it affect any rights actually acquired by the issue of the first marriage previous to the passing of this Act, nor shall this Act affect any such marriage when either of the parties has afterwards, during the life of the other, lawfully intermarried with any other person."

It appeared to me to follow, as a matter of course, when we passed the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, which enabled a man to marry his deceased wife's sister, that he could marry the daughter of his deceased wife's sister; but I found on enquiry of legal authorities that this is not the case—that in order to make it lawful to marry a deceased wife's sister's daughter another Act would have to be passed. Why this provision was not incorporated in the former Act I do not know, but I suppose it was because people's passions were so aroused in the controversy that they overlooked this important fact. Now that we can look at it calmly and dispassionately, this Bill being introduced by a layman instead of a lawyer, we will take a common sense view of the matter and decide it according to the facts of the case. As the law at present stands, a man feeling that he can legally marry his deceased wife's sister thinks he is equally free to marry his deceased wife's sister's daughter, and the daughter knowing that he could marry her mother thinks the same. They marry, and what is the result? A short time after the woman finds that instead of being a wife she is a mistress and that her children are illegitimate. Some hon. gentlemen may say that this may be got over by such people going over to the United States, and getting married there. That is a marriage in the eye of God, but it is certainly not a marriage in the eye of the law. The wife may at any moment have it cast up to her that she is not a legal wife, and her children may be told by their schoolfellows, at any time, that they are bastards. I think it is our duty to remove this anomoly in the law, and I trust this matter will be considered calmly and quietly, without letting any other feelings interfere with the justice of the case.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I may say I quite agree with my hon. friend as regards the law as it at present exists, and I infer from what he says that this is a relief Bill for people who have entered imprudently into the marriage contract. The hon. gentleman is wrong in saying that this matter was not considered when the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill was before the House. I opposed that Bill, and I brought this very question up as being the natural consequence of it—that poople would next want to marry their own nieces. This is the legitimate outcome of the adoption of what I consider to be a vicious principle, a result of departing from long-established usage in relation to the marriage tie. It is another step showing the vicious principle of the measure we adopted a few years ago. It destroys all the friendly relationships between the family of the wife and the family of the husband. The House having passed a law to permit a man to marry his own sister-in-law, I have no doubt that they will also come to the conclusion that, as a natural consequence of that step, they must legalize marriage with a deceased wife's niece. I am opposed to it on principle, but I presume my hon. friend will get his Bill through.

HON. MR. POWER—I hope my hon. colleague will not be irritated with me when I take the liberty of saying that I cordially agree with his view in regard to this Bill, and that he will not think I prejudice the chances of his measure by making this statement. I voted with the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg when the Bill to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister was before the House, but I think my hon. colleague from Halifax is quite right in saying that to be just and logical we should go a little further than we did then, and that we should legislate in the direction of this Bill. I rose, however, chiefly for the purpose of suggesting to my hon. colleague that his Bill does not go quite far enough. I think, instead of saying the daughter of a deceased wife's sister, the Bill should say the niece of the deceased wife, because why should not a man be allowed to marry the daughter of his deceased wife's brother as well as the daughter of the deceased wife's sister?

HON. MR. ALMON—I will be very happy to have the hon. gentleman's support in this matter, but the reason I did not adopt the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman was this: the Bill we passed in relation to a deceased wife's sister did not permit a woman to marry the brother of her deceased husband, and that was my reason for leaving the children of the deceased wife's brother out of the question.

HON. MR. MILLER—I do not desire to prolong the discussion on this question, and do not consider it necessary, as I take it for granted that this Bill is the logical outcome of the Act passed some years ago to legalize a man's marriage with his deceased wife's sister. I do not think there could be any objection to marriage with the daughter of the deceased wife's sister, who is one degree further removed from the deceased wife than the sister; therefore, whatever objection there might be, there can be none with regard to consanguinity. There could be only an objection on the ground of affinity, being within the prohibited degrees. I do not intend to argue the case, as my hon. friend from Halifax has stated pretty much what I feel on this question. I think it is an absurdity that our law should stand as it is—that a man should be permitted to marry the sister of his deceased wife and not the daughter.

The motion was agreed to on a division, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE PATENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (17) "An Act to amend 'The Patent Act.'" He said: The principle of this Bill is to take from the Minister the decision of legal questions arising upon patents, and conferring the power of making those decisions upon the courts. At present, if a dispute arises as to the validity of a patent or as to the validity of its continuance, it is the Minister who has to hear and decide the question. It is thought that that is more a subject for consideration by the court, and it is proposed to give it to the court, as we did the other day with respect to trade marks. The second object of the Bill is merely to correct some verbal omissions and alterations in the existing law.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (7) "An Act further to amend 'The Dominion Elections Act,'" Chapter eight of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

HON. MR. CLEMOW from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The report was received and adopted.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am sorry that the hon. gentleman from New Westminster is not in his place. He asked me a question about this Bill when it came up for second reading, as to the time allowed for notification in British Columbia. I propose to inform him that the provision of the Election Act granted for British Columbia the most extended time—the same time which is allowed for two or three other constituencies in the remainder of the Dominion, which cannot get their notices out in the usual time between nomination and election. I move the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

ESCAPES FROM INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS IN ONTARIO.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day having been called—Second reading Bill (S) "An Act respecting Escapes from Industrial Schools in the Province of Ontario."

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved that the Order of the Day be discharged, as the Bill was not printed.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I should like to ask the leader of the House if his attention has been directed to the fact that in the Dominion there are other industrial schools besides those in Ontario, and if there is to be a general Act, which will apply to all the industrial schools in the Provinces.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I may state that that question has already arisen, and is being considered, and there are one or two others of importance, and it is the consideration of these questions that has prevented the Bill from being now in shape to be proceeded with in the House before Thursday next.

The Order of the Day was discharged.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time without debate:—

Bill (71) "An Act to incorporate the Brandon and South Western Railway Company." (Mr. Boulton.)

Bill (69) "An Act respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company." (Mr. McCallum.)

Bill (64) "An Act to incorporate the Moncton and Prince Edward Island Railway and Ferry Company." (Mr. Poirier.)

INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGE COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (54) "An Act to incorporate the Interprovincial Bridge Company." He said: This is a Bill to authorize the construction of a bridge to connect the cities of Ottawa and Hull. It will be for railways as well as for general passenger traffic. I may say that a new principle is incorporated in this Bill, inasmuch as it gives power to all railways, both present and future, to use this bridge on equal terms; and, therefore, it will be no monopoly, and will obviate the necessity of building several other bridges across the Ottawa River.

HON. MR. POWER—I am very glad to hear from the promoter of this Bill that the company have adopted a new principle, and that they propose to allow all railway companies to use their bridge on equal terms; but I think that there are one or two considerations which arise in connection with this Bill that deserve a little attention before it is read the second time, and the House is thereby committed to its principle. Hon. gentlemen will remember that legislation was passed by the State of New York, and also by the Province of Ontario, some years ago, to prevent the utilization of the Niagara Falls for the purpose of commerce or manufacture, and I think that this Bill brings up a similar question to the proposal to utilize the Niagara Falls for manufacturing purposes. By the third clause of this Bill it proposes that:

"3. The company may erect, construct, work, maintain, manage and use a railway bridge, with the necessary approaches, over the Ottawa River, from some point in the city of Ottawa between Metcalfe square and the ferry landing at the foot of St. Patrick street, or from some point on the Rideau Canal, within the limits of the city of Ottawa, to some point in the city of Hull."

I think it would be a piece of vandalism to build a railway bridge from the foot of the canal here to the city of Hull. In addition to its being an exceedingly objectionable thing to have the trains running so close to the Parliament buildings, between here and Major Hill, or between the Parliament buildings and Nepean Point, it would disfigure the landscape just at the seat of Government, and this is a feature that we should think over before deciding what we shall do. There is now a good railway bridge from the Hull side of the river to Ottawa, and if another bridge is necessary it might be constructed a little further down the river, so that it would not come right in between those buildings and the grounds on the other side of the canal, which are almost adjuncts to the Parliament grounds. While I do not propose to oppose the Bill, I give notice that when it comes before the committee that I shall move that it be so amended as to provide that no bridge shall be erected within the Government grounds here. If the commercial interests of Ottawa require another bridge it should be constructed a little further down the river, where it will do just as much good to the promoters as at the mouth of the canal, and where it will not disfigure the landscape or interfere with the Parliament buildings.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—It seems to me that the people of the city of Ottawa have considered this matter themselves, and should know where the best place to locate the bridge is to be had.

HON. MR. POWER—It is not a matter in which the citizens of Ottawa are alone interested.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I think the roadway being so much lower than the Parliament grounds and buildings, that they will never suffer any inconvenience from the railway or bridge.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—The proposed location for the bridge is at Nepean Point, below the canal. It is the most convenient point at which to accommodate railways on the other side of the river, and there is a clause in the Bill which provides that before we can enter upon the public property we require to have the consent of the Government, and I fancy the interests of the people will be protected. As it is the only eligible site on which a bridge can be constructed, I don't see how it should not be adopted. Some years ago the idea was to build a bridge at Rockliffe, but it was found that the expense of the approaches and the difficulties were so great that it was abandoned. I think I can satisfy hon. gentlemen that this bridge will not interfere with the beauty of the scenery or the convenience of the Parliament grounds or buildings.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DISCLOSURE OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (T) "An Act to prevent the Disclosure of Official Documents and Information."

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause—

HON. MR. POWER said: As this is a new Bill, and one of considerable importance, and as, no doubt, most of the members of the House are not familiar with it, each clause should be explained by the hon. gentleman who has charge of the measure.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The fact is, the explanation is really in the clause itself. The principle of the Bill is simply to make a punishable offence of the disclosure of official information of which an employé of the Government comes into possession by virtue of his office. That is the whole object of the Bill. There is considerable verbiage in the Bill, necessarily, to cover every transaction. It is as nearly as possible a copy of the English Bill lately passed on this subject, which received a great deal of attention and was very carefully prepared. On reading this Bill it seems to me to bear on the face of it proof of the greatest attention to make it apply to every branch or every species of offence against the principle of secrecy which every person in a position of trust should observe. I do not know that I can explain anything further than that. The first clause defines what constitutes the offence. That clause really appears to extend to persons who are intruding themselves into places where they have no right to be, and thereby obtaining such information.

HON. MR. POWER—It appears to me that while the general purpose of the Bill may be a good one, it still requires a little more light on the subject. The first paragraph says: "Every person who, for the purpose of wrongfully obtaining information." The question is, what does "wrongfully" mean here? That is a question which suggests itself to me at once. The term "wrongfully" is not defined anywhere, but I presume it must mean a person does a thing wrongfully if he does it in contravention of any provision of the Bill. The word "wrongfully" is not defined. Take the fourth paragraph of that first section, and the effect will be this: "Whoever, when outside any fortress, arsenal, factory, dock-yard or camp in Canada belonging to Her Majesty, takes or attempts to take, without authority given by or on behalf of Her Majesty, any sketch or plan of that fortress, arsenal, factory, dock-yard or camp," such an offender is guilty of a misdemeanor. Now in the city from which I come there are a number of Imperial fortifications, and under this provision of the Bill an artist who sat down to sketch the martello tower down at Mount Pleasant Park or sketch Fort Ogilvie, or Fort Cambridge, or who sketched the citadel from the outside, would be guilty of a misdemeanor.

HON. MR. MILLER—If he did it wrongfully.

HON. MR. POWER—Apparently, he does it wrongfully unless he previously got permission. Now, nearly every summer American artists come to Halifax, and they sketch the different parts of the peninsula upon which the city stands, including the fortifications, and our own native artists do the same thing, these people having no intention of making any improper use of those sketches. But under this fourth paragraph every one of these men would be guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to the penalties inflicted by this Bill. I think hon. gentlemen will see that the language of this particular paragraph at any rate would need to be a little more guarded than it is.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will perceive that these American artists who come to take sketches of the fortifications at Halifax may or may not do so with an evil intent, but in taking these sketches they do what they are not permitted to do in sketching their own fortresses. Recently I visited an American fortress, and I found on the front doors of that fortress an extract from a law notifying the public that they must not take a sketch of it or photograph it, or sketch or photograph any part of it, and that anyone doing so is liable to be prosecuted criminally. That would be the case with these American artists if they undertook to sketch a fort in their own country. It is a very simple matter, if an artist wishes to take a sketch of a public building or fortification, to get permission. It is perfectly obvious that while the artist, in taking a sketch, might be perfectly innocent of any evil intent, he might be doing something as injurious to the welfare of the country as anyone could imagine anything to be. These sketches might be taken for the express purpose of placing them in the hands of a hostile Government as ameans of gaining access to our ortifications.

HON. MR. MILLER—I think there is complete protection afforded for the class of people that the hon. gentleman refers to by the use of the word "wrongfully." The onus of proof would be on the prosecutor.

HON. MR. DEVER—Who would be the judge?

HON. MR. MILLER—The person before whom the case would be tried; but the onus of proof under this Bill would be with the prosecutor. He would have to show that the sketch was taken wrongfully. Under the law of the United States, as mentioned by the leader of the House, there is no protection at all afforded to any person such as is provided by this Bill, and therefore there can be no reasonable objection to the clause. I think that such a law as this is highly necessary. It is only surprising to me that we did not place such a law on the Statute-book long ago.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There is such a law on the Statute-book of every country in Europe.

HON. MR. REESOR—The same law exists in every country in Europe. Only the other day I was conversing with an artist who had recently been in France, and he told me that when he made an attempt to sketch the fortifications in a town he was not allowed to do so without permission from a certain officer appointed for the purpose. I think we should make a similar provision in our own laws.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—I can confirm what our hon. leader has said. A few years ago I was visiting a large fortress in Minnesota, the name of which I have forgotten, and the first thing that confronted me was a notice that I was not to take any sketches; and more than that, the officer who went around with me, when I showed him my letters, stated that he was very glad to show me the fortress, but said there were certain things he could not show me. He thought I was a colonel in the army, because I showed him my commission as a colonel in the volunteers, and he took me round and pointed out what he pleased, but no more.

HON. MR. POWER—I presume the leader of the House does not think that I am opposing his Bill. I am calling attention to a provision in the first clause which I think is of doubtful propriety. If the doctrine laid down by the hon. member from Richmond is correct, that the onus of proof that the sketch was obtained for a wrongful purpose is with the Government, I think the objection to the Bill will be very considerably diminished. If the Government have proof that the person intended to make a wrongful use of the sketch there would be no objection to such legislation. The portion of the first clause to which I object is the paragraph that I have read. It is perfectly right that no one should be allowed to go into a fortress and take a sketch, but to say that an artist cannot sit down and sketch a military tower or fort from the outside without being liable to prosecution for a misdemeanor seems to me to be going too far. It occurs to me that it would be wiser to strike out this provision. The other clauses are not objectionable.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—The case of the amateur sketchers in whom my hon. friend from Halifax appears to be interested is protected by this clause. If their object is of a bona fide character they can get permission from the authorities to allow them to sketch. It seems to me that the very place where a fortress like that of Halifax requires to be defended is from the outside. If it is to be attacked it is from the outside, and it is from there that the mischief would be done.

The clause was adopted.

On the 2nd clause,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT said that the blanks could be filled in the House of Commons.

HON. MR. MILLER said he thought that the Senate had the power to fix the penalty, and should do so.

HON. MR. ABBOTT said he would let the clause stand until the third reading, and would in the meantime make enquiry on the subject.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved that the Bill be read the third time to-morrow.

HON. MR. MILLER—I would like to say to the leader of the House that it is only proper that he should make careful enquiry with regard to filling that part of the blank fixing the penalty and the term of imprisonment, because if we possess the power it is not right that we should give it up.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is for that purpose I have postponed the third reading of the Bill until to-morrow.

THE GAELIC LANGUAGE BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—Before the next Order of the Day is called, I wish to say that I was absent from the House when the order for the second reading of the Bill to provide for the use of the Gaelic language in official proceedings was called. I had no idea that we would reach the Orders of the Day so quickly. I, therefore, move that the Bill be restored to the Order Paper, and that it be read the second time on the 18th inst.

HON. MR. MILLER—The hon. gentleman is out of order in interrupting the Orders of the Day with a motion of this kind. Then he is out of order in making a motion without notice. I do not think that the House would object if my hon. friend would move to have the Order restored to the Paper after we are through with the Orders of the Day, but to move it now would be to confuse the minutes.

THE SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman can move it after the Orders of the Day are through with, but I do not think that a notice is required.

HON. MR. MILLER—The Bill has been dropped.

HON. MR DEVER—By whom?

HON. MR. MILLER—By the House.

HON. MR. DEVER—By accident.

HON. MR. MILLER—I say when a Bill is dropped once, a regular notice of motion has to be made to place it on the Orders. That is as clear as anything can be.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—I am the last member of this House who would violate any of our rules. At the same time, I thought I should call the attention of the House to the manner in which the Bill had been dropped, and ask to have it placed on the Orders for the second reading on Tuesday next.

HON. MR. POWER—The hon. gentleman can make that motion when we are through with the Orders of the Day.

HON. MR. MILLER—The hon. gentleman can make it with the permission of the House, and no doubt there will be no objection to it. I simply wished to preserve the regularity of our minutes.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (55) "An Act to incorporate the Shore Line Railway Bridge Company." (Mr. Botsford.)

Bill (80) "An Act respecting the Grand Trunk, Georgian Bay and Lake Erie Railway Company." (Mr. Vidal.)

Bill (61) "An Act to incorporate the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company." (Mr. Lougheed.)

SAMUEL MAY RELIEF BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of Bill (16) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Samuel May." He said: The Bill on its face states the object to be attained. It appears that Mr. May had expended a large amount of money in plant and buildings for the purpose of manufacturing this patented article, and through the neglect of his solicitor to pay the necessary patent fees the patent lapsed. The object of this Bill is to have it restored.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I think the House should consider well before passing this Bill. The grounds on which this application for legislation is made are set forth in the preamble. It appears that in July, 1883, this patent was applied for and granted for a period of five years. I call attention to section 22 of the Patent Act, which regulates such applications:

"22. The term limited for the duration of every patent of invention issued by the Patent Office shall be fifteen years; but at the time of the application therefor it shall be at the option of the applicant to pay the full fee required for the term of fifteen years, or the partial fee required for the term of five years, or the partial fee required for the term of ten years:

"2. If a partial fee only is paid, the proportion of the fee paid shall be stated in the patent, and the patent shall, notwithstanding anything therein or in this Act contained, cease at the end of the term for which the partial fee has been paid, unless at or before the expiration of the said term the holder of the patent pays the fee required for the further term of five or ten years, and obtains from the Patent Office a certificate of such payment in the form which is, from time to time, adopted."

Now, that is very plain. The party comes here and says that his solicitor neglected, for a period of three months, to pay the fee, and he now asks us to grant him a patent for the full period of fifteen years from the date of the original application. He asks us to do so on the ground that his solicitor has failed to attend to his business. If we pass this Bill it will certainly be a bad precedent, and I do not know how it will be possible to maintain a patent office business if we are to be called on from time to time, under special circumstances, to grant these extensions by Acts of Parliament, contrary to the principle laid down in the Patent Act. If there be any ground for the interference of Parliament in cases of this kind it certainly should be found in the Patent Act. There should be some power given to the Commissioner in that Act to decide on such applications. There is no such power, and this application, although it professes to stand on special grounds, is just that sort of application which I think Parliament ought not to grant. It is not from an ignorant, uneducated person, who might not, perhaps, be cognizant of the law, and whose acts ought not therefore to be too strictly scrutinized; but in this case the ground of the application is the neglect of the solicitor employed to do the work. He is supposed to be a man cognizant of the law; and if he does not know the law or neglects his duty he is liable to the person who employs him. I think it does not require much consideration to show that if this application is to be granted we shall have this House flooded with such legislation. The patentee has had the benefit of his patent for five years, and even if we refuse to pass this Bill he will not be deprived of anything. He will still have his plant and buildings. There is another matter to be considered—the effect which this legislation must necessarily have upon the persons who have been acting upon the idea that this patent expired in July, 1888. We are asked to validate this patent and to give this legislation a retrospective effect. Since this patent lapsed persons may have made use of the invention, and if we validate the patent from the time when it was granted these parties will be subject to prosecution. There is a provision in the second section which carefully secures all the rights acquired by those who purchased the right to use the invention, and that shows the necessity of carefully looking at this legislation; because I take it for granted that if such a case should be made out as to call for the intervention of Parliament they certainly should protect the rights of other people who acquired them after this patent had expired, as well as the rights of those who paid for the assignment of the patent. I make a special appeal to the leader of the House, whose business it is to see that legislation is carried on in this House on some definite principle. This is a mere matter of administration. The authorities seem to have been doing their duty, and I do not see why we should, by passing this Bill, establish a bad precedent.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I have no interest whatever in this Bill. It was simply handed to me to present to the House, and I was not aware that any serious opposition would be made to it. Therefore, I am not prepared to meet the objections which my hon. friend has raised. I simply ask that an opportunity be given to get an explanation. If the House will permit the Bill to be read the second time now, and referred to the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, the gentleman interested in it can appear before that committee and make explanations, and if they are not satisfactory the Bill could be thrown out on the third reading. If the House will permit that course to be pursued I think the public interests will not suffer, and it will only be showing fair play to the parties interested in the Bill.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I shall certainly oppose any such motion as the hon. gentleman suggests. In fact, we would be committing ourselves to the principle of this Bill, which certainly, in my opinion, is very vicious. He says that the matter can be investigated before the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills. Now, what has the committee to investigate? The facts are stated in the preamble of the Bill, and nothing further can be elicited by the committee. On the face of this Bill it is vicious. We are asked, after a patent has lapsed and other persons have engaged in the making of the patented article, to exclude them from its operation. People engaged in a business watch for the expiration of patents affecting it and quickly adopt the invention whenever they can do so. This Bill not only asks that the patent shall be revived, but that any person who paid for the privilege of using the patented article shall also be protected, but that anybody who has gone to the expense of manufacturing these instruments, on the supposition that the patent expired last July, shall be prevented from carrying on his operations— in fact, that he shall be liable for damages for continuing his operations. I say that this Bill, on the face of it, gives all the information that the hon. gentleman could furnish if it reached the committee. If we agree to the second reading we shall be stultifying ourselves by sending it to a committee. Not only would the passage of this Bill be injurious to those who are interested in the patent, but it would be a dangerous precedent to establish. Persons having patents might let them expire if they thought they were of no value, and then afterwards, if any advantage could be derived from doing so, they would apply for such legislation as this. I shall oppose the second reading of the Bill.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I do not read the Bill as my hon. friend from Lunenburg does. This man took out a patent, in 1883, for fifteen years. The patent lapsed through failure of the solicitor to pay his fees at the end of five years. Now he asks to be restored to the position that he occupied in 1883. As I read the Bill, if anybody between July, 1888, and the time that this Bill becomes law, has undertaken to manufacture this patented article, he can go on manufacturing it. His rights would not be destroyed in the slightest degree by this legislation.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Oh, no.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The recital is inconsistent with the enacting clause. The second clause reads in this way: "Any person who has, within the period between the 12th day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight, and the extension or renewal hereunder—" that is, from the time this Act receives the Royal assent—"of the said letters patent, acquired any interest or right in respect of such improvements or invention shall continue to enjoy the same as if this Act had not been passed." Now, it is a well settled principle that anybody who, within a certain period within which a patent may be taken out, commences to manufacture, is permitted to continue to manufacture. He manufactures, notwithstanding the granting of the patent. He has the privilege of continuing; but I maintain, under this Bill, that if three or four persons have commenced the manufacture of this article during the time between which this patent lapsed and this Bill goes into operation they can continue to do so, and if there is any doubt about the language of the Bill, the committee to whom it is to be referred can make it perfectly clear and plain, so that no person who has obtained any sort of right under this Bill shall be disturbed in that right. I consider the position of the patentee can be made perfectly consistent with the rights of those who have commenced to manufacture, and in that way we do no substantial harm to anybody. We give the patentee anything that is left. We do not disturb those who have commenced to manufacture, because the patentee has been guilty of laches in not looking after the extension of his patent. If the Bill is at all doubtful on that point the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills will take good care that it is made perfectly clear that such is the intention of the Act; because, one would be misled, no doubt, by reading the preamble, which does not agree with the enacting clause. If hon. gentlemen are drawing their conclusions simply from reading the preamble, then I think they are quite right in opposing this Bill; but if they interpret the clause as I interpret it (and I think it is the only correct interpretation to be put on it), then we will do ample justice to those who have commenced in the interim to manufacture, and to the patentee as well.

HON. MR. DICKEY—My hon. friend has not read the first section. It says that this is an application which is to start from this date.

HON. MR. SCOTT—As against persons who are manufacturing.

HON. MR. DICKEY—The first section says: "The Commissioner of Patents may receive from the said Samuel May the application and usual fee for a renewal or extension of the said letters patent for the remainder of the term of fifteen years from the date thereof,"—that is, fifteen years from the 1st of July, 1883.

HON. MR. POWER—And the final words of the clause are: "in as full and ample a manner as if application therefor had been duly made within five years from the date of the issue of said letters patent."

HON. MR. SCOTT—It is a well understood principle of construing statutes that the subsequent clauses control, and there is a special protection for the parties who have commenced to manufacture.

HON. MR. DICKEY—It says anybody who has acquired the right.

HON. MR. SCOTT—He may acquire the right without the leave or consent of the patentee. The committee can make that perfectly plain.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I regret very much that I feel compelled to suggest that this subject is too dangerous a one for the House to break upon precedent in order to meet the views of the petitioner. The law, as my hon. friend from Ottawa says, makes an exception in favor of any person who has acquired by use a right to manufacture whatever it is that was patented by these letters patent; but it does not make provision for the case of persons who may have made preparations to use it at some expense, and who have not been able to complete them; but my objection to the Bill does not rest on that ground. The Patent Act provides a means by which a person may continue his patent in force for fifteen years. The patent is an encroachment on the rights of the public in the first instance, and it, of course, ought to be construed with reasonable strictness in favor of the public. The general patent law, which governs all cases, provides in effect that if a patentee neglects to make the payments which the Act prescribes within the time fixed by law the invention becomes the property of the public. In the present case the payment ought to have been made in March, as I judge from the Bill, and it was not offered until October; so for six months this improvement and invention became the property of the public, to deal with as they thought proper. The application which is made by the petitioner is to re-vest in him, after the expiration of six mounths, those rights which were vested in the public since last March. The general principle on which we should refuse to pass this Bill is that the patent law must be preserved intact; otherwise, there will be no end to the infringement of it, and no end to the number of cases in which we shall be called upon to pass Acts, in order to remove the disability which has been created by the neglect of the patentee. This principle has been affirmed so strongly during the past years that I think we ought not to ignore that fact. There have been applications to Parliament ever since this Patent Act was passed, repeatedly asking, in cases very much harder than this, for relief, and it has invariably be refused. On the last occasion when a Bill of this description was introduced it was objected to, and the six months' hoist was unanimously agreed to in another place. I refer to that because, although what may be decided in another place is not at all binding upon us, the reasons which were given there seemed to me so strong, so unanswerable, so incontrovertible, that I venture to refer to what was said on that occasion as something to which we must at all events accord a considerable degree of weight. The principal objecters to the passage of the Bill were Messrs. Blake, Mackenzie, the late lamented Thomas White, Pope and three or four other gentlemen whose opinions are entitled to the greatest respect, but who, perhaps, did not fill so large a place in the eye of the public as those I have mentioned. Without any exception, and without any objection in the end, the six months' hoist was agreed to by the House, practically upon the grounds which I have just stated, that the law must be obeyed, that Parliament cannot properly be applied to for the purpose of relieving people who neglect to perform the conditions on which they hold their rights as against the public; that it would be a precedent of a most dangerous character, and would tend to embarrass Parliament with constant applications for relief to an extent which would in the end make the law a dead letter. No reason has been given for this Bill, except that of the omission to pay the fees. If we should pass this Bill every person who neglects to renew his patent might at any period of time—because six months is a considerable time—come to this House and cite this legislation as a precedent for the passage of an Act relieving him. One of the most distinguished of the gentlemen I have mentioned, on the occasion I have referred to, said:

"Many of these cases are no doubt very hard. We have heard of cases where persons holding patents had instructed their agent to apply, but the agent had by some mistake neglected his duty, or a mail was delayed, and we were obliged to say in such cases that the party must have recourse against his agent for neglect ing his duty, but that they could not come to Parliament, because, if the door were once opened for such cases the law would be always evaded. What we have done in one Session we will be asked to do in the next Session, and there will be a great many more cases than there were at first. Every one of us who has sat here for any length of time knows that in any case where we have passed a bad Act or granted an exceptional indulgence it is quoted time and again, and always as a precedent for doing something worse and opening the door wider."

HON. MR. SCOTT—How did the House of Commons happen to pass this Bill?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My friend the Minister of Justice called my attention to this: it appears that the Bill passed through the House of Commons without being observed, and it is left to us to perform the function—which I am happy to say we do most successfully perform, on a great many occasions, notwithstanding what people say about us—of correcting the legislation of the other House. My attention was called to this Bill by the Minister of Justice, who expressed a strong opinion, similar to that of Mr. Blake, Mr. Mackenzie and these other gentlemen to whom I have referred, on the subject, and stated his extreme regret that it had passed, and his hopes that such a Bill would not be permitted by the Senate to become law.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I should like to have the second reading of the Bill postponed until I have had an opportunity to communicate with the gentleman who placed it in my hands.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I should think that that would be quite proper.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that the Bill be read the second time on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

VICTORIA AND SAULT STE. MARIE RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of Bill (84) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Victoria and Sault Ste. Marie Junction Railway Company." He said: This is simply an ordinary Bill for the extension of a short line to a line on which a large sum of money has been expended. The object of the Bill is to give powers to build a railway to connect with it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE GAELIC LANGUAGE BILL.

RESTORED TO THE ORDERS OF THE DAY.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B. C.) moved that Bill (P) "An Act to provide for the use of the Gaelic Language in Official Proceedings" be restored to the Order Paper, and that the second reading take place on the 19th instant.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Perhaps it would be better to take the sense of the House as to its being read the second time this day three months. I will move that in amendment.

HON. MR. PROWSE—I shall oppose the proposition to take up this matter on a future occasion, because, I take it, the object of my hon. friend is simply to have a joke, and I think the dignity of this House would be ——

HON. MR. MCINNES (B C.)—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to impute motives. He has no right to say that my object in bringing this Bill before the House is to have a joke. It is no joke, and hon. gentlemen who take that position will, perhaps before long, learn that it is not. The least that can be done is to allow the Bill to go to the second reading, and after the explanation that I propose to make the sense of the House can be taken. If it is the opinion of the majority that the Bill shall not become law I will bow to the decision—but to take advantage of a mere technical objection, simply because I was beyond the bar of the House when the Order was called, to defeat the Bill, is something that is unfair, and without precedent in this House—at all events, since I became a member of it. If I am not allowed to go on with this Bill I shall move a substantive resolution, by which I can get the sense of the House and have my views placed on record. It is unfair, unjust, and contrary to the precedents in this House to take such a course as that which has been proposed by the hon. members from Amherst and Prince Edward Island. I rose to the question of order. The hon.

gentleman has no right whatever to impute such a motive to me as a desire to play a practical joke on the Senate.

HON. MR. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill was granted permission to move that it be placed on the Orders of the Day. Now, it is not competent for any gentleman, when the hon. member moves that resolution, to discuss the substance or the principle of the Bill. It may be competent to vote down the resolution which the hon. gentleman has moved, but it is not competent, under that resolution, to discuss the principle of the Bill, which can only be done at the second reading of the Bill itself. I may say, I think it is quite unprecedented, after the House has accorded to an hon. gentleman the right to make his motion to have the Bill replaced on the Orders of the Day, that that privilege should be refused. Of course, the hon. gentleman can get his Bill before the House in a shorter time by re-introducing it in a somewhat different form.

THE SPEAKER—If a Bill stands on the Order Paper for the second reading, and the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill is not here, and enquiry is made if anybody is to take charge of it, and there is no answer, there is no other course but to pronounce the Bill dropped. It is also equally clear that the hon. gentleman has a right, without notice, after the Orders of the Day are disposed of, to move that this order be restored to the Order Paper. It is not competent to discuss the subject of the Bill on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday March 12th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills, reported from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, were read a third time and passed, without any debate.

Bill (72) "An Act to incorporate the Brandon and South-Western Railway Company." (Mr. Miller.)

Bill (36) "An Act to confirm an Agreement between the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Steamboat Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company." (Mr. McKindsey.)

Bill (49) "An Act respecting the New Brunswick Railway Company." (Mr. Wark.)

Bill (64) "An Act to incorporate the Moncton and Prince Edward Island Railway and Ferry Company." (Mr. Wark.)

ST. CATHARINES AND NIAGARA RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (69) "An Act respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Railway Company," with certain amendments. He said: I might explain that the clause which has been struck out by the committee was a clause affecting the relative positions of the company and the city of St. Catharines in regard to a large amount of bonds, to the extent of $80,000. It has crept into the Bill, apparently by mistake, in another place, and we were called upon to correct that mistake by striking it out at the instance of the promoters of the Bill and also at the instance of persons affected by it in St. Catharines. Perhaps from the peculiar position of the Bill these amendments and the Bill generally can be considered before the third reading at a future day, as I have had an intimation that there is another important clause required to be added, because the Bill as it stands will affect pending litigation. That, of course, we would have corrected had it been brought to our notice while the Bill was in committee. This explanation, perhaps, will be considered sufficient reason for moving that the report of the committee be considered to-morrow instead of to-day.

The report was received.

ERIE AND HURON RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (57) "An Act respecting the Erie and Huron Railway Company," with certain amendments. He said: These amendments occur in the clause which gives the company an extension of two years for the commencement and completion of the work, and it became necessary in consequence of an oversight in sending the Bill up to us with that clause, without the usual guards which are provided in such cases, and certainly by the provision of the General Railway Act, and we have simply added to this extension of time the same principle which is the general law of the land with regard to all railways, and which appears not to have occurred to any of the persons who were engaged in the consideration of this Bill in another place. It simply provides that if the company do not complete their work, and if they go on under this, that the clause shall cease to have effect and they shall not be able to go on with any further work, so that it will simply legalize what is done up to the end of that expiration of time, leaving the company in exactly the same position, and using exactly the identical words of the Railway Act.

HON. MR. VIDAL moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

MOTION.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED rose to—Direct the attention of this honorable House to the great advantages that would accrue to the entire Dominion through the adoption by the Dominion Government of a system of immigration calculated to speedily settle the vacant lands of Manitoba and the North-West Territories; and enquire what steps the Government intend to take towards the adoption of such a system?

He said: I might say in this connection, that the North-West Territories have not the same powers as the other Provinces to deal with this question. The Territories have not the absolute control of the Federal fund and cannot divert any portion of it in this particular direction, except through the Federal Government. They furthermore have not the power to pledge the credit of the Territories in the same manner that the Provinces have to pledge the credit of their particular Province. It therefore becomes necessary that this course should be pursued by a representative from the Territories, so that the importance of this question might be brought before this honorable House. I would just observe in the first place that I justify my advocacy of this subject upon a couple of general principles which I think will be assented to by this honorable House. In the first place, to have a nation we must have population, and, in the second place, the importance or greatness of that nation depends upon the numerical strength of its population. It is unnecessary for me to say that the nations of other countries prove this fact. If we look at the nations of other continents the fact is patent of the correctness of the general proposition which I have laid down, that in proportion to the increase of population will be found the sum of the greatness of that nation and of its national security; in proportion to the increase of population you will find a corresponding increase of all those elements which go to constitute national greatness; in proportion to the increase of population cities will grow, lands will be tilled and the nation will become prosperous; in proportion to the increase of population railways will be built, industries will spring up, established ones will be expanded, ships will be made to plough the ocean highway and capital will vie with capital in opening up national resources. In fact, new vitality will be given to the body politic by the adoption of such a scheme of emigration as that which I am about to advocate. I am aware that there has prevailed, up to the present time, a comparative indifference in the minds of the people of Canada, in regard to this very important subject. I am not going to say that one Administration or another has been lax in its duty in respect to this very important matter. I think public opinion in eastern Canada is entirely to blame for the laxity or indifference which has prevailed up to the present time, in not urging the adopting of as vigorous an emigration policy as we find in other countries on this continent as well as Australia. To prove the force of the contention which I have just submitted, I would direct the attention of the House to what other countries upon this continent as well as Australia are doing in this direction. I would refer first to the Argentine Republic in the way of what it has been doing and is doing to-day in the way of immigration. The Argentine Republic has, as you are doubtless aware, not by one-half the same area of land as we in Canada possess. The area of the Argentine Republic is 1,619,500 square miles. The population at the last census—which I believe was taken quite recently—was 3,800,000. The entire revenue does not exceed by very much the revenue of our Dominion, yet we find the Argentine Republic spending over a million dollars per year to encourage immigration. From the last report we learn that an appropriation was made by the Parliament for fifty thousand assisted passages from the British Islands, Germany, Norway, Sweden and Denmark; and in the year 1889 a volume of immigration amounting to 250,000 souls went into the Argentine Republic. So important has that become that I find in a Blue Book issued by the Imperial Parliament particular attention is directed to the operations of the Argentine Repulic as a field for emigration. The volume which I hold in my hand is the correspondence respecting emigration to the Argentine Republic from the Imperial officers in the country. I find on page 1 of this report which has been prepared by the Imperial Parliament the following statement:—

"The Commissary-General of Immigration, Senor Navarro, has been sent to Europe, $30,000 having been voted for his expenses, and a credit of $1,000,000 opened to him for the purpose of attracting emigrants belonging to the northern races of Europe. He has been authorized to grant 50,000 assisted passages. At the same time, Senor Lanus, the inspector of information offices, who resides in Paris, has been instructed to furnish 20,000 assisted passages for France alone. By this means, the Minister of Foreign Affairs trusts that the number of emigrants landing on the shores of the Argentine Republic in 1888 will be at least 200,000."

I would direct your attention also to a paragraph which I find in the same correspondence, upon page 5 of the report:

"Independently of the direct advantages to be derived by British shipping from the conveyance of emigrants to the Argentine Republic, the owners of the large amount of capital invested in the country cannot fail to derive great benefit from the rapid increase of the population due to immigration. It is generally recognized that the chief element wanting for the development of the vast natural resources of the Republic is labor. During the last four years the immigration has averaged about 120,000 persons, almost exclusively belonging to the productive classes. It is calculated that at least 200,000 immigrants will land in this country during the current year, and that the annual average for the next decennial period will not fall short of 250,000 souls. The present population of the country is about 3,500,000, and it may be assumed, after making due allowance for occasional interruptions of the progressive increase of immigration, that the population at the end of the century will be upwards of seven millions."

In the same report I find this statement:

"During the four years, 1885-88, over 476,000 immigrants arrived in the Republic, or nearly 35 per cent. of the total immigration of 1,374,787 for the thirty-two years, 1857-88. It is of course not to be expected that the full effect of the Argentine propaganda, including the subsidiary passages to which I alluded on a former occasion, will be felt for some time to come; but I am assured on the best authority that 40,000 immigrants, chiefly Belgian, Dutch, North German and Swedes, are confidently expected to arrive during the year 1889, the efforts of the Argentine agents having begun to bear fruit in all parts of Northern Europe, excepting, perhaps, in the British Islands."

I find also on page 46 of this correspondence a statement which I apprehend must be true; otherwise, I cannot conceive that with the authority of the Imperial Parliament it would be inserted in one of their own Blue Books. It is a report from an extract taken from the Buenos Ayres Standard of 31st April, 1889:

"Immigration is flowing into the country in such vast numbers that the total of fresh arrivals for 1889 is already calculated to reach 250,000 souls. The magnitude of this current can be readily gauged when we consider that the total population of the Republic is not supposed to exceed 4,000,000. Comparatively speaking, therefore, the current of emigration to the Argentine Republic may be reckoned as the largest ever known in any country, eclipsing the relative proportions of the hegira to the United States. As we have remarked in previous issues, British immigrants are beginning to form an important factor in these numbers, and we warn our countrymen beforehand: it is absurd to come to these shores in thousands, nay even in hundreds, at a time. At the rate of 100 families per month, satisfactory prospects may be offered to them, but coming in thousands, they are doomed to meet with drawbacks and sufferings they never expected in a young and progressive country like this. All the late British arrivals have been settled on a colony in the south, but it is not every day that a Gartland starts up to found a colony for the benefit of British arrivals, and emigration agents in Great Britain should bear this in mind."

I have to apologize to the House for reading so much from this particular correspondence, but as it is issued by the Imperial Parliament I apprehend it is the very best authority I can cite to this honorable House in support of the contention which I am about to submit, that our Parliament should certainly take more active measures towards the inauguration of such a policy as has been adopted by the Argentine Republic. We have labored under the delusion, as I might well put it, for a long time, that many of the South American States have been quite indifferent in the matter of immigration, and have not exhibited that degree of energy in advancing civilization which we find in more northern countries. But even in Mexico we find a most vigorous policy of immigration being adopted. On very good authority I learn that Mexico is now instituting a vigorous propaganda in Great Britain, and upon the continent of Europe is extending its ramifications in all directions for the purpose of inducing emigration to that country, and I find that the following inducements have been held out by the Mexican Government to those who should choose to go to that country;

"The terms offered are $50 each for every colonist above twelve years of age who is settled in the colony for six months, and a bonus of $200 per year for five years for each family, and $40 for each individual for the same period who is not a member of a family. In addition, various implements, machines, waggons and horses, and colonists' effects, will be allowed to enter the country free of duty."

I find also that in Australia a most vigorous immigration policy has been adopted. I find that for the years 1883, 1884, 1885 and 1886 the Australian colonies have spent at least $1,600,000 a year for immigration for the last ten years. The volume of emigration to the Australian colonies has been 206,000 people per year. This seems unprecedented, when compared with the limited number which have come into our Dominion. For the last ten years in Australia 206,000 souls have been coming in per year. I find in Chili, where they have an area infinitely smaller than our own—only 124,000 square miles—and the revenue about the same as our own, but with a population of only 2,527,320, and where only 18 per cent. of the land is of an arable nature, they are most active on the continent of Europe in directing the stream of emigration towards their shores. I find that in the last five years 520,000 emigrants have gone in per year into the United States, and in addition to the large inducements which have been held out by the Federal Government of the United States towards immigration I find that all the States of the Union are exerting themselves in the most emphatic way towards controlling this tide of emigration, which is pouring in to those States, not only the South American States already mentioned, but Uruguay, Paraguay and other South American States, inclusive of Brazil, are exercising equally vigorous efforts to capture European emigration which is coming to the continent. Under these circumstances, I therefore think that Canada, possessing infinitely greater advantages than any of the South American States to which I have just alluded and infinitely greater advantages than any of the Australian colonies, has shown a laxity and indifference up to the present time, and should at once adopt, to say the least, a policy equally vigorous as that of any of the South American States or Australian colonies. Not only have the countries on this continent been active in this direction, but we find a greater activity prevailing in Great Britain on this particular subject than we have been giving it ourselves. It may appear somewhat strange that Great Britain should trouble herself in this matter, and that she should make large expenditures in the matter of emigration while we have been comparatively inactive in the matter. I find from the Blue Books issued by the Imperial Parliament that a select committee was appointed by the Parliament of that country to enquire into the matter of immigration into the various countries upon this continent, as well as into Australia; and the first scheme which appears to have received attention from that committee is the one which has been recently launched, known as the Crofters' Scheme. Most of the hon. gentlemen are doubtless aware that very recently a number of Crofter families have been sent from Scotland into our North-West Territories, and very close investigation appears to have been made into the result of that movement, for the purpose of, I take it, if possible, of enlarging the movement, of expanding it and extending it to many thousands of Crofter families whom the British Government consider it advisable to direct to this Dominion.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—How many Crofter families have gone into the North-West Territories up to now?

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—Seventy-nine families, under this movement, according to this report. But I may say that this movement has been introduced more as a test than anything else, with a view of following it up on a large scale. I would call hon. gentlemen's attention to the report of the Committee on Colonization, in section 26 of which is given a short résumé of the scheme, and, with the permission of the House, I shall read it:

"The Governement are now prepared (that is, the Imperial Government) to recommend Parliament to advance a sum of £10,000 to start a colonisation scheme for the crofters and cottars of the congested districts of the western highlands and islands, upon the condition that £2,000 is provided by private subscription.

"It is proposed that in the event of the £2,000 being raised the total sum of £12,000 should form an emigration fund, and be administered in the following manner:—

"1. That three or four trustees or commissioners should be appointed as a Board to represent: (1) the Imperial Government; (2) the Canadian Government; (3) the private subscribers; and (4) the important land companies, whose gratuitous co-operation and assistance have been promised, subject only to reimbursement of actual authorised outlay; and that this Board shall be intrusted with the responsibility of carrying out the scheme in accordance with the intention of the Government.

"2. That the Board shall be empowered to obtain such clerical or other assistance (possibly two paid emigration agents, one in this country and one in Canada) as may be necessary in the selection and final settlement of the emigrants.

"3. That in the event of the families being selected and arrangements made for their reaching the port of embarkation, the emigration officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway will take charge of the emigrants at Glasgow or elsewhere, carrying them to their final destination in the North-West Territories for a fixed low rate of passage-money.

"4. That, in order to meet the cost of emigration, and to comply with the provisions of the Dominion Land Acts, a sum not exceeding £120 shall be advanced for each family, of which five-sixths shall be advanced by the Imperial Government and one-sixth by private subscription, and expended in accordance with a scheme drawn up and approved by the Minister of the Interior in terms of the aforesaid Acts.

"5. That the Board constituted as above will undertake, by means of their agents, to settle the emigrants on the Government land, to provide temporarily for their wants, and to collect the instalments of capital and interest from them in the manner hereinafter mentioned, they having the benefit of the knowledge and experience both of the Canadian Government land agents, and of the gratuitous co-operation of the officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Hudson Bay Company, and the Canadian North-West Land Company.

"6. That the Canadian Government will give free grant lands of 160 acres to each family, and also render every assistance through the High Commissioner in London, and through their immigration agents in Canada, in connection with the selection of the land for the immigrants, and their preliminary settlement. The Canadian Government will require that the emigrants selected shall be formally approved by an officer on their behalf.

"7. That the money grants shall be for a period of twelve years, bearing no interest during the first four years, but the before-mentioned Board will collect the principal and interest from the settlers during the last eight years by an annuity which, on an advance of £120, would amount to £20 17s. 8d. per annum. This is equivalent to an average interest of about £4 6s. per annum during the whole period of twelve years.

"8. That the foregoing Board will take, by way of security for the sum of £120, or lesser sum, so advanced, a mortgage on the 160 acres of free grant lands of the Dominion Government, including a lien on the chattels, the mortgage being secured in favor of the Board by legal agreement."

Now, in pursuance of that particular scheme, seventy-nine Crofter families have already been located in the North-West Territories, and I find from the report given by Sir Charles Tupper when he was last in Canada—and contained in this report, at section 978—that these Crofters expressed the greatest satisfaction and content at their location and prosperity. I will read you the sections I refer to:

"Then, I suppose, until those reports arrive, you are not in a position to say whether those people have any complaints to make or not, and whether they are satisfied or otherwise? A. I know that Sir Charles Tupper, who is my chief, visited the settlement this year and heard no complaints whatever. He found the people in a very satisfactory condition and very hopeful of their prospects; they made no complaints to him although he went amongst them."

Let me say in this connection that I see there have been circulated very recently most damaging reports with respect to the condition of those crofter families. I find on the very best authority which I have received from the North-West that these reports are utterly untrue and foundationless, and have been made for a malicious purpose, and have been designed beyond a doubt by persons who seek to direct this particular tide of emigration to the countries outside of this Dominion. Late reports received up to a few weeks ago are of the most satisfactory character, and of a most encouraging nature. This scheme of the crofters indicates on the part of the people of Great Britain a very strong desire to assist emigration to this Dominion, and to assist it in such a practical way that the British people are prepared to put their hands in their pockets and assist a movement of this kind; and I say that when we see such a practical demonstration of their desire to assist this Dominion in promoting emigration to our shores it is high time that we co-operated with them and assisted ourselves in a more vigorous fashion than we have been been accustomed to do up to the present time. Here we find not only the Imperial Parliament paying out £10,000 sterling to assist this movement, but we find private individuals in the mother country putting their hands into their own private purse to assist this movement. I say it should inspire us to hope and activity in this country, and that we should not be reluctant to adopt a most vigorous emigration policy. I would now direct the attention of hon. members to a discussion which took place before this committee as to the advisability and as to the practicability of expanding this particular scheme, so that it might reach even gigantic dimensions. The opinion of this committee appears to have been that colonization is preferable to any other system for the emigration of people in Great Britain. Colonization as distinguished from immigration should be the scheme selected by the Imperial Government—a scheme that would be assisted by them and by the people of Great Britain. I find this discussed in sections of the report which I shall ask hon. members indulgence while I read them to the House. Section 893 gives a statement by Mr. Culmer, who was examined before this committee, and who is Secretary of the Colonization Board; and in reply to the question:

"Do you believe in emigration pure and simple as apart from colonization?"

replies:

"I believe in it up to a certain extent, but I do not think that emigration is practicable as a large scheme."

"Q.—Do you think colonization is?

"A.—I think colonization is.

"Q.—Upon the lines which you have started?

"A.—Very much upon the lines which we have started—probably with some amendments, which would be suggested by the experience on the Board."

I may say, in explanation, in case the point should occur to any of the gentlemen here, that the distinction between the two schemes is this: that in the matter of colonization steps are taken to see that the emigrants are located in this country upon a certain amount of farm lands. In the matter of emigration they simply assist the emigrants with a sufficient amount of money to land them in this country, and do not undertake, after that duty is performed, to exercise any further supervision over them. That appears to be the distinction between the two schemes, as far as I can understand it. Under section 1088 of this report I find this subject discussed in the following manner in the examination of Sir G. W. Hubert, who, at that time, was Under Secretary for the Colonies:—

"Do you see your way to getting over the objection that has been always raised by the Government, whether in respect to Newfoundland or any other place?—No; unless the Government can be induced to change their opinion. I should say myself that it would be expedient for this Government to face a certain loss. I look upon it that whether in the case of colonization or emigration, only a proportion will in either case be repaid of the advances that are made, but I think it would be worth while on all grounds for this Government to make an advance, even on the distinct understanding that it would not get it all back. It would get part of it back; and for that part which it did not get back it would do a great deal of service to the people here and in the colonies. Within limits, and if it is carefully supervised, I think it is desirabie to promise colonization even although you may make a loss. I do not believe these colonization associations will succeed very well anywhere, except under the conditions of having first-rate land, good communications, a good climate and the probability of such a devolopment as will raise the value of the land from a few dollars to £6 or £8 or £10 value in a few years? I can conceive of a colonization scheme, if remunerative, repaying its advances in a very first-rate location, but such places are hardly to be got now, either on British or American soil. There may be some such places, but they are very difficult to find.

"You would face a certain loss on the part of the British Government, in order to promote emigration?—Yes; within limits.

"Within what sort of limits?—I think it would be very well worth while to advance £500,000 on a good scheme, expecting to lose £250,000 of it. I think it would give great relief in the congested districts, and therefore be worth doing."

That is to say, that if the Colonial Government would not guarantee an advance for the purpose of assisting those emigrants, that the Imperial Government themselves should assume a certain loss in assisting this tide of emigration. Then, section 1111, speaking of the question of guarantee, Sir R. G. W. Herbert is asked if he would acquiesce in dispensing with the guarantee, and advancing the money without it, and he replies:

"I think you must not expect any reliable guarantee; therefore I should hold that it is only in exceptionable times of pressure, and in those places which are exceptionally congested, that it should be had resource to. I am not saying that, in my opinion, this is a moment in the condition of the country at which the necessity is very strong, but still I think the condition of the country is such as to make a scheme worth trying."

Then, in section 1115 he is asked:

"Do you think there would be any objection to the Home Government making advances to assist companies if they got a guarantee from the companies as to the repayment of the loan?—If the company were so constituted and had such uncalled capital as to be absolutely able to meet the guarantee, the State need be under no apprehension in making the advance."

Again, in section 1151:—

"Now, I should like to ask you a question as to your opinion that it might, under certain circumstances, be worth while to raise £500,000, facing the loss of £250,000 for the purpose of colonization; I would like to ask you, had you present in your mind in making that statement the results in this respect of increasing our export markets at all?—Yes; I consider that is one of the means in which the outlay would be indirectly recouped to this country."

Then, at section 1419, upon the same point, on which another gentleman is examined—I refer to Major Rutledge-Fair, who I believe is one of the officers of the British Government, and I may say is thoroughly familiar with Canada as a field for carrying out this scheme, is asked:—

"You believe that the colonisation to Canada is far and away the best scheme we have had?—I do; and I believe the colonisation in the North-West, from what I saw of it, could be very well worked out under careful management."

This gentleman had inspected the crofter scheme, and, having looked carefully into it, declared that he thought the Government would be warranted in making the advance. Then, again, in section 2770 of the same report I find the following:—

"But the colonisation money you would expect to be returned?—I would expect the money that was expended in providing a family with a home and with stock to be returned; and I think it would be returned. If it were under proper management (of course the management is everything), and a proper selection of the families were made, I think it would be returned.

"And you would regard with equanimity, would you, the State practically becoming the landlord of a large number of people who were settled in Canada?—I think it might be done."

Sir H. Owne corroborates what has been said on this point by preceding witnesses, and I find throughout the whole report it is pregnant with the ideas which I have already read to this House, and which would receive the strongest confirmation of the public of Great Britain as well as of the most eminent statesmen there. This select committee appears to have been thoroughly imbued with the practicability of this scheme. Now, the question of this Government guaranteeing to the Imperial Government the re-payment of the large sum of money which might be advanced by the latter has received considerable consideration heretofore, and has occupied the attention of this Government, and also the attention of the Imperial authorities, and we have already come very nearly having one of the most successful immigration schemes that has ever been launched in this country carried out, only for this rock of guarantee upon which the parties split, and in this connection I submit to this honorable House that it would well repay Parliament the assumption of such a liability as would be necessary to guarantee repayment to the Imperial Government of a very large loan for this purpose. I would direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the scheme, in which Sir Geo. Stephen appears to be one of the most prominent parties, and which came almost to a very successful termination, but owing to this principal difficulty it failed. In section 1005 of this report I find this dealt with, speaking of various schemes. I might say that this committee had before them ten or twelve schemes of a very important nature dealing with this particular subject, but I am not going to weary this House by referring to the whole of them. I would direct your attention, however, to one in which we are particularly interested, and one if, which carried out, would have been an extremely fortunate thing for this Dominion. The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies is now being examined:

"The next scheme you spoke of was a scheme suggested by Sir George Stephen?—Yes; by Sir George Stephen, who was then Mr. Stephen. He did not propose it on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but he undertook to make the offer on the part of the North-Western Land Company of Canada. What was the date of that?—That was also in 1883. It had reference to emigration from Ireland. His proposal was that that the Treasury should advance £1,000,000 to the North-Western Land Company of Canada, and that by the expenditure of that £1,000,000 some 10,000 families, amounting in the whole to some 50,000 people, might be taken out to Canada; that the company should give 160 acres of land with a house, a cow, and agricultural implements, seeds, and everything to start the colonisation, to each family, and that the loan should run for ten years without any interest, the company taking all risks and responsibility for recovering from the colonisers and repaying the loan. The company would take a lien to the amount of £100 on each block of 160 acres, which would be given to the settler at 6 per cent., and the settler might acquire the land by the payment of that £100 with interest, at any time during his tenure of it. He held that the removal of each family would cost the Government no more than the interest on £100 for ten years; that is £2 10s. a year, or £25 over the ten years. This scheme received a great deal of consideration from the Government. It was in Lord Derby's time. I produce the scheme, which, as I say, was much considered, but the proposal fell through, because the Treasury thought it necessary to stipulate that the Dominion Government should make itself responsible for recovering the advances from the settlers, both principal and interest, and the Dominion Government declined to do that. They said they would readily give the land required, but they had insuperable objections to the Government becoming directly or indirectly the creditor of the settlers. They thought that if they did undertake to recover those advances there would be a great deal of political influence used by settlers to relieve them from making the repayment, and that in fact the company would be more likely to be able to put effective pressure upon the settlers than the Government, for political reasons, would be able to do. The Colonial Office recommended the scheme strongly, because it was felt that it could hardly fail to result in the emigration of much more than 50,000 people. Though the whole amount might not be repaid, a greater number than 50,000 could have been taken out of Ireland by it.

"1012. As the first condition under which the matter was to be considered, was not there a requirement of a guarantee by the Canadian Government which fell through, and that falling through the other details of this scheme were not proceeded with any further?—They were not proceeded with any further in the absence of an undertaking from the Dominion Government."

Now, discussing this question of guarantee, I do not assume that I am able to handle the subject by any means with that degree of ability which should be brought to the consideration of it, but I think that as cheme could be very well brought into operation by the Dominion Government by which they could guarantee such an advance as I have intimated. As to the Government becoming a creditor of the settler, the Government at the present time is very largely the creditor of the settler for every acre of land that is bought in the North-West and for every pre-emption that is taken up. For every homestead located the Government is the creditor of that homestead settler to the extent of that settler paying up the duties which by law he is called upon to pay before he gets a patent for his land, and so I take it that purchasers from the Government of what the Government may have to sell in the matter of lands, timber, minerals, or whatever else it may be. So that while perhaps more directly under such a scheme as this the Government would have to become the creditor of the settler, yet I say at the present time in numerous cases the Government is already the creditor of the settler, and I do not think it has been found up to the present time to cause so many abuses as to warrant the Government in pursuing any other policy than the one that they have followed with the settler. I think therefore that it is unfortunate for the Dominion that this scheme, so large in its proportions, and which might have been attended with such magnificent results, should have failed, for the simple reason that the Government of this country was not prepared to guarantee to the Imperial Government the collection of this one million pounds sterling that would have been advanced to the settlers proposed to be sent out. That money would have been secured on the land given them, and on the improvements placed thereupon. You will recollect that this is not asked as a gift, it is not asked without any consideration being given, for it is merely such a guarantee as is already given, in fact, to a certain railway enterprise, and is required for the purpose of bringing out large bodies of settlers such as I have alluded to. If the Government do not care about directly assuming the responsibility of becoming the creditor of the settler in this respect there are various ways in which this alleged objectionable mode might be avoided. The Government might appoint certain trustees with whom the settler could deal, and in this way the matter would be entirely taken from the domain of Parliament, and the settler would have to deal directly with these trustees. I can conceive of such a scheme as that being possible, so that no friction need occur between the Government and the settlers.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—I should like to ask my hon. friend what security the Government would have over the settler should he choose to cross the lines and go the United States? That is one point. The second is, has my hon. friend learned of the amount the Government of Canada have paid since Confederation to encourage immigration, and the result of that expenditure? These would be important matters to come in with the argument which my hon. friend is addressing to this House.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—I am pleased that the hon. member from Toronto has directed my attention to these points, and I shall be very glad to answer them. In the first place, the security to which I have alluded is a similar security to that taken by those who advanced this £12,000 to the crofters who have settled in the North-West Territories. A mortgage has been taken from those settlers upon the land and also upon all personal effects which have been given to the settler out of this grant of £120 to each family. The £120 are not given to each family before they leave the point of embarkation, but the money is expended judiciously in acquiring for them a certain amount of stock, buildings, and certain accommodations on the homestead which are given him by the Government.

HON. MR. POWER—And in paying his landlord in Scotland.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—I do not think my hon. friend is warranted in making that assertion. In the provision made by the Imperial Government it certainly was not contemplated that any of the money should be diverted to that particular purpose, and I fail to understand why the hon. gentleman from Halifax should make such a statement. A well defined scheme was devised by the Imperial Parliament: money was appropriated and placed in the hands of trustees, who are able men and who, I take it, have seen that that money was applied as contemplated by Parliament, and so far as I know every dollar of that money has been expended in the manner which was intended.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Did not the landlords help the crofters to emigrate?

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—Yes; the landlords paid out of their own pockets £2,000 sterling, for the purpose of assisting this handful of crofters to come out and settle in this country. The hon. gentleman from Toronto has asked what amount of money has been spent by the Dominion Government since Confederation in promoting immigration. I am aware that the Dominion Government have up to the present time spent a large amount of money for that purpose, but for the last few years they have not seen fit to appropriate so large an amount as they previously did, and I regret very much to say that the expenditure of that money has not been productive to the extent that one would naturally have expected. Whether the scheme has been at fault, or the administration of the system adopted for that particular purpose has been defective, I am not prepared to say. One thing I do know is, that there is a very small tide of immigration into this country, and not at all commensurate with the immense resources we possess. During the last ten years it has been estimated that about fifty thousand persons per year have come into the Dominion, and, as I understand, somewhere between two and three hundred thousand dollars a year has been devoted to the encouragement of immigration for the last ten years. I would direct the attention of the hon. gentleman, and particularly of the Government, to the fact that, notwithstanding this expenditure, which appears to me to have been a reasonably large one for such a purpose, yet satisfactory results are not apparent in Manitoba and the North-West Territories. We find the population of Manitoba and the North-West Territories at the present time scarcely exceeds a quarter of a million, and at the outside does not exceed 300,000. Most of the settlers in Manitoba and the North-West Territories have not emigrated from Europe, but simply migrated from Eastern Canada. It is estimated on good authority that not more than 33 per cent. of the settlers in Manitoba and the North-West Territories have come from European countries. Taking 35 per cent. as the number, we have only some one hundred thousand settlers from Europe; therefore, no matter how much money has been spent, no matter what efforts have been put forth up to the present time, those results have not been satisfactory, and either a different system should be decided upon or other means taken for the purpose of seeing if we cannot increase the volume of emigration and have some such influx of settlers into the North-West Territories as the Argentine Republic or the Australian colonies have. In the Argentine Republic, as I have stated, 250,000 persons emigrated to that country last year, and it is expected that the influx will continue to be equally large for the next ten years. For the last ten years Australia has received 206,000 emigrants every year. From the very closest investigation, as I shall point out to you afterwards, none of these places possess the same facilities or capabilities or the same promise for immigration as Canada; none have the resources equal to those which we possess. Our capabilities are far greater than those of either of the countries to which I have alluded. I do not by any means make any attack upon the administration of immigration by our Government to the present time; I attribute it to the fact that public opinion has not been concentrated upon this subject in these times to the extent that it should. The subject has not received the public attention that it deserves; it has not received that close attention to which it is entitled, and by which such a scheme as I have been speaking of might be evolved from enquiry and investigation on so important a subject. Not only has the attention of the Imperial Government been directed towards crofter emigration, but I would ask hon. gentlemen to bear with me for a short time while I refer to the infinitely greater volume of emigration from Ireland, and also the great efforts put forward by the Imperial Government to aid in relieving the congestion of population in that country. I would refer to section 2038 of this report. When we come to consider the efforts which are put forth by the Imperial Government to assist in carrying out the various schemes, it seems incredible almost that they should take such a deep interest in them. I find that £200,000 have been lying there waiting for some company or colonial Government sufficiently energetic to take hold of that money and spend it in aid of emigration, and yet that money lies there idle in the coffers of Great Britain, waiting for somebody to administer it under the proper conditions, and assist emigrants to where they could satisfactorily locate. Major Rutledge-Fair was examined. He was Local Government Board Inspector of Ireland. He was asked:

"You told the committee about the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1882, and the Tramways and Public Companies (Ireland) Act, 1883, and the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881. Can you tell the committee what has been done under any of these Acts?—Under the Act of 1881 there has been nothing done; that was an Act empowering the Land Commissioners to advance a sum not exceeding £200,000 sterling to any company. They might contract on behalf of any state or colony, or with any public body or public company with whose constitution and security the Land Commissioners might be satisfied, for the advance by way of loan of a sum not exceeding £200,000 to assist emigration, especially of families from the poorer and more thickly populated districts of Ireland. Nothing whatever has been done under that enactment.

"Can you tell the committee whether anything has been done under any of the other Acts to which allusion has been made?—The Arrears of Rent Act of 1882 and the Tramways Act of 1883 enabled grants to be made from a sum of £150,000, which was voted for emigration purposes. Of that sum £131,000 has been expended."

Then, in another case, the same witness said:

"There was a free grant of £100,000, was there not, from the Government?—£150,000 it reached eventually; it was £100,000 under the first Act and £50,000 under the second Act; it was £100,000 under the Arrears of Rent Act, and £50,000 under the Tramways Act. There was to have been a second £100,000 under the Tramways Act, but gentlemen interested in migration had £50,000 of it diverted to migration purposes; and I understand that not one penny of the £50,000 so diverted to migration has ever yet been spent. It is simply lying there."

And again, answering this question:

"Therefore, at this moment, there is money lying idle to the extent of £265,000?—Yes; £200,000 under the Act of 1881, £50,000 voted under the head of migration, and £15,000 here, the unexpended balance of the first £200,000 should be clearly kept separate from the rest, because it was only to be lent. The other £200,000 was a free grant."

Now, it would appear almost incredible, as I before stated, that the Imperial Government should be so lavish in their assistance, but it shows the disposition of that Government to deal with this subject in a generous and handsome manner. I therefore think it becomes the duty of this Dominion, as far as possible, to come into touch with the Imperial Government on this question and take advantage of those various inducements which are being held out by the Imperial Government to assist in the matter of emigration. A large volume of emigration leaves Ireland yearly, and there is no reason why that volume should not be attracted toward our shores. I would desire to shortly deal with this question as to the volume of emigration leaving Ireland. The witness is asked:

"But are you satisfied, notwithstanding the opposition of the leaders, that the feeling of the Irish people is strongly in favor of emigration?—There cannot be a doubt of it; you see it everywhere; I should think 79,000 people left Ireland last year, and 60,000 this year."

And under another section I find the average emigration from Ireland for the last ten years is something extraordinarily large:

"You have told the committee already that the number of persons emigrated last year was 79,000, and that the number this year was 60,000?—I do not know exactly what they have been; I can only judge. It is a question which I follow up with a great deal of interest; and observing the weekly returns which have been published in the press, I think there has been a decrease this year; I could not say to what extent it is, but I shall be surprised to hear that emigration this year has been anything else than decreasing. In the year when the guardians and Mr. Tuke were at work, in 1883, the emigration was 102,000."

I cannot put my hand on the section, but the statement is made here that the volume of emigration from Ireland for the last ten years reached about 70,000 souls a year. A great deal of that has been to the United States and Australia. I find a statement here that out of this immense emigration for one year only 700 were assisted:

"But the great mass of emigrants go without any help whatever, do they not?—Yes; the great mass of the emigrants do go without any help whatever. The only persons out of the 79,000 who were sent out of whom I had any cognizance as having been sent out by assistance were the 720."

Where did these emigrants go? They certainly did not reach this country. By some inducement they must have been disposed to go elsewhere, and therefore I say that it is for this reason I beg to draw the attention of this honorable House to the necessity of our endeavoring to capture this immense emigration from the British Islands to foreign countries. I find here also a proposed scheme for emigration from Ireland which might be taken advantage of by this Dominion, in which a large amount of money is proposed to be expended, or the expenditure of which is suggested, and which possibly might be carried out to a very successful consummation. This question is propounded to the witness:—

"But I want to know have you made any estimate of what it might cost the United Kingdom to effect a great flow of population so as to bring about the results which have been obtained in Belmullet, without reference to individual cases?—About £5,000,000.

"Do you think that if £5,000,000 were spent the result would be permanent and satisfactory?—I think so; I think it would relieve a great deal of the overcrowding, the holdings would be increased, and the prosperity of those who would be sent would be enormously increased.

"How many people would that money emigrate? —Five hundred thousand."

Here I say is an important scheme for the atttention of our Government to be directed to, and would possibly result in the Imperial Government carrying out the proposition, thus giving an enormous impetus to this country. I find that from the examination of various witnesses before this committee the Select Committee thoroughly satisfied themselves upon the point that there was no field equal to Canada for emigration and the most emphatic opinions were expressed by all those witnesses, many of whom were very familiar with Canada. Some of them had come out here for the purpose of inspecting it, I presume, with the view of reporting on the agricultural capabilities of the Dominion. They reported most favorably regarding Canada, and as between all the countries I have mentioned — Australia and the South American States—and Canada, it is considered there is no comparison. Many of the hon. gentlemen have no conception of the magnitude of the North-West Territories and Manitoba. I find that in the four districts—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Assiniboia—we have 250,000,000 acres of land, which would make 1,500,000 farms of 160 acres each. We have already 80,000,000 acres surveyed, which would make 500,000 farms of 160 acres each. What are we going to do with these immense possessions that we have in that country, unless some gigantic scheme, such as I have indicated, is instituted and carried into operation by our Government. Is that land to lie there unoccupied for a century to come? Are we to trust to voluntary emigration from Europe, without our putting forth some extended effort? At the present time there is no country on this continent, or elsewhere, that is called upon to the same extent as we are to put forth most vigorous efforts towards the accomplishment of this purpose. There can be no doubts as to the capabilities of Manitoba and the North-West Territories in the matter of agricultural land. It is considered the most fertile country upon the continent. It is traversed by the most magnificent rivers, clear as crystal. Our grasses are the most nutritious, both in their nature and in their quantity. We have most magnificent forests within easy reach of railway communication, enough to build homes for a whole nation if cut into lumber.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—That is in British Columbia, you mean?

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—I will give every prominence to the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman. In British Columbia, in the forests of the Rocky Mountains and in the northern districts of the North-West Territories, there is enough timber within easy reach of railway communication to meet all demands. That of British Columbia is the most magnificent timber to be found on this continent. In the matter of minerals, it is considered by all that our mineral wealth is equal to that of the United States. In the North-West Territories alone we have a tract of land covering 300 miles in each direction, in which coal may be found cropping out at all points—coal enough to heat this continent for centuries to come, if only developed. Our mineral possessions in the precious and baser metals are of incalculable value, and only await the pick of the miner and the fire of the smelter. Now, just at this juncture I would anticipate an objection which is very often made by the people of eastern Canada as to the expenditure of money in the North-West country. I know that there is a feeling prevalent among many in eastern Canada that they in times past have put their hands in their pockets and bought that country—paid for it, and paid for all improvements up to the present time, as well as for the administration of Government there. For that we in the North-West are profoundly thankful, we are profoundly grateful for the generosity of eastern Canada up to the present time. But I say that generosity should be carried infinitely further than it is. I say it is the duty of every loyal Canadian—live he as far east as Cape Breton—to do all he can for the purpose of developing this magnificent Dominion of ours, irrespective of the locality where the dollar is spent. If that country is developed every foot of land in Canada profits by it; but I would venture the opinion that that country already has paid for the vast expenditure which has been incurred in connection with it. In the first place, the acquisition of that Territory made Confederation possible as it stands to-day. True, you had a form of Confederation in 1868, but you had not then acquired in that scheme British Columbia, Manitoba and the North-West Territories. It was not then possible to link the northern half of this great continent by bands of steel from the Pacific to the Atlantic. I assert that the acquisition of that country—no matter what you paid for it—no matter what you are paying to-day for administration in it—has been already repaid long ago in making Confederation as it stands to-day the grand possibility which we have experienced. We contribute to the revenue the same as other citizens of Canada. We contribute the same amount per capita, as you do in the east.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—More; a great deal more.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—I am putting it on the lowest basis.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—We pay nearly twice as much per capita.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—I will leave my hon. friend from New Westminster to deal with the subject. If he can convince this House that we are paying five times as much it will make my case all the stronger. However, we pay as much at least per capita as you do in the eastern Provinces. We are, therefore, not relying upon the support of the eastern Provinces, but are contributing to the administration of Government the same as they do. A great deal is said in different quarters at the present time as to the exodus to Dakota and Minnesota, and other States of the neighboring Republic. I think it must be obvious to every hon. gentleman present that there is some reason for that statement, but in a qualified sense. But the reason for that exodus has not, up to the present time, been placed on the right shoulders. I do not say that any one Administration is responsible; but I deny the fact that the policy pursued by any Government up to the present time has been responsible for that fact, but it lies with the people of eastern Canada entirely. Public opinion up to the present time in the eastern Provinces has been asleep to this question. Your surplus population in eastern Canada in being crowded out naturally look for some country into which they can go, to gratify their love for enterprise and their ambition, and hence their reason for emigrating to the Western States, where they find a new country with a development amazingly rapid. They find half a million of emigrants pouring into that country every year. They find themselves close to large centres of population and trade. It is not that they take exception to the administration of the Government in this country, because I say under the heavens there is no freer or grander system of Government than we have here. It is not that they take exception to the policy of governmental administration in this country, but for the simple reason that they find there a new country opening up speedily, where enterprise is budding forth in an incomparable manner, and where they imagine they can rise to positions of affluence more quickly than here. If we expended the same money, energy and enterprise in opening up our North-West we would not have hundreds of thousands of Canadians to-day contributing to the commerce, enterprise and prosperity of the United States, and purchasing in the New England States those articles which to-day they should be purchasing from Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces of Canada. I say it is entirely due to the lethargy of the people of eastern Canada in not adopting a policy of opening up the North-West, so that we should be placed in a position of equality with the Western States, which are being so rapidly developed. And, furthermore, if our National Police is to be the success which we contemplated it would be, and which I think it has proven itself to be, so much the greater reason for our developing that country and opening up new centres of trade, so much the greater reason for our bringing millions of settlers there, who would be consumers of our manufactures. The Argentine Republic is not a manufacturing State, but a large importer, and therefore there is not the same reason why that country should put forth such enterprise as there is in our case, inasmuch as Canada aspires to be a manufacturing and industrial country, and hence the greater reason why we should have population. I want to submit to the people of eastern Canada an investment. I put this scheme in the light of an investment. We do not ask for generosity in the matter; we simply ask the Government to enter on an investment in the matter of emigration. I find from Atkinson, one of the most prominent statisticians in the United States, and who was representative of the United States Government to the Bi-metallic Conference in Europe—he estimates that each adult settler coming into the country would be worth $2,000. I think very few will dispute Mr. Atkinson's ability as a statistician, and I find on enquiry from our own statistician, Mr. Johnston, that he agrees, to a very large extent, with the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Atkinson, but states we may safely put it down that to any Government in a new country every adult settler is worth $1,500. Taking this as the basis of calculation, the Dominion is justified in entering upon a large propaganda of immigration. I say that a settler has a standard value in the market, just the same as gold or silver, or wheat. He is a commercial commodity, and his value has been fixed quite as arbitrarily as any commercial commodity we have in trade. I find from statistics that each soul in Canada contributes $6.25 per head annually in taxation. Taking this into consideration, we have five millions of people here to-day, who contribute per capita $6.25 by way of taxation. If we had ten millions here to-morrow our taxation would be reduced by one-half, plus the extra cost of administering the Government of ten millions of people. Taxation would thus be almost reduced 50 per cent. I am not urging that we should adopt a system of immigration for the purpose of reducing taxation, for the taxation of to-day is not found to be burdensome; but I say we should direct or divert that increased contribution to taxation to pay for carrying on a system of immigration. There is no questioning the fact that the more people we have to tax the greater the revenue we have, and the less cost per head of taxation. Now, I suggest this: that to bring in 500,000 people from Europe to Manitoba and the North West Territories within the next two years, which would represent 100,000 families, we could obtain from the Imperial Government, I feel satisfied from the feeling as indicated in the report of the select committee from which I have just quoted, an advance of at least sixty millions of dollars on a guarantee from the Dominion Government. Taking the amount that the seventy-nine crofter families have cost, viz., £120 per family, for a guarantee of sixty millions of dollars, we could place half a million of people in our North-West —100,000 families of farmers getting 160 acres each family, starting them as the crofters have been started. Taking three adults to each family, we would thus have 300,000, worth, as estimated by statisticians, $1,500 per head, thus adding an asset to the Dominion of $450,000,000 for the liability of guarantee assumed by us. It may appear incredible when I give you those figures, but I have it on the best authority that adults in this country and in the United States are worth the figures I have given. Then, taking each family as having three adults to a family, at $1,500 dollars a head they are worth four hundred and fifty millions of dollars to the the country. If hon. gentlemen will read a treatise recently published by Atkinson on this subject, in which it is dealt with in the most exhaustive manner, they will doubtless be convinced from the facts and figures given there that settlers are worth the sum which I have mentioned. Now, this half million of people would pay an annual revenue to the country at $6.25 per head of $3,125,000. That is the extra revenue we would have from those people, provided they paid the same per capita taxation as the rest of the people. This would pay the interest at 3 per cent. on the money advanced; and I find from the report of the select committee that money could be probably obtained in Great Britain at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. I think it was agreed upon that if the British Columbia Government, in negotiating a scheme of this kind, would put the guarantee in a certain shape, that the money might be advanced at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—That is the crofters' scheme that you have reference to?

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—Yes; the crofters' scheme. I find that it would pay the interest on this advance of sixty millions of dollars, and would leave a balance of $1,325,000 per annum on account of a sinking fund, to apply on the principal of the guarantee, should the Government be called upon to pay any part of it. From the figures which I have given, the loss at the very utmost—I take the figures of eminent gentlemen of Great Britain, who are thoroughly versed on this subject—the Government would not at the outside lose more than one-half of the guarantee, and we would have a sinking fund of $1,325,000 per annum to cover any loss which might occur. But let me state another fact, that a system of colonization of this kind always carries with it its complement of emigration as distinguished from colonization That is to say, every family of colonists would induce an equal amount of emigration; you could bring out a family of emigrants at a very much less cost than a family of colonists. I find from the Blue Books that the immigrants brought out by the Dominion Government, up to this time, cost us in round figures $4 per head, so that if we brought out 100,000 farming families we might calculate that we could get 100,000 families of immigrants at the same rate we have been paying in the past, $4 a head. Now, these 100,000 families, five to a family, would be another half million of people, and they would contribute to the revenue at the same rate we are paying—$6.25 per head—and consequently three adults in each family being worth to the country $1,500 per head, we would find ourselves in possession of another asset of $450,000,000. Hon. gentlemen may smile; I even felt disposed myself to consider it somewhat incredible when I first read of it; but by a perusal of the figures of eminent statisticians it can be proved beyond peradventure. This is the philosophy introduced into this question of immigration in the Argentine Republic and elsewhere. The Argentine Republic has been conducting its policy of immigration based upon the principles of this method, and which will be found seggested in the correspondence upon the question of Argentine immigration. They estimate that each adult is worth so much to the country; they argue that each adult contributes so much per head to the revenue of the country, and that therefore upon this conclusion feel themselves justified in carrying out the scheme of immigration to which I have alluded. Now, I submit to hon. gentlemen that this is the great solution of the various public questions which are pressing themselves on the public mind to-day in Canada, and which are demanding a considerable amount of attention—namely, the questions which tend to our national future. The great question with which we are dealing to day is how shall Canada make herself great and important, and how shall we attain that position of significance among other nations commensurate with the natrual advantages which we possess. We find the public mind agitated on this question. It will be conceded that abroad in Canada to-day there is a restless feeling as to what our future shall be—Imperial Federation, independence or political union with the United States; these have their advocates and their followers, and are beginning to loom up in the political horizon, and must at an early date receive the attention of Parliament. But, hon. gentlemen, do you suppose for a moment that if we had five millions of settlers upon these western plains there would be any uncertain sound throughout the Dominion to-day as to what our national future would be? Do you suppose if we had as many people in that western country as there are in eastern Canada to-day that there would be any doubt as to our future being an uncertain quantity? Would Canadians then think of any political system or scheme other than building up on the northern half of this mighty continent a Canadian nation worthy of the great races from whose loins we have sprung? I say until such a scheme or system as I have intimated is carried out by this Dominion that this retless feeling will continue to prevail, which will not be quieted, but upon the adoption of such a scheme as that to which I have directed your attention, the pulse of Canada will beat with new vitality—with the hope borne of future greatness, and with an impulse quickened by the possibilities that await us. Those Canadian statesmen who acquired for this Dominion that vast tract of country in 1869 manifested then a sagacity worthy of the highest and wisest statesmanship of this 19th century. They then saw eastern Canada lying alongside of a great nation south of us, whose march of progress in its leaps and bounds are without parallel in any age; they then saw that if we required to maintain our national life we required the acquisition of conditions that would be equal, as far as possible, to the conditions of the nation south of us. By the development of the great plains of the North-West those conditions alone were to be obtained. Here was a tract of land as large as Europe, as rich in its soil as any garden lands on the continent, as wealthy in natural resources as could be possessed by any people. Here, lying dormant, ready to be called into life at the bidding of national enterprise, was to be found every condition to make a wealthy and a prosperous nation. This was what was handed down to us by the statesmen of 1869, and with wise forecast they could see that vast country being developed by Canadian enterprise, and the foundation of a great nation being laid on those fertile western plains. To-day, we have that vast country connected by means of a trans-continental highway with both oceans, and I say the time has now arrived when Canadian enterprise should put forth its right arm and direct the surplus millions of Europe towards settling on the virgin soil of those great prairies. I am proud to say that there are to-day at the helm of state men who helped to acquire for this country those magnificent western possessions. I cannot conceive any nobler ambition for those statesmen than, by the introduction of such a policy as I have endeavored weakly to outline, to have the satisfaction of saying, in the noon-day of their political life, they acquired that vast country, unequalled in geographical extent and agricultural fertility upon this continent; they acquired a boundless plain with scarcely a vestige of civilization upon its face, and now, in the eventide of their political life, by wise and progressive statesmanship, they behold it the adopted country of millions of settlers, the home of advanced civilization, and the seat of the future hope and inspiration of Canada's prosperity and greatness. In conclusion, hon. gentlemen, I beg to ask the question placed upon the Notice Paper, as to what is the intention of the Government?

HON. MR. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has given an extremely interesting speech, a very eloquent one, I may say, but he has propounded some extraordinary theories on this question of immigration. The hon. gentleman commenced by telling us that he found great fault with the laxity and indifference—those were the words he used—in the older Provinces, in their treatment of the North-West. I think that charge was a most ungrateful one. It is a charge, that in my judgment, is wholly unfounded. Certainly he cannot point to any other country on the face of the globe, under similar conditions as Canada, that is as liberal, and that has incurrred as large an expenditure in the opening up of a new country as can be shown towards the development of the North-West by the older Provinces of the Dominion. In the last twenty-five years we have spent certainly over $100,000,000 in that country towards its growth and development, and assisting immigration that we expected would flow in there. We have extinguished the Indian title, and have made it possible for new settlers to live in that country, being a marked contrast with the condition of affairs on the other side of the line, where, during that interval, fierce struggles have prevailed between the pioneers of settlement and the various Indian tribes whose hunting grounds and reserves were being encroached upon. We keep up a force, at considerable expense, of one thousand mounted police, in order to protect the settlers and to maintain order in that country, and to preserve the settlers in earlier days from the encroachments of the Indians. We have distributed seed-grain in the North-West when the settlers' crops had failed, and we have in a variety of ways I need not now allude to, aided the settlement of that country in a manner that is wholly unprecedented. If we examine into the history of this Dominion, and enquire what aid the settlers of Ontario had—and I suppose the same thing would apply to the other Provinces of the Dominion—it will be found that the assistance given to the settlers of the North-West has been altogether out of proportion to the assistance given to the settlers in the early history of the other Provinces of Canada. In fact, the North-West has been a sort of favored country. We have been appealed to from time to time in a variety of ways to assist the North-West, and those appeals have always been listened to. The hon. gentleman has propounded the idea that by availing ourselves of a certain sum of money we can pick up a population in the British Islands and transplant them to the North-West—to the Garden of Eden he has pictured there. I do not recognise the practicability of such a proposition. He talks of 100,000 families as he would talk of 100,000 cattle. He talks of transplanting those people from the land of their birth, whether they like it or not, wholly ignoring the fact that many of them decline expatriation—that many of them, if they do leave their own land, prefer to go to countries more in sympathy with their feelings and associations. Those who have friends in Australia prefer to go there; those who have friends in the United States prefer going there; those who have friends in Canada will probably prefer coming here: but my experience is that it is only the successful settler who is the successful immigration agent. The experience of the last twenty-five years in this and other colonies will bear out my statement. The only successful immigration scheme is the successful settler. Wherever a man is successful in a new land he communicates with his friends at home, and his letters are regarded as a much higher authority than the represtatations of agents or lecturers or the pamphlets circulated by thousands by the Immigration Department, which have no weight or influence whatever. The hon. gentleman has lamented that in Ireland, where emigration has been so large, so small a proportion of them has come to Canada. My hon. friend seems to ignore the history of Ireland; he seems to have forgotten what the causes are which have prevented Irishmen from making Canada their home. I think he said there were 70,000 emigrants left the shores of Ireland for the North American continent last year, and that 57,000 of those went to the United States, and the balance to Canada. Anyone reading the history of the last fifty years knows how difficult it is to induce Irishmen to come to Canada. The reasons are patent to everyone, and I need not advert to them on this occasion. It all goes to show, however, how utterly impossible it is, no matter what amount of money you expend, to induce people to come to a country to which they do not desire to come—not that the condition of affairs in Canada leads to any such result, but the old antipathy that prevails is enough to prevent Irish emigrants from coming to the shores of a British colony. It is not the Irish alone, but the English and Scotch are going to the United States in much larger proportions than to Canada. I lay down the principle that you cannot force immigration into particular channels—more particularly on this continent. Even if you do bring out a body of people and place them in the North-West, within a year they will move off to the United States if they do not like Canada, the facilities for moving backwards and forwards are so great. I venture to say that there are thousands and thousands of people now settled in Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin and other States of the Union who have been assisted to immigrate to Canada from Great Britain and Ireland, who have gone bodily out of this country, and the money expended on assisting them has been lost to our people. In proof of this, I take the figures from our own Blue Books, and the Blue Books of the United States, showing the proportion of people that left Europe and settled in Canada and the neighboring Republic. The conditions of things in the United States and in Canada are sufficiently alike to enable us to make a careful comparison, and I think these figures will prove that the large sums of money expended by the Government have been perfectly futile to divert immigration to this country. The hon. gentleman said that the United States, and even the individual States of the Union, had done more to promote immigration to that country than we had done in Canada. I have heard for the first time that the United States have given any money to induce immigration. I was under the impression that they did not do it—that, on the contrary, of recent years they have been adopting prohibition in that direction, and that there is some difficulty in immigrants getting into the United States; that they are sending people away from their shores, because they do not want them when they are not a superior class. More particularly is that the case since the law with regard to foreign labor has been adopted. It is quite a notorious fact—we see it day by day—that people are sent away from the United States because their coming there has been an infringement on the Alien Labor Law. The following is the table showing the proportion of immigration into Canada and the United States respectively, and the comparative cost:

Years.	United States.	Canada.	Proportion.	Total Expenditure.	British Agencies	North-West Agencies.

The causes of immigration from the old world to the new are entirely beyond our control; money has nothing to do with it. The exodus there is promoted by causes entirely beyond our control. We have nothing to do with it. In Russia and Austria the conscription largely influences it. Good times in Canada or the United States is a moving impulse that induces people to abandon their holdings in the old world to come to the new. It will be seen from the table I have submitted showing the immigration into the United States and Canada since 1876 that we just get our regular proportion, whether the number runs up to 500,000, or is as low as 150,000, which shows that the successful emigration agent is the prosperous member of the family who is in the new world. He writes home and tells his people that the times are improving, and that it is a good period to emigrate to America. If he lives in the United States he advises his friends to come there; if he lives in Canadahe advises them to come here. It is on that principle immigration is influenced, and the money we have been paying out year by year has been thrown away, so far as having any influence on the immigration from Europe into this country. In the years 1876 and 1877 immigration fell off in the United States almost to nothing. There was a larger emigration from the United States, strange to say, in one of those years—I think it was in 1877—than the immigration into the country. It is the only instance from the earliest period in the history of the United States when that extraordinary event took place. It will be seen that in the year 1876 only 169,000 immigrants came into the United States and 25,000 came to Canada. Our proportion was one-seventh of the whole. By comparing the tables it will be seen, taking one year with another, that our proportion is about one-fifth. In 1879 the proportion was increased in the United States, because times improved in that country before they did in Canada; it is quite evident that such was the case, for these figures confirm what has been so often asserted in that respect. In 1879 the immigration increased in the United States to 177,000,and in Canada it ran up to 40,000. In 1880 the number had jumped from 177,000 to 457,000 in the United States and it had fallen off to 38,000 in Canada. Our proportion that year was one-twelfth. But hon. gentlemen will remember that the years 1880, 1881, 1882 and 1883 were what are called booming years in the United States. In 1880 the influence of the improved condition of things in the United States had not re-acted on Canada, though I have always maintained that the United States is simply the barometer of Canada in what are called good or bad times. We had not felt the good effects of it then; we only got one-twelfth of the whole immigration to this continent that year. In 1881 the number of immigrants to the United States rose to 609,000, and ours to 47,000. In 1882 their number still went up, and ours also rose to 112,000. For subsequent years our proportion has been about one-fifth. If hon. gentlemen will examine the statement closely they will find that the expenditure that we made to induce immigration to Canada did not in any way bear upon the proportion of the people who came to this country. In 1879 we spent $176,000 only, yet we got one-fourth of the whole immigration that year. That was our highest immigration, yet it was in the year in which we spent the least money. In 1881 our expenditure was $206,000 and we got only one-thirteenth of the immigrants. In 1882 our expenditure was $346,000, for which we got only one-seventh of the immigrants. In 1883 our expenditure was $420,000, for which we got one-fifth of the immigrants. In 1885 we spent only $310,000, and got 70,000 immigrants. The diminution in expenditure there is due to the fact that assisted passages had to be deducted, so that it will be seen that the money we spent did not seem to affect in any way the proportion of immigrants we got. In 1885 we spent $310,000, and got one-fifth of the immigration; and so on, until 1888, when we dropped the assisted passages, feeling that we were not getting the benefit of it; and in so doing I think the Government acted very wisely—so that the expenditure that year fell to $183,000, while we received actually more immigrants, because we got 88,000 that year, some 4,000 more than we had received the previous year, when we spent $313,000.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The prospective change of Government no doubt had its effect.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I am sorry to say that there was none—no prospects at all of it. The people who had been duped by the National Policy had not had their eyes opened then. They will next election, though. We have spent large amounts of money in the British agencies, and the amounts spent there have been pretty much the same each year, whether we got more or less immigrants. The only way I can account for the reduction in the expenditure noticed in 1879 is, I fancy it was the change of Government, and there was a sweep of immigration agents, and the new ones had not been appointed. That is the only way I can explain the change, for I see it is again up to the normal figure.

HON. MR. POWER—It may have been because a High Commissioner was substituted for the Canadian Commissioner.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I find that so far as the North-West is concerned we have been pretty liberal in the North-West agencies, which I assume were organized for the purpose of more particularly directing the tide of immigration into that country. We commenced in 1877 with an expenditure of $7,000 a year for what are called North-West agencies, and I find they have steadily crept up until in 1888 they reached $20,000. It would not appear from this statement that we are neglecting the North-West Territories, because we are expending more in the agencies than we are in any other part of the Dominion? Therefore, I cannot agree with the theory laid down by my hon. friend (it was a very pretty one, no doubt) that money could accomplish so much, but I think the experience of any gentleman who reflects on the subject, and reads the history of the country aright, will find that it is utterly impossible by money alone to affect a change of population from one country to another.

HON. MR. POWER—Has my hon. friend added up the total number of emigrants who came into Canada during those years?

HON. MR. SCOTT—No; I have not the total number.

HON. MR. POWER—I see that 133,000 came to Canada in 1883. I was going to ask my hon. friend if he has any idea how many of those remained in the country?

HON. MR. SCOTT—I have no idea. I am speaking only of those who came to Canada, who are claimed in the immigration returns. That opens up a broad question. Of course, I am not going to enter into it now. My own experience has led me to the conclusion that these people come and go, that if an emigrant has been assisted out to Windsor he is quite likely to step over to Detroit, and if he is carried to Port Huron he is just as likely to cross over to Michigan. We have realized that there are losses of that kind. We receive some from the United States, but I do not think the proportion is at all equivalent to that of the departures from Canada. The hon. gentleman admits that there has been a large emigration from this country. Those people must have known that there was a Garden of Eden in our North-West that offered the best of homes to the settler, yet they persisted in going to the Eastern States. The hon. gentleman could not understand the cause of their preference. I am not going to enter into the reasons why. He says they do not appreciate the National Policy; I think they do appreciate it, and they have left the country to better their fortunes. They certainly would not have torn up their household gods and gone to another country, unless there was a strong and urgent reason for making the change. It is not necessary to analyze that reason: it leads to another subject, but there is the patent fact, that they did not go there because they believed they would be poorer. They went there because they knew that they were going to be better off. On looking into the figures I am rather startled at the vast number of British subjects who seem to prefer the United States. If it goes on much longer there will be a fusion between Great Britain and the United States. I suppose there are to-day in the United States some six or seven millions of persons who were British subjects. Many of them have become naturalized citizens of the Republic, but no doubt a great many of them have never taken the oath of allegiance. I am including in this estimate the Irish, because they form a majority of these people. There are nearly as many of the Irish people in the United States as there are in Ireland. It is claimed that there are over a million Canadians in the United States. My impression is that the estimate is short of the real number. That is one reason, and a very strong one, why we should have better relations with the neighboring country. The hon. gentleman from Calgary made a great mistake when he said that there is any party in Canada that desires a political union with the Republic I have yet to learn that any considerable number of our people have any such desire. I can count on my fingers the number of persons that I know who look forward to any such change, but there are very many who desire closer commercial relations with the United States, and their desire will be gratified before many years. In that they follow simply in the wake of the mother country, which has the freest trade, on her part, at all events, with the United States. And she has illustrated the wisdom of it by the marked success that has attended her trade with that country, because to-day it is larger than the trade with any other country, save, perhaps, India, and larger on the other side, with England, than with any other nation. The figures prove that conclusively, and they prove, moreover, that it is a growing trade, and therefore this bugbear that is perpetually brought under our notice, this dread of bringing about closer political relations with the United States, has no foundation in fact. If we want to build up a great nation here we must have free trade with the United States; otherwise, you will depopulate this country. An effort should be made to bring back the people who have gone to the United States. They did not go there because the land is better. We have in Ontario a finer country than any State in the Union.

HON. MR. McCALLUM—And the people are better off.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Perhaps they are; but they want to be still better off, as they would be if they had free trade with the United States. However, that is a very broad subject. I have only referred to it incidentally, because the hon. gentleman from Calgary, in expatiating on—I will not say exaggerating—the attractions of the North-West, took occasion to say that it was the only way to meet the aspirations of a political party in Canada that desired closer politicial relations with the United States. I say there is no party in Canada that has any such desire, because we feel that our system of government is infinitely superior to the . We have no doubt corruption on our side, but they have it to a far greater extent. They are a larger country and possess greater accumulated wealth. I do not propose to further follow the argument of the hon. gentleman in reference to the reports that he read to us of opinions expressed on this subject in the House of Commons with regard to colonization companies. I say they are utterly impracticable, and this Government or any other Government would be mad to entertain them at any time. It would be an utter waste of money. A number of charitable, benevolent people took up this crofter question. They did so because of the cruel treatment to which the crofters were subjected by the landlords. It was because the landlord was narrowing the crofter's holding, depriving him of the privileges that he and his forefathers had enjoyed—converting the lands where his sheep had pastured into a deer park. It was because all this was creating a great scandal throughout the British Empire that a few benevolent people took up the question of transferring the crofters to the Canadian North-West. The number of crofters is small, but I have no doubt it will be a happy change for them, and the success which will reward their efforts in that country will be the means of bringing out a considerable number of them, not by means of Government assistance, because, as I see by a copy of the Mail, an English paper of 21st February, that has just now been handed to me, it is proposed by the Lord Advocate of Scotland not to continue this grant to the crofters. In the Imperial Parliament the Lord Advocate was asked if it was proposed to send out any more crofter families this spring to western Canada. The Lord Advocate replied:

"I am informed that a report has been received which will be submitted to an early meeting of the Colonization Board, the general purport of which is that the families are comfortably housed and have more or less land ready for crop. A small balance of the money voted last session remains unexpended, but until the accounts are fully made up it is impossible to say what it amounts to. It is not proposed to send out any more families this spring, and no steps in this direction will be taken until the committee appointed to enquire into the State-aided emigration have issued their report."

In special cases of that kind State aid may be of very considerable benefit; and I will give hon. gentleman another illustration where such aid has been of very considerable service. About 1876 a body of Icelanders, driven from their country by the ice accumulating on the coasts of the island, found their way into Ontario. They were in great want, and the Government of the day transported them to the North-West. The people were entirely out of money. They had nothing to keep them from starvation. The Government of the day, the Mackenzie Administration, thought it might be the nucleus of a future settlement, and so they were planted on the shore of Lake Winnipeg. The settlement was for two or three years extremely unfortunate. It will be recollected that in regard to this matter the small-pox attacked them and decimated the colony. Lord Dufferin, who knew something about Iceland, took some interest in them, and used his influence with the Government in endeavoring to assist them, and so they were assisted for a year or two longer. The consequence has been, no doubt, that their reports to their friends at home have brought out a great many more Icelanders year by year; the colony is increasing to such an extent that new colonies are being formed in the country, but it is not the Government of Canada that is bringing them out. It is the success of those Icelanders who are settled in the country. Their glowing reports to their friends at home, and the money they send back, have been the means of bringing more Icelanders to settle in the North-West. It is another illustration of the way in which immigration can be carried out. A colony that is once successful enlarges simply by the communications between the successful colonists and their friends abroad. In ignoring the principle of colonization upon a general scale, I do not for a moment contend that there may not be individual circumstances that would warrant a Government assisting a special colony, such as the Mennonites. It was known that the Mennonites were going to leave Russia. They objected to conscription; they did not want to serve in a possible war and the proposition was made to the Government of this country to aid them. That aid was advanced, and, no doubt, has been a success. I do not know if the loan has been repaid; but apart from their expenses a very considerable sum of money was given them, in order to place them on a good footing in the North West, and they were charged 5 or 6 per cent. on the money advanced. Whether they have repaid that loan or not I cannot say. People who have made up their minds to move, but are uncertain whether they are going to settle in one part of the globe or another, it may be wise to assist. But to say that you are going to England, Ireland or Scotland and gather a number of people, and say to them: "We want you to come out and settle in the North-West, and we will pay your expenses travelling there," I maintain is utterly futile, unless there are some other inducements than the mere money consideration you propose to offer.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am very glad that my hon. friend from Ottawa abstained from entering into those side questions which were alluded to, naturally enough, but which would only have provoked a discussion of a week or two without producing any practical result. I must say I deprecate the continuance of this practice that has prevailed in the Senate for some time, of having long debates without any substantive motion, or any possible result to be derived from them. I might be allowed, perhaps, to express the amusement that I feel at any hon. friend's comparing the project of commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity, which he and his friends are urging upon the country, with what England is doing towards the United States. Their proposal is to have free trade with the United States, it is true, but not free trade with any other country. The proposal to us involves, as has been shown on other occasions, to my satisfaction, but perhaps not to my hon. friend's, that in order to carry out the scheme we should have to place our commercial and financial system entirely under the control of the United States.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Oh, no; that has never been urged.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not ask my hon. friend to agree with me, but I say it is contended by myself and a great many others that that is the proposition. But if it is so, and I think it is so, we are just in this different position from England—that England throws open her markets to the whole world; she trades with every country on the same conditions, while we should be keeping our markets closed to the world, as far as duties can close them, and have free trade with the United States alone. That is the striking difference between the position of England and that of the United States. In answer to my hon. friend, whose speech I listened to with great attention, and with whom I largely sympathise, I have to say, at present the subject of any further assistance or any further steps to promote immigration, beyond the provision of ample facilities at low rates for access to the North-West and the provision for granting tracts of land to those who go there, is under the consideration of the Government; but no such scheme has yet been decided upon.

DISCLOSURE OF OFFICIAL INFORMATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called,—Third reading of Bill (T) "An Act to prevent the disclosure of Official Documents and Information."

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I have conferred with my colleague on the subject of the penalty to be imposed for infringement of this Act. I have satisfied myself that it is our undoubted privilege to insert in the Bill any provision creating an offence intended to prevent or punish the commission of that offence. There can be no question on that subject. I therefore purpose to fill up the two blanks, the one in the first section and the other in the second section, with the words "one hundred dollars." That is the maximum; the minimum is left to the discretion of the judge. I move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended in the manner I have proposed.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the third reading of the Bill, as amended.

HON. MR. POWER moved in amendment, that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by striking out of the first clause the paragraph marked "i i i." He said: That is the paragraph which makes it a misdemeanor for anyone to take a sketch or a photograph from the outside of a martello tower or fortification. I think that is carrying the thing too far. I do not mean to say that they may not go as far in other countries, but that is no reason why we should do likewise. There is no important secret that is likely to be divulged to any foreign prince, potentate, or power by taking a picture that way.

HON. MR. MILLER—I cannot agree with the hon. member from Halifax. In the first place, at the outset, that clause enacts that a party must "wrongfully" be doing this. Now, that is a sufficient protection. Unless the party is clearly shown to be wrongfully doing the act he cannot be punished. There is no difficulty, I presume, in getting permission to take these sketches, if the proper course is taken, and if there is no suspicion attaching to the person making the application. I think it is proper that there should be such a restriction. I think it is very important that the enemy should not get sketches or photographs of our fortifications. In some instances the restriction may appear to be unreasonable, but we cannot legislate for exceptional cases: we must enact a general law. The Bill has been framed with a good deal of care. It is necessarily verbose to meet the object intended, and the fact that it is based on an Act of the Imperial Parliament ought to be no small recommendation in our eyes, because we know what attention is given to these matters in England. I think it would be unfortunate, and would greatly deteriorate the value of the Bill, if such an amendment were accepted.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—If the amendment is adopted it will practically render the Bill inoperative. There is no intention to punish a tourist who makes a sketch of a fortification, and it must be borne in mind that the onus rests on the prosecutor to show that the sketch is taken for a wrongful purpose.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not know that I can add anything to what my hon. friend from Richmond has said with respect to this motion. The first paragraph of the clause appears to me to guard most carefully the artist who takes a sketch of a fortification for amusement, because it says distinctly that he is only guilty if he wrongfully obtains information. My hon. friend must remember that information of this description in a crisis is really of great importance to an attacking party. My hon. friend will remember that in the invasion of France by the Germans some years ago their extraordinary success was considered at the time, and was, really, largely due to the amount of information they had about every road, every local fortification or place of strength in the country. At the headquarters of the German staff they had drawings of every road and fortified place ample to guide them in their attack. It is to prevent an injury of that description that this Bill is introduced. This clause is an exact copy of a section of the English Act, and we have received a pressing despatch from the British Government asking us to take efficient steps in the direction indicated in this Bill. I think, therefore, that my hon. friend ought not to press his amendment, or, at least, I hope the House will allow this clause to stand part of the Bill.

The amendment was declared lost, on a division.

The Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committe of the Whole on Bill (H) "An Act to amend 'An Act concerning Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister.'"

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause—

HON. MR. POWER moved to leave out "daughter" and insert "neice," and leave out "wife's sister" and insert "wife." He said: There is no reason why a man may not marry the daughter of his deceased wife's brother as well as the daughter of his deceased wife's sister.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I do not approve of that.

HON. MR. MILLER—There is a decided objection.

HON. MR. POWER—Since we have decided that a man may marry his deceased wife's sister, I can see no reason why a man should not be allowed to marry the neice of his deceased wife, whether the neice is the daughter of a deceased wife's sister or brother. There is no relationship by consanguinity at all; it is only by affinity. I do not propose to interfere with the principle, which is of some consequence, prohibiting the marriage of a woman to her deceased husband's brother.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman should have given notice of his amendment, so that we could thoroughly understand what he desires to accomplish.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am opposed to the principle altogether. I do not approve of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and I am against extending the principle. I would suggest that the further consideration of the Bill be postponed until to-morrow.

HON. MR. KAULBACH moved that the committee rise and report progress.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. LEWIN, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (88) "An Act to incorporate the North Canadian Atlantic Railway and Steamship Company." (Mr. Bolduc.)

Bill (60) "An Act to incorporate the Rainy River Boom Company." (Mr. MacInnes.)

CALGARY WATER POWER CO'.S BILL.

OND READING.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (75) "An Act respecting the Calgary Water Power Company, Limited."

HON. MR POWER—Unless I am mistaken, this Bill is opposed by the people of Calgary. In that case, the Bill had better stand over until to-morrow.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—This company has already been incorporated by the North-West Council. We come here for the purpose of having the charter confirmed. The opposition to which the hon. member from Halifax refers is not to this Bill, but to another one. The people of Calgary have no reason to oppose this measure.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (82) "An Act to confirm an Agreement between the Montreal and Western Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company." (Mr. Bolduc.)

The Senate adjourned at 6:10 p. m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, March 13th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

MOTION.

HON. MR. BOULTON moved—

That in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when Canada might be accorded a measure of representation in the Imperial Parliament, by giving to the Government of the Dominion of Canada, and to the Government of each Province in the Dominion, the appointment of a representative holding a seat in the Imperial House of Commons, the representative of the Government of the Dominion also holding a seat in the Imperial Privy Council, the privileges of such representatives being limited to the discharge of and voting upon such questions as may affect Canadian interests. That this resolution be transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, for such constitutional action as he may deem it advisable to take in the interests of the country.

He said: In bringing this resolution before this honorable House for debate, I feel that a degree of responsibility attaches to it that does not attach to ordinary resolutions, because it is dealing with a question which involves issues beyond the precincts of this House and beyond the precincts of this country—not only the destinies of a country but the destinies of an Empire are contained in the principles it involves. My object in bringing this resolution forward was to supplement the resolution that was passed by the honorable House of Commons, expressing the loyalty and devotion of the Canadian people to the British Crown and to the person of Her Most Gracious Majesty. While I believe that that resolution expressed the unanimous sentiments and feelings of the people of Canada, it is open to misinterpretation; it might be considered the expression of affection and regard that a daughter would write to her parent on the eve of receiving the attentions of a suitor, or it might be the expressions of fidelity and devotion that are sometimes made and sometimes broken; but when a pure-minded maiden (if I might be pardoned for using the popular symbol generally applied to our fair country), when a pure-minded maiden gives her hand with her heart, there is then no room for the misinterpretation of the sentiment she expresses or the duration of the bond it implies. In addition, hon. gentlemen, it cannot be denied that the destiny of Canada is viewed from a number of standpoints. Imperial Federation is advocated; we have Annexation discussed; Independence is discussed; the development of a French nationality is mooted; and the suggestion has been thrown out looking to the establishment of a western Dominion in our broad prairie country. It is a misfortune when the minds of a population are drawn from centreing their energies upon those subjects that are conducive to the material welfare of the people, to abstract questions concerning their political future. I believe that we have a destiny to fulfil on this continent, in the interest of the world, and that is, that we shall form the link that will ultimately unite the forces of civilization of the British Empire to the forces of the great American civilization which has been established upon this continent by the genius of the British race; and when I speak of the British race, I do not exclude our compatriots from the Province of Quebec. On the contrary, they have for upwards of a century been inspired with the principles of the British constitution; they have imbibed the same patriotic sentiments that beats in the heart of every Canadian, and they are in every sense part of the British race to-day, retaining a memento of their ancestry in the language they have preserved. While, however, we may conceive that we have a destiny to fulfil, we have also a duty to perform, and that is to do our share towards preserving intact and undiminished the integrity and the lustre of the British Empire. When we realize what that Empire has grown to, the influence that it has exercised upon the civilization of the world, the wisdom that has guided its rulers (except, perhaps, in one fatal instance), and the glory that is yet in store for its ever-increasing power, it makes us feel that we have a duty to perform, as I have said before, in taking our part in maintaining it. We have already done a large share in developing this fair country; the physical endurance, industry and capacity of our forefathers hewed out of the forest and brought into cultivation the smiling fields that now form part of the wealth of the Empire, as their sons now form part of its strength. We have built up a hardy population, reared in morality and intellectuality and although we have made advances, we are yet only on the threshold of our development, so far as the extent and resources of our country are concerned. We have in the Maritime Provinces coal and iron side by side as accessible and as plentiful for the trade of the world as they are on the British isles. We have in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec agricultural resources and manufacturing power that can not be excelled. In the West we have a great wheat field that can produce wheat which possesses 10 per cent. more baking value than any other. In British Columbia we have again coal and iron, all added to our great natural wealth of timber, and fish and minerals. These resources are paralleled on the south by the greatest system of inland navigation the world has ever seen, and the Hudson Bay on the north, both of which penetrate the interior of the continent.

To preserve those resources for the benefit of our own people, or for those who cast in their lot with us, is a duty we owe to ourselves, and to turn the minds of our people into what I might term a legitimate train of thought, so far as our political future is concerned, is a duty which we, occupying the position we do in this honorable House, owe to the people of Canada.

Although I will allow that annexation rarely finds expression in the sentiment of the people, yet there is no doubt that the attractions of that great country to the south are a constant menace to the integrity of our country and its national unity; and we may fairly ask ourselves the question—whether it is better to preserve our national unity as an independent State of the Empire, with our capital in Canada, or to run the risk some day of dividing our country into a number of States, with their capital at Washington, thus losing our cohesive force between the Atlantic and Pacific, and abandoning a birthright which we have inherited and have preserved.

There is no doubt there are people in England who would be pleased to see Canada become part of the United States, in order that no danger might arise which would interfere with the interests of British capital that is so largely centred there. On the other hand, there are people in the United States who would as little like to see the power of the British Empire weakened by the isolation of Canada from it, because they realise that the power of the British Empire will be exercised in the promotion of the welfare of the world's citizens, irrespective of nationality. The same arguments will apply with equal force in regard to independence, and I believe that our circumstances are such that we could not resist the gravitating forces to the south if we had no other sentiment than Canadian nationality to support us. Even suppose we succeeded in maintaining our independence, when we look upon the status of the northern countries of Europe we cannot fail to realise that our position as an integral part of the British Empire is a prouder one and gives greater scope for individual effort than to struggle under the financial burden of an independent State within our own borders.

Take our Princess of Wales—her beauty, her virtues, her graces are Denmark's, but her glories are due to the fact that she will be Britain's Queen and Empress of the greater Britain which we have helped to create, and in our humble capacity we as British subjects and Canadian citizens share those glories with her.

In regard to a distinct French nationality, even allowing for one moment that the French Canadians were a unit in falling back upon the nationality of their ancestry, which we have the best public evidences that they are not, or that it even finds a place in their public policy—but allowing for one moment that they were a unit, what would be the effect should they be successful in developing such a policy? It would be a nationality without influence and without aim or object on this continent. No; we were born together and bred together on the same soil, and we must work together for the national good, and go hand in hand for the good of the Empire that has a noble destiny yet to fulfil in the world's history. We should realize the larger field that is open to Canadians through their position in the British Empire. Look at the marvellous manner in which Scotchmen and Irishmen have penetrated every corner of the world, meeting with success everywhere. Though only a small population in themselves, do they not owe their success to the avenues of the British Empire which have been thrown open to them and which they have helped to create. Englishmen have also appreciated at their full value the co-operation of the talent and labor of the sister kingdoms. The same avenues are open to Canadians, and we have already reason to be proud of the success of many of our countrymen in the larger sphere of the Empire which our connection with it has thrown open to them.

The request for representation in the Imperial Parliament does not in any sense restrict our independence or create an irksome bond. It assures us of as great independence as any part of the British Empire enjoys, and a greater measure of independence than we at present enjoy, because it would give us a voice in directing our destinies, so far as they are controlled by the Imperial Parliament. This has been an age of federation. We have seen several examples during the present generation, the most notable of which has been the federation of the German Empire, which has created a power that is a guarantee of greater liberty to the German subject; and Switzerland also.

Australia is about to form a nation, and is likely to copy our formula as propounded in the work carefully prepared upon our constitution by one of our eminent writers, Dr. Bourinot. Canada has led the way in developing national unity within the Empire, and in doing so has been eminently successful, and has advanced so far on the path of national development that a vigorous national life desires to find some expansion as an outlet for its vigor—an aspiration that finds its existence for a more distinct automony. To meet that aspiration the sentiment has been pretty well expressed throughout Canada that a closer union of the colonies with the mother country is desirable. No practical idea has yet been put forth by any reponsible body having that object in view; but it is fair for us to ask ourselves: Has the time not arrived when we might seek to establish closer relations, somewhat on the basis I have laid down in the resolution now before this honorable House? In this resolution we ask that a measure of representation might be accorded to Canada in the deliberations of the Imperial Parliament, limited to the discussion of questions which affect Canadian interests alone. It would be improper for us to seek to take part in all the deliberations of the Imperal Parliament, because, until we are prepared to bear a full share of the financial burden of governing the Empire, we cannot seek the full measure of representation involved in the discussion of all questions; but we are at liberty to discuss whether the time has arrived and whether it would be to the interests of Canada to have the opportunity of expressing the public opinion of Canada in the Imperial Parliament upon questions affecting Canadian interests.

All may not agree upon the mode of appointing these representatives that this resolution provides, but that is not an essential point. I was quite aware that in bringing this question forward for discussion it was necessary to point out some simple mode of giving effect to the request implied by this resolution, but the number of the representatives or the mode of selecting them I have suggested more as a basis of argument. There is a difference between the Privy Council and the Cabinet: the Privy Council has a much wider range, though not the same influence, but I believe it would admit of a Canadian representative expressing himself in the Cabinet, where the policy of the country is framed, without infringing upon the prerogatives of the representatives of the Imperial Parliament.

This question of representation in the Imperial Parliament is not a new one, as it found pretty strong expression at the time when the American colonies were part and parcel of the British Empire; and had the counsels which were then given, been seriously considered, which would have given Washington an opportunity to express the wishes of his people on the floor of Parliament, that unnatural rebellion would, in all probability, never have blotted the pages of British history. We find that as long ago as 1768 Mr. Thos. Pownall, a member of Parliament, who had served as Lieutenant-Governor of New Jersey and Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Province of Massachusett's Bay and South Carolina, wrote a book, entitled "Administration of the Colonies," dedicating it to the Right Hon. George Grenville (of Stamp Act fame), in which he said: "It is therefore the duty of those who govern us to carry forward this state of things to the weaving of this lead into our system, that Great Britain may no more be considered as the kingdom of this isle only, with many appendages of provinces, colonies and settlements and other extraneous parts, but as the grand marine dominion, consisting of our possessions in the Atlantic and in America, united into one Empire, in one centre, where the seat of Government is." We have also that eminent writer on political economy, Adam Smith, in his "Wealth of Nations," dealing with the proposition at length. He points out (See page 281, 3rd Book 4, chap. 7):

"Towards the declension of the Roman Republic, the allies of Rome, who had borne the principal burden of defending the State and extending the Empire, demanded to be admitted to all the privileges of Roman citizens. Upon being refused, the social war broke out. During the course of that war Rome granted those privileges to the greater part of them, one by one, and in proportion as they detached themselves from the general confederacy. * * *

"The idea of representation was unknown in ancient times. When the people of one State were admitted to the right of citizenship in another, they had no other means of exercising that right but by coming in a body to vote and deliberate with the people of that other State. The admission of the greater part of the inhabitants of Italy to the privileges of Roman citizens completely ruined the Roman Republic. It was no longer possible to distinguish between who was and who was not a Roman citizen. No tribe could know its own members. A rabble of any kind could be introduced into the Assemblies of the people, could drive out the real citizens, and decide upon the affairs of the Republic as if they themselves had been such. But, though America were to send fifty or sixty new representatives to Parliament, the doorkeeper of the House of Commons could not find any great difficulty in distinguishing between who was and who was not a member. Though the Roman constitution, therefore, was necessarily ruined by the union of Rome with the allied States of Italy, there is not the least probability that the British constitution would be hurt by the union of Great Britain with her colonies. That constitution, on the contrary, would be completed by it, and seems to be imperfect without it. The Assembly which deliberates and decides concerning the affairs of every part of the Empire, in order to be properly informed, ought certainly to have representatives from every part of it. That this union, however, could be easily effectuated, or that difficulties, and great difficulties, might not occur in the execution, I do not pretend. I have yet heard of none, however, which appear insurmountable. The principal, perhaps, arises not from the nature of things, but from the prejudices and opinions of the people, both on this and on the other side of the Atlantic. * * *

"The discovery of America, and that of a passage to the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, are the two greatest and most important events recorded in the history of mankind. Their consequences have already been very great: but, in the short period of between two and three centuries which has elapsed since these discoveries were made, it is impossible that the whole extent of their consequences can have been seen. What benefits or what misfortunes to mankind may hereafter result from those great events no human wisdom can foresee. By uniting, in some measure, the most distant parts of the word, by enabling them to relieve one another's wants, to increase one another's industry, their general tendency would seem to be beneficial."

This, hon. gentlemen, was written at a time when the discovery of an eastern passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope was described as the marvel of the age. I wonder what the great political economist would have thought of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which proves to be the North-West Passage to India, that was so eagerly sought for in those early days by explorers. Edmund Burke, that friend of the colonies, who was appointed by the State of New York to be its representative in the Imperial Parliament, also gave expression to the same views, and the fact of his having been appointed by the State of New York to represent its people in Parliament shows the desire that existed on their part to have the opportunity of expressing their views where their interests were concerned. Burke's principal objection to the question of representation by the colonies was the time that was necessary to cover the distance in going to and fro; but so far as distance is concerned, which is sometimes, even at the present day, raised as an objection to the principle I am advocating, scientific appliances have altered that to such a degree that both the expense and the time of passing between Ottawa and London is very little, if any, greater than the time occupied in passing between British Columbia and Ottawa, or San Francisco and Washington, which is considered no bar to the unity of these countries. Electricity and steam now permit of interchange of thought quite as rapidly as is necessary, and while by these means the world is rapidly becoming smaller by the very same means, it is also becoming larger. Although this may be considered a paradox, it is nevertheless true, because the criminal or the recluse cannot now hide himself from the gaze of man or the track of the detective, while on the other hand the area of the world's surface that has been lying hidden from the grasp of man through so many centuries is now being rapidly brought under his civilizing influences, and by cultivation contributing to the ever-increasing demand of the population of the world, and in that respect the world is growing larger. That these can be used for the advantage of the increasing population of the world is an additional reason why representatives to the highest legislative body in the world should be able to take their seat and give information of the resources that await the industry of the laborer of Canada. In later times the idea of representation for the colonies was given prominence to by two celebrated men—Mr. Hume, a member of Parliament, and Judge Haliburton. In 1831, when the Reform Bill was under discussion, Mr. Hume proposed, on the motion to go into committee on the Bill, the following resolution: "That it be an instruction to the committee to make provision for the return to this House of members to represent certain colonies and foreign possessions of His Majesty." Mr. Hume's idea was that the colonies should have nineteen members, the Crown colonies to have four, British America three, West Indies eight, and the Channel Islands one. The representatives were to be elected for seven years and their seats were not to be affected by dissolution. The desirability of colonial representatives being admitted to the Commons was conceded by men of all shade of opinions in the House, but the motion was, on the advice of the Ministry, negatived, without a division, on account of the difficulties likely to be raised, and the difficulties in the way of the passage of the Bill itself, were then quite enough without adding more. Judge Haliburton, of Nova Scotia, one of the most celebrated of North Americans, has this to say on the subject in his novel "Sam Slick:"—

"It should not be England and her colonies, but they should be integral parts of one great whole—all counties of Great Britain. There should be no taxes on colonial produce, and the colonies should not be allowed to tax manufacturers' goods; all should pass free, as from one town in England to another, the whole of it one vast home market, from Hong Kong to Labrador. They should be represented in Parliament, help to pass English laws, and show them what laws they wanted themselves. All distinctions should be blotted out forever; it should be no more a bar to man's promotion, as it is now, that he lived beyond the sea than living on the other side of the channel; it should be our navy, our army, our nation; blot out the word colonies altogether; incorporate them all with England, body and breeches, our people, our country, our Parliament."

These representations from eminent men during the last century serve to show that the principle now under discussion in this honorable House is not a novel or a startling one.

Then, again, we have the examples of other countries—France and Spain both have representatives from their colonies. France, I think, gives Algeria six representatives and to the other colonies ten. Spain gives Cuba a representative for every 40,000 of the population that pay $25 a year taxes. Then we had another mode of representation in the United States. They give to their Territories representation in Congress, with the right to sit and discuss measures, but without the right to vote, and when those Territories are erected into States they have the same privileges that other States represented in Congress possess. Then, again, take our own country, Canada. We have our North-West Territories, and although they have not been erected into Provinces, yet the Canadian Parliament has given representatives to that distant Territory, such is the liberality of the Canadian people that they have drawn from that distant Territory a certain number of representatives who are capable of giving such advice, on the floor of Parliament, as will enable Parliament to govern the country well, and in that way they have shown, I consider, the most advanced and liberal ideas in regard to the representation of the people. Then, again, another view is worthy of bringing forward, and that is, supposing this resolution should take practical shape and that it came before the Imperial Government, and they were to conceive the principle of giving certain representation to Canada in the way I have suggested, or in some other way, it would enable Canadians to take their place in the heart of that great Empire, and if they were able to display ability and make a mark for themselves, the chances are that constituencies in the mother country might be open to them, as we have seen has been the case with other colonies. Perhaps a few Canadians might in this way find their way into the Imperial Parliament and add their voices to the representation which might be accorded under some measure such as we are discussing.

All the ideas that have of late been put forth by British statesmen and by the public press have generally laid down this principle, that any change should be suggested by the Colonies themselves, that it would by unwise for British statesmen to formulate any plan without knowing what the principles are that guide the colonies in relation to the matter.

Her most Gracious Majesty commemorated the Jubilee year, 1886, by inserting the following in her Speech from the Throne: "I have observed with much satisfaction the interest which, in an increasing degree, is evinced by the people of this country in the welfare of their colonial and Indian fellow-subjects, and am led to the conviction that there is on all sides a growing desire to draw closer the bonds which unite the various portions of the Empire."

The Marquis of Salisbury lately said, in response to a public deputation: "Let the Colonies make a move, and signify that they desire a closer union, and how they propose to effect it, and it will receive careful and sympathetic consideration." There is no attempt to influence the colonies. He recognizes our perfect independence, but in view of these utterances this resolution cannot be charged with being inopportune or uncalled for. If adopted, Canada will not be dictating to England or clamoring for the impossible. She will be merely responding to a friendly though unofficial invitation.

Canada has led the way in developing national unity by the federation of the Provinces, and has now attained her maturity by twenty-one years of experience, and her example is being followed by the great colony of Australia and the Cape of Good Hope. She may now, with propriety, lead the way in establishing herself more firmly as a component part of the British Empire. The United Kingdom was gradually formed; our Dominion was gradually formed, and the same deliberation can be used in making a fresh departure for Imperial guidance. The United Kingdom was formed by degrees; it did not wait till everyone was ready; first, Scotch representatives were admitted to the English Parliament; after that, and some time after, too, Irish ones were admitted. Now, Canada, under this resolution, desires and hopes to be granted representation in the same way; and as the developing process goes on no doubt Australia, South Africa and the other colonies will follow suit. Although the Provinces of the Dominion were first confederated in 1867, the National Policy was not developed until 1878, eleven years after, and though the Imperial Parliament should grant a measure of representation to Canada in the counsels of the Empire, an Imperial policy might not be developed for twenty years after. The one is not dependent on the other.

The Imperial Parliament is a Government by precedent and possesses an unwritten constitution of sufficient elasticity to take the widest range, and I think all will admit that it is desirable that the Imperial Parliament should maintain the supreme position in the British Empire it has always held, and that it should not allow any body to be created that will usurp any portion of that supreme authority. The principle of British legislation has been in the past that any change should be gradual in its growth, and for that reason the admission of a small number of representatives into the Imperial Parliament would open the way for that change, without disturbing in any sense the present relationship of the Imperial Parliament to the British isles. In dealing with this question we are only called upon to view it in its effect upon Canadian interest. Should it come under discussion by the Imperial Parliament they would, of course, have to consider it in its bearing to the other colonies of the Empire and the effect that it would be likely to exercise upon British interests.

The benefits that we might expect to derive from the concessions of the representation that we ask, are: First, That we would have the opportunity of lending to the counsels of British statesmen the practical knowledge of questions affecting Canadian interests; secondly, It would have the effect of bringing Canada more prominently under the notice, not only of the people of the British isles, but European countries generally.

A speech from a Canadian representative would have more value attached to it than the representation we seek now to put forth through the pamphlets that we issue, because any remarks that would fall from the lips of a Canadian of Imperial interest would receive the attention of the whole of the British press, and through it the European press. Any expense that might be attendant upon giving this representation would be counterbalanced by the saving of the expense of a portion of the staff we find it necessary to maintain in connection with our interests, and no doubt a saving would also be effected by these representatives in conducting a portion of business of the various Provinces of the Dominion, instead of sending special professional men, as is necessary from time to time, to attend to them.

It would also be an opening for the talent of Canadians, which is not an unworthy ambition for us to possess, and the advantages to the Imperial Parliament of having practical men from the colonies expressing their view upon the floor of Parliament should not be overlooked. We have every reason to believe, were we to make the request somewhat in the form of this resolution, that it would receive favorable consideration at the hands of British statesmen. There is another view, which is not unworthy of consideration. Although it may be considered utopian, it is yet worthy of expression, and that is, that it should be the aim of statesmen in the present day to endeavor to raise the plane of civilisation to a higher standard, so as to bring the great mass of mankind nearer to the realisation of a future life that is worth living for. This can be promoted by enlarging the sphere of deliberative power, especially when that deliberative power is drawn from a source that has its basis founded upon education and christianity. The resolution that I have brought forward for discussion, hon. gentlemen, will not have any political effect, because it provides for its reference to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, to deal with as he may think proper in the interest of the country, and in that capacity he is responsible to the people. But although for that reason it would have no political effect, it would yet have a very strong political influence in guiding public opinion both in Canada and Great Britain, upon this important question, and in dealing with it we should realise Macaulay's sentiments in his "Lays of Ancient Rome:"

> "Then none were for the party,
> "Then all were for the State
> "Then the great man helped the poor
> "And the poor man loved the great.
> "Then lands were fairly portioned,
> "Then spoils were fairly sold,
> "The Romans were like brothers
> "In the brave days of old."

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—Whether it is desirable that the opinion of this House should be called for upon a motion of an individual member on a question of such vital importance as the one which the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has brought before us this afternoon is, in my mind, very questionable. It seems to me that the question which the hon. gentleman has been discussing is one which, if taken up by this House, should be taken up at the instance of the Government itself, and that the Government should have sufficient support in this House for its views to be able to carry such a question by an overpowering majority. I think myself that the hon. gentleman, with the best intentions, no doubt, has perhaps been led into some errors with regard to the advantages to be gained by the relegation of colonial interests to members holding seats in the House of Commons. I will first, with the leave of the House, address myself to that view of the question. It so happens that recent news, so recent that it has only occupied the time necessary for a mail steamer to pass from London to this side of the Atlantic, gives an illustration of what consequences may be expected in depending upon the members holding seats in the Imperial Parliament for the safeguard, and for the discussion and for the promotion of strictly colonial affairs. That part of Her Majesty's dominions called Scotland, scarcely a fortnight ago, came prominently before the House of Commons upon purely a matter of domestic interest. Dr. Clarke, a prominent Scotch member, proposed that all matters strictly relating to the domestic affairs of Scotland should be relegated to a Scotch Parliament, and that in other matters Scotch affairs would be discussed and managed by the Westminster Parliament in the way they are at present. That gentleman met with so little support, even from Scotchmen, that his resolution was defeated by, I think, a majority of 160; and to call the attention of the House to a few of the arguments which were brought forward on this question will, I think, apply to the inexpediency of putting colonial affairs before a Parliament, already overworked by its domestic affairs, and not particularly well posted on the affairs of the colonies. Everyone who has been in the habit of reading the debates in the English Parliament knows perfectly well that the House thins down immediately on the mention even of an East Indian or a colonial question. The great body of members feel that it does not closely concern them, and they have a very obscure idea of what the politics of India or the politics of the colonies are, and the House is almost immediately empty upon the occurrence of a debate such as that. The arguments brought forward were these: that the House itself could provide as competent a tribunal to to discuss Scotch affairs, through the medium of one of its grand committees, as could be obtained by a Scotch Parliament. Those were the arguments brought forward by the gentlemen who opposed Dr. Clarke's motion. They, it seems to me, took very good care to guard themselves by the assertion that the Scotch business had been neglected of late years in the House, and was very much in arrears. But for all that they held, and held, I suppose, rightly, that a grand committee on Scotch affairs would afford just as good an opportunity for the discussion and management of Scotch business as would a Parliament in Scotland. I have brought those matters forward in this way for the purpose of showing that the arena to which the hon. gentleman desires to commit colonial affairs is not a suitable arena, and that our affairs would not probably be more clearly discussed there, and that they would probably labor under the same difficulty that Scotch business has recently labored under, namely, that time and leisure would not be found for a full discussion on these colonial questions I have here an extract from the Manchester Guardian of 20th February on Dr. Clarke's proposal to devolve upon a legislature in Scotland the consideration of the domestic affairs of that country:

> "We think it will be admitted by any candid reader that the existence of a Scotch grievance is made out. Mr. Marjoribanks, for example, contended with good reason that there was nothing which Dr. Clarke suggested 'which could not quite as well be realized by a grand committee of Scotch members in the House.' But Mr. Marjoribanks was careful to add that, 'He quite agreed that the neglect of Scotch business was deplorable.'"

The Manchester Courier speaks in very similar terms. It says:

> "The hon. gentleman, Dr. Clarke, complains that the present mode of legislating for the domestic affairs of Scotland is unsatisfactory. In consequence of the pressure of business from other parts of the kingdom Scotch Bills are put off indefinitely from time to time."

As this is quite a clear case as regards Scotland, is there any reason to believe that colonial affairs would be more liberally treated by the English House of Commons than the affairs of Scotland? I think not. And for that reason I think the arena the hon. gentleman suggests for the discussion of colonial questions is not the most suitable that could be adopted. I quite admit the importance of this subject. In my opinion, it has been ripening in various parts of the world very materially in the last few months. I notice a desire for Imperial Federation displaying itself in various parts of the Australian colonies and in South Africa as well as in Canada, we may say. Several well-known speakers have addressed large audiences both in Canada and other colonies, and generally with great acceptance. Therefore, it is pretty clear to my mind that the question is arising in Canada as well as in other colonies, and I add this, that it is essential, in my mind, if such a confederation is to take place, and to succeed, that it should be commenced and carried into effect in a time of peace, without hurry, without panic, and with all the deliberation the ablest statesmen are able to give to it, and if commenced and carried into effect in that way there is every prospect of its endurance. I would myself greatly prefer the idea of a colonial council, as indicated, I think, at a meeting over which I believe the Marquis of Lorne presided, in the Colonial Institute in 1886. It would not surprise me to hear that not a few of the gentlemen in the House at this moment were present on that occasion and heard the oration delivered by Sir George Bowen to a most attentive audience, and to what man with greater experience could they have listened than that gentleman possessed? He had thirty years' experience as colonial Governor, beginning at Corfu and ending at Malta. He had been first Governor of North Australia—Queensland, as it is now called. He had governed New Zealand during the period of the Maori war; he found the natives in arms against the British Government, and left the colony at peace; from there he went to Victoria. The second difficulty which he overcame in the colony of Victoria was a political difficulty between themselves, defining their powers. That was not the whole of that gentleman's experience: he governed Hong Kong at a most critical period of its history, when the French were waging war with the Chinese, and the greatest difficulty existed to maintain British interests there. Again, that same gentleman, to whose opinions I refer with such confidence, was Governor of Mauritius—a colony containing a population with a large element of French in it, and there also he made himself most exceedingly popular. This is the man who was put forward to address the Colonial Institute at the great Exhibition in 1886. That gentleman, Sir George Bowen, alluded to some of the circumstances which the hon. gentleman has mentioned in his speech. I think he alluded to the fact that Adam Smith had been one of the originators of the idea that a colonial council was the fittest means of governing the colonies; and had the thirteen American colonies, before the War of Independence, been represented in the Imperial Parliament in the manner Adam Smith suggested, there probably would have been no secession, no rebellion, no English blood shed, none of that intense bitterness of feeling which has always prevailed between Americans and British for more than half a century, and which her efforts to-day are not quite sufficient to fully obliterate. Nations do not forget bombarded towns, and farms and villages stained with blood. They are things odious in themselves, the memory of which is handed down from father to son, and it takes generations to obliterate it. Heaven forbid that such things should happen in our day, not if we can by any possibility avoid it. I say, then, that on that occasion, before the Colonial Institute, the meeting was addressed by a gentleman perhaps more competent than any other living person to speak with confidence on colonial affairs. He had been thirty years a colonial Governor, a man of high culture, and his success shows that he possessed the genius for governing men, and that was his idea with regard to colonial government. I should like, for a few moments, leaving the region of facts to which I have alluded, in what I have just stated to the House, to trespass a little while giving hon. gentlemen some intimation of what the probable result would have been in the various difficulties which Canada has had in the past, not now particularly, but at different periods for the last fifty years had we possessed, during that time, a Colonial Council in England? Would we be any better off or any worse off? or in more amicable relations with the United States to-day? I think so, and for this reason: we would have been stronger, and our rights would have been enforced by the power at our back of a whole undivided nation. I think the feeling which would have prevailed in the American mind would have been something of this nature—that it would be useless for them to put forward demands or pretensions which were incompatible with facts and incompatible with justice. I should say that this would be the operation of the Colonial Council in any dispute which existed in past times, or exists now, or might exist in the future—that Canada, if called upon by the American Government to make good mischief done to her cruisers on the fishing grounds, or called upon to make amends to our fishermen, or anything of that kind, would naturally state her case with the greatest clearness and precision for the information of the Colonial Council, and there it would be enforced by her representatives, and there would be in any such statement not one word except what was literally and exactly true; and in that way the Colonial Council, assembled members from all the British colonies—from Australasia, from the Cape of Good Hope, from the West Indies, from Britain's great crown of colonies, would naturally discuss the question with fair, unbiassed minds, and the result would be that they would come to a just conclusion, which would be tenable as against the United States and which would receive the approval of the civilized world. It would be felt that there was a body which was capable of discussing and offering an opinion upon questions strictly colonial, by men whose ideas would not interfere with their judgment. They would have abundant leisure, and the great Colonial Empire would naturally look to them for their decision upon any such point as that. It might be a decision which would involve peace or war; but we would be certain of this, that colonial interests would not be ignored or set aside in favor of any other consideration, and would be the only way to prevent the recurrence of such aggressions as we have seen in our time by the neighboring Republic as against Canada. It would be a warning against similar attempts hereafter. That is the way, I think, a Colonial Council would act in disputes between any of the colonies and foreign States—a most important consummation. But before I resume my seat I should like to say a few words as to the great importance of the colonial question to us. I have been watching these things for many years past, and without addressing any audience upon them, because I thought that the plans which had been projected were not feasible—that they were not practicable. They might do until they came to be closely examined by men of experience, but whenever that happened they were sure to be condemned for their want of efficiency. I use the words of Lord John Russell, the author of the first Reform Bill, before he was called to the peerage, and he used this expression, as regards the English colonies: that it would be deplorable before God and man should any breach be made in the colonial dominion of Great Britain. Since that time the colonial dominion of Great Britain has been marvellously enhanced. Not to digress into discussions as to the when and the where, and the population and wealth of those colonies, I speak of a thing that cannot be contradicted, and say with Lord John Russell that it would be a most deplorable event should the colonial diadem of Queen Victoria be damaged in any way. I think it was necessary that a movement of this kind should come from the colonies rather than from the Imperial Government, but it is quite clear from recent events that in Australasia, in South Africa, and in various other places, there is a strong feeling at present towards adopting some measure of Imperial Federation.

Why should this feeling be so predominant nowadays particularly? I think if we make that enquiry we have not very far to look for a reply, and we have also the fact of the great change that has taken place in battle ships and cruisers. It is from a conviction on those facts that the colonies have become fully conscious of their danger. They might be attacked by vessels of great speed, of not very formidable armament or crews, and yet sufficiently formidable to devastate their seaboards, and perhaps have levied enormous contributions upon their unarmed and unprotected ports. To obviate that is one of the first and most important duties which should be attended to by an Imperial Council and the colonists of our day being conscious of their danger in that way, not from any one particular nation, but from any hostile cruiser — any such cruiser as did so much damage in the recent American civil war—and there are much more formidable vessels than either of those for whose depredations the British Government paid damages to the United States—might do infinitely greater damage on our seaboards. I have trespassed on the patience of the House too long; and, perhaps, after all, have failed to elicit the facts which were not already well known; but I could not avoid asking the House to hear me upon this point, because I felt that to simply adopt the hon. member's motion would be to compromise with the House in the future, and to identify it with an unworkable scheme, one which I have demonstrated pretty clearly by the analogy of Scotland and the position of Scotch members would be absolutely impracticable in the House of Commons as at present constituted.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island in the first part of his remarks, in which he said that it was not in the province of any member of this House to bring forward a question of this kind—that it was more a matter for the Government. The hon. members of the House know that on all public questions Governments are moved by the people—that questions are forced on them by public sentiment, which they had not perhaps thought of before. Therefore, a motion like this which is now before us can do no harm, though it may be premature. As an advocate of Imperial Federation, I think there is no harm in discussing the matter briefly, and the line I would take in the matter would be showing the enormous benefits to be derived from intercolonial commerce between all British colonies and the mother country. There is a very remarkable fact connected with Imperial Federation; the strong advocates of it in England and in this country are always afraid to touch it too closely or to formulate anything like a system or plan for its accomplishment. It is always in a state of chronic unripeness. I have had the pleasure of hearing the question discussed in England by Lord Roseberry, Sir Charles Tupper, and a number of other eminent men, and they circled round it and would not touch it closely. They all declared that we should have Imperial Federation, but they would not formulate any idea that would give the different Governments of the colonies something to work upon or to think about. No doubt it is a very difficult question; there is so much to be done, first of all, in local federation of the different colonies, that it is perhaps premature to discuss the question that is before us. There is no doubt that, first of all, the colonies must feel by intercolonial trade that they are necessary to each other, and that all barriers to such trade in the shape of tariffs must be broken down, and by having free intercourse between the different portions of the Empire they would find that they are necessary to each other, and this question would grow as it could not develop in any other way. The vast volume of trade with the West Indies, Australia, and other countries, is so great that by having free access to each other's markets and a common tariff, or a very low tariff between them, they would become more closely united. I can conceive of no grander idea than a commercial union of all the British colonies with the mother country, as against the whole world, allowing other nations to come under the same rule if they wish to do so—all who desired to join under the same system and tariff would be welcome to do so; but otherwise a zollverein, or commercial union, between the mother country and all her colonies would be the greatest scheme that could possibly be conceived. I have got a few figures to show what has to be done, first of all, in the way of local federation, before representation could be had in the Imperial Parliament. The Dominion has, first of all, to round off its proportions by assimilating Newfoundland with its 200,000 inhabitants, with its revenue of $2,000,000, and its exports of about $6,000,000. There are nine colonies in the West Indies which have all separate governments. In the colony of the Windward Islands an extraordinary condition of affairs prevails. The colony consists of three islands, each of which has its own tariff, though they are under the one Governor. That shows that there is a great deal yet left to be done in the way of assimilation. Then they have in Africa five colonies—Natal, Cape, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Zululand—enormous territories sparsely settled, which will some day form a confederation of their own. Two or three of the colonies are under the Government of Natal. With regard to Australia, the work of confederation has commenced there, and I dare say it will go on and make progress. There are a number of small colonies like Mauritius, Ascension, and North Borneo that we need not deal with, but the Australian colonies are taking up this question of confederation with Tasmania and New Zealand. Before a colony like Canada should demand representation in the Imperial Parliament we must remember that there is India, with its dense population, its immense revenue and its enormous export trade, which must first of all be represented before any of the colonies can claim representation. There is a Secretary for India and an Under Secretary. We have the Secretary for the Colonies and an Under Secretary, as well, for all the colonies. The population of India is so much larger than that of the whole of the colonies that our share of representation in the British Government is small. India has an area of 1,278,844 square miles, a population of 254,000,000, a revenue of $262,565,000, and an export trade of $435,000,000. Of course, the population of that country is not largely Anglo-Saxon; if it were it would, no doubt, have had representation long before now in the Imperial Parliament. The trade of Great Britain as compared with that of all the colonies is remarkable. The population of all the colonies, including India, is about 268,000,000, the revenue $497,000,000, and the export trade $1,005,000,000; whereas, the United Kingdom, with the small area of 121,000 square miles and a population of 38,000,000, has a revenue of $450,000,000, and an export trade of $3,343,000,000. The following is a table which shows the comparison at a glance:

THE BRITISH EMPIRE—AREA, POPULATION, REVENUE AND EXPORTS.

—	Area.	Population.	Revenue.	Exports.

The exports of England alone are three times as much as the exports of all the colonies and India. Twenty years ago the colonies stood in very low estimation in England, but the last few years there has been a remarkable change. Many eminent statesmen of that day almost told the colonies to go, and the leading papers of the United Kingdom thought that we were too expensive to be held, and suggested that we should take our own course and separate from the Empire. That condition of things is changed. There is a great effort now made by Europeon powers to increase their colonial possessions, and England is devoting much more attention to her colonies than she did some years ago. The development of the colonies and their influence on the future of the Empire is opening the eyes of English statesmen to their importance. With regard to the resolution itself, I suppose the hon. gentleman will not press it at this stage of the question. He has done no harm in bringing it forward. To stand still is impossible, and we cannot permit the idea of disintegration or decay to enter into our thoughts. The work of strengthening the colonial Empire is in accordance with the spirit of the age, and is sure to gather force as thought is given to it and as time rolls on.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I also express the hope that the hon. gentleman from Shell River does not propose seriously to take a vote on this resolution, because I think it is exceedingly premature even to discuss it. I do not think that 5 per cent. of the people of this country have expressed an opinion on it or heard it discussed. It is a question that has arisen since the last election. It is altogether within the last three years that the proposal has been discussed in Canada or in England.

HON. MR. DICKEY—It originated six years ago.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Leading statesmen have taken up the subject in England, and have circulated a great deal of literature on the subject, and they annually deliver speeches at the various gatherings that are called to commemorate the inauguration of this movement, yet I fail to see that any of those gentlemen laid down principles for the guidance of those who profess to be in favor of Imperial Federation. It is an ethereal thing, it is a very pleasant subject to discuss the great extent of the Empire, the drawing together of between three and four hundred millions of people. This question of international trade has cropped up, but not seriously, because it would be quite impossible under the present condition of things. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island showed that at present there are in the Imperial Parliament 670 members, and that it is impossible to deal with some of the most pressing questions of the day. As an illustration, he brought forward the statement of Dr. Clarke, the other day, that a health measure affecting Scotland alone has been before the Imperial Parliament for ten years, and they cannot get it on a stage. Another Bill, giving municipalities in Scotland control over the liquor question, has been four years before Parliament and cannot be moved on a stage. Hon. gentlemen know that for the last ten years the Irish question has been the principal subject before the Imperial Parliament. It is not practical questions which are discussed, but questions affecting the various component parts of the Empire, more particularly Ireland. My impression is that the first change there will be Home Rule for England, Scotland and Ireland. That is becoming apparently an absolute necessity, because if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look at the volume of Statutes issued from the Parliament of the United Kingdom they are not as large as our own. The Imperial Parliament has not time to pass Bills. During the six or seven months that the Session lasts they are discussing constitutional questions. Let me ask hon. gentlemen what question has in the last five years—I might go back ten years—come up in the Imperial Parliament on which a Canadian delegate or a delegate from any of the colonies would have been entitled to open his lips? I do not know of any question, except it may be something connected with the shipping interest. There is no other subject that I know of in which Canada was specially interested, so entirely have our affairs been separated from those of England since we got our Constitutional Act in 1867. But the hon. gentleman from Victoria intimated that it necessarily led up to an intercolonial trade between the colonies and the mother country. That again would be impossible. Great Britain is not going to give us any preference over other countries. She is not going to modify the corn laws in the slightest degree, or make her operatives pay more for their food supply for the sentimental benefit of outlying parts of the Empire. Then, again, Great Britain is tied up by some thirty or forty treaties that exclude Canada from giving her a preference in the Canadian market. Canada could not to-day give England a preference in her own markets. We could give a preference to the United States, but we could not to England. It seems rather paradoxical to say so, but that is the absolute fact. Hon. gentlemen know that from time to time during the last half century treaties have been made containing what are called the Most Favored Nation clauses. I have here a return from the British House of Commons down to 1888 in which there is a résumé of the various treaties with different countries. England would have to abrogate all those treaties, if what is called a commercial union, or freedom of tariffs, was to be established between Great Britain and her colonies. That would be a very serious difficulty to get over, and I question whether the mother country would be willing to adopt a course of that kind. Great Britain has felt that her system of free trade has wonderfully enriched her. She is rapidly accumulating the wealth of the world, and is now the great centre for capital, all owing to her free trade principles. She is not likely to sacrifice that for an ethereal scheme, that nobody has been able to reduce to practice. I did not think it was quite proper that this question should go by default, because I find that it is asserted by some influential men that great progress has been made in conversions to Imperial Federation. At a recent meeting in London it was claimed that, so far as Canada was concerned, there were two Ministers, twelve Senators and fifty members of the House of Commons in favor of it.

HON. MR. DICKEY—In favor of what?

HON. MR. SCOTT—That is what I want to know. I have never yet been able to learn what it was they were in favor of. It involves, no doubt, representation in the Imperial Parliament, but until very marked changes take place there it would be utterly impossible that any representatives from Canada could be listened to. We now do get a hearing, through the Governor General and our representative, the High Commissioner at London. Our connection with foreign countries is through treaties: it is entirely in that way that Canada comes to the front in a variety of cases, through the intermediary of Great Britain, the mother country having the control of the treaty-making power over all the colonies. It is only through that channel that Canada is at all heard. We have for a long time been claiming the right to make our own treaties. That has not been conceded yet, and may not be for some time. One of the motives that has been suggested in England, and I have no doubt has stimulated the growth of the feeling in this country, has been the fear that Canada, by this agitation for closer trade relations with the United States, was becoming in danger of being engulfed in the American Union. That has been the motive that has prompted so many well-meaning English statesmen to take up this question, to save the colony from any such crisis. I do not think that this country is in any danger from such a cause. I am not one of those who apprehend that closer trade relations mean closer political relations. If they meant that, then I for one am prepared to disavow the movement. It is contended by those who oppose commercial union that while it is right and proper that we should trade with the United States in wheat, barley and coal, the moment you come to a stove, or a hoe, or a harrow, or a reaping machine, then it is an interference with our loyalty to the mother country. I look upon all that as very rubbishy. I see no distinction in articles of commerce. The moment you trade with a country in one article you may as well trade freely in all articles. We have already a large free list. Let hon. gentlemen take a common sense view of this question. We are told that it is all right to buy strawberries and peaches from the United States, but we must not buy the baskets that they are packed in—that would be an evidence of disloyalty, evidence that we are sliding into a political alliance with the United States.

HON. MR. MILLER—Who says that?

HON. MR. SCOTT—That is the argument—that it would never do to extend free trade to any article made by hand. So long as the exchange is in natural products it is all rights, but the moment we begin to exchange manufactured articles it disturbs the political autonomy of this country. Recently there has been a marvellous conversion on that point that I must not fail to recognize. It will not disturb the political autonomy of this country, it seems, if we buy our mining machinery in the United States, but why it will disturb our political autonomy to buy our milling machinery there is one of those things that nobody can understand. Our alliance with England would not by any means be strengthened by any such proposition. I think it is the ambition of Canada to remain long united with the mother country. Our position is altogether different from that of any colony on the globe. We are here the northern half of one continent, with the Atlantic Ocean on one side and the Pacific on the other. We have but one neighbor. The probability is that, in the future, the friendship with that neighbor will be strengthened. We find a British statesman recently speaking of the United States as the children of England, and we know that they are intermarrying pretty rapidly between the United States and England and that the alliances there are becoming so close that it would be utterly impossible to conceive of any friction between the two countries that would lead to a deadly feud. There is too much good sense on both sides. Is Canada a casus belli? What is the Minister at Washington day by day and year by year employed at—settling matters between the United States and England? No; settling matters between Canada and the United States. Canada is the only trouble, the only cause of disturbance; and I say when we do remove the friction that has for years and years been existing between these two countries we will perform the greatest act of kindness to the mother country that any man can conceive of. If all these difficulties are removed the office of the Queen's representative at Washington will become a sinecure.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté)—How will we remove them? Give up everything?

HON. MR. SCOTT—No; that is not asked and would not be conceded. The United States is grasping, and is exasperating Canada, but are not we exasperating the United States? Was it not exasperating when a number of Scotchmen came from the United States to engage in a friendly game of curling with some Scotchmen in Canada to have their curling stones seized at the Custom house? Similar things occur every day of our lives. No hon. gentleman can deny that we, on our part, are seeking to develop and create all this friction. The four hundred odd articles on our tariff are so many announcements that we are not prepared to talk reasonably with our kindred on the other side of the line. It is the fisheries on the east and the fisheries on the west, the wrecking laws and coasting laws, the American channel and the Canadian channel, and fifty other things that art cropping up the whole time. Until all those are removed, so long will the British Minister at Washington be kept in hot water trying to make things smooth. With two such peoples as we are, living side by side, you cannot keep things smooth without removing the causes of friction. It is better to give away something than to be always fighting with our neighbors, and we will strengthen the arms of England much better by doing so. When we fortify Canada on the east and the west and have a powerful ally on the south, as I trust the future will prove the United States to be, and we can thus help to strengthen the arm of England, her enemies on the east and on the west can be successfully fought and the country readily defended. She has her highway now from the Atlantic to the Pacific to transport her troops to the Asiatic continent. Under a contract made between our overland railway and the Imperial authorities they have the right at any time to use the Canadian Pacific Railway for transporting munitions of war and troops. In the way I have indicated we can best show our loyalty to the Empire and our desire to strengthen and fortify the mother country.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The manner in which the hon. gentleman from Ottawa presses his peculiar views on the House generally induces me to oppose him. The tendency of the hon. gentleman's argument would be to loosen the tie that binds us to England and to attach us to a foreign country, in whose history and traditions we have no part. My hon. friend has in every way advocated discrimination against England, and would have us become the bond slaves of the United States. That is his argument throughout; he has been consistent in that. Every time he deals with the great interests of the Dominion he brings up the country to the south of us and represents it in attractive terms; and he and his friends advise our people to go to Dakota. In that way they send over large number of Canadians.

HON. MR. POWER.—I must call the hon. gentleman to order. He is making a statement which is not founded in fact. I must ask him to give us his authority for making such a statement.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—We know very well that those gentlemen who are associated with my hon. friend have done very much to decry Canada and represent Dakota as a land of promise, and in this way they have induced Canadians to go there. Now those people ask us to come to their assistance and help them to return to their own country. This state of affairs has been largely brought about by the manner in which some of the leading opponents of the Government have decried Canada. My hon. friend advocates better relations with the United States, but we know that our neighbors have raised these hostile barriers. We have gone far to degrade ourselves in seeking concessions from the United States in the way of obtaining reciprocity. We have humiliated ourselves, and instead of our neighbors being willing to concede anything, they have turned out of power the party that proposed to insert in their platform anything looking to closer trade relations between that country and the Dominion.

My hon. friend says it is impossible for us to be heard in the Parliament of England, because they are so much engaged in domestic matters. The hon. gentleman has given an answer to that himself when he says they are to have Home Rule for Ireland, England and Scotland. When that is done, nine-tenths of the subjects which at present engage the attention of the Imperial Parliament will be relegated to those Local Legislatures. If such a change is to take place, now is a most important time for the discussion of this question. When the hon. gentleman says that this subject is not taken up by English statesmen he forgets the utterances of Lord Roseberry, Lord Dunraven and other British statesmen, who have taken a lively interest in this question. I say it is a subject which is now engaging the mind of almost every public man in every part of the British Empire. The difficulty is, how can it be practically solved; and it is only by discussion in Parliament and out of Parliament that the public mind can be ascertained. Probably this body may not be a proper place to initiate the question, because we cannot come to any practical conclusion. The hon. gentleman introduces, as an impediment, the Favored Nations clauses of the treaties. That is a stumbling block which can be removed in time; but when he says that England would never feel inclined to give any preference to her colonies over other countries I do not know that he can speak with such authority as to convince us that such is the case. I believe that England, as well as her colonies, can find some way to overcome that difficulty, as they have overcome more difficult questions, by which the colonies may be united more closely to the mother country, not only politically, but in questions of trade and commerce. I am with my hon. friend who brought this question before us in many respects, and upon the broad question I am closely with him. I am in favor of anything that will bring us in a practical way closer together as colonies, and closer together as an Empire, but I cannot go with my hon. friend in his present motion. The people of the Maritime Provinces as loyal subjects of the Crown felt that they should unite themselves more closely together and assist in forming this Confederation. We did it believing that we were strengthening ourselves—our colony (Nova Scotia) was strengthening itself by becoming part of a grand confederation—and one of the great objects was this: We felt that as a separated Province we had no voice at home; that we had no proper representation there; that we could not present our views with any force. One Province would be sending its views at one time and another at another time, and we have often been told from England: "Agree amongst yourselves first as to what you want, and then it will come with some force from you." That was the feeling we had down there. One of the designs of Confederation was that when questions should arise affecting the Provinces, the Provinces composing the Dominion would be able to speak with one voice to the Imperial Government. Futile were our remonstrances, from one Province to-day and another to-morrow; from others hardly at all—with no concerted agreement or action. I say it is one of the strongest influences we have to-day in matters which affect us as an important part of the Empire that we speak with one voice. By adopting a scheme of provincial representation we would be sending from Nova Scotia a Separatist to England, for a Separatist party is in power in that Province. Probably Mr. Mercier would send from Quebec a Nationalist, and we would no doubt find each of the other Provinces sending diverse views, suggested by the politics of the party in power. The best interests of Canada in this way might be frustrated. If my hon. friend's resolution should pass, what would be the result? In that way we should have a representation in the British Parliament that would speak as one tongue for the benefit of Canada.

HON. MR. POWER—We must admit the dual language there.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—When I speak of one tongue, I mean the same sentiments expressing the opinion of Canada, as a body, to back them. I am glad my hon. friend has brought this motion before the House, even in the way he has; but I certainly would not be in favor of representation in the Imperial Parliament by Provinces. No doubt Confederation is now becoming a live issue. Every colony has been impressed with it—not only confederation of the colonies as between themselves, but a closer union with Great Britain. It has taken wide hold upon the people. I am in favor of closer relations—commercial and political—if possible, between the colonies and the mother country, and it is well to discuss every scheme that may be suggested by public men having that object in view. It is only by discussing it in this way that we can come to a determination as to what is best to be done on this important question. In Nova Scotia we are taking vast strides in this direction; not only in Nova Scotia, but throughout all the Provinces of Canada. In helping ourselves we have helped the British Empire and have done a great deal towards bringing about Imperial Federation. We have established by our efforts in this country since Confederation a closer communication between England and her colonies in the east. We have furnished a highway for England across this continent and we are at present in closer touch with England and England's colonies than we have hitherto been. This federation feeling has gone over the world. Look at Germany to-day, with its united kingdom! We find even in the United States the result of the confederation principle. They fought for confederation. It has been shown that in Switzerland, Australia and South Africa, also, this desire for confederation prevails, not only for confederation amongst themselves, but for closer union of the colonies with England. While I believe the resolution of my hon. friend to be impracticable, I am willing to commit myself to the general principle that it is in the interests of Canada to have closer commercial and political relations with England, and as far as we can with other colonies; but at the present time I think it would be unwise to commit ourselves to any scheme by which each of the Provinces should have a representative in the British Parliament.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—This debate has taken such a wide turn that it is no disadvantage that we should have it. Yesterday we had placed before this House the question of our heritage here in Canada, and to-day we are seeking to get representation in the Imperial Parliament. I do not rise so much to discuss that particular point, but one that has incidentally cropped out in this debate, and that was brought out more prominently in a previous debate in this House. Three years ago I happened to be a silent listener in the gallery in the House of Congress at Washington when I heard these same statements, and subsequently heard them repeated in this Senate. The impression attempted to be left on the minds of the House to-day dy the hon. gentleman opposite is that we have by some act of ours—some act of omission or commission, or unkindness or unfriendliness, brought about feelings of unpleasantness with the country to the south of us. Now, that is not the fact. There is nothing further from the fact; and while I was compelled by circumstances at Washington to sit a silent listener, and while I was compelled to sit here a silent listener as a supporter of the Government, whose desire was not to have anything said in Parliament at the time that might tend to interfere with negotiations that were pending, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without repudiating the charge that we have been harsh and unfriendly in our treatment of American fishermen. I will refer for a few moments to the incidents attending the making of the Treaty of 1818. It will be remembered by those who have read the history of events from 1771 to 1776, that there arose unpleasantnesses between the English colonies in the United States and the mother country which lead to their independence. It has no doubt occurred to every student of history that there were at that time in the English Parliament men who held strong opinions that the colonies were not properly treated, while others held that the revolt in the American colonies was merely an ebulition of temper, and that in a short time they would come back to their old allegiance. Prominent amongst those men who considered the colonies were treated unfairly was Edmund Burke, and it will be remembered that on several occasions, in his addresses to his constituents at Bristol, how distinctly and how vigorously he pleaded for the rights of the colonies at that time. Previous to the period when the United States ceased to be English colonies their fishermen had access to the fisheries in the Maritime Provinces. They knew all the ins and outs of the fisheries; they knew the haunts of the fish of Canada; they were experts on that coast then as they are experts to-day as fishermen. After the Declaration of Independence, down to the year we made a treaty with them, we permitted them as friends and neighbors to pursue their avocations as fishermen around the shores and bays of the Maritime Provinces. In 1818, when we sat down to discuss this question with a view to a treaty, the United States was asked to make a statement through its Minister what were the views that that country entertained with regard to our fisheries. I will recall one or two incidents, the details of which will be found by any gentleman who takes up Hannay's "Acadia." After the Declaration of Independence by the United States a great many loyalist families came down to settle under the old flag in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Members of the same family under different flags and different constitutions were continually visiting each other, sometimes with friendly intentions and at other times of a different nature. We find that on one occasion, from Newburyport, Massachusetts, there came a number of men in a shallop, and landed at the head of the Bay of Fundy, came across into Bay Verte and there seized a schooner, took her into Pictou where the Scotch ship "Jane," of Dundee, was discharging goods for the merchants, and there took possession of the ship and took her over into Bay Verte, rifled her of her contents and held her until messengers were sent through the woods from Pictou to Halifax, when the British sloop of war "Boxer" recaptured her and took her into the harbor of Charlottetown. That was a sample of the goings on in those times. In some instances, not only were our people molested in their rights on the fishing grounds, but their boats were destroyed, their nets were destroyed, and every outrage that could be suffered was committed on people who were unable to protect themselves in isolated places, so that it was necessary that something should be done. There was the very best of feeling between the two countries as a whole at that time. There were fisheries all around the coasts of the New England colonies at that time, as good as ours in certain seasons in the year, but not so good as our deep-sea fisheries. It was neeessary in those days, as it is now, for every nation to have training schools for their seamen, for without them no nation can have influence as a naval power, and a value was therefore set on the fisheries as a school from which to draw able seamen. It was with these views in men's minds that we were asked to sit down and prepare this treaty. At that particular time the Americans were asked to make a statement of their wants: and what was that statement? That they wanted access to our fisheries, merely to get wood and water. And why? Because at that time they had shore fisheries of their own as valuable as ours on their own coast. We gave them the privilege they asked for, and they were satisfied with it, and it went on satisfactorily to all parties until their mercantile marine and their fishing fleet so increased and they exhausted their own fisheries to such a degree that in 1853 the value of the fisheries controlled by the Americans was not 3 per cent. as compared with what it was a few years previous. If you go down into the Department of Fisheries here, and ask the Deputy Minister to show you the different devices that were in use for the destruction of the fisheries, hon. gentlemen would be surprised to see the variety. He will tell you also that the very same means are now being utilized by the Americans to destroy our fisheries that were years ago employed in the United States so successfully to destroy their own. In 1853 we discussed the question with them. They acknowledged that we had a virgin fishery, and to have access to that fishery they were willing to make a treaty, which was entered into and which lasted ten years, and which was greatly in their favor. Was that an act of unfriendliness on our part? Was that the act of a people disposed to be unfriendly or unneighborly? I say, no. I say that history does not prove anything of the kind. When we sat down, later on, in Halifax, to discuss the question there in 1876, what was the result? The Americans had some of the ablest men in the United States as their representatives, and an arbitrator was named who was looked upon as being so far removed from any entanglement between England and the United States that he could be depended upon for an honest verdict. What was the result of that arbitration? We got $5,000,000. After they had exhausted, with all the experts, all the ingenuity, all the tact, and all the perseverance, and all the intelligence they could bring to bear, the whole of the department at Washington, including their shipmasters, fish merchants and every witness from amongst the 50,000,000 of their population who could throw any light on this question in their favor, we were allowed $5,000,000 for our fisheries. After the expiration of the treaty we allowed them, under the modus vivendi, to have access to our fisheries until such time as the public men of the United States should be brought to see this thing in the way the arbitrators who had considered this question had seen it. Of the population of the United States, 600,000 are engaged in the fisheries, directly or indirectly, and when they made representation at Washington, though a small proportion of the people, Congress thought, as we would think if a proportion of our people came to Parliament and said that their rights are trampled on, our sympathies would go with then. We are told that our fisheries have no value for the people of the United States. My answer to that is: if you take up the report published in January last by the Fisheries Bureau of the United States you will find that about one hundred fishermen of the Gloucester fleet have taken out licenses to fish in our waters, for which privilege they paid $9,589.50, and I am astonished to hear any hon. gentleman say, in the face of such facts, that our fisheries are of no value to the Americans. I sat quietly in my seat when that statement was made before, but I vowed that the first opportunity I would have I would state my opinion on the question, and give my reasons for the faith that is in me. While holding these opinions, I am still with our Government in holding out the olive branch. With regard to the question before the House, I think we may be thankful to the hon. gentleman from the North-West, who presented his case so clearly and distinctly before us. His speech, at all events, showed a great deal of thought and careful consideration, and I may say that, speaking of Canada, he is speaking of a country which we ourselves can have very little conception of by merely glancing at the map of it. A recent writer, referring to Canada, says:

"It is difficult to afford an adequate conception of the vastness of this country. England, Wales and Scotland form together an area of 88,000 square miles; you could cut forty such areas out of Canada.

"New South Wales contains 300,175 square miles, and is larger by 162 square miles than France, continental Italy and Sicily. Canada would make eleven countries the size of New South Wales.

"There are (in extent) three British Indias in Canada, and still enough left over to make a Queensland and a Victoria.

"The German Empire could be carved out of Canada, and fifteen more countries the same size."

We may well feel proud of a country such as this, and proud of the position she occupies and her promise of a glorious future. In a few years many gentlemen who sit around these benches will be gone, but events are moving rapidly, and things that seem difficult at the present time will, in a few years, after we are gone, perhaps even in our time, be no longer difficult. There is no man in this Chamber who will deny that within the last thirty or forty years in the lives of many of us, great strides have taken place with regard to facilities for transport both by land and by sea. Only a few years ago it was considered an impossibility to build a railway across this continent. We were told it was madness to undertake it, and that its completion would not be seen by the then Government or many Governments to come. But we have lived to see that railroad an accomplished fact, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and we are proud of it. Every day we hear of railroads encroaching on the cities. Instead of having cities stagnating, without communication with each other, they are being encroached on for the accommodation of the rapidly growing traffic of the country. We are improving in our ship-building—from wood to iron, from iron to steel—and the day is not far distant when we shall have reached the discovery of some other material than steel with which to build ships, or we will be in the same position with our steel ships that we were a few years ago, when we had only wooden ships. As soon as that material is discovered which will have more buoyancy than wood and more tensile strength than steel we shall build ships, driven by electricity, that will cross the ocean in three or four days.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—Hon. gentlemen may laugh. It is very easy to laugh. I have myself laughed in the same way a few years ago at statements that appeared to be incredible, and which are now every-day facts. I have in my hand a copy of the Quarterly Review that was edited by as clever men, and read by as wise men as those who laugh at my prophecy now. In 1819 a writer in the Review stated:

"We cannot but laugh at an idea so impracticable as that of a good road of iron upon which travel may be conducted by steam. Can anything be more utterly absurd and laughable than a steam waggon propelled and moving twice as fast as our mail coaches."

So, again, with regard to the introduction of gas. Many anecdotes are told about

William Murdock, in connection with his discovery, towards the close of last century, of combustible air or gas. An English paper says :

"So little was the invention understood and believed in by those who had not seen its use that even great and wise men laughed at the idea. 'How could there be a light without a wick?' said a member of Parliament, when the subject was before the House. Sir Humphrey ridiculed the idea of lighting towns by gas, and asked one of the proprietors if he meant to take the dome of St. Paul's for a gas meter. Sir Walter Scott made himself very merry over the idea of illuminating London by smoke, though he was glad enough, not so long after, to make his own house at Abbotsford light and cheerful on wintry nights by the use of that very smoke. When the House of Commons was lighted by gas the architect imagined that the gas ran on fire through the pipes, and therefore insisted on their being placed several inches from the wall for fear of the building taking fire. The members might be observed touching the pipe, with their gloved hands, and wondering why they did not feel warm. The first shop lighted in London by this new method was Mr. Ackerman's, in the Strand, in 1810; and one lady of rank was so delighted with the brilliancy of the gas lamp on the counter that she asked to be allowed to take it home in her carriage."

I ask hon. gentlemen how long ago would they have believed it possible that any man could telephone a message from Montreal to Toronto? Then look at the progress of electricity. Supposing we had the material to build the ship that I speak of, with more buoyancy than wood and greater tensile strength than steel, and supposing you could harness electricity into it, is there any reason why such a ship should not be driven across the ocean in less than four days? Parliament is being asked even now to pass a Bill to incorporate a company to build a railway from Quebec to Labrador. The incorporators may be looked upon as being madmen, but they must be presumed to know what they are talking about, or they would not go to the expense of getting an Act of Parliament for their scheme. Unfortunately for this country, we have not got a committee of experts to examine into the feasibility of those schemes. Here, every man is supposed to be his own engineer and to examine for himself and draw his own conclusions. But supposing this scheme is a success, and we had a train running through to the Straits of Belle Isle, it would bring the ocean passage very close to the four days, even with the vessels that we have at the present time. We have other capitalists looking for charters for railways from Manitoba and Lake Superior to Hudson Bay. I am proud to say that I am an advocate of Imperial Confederation, and I shall be glad to welcome the day when some practical plan is proposed to work out that great question.

HON. MR. POWER—I had not proposed to say anything on this subject, but as there appears to be an awkward pause in the proceedings now, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has told us with great emphasis that he is in favor of Imperial Federation and does not care who knows it. I like to see courage of that sort. It is a free country, and every one is entitled to hold whatever views he pleases on the subject of Imperial Federation. I have not given very much thought to the details of Imperial Federation. I think we are still a long way from it, and only when it appears that we are to have Imperial Federation will it be necessary, I should think, for us to sit down and devote our time to consider what particular form the federation is to take. It will strike an ordinary mortal that we have in Canada at the present time a sufficient number of political problems to wrestle with, without seeking outside for something further. I fail to see that there is the slightest necessity for us at the present time to consider this question. The system of government which we have is a pretty good one—as good as any almost that I know of—although I do not think that at the present time it is being administered in the best way. It is not being administered by the right people; but that is a difficulty which I hope we can soon get over without resorting to other colonies. I hope we shall be able to settle that question ourselves by-and-bye; but at present I do think we had better try and govern ourselves under the existing constitution. If any very serious evil consequences were following from the character of our constitution then I should be one of the first to propose an amendment; but I am not aware that there is any complaint of that kind. There is just one characteristic about this Imperial Federation subject which I think deserves more attention than has been called to it, and that is the fact that all past constitutional changes, or nearly all—certainly all constitutional changes that have been valuable and have been improvements—have arisen from a feeling amongst the bulk of the population acted on that some change was necessary. Now, in the case of Imperial Federation there is nothing of the sort. You go to the farmers and lumbermen of Ontario and Quebec and New Brunswick, or the farmers and fishermen of my own Province, or the sailors of the Lower Provinces—men who fly the British flag in every quarter of the world—and you never find any of them talking about Imperial Federation. They do not know anything about it. They do not feel that they want anything of the sort. Who are the people who want Imperial Federation? I think the people with whom this discussion has originated are a number of very respectable and, as a rule, rather intellectual gentlemen, with a good deal of leisure time, who, in casting about for some means to occupy their learned leisure, lighted upon this Imperial Federation, and found it an interesting subject, and one that at some future day might possess some practical value. They discuss and write about it, and in that way create an impression that it is almost a live issue. Now, I do not think that it is in any sense a live issue; and we had better not trouble our heads with Imperial Federation, but had better try and improve the administration of our existing constitution to the furthest possible point; and if anything gets very wrong with our constitution try and have it amended. The proposals of the Imperial Federationists are very impracticable, and the inducements held out to us to part with a very considerable portion of our independence are so empty that I am surprised to hear gentlemen of good sense and prudence, as I have heard to-day, advocate such changes as are proposed. What have we to get in the way of trade—for after all that is the motive that most influences countries—what have we to get from England that we have not got now? We have free access to England's markets, and we cannot get anything very much more from her. There are practically no duties. One of the proposals is, that we could discriminate in favor of the mother country and the other colonies as against foreign countries. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa has pointed out that under existing treaties we could not do that. But suppose we could. If we were to take the duties off goods from England how would we get a revenue? It may be noted that the gentlemen who are strongest in favor of Imperial Federation are opposed to reciprocity with our neighbors. Now, if there is a difficulty in raising a revenue if we enter into reciprocal trade relations with the United States, where are we going to get a revenue if we enter into reciprocal trade with England? I did not intend to speak on this subject, and I shall only say in conclusion that while I think it is a very interesting matter to discuss, it would be premature for this House to commit itself to any such resolution as that introduced by the hon. gentleman.

HON. MR. PROWSE—I have not been in the House very long, but I should like to make one or two observations on this subject. I am sorry the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution has done so in this way, because, like a former speaker, I feel in principle somewhat in favor of Imperial Federation; but whether I should be in favor of Imperial Federation in future as it may be submitted to us then I cannot say, because I want to find out and see on what terms the union is to be effected before I can give an intelligent opinion on the subject. It is said that there is nothing definite about this question, that nothing is laid down by which we can form an opinion of the scheme. I think it is a very wise policy to approach the question in that way. It would be unwise for our ablest statesmen to propound a system of federation cut and dried. I am reminded of the way the confederation of these Provinces was brought about in 1867. A proposal came from Nova Scotia to the Provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island for a maritime union. These Provinces approached the subject very cautiously and carefully. The Government of Prince Edward Island appointed delegates to meet delegates from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick on this subject, but they were not allowed to commit the Province to any scheme. They met and considered the question, and in doing so they were requested by the leading statesmen of old Canada to allow them to appear before the conference and discuss the broader question of Confederation. You know what took place. They held meeting after meeting and discussed the question of Confederation with closed doors. There was no cut and dried scheme prepared for them, but they sat down, as intelligent gentlemen, knowing the importance of the question they were considering, and considered it carefully, and what has been the result? The result is this great Confederation, and I am glad to see here a gentleman who was one of the first delegates that came to Prince Edward Island to bring about the union. I think if my hon. friend from Shell River had proposed a resolution suggesting that the Government institute a conference of delegates from all the colonies of the Empire throughout the world, to be held somewhere, perhaps in London, to discuss this matter, so as to devise a plan, and after having thoroughly matured it the scheme could be submitted to the various colonies, and then we would be in a position to decide whether it would be something that would be acceptable to the Canadian people or not. Had the hon. gentleman proposed something of that kind I should have given it my support. It is said we have nothing to gain by Imperial Federation—that Great Britain admits our products duty free, and that we have every facility of intercourse and trade with the mother country now; but we know what our relations with the United States are, and I quite agree with my colleague from Prince Edward Island, when he tells us that the friction between the United States and Canada is not caused by hostile acts on the part of the Dominion, but by hostility on the part of the United States. I am not prepared to accuse any gentlemen on this floor or in this Dominion of being anxious for annexation, but we know there is a desire in the United States to absorb the Dominion. I know that that is the way they advocate commercial union in the United States to-day. They advocate it in the hope of bringing about a political union. They declare publicly that their scheme eventually means the annexation of Canada to the United States. That must be well known to gentlemen in this House who are continually advocating, and have advocated for years past, a policy of giving way to all the demands made by he United States upon this Dominion. I think the policy pursued by Canada in imposing a high protective tariff upon United States manufactures is a just and proper one for us to adopt. We have a large country, very sparsely populated, and we want to bring people into the Dominion. I do not believe in going to the extreme length advocated the other day, of spending millions of dollars for the purpose of bringing hundreds of thousands of people into this country. We should progress slowly, and be careful to select a good class of emigrants, and I think this country would be better off to-day if those who are residents of the Dominion now, and who are not in sympathy with our population, and have no faith in the future of our country, would take their departure for the good of the Dominion.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Name! name!

HON. MR. PROWSE—As I have said, this country is very sparsely populated. How shall we populate it? By giving a home market for the cultivator of the soil, and to do so we must build up manufacturing towns, we must develop our fisheries, mines and forests, and thus add to our consuming population. In doing that we give employment to our people at home in the manufacture of goods that we require, and we can export the surplus to foreign countries; but if we have to throw down the barriers we have raised, and allow the manufacturers of neighboring countries to come into our markets free, what would be the result? Our people would go to where the goods were manufactured. Those who remained would become hewers of wood and drawers of water for our friends across the border. If Imperial Federation means closer trade relations with Great Britain and her colonies, it will be a grand and beneficial scheme for the whole of the British people and for the world at large. Although the leader of the Opposition in this House has told us that there are barriers in the way I am not so hopeless as to think they cannot be removed in the course of time. It will take time and consideration, but what obstacle has ever daunted British statesmen. They have overcome almost every difficulty in the way, and they will overcome this. If we can only induce Great Britain and her colonies to make a discriminating tariff against the world I am satisfied that great good will result to Canada from Imperial Federation.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—At this late hour I do not propose to say very much. I hope my hon. friend from Shell River will meet the House in the feeling which has been shown, that as he has ably stated his views with reference to Imperial Federation and has elicited a great deal of interesting discussion, he will be content with that and withdraw this resolution. But before I ask him to do that, I should like to say a word or two about this motion and one or two other matters. I remarked the line which my hon. friend from Ottawa took in this discussion, and was pleased, greatly gratified, and I am sure the House was also gratified, to hear his vehement declaration that the line of commercial policy that he desires to see carried out for this country was not calculated to increase the probabilities of political union with our neighbors—that if he thought it was he would abandon the idea rather than see it carried out. I think we were all gratified to hear that, although I do not think that anyone supposed my hon. friend was deliberately agitating for a political union with the United States. But the persistent assertion of his views, which we hear on that subject in connection with every discussion which comes before the House, reminds us of the old story of the head of King Charles I, which was always brought forward in discussion or writing by a gentleman in romantic history who was a namesake of my hon. friend. On this occasion it appears with its usual force, and it certainly produces this good impression on my mind, that it entirely exonerates the hon. gentleman from any idea that could be entertained that he favors political union. It led me to the conclusion, and many others, I have no doubt also, that if he persists in advocating commercial union or universal reciprocity it is not attributable to any want of confidence in his own country, or any want of loyalty to British connection, but simply from an error of judgment on his part, in supposing that by accepting it we would not be approaching political union.

HON. MR. SCOTT—No, no.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend may say no, but the authorities that I quote come from his co-workers in the United States more particularly. There is of course a universal denial on this side that any one who advocates commercial union desires annexation, but on the other side of the line, including the eminent Canadian who figures as leader in this movement, the universal argument, when used in that latitude, is that commercial union will undoubtedly lead to political union between the two countries.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Oh, no; Mr. Wiman denied it on every occasion.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Yes; in Canada, but in his reported speeches on more than one occasion—it would be very easy to refer to them—he states distinctly that the success of his agitation would lead to closer political union between the two countries. The other advocates who had no double part to play, who were altogether Americans, have had the candor always to say and to hold out as an inducement to the American people to support this agitation that freedom of trade between the two countries would bring about political union rapidly.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It would defeat it.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not think there can be any doubt, if my hon. friend would consult the authorities to be found on the other side of the line, that he would find that, without a single exception, the advocates of the agitation on that side of the line advocate it as leading directly to the annexation of Canada to the United States.

HON. MR. POWER—No.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend says no, but I do not propose further to make it a subject of this debate. It is only incident to it, and I have been led to it by my hon. friend's earnestness as advocating that as being preferable to the theory of Imperial Federation. There is just one other point in my hon. friend's speech to which I wish to refer. He complains of us to-day, as he did when we adopted the Fishery Treaty, and on former occasions, as being the cause of the trouble which exists occasionally between England and the United States. It is our misconduct, according to my hon. friend——

HON. MR. SCOTT—No; I did not say that.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The hon. gentleman did not use the word, but he represented that it was our conduct which causes the friction between England and the United States. He alluded in an incidental way to the fisheries on the Pacific and Atlantic, and the duties on packages; and he spoke of those things as incentives to dispute which we were constantly flinging into the arena, provoking conflict by our lad temper and harshness towards the United States. It is very odd that two years ago we agreed with the United States about those fisheries. We made a treaty with them which we approved of, a treaty in which we made considerable concessions. My hon. friend, I think, was one of those who referred to the great extent of those concessions to the United States. The United States, as far as their authorized representatives were concerned at the time, appeared to be thoroughly satisfied with them.

HON. MR. MILLER—The Government of the United States also approved.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It was not we who broke up this treaty; it was the United States. We had a treaty with them formerly which gave them the free use of our fisheries. Who broke up that treaty? It was not us; it was the United States. It was they who returned to the régime of 1818, not we, and when a new treaty was proposed to us, placing things on a more reasonable and amicable footing, we approved of it. It was not we who refused; it was they. When my hon. friend speaks about putting duties on packages I ask him, who taught us to do so? When they agreed to give us free entry of our fish to the United States markets they neutralized that by putting a duty on packages. They were our instructors on that occasion; but my hon. friend did not find fault with them.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Yes; I said they were very grasping and aggravating; but it takes two to make a quarrel.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The aggravation, I heard my hon. friend say, was on this side of the line. What would my hon. friend have us do with regard to the fisheries? Shall we give them up? Shall we hand them over the Atlantic fisheries? Shall we submit to outrages on our fishermen on the Pacific? We can make friends of them, as the little boy at school made friends of the big boy, by giving him all his pocket money and marbles. If we give up everything they may from time to time demand from us we may procure peace, but it is at a price that I for one will never agree to pay, a price that this House, I am sure, will never sanction as long as it exists, and the country will support the House in its refusal to do so. I am sorry to take the time of the House so long in discussing this question, but when my hon. friend expresses views which militate so strongly against mine I cannot refrain from giving him the benefit of as much contradiction as I possibly can.

With reference to the motion before the House, I do not think my hon. friend from Shell River has placed himself in the position to have the theory of Imperial Federation favorably debated. The subject is one of very great magnitude indeed. It branches almost beyond the limits of our understanding. It is really a study for a lifetime to know what it is, to know whether it is needed or not, to know what it should consist of, what we should give and what we should receive; and at this moment I believe there is a large society of influential and intelligent people engaged in discussing this particular subject from time to time, and endeavoring to formulate some plan of Imperial Federation which would commend itself to the understanding of our people. Now, Imperial Federation in the abstract, that is to say, the binding us more closely to England by ties of amity, and by mutual arrangements beneficial to both, is an idea that must naturally appeal to every Canadian, and I think it does; but the difficulty about it seems to be that it is impossible to define any mode by which this Imperial Federation can be carried out, any principle upon which a mode of federation can be framed, and in fact it has so far proved to be impossible to approach the subject with any definite proposition of any description whatsoever. My hon. friend, I believe, is the first person who has placed of record in a tangible form a proposition for the confederation of the colonies with the mother country. That society to which I have referred failed to do so. The speakers and the periodicals which advocate Imperial Federation have failed to do so, and this is my hon. friend's own suggestion. I do not think it necessary to go into the various questions which might arise if my hon. frend's suggestion were taken up as a substantive proposition which we should discuss and debate, and if possible put in shape for progress, because it involves, to my mind, so many impossibilities. In the first place, it seems to me entirely unconstitutional. How is it possible that an elective body like the House of Commons could receive members capable of voting in it who are appointed by the Governments of different Provinces and countries? That is foreign to the principles on which the House of Commons is constituted. The Privy Council is a sort of committee of the House of Commons, selected by the party leader and approved by the Sovereign, which conducts the business of the country so long as it possesses the confidence of the House of Commons. The moment it loses that confidence it retires. There is nothing analogous to this constitution in my hon. friend's proposition, that a member of the Council should be appointed by the Government of Canada; and if he were appointed, what would be his position? Would he retire with the retirement of the Government of the day? Would he need to be in harmony with the general politics of the Government of the day? I could ask a good many more such questions, I think, but the result would appear to me to be, that he would have to be a sort of excresence on the Privy Council, without any standing or constitutional position, and, I think, without much value to anybody concerned. Then, with regard to the House of Commons: if we were going to negotiate with Great Britain for a representation in the House of Commons we, I hope, represent now above 6,000,000 of people. Are we to be content with one representative for the Dominion? That seems to me to be out of the question. If we are to be represented in the House of Commons we must send representatives there elected by the people, who would go there as men representing a certain number of intelligent voters, and who should not go there as the mere nominees of a party Government, which is the Government we must necessarily always have in this country. If 6,000,000 of people are to be represented in the House of Commons they must be represented by a larger number, selected by a better mode of selection than my hon. friend proposes. Again, this scheme of federation must surely not be confined to Canada. The federation would not be solely between England and Canada. The federation which is contemplated and about which so much is said and expected would be a federation between England and her colonies. Have we any reason to suppose that the other colonies would be content with this representation in the British House of Commons and the Privy Council, or if they would claim such representation, or if they did, that it would be accorded to them? I do not think we can say that we have had any communication with other colonies showing that they desire representation in the Imperial Parliament. These are questions which naturally come up and which, I think, every one must feel must be discussed, and not only considered alone, but discussed in common with those others who are interested in this federation as well as ourselves. Then, if we are allowed representation in the British House of Commons of any kind, what are we to give for it—how much of our independence and control of our own affairs is to be surrendered when we obtain from the Empire the right of having our members sitting in the Imperial House and having a voice in its councils, even if that voice be only with regard to its colonies? Some hon. gentleman spoke —perhaps it was the mover of the resolution—on the advantage of having some one to assist in teaching the Imperial Government how to govern Canada. They do not govern us; we govern ourselves. We do not want them taught how to govern us, because we receive no government from them. We control our own affairs and the principles which govern our commercial and financial interests. We have the liberty, under our constitution which Great Britain has granted us, and in the enjoyment of which she protects us, of regulating those ourselves, and they are not regulated by the British House of Commons. It has been a theory, I know, with the advocates of Imperial Federation, that other concessions would be required of us if we were to enter into such relations with the Imperial Government. There are contributions talked of by the advocates of this scheme to the defence of the Empire in money and in men. There are contributions, too, of ships, and there are many other concessions which are talked of as being likely to be required from us in the event of Imperial Federation. These are serious subjects. It is a great question whether a representation of ten times as many people as my hon. friend proposes to represent us in the Imperial Parliament would justify us in allowing the Imperial Parliament to exercise powers over us that they do not now possess. We should approach such a subject with a great deal of care and caution. Without, therefore, saying that I am opposed to Imperial Federation—because that would not be true—I say this, that I am not prepared to say that I am an advocate of Imperial Federation until I learn of some scheme or plan by which our position will not be impaired, and by which our relations to our Imperial mother will be improved. When I hear of a scheme of that description I shall become an advocate, I dare say, of Imperial Federation, provided it does not involve too great sacrifices on our part. Until I do, I sympathize with all the expressions of affection and loyalty towards the Imperial Government and the Crown most heartily, and I say when you show me how we can carry out in practical shape the feelings which we undoubtedly all have on this subject, with a just regard to our own freedom and general interest, I shall become as ardent a supporter of the principle of Imperial Federation as anyone else. Until that comes, I must suspend my opinion as to its merits, and hold myself aloof from any agitation in favor of it which may compromise me or my country to a greater degree than I think is justified by the advantages to be obtained by it. I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion to a vote.

HON. MR. BOULTON—I have great pleasure in acceding to the wish of the hon. leader of this House, and the generally expressed desire of the Senate to withdraw my resolution. The object I had in bringing it forward was to create the discussion which has taken place this afternoon, and I have to thank the House for the attention they have given to the subject.

The motion was withdrawn.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (90) "An Act to amend the Act incorporating the Manitoba and South Eastern Railway Company." (Mr. Girard).

The Senate adjourned at 6:15 p.m.

THE SENATE.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were reported from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, and were read a third time, and passed without debate:—

Bill (61) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company." (Mr. Girard.)

Bill (80) "An Act respecting the Grand Trunk, Georgian Bay and Lake Erie Railway Company." (Mr. McKindsey.)

Bill (55) "An Act to incorporate the Shore Line Railway Bridge Company." (Mr. Wark.)

INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGE CO.'S BILL.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (54) "An Act to incorporate the Interprovincial Bridge Company," with an amendment. He said: This amendment concurs in the clause which fixes the time for commencing and completing the work as being two and five years respectively. It is a mere verbal amendment.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—Perhaps I may say that the clause as it appears in the Bill is similar to that in all other such Bills as have passed through the House this Session, and I do not see why exception should be made upon this occasion. I think that the term of two years and five years is quite sufficient, without incorporating the other part of the amendment, which pratically means nothing. Therefore, I think the House should not concur in this amendment.

HON. MR. MILLER—The hon. gentleman had better move that the House take the amendment into consideration on Monday next. A report sent up here by an important committee, such as the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, should not receive such summary consideration.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—In accordance with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Richmond, I move that the report be taken into consideration on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ESCAPES FROM INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS IN ONTARIO BILL.

WITHDRAWN.

The Order of the Day being called,—Second reading of Bill (S) "An Act respecting Escapes from Industrial Schools in Ontario."

HON. MR. ABBOTT said: This Bill, I think, will require considerable modification, and upon the whole I propose to have this Order discharged and to introduce a new Bill. I therefore ask permission to withdraw the Bill.

The Bill was withdrawn.

SAMUEL MAY RELIEF BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called,—Second reading of Bill (16) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Samuel May."

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the second reading take place on Tuesday next.

HON. MR. POWER—I think there was a sort of understanding that this Bill was not likely to be proceeded any further with. I do not know that the hon. gentleman from Burlington quite concurred in the view expressed by the leader of the House and some other gentlemen here, but I think there ought to be some understanding that on Tuesday next the Bill should either be proceeded with or dropped. I may mention, in connection with this Bill, that the very thing which the leader of the House predicted would happen has already happened. Another Bill has been introduced in the House of Commons for the purpose of doing the same thing with respect to some other patentee that this Bill proposes to do with respect to Mr. May.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I may say that my hon. friend represents to me, and, I have no doubt, correctly, that there are certain special circumstances connected with this Bill that he thinks might make an impression on the House, and he desires to get his information from Toronto and to have time to do so.

HON. MR. MILLER—The hon. gentleman has made a motion which is often made in this House, and it is unusual for any member to object to such a motion when made by the promoter of a Bill. The hon. gentleman from Burlington can do just as he pleases with his Bill—go on with it to-day, or postpone it to another day, or drop it.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—The hon. member from Halifax is nothing unless he is critical. I think he feels himself entitled to be the semi-leader of the Opposition in this House. It would be more becoming on his part if he would allow the real leader to be heard from occasionally. It is always a pleasure to hear the real leader, whether we agree with his ideas or not. His arguments are always clear and to the point, and it appears to me that the semi-leader is always looking out for an opportunity to raise an objection to anything that may occur.

HON. MR. POWER—I do not lay any claim to any position in this House; I do not assume to be anything but what I am exactly. Possibly there are certain other gentlemen who would not do ill if they followed my example in that respect. I did not question the hon. gentleman's right to make his motion. I did not object to his motion, but I suggested that there ought to be some understanding that when Tuesday came the Bill should either be proceeded with or abandoned. There is nothing unusual or improper about that. The hon. gentleman asked for an extension of time, and I simply suggested that when the time came for a second reading he ought to be asked either to go on with the Bill or let it drop.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I have made a motion that is usual in this House, and I beg to inform the hon. gentleman that we do propose to go on with the bill on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ST. CATHARINES AND NIAGARA CENTRAL RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. MCCALLUM moved that the report of the Select Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors on Bill (69) "An Act respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company," be concurred in. He said: On consultation with the solicitor from the city of Hamilton and with the promoter of the amendment of which notice is given, they came to the conclusion that they would withdraw the amendment.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I beg to confirm what the hon. gentleman has said with reference to the amendment of which notice was given by Mr. Sanford. He informed me before going away that he wished to withdraw that amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL AND WESTERN RAILWAY CO.'S AGREEMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. LACOSTE, in the absence of the Hon. Mr. BOLDUC, moved the second reading of Bill (82) "An Act to confirm an Agreement between the Montreal and Western Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company."

HON. MR. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain the object of the Bill.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—The Montreal and Western Railway Company is a line extending from St. Jerome to Lake Temiscamingue. There is an agrement between this company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which this Bill is intended to confirm.

HON. MR. MILLER—We will find out all about it in the Railway Committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (58) "An Act respecting the Brantford, Waterloo and Lake Erie Railway Company." (Mr. McCallum.)

Bill (99) "An Act to incorporate the Owen Sound and Lake Huron Railway Company." (Mr. McKindsey.)

The Senate adjourned at 4 p.m.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege. I notice in some of the newspapers that I am reported as having opposed the second reading of the Interprovincial Bridge Company's Bill as destroying the landscape, interfering with the adjoining grounds, and that the busy hum of industry would interfere with our legislation and the convenience of members of Parliament. I disclaim having made any such utterance; in fact, when the Bill was before us, I remember when the senior member from Halifax opposed the Bill on somewhat similar grounds, I joined issue with him, and said that from what I knew of the locality where the proposed bridge was to be I thought no inconvenience of the kind would result. I would let that pass if it were not for something which followed it, which I find in the Ottawa Evening Journal. I am there reported as having, in the Railway Committee, last Thursday, made use of language which would shock the sense of decency of members of the committee had I done so. The Journal says, in its report of the proceedings in the Railway Committee:

"Senator Kaulbach frequently invoked the Deity that the amendment might pass. The officials in the House and Departments did not want the noise. He had not objected to the Canadian Pacific Railway passing his home, but it was an infernal nuisance."

I need not say to hon. members who were present that my utterances in the committee were entirely in favor of the Bill without any amendment. I disclaim the paternity of any such remarks as the Journal attributes to me. If they were uttered they were not uttered by me, and I take this opportunity to explain that I did not make them, and I trust that the Journal and other papers that have misreported me will correct the error into which they have fallen. On the face of the report, it shows that the remarks could not have been mine, for the Canadian Pacific Railway does not pass my house. I live down in Lunenburg, N. S.

MARRIAGE WITH DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of Bill (U) "An Act to amend 'An Act concerning Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister.'"

On the 1st clause,

HON. MR. POWER said: I moved an amendment to this clause of the Bill when it was in committee before. The amendment was at the beginning of line 11, to strike out "daughter" and insert "niece," and in the same line further on to strike out "wife's sister" and insert "wife." It would read that all laws prohibiting the marriage between a man and his deceased wife's niece shall be repealed. That is the necessary consequence of the legislation we have already passed.

HON. MR. ALMON—When the hon. senior member from Halifax first proposed that amendment, as I wished this Bill to pass without opposition, and through my natural equaminity of temper, I agreed to it; but on looking over it carefully I do not see that it would be any improvement on the Bill—on the contrary, it would be rather an impediment. It would raise a question which I am not prepared to go into, that we ought, when we allow a man to marry a deceased wife's sister, to allow a woman to marry her deceased husband's brother. As we did not approve of that, I think it would be opening anew the question, and impeding the progess of the Bill. I shall therefore oppose the amendment.

HON. MR. MILLER—I should like to hear the opinion of the leader of the House on this question, as it is a legal one. I agree with the remarks from the junior member from Halifax (Mr. Almon), and I gave an intimation of this opinion when the senior member from Halifax (Mr. Power) made his motion the last time this Bill was before the committee. The Act authorizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister is clearly designed to extend that provision to the female side of the house only. It did not intend, nor did it extend the principle to the male side of the house. The amendment proposed now by the hon. senior member from Halifax would not be in consonance with the spirit of the Act which this Bill proposes to amend. It goes further, and includes both sides of the house, whereas the Bill and the Act which it is proposed to amend include only the female side of the house. I think there is a good deal of difference between the permission as granted on the female side and as granted on the male side. At any rate, legislation has not yet gone so far with us as to extend the permission granted to the deceased wife's sister to the deceased wife's brother or to the male side of either of the parties. I do not like, besides, the general term "deceased wife's niece." There may be consanguinity. For instance, the deceased wife's sister may have married a husband related by consanguinity to the man who desires to marry his deceased wife's niece, and therefore it might be well perhaps to guard against anything of that kind occurring under this Bill. But the amendment destroys the sequence, as it were, between the husband and the niece, by tracing it to the daughter of the deceased wife's brother. I think the Bill as it stands makes it more clear, and the sequence is very necessary to preserve the intention of the Act. I hope, therefore, the committee will not alter the phraseology of the clause as recommended by the senior member from Halifax.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—For my part, I must say that I am not favorable to the law as it stands, and therefore I am not particularly favorable to the amendment which the hon. member proposes to introduce. At the same time, the law is in existence, and I think there is a certain logical sequence in what my hon. friend the junior member from Halifax proposes, although it is not supported by the main reason urged by the advocates of marriage with a deceased wife's sister. The main reason that I have heard in long debates in this country and that I have read in reports of debates elsewhere, has always been that the wife's sister very often acquires such a position in the house with regard to the sister herself and with regard to the sister's children that she is in reality the best and most proper person to take her place in bringing up the children after her sister's death. That is really the strongest reason that I have heard urged in advocacy of the law allowing this kind of marriage, and in my opinion it is the reason which produced the strongest effect and ultimately resulted in the Bill becoming law. No such reason exists in the case of the wife's sister's daughter. At the same time, it is apparently a logical sequence of the Act, so far as the rules of consanguinity are not affected. I should insert some words in the Bill to guard against a contingency which might happen. It is not at all uncommon that two brothers marry two sisters. This Bill would enable a man to marry his own niece.

HON. MR. MILLER—Do you not suppose that the general law would prohibit anything of that kind? I thought so, but I thought there might be other degrees which it would be wise to guard against.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is quite possible that the general law, which prohibits that kind of marriage, might be construed as having some operation, although this Bill expressly authorizes a man to marry his deceased wife's sister's daughter without any limitation whatever, and I think it would be prudent to insert these words: "in so far as such marriage is not prevented by any other relationship of consaguinity."

HON. MR. MILLER—Or "in the absence of any relationship by consaguinity."

HON. MR. ABBOTT—In the absence of any other objection arising from consanguinity. If my hon. friend would insert that I would not object to his Bill, but I would be decidedly against extending it any further.

HON. MR. ALMON—I have no objection to that.

HON. MR. POWER—I quite concur in the suggestion made by the hon. member from Richmond and agreed to by the hon. leader of the House, as to the desirability of guarding against a man marrying his own relation who also happened to be a niece of his deceased wife, but I do not see the force of the objection to marriage with a deceased wife's niece. The hon. gentleman from Richmond spoke of that as a violation of the principle that had been apparently admitted, in dealing with the existing law, allowing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. My amendment does not propose to allow any marriage with a relative of a deceased husband. The law does not allow a widow to marry a brother of her deceased husband. My amendment simply deals with the female side of the house; and if a man may marry his deceased wife's sister, a fortiori he might marry his deceased wife's niece, who is one degree further removed from him. The deceased wife's brother is not related in blood at all to the widower, and there is no reason that I can see in logic, no reason in the nature of things, why, if we allow marriage with a deceased wife's niece by her sister, he should not be allowed to marry a niece by his deceased wife's brother. I can quite appreciate the objection of the hon. leader of the House who is opposed to marriage with a deceased wife's sister. I opposed that myself, but Parliament having allowed such marriages, we must, to be at all consistent, allow marriage with a deceased wife's niece.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—As long as the proposal is confined to marriage with a deceased wife's sister's niece it is quite consistent with the existing law, and a logical sequence of it, but by the amendment it is proposed to authorize marriage with the daughter of a deceased wife's brother. The marriage of a woman to her deceased husband's brother was never proposed and would not be sanctioned, though logically it involved the very same violation of the laws of affinity as the Bill which actually became law. This Bill would extend the privilege of marriage to the daughter of a deceased wife's brother, which would be regarded in quite a different light from marriage with the daughter of a deceased wife's sister.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—I am just as much opposed to this Bill as I was opposed to the passage of the Act authorizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. One important reason for my opposition is that this question, in my opinion, is not one which pertains to this House. It was well understood, at the time of Confederation, as those who were at the Conference can remember, that all questions relating to marriage would remain within the jurisdiction of the Provinces, and that the Federal authorities should have nothing whatever to do with the subject, except to possess the power of declaring that a marriage contracted in any one Province should be recognized as valid in all other Provinces of the Dominion. That was promised at the time by those who took part in the Quebec Conference; but as you will see by reference to the Confederation Debates, Sir John Macdonald, Sir Hector Langevin and Sir Alexander Campbell, who were Ministers at that time, pledged their words of honor before the Parliament which sat at Quebec that the question of marriage should never be interfered with by the Federal authorities. When the Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill was before Parliament eight years ago I raised the same objection, and Sir Alexander Campbell did not deny the fact which I have just now stated. He said: "I do not deny the fact, but we have not to-day to look at what we said and promised then: we have to look at the law as it stands." It is awkward that anyone who desired to be recognised as a gentleman should be obliged to say that he had made a promise that he was not prepared to observe. Sir Hector Langevin, in his place in Parliament, said, not only in the name of the Government, but in the name of the delegates from the four Provinces, that marriage would be within the jurisdiction of the Provinces, and that when they went to England they would take good care that the desire and intention of the conference should be carried out. It is extraordinary that we should have been deceived as we were, and I still believe that if the Act authorizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister were to go to the Privy Council it would be set aside. I was happy to find that when the question first came up here, eight years ago, there were some members from the different Provinces who united with us in protesting against the passage of the Act authorizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Among the names of the dissentients, I find that of the hon. member from Amherst. The protest is as follows:—

"DISSENTIENT.

"First.—Because the Bill is contrary to the principles of sound legislation.

"Second.—Because the passing of the Bill is an encouragement to a class of marriages which have been generally discouraged and regarded with disfavor by christian churches and legislators throughout the world, from the earliest days of christianity up to the present century.

"Third.—Because the natural tendency of the Bill is to disturb and disarrange domestic relations, which have been settled and recognized for many centuries, and to introduce confusion and trouble into families.

"Fourth.—Because the Bill is contrary to the spirit of christianity.

"Fifth.—Because it is very doubtful whether the Parliament of Canada has power to pass the Bill, for the reason that the subject matter thereof seems to be one of the matters placed by the British North America Act, 1867, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Legislatures of the Provinces.

"Sixth—Because the Bill deals with a matter which, by virtue of the treaties between France and England, respecting the cession of Canada to the latter power, was to be regulated by the system of law existing in Canada at the time of the said cession, and which, by virtue of the said treaties and of various Acts of the Imperial Parliament relating to Canada, including, amongst others, the Act 14 George III, chapter 83, and the British North America Act, 1867, is to be regulated by the system of law now prevailing in the Province of Quebec and by the Legislature of that Province.

"Seventh.—Because the Bill is contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act, 1867, and to the intentions of the framers thereof, as shown by the declaration of the Canadian Government at the time of Confederation, 1865.

"Eighth.—Because the evidence before the Senate as to the popular sentiment on the matter goes to show that the sentiment is hostile rather than friendly to the proposed change.

The House should pause and decide whether they should encourage legislation which may lead to trouble. There is the other reason which I have already given, that there are in Canada churches that believe that the civil authorities do not possess exclusive power to deal with the question of marriage—that while they may deal with the civil part of the contract the church has to deal with the other and the principal part. In Canada, where those two classes of christians exist, legislation should protect both, and if this Bill contains something of the kind I should not object to it. It should contain words to the effect of those that I proposed on a former occasion, and to which I still adhere, providing that a man may marry the daughter of a sister of his deceased wife, provided the church to which he belongs acquiesce in the marriage. Then if there is an ecclesiastical impediment the church can give a dispensation and the marriage would be valid, not only by civil contract, but also by the church. But as the Bill stands, I am bound to call it immoral legislation, because it does not go far enough; therefore, we should not pass it. Without such an amendment as I suggest I shall vote against the Bill at every stage.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I agree with my hon. friend in a good many of his remarks, and I may say that I took the same ground against the Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill; but I think there is a provision in the law at present that it is not compulsory on any of the churches to perform this ceremony; still, it places them in a very awkard position, and many persons, in order to have such a marriage ceremony performed, go outside of their own churches to have it done, which I consider derogatory to the public interest. Under the proposed amendment people might go from one Province to another to evade this provision, as we now evade the law by going over to the United States to have this ceremony performed. I anticipated this Bill as being a natural outcome of the passing of the Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill, which I disapproved of, on the same ground that I disapprove of this Bill, as being vicious legislation, and I think the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Halifax will complicate it still further.

HON. MR. MILLER.—The question raised by my hon. friend from Delanaudière was one which was raised at the time the Act now on our Statute-book, permitting marriage with the deceased wife's sister, was before this House. It was not only raised in this House, but was raised also in the House of Commons, where it was fully discussed. I am sure it must be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen who were present on that occasion the answer that was given and the clear case which was made out as to the necessity for such a provision being inserted in that Bill. If such a proposition had been inserted in the Act now on our Statute-book I would have voted for it, and in doing so I consider I would have been only keeping pace with the enlightened intelligence of the age, and perhaps we could not refer to any better authority than to the feelings which have prevailed for many years past in the British House of Commons on this subject. With regard to making any provision in favor of the churches—that is, that a marriage such as is contemplated by this Bill should not be binding unless it has the sanction of the particular church to which the individuals belong,—I have this to say, and I say it particularly in connection with the church to which my hon. friend belongs. During the discussion to which I have just now alluded, which took place in this Parliament some few years ago, circulars, or rather declarations of opinion of the Roman Catholic bishops of England and the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland were freely circulated amongst members in both branches of Parliament, and the position the hierarchy of the old country took,—and I think it was the same position taken by the hierarchy of Canada—was this, that while the church did not look favorably upon such marriages, there were cases in which it was advisable and very often necessary that they should be permitted, and in these cases the church granted dispensations permitting such marriages. The bishops themselves contended that it was desirable when the churches thought it necessary to grant dispensations to make such marriages spiritual marriages that they should be in accord which the law and make them legal marriages as well. I think that was the position taken by the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, although I do not undertake to be an exponent of the ideas of the Bishops on this or any other question. Their views were in favor of permitting such a Bill becoming the law of the land, because in all cases where Roman Catholics desire to remain members of that church, they could not enter into such marriages without a dispensation, and therefore the church had absolute control over them in that respect. If a Roman Catholic enters into a marriage permitted by this Bill or the Deceased Wife's Siter's Bill without the sanction of the chuch, he cuts himself clear of the church—he is no longer a Roman Catholic, and therefore the church retains as much control over him as it did before such an Act was passed. Other churches can do the same thing if they think proper, and in my opinion, therefore, there is quite sufficient protection for the churches in regard to permitting marriages of this kind. I think the proposition of my hon. friend, if accepted, might have the effect of endangering the Bill in another place where this question was fully discussed on a previous occasion, and where a proposition to put in such a clause was not entertained. At the proper time I will move an amendment in regard to the second clause, providing for a case of possible consanguinity relation of the daughter of the deceased wife's sister.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—The hon. gentleman is about right in what he said in regard to the last Bill, but that makes no difference as to the arguments I used, for I say it would be immoral legislation, and why? Because when we legislate we legislate for the people as a whole. Say there is one-half or one-third or one-fourth of the population whose creed is that the civil authorities have no right to interfere with marriage, except as regards the civil contract, while the remaining portion of the population believe that the civil authorities have the whole right. In amending the Bill in the way I suggest, if the parties have received a dispensation from their church, then it is moral legislation; but supposing you do not amend it in that way, and supposing that some Roman Catholic who does not pay much attention to his church and its teachings should propose to marry the daughter of his deceased wife's sister, and goes to the bishop for permission to do so, and the bishop says: "Under the circumstances in which you are placed, I cannot grant you a dispensation." He may reply: "I don't care for your dispensation; the civil law is in my favor and I will marry." Is it not immoral legislation that permits such a thing?

HON. MR. DEVER—No.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—I say it is immoral, because the church teaches that the civil authority has nothing to do with these dispensations—that the church alone regulates them. Therefore, for one-third of the population it is an immoral law, because it gives to those who are not quite in accord with the church a chance of avoiding the ecclesiastical law under which they must live if they are to remain Catholics. To live in such a state of matrimony without the sanction of the church would be immoral. Then, if it is immoral as to Roman Catholics, the legislation should be amended, so as to protect both classes of christians—the Roman Catholics on one side and the other churches on the other side.

HON. MR. DEVER—I would be one of the last, I think, to run counter to the doctrines or morals of that church to which I very humbly presume to belong; at the same time, I fail to see that the reasoning of my hon. friend opposite corresponds with the theology or the rules of that church with regard to matrimony. I do remember distinctly when the debate took place in this House on the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, that one of the principal authorities brought to bear on that subject was Cardinal Manning. I think Cardinal Manning's opinion was asked, and he was one of the strongest authorities quoted in favor of that Bill, and if so good an authority as Cardinal Manning was in favor of the principle of that Bill I think that laymen here have no right to set up their individual opinions in opposition to that of so able a theologian. At all events, I fail to see the philosophy of my hon. friend opposite suggesting a case where parties make application to their priest or bishop to perform the marriage ceremony, and meeting with a refusal they go to another church and get married. He says in that way it will encourage immorality. I say to the contrary. I say that so long as a Roman Catholic refuses to accept the dictum of properly constituted authority within the church, that moment he ceases to be a Roman Catholic, whether this Bill becomes law or not; consequently, I cannot see that it is encouraging immorality. Besides, I do not see what right I have to urge my opinions in contradistinction to the large majority in this House who do not look upon marriage in the same light as we do. We claim that marriage is a sacrament of our church, and we, as good Catholics, will only receive it as such, no matter what the law may be. I claim the right as a Catholic to hold those views; at the same time, I do not claim any right to interfere with the opinions of other gentlemen who do not entertain the same views on this question, nor do I see why we should put ourselves in the way as obstructionists. It is quite enough for us to enter into the state of matrimony under such rules as our church directs, and to allow other gentlemen the liberty to enter into the ceremony in the way the law of the land permits. We should allow those who have entered into the marriage contract in the past with a deceased wife's sister as a civil contract to follow that line out to its logical conclusion. I feel that it is very unpleasant, this perpetual introduction of religious views into our legislation. I do not see that we laymen have anything at all to do with it, unless we are called upon to do so by our church. I never was called upon to interfere in this matter, and I am not aware that any clergyman of my church is opposed to the legislation that we assisted in passing through this House in relation to marriage with a deceased wife's sister. On the contrary, I think that they are much pleased with it, and it is quite time enough for me, at all events, to resist such legislation when I am called upon by the authorities of my church to do so.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Bellerose) has made such pointed references to me that it could hardly be expected I should remain silent. He has referred to me as one of the protestants against this Bill, and he has also referred to me as being one of the members of the Quebec Conference. I am sorry to say that I am now the only member in this House who was a member of that Conference, and I have naturally a general recollection of all that took place there. At the same time, I am not in a position to remember any of the incidents my hon. friend has spoken of, circumstances which I presume would not come within my knowledge at the time, because they related to another section of the Conference, and to a different class of persons from those with whom I was brought into immediate contact. My hon. friend has referred to the protest that was signed on the occasion of the passage of the Bill permitting marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and has quoted my name amongst others, but I think he ought in all fairness to have stated that I certainly did not raise the objection which he now urges, that it is contrary to the British North America Act, because I did not make that one of the grounds of my protest on that occasion. Many of the hon. gentlemen who signed that protest, myself amongst the number, have thought proper to state which and what number of the grounds read by the hon. gentleman from Delanaudière they adhered to as the reason of their protest, and he has failed to find amongst those opposite my name such reasons as he has quoted for me. On the contrary, I am excluded from those quotations which he has read as being contrary to the British North America Act, and the reasons I gave were entirely different for the course that I took. I must just state that I opposed that Bill with all my power at the time. I was one of the violent opponents of it. It ultimately passed by a narrow majority of two, and it now being the law of the land I have quite made up my mind to support this Bill, because it is the logical sequence to that Act. I dislike taking up past issues, and I think it is very much to be deprecated that we should do so. With regard to the British North America Act, my hon. friend undertakes to say that there were pledges given at the Quebec Conference that I know nothing of, and that it is contrary to the understanding on which the British North America Act was based to legislate on this subject. As I have always understood the law, it is quite clear that the marriage contract itself, and the persons who should be competent to make it, are matters entirely within the powers of the Federal Parliament; but that the ceremony and the mode of carrying it out—for instance, the question of license or banns, or whatever it is—should be within the competency of the Local Legislature. I think that is the general understanding amongst constitutional authorities on that point, and my hon. friend will see there was nothing adduced to show in the past debate that that was not entirely within the competency of this Parliament if they thought proper to enact it. I only rose to set myself right, and at the disadvantage of having to refer to a conference that took place a quarter of a century ago, to defend my colleagues on that occasion; for I think there is nothing in that Act to place the marriage contract on a footing contrary to that which I have stated. Had this been a new question I certainly would have been against this Bill for the same reason that I opposed the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, but that Bill being now the law of the land I hold that I am bound by it and must accept it as law; and if that be the law, certainly if a person within the degree of the deceased wife's sister is allowed to marry her brother-in-law, surely her daughter, being still further removed, ought to have the benefit of the same holy relation.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—When I read the opinions of different members on this subject I said the hon. gentlemen had only signed the document as alluding to the first, second, fourth and eighth reasons given in the protest. As to the criticism of the hon. gentleman from St. John, I am sorry I am not a good English scholar, and could not make myself clearly understood. I never said that I was completely against the principle of the Bill. On the contrary, I said that if this amendment were added I would support the Bill, for it is very awkward now in our Province as the law stands. A Roman Catholic bishop in our Province may refuse a dispensation to parties provided for by this Bill, and the man says: "Very well; we will get married somewhere else." All the same, that man is not married in the opinion of the church. Why should we not add a provision to the Bill that such parties may be married if they get a dispensation from the church to which they belong to permit them to marry.

HON. MR. DEVER—I am not aware that the Roman Catholic Church cares whether this Bill passes or not. As I understand it, the church holds that marriage is a sacrament, and this Bill, if it becomes law, will not make any difference in their opinion or in their practice.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

HON. MR. MILLER—I propose to move an amendment to the first clause. It now reads as follows:—

"1. All laws prohibiting marriage between a man and the daughter of his deceased wife's sister are hereby repealed, both as to past and future marriages, and as regards past marriages, as if such laws had never existed."

I move that the following be inserted after the word "sister" in the second line: "where no law relating to consanguinity is violated."

HON. MR. BELLEROSE — While the chairman is writing in the amendment I shall read, for the information of the House, a quotation from the Confederation Debates. In the course of the debate on this very question of marriage and divorce, Hon. Mr. Langevin is reported to have said:—

"Notwithstanding the advanced hour of the evening, I cannot pass over in silence another observation made by the hon. member, and I beg he will accord me his undivided attention at the present moment. The hon. gentleman has asked the Government what meaning was to be attached to the word 'marriage' where it occurred in the constitution. He desired to know whether the Government proposed to leave to the Central Government the right of deciding at what age, for example, marriage might be contracted. I will now answer the hon. gentleman as categorically as possible, for I am anxious to be understood, not only in this House, but also by all those who may hereafter read the report of our proceedings. And first of all I will prove that civil rights form part of those which, by Article 43 (paragraph 15) of the resolutions, are guaranteed to Lower Canada. This paragraph reads as follows:—

"'15. Property and civil rights, excepting those portions thereof assigned to the General Parliament.'

"Well, amongst these rights are all the civil laws of Lower Canada, and among these latter those which relate to marriage. Now, it was of the highest importance that it should be so under the proposed system, and therefore the members from Lower Canada at the Conference took great care to obtain the reservation to the Local Government of this important right, and in consenting to allow the word 'marriage' after the word 'divorce,' the delegates have not proposed to take away with one hand from the Local Legislature what they have reserved to it by the other. So that the word 'marriage' placed where it is among the powers of the Central Parliament has not the extended signification which was sought to be given to it by the hon. member. With the view of being more explicit, I now propose to read how the word marriage is proposed to be understood:—

"'The word marriage has been placed in the draft of the proposed constitution to invest the Federal Parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the Confederacy, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rights of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong.'

* * * * *

"The whole may be summed up as follows: The Central Parliament may decide that any marriage contracted in Upper Canada, or in any other of the confederated Provinces, in accordance with the laws of the country in which it was contracted, although the law might be different from ours, should be deemed valid in Lower Canada in case the parties should come to reside there, and vice versa."

So it was that the Canadian Government, under their pledge of honor, and even under their signature, made this provision, because we were anxious about it, and I was one of those who said that I would not vote for Confederation except steps were taken to protect us in those rights. Here was the Canadian Government at that time pledging its honor that the law relating to marriage as it existed at Confederation should continue with the Provinces, and Sir George Cartier said that when in England he would see that those rights were preserved. Yet we see how that compact has been violated, both by the Prime Minister of Canada and by his mouthpiece, the Minister of Justice, eight years ago, when he said: "We don't care about the Provinces; we care how we stand here." I do not know how such conduct would be characterised out of Parliament.

HON. MR. ALMON—I have no objection to the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Richmond, as it does not interfere with the spirit of the Bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

HON. MR. LEWIN, from the committee, reported the Bill, with an amendment.

The report was adopted.

HON. MR. ALMON moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

On the question, "Shall this Bill pass," the Senate divided:—

The Bill passed.

MANITOBA AND SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. GIRARD moved the second reading of Bill (90) "An Act to amend the Act incorporating the Manitoba and South-Eastern Railway Company." He said: This company obtained an Act of incorporation last year for the purpose of building a railway from Winnipeg to the south-eastern part of the Province. A portion of the work was done last summer, and we have reason to expect that the road will be constructed before long. This Bill is to make certain modifications in their charter, especially with a view to extending their line to a point near Lake of the Woods, where a great trade is expected to arise very soon.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGE CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. CLEMOW moved the adoption of the amendments made by the Select Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors to Bill (54) "An Act to incorporate the Interprovincial Bridge Company."

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. CLEMOW moved that the Bill be read a third time as amended.

HON. MR. POWER—I propose to move an amendment to this Bill. At the second reading I called attention to certain objections to this Bill, from what might be deemed an æsthetic point of view, that the construction of a bridge just at this particular point on the Ottawa River was, to use, perhaps, a rather stronger term than the occasion called for, an act of vandalism; that it was calculated to destroy the scenery in the immediate neighborhood of Parliament and to infringe upon the comparatively small space which had been reserved at the Capital for national purposes. There are certain other circumstances in connection with the Bill that, I think, deserve a little attention from the House. This is a Bill which, at any rate, from the point of view raised by the amendment which I propose to move, has not received much consideration. The objection which I have taken to the Bill was not raised at all in the other House nor in committee of the other House, and I was informed by a member of that committee that in his opinion the objection was one which ought to prevail. This scheme is, I think, new. I do not remember that it ever came before Parliament in any shape until the present Session, and it is perfectly clear that a high level bridge at the point indicated must interfere, not only with the scenery, but also with the use of Nepean Point and Major's Hill, and to a certain extent of Parliament Hill. After that bridge has been constructed and the lines of railway connected with it have been built Nepean Point will not be what it is now, and the probabilities are that Major's Hill will be, to a very considerable extent, taken up with lines of railway; and if at some future time it is deemed desirable to erect additional buildings in connection with the Parliament here—a thing which is very likely indeed—the construction of this work will probably interfere very seriously with the erection of these buildings, and I may venture to hope, by the way, that if the Government do see fit to erect any further buildings on the Government grounds here they will be structures more pleasing to the eye than the Printing Bureau, which is now anything but ornamental to Nepean Point. Then there is another practical objection to this scheme, that is, in its present form, which I think must strike hon. gentlemen. The plan which the hon. the promoter of the Bill says that he and his friends propose to adopt is to bring the railway lines up the valley beside the canal. Now, hon. gentlemen are aware that the Eastern Block is built within a few yards of the canal locks, and some of the most important offices of the Government are in the rear of the Eastern Block, and within probably thirty yards of the top of the slope leading down to the canal. Amongst those is the Privy Council office. Now that is a place where, above all others, members of the Government should be perfectly undisturbed in their deliberations. I can fancy, if this scheme goes into operation, that the deliberations of the Privy Council, at any season of the year, are liable to be interrupted at perhaps very critical times by the very unmusical noises which proceed from engines. I can imagine, perhaps, an eloquent sentence from either of the hon. gentlemen opposite interrupted by a very loud whistle from a locomotive. In warm weather, apart altogether from what is doing in the Council Room—and it is very warm, I believe, in the Privy Council Chamber at times—if the windows are opened, instead of getting in the balmy air of summer, hon. members will be liable to take in large quantities of smoke and cinders from the passing trains. Now, I think that the hon. gentlemen who represent the Government in this House ought, at any rate, to pause a little at the prospect which this Bill opens to them. I have already stated that the Government of Canada, in selecting Ottawa as the Capital, reserved too small a space for Government purposes—much less than the space reserved for the public buildings at Washington.

HON. MR. DEVER—When this bridge is built they will have the opportunity of going over to Hull.

HON. MR. POWER—We are in a certain sense trustees of this property for the Parliaments that are coming after us, and for the Governments that will succeed this one, and I think the Government will be guilty of a breach of trust in allowing this small piece of ground to be encroached on. For these reasons I move:

That the said Bill be now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out all the words from "Metcalfe," in line 28 of the first page, to "Ottawa," in line 30, both included, and inserting instead thereof the words following, that is to say: "Mackay street and Cathcart street."

The effect of that amendment would be to leave these promoters about half a mile on the river side, at any point of which they can locate the crossing of their bridge, and would simply exclude them from Nepean Point and the landing between the canal and Nepean Point. There is just one other remark which I may be allowed to make, that this is not the case of a number of people who have the money and who are anxious to construct a necessary work. Look at the list of corporators, some of whom have very little money and some of whom have only recently been in insolvency.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—Who are they?

HON. MR. POWER—The hon. gentleman is not one of them, and I do not think he wishes me to advertise that some one or two of them have been in that condition.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—I do not know one of them that has been.

HON. MR. POWER—I do not think that this is an undertaking which has any very special claim upon the consideration of the House. It is really, I imagine—I do not say it in an offensive sense at all—a charter which is got for the purpose of being disposed of to some one else.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is not in a position to move his amendment. He has given no notice of it. I never heard of this amendment before, and I am very much interested in this Bill. The hon. gentleman should have given notice of it on Friday last.

HON. MR. POWER—It is not necessary at all.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It is necessary. You cannot move an important amendment without a day's notice. I maintain there is no parliamentary law that after a private Bill has gone through all its stages and comes up for the third reading an important amendment can be moved without notice.

THE SPEAKER—It is laid down very clearly that no amendment can be made at the third reading of a private Bill without due notice.

HON. MR. POWER—As the amendment which I have moved is out of order, I propose to move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole House, for the purpose of being amended in the direction that I have indicated.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I take the same exception to that amendment.

THE SPEAKER—The amendment is clearly out of order.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I wish to reply to the remarks of the hon. member from Halifax.

HON. MR. POWER—My amendment being ruled out of order, I do not think the hon. gentleman is in order in speaking to it.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The Bill is before the House for the third reading, and on that motion I can certainly speak. One would suppose that the hon. member from Halifax did not know the locality where this bridge is to be erected, because the route which has been selected seems almost intended by nature for the purpose. My hon. friend says that this matter was not discussed in these points in the other House: certainly it was fully discussed in the committee of the Senate, and we had an engineer before us, who showed us the plans and profiles of it and proved that the bridge was to be constructed at the narrowest part of the river, as near the head of navigation as possible. It will not mar the landscape, but will pass along the face of the cliff, some 30 feet below the top of it, and skirt all the way up along the edge of the cliff to the level of the canal basin. But if the route recommended by my hon. friend were adopted the bridge would cross the river lower down, where it would certainly impede navigation, where it would cost more to construct it, and where, besides, it would have to cross several important thoroughfares in the city. By the route described in this Bill there is no interference with the navigation of the river; the bridge and the tracks leading to it will not interfere with Nepean Point or Major's Hill, but will skirt along the edge of the cliff below them and will not cross any street of the city. The route selected is the best that could be found, causing less inconvenience to the city and to everyone than any other that could be selected. There can be no annoyance from the smoke of the engines, because the line running in the valley between the two hills, the currents of air will be up and down the canal, and will carry the smoke and cinders out to the Ottawa River or up to the canal basin. The evidence submitted to the committee, as well as the personal knowledge which all of us have of the locality, show how little ground there is for the hon. gentleman's objections to this Bill.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—The hon. member from Halifax seems to take a paternal interest in this project. He has offered a persistent opposition to this bridge company, for what reason I do not know. He seems to ignore the fact that the City Council, who are the guardians of the city's interests, and the Government, who are alive to the interests of the country, are in favor of this Bill. The hon. gentleman may have some interest in the part of the city where this bridge is to be built. I am perfectly conversant with all the details of this matter, and am satisfied that the place selected is the only one where the bridge can be built to serve all purposes; and as far as the Government is concerned, you may depend upon it they will take all necessary precautions to protect their property. This bridge will be 30 or 40 feet below the level of Nepean Point or Major's Hill. I, for one, would oppose any project for the construction of a railway on the level of those grounds. It would have a very prejudicial effect on property in that locality, and as the owner of a considerable amount of property there I would most strongly object to the construction of any work which would have a tendency to impair its value. Instead of injuring the place, the bridge will beautify it. Nature has made that locality the best, and in fact the only route from Hull to the heart of the city, and it is the best in the interest of all parties. We know that a charter for the construction of a bridge at that very place has been in existence for the last three years, yet the hon. gentleman from Halifax has never shown such a paternal interest in the matter hitherto. If the House could have seen the plans and heard the evidence submitted to the committee they would have been convinced, as we are, that no other place is so conveniently situated for this bridge as the one that has been selected. If the route which the hon. gentleman from Halifax proposes were adopted the railway tracks would cross no less than nine streets of the city, some of them very important thoroughfares. It would increase the distance and make the work far more expensive—in fact, it would prevent the construction of the bridge. If he had been prepared with plans and evidence to show that any other route would have been as good as the one that has been chosen I would have given the alternative proposition very careful consideration; but I know that it is impracticable to construct the bridge and line anywhere else but just where it is located. The only other place that could be thought of is at Rockliffe, two or three miles below the city; but it was found, after a careful examination, that the cost of constructing a bridge at that point would be enormous, and it was abandoned. It is highly important to this city and to the surrounding country that this bridge should be constructed. This company is no sham, as the hon. gentleman represents it to be. He says that some of the corporators are insolvent. I should like to know who they are. I know that some of them have a very large stake in the city, and I do not know one of them who could be said to be insolvent at the present time. It is very unfair for the hon. gentleman to throw out insinuations of that kind. I know that this bridge will be built without delay if it is possible to construct it. We are promised aid from the Ontario and Quebec Governments, from the city and from other sources, and I believe that the bridge will be constructed in a very short time. It is highly important that this Bill should pass now, in order that we may get aid from the Ontario Government. If this Bill had been allowed to pass without the amendment which was made the other day a delegation would have proceeded to Toronto and received a considerable amount of assistance for the purpose of proceeding with the work. Every one in this section of the country appreciates the importance of this undertaking, and I am only sorry that the hon. member for Halifax did not consult the legal men of the city before opposing the Bill. Had he done so he would not have taken such a hostile position to the project as he has done from the start. He must think that the people of Ottawa do not understand what is in their own interest. We certainly do not want to impair the beauty of the scenery or in any way to interfere with the magnificent view to be had from Parliament Hill. I would be the last man in the world to advocate anything of the kind, and I hope that the hon. gentleman will consent to the passage of the Bill. I am sure that when the bridge is constructed he will agree with us that nature made the route which has been selected the only one in the locality for the bridge within the limits of the city.

HON. MR. POWER—The hon. gentleman seems to be under the impression that I have a desire to thwart him in some way.

Now, there is no gentleman that I would rather oblige than the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, but I have my own opinion about the desirability of this bridge, and I have a right to express it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

SECOND READINGS

Bill (58) "An Act respecting the Brantford, Waterloo and Lake Erie Railway Company." (Mr. McCallum.)

Bill (99) "An Act to incorporate the Owen Sound and Lake Huron Railway Company." (Mr. McKindsey.)

The Senate adjourned at 5:15 p. m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 18th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

GAELIC LANGUAGE BILL.

SECOND READING DEFEATED.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill (P) "An Act to provide for the use of the Gaelic Language in Official Proceedings." He said: By reference to the Dominion census of 1881, I find that the entire population of the Dominion was 4,324,810. The principal portion of the population was composed of:

French origin	1,298,929
Germans and German origin	254,319
English	881,301
Irish	957,403
Scotch	699,863

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Is that high Scotch or Low Scotch?

HON. MR. DEVER—Low, of course.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I may say, before proceeding any further, that those hon. gentlemen who are inclined to treat this Bill with levity will reflect a great deal of credit on themselves and on the House of which they are members if they reserve their irrelevant remarks until after I get through with mine. They are then open to make any remarks they see fit, and I shall have great pleasure in listening to them, without attempting to interrupt them.

As the Highland Scotch and the Irish Celts are only different members of the Celtic family, I should class them as one. Combined, the two number 1,657,266, or nearly 400,000 more than the French element in the Dominion of Canada.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Why do you not include the Irish in your Bill?

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—I beg of the hon. gentleman not to interrupt me. It is well known that nearly three-fourths of the population of Ireland are Celts.

HON. MR. DEVER—No; Phœnicians.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—Nearly three-fourths of the population of Ireland are Celts, and the emigration of Celts from Ireland far exceeded those of Scotch origin in the north of Ireland. Of the nearly one million, in round numbers, of Irish who came to this Dominion, over two-thirds were Celts. A vast majority of the Scotch who came in early days to British North America were not Lowland Scotch, but Highland Scotch. They were the people who were principally instrumental in adding this great Dominion to the British possessions. They settled here, two or three for every Lowland Scotchman; consequently I claim that of the 700,000 Scotch (speaking in round numbers) that we have in the Dominion of Canada, nearly two-thirds of them are also of Celtic origin, showing that we have over one million of Irish and Scotch Celts in the Dominion to-day.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—Do they understand Gaelic?

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—Since the hon. gentleman has asked the question, I will say they do not, and I am sorry that they do not. I am rather surprised at the hon. gentleman who has asked the question, for I find that in the very Province from which he comes the majority of the people are either Irish Celts or Scotch Celts, and there are many settlements in that snug little island by the sea where they speak the Celtic in their homes, in their families; they use it at the family altar; they use it in their churches, and it is the only true way by which they can offer up their supplications to the Heavenly Throne. A large percentage of the priests and ministers of Cape Breton Island are Celts and speak the Gaelic, and all the rites of their church are conferred, as all the services are conducted, in that language, in many of the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian churches. In Cape Breton, where of the 100,000 of the population, I think I am within the mark when I say that at least three-fourths speak the Gaelic language, and to my personal knowledge I can go into settlements there composed of thousands of people where scarcely any other language is used but the Gaelic. Taking the Dominion as a whole, as far as I could possibly analyse the census, and from my own personal experience from the Straits of Canso to Nootka Sound, at the lowest estimation we have at least one-quarter of a million of people who speak the Gaelic as their everyday language.

HON. MR. MILLER—You do not include Cape Breton, then?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I do.

HON. MR. MILLER—But you said from the Straits of Canso?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I know that the hon. gentleman represents that part of the Lower Provinces, and I would not deprive him of the honor of speaking for his Island. But irrespective of the Irish Celts who, I believe, number nearly as many as the Scotch, there are certainly from 200,000 to 250,000 Celts who speak the Irish language in their families and transact most of their business in their mother tongue.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Where are the Welsh?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—There are very few of that branch of the Celtic family in this country, and I am only sorry that a greater number of them are not among us, for a more thrifty, honest, industrious people we have not in the Dominion. They are something like the people from whom the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg has descended—a most desirable class of immigration to be attracted to our shores. The reason I couple the Irish Celt and the Scotch Celt together is because they are the same people—different families of the same race. They speak the same language, and I appeal to my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. O'Donohoe) if he and I cannot converse in Gaelic, and understand each other very much better than people from Cumberland and Northumberland, and counties in the south of England, can understand each other? There is nothing like the same difference between the Irish and Gaelic, that there is between the English spoken by people from the north and south of England; consequently, if this Bill becomes law, as I have no doubt it will, I do not see why it cannot serve every purpose for the Irish as well as the Scotch.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Why not include Welsh also?

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—I cannot include the Welsh, because in the course of centuries they have made such changes in their language that it is no longer the language of Scotland and Ireland, and they could not be included in the provisions of this Bill.

HON. MR. GLAZIER—Get them another Bill.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—A few days ago we had a most eloquent and interesting speech from the gifted member from Calgary with respect to emigration to the North-West Territories. During that speech he informed us, amongst other things, that within the last two years seventy-nine families of Scotch crofters had settled in the North-West, representing, I presume, if they are like the ordinary Scotch and French families, five members to a family, which would give a total of four or five hundred souls. Since that time I had a conversation with the hon. gentleman, and I do not think that I am revealing any secret by saying he informed me that they required to have two interpreters. They are all Highland Scotch, speaking nothing but Gaelic. They are in two different settlements, about 50 or 60 miles apart; each settlement has an interpreter, and I presume that the interpreters are employed by the Dominion Government and are Government officials, so that that in itself will show the necessity for the Bill that is now under consideration. I shall now call attention to the special census of the North-West Territories taken in 1885. I find from it that there is a great discrepancy between the populations as given in 1881 and as given in 1885. In the census taken in 1881 the population of the North-West Territory is given at 56,446, composed of 2,896 Frenchmen, 21 Germans, 1,374 English, 218 Irish and 1,217 Scotch. By reference to the census of 1885, only four years afterwards, I find that there was only 48,362 of a population in the North-West Territory, or over 8,000 less four years after the Dominion census was taken in 1881. Instead of having 2,896 Frenchmen in 1885, it only gave us 1,520; instead of 21 Germans, as we had in 1881, I find that there were 427 in 1885; instead of having only 1,374 English, as in 1881, they had 8,397 in 1885; and the Irish increased from 218 to 5,285, and the Scotch from 1,217 to 6,788.

HON. MR. ALMON—Good for the Scotch.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Hon. gentlemen will see, perhaps, the application of these figures a little later on. The census gave us the population of the French Half-breeds as being 3,387, and that of the Scotch Half-breeds as being 742. Even adding the French Half-breeds and the French together, they scarcely number 5,000, while adding the Scotch Half-breeds and the Scotch there it gives over 8,000, or 3,000 Scotch and Scotch Half-breeds more than French and French Half-breeds.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—How many of a population does my hon. friend give to the North-West in 1881?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Fifty-six thousand four hundred and forty-six.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—If all the elements of this population have increased up to 1885, I do not understand how my hon. friend makes out there was a decrease in the whole population.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Decreased?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend has stated that there was an increase in English, Scotch, German and Irish in those four years, and yet he says there were fewer people there in 1885 than there were in 1881.

HON. MR. WARK—Were the Indians included in both?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I am much obliged to my hon. friend from Fredericton. There were 20,170 of that population who were Indians.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—How many Indians were there in 1885.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not look them up, but I suppose they were about the same as in 1881. I do not think they are increasing, but if the hon. gentleman has any doubt about the figures I have quoted I hope he will send a messenger for the Census of 1881, and there he will see the figures for himself. I am not trying by any means to distort figures or to mislead the House. I have given them as they appeared in the Census of 1881 and 1885, which I hold in my hand. There is another point to which I shall call the attention of the House. After analyzing the different constituencies of which this Dominion is composed, I find that the Highland Scotch have the absolute control of fourteen counties in the Dominion, and that they hold the balance of power in sixteen more. In thirty counties they have either absolute control or they have the controlling voice, which counties are represented by no less than thirty-five members in the House of Commons. If no other reason was advanced, I think that that in itself would be quite sufficient to induce the Government to accept this Bill, and that it should become law before another general election takes place. Since I introduced this Bill, a few weeks ago, I have received dozens of letters and addresses, many of which are exceedingly interesting and instructive, and I am only sorry that I have not sufficient time to read them to this House. However, as I wish to get through as quickly as possible, with any degree of justice to the importance of the measure that I have in hand, I shall only ask your permission to read one of them, from the Gaelic Society of the County of Bruce, Ontario. As a matter of course, according to the eternal fitness of things, it is in Gaelic, and is as follows.—

HON. MR. POIRIER—Would my hon. friend read that in French, as I could not understand it in the language in which it was written?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I am exceedingly sorry that I cannot read or speak French as well as I can read Gaelic, but I will do the next best thing—I will read it in a language with which every hon. gentleman who hears me is familiar, and which will enable him to appreciate, as far as a translation can express the ideas contained in the address, the views entertained by the Highlanders in this country on the subject of this Bill:—

"McKAY SETTLEMENT.

"COUNTY BRUCE, ONTARIO,
"27th Feb., 1890.

"At our monthly meeting the following address was unanimously adopted.

"The HON. T. R. MCINNES, OTTAWA:

"KIND FRIEND,—Your countrymen throughout the land feel highly complimented and truly happy to know that they have, as the old proverb has it, 'a friend at court pleading their rights and claims.' And although, as a society, we do not ask nor believe that more than one language should be maintained at the public expense, yet, if more than one is to be so maintained, we submit that the Gaelic should not be left behind. We need not remind you that there are thousands of Scotch people in this land, loyal to their country and the Crown, who, although their language is neither fostered nor used in Parliamentary discussions, have never occasioned troubles nor wrangles. And in the North-West part of the country, thousands of immigrants from Scotland, and especially from the islands of Scotland, settle there every year, who understand little of any other language but the Gaelic they learnt from their mothers in the Land of the Hills. And we repeat that if more than one language is to be used in the courts and Parliament, what language is more entitled to that right than that of the valiant braves who stood shoulder to shoulder on the Plains of Abraham, their pipers playing the chivalric airs of Scotland, and their great swords glistening in the sun of the early morning of the day the country was won to the British Crown.

"Hoping you will stand faithful and manly in favor of the language in which we have been early nursed, that the public may see that although early removed from the Land of the Hills, we are not forgetting our language nor our native country.

"On behalf of the meeting,
"(Sd.) JAMES JOHNSTON, Chairman,
"E. ALEXANDER, Treasurer,
"E. McDONELL, Secretary."

That is a fair specimen of the letters and addresses that I have received from various parts of the Dominion, from Cape Breton to Vancouver. Now, referring for a moment to the North-West, if the French language is to be maintained there as an an official language—there is equally good reason—in fact, a better reason for a similar recognition of Gaelic. I am not one of those who object to the perpetuation of the French language in this Parliament, providing Gaelic is put on the same footing. Every right and privilege accorded to the French Canadian people when they came under the British Crown should be most scrupulously guarded, and the minority should be treated in the most liberal spirit; there is no great nation, excepting the United States, that has not, at some period of its existence, but had two or more languages recognized officially, and many of those nations occupied countries insignificant in extent compared with the enormous area of this Dominion, which is equal almost to the entire continent of Europe. And if small countries, such as Switzerland and Belgium, can afford to have two or three official languages, surely this Dominion, that is putting forth such great efforts to attract desirable immigration to fill up our waste lands, should offer every encouragement that may be necessary to accomplish that object. If it should be necessary to have three or four official languages let us have them. What would the cost amount to? According to a statement made in the other House in the debate on the dual language Bill, the cost of printing French documents in the North-West amounts to only $400 a year. Why, a few families—a few dozen immigrants—would cost the country that much to settle them in our North-West, and then there would be a grave doubt in the minds of the public whether they would become permanent settlers even after that expenditure. You who speak the English language have no idea what it is to find oneself in a foreign land, comparatively helpless and unable to converse with the people. A few hundred dollars could not be better spent than in making Gaelic an official language, so as to attract to this country a most desirable class of people. Some hon. gentlemen have expressed surprise at the Bill before the House. They refuse to treat it seriously—and yet, apparently, they find nothing surprising in the proposal to establish French as an official language in our North West—or the still more liberal proposition of the right hon. the Premier of Canada, to make German, under certain conditions, official in that country. Let me here read to the House what the right hon. gentleman said in his speech on the dual language question a few weeks ago, when imploring the members of the Commons—irrespective of party—to defeat the McCarthy Bill, and to continue the official use of the French language in the North-West Territories. At page 800 of the Commons Hansard he is reported as saying:

"There is scarcely any French spoken in the North-West. There are a few French Canadians there, and a scattered population of French Half-breeds, and the whole effect of this Bill (the McCarthy Bill) would be to deprive these poor people of reading or knowing the laws to which they are subject."

Again, at page 802, still speaking of the North-West, we find him making the following important declaration:

"After the population comes in there, if there is a large German population—and I should be very glad to see it—who shall take possession of a large quarter of that area, why not give them the right to use the German language? They would insist upon using the German language. If the French Canadian settlement, which was commenced under rather unfavorable auspices at Edmonton, should increase and grow so that they would become a French Canadian Province, they would insist upon having their language."

Again, at page 799, the veteran chieftain of the Clan Macdonald, as he becomes inspired with the great importance of the subject, and, notwithstanding his great age, his warm Celtic blood coursing more freely in his veins, he makes the following pathetic and significant declaration, which we must accept as the policy of the Government of which he is head, anent official languages in Canada, remarks:

"The reason why I oppose the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) to-day is the same—because that Bill, a small Bill; I might almost call it an insignificant Bill in its enacting clause—is based on the purpose of doing away with the French language, of discarding the French language, at all events, and depriving the French Canadian people of the solace of the language they learned at the feet of their mothers. Why, Mr. Speaker, if there is one act of oppression more than another which would come home to a man's breast it is that he should be deprived of the consolation of hearing and using and reading the language that his mother taught him. It is cruel. It is seething the kid in his mother's milk."

Such was the declaration, yea the oracle of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government of this country, on the 17th ult. The policy laid down is plain and unmistakeable, that when the German element increases in the North-West the German language is to be made official; that although there are only a few French Canadians and French Half-breeds in the North-West, French must be retained as an official language. That it would be wicked to deprive these poor people of the privilege of reading or knowing the laws to which they are subject. That there is scarcely any French spoken in the North-West. That if there is one act of oppression more than another which would come home to a man's breast it is to deprive him of the consolation of hearing, using and reading the language that his mother taught him. He exclaims: "It is cruel—it is seething the kid in his mother's milk." Surely, after such earnest and pathetic pleading—such consuming solicitude and regard, such outpouring of sympathy for the welfare of our French and German fellow-citizens, over whom he exercises such fatherly influence, care and protection, he cannot with any degree of consistency do less than grant equal rights and privileges to his own countrymen—the Highlanders, the Britons—the true Britons—and their immediate descendants, to whom so much of the greatness of England is due, and also to the undeniable fact that to the untiring energy and matchless valor of the Scotch Highlanders—ably assisted by their brethren from the Emerald Isle—Canada is to-day and has been for over a century an integral part of the British Empire. Who dares to say, or even insinuate, that the head of the loyal Clan Macdonald (Sir John), and every clansman throughout, not only the Dominion and the British Empire, but throughout the world, has not at least as great regard and sacred love for the language they first lisped on their sainted mothers' knees as the English, the French, the German, or any other people? To think or say the reverse would be a gross libel on the most affectionate and warm-hearted people that ever lived. Any contrary contention would only display an unpardonable amount of ignorance of the true character of clansmen. The Scottish Celt, in whatever quarter of the globe you find him—and he is generally to be found in every nook and corner of it—loves his mother-tongue, loves his country, loves her glorious history and traditions, with a more intense and enduring affection than any people of whom I have any knowledge, with one exception—the Irish Celt. The manly sons and womanly daughters of Scotland's high and heathered hills, as they bid farewell to their beloved country, are always moved with the deepest emotions, and they often sing in mournful tones:

"Tho' far frae thee my native shore,
An' tossed on life's tempestuous ocean;
My heart aye Scottish to the core Shall cling to thee with warm devotion."

Yet in the same notes they give expression to a still deeper and more patriotic feeling in:

"Farewell, farewell my native hame,
Thy lonely glens, an' heath-clad mountains,
Farewell thy fields o' storied fame,
Thy leafy shaws an' sparkling fountains.
Nae mair I'll climb thy mountains steep
Nor wander by the rapid river,
I seek a hame far o'er the deep,
My native land, farewell forever."

To the matchless valor of the Scotch and Irish soldiers the British arms have been victorious in every clime and in every country where honor and duty called them, until to-day the Union Jack proudly floats over one-sixth of the earth's area and over one-fourth of the world's population. In extending the possessions of Britain and furthering her interests I know of no land which has not been consecrated by their precious blood—I honestly, justly and conscientiously claim and believe that principally through the dauntless bravery of the "Chlaun nan Gaidheal" Britain has become the great and glorious nation that she is, and has been for so many centuries—in the vanguard of nations, as the great disseminators of light, of liberty and of civilization, and all the blessings that follow in their wake. Through the prowess of Scotia's kilted veterans and Erin's warlike sons the northern half of this continent was wrested from a foreign power and added to the British possessions. In that mortal struggle were engaged two of the most valiant races that the world ever produced. In mortal combat they met on the historical Plains of Abraham to decide the destiny of half a continent nearly equal in area to the whole of Europe. At the word of command the stalwart Highlanders and the gallant Frenchmen rushed on to death and glory. The bloody struggle, though brief, was decisive, and many were the acts of heroism performed, which added fresh lustre to the arms of the contending nations. The god of war, however, smiled on the kilted sons of the heathered hills. A great battle was fought, an important victory was won. Canada became British, and has remained so ever since. I submit, therefore, that to the "Chlaun nan Gaidheal" and to them alone are we indebted for the fact that Canada is British to-day. Who were the first permanent settlers in our great North-West? The brave and hardy Highlanders, under the guidance and supervision of the good Lord Selkirk, who, as early as 1811, took possession of that country. Among that noble band was the good and brave father of our respected colleague from Kildonan (Mr. Sutherland). Who to-day are exploring what remains of the North-West terra incognita, who are continually advancing the outposts of civilization further, and yet further, into those great plains that stretch beyond the Arctic circle? The intrepid Highlanders of Hudson's Bay. I have no desire to decry the French; such an idea is foreign to me; I gladly acknowledge the invaluable services rendered by them as the explorers and pioneers of Canada, but I contend that no class of Canadians should be favored above another, and that if the French of the North-West, or of the Dominion as a whole, be allowed to use and have their language used officially, the Highlanders of Canada should have equal courtesy shown to their beloved Celtic language. It is objected that if we establish the official use of Gaelic there can be no reason why German, Italian, Chinese—what you will—should not be used officially, and so all order and unity in our Parliament, our Legislatures and legal tribunals would be lost in polyglot confusion. On the face of it, I admit, this objection is plausible enough; but examine it for a moment, and you will find that it is founded on an utter misapprehension. The difference between the official use of Gaelic, and, let me say, of German or Italian, is as wide as the difference between what is essential and what is non-essential. Let me explain: The great bulk of the inhabitants of Canada are directly, or by descent, Scotch, Irish, French and English. The foreign element of our population is very small, consisting principally of German, Italians and Swedes. These people, though foreign, are not under disadvantage on that account; for Canada stands with open armed welcome for all who come with honest purpose to her shores, but they must come subject to her institutions, laws and languages. But who dare say that the Highlanders of Canada are a foreign element? Are they not an essential—I might almost say the essential element of our people? Hon. gentlemen may smile as much as they please. I say it is so, and the statement cannot be disproved. From the day (or rather the night) when they clambered up the rocky heights of Quebec, to this hour, when Clan Macdonald has brought forth a chieftan to rule the Dominion, a man whose matchless abilities as leader can force admiration even from his bitterest opponents, the Highlanders have been a leading element in the population of the country. Take again the ex-Premier, of the Clan Mackenzie—a man of marvellous ability, a man whose every act and word during a long, active and honorable public career has been ineffaceably stamped with the purest patriotism, and whose many good and wise acts and sayings will be emulated by future generations. Highlanders are an essential element, and have and will continue to exert a powerful influence for good, no matter what restrictions or disabilities they may labor under. They will surmount them all. Go over the long list of our brightest names, and see how many belong to the clans. On the Atlantic side, the name Nova Scotia speaks for itself, and on the Pacific slope the original name of the Province that I have the honor to represent was New Caledonia. The name suggests whose footsteps first passed over the rugged heights, through the torrent-washed cañons and into the dark and shaggy forests of that new land, to open a way for the world to the wealth of its rich mines, its vast forests and its exhaustless fisheries. I will not speak of the past history of those whose native tongue was Gaelic. I will not speak of the bards who have made it glorious, or the heroes whose dying words have made it sacred. You who have not lisped it first at a mother's knee—you who have not felt it lend itself to the whisperings of love and to the moanings of sorrow, to the curses of anger and the beseechings of prayer—you cannot understand the feeling with which every Highlander regards his native tongue. You are not Celts. On Britain's bloodiest battlefields, wherever her valor has been put to the severest test, above the clashing of arms and the roaring of guns, have been heard the wild chanting of the Pibroch and the Gaelic cheers of the charging Highlanders—"Gula ri Guala." Notwithstanding that that language was taught in the royal household to the royal family—that Gaelic chairs are endowed in the universities of Edinburgh, Oxford and Berlin (blessings brighten as they take their flight), I am fully conscious of the fact that it is passing away. I regret exceedingly that the most forcible and expressive of all languages is falling into disuse, and being replaced by the great commercial language of the world. You need not fear that in recognizing Gaelic you are prolonging its life. You will not do that, for the trend of events points inevitably to one language and one nation; but you will be showing what is deserved—and what will be appreciated as much as it is deserved—gratitude to the Highlanders for the great part they have taken in the upbuilding of our nation. Neither the French nor the Gaelic language will ever gain ascendency in the Dominion—of that we may be sure. They are passing away. They must eventually disappear: but till they do, let us recognize them. We owe it as a tribute of respect to those whose mother tongues they are. Let us not forget that it was the French that made Canada worth taking, and that it was the Highlanders who took it, and together they were the pioneers of the civilization that followed in their wake. Such toleration and friendliness, far from delaying the day when the broils of party creed and races, that now unfortunately distract the nascent nation will be over—will rather hasten it, and when that glorious day comes, and we gaze upon Canada, the youngest and fairest of nations, free, united and at peace, then shall Highland bonnets leap high in the air, and from the wild Atlantic coast to the far Pacific shores shall Highland voices hail her with the glad refrain—"Cead Mille Failthe." Now, in view of all that I have stated—in view of those undeniable facts that I have submitted to the House—I appeal to every English member of this Senate who has any gratitude, and I know that you are all possessed of more or less gratitude, to do this simple act of justice to the Highland Scotch that have made Great Britain a great empire, and have added so much to her prestige during the past centuries! I appeal to you to support this Bill, and not to relax your efforts in supporting it until it becomes the law of the land. I appeal to every French gentleman in this House, in view of the generous treatment that has been accorded to them since they have transferred their allegiance from France to Great Britain; I appeal to them to extend the same courtesy, the same rights and the same privileges that they hold so dear to themselves, to the Highland Scotch of Canada! It would only be in keeping with their frank, generous and kind-hearted nature in other things, and I appeal to my French friends confidently to support the measure that is before the House! To my Irish colleagues, I need scarcely say that I expect there will not be a dissentient voice amongst you—that you will support to a man a language that is as dear to you as it is to the Scotch. It cannot be denied us on the score of economy; it can be denied to us merely because it will cost an extra few hundred dollars each year. It is our right, and if we stand true to ourselves I have not the slightest doubt in the world but that we will get it, if you lend your support to the Bill before the House. Now, to my fellow countrymen—and allow me to say that I have analyzed the representation in this House and in the House of Commons, and find that there are ten Highland Scotch representatives in the Senate that can speak more or less Gaelic; we have eight Irishmen that can speak more or less Gaelic, besides others that are of Celtic origin, making in all over twenty members of this House who are Scotch and Irish Celts, and thirty-two members in the Commons who speak Gaelic and Erse to some extent. In appealing to my own countrymen let me remind you that this is the only opportunity that has been offered us to show our love for our mother tongue in this connection, and I believe that Highland Scotchmen, and people of other nationalities who have been improved by Highland Scotch blood in their veins, will stand up truly and manfully in upholding their rights in connection with their language. I believe that those who do not will bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every Scotchman from Cape Breton to Vancouver, and will be branded as unworthy descendants of a noble, a generous and an honorable race. I therefore expect that there will not be a dissentient voice amongst the Highland Scotch representatives in this House. Now one word to the hon. gentleman that leads the Senate. The policy of the right hon. gentleman that leads the other House (Sir John A. Macdonald) was laid down in a most unmistakable manner in pleading for the defeat of the McCarthy Bill and the continuation of the French language in the North-West. He lays it down plainly that we are to have more than two languages under certain circumstances, and if the hon. leader of this House is in accord with his chieftain he cannot do less than carry out the policy there defined by the Premier, and not only vote for this Bill, but use all his influence and not relax his efforts until it becomes law. Perhaps it would not be out of place now to address the House in the language of Divine origin:

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I have always contended that Gaelic was the language of poetry, but after the poetry the hon. gentleman has given us to-day I am sure we had better be preserved from anything of the kind in this House. I am sure we would not like to indulge in Gaelic as an official language. I do not know how to treat this matter—as a joke, or how. I cannot say anything seriously about it, for it is evidently a joke. On my hon. friend's own admission it would be a piece of cruelty to a language that is struggling for existence in a hopeless way to assist it to continue its struggles, when the hon. gentleman admits that it is going out. We know that English is to be the dominant language on this continent. The hon. gentleman grew pathetic when he spoke about listening to the Gaelic language at his mother's knee. I believe that I listened to the German language on my mother's knee, but the Germans in our county found that we were behind the age as long as we continued to adhere to our mother tongue. It is only about twenty years ago since German was excluded from our public schools, and it is from that date the county of Lunenburg has taken the strides forward that it has. The Germans found that so long as they retained their native language, when they went out of the county they could not transact business, because they could not be understood, and were laughed at.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B. C.)—Why are the French who cannot speak English not laughed at?

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman's speech was very fine, and it has pleased us all, but I don't suppose any of us want Gaelic as an official language. He speaks of some thirty-two members of the Legislature as representing Scotch Highlanders, but I ask him how many of those members are there who cannot speak the English language? They all speak English, and they speak the English language better than they do Gaelic. I ask my hon. friend if he were entering into a debate in philosophy, science or art, where would he be with his Gaelic? I don't think the hon. gentleman himself, if he undertook to discuss a problem in Euclid or mathematics, would find the Gaelic language of any service to him. I am afraid that in almost any department of business in this country his language would be entirely useless—even in the part of the country from where these people come Gaelic is not used as an official language, and is it reasonable that privileges should be asked for Highland Scotchmen in this House that are not asked for in their own country? No doubt, Scotchmen try to make themselves at home, and add to the wealth and prosperity of any country in which they settle; but I defy the hon. gentleman to show that in any part of the world Scotchmen have demanded that Gaelic shall be made an official language. I do not know of more than one or two members of this House who would undertake to read Gaelic, and if it were made an official language, and made compulsory in the records and journals of this House——

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Does the hon. gentleman say that I wish to make it compulsory in this House?

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I so understood the hon. gentleman.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. If his law is not better than his understanding, it is not worth much.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman's own Bill provides that Gaelic "shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses."

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes; in the records of the House.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Even then it would be a dead language, as our judges could not be expected to have to learn it. It would be absurd to require that the judges of this country should learn Gaelic to be able to understand the official documents. My hon. friend has spoken in Gaelic, and no doubt it was very fine. I tried at one time to learn Gaelic myself, and undertook to speak it in my own county, but nobody could understand me, and they opened their eyes in astonishment when I undertook to speak it.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—You could not get Gaelic into a Dutchman's head. The want was in the pupil, and not in the teacher or the language.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—In the north of Scotland, where Gaelic is used, I found the Scotch indulging very much in legends and fables and fairy tales and witch stories. They were great believers in all those things, and that is what the language seems specially adapted for.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the Highland Scotch believe more in legends and fairy tales that the Greeks and Romans? Yet I have no doubt he has spent many a long year trying to learn the languages of these people.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I dare say; but in the northern part of Scotland I find these people were great believers in witches and fairies, and legends of all kinds, and their language seemed more adapted to expressing the ideas of the people in these matters than anything else. As I said before, it would be a cruelty to the Scotchmen themselves to attempt to perpetuate a language which my hon. friend admits is in its death struggle.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not say anything of the sort. I never used such language.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I took it down myself.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I never made use of such an expression.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I will say nothing more about it. The flights of oratory that my hon. friend indulged in were very fine, but I am sure he did not convince the House. But he trenched upon the time of the House, that should have been occupied by the practical business before us. We are not here to perpetrate practical jokes. We are here to do the business of the country, and we should do it as it is sent down to us. If my hon. friend were to secure the passage of his Bill it would be followed by others of a similar character, and we would soon have confusion of tongues. According to my hon. friend's theory, every person who came here, no matter where he came from, would be entitled to the same rights as Scotchmen. I am sure the Germans do not want any such privilege. Even the Scotchmen themselves do not want it. My hon. friend does not produce a single petition from any part of the country asking for such a Bill. In Nova Scotia, which is largely settled by Scotchmen, and in Cape Breton, the language was never made official, and even in England and Scotland they do not want it. I certainly deprecate anything that would have a tendency to extend plurality of languages. I believe even the French in Parliament speak more in English than they do in their own language. They can speak fluently and well, and with force, and I hope the day is not far distant when the English language will be the language of the continent.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend gave some figures to the House which I fear may be subject to misinterpretation. I understood him to quote them as showing that the population of the North-West Territories from 1881 to 1885 had diminished—that is to say, the civilized population—while in reality the two censuses which he quoted show that the civilized population of the Territories in 1881 was 6,976, and the civilized population of the Territories in 1885—which was one year before the opening through of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which gave facilities for reaching that country, was 28,192, or more than four times the number of the civilized population in 1881.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not make use of the word civilized or uncivilized. I gave the total population.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am quite aware of that, but the figures were so quoted as to show, to my mind, and possibly to the minds of other people, that the population we would recognize as a useful population of the North-West Territories had decreased in the last four years, while the figures show it had actually quadrupled. Now, with reference to this measure which my hon. friend has introduced, I must, out of courtesy to him, assume that he is advocating this proceeding seriously—that he seriously intends or desires that we should publish our proceedings in three languages instead of two—that we should triplicate our officials in the way which would be required for that purpose, and that he contemplates an innumerable number of inconveniences, which would necessarily follow the adoption of any such measure as he proposes to the House. I say I am bound to assume that the hon. gentleman seriously desires that his proposition shall be carried. I, of course, may be permitted to form my own opinion as to the soundness of his judgment in that respect, and I shall say more about that: but without imputing to my hon. friend any such intention, this Bill appears to me like a sort of far-fetched joke, framed for the purpose of casting ridicule on——

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman is assuming things that he or no other person in this House, or outside of this House, has any right to assume.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am sorry for that.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—It does not matter whether the hon. gentleman is sorry or not; all he has to do is to deal with the Bill, and with the Bill alone, and with the principle of the Bill.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—What is the point of order?

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman is out of order in imputing motives that I am insincere, and I ask for the ruling of the Speaker, because it has been suggested once before by the gentleman from Prince Edward Island, and I think that ought to be quite enough. If there is nothing in the principle of the Bill for the hon. gentleman to oppose, it is not fair to impute motives.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am afraid that my hon. friend is not as familiar with the English language as he is with the Gaelic, otherwise he would not accuse me of imputing any motive to him at all. I assume him to be sincere in his desire to have this Bill become law—I assumed that. Then I stated what the Bill does appear to me to be. I did not say that my hon. friend intended it to be so. It appeared to me, from his language, or purported to be, a far-fetched practical joke, intended to cast ridicule——

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—It is the language of section 133 of the British North America Act.

HON. MR. ABBOTT — Calculated to throw ridicule upon the just pretensions of our fellow citizens of French origin to have their language recognized in our courts and in our Parliaments, as we do recognize it, and as I hope we shall continue to recognize it. That is the aspect which the Bill presents to my mind, and I do not propose to discuss it. I do not think there is any other man in the House who will imperil his reputation and position as a statesman and a public man by voting for it, and I hope that we may be allowed to proceed with the serious business of the House, and that the House will vote down the second reading of this Bill.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I do not intend to discuss the Bill, but I wish to call the attention of the House to the position we are in if we vote for this measure. In the British North America Act there is a section which provides for a dual language, and I contend that we have no power to legislate on this subject, as to the public records, until we get an alteration of the British North America Act.

HON. MR. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman read the section?

HON. MR. DICKEY—Section 133 of that Act, which my hon. friend says is almost in identically the same words as his Bill, provides:

"Either the English or the French language may be used by an person in the debates in the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and of the House of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process, in or issuing from any court in Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec."

Now, here is a distinct provision as to the languages which shall be used in our official proceedings; yet my hon. friend proposes that another language shall be added. How can he do that, unless he has power from the source which gave us this Act? How can he alter any section of this Act to add another language? He says he proposes to add two, and he hopes eventually four. Why not half a dozen? Why not have Spanish, German and Irish, which, although a cognate language, is not the identical language spoken of here; but it has this recommendation, at all events—for my hon. friend rests his argument on figures—it is the language of 300,000 more of Irish than of Scotch.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—It is the same thing.

HON. MR. DICKEY (B.C.)—We are asked to alter that section, and to say that three or four more languages shall be used in addition to those which the Act provides shall be used. It is unconstitutional, and I therefore say that this is a Bill which we have no power to pass in this Parliament.

HON. MR. POWER — Whatever objection there may be to the Bill of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia, I do not think it is open to the one which is raised by the hon. gentleman from Amherst. The British North America Act says that the French and English languages may be used by any person in the debates in the Federal Parliament and in the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, but that Act does not limit the power of the Canadian Parliament to making official as many languages as it pleases. It does not control our powers in that way at all, so that the Bill of the hon. gentleman cannot be disposed of on that ground. I am not familiar either with Gaelic or Erse, but as I heard the hon. gentleman's closing remarks in, I believe, his native tongue, I feel that there was a good deal to be said in favor of having that musical language used in Parliament. I do not propose to discuss the Bill at all, but I rise largely for the purpose of making a suggestion to the hon. leader of the House. I have noticed that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government in another place does not, as a rule, when a supporter of his introduces a Bill which should not pass, and which has really almost nothing to be said in favor of it, call upon his friends to vote it down. The policy which he adopts is, as a matter of courtesy to the hon. member who introduces the Bill, to give it a second reading, and then put it to sleep. Looking at the fact that the hon. gentleman who has introduced this measure has been able to show that the language to which his Bill refers is spoken by a very large portion of our population, perhaps the most courteous way to deal with his measure would be to give it a second reading, and afterwards, in Committee of the Whole, the objection might possibly be raised that it was a measure involving a tax upon the subject, and therefore one which did not come within the jurisdiction of the Senate.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I regret very much that whatever my hon. friend may think is the practice of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House of Commons, I am unable to adopt that practice in the present instance, even though it were applicable to the present case, which I do not think it is. I understand the parliamentary principle to be that the reading of a Bill the second time affirms its principle. I would be sorry to see this Bill go off on a point of order, or in any other way than by a direct vote against it, showing that this House has not hesitated for a single moment in expressing its disapprobation of the principle of the measure.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—I do not rise to discuss the Bill that is now before the Senate; neither do I say that I am greatly opposed to the measure itself. I believe it is a question which the Government has to deal with, and until the Government are ready to suggest that this favor should be accorded to any of our fellow men in Canada of other origin than English or French, I shall always be ready to negative such a proposition. But when the Government believe that the finances of the country will bear such an expense I will be ready to approve of the granting of such favors. My object in rising is to answer a comparison made by the hon. mover of the Bill, when he stated that while the French population had a right to the continuance of their language, Scotchmen or Irishmen had an equal right to have their languages officially recognized.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—I had reference to the North-West.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—From all I have learned, a comparison, to be a good one, must be between two objects under similar conditions. In this instance the positions of the two languages compared are not equal. I find that the Gaelic language is confined to the British Islands, and is spoken by very few outside of the United Kingdom. French, on the other hand, is known everywhere; it is spoken in every part of the world. So universal is the use of the French language that when delegates from every civilized nation met at Washington some six years ago to discuss matters relating to the public health it was the only language which was understood by all, and they had to come to Ottawa to procure the services of two of our French reporters to report the debates of the conference. Only a few days ago a labor conference was assembled at Berlin, and there, again, French was used, because it was the only language understood by all. The comparison of the hon. gentleman is, therefore, not a sound one.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—The comparison is good, as far as our own country is concerned.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—No; because even in this country of ours, since French is known everywhere, if you maintain that language you will be sure, when you go abroad, that you will always have a language which will enable you to communicate your views in any part of the world. If you use Gaelic, I do not know where it would be understood outside of the British Islands. I will not discuss the question itself. It is well known that the French language was guaranteed to us when Canada was transferred to England, and I feel sure that the great majority of the people of this country are ready to support us in our claim. For that reason I do not propose to discuss this Bill at all, and I have only risen to show that the comparison which the hon. gentleman instituted was not sound.

HON. MR. POIRIER—As there is likely to be a division on this Bill, I should like to say a few words in explanation of the vote I propose to give. To a certain extent, I am favorably impressed with the idea, and I am sorry that I cannot vote for the Bill, not for the reasons assigned by our hon. leader, although I regret, in this case, that I am not in harmony with him, but because, first, of the fact that the Bill is, in my estimation, uncalled for. There have been no petitions to either House, or not a sufficient number to justify us in passing such a Bill.

HON. MR. McMILLAN—Has there been any petition?

HON. MR. KAULBACH—There have been no petitions.

HON. MR. POIRIER—The hon. gentleman from British Columbia read something in Gaelic—I do not know what it was. In the second place, I believe that if such a measure is to be passed it must be introduced by the Government, and not by any individual member, however prominent he may be. As to the principle of the Bill, a great deal has been said in favor of it, and a great deal could still be said. I am myself greatly in sympathy with the idea of doing anything to extend the use of the Gaelic language. I was surprised at the conclusion of the hon. gentleman's remarks when he told us that the object of this Bill was not to extend the knowledge of Gaelic, because it was disappearing anyway. If it is disappearing it is a matter of sentiment, and as such I do not believe it is worth while for us to inaugurate this legislation. If it were a matter of practice, I would be in harmony with it and would favor the Bill. With respect to the proceedings of this House, I think it would be perfectly useless to print them in Gaelic; and as it is already the right of any member to use that language in debate, and the hon. gentleman has himself used it in his speech to-day, there is no necessity to legislate for its use in Parliament. But, as a matter of fact, it is not used. We all acknowledge that the printing of our reports here in Gaelic will not be of any service to the public. If there is any considerable number of people in the country who use the Gaelic language I think it would be only right to have the laws printed in that language. But I cannot support the Bill as it stands. There are some sentiments expressed by my hon. friend to which I must take exception. He said, in making his comparison, that the same courtesy should be extended to the Gaelic that is shown to the French. The comparison in this case is not, in my estimation, a good one. French is used here, not by courtesy, but because the right exists under the constitution. It is a matter of privilege granted by the treaties with France and incorporated in our constitution. It would be a matter of courtesy to permit the use of Gaelic or any other language that is not now official. Further, I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman when he says that Gaelic, though taught in universities, is fading away in the same way that French is. I should be sorry if it were the case with Gaelic; I hope it is not, but I can assure my hon. friend that it is not the case with French. The use of the French language continues, not through any aggressiveness on the part of our people, but through a patriotic and conservative spirit. There is a difference, as my hon. friend from Delanaudière has pointed out, between a language that is not spoken officially anywhere in the world and a language that is spoken officially in one of the most glorious and powerful among the nations of Europe, and whose extension is world wide. We French in Canada feel that we are English by our laws and constitution; and that, being backed by France, and having discovered, settled and evangelized this land, we have as better cause to be attached to our language than another nationality would have; and that we are justified in our attachment, inasmuch as it is based upon history and backed by our motherland, where that language is still officially used. Therefore, the comparisons made by my hon. friend are not applicable to this case, in my estimation. Without making any further remarks, I may say that I cannot vote for this Bill as it stands, because I see no necessity for the printing of our deliberations in the Gaelic language.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—My excuse for rising to address the House upon this occasion is that I have lived for some forty-four years in a settlement largely composed of families whose original tongue was Gaelic. At an early period the heads of the houses, for the most part, were Scotchmen born in the old country, some of them, perhaps, in the islands of Scotland; yet, notwithstanding that, out of quite a numerous circle of families living in the immediate neighborhood I scarcely recollect one of the male heads of the family who did not speak English, and generally they spoke it with remarkable purity. I recollect one elderly woman, my very next door neighbor, who did not speak English, and with her I could not converse; nevertheless, we were the best of friends, her family and ours. I look back upon those associations with the greatest satisfaction, because I say from the bottom of my heart that no man could live amongst more friendly and intelligent neighbors than I did myself; but I cannot say that I believe the Gaelic language was of service to them. It may have been a thing to be remembered. I have heard many of my old neighbors say that they preferred to read Holy Writ in Gaelic, because they had been accustomed to reading it in that language. The next generation, to a great extent, spoke Gaelic, but it was not the familiar tongue to them that it had been to their parents. I doubt very much if the third generation now growing up in that settlement speak Gaelic at all, but they speak excellent English, which they have learned in the settlement school. If I could see that the claim put forward by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia was likely to be a valuable privilege to anyone of Celtic origin, I should certainly support his measure, but I cannot help coming to this hard conclusion, that the best thing for the Gaelic-speaking races now is to learn English as quickly as they can. To speak only Gaelic will, in my opinion, stand in their way, preventing them from obtaining employment and making money in situations in which, if they spoke English and French, they would certainly become more useful and more wealthy. That is my opinion with regard to this language. I am not aware that any of my neighbors, or any people of Celtic origin in Prince Edward Island have experienced difficulty or loss because of ignorance of the English language, and for this reason a very great majority of all the males speak English as well as most Englishmen do, and a great deal better than some Englishmen. This being so, I do not think there is any solid ground to be advanced in support of the measure before us. If I could see, as he appears to see, any solid advantage that it would confer on the Gaelic-speaking races, I would support the measure, but as I cannot see anything of the kind, I must vote against the Bill.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—As a Highlander, I wish to make a few remarks. The hon. gentleman who brought this Bill forward has no reason to be ashamed of what he has done. He has furnished a great deal of information on the subject, and spoken well of a race that has produced the best soldiers in the world. But we cannot close our eyes to the fact that Gaelic is not a commercial language, and, as he has told us, it is dying out of the land. In the very heart of the Highlands the English language is taught in the schools. No other language is taught. Gaelic is very expressive; it is the language of poetry, but it is not the language of science or of commerce, and all transactions carried on in the Celtic parts of Scotland are conducted in English. The hon. gentleman having brought forward his Bill, and spoken as he should have done of a race who deserve all the compliments he has paid them, I think the best course would be to withdraw the Bill for the present time. It is now before the people, and perhaps between now and another Session will gather more force and receive a better support.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—Before any disposition is made of the Bill I wish to express my surprise at some of the remarks to which we have listened, especially those of my hon. friend from Acadia. Really the strictures and insinuations that he made against the Gaelic language, and those which we heard from the hon. member from Lunenberg, do not display that generosity and liberality that are supposed to be peculiar to the two races to which those gentlemen belong. As far as the leader of the House is concerned, he has given absolutely no reason why this Bill should be rejected, except that it would add to the public expenditure a few hundred dollars annually.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Thousands of dollars.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B.C.)—Well, even if it were thousands of dollars, I think the money would be well spent. The hon. gentleman from Amherst raised a constitutional question, on which he is generally a good authority. But to be forewarned is to be forearmed. I had a hint some days ago that that question would be raised, and I took the trouble to be prepared. I examined the question pretty closely, and not only did I satisfy myself that this Parliament could make any language it chose official, but I have the opinion of Dr. Bourinot, who is recognized as the highest authority in the country on constitutional questions, to confirm my own view. When I told him that some of our leading parliamentarians in the Senate thought that this Bill was unconstitutional, he ridiculed the idea. The hon. gentleman from Amherst has referred to the 133rd section of the British North America Act, which is as follows:—

"Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and of the House of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

"The Acts of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages."

Now hon. gentlemen will see in that section the distinction. The reason that English and French are mentioned there is expressly so that they could not be legislated out of the Parliament of Canada. It was in order to guard and protect the French language that that clause was constructed as it is. But does it say that you shall not legislate for the use of German, Italian or Gaelic? No. It is as plain as possible that Dr. Bourinot puts the proper construction on it, and I may add that the hon. ex-Speaker, who I am sorry to say is not in his place, concurs in his opinion. I submitted the question to him, and he agreed with Dr. Bourinot in the matter; so that it is within the purview of Parliament to legislate to add another or other languages to the two official languages that we have now. We have just as much power to legislate in that direction as we have to incorporate a railway company. I have only to add that on the leader of this House and on the Government of Canada I throw the sole responsibility of the defeat of this Bill. (Hear, hear). It is all very well to say "hear, hear," and to speak lightly of this Bill; but, as I said in my opening remarks, the hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that thirty-five members of the House of Commons hold their seats through the votes of the Highland Scotch in Canada. It would be very much better if the Government and their supporters did not sneer and speak lightly of the Highland language and the Highland Scotch people as they have done. In the near future they may hear of it in a way that may not be satisfactory to themselves, though beneficial to the country.

HON. MR. DEVER—I rise to say that I am somewhat grieved at the manner in which this grand subject has been brought before the House. The hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill commenced by telling us that the Highland Scotch were Celts. I feel he was right in that, but he forgot to state that it was a tribe of the Celts who had a peculiar language, a language the genius and origin of which are only known to philologists. I do not pretend myself to be a philologist, and on that point I speak with timidity, and am willing to admit that I have availed myself of the knowledge of others who have studied this language and the genius of it, and with the permission of the House I may be allowed to read a few quotations to show that the hon. gentleman should have pointed out the origin of his language, the number of letters used in it and whence it came to Ireland and Scotland. I feel the more called upon to do so from the fact that hon. gentlemen in this House, speaking on the subject, seem to differ widley. One hon. gentleman, who is known as a man of great intelligence, seemed to think that the Welsh, ancient Britons, Irish and Highland Scotch were the same clan. That, I think, is at variance with the fact. The ancient Welsh and British were one tribe of people; but the Scotch, on the other hand, and the ancient Irish, I hold, and I think writers on the subject also hold, were of another tribe known to have come from Asia and settled in Spain, and some 484 years afterwards, owing to a disturbance in that country and interference with their peculiar religion, which was that of the worship of Baal, the sun, they emigrated to Eri, now Erin, and co-operated with the Scotch, according to history, borrowing kings from each other; for I think it is to be found that a king from an Irish tribe was a king of Scotland, and that as the Romans had a shield, so had the ancient Irish a peculiar stone, known, in their language as "Leafail," the stone of destiny, on which their Kings were crowned, and which was borrowed for that purpose by the Scotch, deposited at Scone, whence it was taken as a trophy by our English, and to-day may be found in our Queen's coronation chair.

HON. MR. POWER—I rise to a question of order. This is all very interesting, but it has nothing to do with the question before the House. The hon. gentleman should speak to the point before us.

THE SPEAKER—The House has been, I think, very indulgent in allowing the greatest license in the discussion of this measure, and I respectfully suggest that the hon. gentleman is giving us an aesthetic speech, which does not bear on the question.

HON. MR. DEVER—I wish to put some remarks made to this House on a correct and historical basis. I think I have proper authority for doing so, and I claim the right to be heard. Another hon. gentleman seemed to dispute the historical statement that the Scotch and Irish were not one tribe. I hold in my hand extracts from a work which, I think, if the hon. gentleman had consulted, would have made him more familiar with the facts bearing on our forefathers, of whom we are all proud and whose memory we do not care to hear ridiculed. The first extract which I will read is as follows:—

"The original language of Britain is that called by the ancients the Celtic; it was spoken by the original people of Britain, whose forefathers were as ancient as the globe itself. But the present English language is the Germanic, enriched by the ornaments of Greece and Rome, wherewith it is so bedecked as to hide its original cumbrous shape, and therefrom it hath been moulded into fine form and acquired much majesty and grace. This language is the language," he says again, "of the ancient Briton and Welsh, and is a totally different origin from the Scytho, Iberian, improved to the Bearla Feine, or Phœnician language, as written in Gaelag, 1365 years before Christianity, and is the language called Scottish Gaelag, Irish Erse, as in use at this hour, but languishing on a declining bed with the children of the land." Again he says: "The language is at this day called Bearla Feine, the signification of which is the Phœnician language, composed of sixteen letters, namely: A B C D E F G I L M N O R S T U."

HON. MR. POWER—I rise to another question of order. The hon. gentleman is reading his speech.

HON. MR. DEVER—I am only reading quotations. Again this writer says:

"The proofs here submitted to you are irrefragable of the identity of the Scotish language with that of the tribe that colonized Eri."

I have read this to show that the Scotch and Irish languages are the same, and that it was the language of the forefathers of many of us, and though rather obsolete at present, still I feel it is our duty, as defendants of that grand old people, to hold that respect and honor due them as the descendants of honored sires.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was rejected by the following vote:—

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (17) "An Act to amend the Patent Act."

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause,—

HON. MR. POWER—I wish to call attention again to what has always struck me as being the inconvenience of this way of amending an Act. The whole effect of this long clause is to insert two or three words in clause 34 of the existing Act. It would have taken only two or three lines to make the amendment, but under this inconvenient system the hon. gentleman himself finds it difficult to know at first sight what the amendment is.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend knows he is raising a question which has been greatly discussed amongst draftsmen as to whether the amendment shall be printed by itself, or whether the clause as amended shall be re-printed as a whole. I am rather inclined to think that the second way is the more convenient.

HON. MR. POWER—In England, where they have no consolidation, such as our Revised Statutes, the hon. gentleman's views would be correct, but here in Canada and in the various Provinces of Canada there is in each instance a consolidation of the statutes. We, in 1886, consolidated our statutes, and the statutes that govern Canada are to be found in two large volumes. Now that is a sort of Code, and I feel that the balance of convenience is very much in favor of making the amendments in the shortest possible form, so that every one who has a copy of the Revised Statutes can note the changes in the law on the margin of his statutes.

Clause agreed to.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The 2nd clause is like the first, providing for two or three slight amendments, one of which is important. By the General Act it is provided that any dispute which arises shall be decided by the Minister or Deputy of the Minister of Agriculture, whose decision in the matter shall be final. This clause transfers the decision of the dispute to the Exchequer Court.

The clause was agreed to.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I rise to call attention to the fact that they have adopted in clauses 34 and 47 two different principles. The hon. gentleman from Halifax considers that it would be infinitely simpler and better if the proposed amendment were introduced by itself, instead of a reprint of the clause as amended, and we could then see what the changes were. No doubt, to those who are passing upon the proposed legislation it would be the better way, but I think if the profession were consulted, who, with the assistance of the courts, have to interpret the law, it will be found that it is infinitely better to repeal the whole section and re-print it as amended. Otherwise, you have to refer to two different volumes to find out what the change is. I notice with regret that the principle which the leader of the House has laid down is not followed in this case, for I see that the amendments in the 3rd and 4th clauses are made in the way referred to by the hon. member for Halifax as being the proper method.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will see the reason is that the amendments in the 3rd and 4th clauses are very trifling.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It does not follow an invariable practice, that is all. I have been asked to propose an amendment, giving a degree of latitude that the law does not now permit to British subjects who have taken out patents in Great Britain, allowing them a longer period than one year within which to perfect their right in Canada, restricting that privilege to British subjects only, and to those who had taken out patents in Great Britain. I submitted the proposed amendment in the form it should come to my hon. friend, and I would like to know whether he has considered it, and whether the Government will accede to it or not?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I have considered the suggestion made by my hon. friend, and have submitted it to my colleagues, and I must say that their unanimous opinion is against it. The law at present makes provision that any inventor shall be intitled to a patent for his invention if a patent has not been in existence in the country from which he comes for more than twelve months prior to the application for his patent in Canada. That is the period which has been selected in the United States, I am told, and it is considered to be sufficiently long to enable any person taking out a patent in any foreign country or in England to take it out here. Communication between foreign countries and Canada is very easy. Probably if this law were now made for the first time twelve months would not be allowed, but it was different when it took a month or more to cross from England to Canada.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE ORANGE ASSOCIATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (32) "An Act to incorporate the Grand Orange Lodge of British America." He said: This is a Bill that has been sought for by numerous members of the association, resident in various portions of this Dominion. It is not my intention at the present time to discuss the merits of the Bill at any length, or state the objects to be attained by the passing of this measure, because the clauses of the Bill are sufficiently expressive to convey its general intention. I have postponed the consideration of this matter from time to time for the convenience and in compliance with the expressed desire of several members of this House. I am not sorry for having done so, because I am aware that the more they consider the nature of the Bill, and what is desired to be attained by it, the less opposition there will be to its passing this House. Therefore, I am perfectly satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of hon. gentlemen, knowing that they are at all times disposed to mete out equal justice to all classes of the community, and I have no doubt they will aid in rendering substantial justice to this class of the community, who consider they have had a grievance in the past. I do not know that there will be much discussion on this occasion; therefore, I reserve to myself the right to answer any discussion that may take place, and will content myself for the present by moving the second reading of the Bill.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I feel that I cannot allow this Bill to go without explaining in as few words as I can my reasons for the objection which I have against this legislation. The Parliament of Canada is asked to give its sanction to an institution that has been seeking incorporation at the hands of this Legislature for a considerable number of years, which sought it in the old Parliament of Canada, and by the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland, which sought recognition at the hands of the Governments of Great Britain and Ireland, and sought it in vain. There must be some grave State reason that prompted a Parliament in which the Catholic element was so little represented to refuse that institution recognition by the State. The reasons are, of course, inherent in the principles on which the order is established. I do not propose now to go into a history of the institution, in order to illustrate, as I could do, the many reasons and arguments that could be adduced against any recognition of an institution of this kind. I will simply point out the objects of the society at its original inception, and the purposes that have marked its history since the time of its inauguration. Hon. gentlemen who are at all conversant with the history of the last century must be aware that this society was instituted for the purpose of preventing the removal of the disabilities of the Catholics of the Empire. I need not point out what those disabilities were. They were of a very grave and serious character. The Orange society made no secret whatever that that was its purpose. They considered that the ascendancy of the Crown of Great Britain would be endangered if Catholics were allowed the ordinary privileges of freemen—if they could be elected to the House of Commons, if they could be appointed as magistrates, if they could serve on grand juries or had any recognition under the laws of the country. The origin of the society was in 1795. The first occasion when we find public attention drawn to it in a very marked degree was about the time of Catholic emancipation, because it is well known at that time the order took very high constitutional grounds—they have always professed to be more loyal to the State than the Crown itself—in opposition to what is called Catholic emancipation. Hon. gentlemen need not be told what that was. Within the lifetime of a large number of gentlemen who now hear my voice no Catholic could be elected to the House of Commons of Great Britain and Ireland. Though in Ireland seven-eighths of the population were Catholic, they had no representation. The object of the society was, of course, to prevent their being so represented, and the society became so decided in its action that the British Government was forced to intervene. The first action taken was to restrain the society from exhibiting itself in public in the way of processions. It is a singular feature that that stand was taken by a Government that has contributed very largely to the governing element of the Dominion of Canada. No less than three of the ancestors of gentlemen who have been Governors of Canada were represented in that Cabinet. The ancestor of the present Governor General was then Secretary for Ireland, and there were included in the Cabinet the predecessors of Lord Lansdowne and Lord Durham. As I have said, there must have been very strong and very grave reasons which prompted those gentlemen to suppress the society. Mr. Stanley—who was then Secretary for Ireland—in answer to a statement that other societies formed for political purposes were allowed to exist, gave as his reasons for supressing the order in public and not allowing them to walk :

"If the Bill would, in practice specially, touch Orange processions, that could only be because the Orangemen persevered more than others in keeping up feelings of religious animosity. These processions had a manifest tendency to provoke a breach of the peace and cherish party feelings. It was, therefore, the duty of the Legislature to put them down."

That was the answer of the Government, and notwithstanding a pretty bitter fight in the House, which, of course, was largely Protestant, they carried the Bill, and did what they could to stop the processions. Then the House of Commons took the question up as to whether it was really proper that this society should continue to exist or not. A very voluminous report was made to the House, and the conclusions come to were that it was not proper that the society should continue to exist in Great Britain and Ireland, or the colonies, as far as they could control it. The reasons are given very fully in the report, and the Orangemen, feeling that public opinion was strong against them, very properly determined to suppress themselves, and so they did. I will read just a few lines from that report, and hon. gentlemen will see for themselves the reasons that prompted that action on the part of the House of Commons. I will be told, no doubt, that the object of this society is a benevolent one, for the purpose of keeping up fraternal feeling among its own members, and for the purpose of instituting funds for the relief of their own widows and children. Now, at all times that has been a prominent claim put forward by the society. While I think that those are objects that we should all desire to favor and sustain, they can be carried out by the society without this formal recognition by the Parliament of Canada of its existence. When the question came up in the Legislature of Ontario, a body of gentlemen, almost entirely Protestant—there were only three Catholics in the House—even there the vote on the second reading of the Bill was only carried by a majority of eight, showing that they recognized there was a minority element in this country that had some right to be considered in granting official and parliamentary recognition to this body. The Government of Ontario declined to approve of the Bill, and it was referred to Ottawa. The Government at Ottawa also declined to interfere. In order that no ground of complaint should exist, the Ontario Government shortly afterwards did what I think was very proper—they passed a general law, under which this association could obtain the authority for acquiring property and for managing its affairs without its being obtruded on the Statute-book as a recognition by the Province of the order itself, because it is for that rather than any other reason that a large minority of the people of this country take exception to this Bill. It necessarily, from its past history, is aggressive from their standpoint. I do not mean to say that there are not very many excellent men in the order, excellent citizens, as good as there are in the country, and no doubt it is the influence of many of the leading members of the order that has kept it within reasonable bounds. If one were quite sure that that kind of influence could always preserve it within bounds, although one might feel offended at the official recognition of the society, still there would be a feeling that it would not be aggressive because of that influence in the order. But, in legislating on questions of this kind, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, no matter how well-disposed the leaders and controllers of a body of this kind may be, its purposes are unpleasant, aggressive and hostile, to a very large element in this country. The minority element, of course, is very large, and if it were not that Parliaments in the past have considered that some degree of regard was due to their feelings this Bill would have been on the Statute-book long ago. The first time that I had occasion to vote upon this question was so far back as 1858, thirty-two years ago, in a House of which a large majority were Protestants. A similiar Bill to this was introduced by Mr. Benjamin, an excellent and a very popular man of that day. The Bill, on the introduction alone, was only carried by the casting vote of the Speaker, and on the second reading it was thrown out in a House largely composed of Protestants. The motive that actuated them was a recognition of the tender rights of the minority. Hon. gentlemen may not be disposed to consider that those tender rights are entitled to very much consideration, that the feeling has been overdrawn and more highly colored than circumstances justify, but one cannot ignore the history of the past. Without going into any controversial point connected with the history of the society, I may lay down this as a fact which will not be disputed, that it has been aggressive. It may be said that the other side has been aggressive also. No doubt the existence of the Orange association has led to the formation of other societies that had the justification of being organized in self-defence. I do not propose to justify their course. I think it was wrong that they should have been allowed to go into operation—very wrong, in a community such as ours, or any community, that secret associations should exist, where feelings that are developed in close lodge rooms are not those of fraternal charity to people who differ from them. I am not speaking now of one society or another, but we know that the result of the development of this institution was the production of similar associations and orders on the other side, and that has time and again led to very grievous trouble. I will take the opinion of the House of Commons, controlled by one of the best Governments of that day. Under the influence of that Government, here was the conclusion of the House of Commons:

"The obvious tendency and effect of the Orange institution is to keep up an exclusive association in civil and military society, exciting one portion of the people against the other, to increase the rancour and animosity too often unfortunately existing between persons of different religious persuasions—to make the Protestant the enemy of the Catholic and the Catholic the enemy of the Protestant—by processions on particular days, attending with the insignia of the society to excite to breaches of the peace and to bloodshed—to raise up other secret societies among the Catholics in their own defence, and for their own protection against the insults of Orangemen; to interrupt the course of justice, and to interfere with the course of justice and discipline of the army, thus rendering its services injurious instead of useful, when required on occasions where Catholics and Protestants may be parties. All these evils have been proved by the evidence before the House in regard to Ireland, where the system has long existed on an extended scale, rendered more prejudicial to the best interests of society by the patronage and protection of so many wealthy members, high in office and rank, taking an active part in the proceedings of these lodges, though in Great Britain in a more limited way.

"The Orange lodges have also interfered in various political subjects of the day, and made Orangeism a means of supporting the views of a political party, to maintain, as they avow, the Protestant ascendancy."

It goes on in the same strain and the same spirit. We are quite willing that the society should continue to exist in this country with the facilities given them to hold property, but we do think it is asking too much to expect Parliament to recognize a body that, as I said before, has been refused recognition by the Parliament of the mother country. Canada ranks, I believe, as the principal dominion (of course excluding India) of Great Britain, outside the United Kingdom. This Parliament is now asked to give this association official recognition, which I think is a mistake. It can only be under protest of those who feel that their best sentiments are outraged by this official recognition. I do not desire and I am not going to embark on very many questions that are germane to this subject. I simply wish to put on record my own protest against the official recognition of the Orange society. It has now, in several Provinces of the Dominion, powers to hold lands and carry out any of the benevolent purposes for which the society desires under this Bill to obtain increased powers. I, for one, would not object to their coming in under the general law. A gentleman near me says that there is nothing objectionable about the Bill. That may be so from his standpoint, but from my standpoint, and in the opinion of those who think with me, there is this objection—it is an official recognition of a body whose birth was an aggressive one against the Church to which I belong, whose history during the last seventy-five years has been quite in harmony with the objects of its birth, acting as they say under the belief that their course is the best calculated to sustain the supremacy of the Empire. We profess, on the other side, to be equally good subjects. We have fought in the same fights, we have taken part in the same battles to maintain and sustain the constitution under which we live, and we hope to join hands in the future in any necessary movement of that kind; but at the same time we cannot but feel that it is unfair to a large class of our people that the stamp of official recognition should be given to the Orange body by the Parliament of Canada.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—Before this Bill is voted on I have a few words to say. I agree with the last speaker that it should never have come before the Parliament of Canada. The Orange society has been refused official recognition in the old land, where its history was known; its processions were suppressed, and the body itself had to be dissolved. After one hundred years of its history it caused those authorities to effect those changes, and I regret to find that it is carried to this new country, where it was not needed. If in the old land, where the great majority of the country in which it had its birth were of one faith, and the Protestants only a small minority, there was any cause for a feud or for the existence of a secret society to defend themselves against the large majority, surely that does not obtain in Canada. Is there any use for a secret political society in Canada?

Now, that is the question that should be calmly considered by this House, at any rate. If there is a function that this House has more than another, it is to protect the minorities in every part of the Dominion. The Orange association is a secret political society that brought no credit to the land in which it lived for nearly one hundred years, and why should it be imported into this new land, where there is nothing to be complained of, where there is government by the people for the people; where there is a free press; where there is a free people? Surely the great object of its existence, to support Protestantism, does not exist here? There is no danger that where there is over the whole Dominion only one-third of the population Catholic that they are going to subvert Protestantism. Protestants disdain to be considered as allied with this organization. Protestantism would not bear to hear that they needed it in this land. Who then wants it? There is no need of it. Not for the protection of Protestantism surely? What, then, is its object? Its object is purely political. It is a political organization. This Bill would not be here to-day but that it is a political organization, nor would it have ever come here for its second reading had it not been for a political combination. That is what it means—no more, no less. Is it wise to foster, to recognize secret political combinations in this free land of ours? Does it increase or improve a neighborhood? Does it improve social intercourse? In times of peace is it likely to preserve the peace? Is it safe in times of difficulty to have secret political societies in our army or in our camp? The investigation referred to by the last speaker, in England, disclosed the fact that thirty-six lodges were found in the army under the Duke of Cumberland, and it was found that this very loyal body—because they possessed, according to one side of their shields, all the loyalty that is to be found in the world—was organised within the army for the purpose, as the report and history assert, of preventing the succession by her present Most Gracious Majesty. They were a conspiracy in the army for the purpose of securing to their Grand Master, the Duke of Cumberland, the position which Her Majesty holds to-day. And they are the loyalists of Canada; they would subvert the constitution and destroy the succession for the purpose of putting their Grand Master on the Throne. They are so loyal that they have loyalty planted in front of everything that they introduce, but their acts speak another language. They are double-faced, and they are double-tongued. They have two tongues and two faces, and these are always working. Now, I will ask the House to allow me upon that point to read from the Edinborough Review an article founded upon the report which has just been referred to:

"One of the saddest and most discouraging features in the condition of Ireland is the intenseness with which party spirit rages there, and the extent to which it perverts the minds of men of all ranks, and blinds them to their plainest duties. We had indulged the hope that Orange riots had become a matter of history: but the sanguinary events of Dolly's Brae have dispelled this illusion, and attracted public attention to the saddest of all tasks—the Government of people who boast of their loyalty as an excuse for lawlessness, and while clamorous for the rights of free men, can only be restrained by force from engaging in civil war. Our readers are aware that the 12th of last July was celebrated in the North of Ireland by the Orange party; that in the County of Down the march of a procession was followed by rioting and the loss of several lives, and that, after a formal enquiry into the circumstances by Mr. Berwick, on the part of the Government, Lord Roden, Mr. W. Beers, and his brother, Mr. F. C. Beers, were dismissed from the commission of peace, in consequence of the share they had taken in these transactions.

"Nothing could be more praiseworthy than the published rules of the Orange society. They prescribed loyalty as the point of honor, obedience to the law as the first duty; they prohibited the admission of anyone capable of upbraiding another on account of his religious opinions, and they inculcated peace and good will. But never did any society exhibit such a glaring inconsistency, rather such a positive contradiction between its professed principles and its actual practice. The facts which came out before the committee surprised all parties, none more, we believe, than the Grand Master himself. It appeared that the Orange oath of allegiance had once been avowedly 'conditional:' and that the same spirit remained, although the words had been changed; that, contrary to law, warrants had been issued to military bodies; that the inadvertence of the Grand Master had been taken advantage of, and his confidence abused by the officers of the institution; that the practice of the society was to resort to every contrivance—by songs, speeches, party tunes, processions, emblems and mottoes—to insult, to domineer over, to offend and irritate their Roman Catholic neighbors: and the result of its working was seen in outrages, murders, houses wrecked, villages destroyed, riots without number, law perverted, justice denied, and the animosity of the rival parties wrought up to madness.

"To give some idea of the responsibility falling upon those who encourage Orange processions, we will enumerate a few of the principal Orange riots in the five years preceding the formal dissolution of the society in 1836. At Crossar, in 1830, in the County of Down, a formidable armed procession, exhibiting warrants from the Duke of Cumberland, openly resisted the police, and only retreated before an overpowering military force. At Dungannon, in Tyrone, they overawed the magistrates, and by force compelled them to disobey the orders of the Government. At Tanderaghee there were riots and murders. At Maghera, in Londonderry, the Roman Catholic party having dispered, the Orangemen broke their promise to the magistrates, evaded the troops, and rushed upon the village of Drumard. There they fired upon the peasantry, who fled, and continued to wreck and burn the houses, until at length the military re-appeared, and drove them back at the point of the bayonet. Mr. Hunter, the magistrate, in his report to the Government, says: 'Anything so disagraceful to the character of men and of Protestants—so savage, so lawless, and so uncalled for—cannot be forgotten; the whole was done with such deliberation, and in open defiance of the law.' In Armagh, and this instance shall conclude our list for 1830—some Orangemen passing in procession through the Roman Catholic village of Maghery, and playing the Protestant Boys, were beaten, and their drums broken. Two days afterwards the Orangemen attacked Maghery. There was no opposition—the inhabitants fled for their lives; an old man was beaten—a widow, within eight days of her confiment, was wounded with a bayonet, and knocked down—her son, a half-witted lad, was fired at—another woman and her infant were beaten and knocked down—and twenty-eight houses wrecked and burned, and every particle of property pillaged and destroyed. The sequel is characteristic of the state of society there. The Roman Catholics who broke the drums were convicted, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment; but, though the wrecking of Maghery took place in open day, in the presence of Colonel Verner himself, though the rioters' names were known and their identity sworn to, not one of them received a punishment whatever.

"These horrible events startled even Colonel Verner and his brother Orangemen, and the advice they then gave derives additional weight from additional occurrences. They earnestly recommend the abandonment of all party processions, and 'trusted that no persons of respectability would be found so regardless of consequences as to incur the heavy responsibility of countenancing the celebration of any day, in a manner calculated to give offence to any person whatever.' But having thus discharged their consciences, they continued to support and stimulate Orange processions by every means in their power.

"In 1831, at Tully Orier, in the County of Down, an old woman was shot in her house, and four men were pursued by the Orange party, fired upon, and driven into the river, where they were drowned. In 1832, under the impending Party Processions Act, the Orange leaders exerted themselves, and with considerable success, to prevent the usual processions. But at Dungannon their advice was not followed, and riots took place. In 1833 there was great rioting in Lurgan, Tanderaghee (where, at Lord Manderville's gate, a magistrate was burned in effigy, in the presence of Dean Carter), Loughall, Ballyhagan and Cootehill. In 1834 similar scenes were enacted at Belfast, Portglenone, Portadown and Dungannon. In 1835 there were numerous riots—at Belfast, Kilrae, and other places; but we have no room for an account of any except that at Annahagh, near Armagh. A Protestant and his daughter had there been beaten by the Roman Catholics, in revenge for which the Orangemen turned out, armed with their yeomanry fire-locks; they attacked Annahagh, and burned and wrecked nine houses, when they were stopped and driven off by the police and military. It is almost superfluous to record that for beating this man and his daughter four Roman Catholics were transported—but for burning nine houses not a single Orangeman was punished in any way. There is a melancholy similarity in the details of the occurrences, proving that they did not arise from accidental or different causes, but were the certain result of a system, according to which the Orange processions were arranged on recurring anniversaries, in the way calculated to produce the utmost excitement and irritation.

"It was very extraordinary to see men of education, principle, and otherwise estimable character, so deceived by their own assumptions, and so bewildered by the noxious influence of party spirit, that though familiar with the state of things we have described they actually denied its existence, or boldly attempted to justify it to the world. Colonel Verner asserted that the Orange society, as a body, had never interfered in any political question; Colonel Black did not consider 'Croppies Lie Down' a party tune: affirmed that the anniversaries of the 12th of July were peculiarly tranquil, and that administration of justice was pure. The enquiry by the committee of 1835, however, brought the truth fully to light. The exposure was complete, the condemnation universal. All classes, creeds and parties then united in declaring that the Orange organization must be arrested, that the supremacy of the law must be vindicated, and that no party in the State should be permitted to arrogate to themselves superior privileges, and insult their fellow-subjects, under ground of a pure religious belief or on the false and insolent plea of superior loyalty.

"The Orange leaders, we are happy to say, at this juncture, yielded a manly and dignified obedience to the will of the nation, as expressed in an address of the House of Commons, and the answer of the Crown. Notwithstanding considerable resistance from the Irish portion of the body, the Grand Lodge, in April, 1836, dissolved this society, and through their organ proclaimed that they did so, not in compliance with expediency, but for the sake of principle—that they would neither repent of the deed nor recall it."

HON. MR. McFARLINE—What is the date of the article that the hon. gentleman is reading from?

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—I am readding from Edinborough Review of 1836. That was the course there, and the time embraced in these transactions only extends over five years. The twelve years that the society had been dissolved were twelve years of solid peace to Ireland. In no twelve years during the last century did peace reign so supreme as it did during the twelve years of its suppression; but immediately upon their re-organizing the same state of things continued as before. This was, the state of affairs in Ireland. Its history there was a dark one. I do not desire to harrow the feelings of anybody in this House in going back to these events, and I am merely taking up one point in their history, to show what it was in Ireland, and to show that this society had its origin there. Whether there was cause or not, even assuming that there had been cause, there is no reason for bringing it to this country. The causes that obtained in Ireland do not exist here, and the causes having ceased, the effect should cease also. Orangeism or any other ism of a secret political character is not needed here. Any man who has anything to complain of here can say it as free as the wind, as free as water, as free as air. Why, then, should we have secret societies? It is not consistent with our free institutions. We have one of the freest governments in the world—a government from the people direct, and springing more from the people's control, perhaps, than in any other country in the world. We may have differences from time to time, party differences on party grounds; but all parties admit that we have a good system of government—one that we would not change for anything else in the world—and under such a system of government, why should we in this House foster these secret combinations? Can any man who votes for that measure say to himself: "By doing so, I make society better; I tranquilize the country by giving that vote?" Can any man, on his conscience, say he has improved society by giving his sanction to an Orange Bill at this period of the world's history? Can any one say that our people would march to the front in time of trouble in the same united spirit they would if we had no lodges? In the army in England, where lodges were organized, they were suppressed immediately when found. They were as provocative of evil and disunion in the army as here, and every man can easily consider to himself how that may be. If you have a regiment with one hundred Catholics, and they are banded together in a secret society, and you have a hundred Orangemen banded together in a secret society in the same regiment, have we the same army? Have they the same impulse, the same united aim that they would have if they were merely citizens brought together under the drill of the country, under their commanders? Is there no danger? I say there is a danger. I am speaking to this House frankly; I am speaking to it without regard to what Orangeism has been in the past or what it may be in the future; but I speak in the public interest, in the interest of peace and in the interest of social existence and happiness in this our new and happy land, in which we ought not to foster, encourage or recognize any secret political organization. Since Orangeism came here, how have those societies conducted themselves? A few events will demonstrate it, a few events fresh in the memory of every man here, from the burning of the Parliament House in Montreal until you come to Prescott, where the black flag was hoisted. Then coming to Kingston, where the son of Her Majesty would not be allowed to land unless he marched under an Orange arch. He had with him the Duke of Newcastle and his suite; the Orangemen came to meet them and he could not land there. That was loyalty to the Queen's son. They have all the loyalty. That is Orange loyalty. Then a step further west, to Toronto. He wanted to go to church on Sunday, but the Orangemen there had built an Orange arch. He would not go under the Orange arch; therefore, they would not let him go to church. They filled the streets. They were for mobbing him if he took any other route on that occasion to get to church; still, notwithstanding the annoyance and humiliation he had to suffer, he would not bow his neck or humiliate himself to go under the Orange arch, because it was the policy of the British Government that Orangeism should not be fostered or recognized. We had another specimen of Orange loyalty in the city of Toronto—a very nice specimen. Lord Elgin came to the city of Toronto, where he was addressed by the people—a grand man. We all remember him. He was rotten-egged in the streets of Toronto by the Orangemen. But these were loyal Orange eggs.

HON. MR. MCKINDSEY—You are wrong.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—No; I was there. I am speaking by the book. At any rate, these are a few specimens of Orange loyalty, Orange freedom of speech, Orange fair play. These are evidences of them; but, for us the minority, living in Ontario, we have quite another tale to tell. It is not eggs—not even loyal Orange eggs that are thrown at us—it is bullets; it is stones. We see the Archbishop at the head of his flock moving from one church to another, performing a pilgrimage in solemn silence and prayer, without any insignia or colors, or anything else. We see them run upon, stoned, pistoled and driven as if they were wild animals. We see bloodshed, women and men frightened, and such a scene, perhaps, as has never been witnessed in any other city in Canada. Now, that is conduct that we have a right to represent to this House. We have a right to ask this House, who are a judicial body, and capable of considering the rights of the minority as well as the rights of the majority—we have a right to ask them, in view of occurrences of this nature, is it desirable to sanction a body of men who are capable of such acts, for good men are known by their observance of the laws? Men who violate the laws never can and never could be called good men in any period of the history of the world. Another man came out to Canada—whether he was prudent in coming to this country or not is a question, but he came to a country over which floated the British flag, and which he heard was a free country—I refer to Mr. O'Brien. He went to Kingston and he had a hairbreadth escape from being murdered there, and he had the same experience in the city of Toronto. These people might find fault and say that he had no business coming to this country, but was it for them to take the law into their own hands and avenge themselves?

HON. MR. MCDONALD—It served him right.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—Do I understand my hon. friend to say "Yes?"

HON. MR. MCDONALD—To what?

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—That they were right to take the law into their own hands.

HON. MR. MCDONALD—No; I did not say that; I said it served O'Brien right, that was all.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE — My hon. friend may say it served O'Brien right, but if stones were thrown at his own head he would scarcely say it served him right.

HON. MR. McDONALD — I did not break the law.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—Nor did Mr. O'Brien on that occasion break the law. On another occasion the Orangemen in the city of Toronto, without any provocation, broke down a hotel, simply because Mr. McGee was dining there on the 17th March, and they pursued him to the Parliament House, were he told the House the circumstances, but the owner never received any remuneration, nor were there any convictions made. The judges themselves said on the bench that the officials and the constables were altogether with these people, and Chief Justice Richards said there was another oath beyond the oath of their office that they observed, and no man could be brought to justice under it. That was the state of things there. Look at the sad results flowing from the Orange procession in the city of New York. They may have had some provocation. They were out in procession; but supposing there is a provocation, does that justify wholesale slaughter? If a child throws a red rag at a bull, can the bull be justified if he takes the child on his horns and tosses him in the air? There were sixty lives laid in death because of the procession in 1871 in the streets of New York. If there had been no procession of that kind no lives would have been lost. Would it not have been better for society to be without such an organization? Would it not be better for society here to be without them? I submit to this House that we should give no countenance to Bills of this character. Next Session a Bill of a very different nature may be brought before us by some other secret society, and we cannot very consistently say no to it if we say yes to this one. Outside you hear it freely stated that this House has its mind made up—that this Bill comes to the Senate under the sanction and with the approbation of the Premier of the Dominion; that, in fact, it is his design, and I have very little doubt it is, because the maker's name seems to be stamped on the blade pretty well. He is himself one of the order, and no doubt does everything in his power to foster it, and has always done so. In my humble judgment this House should not pass this Bill. We should not care under whose auspices the Bill was brought up or who brought it here; the question for this House should be, is it beneficial to society to give this organization that recognition which is sought? It is not what is on the face of the Bill I read to you. What is on the face of the Bill amounts to nothing. The Orange order can in every one of the Provinces have all the rights they want as to holding property, and as to benevolent purposes, so it is not for that it is brought here. It is to give the society recognition. Now, hon. gentlemen, in all frankness I believe that a more serious question you have not been troubled with in your time in this Senate, and if there ever was one that should be well considered before we cast our votes it is this Bill. In withholding our support from it we are hurting nobody; we are producing no bad effects. We are irritating no party. They have all the power they want for holding property and for benevolent purposes, and why do they ask the Parliament of Canada to give them recognition. For my part, I believe it is unwise to recognize any society of the kind—not merely the Orange society, but any society whatever that is secret and political. These societies begin in a very peculiar manner. They do not do good to the Orangemen. The great mass of the Orange body are not benefited by them. It is simply the bell wethers—the fellows that make use of them for positions—these are the men who make use of the other poor fellows, and all they get in return is to be trotted out under the burning sun on the 12th of July to parade the streets. These societies do them harm, by subjecting their members to excitement, and I believe that they would not be any worse Protestants by not having this organization, and that the state of Protestantism in Canada does not require their assistance. England says: "We don't want your assistance," as she has told them freely and frankly over and over again; "the civil power is strong enough to protect the country." The Orangemen offered to take up arms for Ireland, but their offer was repudiated. Under these circumstances, I ask hon. gentlemen to consider calmly whether they are doing a benefit or an injury to Canada by legalizing a system of secret societies in our political affairs.

HON. MR. MCMILLAN—I regret very much, though a co-religionist of the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, that I have to take an entirely different view of the question before the House. It is not for us to consider whether this organization is required in Canada or not; it is for us to consider whether the gentlemen who are seeking incorporation at our hands are entitled to the rights which other citizens in the Dominion of Canada have hitherto had. They, no doubt, see some good in the society. They, no doubt, understand what they are entering upon when they become members of this society, and it is under such circumstances we are to judge them here, and not from our standpoint as Roman Catholics, who are supposed to be opposed to them. If I thought this Bill would give Orangemen the right to insult or harm the Church of which I am a member I would oppose it, for I hold my Church as dear as anyone; but the object of the Bill, as I understand it, is simply to enable the society that already exists to hold lands, and to carry out certain benevolent objects. I do not think that the speeches of my hon. friends who have preceded me have done much towards creating harmony or good feeling amongst the people of this country. I think it is really distressing to hon. gentlemen who take a calm, honest and disinterested view of this question to listen to a history of the society of half a century ago. I have read a great deal of its history myself, and I must confess that, perhaps, as a Catholic, and belonging to a different nationality, I cannot appreciate it to the same extent that my hon. friends, whose ancestors, or who, perhaps, themselves were born in the country where this organization had its birthplace. But, after all, I judge of that organization as I find it here. Some of the best men I have ever met were Orangemen. I have met them socially; I have met them professionally; I have done business with them, and I have never known that they were made of different clay from my co-religionists. Why then should I deprive them of a right that other citizens have obtained and are now seeking in this House? This is not the first society to whom we have granted a charter of this kind. Last year we granted an Act of incorporation to the Independent Order of Foresters, which was almost word for word the same as this Act—and it goes even a little further, for it gives them power to invest their funds and to become almost a loan company. Now, when we granted a charter to the Foresters, why should we deprive the Orangemen of the same privilege? Is it because they have a history that appears black in the eyes of Irish Catholics? I should think that the only way to wipe out differences of that kind which have hitherto existed would be to meet them with the right hand of fellowship, and say, as Catholics and as friends, we will grant you what you want, and by so doing deprive you of your grievance. I did not intend to say a word on this question, but I do not believe that the speeches which have been made by my hon. friends, which were certainly of a very recriminatory character, have done their side of the question any good, nor do I think that they have changed the opinion of any hon. gentleman present. I am thoroughly satisfied that I, belonging to the same religion as my hon. friends from Ottawa and Toronto, have at my back just as many of the hierarchy of this Dominion as they have, for they want no struggles, they want no feuds, and no dissensions of any kind. I may remind my hon. friends that when the Roman Catholics were asking favors in the Legislature of Canada the Orangemen were their best friends. Now, I say it is time for us to return the good they have done to us in times gone by. Out of fourteen Orangemen in the Legislature of Canada, when we asked for the separate school system, thirteen of them voted for it. They helped us to incorporate the Jesuit College in Montreal, and other Catholic institutes; yet, when they come before the House for a charter we are asked to deprive them of the common rights of citizenship. With a view to create peace, order, harmony and good fellowship in this country, and to restore that union that we ought to have to make the Dominion of Canada a country worth living in, a country where no such distinctions are known, the sooner we meet each other upon common ground and give to others what we demand for ourselves the better for the future welfare of this Dominion.

HON. MR. POWER—I do not take exactly the same view of this question as any of the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, and although there has been, perhaps, enough said about this Bill, I propose to say a few words more. I think that the hon. gentleman from Ottawa and the hon. gentleman from Toronto were perfectly right as a matter of principle. The objections to this Bill are several. In the first place, there are grave doubts as to the constitutionality of the Bill, and although hon. gentlemen may be disposed to fancy that there is not very much in the constitutional objection, I would refer them on that point to the remarks of the present Premier of the Dominion. In 1873 the Ontario Legislature passed an Act incorporating the Orange Association, and the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, acting under the advice of his Executive Council, reserved that Bill for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General. The matter in that way was brought before the Government at Ottawa, and this is what the present Premier, who was then Minister of Justice, said with respect to the Bill:

"If the Acts should again be passed, the Lieutenant Governor should consider himself bound to deal with them at once, and not ask Your Excellency to interfere in matters of provincial concern, and solely and entirely within the jurisdiction and competence of the Legislature of the Province."

It may be urged, as it has been urged, that this is a case like those of the Methodist Church and of the Presbyterian Church which had distinct organizations in the different Provinces, when they came to Parliament to confirm the union of the several local churches with one another, when what had been previously separate provincial organizations were anxious to become united Dominion organizations. The Bill before us is not like those, because in both those cases these religious organizations had legislation from the Provincial Legislatures, and they came to Parliament to suplement and complete that legislation. The principal object of this Bill, as far as one can gather from reading it, is to enable this body to hold real property throughout the country. Now, the power to invest a corporate body with the right to hold real property in a Province belongs to the Local Legislature, and it belongs to the Dominion Parliament only incidentally to some other general right. I do not myself think that the incorporation of this society is a thing which really comes within the jurisdiction of Parliament at all. It is possible that if all the Provincial Legislatures had agreed in recognizing the existence of this body as a corporation, that corporation, having an existence in all the Provinces, might come here to ask us to supplement the provincial legislation by recognizing the whole body as one corporation. The Orange association are incorporated in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba, and there can be no necessity for incorporation, I should say, except in Ontario and Quebec. Now it happens that the people and the Legislatures of these two Provinces are not willing to incorporate the Orange body, and the promoters of this Bill come to Parliament and ask Parliament to override the wishes of the people of Ontario and Quebec, by granting them the recognition which they cannot get from the Legislatures of these two Provinces. I think we should pause before we pass a Bill of that sort. We propose to override the wishes of the people of the two most populous Provinces of the Dominion, Provinces which, together, contain about three-fourths of the population of the country. So much on the constitutional point. A great deal more might be said; but I do not propose to take up the time of the House with a discussion of that kind. Then the principle of the Bill is objectionable on the ground stated by the two hon. gentlemen who opposed it. It is a recognition by the State of an oath-bound secret society. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down wanted to know why this society should not be recognized by the State as well as other societies of a perfectly harmless character. If the hon. gentleman had stopped to think he would have seen that if the reasons against recognizing this society were so potent in the old country as to prevent it being recognized by the Government or Parliament there, not only potent enough for that, but so potent as to induce the Government there to break up the organization——

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That was fifty years ago.

HON. MR. POWER—I do not care to advert to recent evidence, but the hon. gentleman from Toronto quoted a good many incidents which go to show that the spirit of the Orange body had not changed very much during the last fifty years, and that in the city of Toronto to-day the same spirit is manifested that was manifested in Ireland fifty years ago. The Government and Parliament of Ireland recognize without hesitation bodies of a benevolent character, such as the Forester's association; and to compare the incorporation of a college, and institution of learning, with the incorporation of this body, seems to be a most extraordinary thing. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman from Glengarry should have made such a comparison.

HON. MR. MCMILLAN—We must look at it from their standpoint.

HON. MR. POWER—That is just one of the misfortunes about the matter. The members of the organization do not look at these matters from anything like a disinterested or reasonable standpoint. I think the hon. gentleman will hardly allege that the Imperial Government or men like the Duke of Newcastle looked at this question from an unfair or one-sided point of view.

HON. MR. MCMILLAN—We do not want to perpetuate the fights and struggles that they had on the other side of the Atlantic.

HON. MR. POWER—Some one said, when it was proposed that capital punishment should be done away with: "Let the murderers begin." Now, the hon. gentleman does not wish to import the struggles of the old country—but the struggles have been imported, and we have them here now. That is the difficulty—it is too late to keep them out.

HON. MR. MCMILLAN—Where are the struggles?

HON. MR. POWER—The hon. gentleman has heard references made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto to several instances where they have happened. The objectionable feature about the principle of the Bill is that the real cause of the existence of this body is hostility to one denomination in the community, and it is a most objectionable thing that the State should recognize a body which is based on that principle. That has been denied, I know, by the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill. I quite agree with what has been said by several hon. gentlemen, that there are in that body a great many mose amiable and fairly enlightened men, and they know that the clergymen of my denomination do not wear horns under their hats, or anything of that sort, but still the principles of the order itself are such as I have mentioned. That will probably be denied by the hon. gentleman from Rideau division when he comes to reply. That hon. gentleman was kind enough to allow me to look at the manual of the order, and there did not appear in black and white on its pages anything that looked very bad, except that the order was based apparently on the principles which actuated William of Orange. William of Orange lived at a time when the doctrines of toleration, which are almost universal now, were almost unknown, and the probabilities are that if William of Orange were alive today his views of toleration would be altogether different from what they actually were. The consequence is that the Orange association, which tends to perpetuate in the latter end of the 19th century principles which were current at the latter end of the 17th century, is an anachronism. Now, what did William's principles lead him to? In one instance, where he made a treaty, not with his rebellious subjects, but with men who were fighting in the cause of a man whom they believed to be their lawful monarch—his own father-in-law—his principles led him to violate that treaty afterwards. The same principles led him, when loyal subjects of the Stuarts in Scotland were driven to the wall, and after the war had ceased, to cause a number of them to be put to death at Glencoe in the most cruel manner possible. We certainly do not need to have principles of that sort promulgated at the present day. As the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill did not make any speech, one has to anticipate what he will probably say. I claim that, as I have stated, hostility to Roman Catholicism is really the essential, fundamental principle of the Orange order. When this matter was up for discussion in the House of Commons some six years ago the hon. gentleman from West Durham produced a number of authorities, which hon. gentlemen can see by referring to his speech, coming from the official organ of the Orange association, the Sentinel, and from other authoritative sources, showing that the fundamental principle of the body is hostility to Roman Catholicism. As has been very properly stated there is no necessity for such an organization as this to-day. I do not think that in Canada, at the end of the 19th century, there is any necessity for an oath-bound, secret society of this kind to maintain the rights and liberties of Protestants. They are perfectly safe. Protestants have a very large majority in the country, and they are able to take care of themselves. Even at the end of the 18th century, when the organization was first established, it might be supposed that there was some excuse for their existence, because at that time the air was full of revolution. The French Revolution had just taken place, and there was a great deal of more or less disloyal feeling current in the United Kingdom; and the Catholics, who composed the vast majority of the Irish people, were looking for some of the rights of citizens. Naturally, the people who had the exclusive rights in their hands did not wish to share them with those who had them not, and the object of the establishment of the Orange association was to prevent the majority, who had been kept under before, from acquiring rights which they ought to have. That is human nature. The people who have exclusive privileges necessarily and naturally try to prevent other people from sharing them with them; but that is not the case in Canada. In Canada we all have equal rights.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—That is what we want.

HON. MR. POWER—The Catholics in this country are in a small minority in every Province except Quebec, and in that Province the Protestant minority are treated with the utmost liberality. No one who has a reputation that he has any regard for is prepared to father the statement that the Protestant minority in the Province of Quebec are not treated with the utmost liberality. Almost the only question as to which differences of religion have any effect in Canada is the question of education, and as regards that most important and vital question, the Protestants of Quebec have been treated with wonderful liberality. I think that Protestants ought to be in most ways as good men as their Catholic neighbors, and in as much as there are five Protestants in Ontario to one Catholic, and the proportion is nearly the same in all of the Provinces, except Quebec, I think our Protestant brethren will be able to take care of themselves without the assistance of any such association as this. In addition to the objection which I have already mentioned to the recognition of secret societies by Parliament, the parliamentary recognition is equivalent to an admission that the society is necessary in Canada. No hon. gentleman will contend that that is the case.

HON. MR. McMILLAN—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the incorporation of this society will embolden them, or give them more privileges than they have at present to parade the streets?

HON. MR. POWER—I have said that on principle you cannot defend the incorporation of this society. There are three grounds: I take the constitutional ground; I take the ground that it is improper to recognize a secret oath-bound society, and then I say that the incorporation of this society is a recognition by Parliament of the fact that the society is necessary or useful here to-day. I say that that it is a libel on the country.

HON. MR. McMILLAN—But this Bill does not empower them to be more aggressive.

HON. MR. POWER—I shall deal with that presently. So far, I agree with the hon. gentlemen from Ottawa and Toronto, that theoretically the argument against this Bill is unanswerable. But there is a practical side to the question, too; and that I propose, with the permission of the House, to deal with very briefly. Are there any circumstances in connection with this Bill which might modify our objections? In the words of the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me, will incorporation really add anything to the power or influence of the Orange body in Canada? I do not undertake to answer that question in a very decided way myself, but we have some evidence to go upon. As far as I am concerned myself, I should be disposed to look to the case of my own Province for an answer. With the permission of the House, I shall give a very brief history of Orange incorporation in Nova Scotia. In the year 1873, the same year in which the Bill passed the Ontario Legislature, a Bill was introduced in the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia for the incorporation of the Provincial Grand Orange Lodge of Nova Scotia. That Bill did not receive a second reading. It was introduced again the following year and failed to secure a second reading. The Bill was introduced a third time in the Session of 1875; and my own impression is that in 1875 there were twice as many Orangemen in Nova Scotia as there had been in 1873. In 1875 the Bill, which is very much the same sort of measure as the one now before us, was passed without any discussion. A good deal of feeling was being stirred up throughout the Province, and the Government of the day and the members of the Legislature concluded that, although it might be a thing which could not be defended as a matter of principle, yet, as a matter of policy, it was better to pass the Bill. As I have said, the Bill passed without any discussion; and since that time we have heard very much less of Orangeism in Nova Scotia than we heard before.

HON. MR. MACDONALD(B.C.)—Where was the evil effect of it?

HON. MR. POWER—The body has fallen back to about the condition in which it was two or three years before the Bill was passed. Another fact in connection with the incorporation is that in Nova Scotia, as far as I am aware, the Orange association is not in any sense a political organization.

HON. MR. READ—It is not here, either.

HON. MR. POWER—Under these circumstances, I am placed in a somewhat different position from other members who have spoken. The Orange body is incorporated in Nova Scotia, and the additional incorporation by this Parliament will not materially affect their position in Nova Scotia; so that I might vote against this Bill without giving them ground for complaint; and, on the other hand, I might vote for the Bill, because we have the organization incorporated there, and this Bill will not give them any greater influence or weight, or any higher standing than they have already. I think one of the probable effects of incorporating the body will be that we shall hear less about them in other Provinces, as we now find is the case in Nova Scotia.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They will have no grievance.

HON. MR. POWER—There is no substantial reason why there should be an Orange association. I believe the body is held together now largely by a feeling—a mistaken feeling, no doubt—that they have a right to incorporation, which right is refused them. They are unable to look at their own body with the same eyes as men who are perfectly indifferent in the matter do, and they feel—wrongly, I think—that they have a grievance, and, as long as they feel that they have a grievance, they will keep on agitating, and we shall not get rid of this difficulty. I believe, as I say, that one of the effects of their incorporation will be that we shall hear less of them after a very little while. There are two classes of Orangemen. There is one class who practice upon the prejudices of their weaker brethern for their own advantage, political or otherwise, or for the advantage of their party; and there is the large mass of members, who are honestly under the impression that they have a serious grievance. The feeling that they have had that grievance, as I have said, keeps the body together and makes them active. If the Bill is passed, the sense of grievance will probably be removed. I should feel very strongly in favor of not passing it if I thought that by throwing it out we would be done with it; but, if we reject this Bill after it has been passed by the House of Commons, we shall have it coming back year after year; so I take it that there is a good deal to be said in favor of our freeing Parliament of this agitation by passing the Bill. There is this other circumstance—that there have been no petitions presented in this House against the Bill. I feel that, as a matter of principle, I am obliged to vote against the Bill. Apart altogether from my own religious views or prejudices, I could not vote for a Bill to recognize an association which is based upon what I consider very objectionable principles; and, if the question is pressed to a vote, I shall feel bound to vote against the Bill. At the same time, I am not myself anxious that the opposition should be pressed to a division.

HON. MR. READ—I would not have risen on this occasion to say a word if the hon. gentleman from Toronto had not charged the Orange body with almost all the crimes in the calendar. In the course of his epeech he referred to the burning of the Parliament buildings, which he attributed to the Orangemen. I do not know what authority he has for that. Many of us recollect the reasons why the Parliament buildings were burned. It was because the Rebellion Losses Bill had just been sanctioned. We know that meetings were held all over Upper Canada against the passage of the Rebellion Losses Bill, and we claim that the Governor General, in his despatches to England, did not tell what was exactly true, because he stated that there were a few petitions against the Rebellion Losses Bill, when the fact was that there were petitions from all parts of the country. I do not think, therefore, that the hon. gentleman should charge the Orangemen with having destroyed the Parliament buildings. Then the hon. gentleman complained that the Prince of Wales was not allowed to land at Kingston. It was his own fault if he did not land. The Duke of Newcastle had notified the Mayor of Kingston some time before that if there was any Orange demonstration the Prince would not land. I went fifty miles to Kingston and stopped there three days, and I should not have gone had it not been for that letter to the Mayor. I went to Kingston alone, and I stayed there during the time I have mentioned. The Prince had been at different places around this country, and we all know why the Duke of Newcastle acted as he did on that occasion. His Government then was depending on the Irish vote, and anything he could do at the time to secure that vote was what he was aiming at. It appears that where there was an Orange flag or an Orange arch it was like a red rag to a bull. He would not land at any place where the arch was not perfectly green. He was to have visited the place where I live, but when the steamer arrived, and it was found that there were arches up, he did not land. Then he went to Cobourg, but did not land there. The hon. gentleman tells us that at Toronto Lord Elgin was rotten-egged. I thought it was at Montreal. The event happened so long ago that I must have forgotten it. I thought that these things were dead, and I can see no object in reviving them. If we, on our side, wished to bring up instances of intolerance against our opponents we could have a great deal to say. I know why I became an Orangeman, though I have not been in an Orange lodge for over forty years. I think the aim of the people of this country should be to avoid causes of division. The Orange society say they have a grievance; they think that something they are entitled to is withheld from them, and they will continue to demand it until they get this Act of incorporation, and they will succeed in getting it some time or other. I think the best evidence in support of this Bill has been furnished by the hon. member for Halifax. He has told us what the experience has been in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where the Orange society has been incorporated. I do not know on what grounds he accuses Orangemen of intolerance towards Roman Catholics. I know Orangemen in Ontario who lost their election because they voted for Roman Catholic institutions. The late Mr. Benjamin and the late Mr. Anderson were defeated because they voted for the incorporation of the Sisters of Lorette at Quebec. I will not detain the House any longer, because our tempers are likely to be aroused by discussions of this kind, and the less that is said the better.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—I have not much to complain of with respect to this discussion. The remarks of my worthy confrère showing that this Bill had been before the House on many occasions, and it would not receive the sanction of Parliament, is the best evidence to my mind of the great revolution of sentiment that has taken place in the minds of the people of this country. It shows that they have come at last to recognize the fact that the Orangemen are entitled to what they seek from Parliament. A great deal has been said respecting the difficulties concerning the visit of the Prince of Wales to this country. I think the whole difficulty on that occasion arose from the fact that the Duke of Newcastle acted under Imperial instructions. It was impossible for him at that time to act otherwise than he did, because the Party Processions Act was then in operation in England, and he was compelled by force of circumstances to prevent the Prince from in any way recognizing the Orange institution in this country. But since that time the Party Processions Act has been repealed in England, and they are as free there to-day as we are in this country. Now, after all, what do we demand? Simply what is accorded on all occasions to every institution and class of men that may apply for such legislation. Is there anything wrong in that? Can there be any difficulty in granting these powers to an association which is known to be loyal to the Crown? Loyalty is one of their fundamental principles. I do not think, judging from the array of names that appear as corporators to that Bill, that you can hesitate for one moment to place in their hands the powers they ask for.

HON. MR. POWER—They were not loyal to the Prince of Wales.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—They have always been loyal to the Crown of Great Britain. At that time there was a disability. The loyal Orangemen of this country consider that they have a grievance. They have asked for this Bill over and over again. Why it has been denied them I cannot tell. It is true that at one time an Act was passed in Ontario and submitted here, and the Orangemen were told that the Federal authorities had nothing to do with it, and that they had to get the consent of the local authorities in Ontario. That was refused, and that was another grievance. Now we want to try to remove this grievance. I believe that the passage of this Bill will have the same effect throughout the Dominion that the incorporation of the order has had in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. This legislation is necessary, because this body is supreme, and the provincial bodies are subject to them, and therefore they require to have one grand controlling power over the other minor bodies. I am very glad to hear from my hon. friend from Ottawa that he at last recognizes the fact that there has been a change in the sentiments of the people of this country, and that they are willing to render substantial justice to people who have been denied it for many years. I would remind him that he has himself received more assistance from the Orangemen of this section than any other politician that I know of. We supported him when he advocated the adoption of the separate school system, and I ran great risk myself in supporting him as the representative of this city because he voted as a majority of the people here thought he should not have voted on that question. Reference has been made to the difference in the treatment accorded the minority in Quebec as compared with the minority of Ontario. I think we are just as lenient to the minority in this Province as the majority are to the minority in Quebec. There is no difference in that respect at all. We want to try to efface those differences altogether, and to become a united people. I believe that this Bill will do more to accomplish that result than any measure that has been before Parliament up to the present time. I hope the House will pass this measure and give this body of men the recognition that I think they are entitled to, and which they should have received long ago at the hands of the Dominion Parliament. I am very glad that the discussion is at an end, and that there has been nothing of an irritating character said in the course of the debate. I should like to have the Bill passed without a vote, but if a vote must be taken I hope the measure will be sustained by a large majority.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was agreed to by the following vote:—

SAMUEL MAY RELIEF BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called,—Second reading of Bill (16) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Samuel May."

HON. MR. ABBOTT said: With regard to this Bill, there has already been a little discussion in the House, and I should like my hon. friend who has charge of it to postpone the further consideration of it until Monday next. There is another Bill of a similar character coming up which I expect to have here on Friday, and I should like to consider them together.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that the Bill be read the second time on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (V) "An Act to amend the Acts respecting the North-West Territories." (Mr. Abbott.)

Bill (W) "An Act respecting Grants of Public Lands." (Mr. Abbott.)

Bill (X) "An Act to amend Cap. 127 of the Revised Statutes, entitled: 'An Act respecting Interest.'" (Mr. Abbott.)

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called—Second reading Bill (9) "An Act further to amend the Adulteration Act, Cap. 107 of the Revised Statutes."

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved that the Order of the Day be discharged, as the Bill had not been distributed.

HON. MR. SCOTT — Are there any changes from the Bill as introduced in the other House?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I have not seen the Bill, and am not, therefore, able to inform my hon. friend.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I might mention that the principle which the hon. gentleman laid down yesterday, and which I thought was an extremely good one, should be followed in this case. It would be infinitely better if the draughtsman should consolidate the amendments. Last Session we made changes, and this Session we are asked to make further changes, and it is extremely difficult to ascertain without such a consolidation what the changes are.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—As soon as we have the reprint of the Bill I shall endeavor to meet my hon. friend's view.

HON. MR. PAQUET—Last year the hon. gentleman promised that he would endeavor to have the law amended so as to provide a legal standard for milk. Under the existing law it is impossible to convict a vendor of milk for adulteration, as we have no legal standard.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I promised to do it as far as I could do so.

HON. MR. PAQUET—After I had the conversation with the hon. gentleman, I promised the Dairy Association that I would urge upon the Government to have a legal standard fixed, and I would like to know if there is any hope that we may get something definite this Session?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I think I explained to my hon. friend the difficulty which existed last year—that it was almost impossible to determine a standard percentage, because the percentage of fatty matter in the milk of some animals was at times so extremely low that it would not be convenient to make that the standard, and at the same time it would be an extreme hardship to provide that the milk of Holstein cows, for instance, should be excluded because it was not up to the standard. I have not discussed the matter with my colleague this Session, but I shall do so before we proceed with the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was discharged.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE, CHEQUES AND PROMISSORY NOTES BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (6) "An Act relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes." He said: I suppose the House will not expect me to enter upon the details of this Bill on its second reading. It is almost a reproduction of the existing law—in fact, it is a sort of code for promissory notes and bills of exchange, the first that has been made under the power given to the Federal Parliament by the British North America Act. Every clause will be considered in detail in committee, and in order that members may have time to look carefully into the Bill and make up their minds about it, I propose to submit it to Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

HON. MR. SCOTT—This Bill has just been handed to me, and I am not in a position to say much about it; but my hon. friend will remember the promise he made yesterday, that he would get somebody in the Department of Justice to strike off a few slips showing what the changes are in this Bill?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I have given such orders. It is not very easy to show what all the changes are, but I propose to show in what respect the law is to be changed.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The changes are, briefly, to make the law uniform throughout the Dominion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 4 p. m.

NORTH CANADIAN ATLANTIC RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraph and Harbors, reported Bill (88) "An Act to incorporate the North Canadian Atlantic Railway and Steamship Company," with an amendment. He said: The substance of this amendment is that it affords time in which the competing line can have legislative power to sell their property, if they so agree, to this company. It provides also, in case of difference of opinion, a mode of adjusting the price, and in the meantime this company shall have only running powers over the competing line. This amendment was reported to us today by a sub-committee to whom the whole matter was referred. The committee, of which I had the pleasure of being chairman, had before them the difficult task of reconciling the passage of this important measure with a due regard to the legitimate interests of the competing line; and I am happy to say that this object was attained in a manner that commended itself to the support and concurrence of all the parties interested in it. This happy result has been attained, I think it is fair to the committee to say, in consequence of the patient hearing which was given to all parties on the question, this being the last of three distinct sittings which the committee devoted to the consideration of this measure. I may be also permitted to hope that this amendment may receive approval in another place, and that the result will be that this measure, in which a large portion of the people of Quebec have evinced such an interest, may be brought to a successful issue. I have therefore great pleasure in moving that the House do now adopt this report. My reason for doing so is this: It is a report concurred in by all the parties interested, unanimously concurred in by the committee, and I hope it will receive, not only the unanimous concurrence of this House, but of the other branch of Parliament. At this period of the Session, and with the prospect of a holiday before us, it is important that the Bill should be sent down to the other House, so that it may be concurred in there, and be in a position to be passed upon with other Bills, at the first meeting of the representatives of the Crown, which I am led to believe may be possible before the end of next week.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not see any objection to the Bill taking this present stage. I have seen the amendment, and it is an important one, but, at the same time, one which solves all the difficulties between the proposed company and the existing company, which is a railway running east from Quebec about 21 miles; but there is another point in the Bill to which my attention has been called, and while I hope that the Bill may be allowed to take this stage and get so much nearer completion, I propose to ask my hon. friend to let the third reading stand over until Wednesday, in order that this point may be considered.

HON. MR. MILLER—It was understood before the committee that the amendment would be concurred in to-day, and the third reading taken, and this course was recommended by the committee. The chairman was authorized to say that this was the desire, and that no notice would be required for any amendments that might be proposed at the third reading. The hon. member from Montreal has, I think, an amendment to move to a very important clause of the Bill, and it was understood that he might make that amendment without the usual notice required for amendments to private Bills. Unless there is some urgent reason for postponing the third reading until Wednesday, I do not see why, under the circumstances, it might not be read the third time immediately.

HON. MR. POWER—As a private member of the House, I feel very strongly that the step which the hon. leader of the House has recommended should be taken. We are not very near the end of the Session; there is not the slightest risk of the Bill if it has to wait a couple of days, and I think his suggestion is a proper one.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I would say, in answer to my hon. friend from Richmond, that the point to which I refer is one of immense public importance, and I am not satisfied that it has received proper consideration.

HON. MR. MILLER—What clause is that?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The bridge clause. I do not know that that was taken up in committee.

HON. MR. MILLER—It was, and I voted against it, and if the motion is made I shall vote against it here.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It has not received such consideration from my colleagues as they desire to give it, and I was requested by the Minister of Railways to ask to have the Bill stand over until they have time to consider it.

HON. MR. DICKEY—It was brought to our notice, because an injustice to others might be involved if that fact were not brought out. An hon. member did propose to make a motion in the committee to-day with regard to that very clause, to strike it out, and it was felt that it was a matter, the committee having already divided upon it and having recommended the clause, that had better be placed before the House, and in order to meet the convenience of the hon. member who wanted to make a motion in amendment, it was agreed to recommend to the House that he should be at liberty to do so without giving regular notice. The matter was brought before us and very fully considered. However, the motion now before the House is for the adoption of the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—The third reading of the Bill being opposed to-day by some members, it is impossible for me to proceed. Under the circumstances, I move that the third reading take place on Wednesday next.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I presume that if any amendment should be moved on Wednesday next my hon. friend will consider that he has notice of it.

HON. MR. MILLER—No; I should think any amendments to be moved on Wednesday should be placed on the Order Paper.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend is not reasonable on that point. I have asked for the postponement of the third reading in order that the Government may, to-morrow, have an opportunity to decide on this bridge clause. I cannot foresee what they may decide upon, whether to refuse permission to construct a bridge, or whether they will approve of it; and I am not, therefore, in a position to give notice of any amendment which it may be desirable to move on Wednesday next.

HON. MR. MILLER—I think the remarks of the leader of the House shows great laxity on the part of the Government on this important matter. The measure passed through the House of Commons, and no objection was raised to it there, though the Premier made a general objection to further bridging the St. Lawrence. I think it would be very wrong and a very unfortunate thing to permit any company to obstruct the navigation of the St. Lawrence to the extent that it would be obstructed below Quebec as this Bill contemplates. The promoter of the Bill says that unless he gets the clause providing for the bridge the whole scheme will fall to the ground. It would be a very easy matter at the third reading to move the six months' hoist if the Government object to the clause.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—That is what I propose to do on Wednesday next if the Government should come to the conclusion that they would rather not have another bridge across the St. Lawrence down there. All that I ask is, that I may be excused from placing on the Notice Paper any amendment that the Government may think it advisable to have moved at the third reading.

HON. MR. POWER—After the declaration made by the leader in a full House the promoter of the Bill cannot complain that he has no notice, and I do not think that any member of the House would raise a technical objection of that sort under the circumstances. The rules are based on common sense, and it would be contrary to common sense to expect the leader of the Government in this House to give notice of an amendment when he does not know what the Government may decide to do. He has, however, notified the promoter of the Bill that he may find it necessary to move an amendment to this particular clause.

HON. MR. MILLER—If the rules are based on common sense they shoud be carried out.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The notice might be given on Monday.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—I shall have no objection if a motion is made on Wednesday without further notice, because I understand the only question affected is the power to build the bridge. Meanwhile, I will communicate with the members of my company and see what position we will take. I think an amendment to this clause would injure that grand scheme. It is necessary that our railway should have connections with the railway systems on both sides of the St. Lawrence. It is true there is a company now in existence which intends to build the bridge, but this charter was granted in 1887, and will lapse in the month of June next, and no power during the Session will be granted to the company—at least there is no Bill before the House. Under the circumstances, I think it is in the interest of this company to have the bridge clause, so as to be enabled to float bonds at once. The whole matter will be left in the hands of the Government. The Governor in Council will have the power to decide everything. If the other bridge is not built they might grant our company the right to go on and build a bridge.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Sufficient notice has been given that the amendment if made will be to the bridge clause.

HON. MR. MURPHY—I have no idea of frustrating this great enterprise by depriving the company of the right to build the bridge, but my instructions from Montreal are to this effect, that it is marvellous that such a Bill should have been before the House and the shipping interests should not have been informed of it. It is still more marvellous that it should have passed the Railway Committee without any provision being made as to the height of the bridge above the navigable channel of the river. That is the objection that I made to-day, and I asked to have that clause struck out; but with the assurance of the leader of the House that the matter will be considered by the Government to-morrow, I am satisfied that they will see that the bridge is built at the proper height, and that all other conditions necessary in the public interest will be attended to.

HON. MR. LACOSTE—All those matters are, by this clause, to be decided by the Governor in Council.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills, reported without amendment from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, were read the third time, and passed:—

Bill (74) "An Act respecting the Confederation Life Association." (Mr. Vidal.)

Bill (72) "An Act respecting the Summerside Bank." (Mr. Howlan.)

Bill (32) "An Act to incorporate the Grand Orange Lodge of British America." (Mr. Clemow.)

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill No. (9) "An Act further to amend the Adulteration Act, Chapter 107 of the Revised Statutes." He said: This Bill, though long, is largely a reprint of former clauses which required alteration. The first two clauses that occupy the first three pages require a change in the middle of them which is not easy to be found if printed by themselves with directions where they should be inserted.

HON. MR. POWER—It is not easy to find them in the Bill.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It will be easy to find an amendment in the Bill when it is substituted for another, because then it will be in the Bill, in the body of it. The alteration is in sub-clause No. 7, and it is required to make one of the definitions of adulteration harmonious with the new provision of the Act, that in certain cases the Governor in Council may fix a standard of each article of food, and declare what its component parts shall be, and this clause is put in for the purpose of making that one of the definitions of adulteration. The only other alteration in that clause is to provide that the word "analyst" shall include any member of the Board appointed under the authority of sub-section 2 of section 3 of this Act, and any assistant analyst to the Chief Analyst at Ottawa. The first three pages of the Bill are all as they are in the Statutes, with these two exceptions. The alteration in section 12 is simply a verbal one. The word "such certificate" is used in the Act, and it seems to be doubtful as it stands what certificate is referred to; so it is altered to represent such certificate as is referred to in the preceding section. Section 5 of the Act provides for the publication of the proceedings of the analyst, and the distribution of these publications for public information. Section 8 is the clause to which I have just referred, which enables the Governor in Council to establish a standard of the component parts of any article of food, drug or compound, where it is not otherwise provided for under the terms of the Act. Section 9 is substituted for a previous clause, making much more equitable provisions with respect to trials of charges for adulteration, and providing, where the facts are such as to show the innocence of the accused, or his ignorance of the adulteration that has been practised, that he is in some cases absolutely discharged. In section 11 the only alteration is the inserting of the word "procuring," to provide for making any expenses incurred in procuring and analyzing a sample of food, drug or fertilizer a portion of the costs of the proceedings against the party convicted.

HON. MR. POWER—There is one point in connection with this Adulteration Act. It is a very useful law if it were carried out. We passed this Act one year, amended it the next year, and the third year further amended it, and I think the provisions of it are very carefully drawn, and it is a very good Act; but what is the use of legislating that such and such shall be deemed adulterations, for which the party shall be punished, and then when these adultera-tions take place the party is never punished?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend is mistaken.

HON. MR. POWER—Whatever the practice may be in this part of the country, in the lower Provinces I have not heard of a single case where any seller of an adulterated article has been prosecuted for contravention of the Act.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I can speak for my own Province, and I can assure my hon. friend that there have been repeated prosecutions for adulteration there. I do not know what the statistics of prosecutions in other Provinces are, but I know that in the city of Montreal there are many prosecutions under the Act. What the Government are doing is to so amend the law as to make the conviction of offenders against it sure. There seems to be an unaccountable disposition on the part of magistrates to let off those parties. Probably it is because adulterations are so common, or it is because tradesmen are supposed not to know much about them; but the attention of the Department is more and more directed to this particular subject, with a view of endeavoring to make this system effective. I omitted to mention, with regard to a standard for milk, that I was unable to see the Minister to-day, owing to his being occupied in departmental business, but before the Bill comes up for the third reading I shall be able to give my hon. friend an answer.

HON. MR. REESOR—I beg to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that a great many parties have been let off, because the goods sold were adulterated before they reached them—so far as the evidence went, they did not know that the goods were adulterated. It would be a great hardship for a man to be fined in a case of that kind for adulterating goods. The Act has accomplished a great deal of good, by putting dealers more on their guard against introducing adulterated articles than before, and the public are more on the watch to see that the goods they buy are what they are represented to be.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will perceive that the plea which he says has been put forth, and which defendants are entitled to, and on which they are acquitted, must be a bonâ fide plea; but the fact is, that most of the dealers—and this is one of the difficulties it is almost impossible to get over—most of the dealers in articles usually adulterated must know whether they are adulterated or not, not because they have adulterated them, or examined them, but they know from the price at which they buy and sell. When they sell a box of coffee below a certain price they know whether it is all coffee or not; but it cannot be said that they have any special knowledge of it. They take it in good faith as being coffee, and sell it as coffee, just as they get it, and it is very hard before a judicial tribunal to say: "You must know, being a skilled grocer, that there was chicory in that coffee." That is one of the great difficulties, and I do not know how it is going to be got over, about articles sold by tradesmen.

HON. MR. REESOR—A great many grocers sell coffee openly as a mixture of coffee and chicory.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—They are bound to describe it in that way now.

HON. MR. REESOR—So far, I don't know that they are necessarily to blame. Parties want cheap articles, and buy them adulterated; other dealers sell the article in a pure state and grind it before the purchaser.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

SAMUEL MAY RELIEF BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called,—Second reading Bill (16) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Samuel May."

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) said: When this Bill came up for a second reading on a previous occasion the leader of the House requested me to postpone it until a Bill of a similar character came up from the other House. That Bill has not reached us, and, as the leader of the House is not here, and he has requested me to ask a further postponement, I move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that the Bill be read a second time on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

HON. MR. READ moved the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament.

The motion was agreed to.

ELBOW RIVER WATER CO.'S BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Bill (76) "An Act to incorporate the Elbow River Water Power Company," was introduced and read the first time.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED moved the suspension of the 41st Rule of the House, and that the Bill be read the second time presently. He said: The reason I make this application is that a delegation has arrived from Calgary, consisting of the Mayor and some of the councillors, and they are desirous of presenting their views before the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors on this question. As we contemplate an adjournment for some time, and as it would be impossible for those gentlemen to wait over the adjournment, I trust that hon. members will allow the Rules to be suspended and the Bill to be read the second time presently, so that these gentlemen may have an opportunity to appear before the Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY AND MINING CO.'S BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill (34) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company," was introduced and read the first time.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté) moved the suspension of the 41st Rule, and that the Bill be read the second time presently. He said: I think the House will treat this Bill with as much consideration as they did the last one, and I think I have a good precedent to ask that the Rule be suspended.

HON. MR. POWER—I think this is the first time that a request of this sort has been made without any reason being given. I fancy there can hardly be any good reason, for if there were, no one is better qualified to put the reason before the House than the hon. gentleman who has made this motion.

HON. MR. READ—As for my qualification in this instance, I may say I have none; I do not know anything about the Bill. I was simply asked to move the suspension of the Rule; but as there is an objection, I beg to withdraw the motion, and to move that the Bill be read the second time on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PONTIAC PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill (87) "An Act respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company," was introduced and read the first time.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I am very much in the position of my hon. friend opposite with regard to this Bill. The promoter of the Bill simply asked me to move the suspension of the Rule and that the Bill be read the second time presently; but as he has given me no explanation for adopting such a course, and as there is an objection to it, I move that the Bill be read the second time on Wednesday next.

HON. MR. MILLER—I do not know even that that motion should be allowed. This Bill contemplates the building of a bridge across the river Ottawa. I think the policy which is now in favor is to obstruct these navigable streams as little as possible, and perhaps, second to the St. Lawrence alone, is the Ottawa River in this respect. I am not in favor of any one of these projects, and I give my hon. friend notice that I must have ample evidence as to the necessity for this bridge when the Bill is before the committee, before I give it my support.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—There are some very objectionable features in this Bill. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that a Bill has already passed this House providing for one bridge across the Ottawa River here. The promoters have incorporated in this Bill similar rights and privileges, and have also incorporated other rights and privileges of which they have given no notice.

HON. MR. MCKINDSEY—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to discuss the principle of the Bill on this motion for a second reading at a future day.

THE SPEAKER—The point of order is not well taken.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—This Bill asks for the right to build a bridge across the Ottawa, almost at the same point for which another charter has already been granted, and for other rights which the original charter did not give them. They also apply, without notice, for power to build a foot passenger bridge, and to collect tolls. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that when the Morrisburg Railway was before the House, the provision for a bridge across the Ottawa was struck out, on the understanding that there should be only one bridge allowed across the Ottawa River at this point; therefore, it would be very wrong to allow this company to have powers that were struck out of the other company's Bill on the same principle. I think that when the Bill comes before the committee I shall be able to show that they have incorporated in it several clauses of which notice has not been given, and I shall oppose it on several particulars.

HON. MR. VIDAL—This discussion only shows the inconvenience of debating the principle of the Bill at the wrong stage. I am constrained to say, with the Bill in my hand, that the hon. gentleman from Ottawa has entirely misinterpreted its contents. This Bill merely asks for an extension of time, in order to allow the company to complete their works. There is nothing in the Bill about foot passengers and tolls.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

HON. MR. SMITH moved that the House do now adjourn.

HON. MR. PERLEY—Before the House adjourns, I wish to state that owing to an irregularity in the notice of motion submitted by me in our routine proceedings to-day, I give notice for Thursday, the 27th instant, that when the House adjourns on that day it do stand adjourned until the 15th of April next, at 8.30 p.m.

HON. MR. MILLER—I would like to know why we were brought here at all to-day, unless it was to hear our prayers. There is no business to be done, and I do not see why the House was not adjourned over Friday until Wednesday next, to allow those gentlemen, who could have done so, to go to their homes. I get up to look at the House, and I am reminded very much of the words of a celebrated orator when he was brought before a Scotch audience. After the cheers had subsided he said: "What have we all come here to-day for? Curiosity? No," said he, "curiosity never brought so many Scotchmen together? It is something else." I say there is neither curiosity nor business, nor anything else that has brought us together. There is no business before the House and no reason why we should not have adjourned over until Wednesday.

HON. MR. DEVER—We could not have adjourned without a notice.

HON. MR. MILLER—The adjournment could have been moved, and that motion could have been carried by the unanimous consent of the House. I contend that the Senate occupy a much more ludicrous position before the eyes of the country when we are brought here to do no business, but merely to say our prayers, than if we had adjourned. Any one who has followed the business of Parliament must know that the Senate for years has given conscientious attention to the legislation of the Dominion in its committees. There is where the work is done, and I can turn to the hon. gentleman on my right (Mr. Dickey) and say that perhaps no member of the Senate deserves more from Parliament than he does for the consideration, the attention, the ability and the patience which he has given to committee work. And it is telling, too, because you find the other day the House of Commons seriously considering the proposal to send all private Bill legislation to this House, according to the custom prevailing in England in regard to legislation in the Imperial Parliament. I repeat that the wise, careful and attentive consideration which this House gives and has been giving for years to the legislation of the country is telling—and perhaps against hostile public opinion—in favor of this House. I do not think, under these circumstances, that we should be called upon in this way to show that we have nothing to do, when the House of Commons has adjourned over Tuesday. I thought the other day, when some important Bill came up before the House, for instance the Promissory Note Bill, which would take some time in committee, and the North-West Lands Bill, the North-West Government Bill and some other Bills, that we might have them to-day. I do not see why these Bills were not remitted to this House to-day. Is it to suit the convenience of the gentleman that leads the House, and who had to go to Montreal, that the public business of the country is to be shoved aside in this way? I may feel it my duty before Parliament rises to submit a resolution to the Senate on this question.

HON. MR. SMITH—I am quite sure that had the leader of this House known the wishes of the hon. Senator from Richmond he would very likely have complied with them; but the hon. gentleman had some business to look after, to-day, in Montreal. He is to be here on Wednesday morning, and there is considerable business to be done on Wednesday and Thursday before the Easter adjournment. I think the hon. leader, on all occasions, endeavors to comply with the wishes of the majority of this House, even against his own convenience. To-morrow being a holiday, it is my intention to move that this House do stand adjourned until Wednesday next, and Wednesday and Thursday will be sufficient to bring up all arrears of business to that date.

HON. MR. MILLER—I have no doubt at all that everything that has been said by the hon. gentleman is quite correct, but I ask this House to consider first what this body represents. This body represents the highest court in the Dominion. It represents the first branch of the Parliament of a great country. It should not forget its dignity and its rights; and what are we called upon to adjourn over for? Why, to suit the convenience of an individual member of the House.

HON. MR. SMITH– No; no.

HON. MR. MILLER—I say it is, and unless this thing is moderated I will submit a motion and record the opinion of the House as to the way generally in which this House is treated with regard to Ministerial measures.

HON. MR. SMITH—I should say that the leader of the House intended to move an adjournment until the 7th of April, and that would have have taken in Easter week and a few days more.

HON. MR. MILLER—It is quite time that this House should speak out, if we do not want to go down to nothing.

THE SPEAKER—I understand that the motion now made by the Hon. Mr. Smith is to this effect: That the House do now adjourn until Wednesday afternoon at three o'clock.

HON. MR. MILLER—There is no notice of that motion before the House.

HON. MR. POWER—To-morrow will be a statutory holiday.

HON. MR. MILLER—There is no notice of this motion before the House, and I take objection to it on a point of order.

THE SPEAKER—I hope that this, matter will be arranged without any further feeling. I suppose that Parliament can sit every day if it pleases, Sunday included. There are however, certain days which are considered as public holidays or fêtes d'obligation. I believe that to-morrow is one of these. The hon. gentleman in making his first motion had forgotten this and then got up and moved the motion now before the House, that when the House adjourns it stands adjourned until Wednesday next. If the hon. gentleman insists on his objection that the motion cannot be made without notice, of course it is fatal.

HON. MR. POWER—It is to be hoped that the hon. gentleman from Richmond will not insist on his objection, for we shall be in a worse position to-morrow than we are in to-day. There is nothing at all on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow, and nothing can come before the House. The House of Commons is not now sitting, and we have the only Bills that are in a position to come before us from the House of Commons; consequently, if the hon. gentleman from Richmond insists upon his objection we shall have nothing at all to do to-morrow but come here and say our prayers; and I may say, as one member of the House that I do not get a great deal of spiritual advantage from that exercise.

HON. MR. VIDAL—The objection is a fatal one if the hon. gentleman insists upon it, but I do not think that he will stand alone in this matter, and say that his will is to prevail against the will of the whole House.

HON. MR. MILLER—If other hon. gentlemen get as little advantage from the prayers as the hon. gentleman from Halifax does, and there is to be no other business before us, I shall not press my objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 4 p.m.

ELBOW RIVER WATER POWER CO.'S BILL.

REJECTED.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (76) "An Act to incorporate the Elbow River Water Power Company," recommending that the Bill be not passed, as it would be contrary to the public interests. He said: As the rule requires that reasons should be given for postponing a Bill, I may briefly explain why we make this recommendation. This corporation asks for power to appropriate the Elbow River for the purpose of speculating. This river, as it happens, passes through the southern margin of the city of Calgary. Looking to the future of that city, which occupies perhaps the most commanding position in the North-West, and looking to the vital importance of its water supply, the committee considered, with very little difference of opinion, that it would be most unwise to allow that water privilege to be taken away, and to grant the power of diverting it entirely from its present course to another termination in the Bow River, and they, therefore, recommend that it is against the interests of the city of Calgary, represented before the committee by the Mayor and Corporation, and, therefore, against the public interest. I apprehend that the House will have no difficulty in agreeing with the committee that such a Bill should not receive the sanction of this House. I therefore move that the report be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

HON. MR. PERLEY moved: That when the House adjourns on Thursday, the 27th instant, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 15th day of April, at half-past eight o'clock in the evening. He said: It is understood that there is very little legislation before the Senate now, and the practice has been that the Senate adjourns over Easter week. It is thought desirable to make the adjournment, this time, a little longer, to enable hon. gentlemen who live at a distance to visit their homes. Members from the North-West and from the Maritime Provinces cannot take advantage of those adjournments; if the proposed adjournment is granted they can. I understand that the Budget is to be brought down to-morrow, and that the debate thereon is likely to occupy several days, when no business will be brought up to this House. Short adjournments are of no value to members who do not live within a reasonable distance; but if the adjournment proposed in my motion is considered too long, it might be reduced to the 9th of April.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B. C.)—Better make it a week longer, so that British Columbia members can go home.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I am taken by surprise in this matter. I understood from my hon. friends that they had withdrawn this motion for to-day, and had made it for to-morrow, and I see another motion to the same effect on the Order Paper for to-morrow. I think my hon. friend had better withdraw his motion. It is not in the interest of the public or in the interest of legislation that these adjournments should take place. When we come to look at the number of Bills of great importance, such as the Banking Bill, Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange Bill, and other important Bills that are to come before this House, I do not think it is advisable that we should have such a long adjournment. If we do adjourn, it should be simply over the Easter holidays, the same as the House of Commons. They will probably meet every day except one next week. In consequence of those repeated applications for adjournments, the business of this House is not in a satisfactory position. They are generally brought up for discussion by gentlemen who do not take an active interest in the business of the House. There is no necessity for adjourning beyond Tuesday. The banks are open on other days, business is going on, and men are at work in the streets and in their shops, yet the Senate is asked, for some particular purpose, to adjourn for several days. Yesterday the Senate did not meet, though the pages and messengers were on hand; the Senators alone were absent.

HON. MR. ROBITAILLE — Yesterday was a statutory holidy.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—If my hon. friend wished to say his prayers on that day there was no reason why he should not do so; but even that hon. gentleman I found about the House, as well as others, though it was a day supposed to be set apart for prayers. I do not know that there is anything obligatory that we should do no work on that day.

HON. MR. ROBITAILLE—It is a statutory holiday.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—There are several important Bills before the committee of which I am chairman—the Divorce Committee—that we cannot go on with, and if this long adjournment takes place the effect may be that justice will not be done. I think we had better alter the rules of our House and the constitution of the Senate, and provide that all those days that hon. gentlemen take as holidays should not be taken at the expense of the public. We are called here to do important business, and we should stay and attend to it. If the adjourned days were called absent days, and were taken from the indemnity of members, there would not be so many adjournments asked for. I say in all earnestness that it is not in our interests to adjourn; because, after an adjournment, whether long or short, we come here rushed with business, and instead of discussing the public measures before us in a deliberate way, they will be put through in a manner not creditable to this House. I contend that we had better adjourn the Senate altogether and amend the constitution, if we are to bring upon ourselves, by our own conduct, the adverse criticism of the public. I do hope the leader of the House, having the responsibility on his shoulders of seeing that the business of the Senate is prosecuted effectively, will, in the interest of legislation, and in the public interest, oppose prolonged holidays as being detrimental to the best interests of the country. We had an adjournment in the early part of the Session for ten days. Then we had another adjournment of ten days.

AN HON. GENTLEMAN—No; only a week.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Well, say a week; yet, here we are asked again for another adjournment of two weeks. I was going to say I wonder that my hon. friend has the audacity to rise in the House and propose such a motion as this. The Bills before us should occupy the undivided attention of the House for a week if properly discussed, and I do hope that the leader of the Government will state to the House that it is not in the public interest that there should be any longer adjournment than is necessitated by the Easter holidays. If the adjournment does take place there are Bills before the Divorce Committee that cannot be proceeded with; members of the Committee will not stay here and proceed with the consideration of these important questions during an adjournment.

HON. MR. ALMON—When did the Divorce Committee meet last?

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Some time last week. We had a meeting since then, and, in consequence of the evidence not being printed, the committee felt that they were not prepared to discuss the merits of the Bills, or decide upon the important questions which they involved. I say the effect of this adjournment will be to postpone the consideration of those questions before the committee, and will no doubt have the effect of depriving those persons who are looking to this Senate for the passage of these Bills of the relief which they seek from Parliament.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.)—I move in amendment, that when the House adjourns on Thursday next it stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 9th of April. I am quite willing that an adjournment should take place, but I think that ten or twelve days will be ample to enable my hon. friend who made this motion to go to his home, remain there a couple of days, and return.

HON. MR. ALMON—I am very much confused by the different amendments. I would like to know what the leader of the House has to say to these propositions, and also how senators will be treated on the Intercolonial Railway. When Sir Charles Tupper had charge of the Intercolonial Railway, the members of this House had free passage over that line. Under the system that prevails now we travel at half fare. If we put on white chokers and called ourselves "reverend"—and I do not see why we should not—we would get the same rate. If I was to travel as a drummer selling boots and shoes I would get the same rate, although I have less baggage. I hear that the management of the road has been very much improved of late by adopting suggestions that I have made in this House from time to time. For instance, I told them time and again that they could shorten the journey between Montreal and Halifax by having breakfast at one place instead of two. They used to have breakfast at Truro and Amherst; now they have it at only one of these places. I also told them that they could save time by taking water at stations where they had to stop for other purposes. I should have thought the Minister of Railways and all his deputies would have waited on me and thanked me for all the suggestions I gave them, and which they have adopted, by which they have shortened the journey between Montreal and Halifax some six hours. We have now only one night in the Pullman, whereas we had two before my suggestions were adopted. I should like to ask what the leader of the House thinks about making the Intercolonial Railway free for senators travelling to and from the capital in connection with the public business. I do not agree with the hon. member from Lunenburg on the question of consulting the people on public questions. For instance, I should like to meet the people of Halifax and ascertain whether they prefer the Harvey Short Line or the one from Rivière du Loup to Moncton. Halifax wants both; but if they were told that they could get only one they might state which they preferred. I do not know that the hon. member from Lunenburg would have any occasion to consult his constituents. There is no canal or railway in which they are interested. There is a little packet which goes to Halifax and furnishes communication with civilisation. We who live in civilised communities would like to go and find out what our constituents think on public questions.

HON. MR. POWER—I am in favor of the amendment moved by the hon. member from New Westminster. It has been the custom to adjourn for about twelve days at Easter in past Sessions. That is all that the hon. member proposes. The House of Commons, as I understand, will adjourn for a week.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—No; no.

HON. MR. POWER—I have fairly good authority for saying so. My informant is one of the Ministry. Perhaps the hon. member from Lunenburg has something later and more authoritative. I think that the speech made by the hon. gentleman is one that we are all familiar with. We have heard it already twice this Session, and at least twice every Session for some years. The only new thing that appeared in his speech is the fact that the committee of which he is chairman would be interfered with to some extent by the proposed adjournment. With the exception of that reference, the hon. gentleman might as well have said: "If hon. members will refer to my speech, made a month ago, at the last adjournment, they will see my sentiments." It would have saved time and covered the ground just as effectually. Take my own case. I am like a good many other members who come from a distance. I have been here nearly two and a-half months attending to the public business whenever there was any to be attended to. Easter is at hand, and we propose to adjourn as usual. Now, the question is whether the adjournment at Easter will be made so that it will suit members who live at a distance from the capital or not. Hon. gentlemen who live comparatively near Ottawa should show a little consideration for the convenience of those who live a little distance away.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—No.

HON. MR. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island says "No."

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—I say, no.

HON. MR. POWER—This is a free country, and people are at liberty to express their opinions. It so happens that the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island would not go home no matter how long the recess was. As for the hon. member from Lunenburg, his home at present really is in Montreal, and not in Lunenburg; therefore, he is not anxious that we should have a long adjournment. If I thought that the public business would suffer owing to this adjournment I should not support the motion, but I do not think it will suffer. There is not the slightest possibility that Parliament will be prorogued before the 1st of May, so that at the very lowest and most moderate calculation we shall have at least three weeks to transact whatever business may come before us. Any gentleman who has noticed the vast amount of work done during the last week of the Session by this House will understand that we will have no difficulty in dealing with any business that may come before us during the three weeks that must elapse after the close of this adjournment. The object in selecting Thursday is to enable gentlemen from Manitoba to reach their homes by Sunday. With respect to the vast amount of work which the hon. gentleman has given us to understand we have before us, I contend he is quite mistaken. There is only one Order for to-morrow—that is, Committee of the Whole House on the Adulteration Bill. The business of the committees is very well up. There are almost no Bills before the committees and the public business will not suffer at all owing to this adjournment. I hope that hon. gentlemen who live comparatively near the capital and who have had several opportunities during the Session to visit their homes will not now deal in a niggardly or churlish spirit with those who live some distance away.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—I think I might pay the hon. member from Halifax the same compliment that he paid the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, because I think we have heard similar sentiments from his lips on other occasions.

HON. MR. POWER—Never; this is the first time that I have spoken in the same direction.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—With the exception that on other occasions he did not differ so far from me. I think we should not have long adjournments. As to the fairness of accommodating gentlemen who live a distance from the capital, such considerations should not enter into the votes given by the members of this House. We are sent here to attend to the public business, and for no other purpose. And when we begin to weigh the cost and inconvenience which different members will suffer personally, I say we are departing from our proper duty. I was anxious to hear from the leader of the Government what his view was with regard to this adjournment, because I presume that whatever the Government approve of will necessarily be carried. I have a recollection that when the House adjourned the first time after the opening of the Session we had from the leader of the House a distinct pledge that no more adjournments would be asked for this side of Easter, and that the House would then be in a position to rise before Easter. I know that circumstances have occurred with regard to the hon. gentleman himself which I, in common with others, regret, which caused his absence, but having returned to us it is the more incumbent on him to economise all the time that we can and waste none. I was here two day before the opening of the Session and have been here ever since, though I have business that I could attend to if I could only be at home. I am not going to allow anything of this kind to weigh with me at all. Let us have no adjournment whatever, except for the Easter holidays, and then let it be of the smallest possible dimensions.

HON. MR. PROWSE—Before taking a seat in this Chamber, and before receiving my appointment to the Senate, I was led to believe that the hon. gentlemen composing this body were gentlemen who were imbued with a high sense of the important position they occupy; that they are not responsible like gentlemen who occupy seats in another place—not directly responsible to the people—but were chosen as men who would be responsible to a higher authority, the best interests of their country and their own consciences. Since coming here I have been impressed with the idea that the deliberations of this hon. House are not meeting the expectations of the people, and I am to some extent disappointed. My experience since I came to the Senate has been that whenever any important question was proposed which would be worthy of consideration in this Chamber for a week, it was passed over in a few minutes. I refer to two of those in particular—one, the question introduced by the hon. gentleman from Calgary in reference to immigration, which is one of the most important questions that could be considered by this Chamber or by any other body, in the present condition of the Dominion. It was passed over with one or two speeches. Then there was the very important question, perhaps not second to the first one in importance, introduced by the hon. gentleman from Manitoba (Mr. Boulton) in reference to Imperial Federation, a question on which I thought the matured minds of the older senators in this House would have spent some time in expressing their views fully; yet it was passed over, apparently with no other object than to adjourn the House and have as few speeches as possible. I find also that when an hon. member rises in his place to address the House he is very often interrupted by conversations and interjections which render it very unpleasant for him to proceed with the remarks he has to make. When this Dominion was first confederated we never heard a word about doing away with the Senate. The constitution was framed by delegates appointed for that purpose and it was confirmed by every Province in the Dominion, and that constitution provided that we should have a House of Commons and a Senate, and the sentiment was never expressed that we could do without an Upper Chamber. But what do we find to-day? We find an agitation throughout the country in favor of doing away with the Senate altogether, and in some quarters in favor of an elective Senate. What are the causes? I maintain it is due to the fact that members of this House have not shown themselves equal to the responsibilities imposed upon them.

Some HON. GENTLEMEN—No! No! No!

HON. MR. PROWSE—That is, in my humble opinion the cause, and if this Chamber gets into disrepute with the people of the Provinces the senators themselves are alone responsible for it. I shall feel it my duty, when the usefulness of this Chamber is gone, to be prepared to vote for its abolition. But I contend that its usefulness is not gone. I contend that it is one of the best guarantees we have against hasty legislation in another place, and if hon. gentlemen will only apply themselves to the duties devolving upon them as senators they will make of this Chamber an institution in which the people throughout the Dominion will have full confidence. I understand that my hon. friend from Alberton (Mr. Howlan) has a question to bring before this House which demands most careful consideration, I might almost say it is whether Prince Edward Island really belongs to this Confederation or not—whether the terms of Union which were promised us some seventeen years ago have ever been fulfilled. This question, I take it, demands from the Senate very careful, long and continued deliberation and discussion; and other questions might be introduced which would be useful to the country and to the credit of the Senate, if sufficient time and attention were given to them.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I hope the few remarks that I made on this subject will have some influence on the leader of the House. I am very much surprised at the remarks of the senior member for Halifax to-day. He said that my remarks on this question were a repetition of my remarks on former occasions—that I brought nothing new to bear on the subject, except what I said about the Divorce Committee. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman did not understand my reasons against a long adjournment, and I can only attribute to him personal motives in supporting this motion. My hon. friend on former occasions stood by me when I opposed adjournments during the Session; but now he tells us that he wants to go home himself—in other words, that he is prepared to sacrifice the business of the country for his own personal gratification. My hon. friend says that we can do the business that remains to be done this Session in three weeks. He is one of those who, with myself, have for years past denounced the Government for holding back the important business of the country to the last week of the Session, yet he now thinks we can adjourn for two weeks, go to our homes, and then come back here and finish up the business of the Session in three weeks. The important Bill respecting bills of exchange and promissory notes is to come before us in committee, and every clause of it should be discussed a couple of days at least. Then the Bill respecting the North-west Territories is a matter of grave and important consideration, and might well occupy the time of the House for two or three days. The hon. gentleman from Halifax seems to be in the secrets of the Government, and tells us how long the other branch of the Legislature is going to sit. He seems to have privileges which are not accorded to other members of the Senate. He tells us that he had his information from the Ministry. I doubt if his information is correct—that even a Minister could tell him; and I doubt if any such decision has been arrived at. On Friday of this week the Divorce Committee would probably have a report to present to the House for consideration. By this motion we lose not only Friday, but all the next week and part of the week following, and then meet at 8:30 in the evening. Is not that a day lost also? It is a fraud and a delusion to say that on the night we meet here after the holidays we shall do any business. To meet at that hour is simply to do nothing, and adjourn. Members rush in here late in the evening, and they do not feel disposed to enter upon the business of the House with any pleasure. The mind is diverted by absence from legislation and from being shaken up by the cars. So it is not only Friday of this week, but all next week and virtually two days of the week following will be lost. The junior member for Halifax has referred to the importance of his going down to his own Province to consult his constituents on the Short Line question. When he gets down there he has a lovely place on an arm of the sea, and when he finds himself sitting cozily in his pleasant room he will think very little of the affairs of the Province, or the Short Line either. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman has shown such ignorance of the Province of Nova Scotia. He thinks Lunenburg is out of civilization, and we have no way of getting down there except by tramping through. I will inform my hon. friend that we have had steamers running daily to that town ever since Confederation. We have a railway coming there within two miles of my own premises, and we have every accommodation; but notwithstanding the facilities which I might avail myself of to go home, I consider it is not in the public interest that I should go and leave the business of the country at a standstill. We had nothing to do on Monday, simply because there was nothing given us to do. The business of the House was so arranged for Monday and Tuesday that we had nothing on our Order Paper. When I look upon the amount of business before us and the attention it requires I cannot see that this adjournment will have any beneficial effect, but quite the reverse. I do hope the leader of the House will take this matter into consideration, and not place us in a humiliating position; those of us who are anxious to take an interest in the business of the country will have to remain idle here during an adjournment. These motions do not emanate from men who take an active interest in the business of Parliament, and I would say it is time to ask in the public interest whether we should have these adjournments at the public expense. The Senate ought to do away with free passes on the railway. If senators were without free passes we would not be asked for so many adjournments.

HON. MR. ALMON—I only suggested we should have passes over Government roads.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—If members could not pass so freely without expense, and did not have these holidays at the public expense, they would not be so eager for adjournments.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General is waiting to give the Royal Assent to Bills that have been passed this Session. I therefore move that the House do adjourn during pleasure.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned during pleasure.

The House was resumed.

The Hon. Sir William Johnston Ritchie, Knight, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy Governor, being seated on the Throne.

The hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House: "It is the Deputy Governor's desire that they attend him immediately in this House;"

An Act respecting the Great North-West Central Railway Company.

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the words following: "In Her Majesty's name, His Honor the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills."

The Deputy Governor was pleased to retire, and

The House of Commons withdrew.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I quite understand the various opinions that prevail about adjourning, but it has been the practice in this House to adjourn for a few days at Easter, and from the fact that so many members of this House reside at a great distance from Ottawa it is obvious that an adjournment of two or three days would be of no value. Consequently the practice has grown up of making an extended adjournment at Easter, and making it long enough to enable those who reside at some distance to visit their homes. My own opinion of this adjournment would be to make it from Friday evening to Tuesday evening, but I see plainly that there is a strong sentiment in the House in favor of extending the holiday at both ends—that is, to allow the adjournment to commence on Thursday evening and extend it to ten days. The reason that is given for this is that hon. members who leave here on Thursday evening can reach their homes in the lower Provinces and in the North-West and Manitoba for Sunday. In like manner they can leave their homes on Monday and reach here by Wednesday night. I recognize a great deal of force in that, although my own opinion would be to adjourn from Friday night till Tuesday night. However, if the House is disposed to take the extra days, I would be disposed to yield to it; but I should like to know what the views of hon. members are.

THE SPEAKER—The question is on the amendment to the motion of Mr. Perley.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I rise merely to express my regret that my hon. friend, with his usual good nature as leader of the House, has so far yielded his own opinion as to give us an opportunity of consenting to an adjournment which I consider is too long. I think that the position which the hon. leader of the House took in the first instance was a proper one, and I regret very much that he has yielded to the pressure to consent that the House may adjourn for a longer term. My own experience is that the ordinary adjournment is quite sufficient, and any further adjournment is very much to be deprecated.

HON. MR. DEVER—I do not know that any hon. gentleman, if he wants to go home, should be ashamed to say so, nor that he should be ashamed to say so if he does not want to go home.

The amendment was agreed to on a division.

NORTH CANADIAN ATLANTIC RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP CO.'S BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

HON. MR. BOLDUC (in the absence of Mr. LACOSTE) moved the third reading of the Bill (88) "An Act to incorporate the North Canadian Atlantic Railway and Sseamship Company."

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This Bill was allowed to stand over when it was last before this House, with a view to the consideration of the question whether the company should be permitted to erect a bridge across the River St. Lawrence from the Island of Orleans to the main shore. That question has been laid before my colleagues, and we think it would be impolitic to allow an obstacle of that kind to be placed to the navigation of the St. Lawrence at a point where the whole of the shipping, which visits our country passes through, and I am sorry to say that I cannot on behalf of the Government, give my consent to the Bill passing with that clause in it. In fact, to facilitate matters, it would be best for me to move, as I now do, that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out section 4 of the Bill with its sub-sections, and the 5th and 6th sections.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Are those all bridge clauses?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—They are all with reference to the bridge.

HON. MR. BOLDUC—I understand that the promoters of this bridge have agreed that the clauses referred to be stricken out, and I have no objection to the motion.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I do not know if I understood the leader of the House to say that it was the view of the Government that there should be no bridge built across the St. Lawrence in that locality at all. There is a projected bridge in which the Maritime Provinces are interested—that is, the bridge which is to cross at Quebec. I do not know if this expression of opinion from the leader is general, or with regard to this particular bridge. The exercise of the powers mentioned in the Bill must be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, and I think it would be just as well if the bridge clause had been allowed to remain in the Bill. Then it would be easy for the Government, when the question came up, to see that the bridge was built in such a way that it would not be an impediment to navigation, but to say that there shall be no bridge there at all is, I think, going too far.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—I trust that the House will consent to the elimination of these clauses. I opposed in committee the construction of the bridge at that point, on the ground that it would be an obstruction to navigation. I think any one will see that the elimination of those clauses will do no harm to the company at all, as the construction of the bridge is a highly improbable work, and at best would be only a makeshift and a serious obstruction to the navigation of the river.

THE SPEAKER—I suggest that an entry be made in the Minutes that this amendment is made at the third reading with the consent of the House.

HON. MR. POWER—I wish to call the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that the latter half of clause 17, which provides for the issuing of bonds, should be stricken out also, because it deals with the issuing of bonds for the bridge.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I also call attention to the fact that we are establishing a dangerous precedent in undertaking to amend the Bill at the third reading without notice. It should be well understood by the House and clearly stated in the Minutes that this is not to be regarded as a precedent.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The fact is, in clause 17 there are several references to the bridge, and I have to thank my hon. friend from Halifax for calling my attention to it. I am under the impression that it would be better to refer this Bill back to the Committee on Railways, or to a Committee of the Whole House, for the purpose of re-modelling this 17th clause.

HON. MR. POWER—Perhaps the better way would be to refer the whole Bill back to the Railway Committee for the purpose of making these amendments.

HON. MR. BOLDUC—This Bill has been so often postponed that I should prefer to have the amendments made in Committee of the Whole House now.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I do not wish to delay the passage of the Bill, but I think it would be more regular to refer it to the Railway Committee, with instructions to amend it.

THE SPEAKER—I am of opinion that that is the proper course.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, to eliminate the clauses authorizing the construction of the bridge and all provisions incidental thereto.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Then there will be nothing on our Minutes with reference to striking out the clauses here in the House.

THE SPEAKER—No.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (V) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the North-West Territories." He said: This Bill makes several provisions, the details of which are important in themselves, but not of general importance, and also contains some enactments which are of great general importance to the North-West Territories. The details to which I refer relate to the periods of meeting, the mode of conducting elections and several provisions with regard to judicial proceedings which will facilitate the administration of justice in the North-West Territories. The more important general provisions have reference to the classes of subjects about which the Assembly may legislate. There are sixteen subjects which are relegated to the Local Legislatures by the Constitution, and by the tenth clause of the Bill eleven of these subjects are referred to the Assembly. Those which are omitted are the powers of amending the Constitution, the borrowing of money on the credit of the Territories, the management of public lands, the management of eleemosynary institutions and the conduct of local undertakings. Those are five subjects which for the moment it is not deemed expedient to entrust the Local Assembly, and I suppose the reasons for witholding them are tolerably obvious. There are also two other very important clauses, one in reference to the language in which the proceedings of the Assembly are to be recorded, the other with reference to regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors. The powers with regard to those subjects are relegated to the Assembly after the next election. They are allowed to make such provisions as they may deem expedient for the mode in which their proceedings shall be recorded, and they are prohibited from making any change in the existing law with regard to the sale of liquors until after the next election. So, in point of fact, those questions are relegated to the people.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will say whether the question of education is relegated to them. I did not hear him mention it. Has it been overlooked ?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—No ; I think the educational powers are retained by the Dominion for the present.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I thought the hon. gentleman said that the particular powers that are retained are mentioned also.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The subject of education is not relegated to them for the present.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—This refers to the publishing and recording of proceedings of the Assembly. That is relegated to the Assembly itself, but I do not see anything here as regards the statutes and proceedings in the courts. Is that intended by this Bill to be relegated to the North-West Territories or is it to remain under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada ?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I understand that the regulation of all matters connected with the publication of the Acts of the Legislature and with its proceedings will be in the hands of the Legislature.

HON. MR. POWER—I am glad to see that we are giving the people of the North-West Territories another instalment of self-government. What we are now giving them we might have given them earlier ; but they must be thankful to get it, though a little late. Amongst the things over which jurisdiction is given to the Legislative Assembly I do not find the franchise. There is a provision in the 9th clause of this Bill as to the mode of providing voters' lists, but that does not seem to me to be quite broad enough to include the right to decide who shall be allowed to vote. It is apparently authorising the Legislative Assembly to arrange as to the manner in which the lists of persons entitled to vote under Dominion legislation shall be made up. I think the Legislative Assembly ought to have the right to decide who should have the privilege of voting at their own elections. I simply call the attention of the leader of the House to it, so that he will be able to satisfy himself on the point between now and the time the House goes into Committee of the Whole on this Bill. I think the right to regulate the franchise is one that probably was intended to be given to the Legislative Assembly.

HON. MR. BELLROSE—I regret that I cannot support this Bill. There is a part of it, the 32nd clause, which I consider unjust. Under existing law, the people of the North-West may use either French or English in the meetings of the Assembly ; this right is to be set aside by this Bill, if a majority of the people should decide to do so after the next elections. We know that they have already decided that the use of the French language should be abolished in the North-West. If this clause of the Bill is rejected we know that any legislation which would deprive the French minority of the rights which they possess under the Constitution, given them by the Parliament of Canada, would be ultra vires, and the Premier of Canada would be obliged to veto it. By this 32nd section the Local Assembly will be empowered after the next general election in those Territories, to abolish the use of the French language and we all know that if this Bill passes French will cease to be an official language in those Territories. The principle which this clause embodies has been accepted by the Government of the Dominion. I do not intend to use language which would be necessary to characterize the conduct of those members of the Government from the Province of Quebec who accepted that position; they disregarded the interests of those whom in honor and in conscience they were bound to protect. If the Government are allowed to sanction this invasion of the rights of the minority in the North-West Territories they will be placed in a position to go still further and to sanction the Act recently passed by the Manitoba Legislature abolishing the use of French as an official language in that Province. Sir John Macdonald is bound by his assertions, and by his interpretations of the Constitution for over twenty years, to veto that Act of the Manitoba Legislature; but the decision of the other House on the dual language question would warrant the Prime Minister in allowing the Act, because the Parliament of Canada has already consented to doing away with the use of the French language in the North West. The result of passing this Bill without amendment will be that within a year, both in the Territories and in the Province of Manitoba, the rights guaranteed to the minority will be swept away. It is true that the great majority of the people in that part of Canada do not approve of the use of the French language, but the French population are not new arrivals there. French was the first language spoken in those Territories, and it is not surprising that those who are of French descent cling to it still. In this country England did not adopt the same policy that she pursued in Ireland. When England sought to destroy, not only the nationality but the religion of Ireland, she attacked the language of the people.

HON. MR. POWER—But the religion of the Irish was not destroyed.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—England tried it, but did not succeed. In this country her policy was different. She was liberal in the extreme to her French Canadian subjects. Of her own free will she gave them the rights that they have enjoyed, and guaranteed them by treaty. These privileges were confirmed by the British North America Act, and when the Territorial Government was organized in the North-West the Dominion Government—and I am happy to say it was a Liberal Government—extended the same privileges to that portion of the Dominion. Are we to be told now, after all these years, that these privileges are to be withdrawn? It is useless to say that we are simply granting to the people of the Territories the right to regulate these matters for themselves: we know what it means—that we are handing over the minority to be stripped of their rights by a hostile majority. We are asked to empower the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories to strike a blow which the Government at Ottawa have not dared themselves to inflict. I should have looked on this question in a different light had the Dominion Government come forward and adopted this policy on their own responsibility, but they have preferred to deprive the minority in the North-West Territories of their privileges by indirect means, and it only shows that they are willing to empower others to do a wrong which they would have done themselves if they had not been afraid of the consequences. I would prefer the open hostility of the Government; and if those who speak the French language throughout the Dominion are true to themselves they will resent this as an act of hostility to their race on the part of the Government of the day. I am opposed to this Bill, and when it goes to a Committee of the Whole House I shall move an amendment to that clause.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—This only refers to the proceedings in the Assembly. The publication of the statutes and the proceedings of the courts are not given to the Government of the North-West, and, therefore, the clause is not as far-reaching in its effects as the hon. gentleman supposes.

The motion was agreed to.

GRANTS OF PUBLIC LANDS BILL.

SECOND READING

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (W) "An Act respecting Grants of Public Lands." He said: This is a short Bill for the purpose of placing the titles of real estate in the North-West Territories upon a proper footing. It appears that we have adopted there the new system of titles, under which, on the death of a man, his real property vests in his executors. My hon. friend from Calgary will be able to correct me if I am wrong; it is a subject with which I am not familiar, but I understand it is necessary, in issuing a patent, to make the grant in such a manner that the fee simple will be in the patentee; but the ordinary words of limitation are not inserted in the patents, for fear of conflicting with the Torrens system. This Bill is simply to make provision in granting patents to vest them in the patentee.

The motion was agreed to.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (X) "An Act to amend Chap. 27 of the Revised Statutes, intituled: 'An Act respecting Interest.'" He said: This is a Bill intended to remedy a difficulty which has arisen about large loans by incorporated companies—such, for instance, as the bonds that are issued by the railway companies for a term of years. It appears to be considered that under the law which enables a mortgagee to pay in his mortgage within the time fixed by the instrument itself, where he thinks proper to do so, a privilege might exist on the part of railway companies and large corporations that have effected loans for long periods of time to pay in those loans before they become due. This, it appears, is likely to affect the values of such securities. It is a subject of enormous importance to Canada that the loans of those who are engaged in improving this country should not be affected, that the value of securities should not be lessened by a legal point of this description. Hon. gentlemen will remember that this clause was introduced at the time when there was a kind of a crusade against the loan companies, in order that the farmers, who had borrowed money at large rates of interest, should be at liberty to pay back the money before the time fixed for the maturing of the mortgage. The law was then enacted, and it is in such general terms that there is a danger that it may be construed to apply to such cases as I have referred to. This Bill is to prevent, in so many words, the application of that law to loans made by incorporated companies for a fixed period of time.

HON. MR. POWER.—When the Bill goes into committee I think it would be desirable to insert some provision that would make it apply to cases of loans which have already been made to incorporated companies, because this Bill, of course, can only speak from to-day. As to the railway companies of which the hon. gentleman has spoken, all railway companies which have heretofore borrowed money would be presumably governed by the law that was in force at the time of the loan and I think, in order to avoid any doubt of that sort, the Bill should be modified in the direction I have suggested.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—That is the intention of the Bill.

HON. MR. POWER—It does not say so, and this Bill only applies to cases where corporations are the borrowers. The language used by the hon. gentleman might create the impression that it was intended also to apply to cases where corporations are the lenders. I am glad to see that it does not, because there is no reason why a loan company should be in a different position from a private lender.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will see by the terms of the Act that it is expressly limited to the class of loans that I have already referred to—that is, loans which corporations have made for themselves, not loans which they have made to other people.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (89) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the River Detroit Winter Railway Bridge Company, and to change the name of the Company to the River Detroit Railway Bridge Company." (Mr. Howlan.)

Bill (91) "An Act to grant certain powers to the Chambly Manufacturing Company." (Mr. Pelletier.)

PONTIAC PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. POIRIER moved the second reading of Bill (87) "An Act respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company."

HON. MR. POWER—I think it would be more courteous to the hon. member from Rideau division to let the second reading of the Bill stand until to-morrow, or some other day. One of the principal provisions of this Bill is the authority given to the company to construct a bridge over the Ottawa River, and the hon. gentleman from Rideau division, who is not in his seat today, has very strong objections to that part of the Bill. I think it would be better to let the Bill stand until he can be present to express his views.

HON. MR. POIRIER—There can be no objection to the second reading of the Bill to-day, as I propose to have it referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, where the hon. member from Rideau division will have an opportunity to press his objection to any of the details of the measure.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES BILL.

PROGRESS IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (6) "An Act relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes."

(In the Committee.)

On the 2nd clause,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There is no portion of this clause which I understand to vary in any degree the existing law.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Where are the definitions taken from? They are not in any statute of ours at present.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—They are mainly taken from the English law, I understand, which is now in force. The English Act is like this: a species of codification of the entire laws with regard to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes. The definitions are taken from the English Act, which my hon. friend will find in Chalmer's "Treatise on Bills and Notes." There are one or two left out—for instance, the word "bankrupt," as there are no bankrupts here.

On section 3,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This definition is taken from the same Treatise, and I believe from the English law also, and every hon. gentleman who has read the law of bills of exchange will recognize the usual definition.

The clause was agreed to.

On section 4,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The only portion of this section which can be regarded as new is sub-section 2. That is taken literally from the English law, and it is simply a provision which prevents the possibility of a holder being defeated in his claim on a bill by proof that although it appears to be an inland bill it was really either made or accepted in foreign country. This is the reason give by Mr. Chalmers, and I presume it is the correct reason.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 6,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Sub-section 7 of clause 6 makes some change. At present it is understood that a bill payable to the treasurer or other official of a society is void for nncertainty. There are several judgment uin that sense. They are cited here—I think those that are cited are English judgments; but it is evidently a subject that ought to be cleared up, and it has been cleared up here, as it is cleared up in he English law, by making a bill valid which is addressed to any person holding any particular office for the time being.

The clause was agreed to.

On section 8,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Some of the sub-sections of section 8 are supposed to alter the law in some respects. For instance, sub-section 3 provides that a bill is payable to bearer which is expressed to be so payable, or on which the only or last endorsement is an endorsement in blank—the name only of the endorser. The difference, if there be a difference, is in this: that if the last endorsement is a blank endorsement it renews the negotiability of the note or bill, which may have been limited by a previous endorsement. It is not permitted under this measure to stop the negotiability of a bill by omitting to make it payable to order. For instance, a bill is endorsed "Pay to John Smith." That bill remains negotiable. John Smith has the right to endorse it, and he may endorse it in blank, and if he does so it becomes a bill payable to order. I am not prepared to say that that is not the law now, but it is a point on which there is some doubt, and this clears it up.

Sub-section 4 is changed in a slight degree, in conformity with the principle which I have just mentioned as being applicable to section 3. It embodies, in so many words, the rule that as long as the bill does not contain express words prohibiting transfer the bill remains payable to order. That was the Scotch law; it is now universal in Great Britain. It was adopted into the English law under their new Bill.

The clause was agreed to.

On section 9,—

HON. MR. SCOTT—I cannot understand the wisdom of introducing sub-clause (c) into this Bill.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—That is a clause embodying a practice in frequent use of late years, and I doubt if its legality has ever been disputed. The principle is now adopted almost universally in loans on time—that is to say, if the interest is not paid, or if any instalment is not paid when due, the whole debt becomes due.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It is an entirely new principle in Canada. The objection to this Bill is this: as I get into it I find that it will take a great many years to find out what the law is. We are going to have all the decisions of our courts upturned with regard to bills and notes. In my opinion, it would be much better to trust to the precedents established by the decisions of our courts. Under this bill all our valuable reports are going to be set aside as futile, and new precedents are to be established.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am not sure that my hon. friend's criticism is quite correct, for he will perceive that the changes we are making have already been sanctioned by the courts, and this clause is drawn in accordance with the decisions of the courts.

HON. MR. SCOTT—That if an instalment on a note is not paid within the time, then the whole amount becomes due? I don't think my hon. friend will find any law for that in Canada.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This is the law in England.

HON. MR. SCOTT—By special statute there?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—By a statute that has been in force there for some considerable time, and that law rests on the decisions of the courts.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Then a single day of a mistake in a man paying a $1,000 instalment on a note for $10,000, payable in ten instalments, makes it all become due?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will find that it is not an uncommon thing to make such a provision in other important transactions—mortgages, for instance.

HON. MR. SCOTT—What I say is this: that in an important document, such as a mortgage, the mortgagee may come into court with it, but he cannot enforce it summarily—he cannot get out an execution within ten days, as he can on a note.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—He cannot get it in ten days on a note either, if the maker has a defence.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It is presumed that there is no defence. The only defence would be that he did not make the note. Say he made a note for $10,000, $1,000 payable at a future day and the balance payable in nine instalments. The first payment by oversight of a single day is overdue, and the maker has failed to provide for it. He can be sued immediately for the whole amount under this Bill, and in ten days execution will issue. I think it is a very oppressive and arbitrary clause.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—It does seem certainly hard. It has been the law with regard to mortgages that in default of payment of instalment or interest the party could foreclose the mortgage.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will see that the alternative lies between letting people do what they like and prescribing what they shall do. If a man can satisfy the exigencies of his own business by making an undertaking in this form under conditions of the law, surely he should be permitted to do it. He knows the conditions, and if he does not choose to make a note which will expose him to such a contingency, there is no obligation on him to make it.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I think my hon. friend had better let that clause stand for the present.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I have no objection.

On clause 11,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This is a provision made to remedy a doubt in the existing law. I fancy there are decisions upon it, but this is to clear up the doubt and lay down a fixed rule, which is to be binding on all occasions in future, and it seems to be an equitable rule, because if there is any inconvenience caused by the exercise of this right, it is thrown on the person who makes the blunder.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 13,—

HON. MR. POWER—It has been suggested by the hon. gentleman from St. John that this clause might be amended by inserting after the word "Sunday" the words "or other non-judicial day." The paper might be dated on a statutory holiday, for instance.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not know that it has ever been contended that a note dated on a statutory holiday is null.

HON. MR. POWER—As some doubt has been expressed by business men upon this point, would it not be better to remove any doubt by inserting the words I have suggested?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is a pity to put anything into the Bill which is not absolutely required. However, I will consider if it is necessary.

On clause 14,—

HON. MR. DICKEY—It seems to be an anomaly that a bill payable on demand is payable really on demand, while a bill payable at sight is allowed three days grace.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is not proposed to alter the law in that respect. We do not want to alter the law where we can help doing so.

HON. MR. POWER—If my hon. friend looks at clause 2 of clause 14 I think he will find that there is some ground for the doubt expressed by the hon. gentleman from St. John.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I will have it looked into.

On clause 18,—

HON. MR. SCOTT—This is a strange provision, that where a man declines to accept a bill payable at sight, and subsequently accepts it, the days of grace are counted from the day the bill was first presented to him. I think it is rather contrary to common sense.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—In the absence of an agreement.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It is presumed that when a man says, "I will accept that bill," the time should run from then.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—In my opinion the view taken of this clause is the right one, because the original contract with the holder is that on the presentation of the bill the drawee shall pay it. If, when he accepts, he desires to vary the date, he is permitted to do so by agreement with the holder.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 19,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This is a clause about which there was a good deal of debate in the other House, and it seems to be a question whether there is anything new in it or not. There is no substantive law to which we can refer for the express letter of it, and it is not always easy to say whether a proposed clause is new or not. I would suggest that it be allowed to stand for the present.

On the 26th clause,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This is framed to meet difficulties which have very frequently arisen as to whether a person was liable when he added to his signature some qualifying word, such as "Agent," without saying for whom he was agent. By this clause he is not liable if he states for whom he is agent, but unless he states for whom he is agent he is liable.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Suppose he signed for a company, ought he to be liable?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Not at all, if he states the company for which he is agent. The mere addition of "agent" to his signature does not relieve him.

HON. MR. SCOTT—But if he signs as agent for a company?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Then he comes under the first part of the clause. If he designates himself as acting in a representative capacity he is not liable, but if he simply signs as "agent" he is liable.

HON. MR. POWER—If he says he is agent for John Smith he is not liable, but if he says that he is simply an agent he is liable.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Yes; that puts the destinction very clearly. This clause is in accordance with the English system, and we shall have there, to begin with, a fund of decisions.

HON. MR. SCOTT—There are cases in our own courts in the same direction.

The clause was adopted.

HON. MR. McCLELAN, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate adjourned at 6 o'clock.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (79) "An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada," with amendments. He said: These amendments are in the direction of the preservation of the private rights of the city of Hamilton with reference to this Bill. The clause which came to us in the Bill for that purpose from another place—clause 4—enacted that nothing in this Act should affect or impair the claims of the city of Hamilton as to any claim which now exists, arising out of the dispute between them. The first amendment extends that to claims which may hereafter exist arising from the same causes. The next amendment is of a more comprehensive character, and extends the benefit of this protection to any obligation arising out of any by-law hereafter made for which the said company are in any way liable. These amendments cover the whole ground; and I may add, for the satisfaction of the House—and it is a satisfaction to the committee which endeavors to protect private rights—that these amendments have received the sanction of both contending parties and the unanimous sanction of the committee. I have no hesitation in asking the House to concur in these amendments.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time and passed.

NORTH CANADIAN RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (88) "An Act to incorporate the North Canadian Atlantic Railway and Steamship Company," with amendments. He said: This Bill, although so recently before the House, may not be familiar to some hon. members, and, therefore, it becomes necessary for me to explain, as the report merely refers to what is struck out of the Bill, that this was the result of a decision arrived at by the Government and announced here after the first report was submitted, against allowing any bridge over the St. Lawrence in the place where this Bill would allow it to be constructed. It was referred for a reconsideration, with instructions accordingly, to strike out all parts of the Bill relating to the bridge clauses. The first of the three consecutive amendments is that which relates to the three clauses referring purely and solely to the building of the bridge—clauses 4, 5 and 6. The second amendment was a consequential one, following from that, and relates to the 17th clause, which provided for the issuing of bonds for the bridge as well as for the construction of the railway. The amendment to the 17th clause struck out all relating to the bonds or mortgages given for the raising of money in order to build the bridges. The other amendment is returning the Bill with the amendment, which was in the first report, renewed; that is to say, the amendment which related to the circumstances under which this company could take any step at all, and which prevented them from taking any step in carrying out the undertaking until after they had made an agreement with the competing company. Under these circumstances, the Bill is in a position that I can ask the House to concur in the amendments. I therefore move that they be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

DISMISSAL OF JOHN WIGGINS.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.) enquired of the Government:—

"Why was John Wiggins, of New Westminster, B.C., and lately employed in the British Columbia Penitentiary, dismissed; and what is the amount, if any, still due him in respect of such employment?"

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I have to inform my hon. friend that the cause of the dismissal of this man Wiggins is somewhat complicated, and arises out of papers which he was going to move for to-morrow, and I think it would be better to leave the explanation of that cause until after those papers come down, which will be soon after they are moved for. As to the money due him, there is a small sum, the exact amount of which the Department does not know. That was offered to him but was refused.

CENTRAL ONTARIO RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day having been called, Third reading Bill (87) "An Act respecting the Central Ontario Railway."

HON. MR. READ said: There is an amendment to be proposed to this Bill on the third reading, and as I have no authority from the promoters to accept of an amendment, I wish to have time to consult them as to what I shall do.

HON. MR. VIDAL—There is no notice given of any amendment.

HON. MR. READ—No; but I understand that the leader of the House proposes to move some amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was discharged.

THE ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (9) "An Act further to amend the Adulteration Act, Cap. 107 of the Revised Statutes."

(In the Committee.)

On the 11th section,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—With reference to the question which my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Pâquet) put to me, as to the standard for milk, the matter has formed the subject of a good deal of consideration with the Minister, and the conclusion that he has come to is this: That it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, advantageously to fix one standard for milk. It is necessary that milk for manufacturing purposes should possess a certain percentage of fatty matter, but it is not absolutely essential for domestic uses that it should be as rich as it must be for manufacturing purposes, and the present intention is to have, under clause 8 of this Bill, two standards for milk—one which will form the minimum standard for milk to be used for manufacturing purposes, and the other to form a minimum standard for milk to be used for domestic purposes. It would gratify the Minister very much if gentlemen like my hon. friend opposite, who have given their attention to this subject, would favor him with their views about it. It is a new subject, and it is one of very grave importance indeed from many points of view, and we are extremely anxious that it should be dealt with as it ought to be, and if my hon. friend would favor the Minister with his views, either by sending him a memo. or by seeing him, it would gratify us very much.

The clause was agreed to.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved that the committee rise and report the Bill without amendment.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—Before the committee rises I may say that I am fully alive to the importance of having a standard for milk. I recently read in an English paper that milk was still one of the few things that it was found difficult to deal with there, owing to the want of a standard laid down by the Government as to quality, and it is now a moot question there as to establishing that standard. I am glad to find that we in Canada are a little ahead in that respect, although I fear that we are a little behind them on the general principle with regard to which our adulteration Acts are passed. They appear to have, in England, an Act making the vendors responsible for the quality of all the articles they sell, and as a consequence there is a general purity found to exist now in the articles sold by retail, in which adulteration used to be so very common. I rather think, that before very many years elapse, Canadian dealers will have to be placed under the same responsibility with regard to the articles that they retail, looking of course themselves to the parties who furnish the goods.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—The Minister will have to be very careful not to make the standard too high, and I am very glad to hear the remark of the leader of the House about two standards. On the Island of Montreal there are two points, three miles from each other, at one of which they got the standard easily; on the other point they are not able to get the standard at all. At one place it is high gravelly soil, and it seems to be able to produce richer milk there than on low clay ground. That is along the Petite Cote road. At Longue Point it is not so, and at one of the richest farms that I know of they tried six or seven times last year, by examining the milk fresh from the cows, to get the standard, and they never reached it. I suppose it is on account of the different qualities of feed, so that if the standard was made too high it might be very severe on parties who own low lands, where their cows cannot get as good feed as they can on high lands.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I would like to say, in answer to my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, with whose sentiments on this subject I entirely concur, that an effort is being made by this Bill now before the committee in the direction he indicates. The Government are fully sensible of the necessity of enforcing these laws against adulteration, as well as making them and putting them on the Statute-book; but the hon. gentleman not being a lawyer himself, and perhaps not having had any experience on this particular subject, cannot be aware of the extreme difficulty of procuring a conviction against a dealer for the sale of adulterated articles. It is very difficult to say that a man shall be convicted because he sells an adulterated article, unless it is shown that he has some knowledge of what he is doing, and I may say that most of the prosecutions have failed from the impossibility of proving that the man who sold the article had a knowledge himself of the adulteration of it. In sections 5 and 9 provision is made for giving much greater publicity to the examinations made, including the names of the vendors and the results of those examinations, than has hitherto prevailed. In addition to that section which places the vendor on a different footing altogether with regard to the article which he sells, it is not sufficient for him under the provisions of section 9 to profess ignorance, or place himself in a position for knowledge to be proved against him, but he must take a certain amount of precaution, and must do that in a formal manner, to relieve himself from the punishment which the law inflicts for adulteration.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—By making the vendors responsible for the purity of all the articles they sell they themselves will take care to obtain such a guarantee from the manufacturer as will practically secure the object we all have in view, which is the sale of absolutely pure articles. That, I think, has been the experience of countries that have tried making vendors responsible. I do not mean to attach any criminal intent to the vendors. They sell what they get, and probably the chief gainers by it are the manufacturers of the adulterated articles; but if these gentlemen were reached by law through the vendors I think it would tend to the security of the public.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—That, as my hon. friend will see, is precisely the tendency of section 9.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES BILL.

COMMITTEE POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being read,—House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (6) "An Act relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes."

HON. MR. KAULBACH said: Many of the gentlemen who are interested in the discussion of this Bill are absent, and I think it would be well, if my hon. friend considers it will not interfere with the public business, that the consideration of the Bill be postponed until after the adjournment.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend anticipates what I was about to say to the House with regard to this Bill. A good many of the gentleman who take an interest, and some who took part in the debate yesterday, have left already, but they called upon me and asked as a particular favor that the Bill should not be proceeded with in their absence. I therefore move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that it be an order for the 10th of April next.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—Will the hon. gentleman, during the recess, see that the promised slips showing the changes in the law are distributed to members.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend does not quite realize the difficulty. There is no statute, nothing to which we can refer as containing the existing law, and, therefore, it is practically impossible to do what I did on one occasion—I think it was when the Customs Act was before us two or three years ago—print the Bill and the existing law in parallel columns, showing the difference between them. The changes in the law are not absolute, positive changes, except in very minor particulars. Where they appear to change the law they really do scarcely anything more than settle disputed points. There is really no absolutely new legislation in the Bill, from one end to the other. I have a further table from the Minister of Justice, showing the clauses in which there is some difference between the English law and our law, and those of the clauses in which we have what may be called, in one sense, a new enactment, inasmuch as it settles difficulties that occurred previously. I would be happy to communicate that to my hon. friend if he desires it, but I do not think I could profitably undertake to publish a regular statement of the changes, because there are no data from which to commence. There is no clear statement of the present law on promissory notes in existence. It is taken from judgments, from decisions of the courts, from custom, from the code of Quebec, from the statutes in different Provinces, and largely from the existing definition of the law in England; but I shall be prepared, as I was yesterday, to point out in advance, on any clause being called, exactly what alteration, if any, is made by that clause in what is generally understood to be the existing law. I do not think I could do more than that.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—The hon. gentleman congratulates the House on the forward state of the business, but I beg to point out that there are two important private notices of motion which have been postponed from day to day. One of them is in the hands of my hon. friend from Alberton, and is a motion which is of very special interest to the people of Prince Edward Island. I cannot, of course, say whether my hon. friend has been induced to postpone that motion in consequence of the adjournment, or what other cause, but I can only say that the people of Prince Edward Island take a very keen interest in the motion of which the hon. gentleman has given notice and which has been postponed more than once.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I am glad to hear my hon. friend speak that way. On former occasions, when this matter came up, I did not find him taking such a keen interest in it as he does now. With reference to the measure before us, relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes, I wish to know if the French code has been brought in harmony with the law of the Dominion on this subject? I know there is some difference between the law of Quebec and the laws of the other Provinces.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am pleased to be able to say that, so far as the principles of the law are concerned, this Bill harmonizes the laws throughout the whole Dominion. There may be some slight difference in the Quebec law as to the exigencies for presentments and protests, but it it only in matters of detail, matters of procedure, and does not affect the principles of the law.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—I may say, in reply to my hon. friend from Charlottetown, that the only reason I postponed the motion of which I gave notice was in order that we might make more rapid progress with the business of the House. Several gentlemen expressed a wish to get home, and I thought that the motion might be allowed to stand until to-day. A similar anxiety is manifested to-day, and as nothing can be lost by postponing the motion, I am willing to let it stand over until after the holidays.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—I hope that the hon. gentleman who leads the House will, on the resumption of business here, feel himself in a position to give the House some information with regard to the state of negotiations between the British and the American Governments on the Behring Sea question. It may be in the hon. gentleman's recollection that the subject was alluded to at the opening of the Session, and I think then he expressed the hope that he would be in a position to give further information before the House rose. I only hope that the hon. gentleman will be able to do so when we meet after the holidays.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 4 o'clock.

PUBLIC LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of Whole on Bill (W) "An Act respecting Grants of Public Lands."

(In the Committee.)

On the 1st clause,—

HON. MR. SCOTT asked for an explanation.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I had the honor of informing hon. gentlemen of the purposes of the Bill on the second reading, but I shall be happy to repeat the explanation. This is a Bill for the purpose of harmonizing the system of grants with the Torrens system of conveyance, and for no other purpose. I am afraid, not being a lawyer under the common law, that I cannot explain accurately the precise effect of the change, but I understand it to be something like this: In ordinary letters patent property is conveyed by the Crown to the grantee and his heirs; under the Torrens system, as I understand, the land does not pass to the heirs of the deceased in case of transmission by death, but to the executors, and this Act is intended to harmonize the system so that the grant in the letters patent, which would not, under the common law, be a grant in fee, is made a grant equivalent to a grant in fee to harmonize with the Torrens system.

HON MR. SCOTT—The reason I asked for an explanation is that the Bill applies to Ontario. Now, the Torrens system is not in force in Ontario, except in a small area of it, but it is in force in the North-West.

HON. MR ABBOTT—I am unable to inform my hon. friend why it is made to apply generally to Ontario.

HON. MR. SCOTT—For Manitoba and the North-West Territories it is all right enough.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It would be all right also in those parts of Ontario which are under the Torrens system. Whether there is any objection to having the Bill apply to Ontario generally I do not know, not being familiar with the laws of this Province.

HON. MR. POWER—It appears to me that this Parliament has no power to deal with the public lands of Ontario.

HON. MR. SCOTT—There are Indian lands in Ontario.

HON. MR. POWER—I quite see the objection taken by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa. The Torrens system is not in operation in Ontario, except as to the County of York, and I do not think the Dominion Government owns any land in that county.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The hon. gentleman will see, with regard to that point, in the third clause it is limited to Dominion lands, Ordnance or Admiralty lands, Indian lands, and all other lands which are the property of Canada, or of which the Government of Canada has power to dispose.

HON. MR. POWER—Take, for instance, the Indian lands in the County of Haldimand. The Torrens system of land conveyancing and registration is not in operation in that county. Why should the lands which the Dominion Government may grant there be under a different law from the lands in other counties?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—That is the objection taken by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, and the one which requires explanation. If the committee will pass the Bill through this present stage, I will be in a position to give an answer to that question at the third reading.

HON. MR. POWER—As to the second clause, the twenty-third line says that the grant shall be "taken and held to have operated as a conveyance to such personal representative of an estate in fee simple or an equivalent estate in such lands." It appears to me that there should be some words to show—I do not know that they are absolutely necessary—that they are conveyed to him as such personal representative, and that the administrator does not take them for himself.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The preliminary sentence of the clause makes that clear. I do not think there is anything in that point.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (X) "An Act to amend Chapter 127 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, entituled: 'An Act respecting Interest.'"

(In the Committee.)

HON. MR. ABBOTT said: I desire to improve this Bill by adding a clause to repeal two sections of the Revised Statutes, which should not have been allowed to remain in force, and which are only productive of trouble and worry to understand what they mean. I refer to sections 10 and 11 of the law respecting interest, both of which are inconsistent with all the legislation we have had with reference to interest, and have become entirely obsolete. In some extraordinary manner these clauses escaped the notice of the legislators, and found their way into the Revised Statutes. It was intended last Session to repeal these two sections, but the Bill relating to interest came up at too late a stage of the Session. I move that a clause be added to the Bill to repeal sections 10 and 11. If the committee accept this amendment, I propose to let the third reading be postponed for two or three days, so that hon. members may see what the effect of the amendment is.

HON. MR. POWER—While I think that the first sub-section of section 10 appears objectionable, it strikes me that there should be some limitation to the amount of interest that should be chargeable in these cases; but looking at the remainder of this chapter I do not see that, apart from those two sections, there is any limitation of the rate of interest, and it occurs to me that there ought to be some limitation. I do not think that in the case of bills and notes, for instance, more than 8 per cent. should be collectable.

HON. MR. DEVER—I do not see why there should be any limitation of the rate of interest any more than in anything else that is the subject of bargain and sale. It is not the case in New Brunswick.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The policy has been to relieve the dealing in money of any restriction, leaving it perfectly free to people to make whatever bargain they please, except in special cases, where there is a special exception created by charter or Act.

HON. MR. DEVER—Where there is no bargain, there should be limitation of interest.

HON. MR. POWER—The hon. gentleman from St. John has undertaken to contradict what I said just now about the other Provinces. I would refer him to the provision with respect to New Brunswick in chapter 127 of the Revised Statutes.

HON. MR. DEVER—That has been repealed, I understand.

HON. MR. POWER—No; it is in force now. The next section contains a provision such as I have suggested just now.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend is right, I think, in saying that there is a restriction in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but that is not the general policy of the Dominion, and I dare say it has found its way into the Act in deference to the feelings of the people of those Provinces. The clauses which are being repealed apply only to the Province of Quebec.

The motion was agreed to.

HON. MR. READ (B.C.), from the committee, reported the Bill as amended.

SAMUEL MAY RELIEF BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of Bill (16) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Samuel May." He said: This Bill has been postponed for some time until a Bill of a kindred character should reach us from the other House. The other Bill has not yet reached us, and I do not like to ask the House to defer the second reading of this one any longer.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Postpone it for ten days until the other Bill comes up, and let the two be considered together.

HON. MR. MACINNES—I may state that I have some evidence to offer before the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, if the Bill is referred to that committee, in order to show the bona fides of the petitioner and the merits of the Bill, and with the permission of the House I prefer to go on with it.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I took some objection to my hon. friend's motion on a former occasion, and suggested that the whole question should come up before the House at the same time, and therefore I thought it better that this Bill should wait the coming of the other, but I do not think it is quite fair to keep my hon. friend hanging between heaven and earth so long, and as he tells me that he has evidence to bring before the committee which will place the House in possession of the facts as to whether this Bill should be made an exception to the general rule, I think it is only fair that he should have the opportunity to do so. We can take any time we like to consider the Bill itself on another occasion after the Bill comes back from the committee.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I think in fairness to the House we should not be compromised by any action we take now at this stage of the Bill. The motion before the Chair is that the Bill be read the second time, and that involves the principle of the Bill, which I, for one, do not wish to be considered as assenting to. Whatever course my hon. friend wishes to take, we should not be embarrassed by being called upon to sanction the principle of the Bill at this stage, when we might be very much disposed hereafter to regret our action. If the motion had been that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be referred to committee, it would be another matter. That was the course I presumed my hon. friend would take, and in that way the House would not be compromised and he could bring all the information before committee that he desired.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the second reading of a private Bill is not considered to have the same force as binding upon the House on future occasions as the second reading of a public Bill. Of course a great deal depends upon the merits of a private Bill and the evidence that can be adduced in support of it; and it is the ordinary practice of the House undoubtedly to give private Bills the second reading and refer them to committee. The House never hesitates, after the committee reports a Bill, to deal with it as they think proper. When this Bill came up on a former occasion the impression I had was that it was an entirely new proceeding, one for which I thought there was no precedent. I stated so on the authority quoted in another place. I have had occasion, however, since then, to look into the records myself, and I find that there are three or four Bills on our Statute-book already carrying out the principle which my hon. friend seeks to act upon in his Bill, some of which passed without any objection whatever, and I only find one instance of a Bill being rejected in another place, and none in which a Bill of a similar character was rejected in this House. So, in reality, if we come to precedent the statements quoted in the Commons Debates were erroneous, for there are actually laws on the Statute-book similar to this one in all respects. Even that would not decide me to pass a Bill like this as a matter of course, or anything approaching a matter of course. I should only do it in an exceptional case, and I could conceive a case where it would be a manifest hardship to a patentee to refuse him a renewal of his patent, and I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House would reject an application of that description. I could speak of a case which occurred where the mail happened to be late—where the money for the renewal of the patent was in a registered letter that had arrived in Ottawa a few minutes after the period at which registered letters were delivered in Ottawa. The letter and money made their appearance in the Department after the time for renewing the patent had lapsed and the Commissioner refused to renew it. Should a gentleman come to the House under such circumstances and apply for a renewal of his patent on the ground that he did everything he could to get a renewal within the proper time, we should feel disposed to sanction it. I am confident that the great majority of this House would vote for it. It is possible to conceive a case where we would be disposed to relax the rule prescribed for us in the patent law. My hon. friend from Burlington tells me that he can make out a very strong equitable case in favor of this Bill, and I do not think we shall compromise ourselves in our final vote on this Bill by passing the second reading now and referring it to committee to ascertain what my hon. friend can prove of the efforts made by the petitioner to get a renewal for his patent.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I am opposed to this Bill. I think it is a dangerous measure, calculated to establish a precedent of a vicious character. We have not only to look at the rights of the individual himself, who neglected to renew his patent at the proper time, but we have to look to the interests of the public. This industry belongs to the public, and we are actually by this Bill depriving them of the benefit of it. We may by our action be depriving gentlemen who have invested capital in the manufacture of this article, whatever it is, of a right to which they are fairly entitled under the law. The petitioner has had for five years absolute control of this patent, and I do not see why he should have a continuous monopoly. If it is his misfortune to have forfeited his patent it is also his fault. He has had five years of a monopoly, and with the practical experience gained in that time, and with his plant and facilities for manufacturing, he still has the advantage over competitors, and if, through his neglect, his patent was not renewed at the proper time, and it has now become the property of the public, I do not think it is in the interests of the community that the public should be deprived of the rights which they have acquired.

HON. MR. McDONALD—You rob the patentee of his rights.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—If he has neglected his duty and allowed his patent to lapse, I do not see why we should interfere between him and the public. Supposing others have been investing their money in this industry, knowing that the patent had lapsed, are such men to be prejudiced in this way? I think the public have rights to be protected as well as the individual. We are told that there is another Bill of this character before Parliament, and if we pass this one it is hard to say how many more we shall have if such a precedent is established.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I think my hon. friend from Lunenburg is making a great mistake in opposing the second reading of this Bill. His statement shows the necessity of letting this Bill go to the committee, where evidence can be received. How can any of us form a judgment on the case without knowing the particulars of it? We have had it shown already, by the leader of the House, that circumstances may occur where not a single member of the Senate would refuse relief to an applicant. How do we know but this is a case of the kind? If we remit this Bill to the committee to look into the evidence, I have perfect confidence in that committee that they will guard the interests of all parties concerned as jealously as this House will. If any reason should be shown why this Bill should not pass, the committee will report to that effect. How are we to judge whether it is right to pass this Bill or not, if we do not send it to the committee, where the evidence concerning it can be obtained? I am persuaded that the majority of this House will see the reasonableness of the proposition that has been made. We do not commit ourselves to the principle of the Bill, when it is a private Bill which requires investigation.

HON. MR. POWER—I am rather in a quandary as to how I should vote on this motion, and I am placed in that position by the hon. leader of the Senate. When the Bill was under discussion on a previous occasion he opposed it as a matter of principle, and he tells us this evening that while he may possibly oppose the Bill at a later stage, still he thinks it would be highly unfair to the hon. promoter, and the person whose interests he represents, not to allow this Bill to go to a committee for the purpose of having an inquiry. Now I remember that when this Bill was under discussion before, the hon. leader of the House did not take that view. At that time he looked at the preamble, in which are set out all the arguments in favor of passing the Bill, and took the ground that if all the statements in the preamble—and that is all that could go to the committee—if all those allegations were true, the Bill should not pass. Now, what is the substantial allegation? It is that this patent was granted on the 12th of July, 1883—the day is perhaps a little ominous—and under the law the owner of the patent should have made his application on or before the 12th July, 1888. Now, it may be that Mr. May was engaged in the celebrations which occasionally take place on the 12th July, but then that might have been forgiven him if he had applied next day, but no application was made for three months afterwards, not until October, 1888, and since that time a further period elapsed, from October, 1888, until the opening of the present session of Parliament, before any steps were taken by Mr. May to make his rights good.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—He could not have taken any steps before.

HON. MR. POWER—He could have applied in the Session of 1889. As the hon. member from Lunenburg has said this evening, and the leader of the House said on a former occasion, the public may have been using this patent since.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—He, Mr. May, had no opportunity of applying to Parliament until now. He could not have done it during the previous Session.

HON. MR. POWER—Why not?

HON. MR. MACINNES—Because there was not time. Last year the House had risen, and he applied at the very earliest period he could to this Parliament for relief.

HON. MR. POWER—His patent right expired on the 12th July, 1888. The application to the Department was made by his solicitor in October, 1888, and then the application should have been made to this Parliament the following Session. A good deal of time has elapsed and, as has been pointed out, the rights of other people may have arisen in the meantime. Now we are asked, because his solicitor neglected his duty, to pass this Bill. I quite agree with the view taken by the leader of the House on a previous occasion, that this would be vicious legislation, and the arguments which the hon. gentleman has made use of this evening have not changed my mind. Unless he produces stronger reasons in support of the Bill I shall oppose the second reading.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—With regard to the rights of other parties which may have arisen in the meantime, clause 2 applies to them.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—No.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—Clause 2 says:

"Any person who has, within the period between the twelfth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight, and the extension of renewal hereunder of the said letters patent, acquired any interest or right in respect of such improvements or invention, shall continue to enjoy the same as if this Act had not been passed."

That fully provides for any interest which may have arisen prior to the passing of this Act.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I may also state that it requires a very large expenditure to go into this business—the erection of expensive buildings; and I believe it can be shown before the committee that no one else has commenced to manufacture this particular article. I am perfectly convinced that it would be only justice to Mr. May to give him an opportunity to prove his bona fides, and to show that the neglect was not his. He is entitled to go before the Standing Orders Committee, and prove under oath the allegations set forth in the preamble. If he does not prove his case to the satisfaction of the committee, of course there the matter ends, but if he shows a good case, it would be only doing justice to grant him relief.

HON. MR. DEVER—Has anybody petitioned against the passage of this Bill?

HON. MR. MACINNES—No.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE RECENT ADJOURNMENT.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved that the House do now adjourn.

HON. MR. POWER—Before the House adjourns I wish to call the attention of the hon. member from Lunenburg to the fact that there has not been a vast accumulation of work from the House of Commons during our adjournment.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—But there is before us some legislation that may be defeated through the delay caused by our adjournment.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I hope no injury will result from our little junketting, and I do not think there will be any.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned at 9:20 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, April 10th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CENTRAL ONTARIO RAILWAY BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day having been called, "Third reading Bill (86) 'An Act respecting the Central Ontario Railway.'"

HON. MR. READ said: This Bill has been laid over in the interest of some of the original bondholders, who ask for an amendment to secure their position as it now exists, so that there will be no uncertainty about it. I beg, therefore, to move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by inserting in the sixth line, after the word "shall," the words "continue to all the property covered by the mortgage securing such bonds." I move this with the consent of the bondholders, and they are the only parties interested. The Bill would appear to convey the idea that their bonds would cover the road to be constructed. It is only intended that the securities shall cover the road already constructed, and it is to make it definite, that there shall be no mistake about it.

HON. MR. DICKEY—It would be better if the hon. gentleman would move that the Bill be re-committed. We can hardly grasp the whole scope of this amendment on such short notice.

HON. MR. POWER—I think it would be better to adopt the course that was adopted with another Bill the other day, that is, to refer it back to the Committee, and let the Committee make the amendment.

HON. MR. MILLER—Even then, notice will have to be given; it being a private Bill no amendment can be made to it without notice.

THE SPEAKER—I think the simplest form would be for the hon. gentleman to move that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors.

HON. MR. READ—I will adopt that suggestion, and beg to move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that the Bill be referred back to Committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was discharged.

PUBLIC LANDS BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the third reading of Bill (W) "An Act respecting grants of Public Lands." He said: This Bill passed through Committee yesterday, but there was one point in it respecting which some questions were put to me, that I was not at the time prepared to answer with a proper degree of precision. The Bill is intended in the main to reconcile the system of grants made by the Government with the system of transmission of property known as the Torrens' system, and it was pointed out that it applied not only to the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, where the Torrens' system exists, but also to Ontario, where it only partially exists. For the moment I saw some difficulty in that fact, and desired to have time to consider the Bill. I find now, as a fact, that the main object of the Bill is to reconcile the two systems; but, in the Province of Ontario there has been a law passed which provides for the devolution of property, and which makes real estate passing from a deceased person personal estate, that is, it goes to his personal representatives, exactly as under the Torrens' system the land passes to the persons who represent it, and, therefore, the Bill is intended not only to harmonize the present system—the form of the patent with the Torrens' system—but also to harmonize in Ontario, in the limited area in which this has anything to do with it, the land grant with the system of devolution of property under the legislation adopted in 1886.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

COMMITTEE POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day having been read, "Committee of the whole House on Bill (V) "An Act to amend the Acts respecting the North-West Territories."

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There are certain points which will come up on the discussion of this Bill, and one or two which have been brought to the notice of the Government lately, and which are now under consideration, and for these reasons I ask that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that it stand as an order for Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was discharged.

SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY AND MINING CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté) moved the second reading of Bill (34) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company." He said: This Bill extends the time of commencing the construction of the railway and also authorizes a connection with the Hudson Bay Railway.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole the consideration of Bill (6) "An Act relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes."

(In the Committee.)

On the 32nd clause,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT said: Sub-section 2 is changed in some degree but not materially. This is a modification of section 4 of the English Act. There is a form of endorsement which is common in the Province of Quebec and not unknown elsewhere in the Dominion. I am not satisfied that this clause provides for that endorsement. It is known as endorsement pour aval. It is true this clause has reference to the transfer of a bill, but I think that the amendment that I suggest could be made at the end of the clause.

HON. MR. POWER—This clause deals altogether with the transferring of bills.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Although it says in the first portion of this clause, that it purports to deal with the negotiation of a bill, still the third and fourth sub-sections do not seem to deal exclusively with that subject, and we might with propriety treat this clause in a more comprehensive way.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—I would venture to suggest that if a person is wrongly designated in a bill, and endorses it as therein stated, he should be compelled to attach his proper signature. Under such circumstances, a man should be held clearly responsible over his own proper signature, for the fact that he adopts deliberately an erroneous designation. I would therefore suggest to strike out the words "if he thinks fit," and that he be compelled to adopt the wrongful designation over his own proper signature.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend's suggestion is a very important one and should not be dismissed without due consideration. With the consent of the House, I will let the clause stand for the present.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The suggestion is a very good one.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On the 36th clause,—

HON. MR. DRUMMOND said: It appears to me that the third sub-section is very vague and uncertain and that some definition should be given of what is a reasonable length of time.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend's objection to this has a certain degree of plausibility, but the same difficulty occurs in a great many places in the Bill, and already exists in the law. The question whether a bill, or note, or cheque, payable on demand is presented within a reasonable time has always been left to the appreciation of the court. There are cases where a bill has been held for nearly five years before being presented, and it has been decided that it was not withheld an unreasonable time. There are other cases in which a much shorter time has been held to be unreasonable. It all depends on the circumstances of the case. For instance, it is a common practice for a demand note to be given to a bank as collateral security for an account. Although it is made payable on demand, it is obviously not intended to be presented, but to remain in the hands of the bank until the persons whose names appear on it insist on something being done with it. In a case which went from St. John's to the Privy Council a note which had been left in the hands of the St. John's glass works for over four years, until the parties to it had become bankrupt, and was then presented, was held to be presented in sufficient time, because it had been presented in the hands of the bank as collateral security. It is therefore practically impossible to put into any Act what is a reasonable time within which a note payable on demand shall be presented, and it has to be left to the judgment of the court.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 38,—

HON. MR. DRUMMOND said: It is well known in Canada that the maker of a note very often pays the wholesale house to whom it is given, and not the bank. The wording of the last clause of sub-section (c) of this section would appear to open the door to the discharge of the promissor.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The rights and powers of the holder of a bill are defined by this section. That is an incident to the character of bills of exchange and promissory notes. They are necessarily negotiable, and obtain a kind of sanctity in the hands of a third holder for value which is not accorded to any other form of payment. In the hands of a third holder, for value, even though the note was improperly negotiated by the original holder he can obtain value for it, leaving the man who gave it recourse against the party who improperly negotiated it.

HON. MR. SCOTT—That is, if the paper has matured, but this might be interpreted to apply to a note at any stage.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Words are employed through this Bill to signify a note given to a third party for value.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—It would not apply in the way I suggested.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The holder must be paid.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 42,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT said: There is a good deal of laxity as to what is the proper time for accepting a bill. There is no such universal custom established in the Dominion as would justify a person delaying acceptance of a bill of this kind without exposing himself to some risk. It was thought expedient, and it met with the approbation of a good many business men who were consulted about it, to fix the time as stated in this clause. That is, if it is not accepted on the day on which it is actually presented for acceptance, or the following day, then it must be protested.

HON. MR. SCOTT.—I think it would be a mistake to alter the law in that particular. Bills are often sent forward for presentation, and the party has not had advice; he says, "call to-morrow or the day after to-morrow; I have not had my mail, and I will probably hear from the drawer in a couple of days." The bill is withheld accordingly. Under this clause the bank could not withhold it.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Yes, for two days, the day of presentment and the next day.

HON. MR. SCOTT—My idea would be to allow more time. You cannot lay down an arbitrary rule that would apply in all cases.

HON. MR. McKAY—Bills are often presented before the invoice of the goods are received, and the banks allow a draft, in such a case, to remain in their possession until they know that the goods have arrived.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND — A longer time would be better; three days, at least, should be allowed.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On the 45th clause,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT said: This is slightly different from the provision in the English Act. In sub-section (c) the words "or his representative" are added, and we leave out the words "at a reasonable hour on a business day."

HON. MR. POWER—Why leave out those words? They seem reasonable.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There is no occasion to provide that it shall be on a business day, because there is another specific provision in the Act which excludes the payment on a day which is not a business day. To fix what would be a reasonable hour was thought inadvisable, because outside of cities, where business hours are not always observed, it would not be considered at all improper to present a bill or note at the store of a storekeeper whose business is in full blast between seven and nine in the evening; but in a city it would probably be considered a rather extraordinary proceeding to present a bill at such an hour. It was thought perfectly safe to leave this to the practice that prevails among the people themselves who hold notes and have to pay them.

HON. MR. POWER—I do not feel quite clear about that. Suppose, as has happened in American cases, the presentment for payment is made at 11 o'clock in the evening at a man's house, and he does not happen to keep his money about the house, he cannot be expected to pay then.

HON. MR. PELLETIER—That would not be the proper place or time.

HON. MR. POWER—The proper time is left out. I doubt the wisdom of departing from the wording of the English law there.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There is no provision in our law as it stands as to the time in which a bill should be presented, and it seems to me that we have worked under the law as it stands without any difficulty, and we do not wish to introduce any arbitrary change with respect to bills and notes that does not exist in any Province in our country now.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Still, we are doing it with regard to a great many points in this Bill.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not think we are making any changes of importance, except where inconvenience and loss to the community have been experienced under the existing law. I have never had a case, and I have had a great deal of experience in my practice, in which a difficulty arose because of the time of presentment. There is a word omitted in sub-section 7 which I should like to put in. The word "acceptance" should follow the word "bill" in the first line, because if the place of payment is specified in the acceptance the bill ought to be presented at that place. Under the English law the word "bill" is construed to mean bill or acceptance, but in passing this Bill through the House of Commons some one took exception there to the word "bill" as possibly not including the acceptance, and the words "or acceptance" have been inserted in several places in the Bill, and as they are left out here, it seems to me it might create a doubt whether it meant acceptance or not, so I move to insert the words "or acceptance" in the first line of the second sub-section.

The amendment was agreed to.

On the 47th clause,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—In sub-section 2 of this section there is an omission. It is stated that a bill is dishonored by non-payment when it has been presented for payment and payment has been refused. Then the section goes on to define what the rights of the holder are. The word "acceptor" ought to be there, because the recourse is created against the acceptor, as well as the drawer and the endorser.

HON. MR. POWER—It is remarkable that so important a point as that should not have been dealt with by the English Act.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—We all know that as soon as the bill is dishonored the immediate right of recourse exists against the whole of the parties to the bill; still, as we are taking the trouble to make all the parties liable, we may as well name all of them.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 49—notice of dishonor,—

HON. MR. SCOTT—Is verbal notice sufficient now?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Yes; I think it is a matter of proof in Quebec. I do not know how it is in Ontario.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I have no objection to the provision.

On sub-section 4,—

HON. MR. SCOTT—I think it is introducing a very dangerous principle, to make a notice of protest or dishonor as being sufficiently given if it is addressed to any party to such bill at the place where the bill is dated.

HON. MR. REESOR—I think it is usual to ask the post office address of every endorser.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I think the deposit in any post office at any time during the day on which protest or presentment has been made ought not to be sufficient unless the postage is paid. I propose to add after the words "post office," in the seventeenth line, the words "with the postage paid thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Then in sub-section 5 I would like to add in the 23rd line, after the word "posted," the words "as before provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

HON. MR. POWER—Paragraph (k) is different from the English law. The provision in the English Act is that notice must be given as soon as the bill is dishonored, or as soon after as possible. This Bill provides that notice must be given not later than the next following judicial or business day.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I would like my hon. friend to consider if an amendment would not be in order at the 9th line of sub-section 4, with reference to qualifying the words "at his customary address or place of residence," by adding "or place where such residence is given."

HON. MR. ABBOTT—A note is payable to so-and-so in Montreal, and is endorsed by half a dozen people. The note is not paid when it falls due, and it goes with perhaps a hundred other notes to the notary to be protested. He sends notices to everybody on that bill to the place where the note is dated. He mails the notices in Montreal. If the endorsers live elsewhere it is only necessary for them to insert after their names the places to which notice shall be sent, and if they fail to do so it is their own fault if notice is sent only to the place where the note is dated.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The rule in Ontario is that the notary has not only that day but the whole of the next to post the notice, and during that time he has plenty of time to make enquiries. If a well known firm in Toronto is endorser on a bill, surely it is not asking too much of the notary to address the notice to the proper address. It is too much to say that a notary's clerk, without making the slightest enquiry, may send a notice to the post office, at the place where the bill was dated, when he could easily find out the proper address.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not pretend to know the Ontario law as well as my hon. friend does, but I may inform the hon. gentlemen that the general practice has been to mail the notice to the place at which the bill is dated, unless there be an indication of another address. It is all very well in a small place, or where there is a small business, to say that the notary shall make enquiry where the parties are, but where business is transacted on a large scale it is not easy to find out where each party is to be addressed, when there may be, perhaps, a hundred notes to be protested on the same day. It might give rise to an immense loss of security.

HON. MR. SCOTT—The whole Bill is conceived in the interest of the banks. It is quite apparent on the face of it.

HON. MR. DRMMMOND—Would it not be well to put in the word "endorser" after the word "bill," in the 9th line, subsection 4?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will perceive that the endorsation does not usually bear the name of the place where it is made, but the law expressly provides that if the endorser choose to name the place, then the notice must be sent to that place.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 51,—

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—Why should there be any distinction made between the Province of Quebec and other Provinces in the noting and protestiug of an inland bill for non-acceptance and payment? I heard the opinion expressed within the last day or two, by a judge of the Province of Quebec, that it was injudicious and improper that there should be any distinction made. I submit that what is sufficient for one Province ought to be for the others.

HON. MR. POWER—I presume the secret of it is, that the notarial body is a very large and influential one in the Province of Quebec, and is also well represented in the House of Commons, and they have taken care that their fees shall not be taken away from them.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The people of Quebec desire to have their law as it is, and it seems to me, as it is only a matter of procedure and not of law, it is desirable to keep it as it is. It is a process that their forefathers have been accustomed to for centuries; they wish to retain it, and I can see no objection to allowing them to do so.

HON. MR. PELLETIER—I must believe the hon. gentleman from Montreal when he says that a judge there expressed the opinion that there should be no difference in the law in the Province of Quebec and elsewhere; but I am sure that that judge does not represent the opinion of the Province or of the Bar of the Province. I remember an occasion when an attempt was made to have a change in the law of Quebec in this respect, and not only the members of the Bar, but the Bench also, were opposed to it.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—It is desirable to have the law uniform—not only the law but the procedure.

HON. MR. PELLETIER—Then make it as it is in Quebec, and we will have no objection to it.

HON. MR. BOLDUC—I have now heard for the first time that a judge has made objections to the practice in the Province of Quebec. I have, on many occasions, heard those gentlemen state that the commercial law of Quebec was the best that could be had anywhere. Our people are used to the law as it exists in the Province, and the slightest change would work very prejudicially against them.

HON. MR. RESSOR—Will the hon. gentleman explain why notarial fees are more than twice as high in the Province of Quebec as they are in the Province of Ontario?

HON. MR. BOLDUC—That is a matter of detail. I do not think they are double, but protests are not so numerous in our Province as in other Provinces, in consequence of the high notarial fees.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will perceive that in Quebec the notarial profession is a learned profession by itself. In the other Provinces any one may be a notary; it is an incident generally to some other profession, and there is no reason for paying a high price for services which are almost mechanical. There is no reason for making the same charges in the other Provinces that prevail in the Province of Quebec.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Will my hon. friend explain why those words are introdueed in clause 51—"but it shall not, except in the Province of Quebec, be necessary to note or protest any such bill in order to preserve the recourse against the drawer or endorser." How is the drawer or the endorser to be held unless he is notified?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I put that question to those who drew the Bill, and the explanation is satisfactory to a certain extent. There is another clause in the Bill which provides that if an inland bill is dishonored notice must be given to the endorser and the drawer, but they do not insist on the formality of a protest. That is what is dispensed with in the practice in Ontario. Noting means notarial notation, which is completed by protest.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I think those words are simply confusing.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I propose to add after the word "but," in the third line, "subject to the provisions of this Act with respect to motives of dishonor."

HON. MR. SCOTT—The clause means nothing, and should be struck out altogether.

HON. MR ABBOTT—This clause deals with the protesting of bills, and it says that inland bills need not be protested. I understand that that is the law in England, and it makes the law uniform throughout the Provinces, except the Province of Quebec.

HON. MR. REESOR—The notice of dishonor would not entail the expense of a notarial protest.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It would not. The amendments I propose to make to this clause are, after the word "but," in the third line, to add "subject to the provisions of this Act with respect to notice of dishonor."

HON. MR. POWER—That is clear from the provisions of the Act.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My theory about legislation is that we should endeavor to put it in such a form that persons will not be liable to be misled by it. I must confess that I was misled by this for some time, and imagined that the bill rendered it unnecessary to take any proceeding whatever with regard to inland bills of exchange, and one would naturally think so, reading the clause by itself. Therefore, as this amendment will make it quite clear, I think it will be better to adopt it.

The amendment was adopted.

HON. MR SANFORD—Do I understand that the portion referring to the Province of Quebec is struck out?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—No. Why should my hon. friend take such an interest in the Province of Quebec?

HON. MR. SANFORD—I take a considerable interest in the Province of Quebec. If this exception is permitted, anyone whose business extends to the Province of Quebec would have to keep in his employ somebody specially to watch these matters in that Province. We are legislating for the Dominion, and I cannot see why a law which is applicable to the other Provinces should not be suitable for the Province of Quebec. I am not alone in taking this view of it. Many who are doing business in different sections of Canada feel as I do on this question. If we have one uniform law for all the Provinces we will avoid serious mistakes and embarrassing losses.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I hope my hon. friend will move that inland bills be protested notarially in other Provinces as well as in Quebec. I think it is a better system. There is really no change in the principle of the law whatever. It is only a minor proceeding, and I do not see why we should not indulge the Province of Quebec in this matter. I should like to know whether I am expressing correctly the feelings of representatives from Quebec in saying that they desire to retain this mode of procedure in the event of a bill being dishonored. I think it is hard to deny it to them, inasmuch as it does not materially affect the other Provinces.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—It is quite impossible to say that a special regulation affecting Quebec does not affect other parts of the Dominion. In this case the notarial protest should be dispensed with if it is found unnecessary elsewhere. If the suggestion of the hon. leader of the House, that the other parts of the Dominion should adopt this system of notorial protest, were to prevail, it seems to me that the tail would wag the dog. I am of opinion, not having any interest in notarial fees or legal expenses, that the parts of the clause referring specially to the Province of Quebec should be omitted.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The object of this Bill is to harmonize the commercial law as far as possible throughout the Dominion. I do not see why Quebec could not come under the general law which applies to all the Dominion. Commercial law should prevail uniformly in all the Provinces, and I do not think that Quebec would be much opposed to such legislation.

HON. MR. POWER—This requirement, that not only shall notice be given by a holder of the bill, but that he shall go to a notary and get him to make an official protest, is simply a sort of trap to the unwary creditor, and I can readily understand that a business man residing in another Province, to whom an inland bill becomes due from some one in the Province of Quebec, and payable in that Province, may very likely be misled, may act upon the law as it is in his own Province and find afterwards that, according to the law of the Province of Quebec, he should have employed a notary and had the bill protested. There is a very serious objection to maintaining this exception in the bill. I cannot, for the life of me, see how a debtor in the Province of Quebec should feel aggrieved, because he will be relieved, if this provision is striken out, from the necessity of paying the notarial fees in addition to the amount of the bill. I quite agree that it will more or less diminish the emoluments of a very respectable class of the community in the Province of Quebec, but I do not know that we are just now bound to consider them, and the argument of the hon. gentleman that this has been the law in the Province of Quebec for a long time does not seem to have much force.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Both of my hon. friends mistake the application of the theory they advance. They say that commercial law ought to be the same throughout the Dominion. The commercial law is made uniform by this Act; the obligations and remedies are the same throughout the whole of the Provinces; but in Quebec, if the parties are sued they are sued in a different manner from that which is recognized in the Province of Ontario. They are charged a smaller amount of costs considerably in the Province of Quebec than in Ontario, when they are sued. There are various other particulars which follow the dishonor of a bill, but the obligations of a party are the same. The same argument which my hon. friends use for the purpose of having the notarial system of Quebec upset as regards promissory notes would apply to proceedings before the courts.

HON. MR. POWER—We have nothing to do with that.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—When my hon. friends object to this provision with regard to protesting they are not objecting to any difference in the commercial law, but to a difference in procedure. If it is the desire, as I really think it is the almost unanimous desire, of the Province of Quebec, to preserve the existing procedure intact, we do not concede anything by allowing them to do so. If a man in another Province does not wish to pay two or three shillings more for a protest in the Province of Quebec he need not deal with anyone in Quebec. I do not suggest that there should be a cessation of commerce between the Provinces, because it costs more for a protest in Quebec than elsewhere, but while we claim that the law shall be the same as far as is practicable throughout the Dominion, I do not think that a slight change in the procedure is worth quarreling about. Quebec desires to keep its system of protest, and I think it would be seriously aggrieved if we were to take it away from them.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—If it is only a slight change of procedure, the gentlemen of the notarial profession in Quebec will be more ready to yield to the general law of the Dominion. We are here to legislate for the whole Dominion; to make an exception will only lead to confusion.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This is not a change in the law; it is keeping the law as it is.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—But the object of this Bill is to make this law uniform, as far as possible.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—It appears to me that this exception is extending to the notarial profession of Quebec a consideration that is not shown to the professional men of the other Provinces. Consequently I think the same consideration should be extended to the members of the profession in the other Provinces.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—You would make the other Provinces subject to the law of Quebec?

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—I am strongly in favor of the suggestion thrown out by the leader of the House, that we should make the Quebec system uniform throughout the Dominion.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Though I am a lawyer, I do not approve of that.

HON. MR. POWER—If there is a risk of destroying the Confederation we should not protest any further against this exception; but I think the leader of the House rather misrepresents the position taken by those who are opposed to his view. The opposition is not based chiefly on the fact that the fees of notaries in Quebec are higher than the fees of notaries elsewhere, but that certain things must be done in order that the holder of a note may recover on it in the Province of Quebec, and this difference makes a sort of trap for the holder.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I drew attention to the fact that it would be very much better if the law were uniform throughout the whole Dominion. I cannot, however, forget that the practice, in Ontario at all events, is that all inland bills are protested. The banks invariably protest—that is where 99 per cent. of the protests come from. If a man wants a bill protested he hands it in to a bank. Therefore I do not see very much after all in the exception in favor of Quebec. It only is important with respect to the amount of the fees charged.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not understand sub-section (b.) It is as follows:—

"(b.) When a bill drawn, payable at the place of business or residence of some person other than the drawee, has been dishonored by non-acceptance, it must be protested for non-payment at the place where it is expressed to be payable, or at a place in Canada situated not more than five miles therefrom, and no further presentment for payment to, or demand on, the drawee is necessary."

There must be some omission in that: it ought to apply to the case which actually occurs, that is, that if a bill is dishonored by non-acceptance then it should be protested for non-acceptance, and if by non-payment, then it should be protested for non-payment. The process which a bill goes through is this: it is presented to the drawer, and if he refuses to accept, it is protested for non-acceptance, and thereupon the holder immediately has an action against everybody whose name appears upon the bill to recover the amount of it; but why should he be put to the trouble and expense of protesting it again after he has gone through the process which makes everyone on the bill liable to the holder? There is no occasion for the expense of another protest.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—The ordinary course of business is to hold the bill until the time is up.

HON. MR. POIRIER—If a bill is presented and not accepted, it then and there becomes due—it has matured, and therefore it can be protested for non-payment.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It can, but why?

HON. MR. POWER—I think a little more consideration still is due to this matter. Inasmuch as we are dealing with inland bills, if a bill is not paid then it must be protested at the place where it is expressly payable. I think perhaps the better way would be to let the clause stand over for further consideration. The English Act was drawn with great care, and we should be slow to depart from its terms.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not understand why there should be any difficulty about adopting the proposition which I have made. Let us see how the parties all stand. A bill is drawn by Brown payable in Montreal. It is presented to this person in Kingston, say, and he refuses acceptance. It is protested or not protested, but in either case notice of dishonor must be given to every party on that day or the next day, or all recourse against the parties is lost. Then the next day everybody who is a party to the bill knows that it is not accepted, that it is dishonored, and that a right of action has accrued to the person who holds it to sue them all, which he can do without further notice or demand, and it is their business then to pay or not to pay it. If they do not pay it they subject themselves to an action. Since the rights of all parties are complete, since the holder has right of action against everybody concerned, since everybody is aware that the bill has been dishonored, why should we force the holder to go through the further process of protesting the drawer and endorser, or anybody else for non-payment?

HON. MR. SCOTT—He is not bound to do it, but if he does it, then it must be at the place where it is payable.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It may have been necessary to put such a clause in the English Act years ago, when it was passed. It may have been necessary, at that time, to hold the bill until it became due before it could be sued upon. That was the opinion when I came to the bar in Quebec, that you had to hold a bill until it became due, but that idea is exploded. If a bill is protested for non-acceptance a right of action accrues to the holder. The suggestion that I make is to insert the words "or non-payment" after "non-acceptance."

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—I would like to hear an explanation of the provisions of sub-section 6, that a Bill must be protested at the place where it is dishonored, or at some other place in Canada situate within five miles of the place of presentment and dishonor of such bill.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It must be put of record and made an official act within a certain distance of the place. That is the reason that has been given to me in answer to that enquiry.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND.—Could it not be made available to cause a great deal of inconvenience to a merchant? For instance, the holder might actually prefer to go five miles from the place of presentment to protest it, in order to put the parties to inconvenience.

HON. MR. POWER—I imagine that the real object of it is to accommodate country merchants, where notaries are not to be found, perhaps, in the immediate vicinity.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The protest consists in the filling up of a notarial form, and there can be no injury to any man in protesting a bill five miles from the place of its presentment, except to the man who gets it done, if he goes five miles outside of the city to get a notary to do it. I think the objections which have been made to this clause may be met by inserting after the word "payable," in the 44th line, the words "or where it requires to be presented for acceptance, as the case may be." That will compel the protest, whether for acceptance or payment, to be made within a reasonable distance of the place where the Bill is to be presented for acceptance.

HON. MR. POWER—Would it not be better to put it in this way—that it must be protested for non-acceptance and non-payment respectively.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It would only lengthen the clause without making it more clear. It must be understood that it is either for non-payment or non-acceptance.

HON. MR. POWER—Then the better way would be to put the non-acceptance first.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Perhaps it would be better, though virtually it amounts to the same thing. I shall alter the order of the wording on the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

The amendment was agreed to.

On clause 52, sub-section 2,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am going to ask the committee to destroy the distinction to some extent between what is called a qualified acceptance and a general acceptance. I believe it is the law in some parts of the Dominion that an acceptor may accompany his acceptance by a statement that the bill is payable at a certain place.

HON. MR. SCOTT—That is an acceptance generally.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Yes; that is an acceptance generally, and it is so defined in this Bill; but, if he adds the word "only," or some other equivalent phrase, then it is a qualified acceptance. If a bill is drawn on him, payable at the Bank of Montreal, it is a general acceptance, and the holder is bound to accept that form of acceptance, and every party to the bill remains bound on it; but if the acceptor adds the words "only" or "elsewhere," it is a qualified acceptance, and the holder cannot take it; if he does take it the endorsers are discharged. That seems to me an absolute absurdity, that when a man says "I will pay this bill at the Bank of Montreal" the holder of the bill is bound to take that, and he does not discharge the drawer or endorsers, but if he adds the word "only" the endorsers are not held. By these two clauses, if you say a bill is payable at the Bank of Montreal you need not present it there, but the acceptor remains liable without any presentation; but if it is payable at the Bank of Montreal only and not elsewhere, then you can present it there, not necessarily on the day it matures, but when you like. I propose to amend the Bill to provide that if the acceptor names a place of payment in the bill it must be presented there for payment. Under this system, if a man in his acceptance says where he will pay the bill it has got to be presented there, but the non-presentation does not relieve him, nor does it relieve anybody else as endorsers; but if the holder chooses to sue him without presenting it where he promised to present it, then he runs the risk of paying the costs. That seems to me to be absolutely just, simple, and convenient in all respects. If the holder puts the acceptor to undue cost by sueing him at one place when provision is made for payment at another place, he sues at his own risk, and the costs are in the discretion of the court.

HON. MR. SCOTT—Section 52 only relates to the person that is ultimately liable on the bill.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—In Nova Scotia the endorser of a bill is not relieved from his responsibility by the acceptor saying that he will pay it at his own office. It does not relieve either the drawer or endorser; but if he says "payable at my office and not elsewhere," then it is taken at the party's risk that the endorser may be relieved. I know of no case in our Province in which the acceptor could be sued unless the Bill is presented to him for payment.

The clause was agreed to as amended.

On clause 60,—

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—Clause 60 in the Bill as originally drawn is entirely different from clause 60 now before us, and it created a great deal of excitement amongst bankers. That clause was struck out in the Commons, though it existed in the English law, upon which this Bill has been modelled. It provided:

"When a bill payable to order on demand is drawn on a bank, and the bank on which it is drawn pays the bill in good faith, and in the ordinary course of business, it is not incumbent on the bank to show that the indorsement of the payee or any subsequent indorsement was made by or under the authority of the person whose indorsement it purports to be, and the bank is deemed to have paid the bill in due course, although such indorsement has been forged or made without authority.

As far as the mercantile community is concerned, the Montreal Board of Trade objected to this clause, but I have received a great many communications from bankers expressing strongly their objection to this clause being struck out, and claiming that as the Bill is a copy, to a large extent, of the English law, there is no valid reason for departing from English practice and striking out this clause. They principally dwelt on the inconvenience to which it subjects a large portion of the public, because if the bank is liable for any indorsement, whether they are familiar with it or not, of course the identity of the party to whom the bill is payable is a necessity for the bank to ascertain. I hold here an immense number of opinions given by agents of banks and others throughout the country, that if this clause is struck out and the bank is held responsible for signatures and indorsements for which it has no sufficient means of information or identification, that they will be compelled, in self-defence, to put a great many people to inconvenience in respect to it. Under these circumstances, I think I ought to move that clause 60, as it appeared in the original bill, should be reinstated in this bill.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I really do not see why the bank should not be responsible. If a bill is forged, I think it is the duty of the bank to take care that they do not pay it. They generally require a person who presents a cheque at a bank to find some one to identify him. The banks are well paid for all this trouble, and should be careful of what they are about. If you relieve the banks of responsibility they will take any paper that may be presented. It would open up a multiplicity of means of defrauding the public. The bank must take care of itself and know the person to whom it pays money.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There are two illustrations in the English Act quoted which seem to me to suffice as to the argument against this clause. These illustrations are as follows:

"1. A cheque is drawn payable to C. or order. It is stolen, and C.'s indorsement is forged by the thief. The bankers on whom it is drawn pay it. They can debit the drawer's account with the amount of the cheque.

"2. A cheque is drawn payable to C.'s order, and handed to an agent of C.'s in payment of a debt due to C. The agent, who has no authority to indorse cheques, indorses it "per proc." for C., obtains payment and keeps the money. The loss falls on C. He has no remedy against the drawer or the bankers."

He has no remedy. That is the state of things which this clause would produce. The only argument against it, and it is an argument that has some weight, is that it is a serious inconvenience to the banks to be made responsible for the genuineness of the endorsement on a bill presented to them for payment. The endorsement on that bill is one that the drawer does not see at all. He requests the bank to pay out of his money to John Smith five hundred pounds; the bank pays it to John Jones in reality. How can it be said that they are fulfilling their obligation to him when they take his money and give it to another man? If they do not know the endorsement, of course it is their interest to verify it in some way, and my experience is that they always do so. I have had a bank account for forty years, and occasionally a person receiving a cheque from me has come back to me to be identified. I write my name on the back of the cheque and that suffices. To allow this other clause to become law would open the door for frauds of every description. A cheque could not be left where an office boy or anybody else could get at it. You could not send a cheque by post to pay an account—you could not give a cheque without getting a receipt for it. You would run the chance of any beggar on the street picking up a cheque and putting his name on it, and the banks paying it without hesitation. The money would be paid away contrary to the instructions of the owner, and without any opportunity for the person who owned the money to protect his interests. I am pulled both ways in this matter. I have something to do with the banks myself, but I cannot recognize the justice of this proposition, and I think the House was right in striking it from the Bill.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—Is it not peculiar that in this particular the House should depart from the English Act, which has been followed in every other feature? That is an anomaly which requires some explanation. I might trouble the House with a short paragraph from a communication which I have received. My informant says:

"From experience I am certain there is no part of our dealings with the public that causes so much exasperation and so much positive inconvenience to the public as the fact that banks are responsible for the endorsements upon cheques. In order to protect ourselves, we must see that the party who presents the cheque, or by whom it purports to be endorsed, is the real payee, and in order to do this we are constantly obliged to refuse payment until the public, very often at great inconvenience, are compelled to bring parties to the bank, not only whom they know but whom we know, to identify them.

"I imagine that if a statement of the kind were sought it would be found that not one case in 5,000 is a cheque presented but by the party actually entitled to receive the money; yet it is quite likely that of that number we would call upon 250 to be properly identified to us.

"This is a serious inconvenience when men are in a hurry and especially when they are strangers.

"This is the disadvantage of it to the public. To the bank it is serious in another way.

"The liability of banks for endorsements has been abused, inasmuch as many men now use bank cheques as receipts for money, knowing well that on the bank is thrown the responsibility of seeing that the money is actually paid to the proper person. They take little heed, therefore, to examine their passbooks and cheques when surrendered to them, to satisfy themselves as to the genuineness of the endorsements, and owing to this, after a lapse of many years, a bank might be called upon to refund money to a party who, if he had taken care to satisfy himself at the proper time, would have detected the fraud.

"We take every possible care to surrender customers their cheques and get confirmation from them that their account is correct in our books, but it has been held that this is no protection to the banks against the fraud of a forged endorsement, and certainly we should have protection of some kind."

Now I can quite see, on the face of it, that it is a great convenience to the public that this clause should be struck out, but it is the practice of banks, in judging of the proper endorsation on cheques especially, to leave it to a junior clerk, to whom they pay two or three hundred dollars a year, and, as a matter of fact, if you make your cheques payable to a certain firm you throw the onus of proving the payment on the banks, you being the only party knowing them to be entitled to it. If it be the fact that in drafting this Bill clause 60 was for good reason inserted, I cannot see that it can be rejected summarily now.

HON. MR. POWER—In connection with this clause, the matter was very fully discussed in the House of Commons, where the feeling was overwhelmingly against the retention of the draft clause which the hon. gentleman now desires to have inserted in the Bill, and although it is perfectly true that we should, as a rule, follow as nearly as we can the English law, still, if the English law is in itself not applicable to our condition, I do not think we are bound to adopt it. If hon. gentlemen will look at clause 24 of this Bill they will find that the clause which the hon. gentleman wishes to insert is an exception to the general principle governing the Bill. The general rule is, that the holder is responsible, and I do not see why an exception should be made in favor of the banks. They have facilities and skill which enable them to protect themselves better than others could.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—If that clause were adopted, it would be unsafe to send cheques payable to order anywhere, as is now done all over the country; because, if a letter were to get into other hands, and the endorsation of the cheque were forged, the fraud could not be discovered, because the payment would be in another city altogether.

The amendment was declared lost.

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—I think it ought to be clearly understood that the bank has a legal right—I have heard it questioned—to take precautions to satisfy itself as to the validity of signatures and endorsements. If the banks cannot exercise due and proper care, and are responsible, as this Bill makes them, I think it is necessary to insert in the Bill something giving the banks the absolute right to require identification in every case, and perhaps some of the lawyers in the House will say whether that is requisite or not. If there is not a clear opinion on that point I shall feel it necessary to divide the committee on a clause conferring on the bank the power of absolutely identifying the signatures and a certain limit of responsibility—a period beyond which the responsibility does not extend.

The clause was adopted.

HON. MR. MCCLELAN, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (Y) "An Act respecting the Reckoning of Time." (Mr. MacInnes, Burlington).

Bill (Z) "An Act respecting Railways." (Mr. Abbott).

HON. MR. POWER—I presume that is substantially the same Bill that was introduced by the hon. gentleman from Monck and defeated in the other House. Have the Government repented of their action?

The Senate adjourned at 6 o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, April 11th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READING.

Bill (91) "An Act to grant certain powers to the Chambly Manufacturing Company." (Mr. Pelletier).

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Bill (89) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the River Detroit Railway Bridge Company." (Mr. McKindsey).

PONTIAC AND PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported Bill (87) "An Act respecting the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway Company," without any amendment. He said: A member of the committee stated that it was his desire to move certain amendments to this Bill at this stage, and if he still persists in that determination I quite admit that he ought to have an opportunity, in order that he may do so, to give the necessary notice.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I shall avail myself of my unquestionable privilege to move the third reading of the Bill presently, leaving it to any hon. member to move whatever amendment he may think fit.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—I gave notice in committee this morning that I intended to move certain amendments to this Bill, and I thought it was necessary that I should give notice to that effect. That is the reason I do not approve of the motion submitted by the hon. gentleman from Sarnia, that the Bill be read the third time presently.

HON. MR. MILLER—As the hon. gentleman from Rideau division has stated in his place that he intends to move amendments to this Bill, I am sure it is the desire of the House that he should have the opportunity of doing so.

HON. MR. VIDAL—If it is the desire of the House I shall withdraw my motion, and move, instead, that the Bill be read the third time on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL MAY RELIEF BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

HON. MR. HOWLAN, from the Committe on Standing Orders and Private Bills, reported Bill (16) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Samuel May," recommending its passage.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the Bill be read the third time on Wednesday next.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I should like to ask the leader of the House whether he thinks it would be necessary to give notice of an amendment to this Bill for the protection of rights acquired since the lapse of this patent? I do not think that the promoters of this Bill intend that it shall cover the rights of those who have invested capital or commenced operations in this business under the impression that the patent had expired. If the leader of the House thinks the second clause is sufficient to cover any such rights I shall not move in the matter myself.

HON. MR. DICKEY—The third reading of the Bill is proposed for Wednesday next, and therefore it is open to the hon. gentleman to place a notice of his motion on the Paper.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I have no intention of taking any action myself; I simply call the attention of the leader of the House to the subject.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It was for the purpose of considering this question, and others connected with the Bill, that I asked my hon. friend to postpone the third reading until Wednesday next; but at the same time, I should be sorry that the House should put itself entirely into my hands in the matter if I might be of opinion that no amendment is necessary. I might be wrong; if so, it would not be the first time, and I suppose will not be the last time. If any member wishes to make an amendment he can give notice. It is my intention to examine the Bill and report on it, with a view of deciding what the Government will do when the third reading is moved on Wednesday next.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—In the committee to-day we had ample evidence before us that no new works had been commenced by any one. We are perfectly willing that this relief should be granted to Mr. May.

The motion was agreed to.

ELBOW RIVER WATER POWER CO.'S BILL.

MOTION.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED moved that the Bill to incorporate the Elbow River Water Power Company be recommitted to the Select Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, for reconsideration. He said: I placed this notice on the Paper at the request of the corporators of the Bill. Mr. Davis, the member for Alberta, had charge of the Bill in the House of Commons, being at the same time one of the corporators. The Bill was brought up and speeded in its reading for the purpose of allowing a delegation from Calgary to express their views before the Select Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors. The delegates from Calgary were heard exparte, Mr. Davis being then in Montreal. I was not prepared to express my views on the matter to the committee, Mr. Davis having all the plans and other information and knowledge respecting this Bill. I therefore asked the committee, on that occasion, to let the Bill stand until Mr. Davis returned from Montreal. The committee did not then expect to meet on the following Thursday, which was the date of the adjournment, and in their wisdom (for I must assume was what assume they did they considered was wisely done though I might differ therefrom) they refused to let the matter stand until Mr. Davis returned. On his return to Ottawa he requested me to ask this honorable House to permit the Bill to be recommitted to the committee, so that he could express his views upon it. It seems to me that this consideration is involved in the motion, namely, when a promoter of a Bill brings it before a committee of the House he should be given an opportunity to explain to the committee the objects of the Bill. The committee on that occasion was not assisted by the representations which Mr. Davis could have made, and, I am disposed to think, had not placed before them that measure of information which it was their desire to have in connection with the measure. The Bill is evidently fraught with a certain amount of importance to its promoters and to the particular district in which it is the intention to carry on the operations referred to in the Bill.

I think hon. gentlemen present should take into consideration that in such a matter as this the public interests would be best served by hearing what the promoter of the Bill may have to say upon this particular question. I do not intend upon this occasion to deal with the merits or demerits of the Bill. I think this question should be taken into consideration entirely apart from that—that we should divest ourselves entirely of the view as to whether this Bill is possessed of merits or not, for this, I submit, cannot be very well considered on this occasion in the House, nor can it be done by hearing the ex parte views of delegates on one side; but the views of both parties should be presented before the committee. I therefore move the motion which has been placed upon the Paper, that this Bill be recommitted, for the purpose of hearing Mr. Davis on the matter, so that if his views should appear to be consonant with what might be deemed the public interest, that the measure should be restored to the Order Paper, so that it may come before this House again in due course.

HON. MR. DICKEY—My hon. friend says that he does not propose to go into the facts of this case, and he gives the House no ground on which he desires a reconsideration of this Bill. I do not, therefore, propose to go into the facts of the case at present, but I shall submit to hon. members a preliminary objection to this motion being entertained upon grounds which I think will recommend that proposition to the good sense of the House. My hon. friend has correctly stated that when the Bill came up from the House of Commons he asked as an indulgence that it should be read at once a first and second time, on the same day, and the rule was dispensed with, in order to accommodate the hon. gentleman; and the reason he gave for it at the time was, that the mayor and some of the corporation of Calgary were in attendance, for the purpose of opposing this Bill, and he desired to give them an early opportunity of appearing before the committee. In consequence of that they did appear; they were heard, plans were submitted, the whole question was gone into, and a very strong, almost a unanimous opinion was expressed against the Bill, and a report was, in consequence, submitted by me, as it was my duty to do, as chairman of the committee, to this effect:

"Your committee find that the preamble of the said Bill has not been proved to their satisfaction, and your committee have arrived at such decision on the ground that the passing of the said Bill would be against the public interest."

This was on the 26th March, and is signed by myself as chairman. On motion of myself, seconded by Hon. Mr. Power, that report was adopted by the House, and, therefore, there is an end of the Bill. My hon. friend does not propose to rescind the solemn action of the House, when they declared it was a Bill against the public interest—that the preamble had not been proved—but he proposes cooly to refer it back again to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, although the House has solemnly disposed of it. In all good nature I will say that the committee scarcely ever meet without having new business to do, without being asked to reconsider business that they have already disposed of, and on which the House has sanctioned our action. Therefore, that ought to be a sufficient reason for the House not entertaining this motion at all. I am pefectly prepared to show by the most cogent reasons, if it is necessary, that this is a motion which should not be entertained—for the reasons that are given in the report itself, and it is hardly worth while going into this discussion. As chairman of the committee I never shirk any work, and on behalf of my fellow members, I must object to asking them to entertain a subject which they have already considered at some length, and which the House has disposed of. I ask the opinion of the leader of the House on this question, because it concerns the practice of the Senate, and, in my opinion, it would be most unwise to reopen the matter.

HON. MR. SANFORD—I cannot agree with the views presented by the last speaker. The facts are these: The promoter of that Bill had not the opportunity of stating his case to the committee. Those who were opposed to it ventilated their views very freely, and the committee were necessarily biased in the report that they brought in. Surely when the promoter of the Bill was unavoidedly detained, had not an opportunity of stating his case, hon. gentlemen will permit the Bill to be referred back to the committee to allow him to state his views with regard to it. It is only a matter of justice and fair play. I certainly hope that the motion that the Bill be restored to the Order Paper be favorably considered by the House.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—It seems to me we have nothing before us; as that report has been confirmed we cannot send it back to the committee. The House has no longer possession of the Bill, and I do not see how we can revive it. I think it would be establishing a bad precedent if the motion of my hon. friend should be adopted. If we create such a precedent we will find persons at all stages of legislation asking that Bills be referred back to committee.

The motion was declared lost on a division.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day having been called,—

That an humble Address be presented to Her Most Gracious Majesty; praying for the amendment of the British North America Act, so that Senators shall, henceforward, as their seats become vacant, be appointed by Provincial Legislatures, the Crown to retain the right to the appointment of three or six additional Senators, as now exists under the Constitution.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (Cape Breton)—in the absence of Mr. POIRIER—moved that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that it stand as an order for Wednesday next.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I think we are getting into a very vicious habit in this House of allowing gentlemen who place motions on the Order Paper to postpone them from time to time, sometimes for a month. A Bill must be either withdrawn or postponed in a certain way, and to allow notice of a motion of this kind to be given for a certain day, so that gentlemen may be prepared to discuss it on a certain day and vote upon it, is not in the public interest, and the House should not be treated in such a cavalier manner.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not know that there is any limit to the will of the House in these matters. The House has a right, if it choose, to allow any hon. gentleman who puts a motion on the Paper to postpone its discussion, and I think I and others in the House are quite as much to blame, if there is blame anywhere, as the hon. gentleman in whose name the motion stands. The question is one of no inconsiderable importance, and every hon. gentleman has a right to bring up such questions and have them discussed, and in the present instance I know that several members of the House are desirous of speaking on this motion, and they thought the time fixed by the hon. gentleman was rather too short. It is at the request of several members of the Senate, amongst them myself, that this notice is postponed. I saw the hon. gentleman this morning, and suggested next Wednesday for his motion, and I understood him to agree to it, as we have the Promissory Notes Bill and the North-West Bill on Tuesday.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was discharged.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (129) "An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act."

The Senate adjourned at 4 p. m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, April 14th, 1890.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

HON. MR. READ—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to bring to the notice of the Government the delay in the printing of the Bills. There were nine Bills passed last week, and none of them are returned printed. I have made enquiries of the officials, and from them I understand the delay arose from the compositors having a half-holiday on Saturday.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I shall certainly bring this matter to the notice of my colleague, the Secretary of State, and ask him what is the cause of the delay.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—I shall be glad to receive the instructions of the House with regard to the non-publication of the Debates of the Senate which occurred last Wednesday. It appears that a speech of one hon. gentleman, sent to him for revision, has not been corrected, and remains in his hands, and for that reason the Debates of that day is delayed, and I am appealed to as chairman by the clerk of the Debates Committee to know what to do. Is the printer to proceed with the publication and omit the hon. gentleman's speech, or is he to wait until he receives the corrections? That hon. gentleman is not in Ottawa at present, I understand (I allude to the hon. Senator from Burlington). If this House will please decide whether that debate is to be published without waiting for the hon. gentleman's speech, I shall feel more at ease about it.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I do not see why there should be any delay at all. The reports of the few remarks that I make in the House are never given me to revise, and I do not want to look at them, and I do not see why any other gentleman should delay the publication of the Debates. Let it go in as it is, or omit it altogether.

HON. MR. MCINNES (B. C.)—I may say that a messenger from the Printing Bureau, on Friday last, brought a large envelope containing some printed matter to my room, and said it was addressed to Mr. McInnes, room No. 8. I told him that it was not for me; that I had made no speech in the Senate for sometime, and that I thought it was for my colleague from Burlington. However, as it was addressed to room No. 8, I opened it. When I saw it was a proof of my namesake's speech I gave it to the boy, and told him to go to room No. 9 with it. That may account for the speech not being returned to the Printing Bureau, and the delay in the printing.

HON. MR. POWER—This question as to the time which is to be taken by hon. gentlemen in correcting their speeches was under discussion before the committee, and the committee instructed the reporters that after the time for correcting speeches had elapsed speeches were to be published, whether corrected or not; and I do not see why the whole publication should be delayed because one hon. gentleman happens to be absent and neglects to revise his speech. As a rule, the speeches are reported with accuracy, and if any hon. gentleman wishes to make any material change in his speech he should at least make an effort to do so within the time which is appointed—that is to say, any time up to 10 o'clock on the evening on which the speech is delivered. It would be unreasonable to delay the whole publication because an hon. gentleman does not find it convenient to revise his speech within a proper time.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—It ought to be left entirely within the discretion of the reporters. If I recollect right, the speech in question was on irrigation in the North-West, and if that is the one, it did not require revision, because it was already written.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—Supposing the hon. gentleman's speech were omitted from the first issue of the Debates it could appear in the subsequent edition for the bound volume. I presume, therefore, it is the desire of the House that the Debates should be printed without waiting for the hon. gentleman's speech?

HON. MR. OGILVIE—We should not have the publication of our Debates kept back for any person's correction of speeches.

HON. MR. McINNES (B. C.) — They must have the hon. gentleman's speech down at the Printing Bureau in type-writing, as it was sent down by the reporters, so that there is no necessity for waiting for a corrected copy.

DETROIT RIVER RAILWAY BRIDGE CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called,— Third reading of Bill (89) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the River Detroit Winter Railway Bridge Company, and to change the name of the Company to 'The River Detroit Railway Bridge Company,'"

HON. MR. McKINDSEY moved that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended on page 2 by striking out from "3," in the first line, to "the," on the third line. He said: This alteration simply changes the third clause of the Bill. It makes the sub-section of clause 3 the third section, instead of the one in the former Act. It does not change the principle of the Bill, and therefore I presume there will be no objection to it. The change was suggested at the meeting of the committee by the senior member from Halifax, but was not accepted at that time. Since then it has been thought better to make the amendment, because it will simplify the matter and make the clause of the Bill more readily understood.

HON. MR. DICKEY—As this motion proposes substantially to correct a report of the committee of which I am chairman, I should like to explain to the House that this amendment asked for has not in any way arisen from any laches or want of attention on the part of the committee. The hon. member has himself stated that the attention of the promoter of the Bill was called to it by a member of the committee, who, I am bound to say, suffers very little to escape his notice. I also, as chairman, felt bound to press on the member and his counsel who had charge of the Bill the desirability of adopting some amendment of this kind in order to make the matter plain, but the promoter of the Bill and his counsel both insisted that there was no necessity whatever for the amendment. Of course, as chairman of the committee I could not urge the matter further. Neither did any member of the committee think it advisable to do so, as the promoter and his counsel had such a decided opinion on the matter. Consequently, we decided to report the Bill as we have done. This matter escaped the notice of the Railway Committee of the House of Commons and of the counsel employed to assist in procuring the legislation. I am very glad indeed that the amendment has been made, because it is eminently necessary, and I have no doubt that it will receive the immediate assent of the House of Commons.

HON. MR. McKINDSEY—The suggestion was made before the committee, but the effect of it scarcely appeared at the time. At all events, there was sufficient in the suggestion that was made to throw a doubt on the Bill. After considering the suggestion made by the senior member from Halifax it was thought better to propose this amendment, in order to put the matter right. It does not change the Bill in any way at all; I did not think it was necessary when I gave notice of this motion, but it is simply for the purpose of removing any doubt that might exist with respect to the matter, so that there may be no difficulty or trouble in raising the money for the work, it being an international matter.

HON. MR. POWER—I do not think that the motion which is made by the hon. promoter of the Bill will have the effect that he desires. The amendment to clause 3 of this Bill will make it read as follows:—

"The bridge shall be commenced within three years and completed within five years from the passing of this Act, otherwise the powers hereby granted shall cease and become null and void."

This Bill contains very few powers. Under the original charter the work should have been begun within three years, two of which have already expired. At the expiration of one year from this time the powers conferred by the original charter will expire, and the only powers that will be continued to the company will be those set forth in this Bill, which are almost none. The Bill provides that the bridge, instead of being built on a low level, shall be built on a high level, but all the powers with respect to the beginning of the work, borrowing powers and all the legislative machinery necessary, will cease to operate if the work is not begun within one year from the passing of this Act and completed within three years. I do not think that that is the intention of the promoter of the Bill. At the same time it is only fair to say that the hon. gentleman who was in charge of the Bill was perfectly willing to accept the amendment suggested in the committee, but his wish was over-ridden by a majority of the committee. I also desire to call attention to the fact that in the second clause of this Bill there is what I look upon as being an ambiguity, which may lead to difficulty hereafter, so that, in my humble opinion, the better way would be to have the Bill referred back to the committee, to be amended generally. The first sub-clause of the second clause of the Bill begins as follows: "The bridge shall be a high-level bridge, and have not more than two piers located in the river, which piers shall not exceed each 40 feet at the surface of the water." Now, the Bill does not state 40 feet in what way. The intention is, I believe, that the pier shall not be more than 40 feet wide. When the company begin to construct the bridge they may, if they cover more than 40 superficial feet, be met with an injunction or some opposition which will interfere seriously with their enterprise. I think it would be wise to refer the Bill back to the committee and have it put into proper shape. It would be unwise to put the Bill through in its present imperfect shape to save a day now. The duty of this House is to correct hasty legislation from the other Chamber, and I think the wiser course would be to refer the Bill back to the committee.

HON. MR. MCKINDSEY — I do not think that my hon. friend is correct in saying that the majority of the committee were opposed to this amendment. I think otherwise; the majority said it was necessary, but the solicitor did not see the importance of it, and consequently the amendment was not made. What took place in the committee is probably not a proper subject of discussion in the Senate just now. The hon. gentleman spoke of the extension of time covered by this clause; that being embodied in this Bill as an original clause will extend the time as desired. Therefore, I can scarcely see how there is anything wrong in that clause. With respect to the 40 feet that the hon. gentleman referred to, I do not see how it is possible that the clause can be misunderstood, because the next sentence after the one he quoted describes that there shall be a clear water way between such piers of not less than 1,000 feet and one opening of not less than 750 feet on each side of the main opening, and they shall be so placed as to best accommodate the navigation of the river. Therefore, the essential element in this Bill is to protect the navigation of the river. I discussed this matter with the promoter of the Bill, and he appeared to be willing to accept the amendment that I now propose, and I do not feel at liberty to adopt any other suggestion.

HON. MR. VIDAL — The suggestion made by the hon. member from Halifax is a very important one in the interest of the Bill itself.

HON. MR. MCKINDSEY — What is the proposition?

HON. MR. POWER — That instead of making the amendment proposed, the Bill should be referred back to the committee, so as to have it put into proper shape. The committee will meet to-morrow, so that there need not be more than a day's delay.

HON. MR. MCKINDSEY — I want to know what the objection is.

HON. MR. POWER—I have no objection to the Bill; what I desire is, that the hon. gentleman should get it in the best form.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was then read the third time, and passed.

PONTIAC PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

HON. MR. VIDAL moved the third reading of Bill (87) "An Act respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company." He said: It is not necessary generally that any explanation should be made at the third reading of a Bill of this kind; but in view of the circumstance that a notice has been given that certain amendments are to be proposed, I think it is desirable that I should express my opinion upon them as they are before the House. In the first place, I entirely and most heartily concur with every provision expressed in these proposed amendments. What they contemplate doing is a thing that ought to be done. It is asking nothing that should not be granted. My objection is, that already on the Statute-book we have those things clearly and distinctly stated. In the charter of the company we have almost literally the same provision respecting this bridge, the only difference being that in the proposed amendments it is somewhat more expanded in words. I do not know that words could more fully and completely secure to the other roads desiring to use this bridge the privileges which they seek, and which are sought to be conferred on them by the passage of this amendment. My hon. friend from Ottawa must have overlooked this provision in the existing charter of the company, comprising as it does everything which is embodied in his proposed clause (A). In case of disagreement about right of way, etc., referred to in clause B, there most ample provision in the Railway Act itself. There is no necessity whatever in enacting them again in a private Bill of this kind. By the general Railway Act the Railway Committee of the Privy Council has power to inquire into, hear and determine any application, complaint or dispute respecting a variety of things which I shall not trouble the House by reading, but I do not know that any words could more fully convey to our minds the idea of absolute power to settle any difficulty which may possibly arise in connection with the Bill that is now before us. I think, therefore, it is very clearly and distinctly unnecessary that the Bill should be amended by the addition of these clauses, and if my hon. friend does not see his way clear to withdraw them I shall have to appeal to the House to sustain my view of the question. In the meantime, I move the third reading of the Bill.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Is that the same amendment that was proposed before the committee? There was a proposition from the city of Ottawa asking that some clause be included, and I think it was a similar proposition to the one that we now have before us.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—There seems to have been a great deal of misconception with reference to this Bill, and as it affects another Bill which has passed this House to incorporate the Interprovincial Bridge Company, I will ask the indulgence of hon. gentlemen to review the question from its beginning, in order to show that as far as the Interprovincial Bridge Company are concerned, they have acted in perfectly good faith, and that they intend to carry out what must be admitted to be a project which will be of great service to the whole community and to the various roads desiring to use that bridge. I will commence be adverting to the fact that in 1880 an Act of incorporation was obtained by the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway Company for the construction of a road from the village of Aylmer, with power to bridge the Ottawa above, and no power to construct a bridge at or near Ottawa. The works were to be begun within two years and concluded within six years. The Act of 1882 gives power to bridge the Ottawa River at or near Ottawa from some convenient point on its line of railway between the eastern limit of Hull and the village of Aylmer, to connect with any line of railway running in or near Ottawa; also, power to build approaches, but no power to build any portion of the railway on the Ottawa side. It had also power to lease or sell the brldge to any of the three Governments or to the city of Ottawa, or to the city of Hull; also, power to unite with any company or companies in building the bridge and in working it, and to agree with any company as to its construction, management and use. The time for beginning the railway was extended to the 1st of September, 1883, and for completion until 1st September, 1888. There was no time limited for beginning or completing the bridge. The amendment of 1889 extends the time for the completion of the railway to Pembroke to the 1st of January, 1891, and in default all powers granted by former Acts are to cease as to the part of the railway then incomplete. The railway was not begun till after 1882. Aylmer was made the point of commencement. No portion of the road was built between Aylmer and Hull, and the company, had no authority to build a railway line from the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Ottawa, river on the Hull side, or from the bridge into the city of Ottawa, on the Ottawa side. The bridge charter was in existence for eight years, but nothing was done under it but prepare and deposit the plans. The Interprovincial Bridge Company gave notice of an application for a charter to bridge the Ottawa between Metcalfe square and ferry landing, St. Patrick street, and to build a railway up the canal. The following is their notice:—

"NOTICE is hereby given that application will be made at the next Session of the Parliament of Canada for an Act to incorporate a company for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating a bridge across the Ottawa river, from some point in the city of Ottawa, between Metcalfe square and the feny landing at the foot of St. Patrick street, to some point in the city of Hull, for railway, carriage, foot and passenger traffic purposes; with power to amalgamate with or enter into arrangements with a railway company or companies, or any corporation for the use of the bridge."

"A. FERGUSON,
"Solicitor for the Applicants.

"Dated 27th November, 1889."

On the 20th of December the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company deposited plans at the Railway Department of a bridge across the Ottawa, and a railway up the canal, to which they received the following reply:—

"OTTAWA, 10th April, 1880.

"SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 10th instant, I am instructed to say that the plans of the bridge over the Ottawa river to be built by the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway were received in the Department on the 20th of December last.

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"A. P. BRADLEY,
"Secretary.

"A. FERGUSON, Esq.,
"Barrister, &c. Ottawa."

On this, the Chief Engineer of Railways reports that the company has no authority to build any railway on the Ottawa side from the bridge. On the 14th of December, 1889, the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Co. gave notice that they would apply for na Act to extend the time for bridging and completing their railway for general traffic purposes, as follows:—

"The Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company hereby give notice that application will be made at the next Session of Parliament of Canada for—

"1. To extend the time for bridging the Ottawa river and for completing the said railway to Pembroke.

"2. To amend the Acts of the said company in relation to an issue of bonds by the said company, and to further declare and define the powers of the company as respects the same; and to divide the right of issue over different sections of the railway; and to reduce the amount of any issue over any section of the railway; and further to obtain authority to make a special issue of bonds on the bridge and its approaches over the Ottawa river, near the city of Ottawa; and further to enable the company to so construct its bridge over the Ottawa river between Hull and Ottawa as to make it available for ordinary traffic also, and for other purposes.

"H. LASSEY MALTBY,
"Secretary."

It will be seen that no notice was given for power to build a railway up the canal. The Interprovincial Bridge Company's application was regular and went through the proper forms. The Pontiac Pacific Railway Company asked for certain amendments in the Interprovincial Company's Bill, and these were agreed to and put in, and the railway company asked that five or six names be put on the board of provisional directors. When the original Bill was introduced the incorporators were Mr. Booth, Mr. Magee, Mr. Chabot and myself—that is, the original application that was made for the purpose of obtaining a charter for the Interprovincial Bridge Co. At that time a conference of the different parties interested was held, and it was considered to the advantage of all parties that the various railway companies should be interested in the scheme and become incorporators with the Interprovincial Bridge Co. That was done, and at that time there were five names representing the Canada Atlantic Railway Co., seven names representing the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company; three representing the Vaudreuil and Ottawa Railway Co., two representing the Morrisburg and New York; seven from the city of Ottawa, and three from the city of Hull. This gave the railways companies a total representation, on that board, of seventeen, as against ten of other parties interested. At that time the originators and promoters of the bridge company imagined that all the difficulties were arranged; there was a perfect understanding that the bridge should be built as an independent work, and it should be used in common by all railways, present and future, and this arrangement should be conculsive. But by some influence or other another shuffle of the cards took place, and after this Bill was before the Private Bills Committee of the House of Commons that committee reported:

"The committee have also examined the notices given on the petition of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company for certain amendments to the Acts affecting the company, and find them sufficient for all the objects mentioned in the petition, except for the purpose of extending their line of railway to the Canal Basin, in the city of Ottawa, which was not mentioned in the notice."

In our own committee the petition of the railway company was considered, and was reported on to the Senate as follows:—

"Your committee also examined the petition of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company, praying for an Act amending the Acts affecting the said company; and find that the petitioners pray for leave to extend their railway into the city of Ottawa as far as the Canal Basin, of which no notice was given, but as it appears from their Bill now before Parliament that such powers are not asked for, your committee recommend that the notice be deemed sufficient.

"All which is respectfully submitted.

"GEORGE W. HOWLAN,
"Chairman."

Therefore, it was considered that they had abandoned that portion of their Bill in accordance with the understanding come to by these two committees. We find, however, notwithstanding the understanding that was arrived at between the parties interested in the Pontiac and Pacific, and notwithstanding the solemn agreement entered into with the Interprovincial Bridge Company, they did incorporate into their charter, as clause 2, the following provision:—

"2. The company may extend its line of railway from the said bridge to the canal basin, in the city of Ottawa, by such route as is approved by the Governor in Council."

They have given no notice of that, as will be seen from the copy of the notice which they published. If the bridge company had imagined for a moment that the Pontiac Pacific Junction Company intended to prosecute their scheme, having the right for one year, until January next, they would certainly have abandoned the idea of obtaining a charter. But it was so fully understood between the parties representing the different interests that the interprovincial bridge should take the place of all others, and the bridge company having shown their earnest desire to meet the views of all parties, I think it would be in the interests of the community if their scheme prevailed. I want to put on record these various statements, in order that hereafter the blame may be attached to the proper parties for. I have doubt that these two charters will have no the effect of killing both schemes. I do not believe that any capitalists will be found willing or competent to go into either of these projects when they find there are rival charters. It was for the purpose of preventing that, and to have the assistance of all parties, that the Interprovincial Bridge Company was inaugurated to build an independent bridge. It is much easier for an independent bridge company to get assistance from the two Governments and the city than it would be if the scheme was in the hands of any one railway company. I may say that there was no intention upon the part of the promoters of the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway Company, until very recently—until they found that the Vaudreuil and Ottawa Railway and the Canada Atlantic Railway had obtained an advantage in getting to the Canal Basin—to secure an outlet to this side of the river, and they then set up their claim for a bridge over the Ottawa. If it had not been for that we would never have heard of them trying to build a bridge across the Ottawa, for they have enough to do to build their extension. I believe that the city of Ottawa is prepared to give every reasonable facility for railways to get into the city, but they desire that this bridge scheme shall be an independent route, not monopolized by any one company, and that the city shall be interested in it. I hold in my hand the certified copy of the Minutes passed by the Council of the city of Ottawa, in which they strongly advocate the incorporation of the Interprovincial Bridge Company, upon the ground that it is desirable that all these privileges should be within the control of the municipality. It was intended also to extend the operations of this company very materially. It was intended that they should not only have this bridge, but the approaches to it, and a Union station, and that they should acquire sufficient ground now, while it can be obtained at a reasonable price, to meet all future requirements for railway accommodation, and prevent the troubles that have been experienced in other parts of the Dominion. I am sorry to say that the action taken by the Pontiac Pacific Junction Company will have a disastrous effect on the whole scheme, and will render it impossible to have a Union station. I merely wish to put this on record, because I know that before the time expires within which this bridge is to be built there will be an application for a renewal of the charter, for it will be impossible to build within the time, on the assumption that two charters are in existence. The Pontiac Pacific Junction Company ask for only two years, though they have not yet reached the city of Hull, and by the time they reach Hull and build all these approaches it will take them much longer than two years. If they had carried out the agreement which was entered into in good faith it is natural to suppose that with all the companies interested it would have been possible to get assistance from the three Governments and the city to enable them to build the bridge immediately. If the Pontiac Pacific Junction Company can build a bridge themselves and can give us the facilities offered by the Interprovincial Bridge Company I will be satisfied. We want a bridge that will be sufficient for public business, and which will be open to all railway companies. I have laid the facts before the House, and I do not believe that they can be controverted. It does seem to me, however, to be a violation of an agreement that should not be allowed. The amendments I propose will do not harm if inserted in the Bill, and they may do a great deal of good. They are copied from the Interprovincial Bridge Company's charter, and if it was right to insert them there it certainly cannot be wrong to insert them in the Bill now before us. I therefore move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by adding the following as clauses A and B :—

"Clause A."

"So soon as the said bridge over the Ottawa river, at or near the city of Ottawa, is completed and ready for traffic, all trains of all railways connecting with the same, now constructed or hereafter to be constructed, and also the trains and cars of all companies whose lines connect with the line of any company so connecting with the said bridge and approaches, shall have and be entitled to the same and equal rights and privileges in the passage of the said bridge, and in the use of the lines of railway of the company connecting therewith, so that no discrimination or preference in the passage of the said bridge and in the use of the lines of railway of the company connecting therewith, or in tariff rates for transportation, shall be made in favor of or against any railway whose trains or business pass over the said bridge."

"Clause B."

"In case of any disagreement as to the rights of any railway whose trains or business pass over the bridge, and the lines of railway of the company connecting therewith, or as to the tariff rates to be charged in respect thereof, the same shall be determined by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council as provided in section eleven of 'The Railway Act.'"

HON. MR. DICKEY—I do not think there can be any difficulty about this matter when I come to explain exactly how it stands. I do not enter into a discussion of the merits of the Bill at all, but with regard to this particular clause in amendment. My hon. friend who has charge of the Bill has very properly and fairly said that he does not object to these amendments; on the contrary, he thinks them perfectly right, but he says they exist already in the charter of this company. Now that is the point. This gives power to all railways connecting to have the same rights and privileges in the use of the said bridge. That power is given by the Act which has been read, and no other power as regards that part of the matter, and the reason of it is perfectly obvious: there is no power to enable other lines of railway to run their cars over the railway which this company is authorized to construct, connecting with the bridge, for the obvious reason that at that time the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway had no power to build a railway on this side of the river at all to connect with other railways. They had only power to construct a bridge, but no power to construct a short railway, as they now have, around Nepean Point to connect with lines on this side. Therefore, they had not this additional power which I now read, "the same and equal rights and privileges in the passage of the said bridge and in the use of the lines of railway of the company connecting therewith." That is the material point, so that "no discrimination or preference in the passage of the said bridge and in the use of the lines of railway of the company connecting therewith, or in tariff rates for transportation, shall be made in favor of or against any railway whose trains or business pass over the said bridge." Gentlemen will see that if it is necessary to have any legislation with regard to the railway in connection with it, these amendments will be absolutely necessary, for the simple reason that they are not in the original charter clause at all: and as they are not in the clause it is right that they should be in the amendment, and it is necessary, for this reason. that the regulation of the powers for going over the bridge is perfectly futile and useless, unless you extend those powers to the railway which connects that bridge with the existing lines of railway. The House will see therefore that this is absolutely necessary. It would be in vain that you should leave them with a power which they, undoubtedly, possess under the charter, of having the same rights over the bridge when they have not the right of way over the railway to get to the bridge itself and to the lines on the other side of the river. That being plain, I think the House will have no difficulty in accepting these two amendments, because they are in line with our legislation, and they are in accord with the provisions of the charter of this company. After this explanation I hope my hon. friends will be content to accept the amendment and let the Bill go.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I am not disposed to let the Bill go so easily especially as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clemow) in his remarks did not touch one single point of the question before the House. He gave his own ex parte statement of a great variety of things which were presented before the committee. The committee heard all these statements.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—The House did not.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I said the committee heard all these statements—heard every thing that could be advanced in proof of them—heard and read all these documents, and the decision of that committee, by a very large majority, was that the Bill should be reported to the House without any amendment. The hon. gentleman has told us his motive for repeating his statements. He wishes to have them recorded in the official report. That is the object. It is not to convince the House. If he had acted consistently with his speech his motion would not be to make this amendment, but that the Bill should be read the third time this day six months. I do not think his statements, which were answered in the committee, should go upon the Debates without some remarks being made to show that they are not quite so straightforward and so correct as the House would be led to suppose. The hon. gentleman wished to create the impression that this charter had been in existence for eight years and nothing had been done under it. I wish to inform the House that some seventy miles of road has been built by that company.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—I was speaking of the bridge.

HON. MR. VIDAL—It is not a bridge company; it is the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company that need the bridge as part of their line. They have built some seventy miles of road, and it has been in operation for years; and they have also constructed, ready for the laying of the rails, some twenty miles of another road up the Gatineau. The company has shown its bona fides in this way—that its road is a road which is in existence and in operation, and is entitled to get an extension of time, which has never been refused to any bona fide company by Parliament. The hon. gentleman says they did not have any right to make a bridge at first. That is so, but two years after they got their charter they found that a road without power to extend their line into Ontario was useless. The road could never be a success without access to the Ontario side of the river, and the building of the bridge is part of the scheme necessary to their existence. If the hon. gentleman will look into their charter as it exists, he will find that it speaks of the construction of approaches to the bridge. What does an approach on the Ottawa side mean but a short line in Ontario, and no objection for want of specific notice was made in the House of Commons. This objection was not sustained when it was before our committee, because it was considered that the very fact of having the right to make the bridge was sufficient notice that the railway had to be made on this side to get to it. And then, again, why is a notice required to be given for the construction of a line of railway? Is it not in order that the proprietors of the land through which the line is to pass, and of the adjacent lands, shall have notice of it to enable them to guard their rights? Now, it so happens that the whole of this land through which the line is to pass is owned by the Government; and the Government have had notice of it, because they have had plans of the bridge since December last in their possession and raised no objection. I think, therefore, that the objection as to want of notice has no force. A great deal has been said about the understanding between the respective companies. My hon. friend has been misinformed or misled on that point. There was no such thing as an understanding come to on the part of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company. There was no one authorized to make such an arrangement for it at any meeting of the directors. They regarded their interests as protected by the fact of a number of their directors being put on the Board of the Interprovincial Bridge Company. For what purpose? In order that there should be, as I hope there will be, an amalgamation of the two companies, which will secure the building of that bridge. I do not at all share the idea of my hon. friend that this Bill will have the effect of stopping the building of the bridge. The bridge must be built, even if the company had to do it without assistance. When the alamgamation takes place, as I believe it will, I am under the impression that the city of Ottawa, the Quebec authorities, the Ontario Government, and the Dominion authorities, will all contribute to the construction of that important work. In this way the passage of the Bill will secure the result without the necessity of making the alterations. The hon. member from Amherst attaches importance to the fact that nothing is said about running powers, but surely any agreement to permit trains to pass over the bridge must include in it the power to use the roads leading to the bridge. I think there is a clause in the Railway Act which authorizes companies to make such traffic arrangements; there is no difficulty at all on that score. I do not think it wise that I should enter fully into the statements made by the hon. member for Rideau division, because I think it was scarcely fair to the House that they should be presented as they were. I have shown the bona fides of this company and that the proposed amendments are totally unnecessary—that the public interests and those of other railways are protected by the provisions of the Railway Act and by the existing charter of the company. I trust, therefore, that the amendments will be rejected and that the House will consent to the third reading of the Bill as it stands.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—When this Bill came before the Standing Orders Committee there was no proper notice given that such an Act should pass. The matter was before the committee, and we reported that, not having such a clause as this, the Bill should pass. Therefore, if the power which is now sought had been in the Bill when it was before the committee we would not have accepted it because there was no notice. It is, in my judgment, smuggled into the Bill. That is the way the matter occurs to me. I have not the remotest doubt in my mind that if this clause had been in the Bill when it came before us it would not have passed through our committee.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—The hon. member from Rideau division laid great stress, both in the committee and here, upon the fact that the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company had done nothing—had not made an attempt to build the road between Aylmer and Ottawa.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—I said with respect to building the bridge, not the railway.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—The bridge and the railway.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—My reference was entirely to the bridge.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—I have a distinct recollection of hearing him say both the bridge and the railway, in the committee.

HON. MR. CLEMOW—The hon. member is mistaken.

HON. MR. OGILVIE—There is an understanding that as soon as the proper papers are passed the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company will acquire the branch between Aylmer and Ottawa. So far as the amendments are concerned, everything that could be accomplished by them is in the Bill and the general Railway Act. That being the case, I think it would be a pity to adopt amendments which will be perfectly useless. I hope the House will pass the Bill, as the committee did, almost unanimously, and without amendment.

HON. MR. VIDAL—I would call attention to the fact that the proposed clause "A" will entitle any and every company to go over, not only the bridge and its approaches, but the whole line of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. Surely that is not a privilege which should be conferred.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was adopted by the following vote:—

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the adoption of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole to Bill (X) "An Act to amend Cap. 127 of the Revised Statutes, intituled: 'An Act respecting Interest.'"

HON. MR. DEVER—I wish to make a few remarks in explanation of what happened on the second reading of this Bill. I expressed the opinion at that time that in New Brunswick money was as free as other commodities in the market, to bring whatever interest might be settled upon in writing, and that where there was no understanding as to interest the legal rate should be 6 per cent. On that point I was flatly contradicted. I was told that the rate of interest in New Brunswick was fixed by Act of Parliament at 6 per cent. I had not at that time the knowledge of the Act that the hon. member had, he being an active legal member of the House and a practising lawyer in Nova Scotia, and though my memory was pretty clear on the matter I submitted to the contradiction. As I was the member of the Senate who introduced the measure in this House abolishing the usury laws in New Brunswick, and one of the present judges in New Brunswick had promoted that Bill in the House of Commons, I felt that I was right; but to make sure of it I procured the Act, and I find it at page 1693 of the Revised Statutes of Canada confirming my statement. There are five sections relating to New Brunswick which fix the rate, and one of those sections refers to banks and incorporated companies. It was this section which the hon. member quoted against me to show that I was wrong. That section fixes the rate for banking houses and chartered companies, but private individuals can take any rate of interest agreed upon.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—The law of New Brunswick relating to interest is the same law that applies to the whole Dominion. The usuary laws are abolished altogether.

HON. MR. POWER—I am happy to be able to agree with the hon. gentleman from St. John, that he was right and I was wrong. I do not propose to say anything more on that, but I wish to speak as to the amendment which is now before us. It proposes to repeal sections 6, 10 and 11 of the chapter respecting interest. These sections refer to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and I think the attention of hon. gentlemen from those Provinces should be directed to the effect of them. Under section 10 no higher rate of interest than 6 per cent. is to be taken by any corporation, except a bank, for a loan of money, and under section 11 all bonds, bills, promissory notes, contracts, assurances, and so on, executed in violation of the provision of section 10, reserving a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent., shall be void. I think that that is an unwise amendment, and that the same provision should be made with respect to Ontario and Quebec as has been made with respect to Nova Scotia—the instruments are not void, but the holder cannot recover more than the legal rate of interest. Under this amendment, hereafter any corporation, company, or association of persons in Ontario and Quebec can take any rate of interest that the borrower and lender may agree upon. While that may be only a slightly objectionable provision as regards individuals, when it comes to the case of corporations and companies it is very objectionable indeed. As things stand to-day, 6 per cent. is a very high rate of interest, and I do not think that any borrower should be put in the position of being obliged, under any circumstances, to pay a higher rate. The lenders of money can take care of themselves, but Parliament should protect the borrowers. Of course, if the representatives from Ontario and Quebec have fully considered the effect of this amendment I have nothing further to say, but it seems that hon. gentlemen who are not willing to have free trade in other commodities desire to have it in money.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I cannot see why the House should make a distinction between the different Provinces. There is no such difference in the value of money as to make it necessary that there should be one law for the Lower Provinces and another for Ontario and Quebec.

HON. MR. POWER—There is a limit to the rate in Nova Scotia, but if this Bill passes there will be none in Ontario and Quebec.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The reason for making this apply only to Ontario and Quebec is that the clauses which are repealed apply only to those Provinces. Section 10 ought never to have been in the Statutes at all. In point of fact, interest is free in Ontario and Quebec. There are some very limited restrictions on it which this law does not touch. This section 10 being there is an entire mistake, and, as it happens, it has no effect at all. My hon. friend from Nova Scotia takes the ground that money ought to be restricted, but this Parliament has adopted the doctrine that it ought not to be restricted, and I do not think that it would be wise to leave on the Statute-book a section which is entirely inconsistent with the law and which is practically a dead letter.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was then read a third time, and passed.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (6) "An Act relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes."

(In the Committee.)

Clause 79 was allowed to stand.

On clause 83,—

HON. MR. SCOTT—This is a peculiar clause. A man makes a note to a devisee, for instance, who puts it in his box and dies without presenting it. How is it under that clause? Is the estate bound?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—It is not an obligation at all until it is delivered to somebody; but he may devise it by will if he choose. I think it is necessary under the present system to deliver to make it obligatory.

HON. MR. DICKEY—A question may arise hereafter as to whether it is not necessary to prove delivery in order to make the note good, and that might be a very embarrassing proceeding.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—No doubt, my hon. friend having drawn and maintained a thousand actions on promissory notes, always alleges delivery, and possession of the note has always been held as being prima facie evidence of delivery.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 86,—

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This clause is inconsistent with the corresponding clause in the law relating to the acceptance of bills.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It is a total innovation of the law of Ontario as it now stands.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I think it is an innovation of the law of the Dominion. The first clause deals with the maker, the second clause deals with the endorser, and in order to hold the endorser you must present the note for payment.

HON. MR. SCOTT—If it has to be presented it involves proof, and if an action was brought evidence has to be given that the note has been presented.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—That only applies to a note made payable at a particular place.

HON. MR. SCOTT—As a general rule, notes are made payable at a particular place, but this clause involves proof that the holder ought not to be called upon to make in court. It involves a notarial proof, otherwise you will have at trial to call a witness to swear that the note was presented at the particular place.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Business men usually make provision at their bankers for the payment of their notes. A business man may be out of town, but leaves money at a particular bank where he promised to pay the note. Surely it is no obligation on the holder of a note to make him present it at the place where the maker promised to pay it.

HON. MR. POWER—It seems to me that the argument of the leader of the House is a perfectly satisfactory one. It is limited to the case of where the place of payment is named in the body of the note.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 88,—

HON. MR. DRUMMOND—This brings up the question of Quebec again.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There are two points in this clause which I think require our consideration. My attention was called in the early part of the discussion of this Bill to the obligation which is imposed on the person who gives a Bill for a patent right to stamp something upon it or write something across it, and the question was raised whether that would apply to a note, and I am under the impression that it would not. The rule would, but the penalty or provision for punishing the maker of the bill would not apply to the maker of a note, and I propose to alter the original clause by adding the words "promissory note" to that.

HON. MR. SCOTT—I had another amendment which I think ought to be added at the end of that clause, where the party offending commits a misdemeanor and is liable to a penalty. I intended to add this amendment: "And such a person so offending shall have no claim against the acceptor or maker." It is not right that a man who commits an offence against the law of the country as a misdemeanor should be able to take advantage of it.

HON. MR ABBOTT—I think what my hon. friend says is reasonable. I will look into it. Then I do not understand why it is under this clause that a foreign note being dishonored should not be protested, more especially in respect of the endorsers. I do not see how we are to get at the endorsers if we do not protest the note, and I would move to strike out the words "except in the Province of Quebec," and add these words: "except for the preservation of the liability of endorsers."

HON. MR. POWER—Why should you make it more difficult to recover if the endorsers have notice?

HON. MR. SCOTT—Because it is proof. It carries with it its own proof.

HON. MR. POWER—If the creditor or holder of the note does not think it necessary to get that proof, why should you say it shall be necessary? It is not the English law. If the holder runs the risk of not being able to prove his claim, why should we go further?

The amendment was agreed to.

HON. MR. McCLELAN, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress, and asked leave to sit again, on Thursday next.

The report was received.

The Senate adjourned at 6 p. m.

THE SENATE.

CENTRAL ONTARIO RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported (Bill 86) "An Act respecting the Central Ontario Railway Company," with an amendment. He said: This Bill is an amending Act, providing for a readjustment of the bonding powers, which were respectively $20,000 and $30,000 a mile, under certain circumstances. The last clause provides that the new bonds shall be a security on the whole railway property. The amendment is to this effect: that until these bonds are exchanged for the old bonds, the latter shall continue to remain a first charge upon the property secured by the mortgage. This amendment has received the consent of the promoter of this Bill, and as it is in the interests of the bondholders and for the preservation of vested rights, I see no objection whatever to the amendment.

HON. MR. READ moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time, and passed.

SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY AND MINING CO.'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbors, reported (Bill 34) "An Act to incorporate the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company," with an amendment. He said: This Bill professes to enlarge the scope of the powers of the railway by extending it from a place called Saskatoon, on the South Saskatchewan River, to the North Saskatchewan River, and ultimately to a connection with the proposed line to the Hudson Bay. In that direction, the first place it strikes, under this present Bill, is a place called Fort à la Corne. The amendment which is made, I may say, is of no possible interest to the public, but may be of great importance to the company. In the Bill it is stated that the line was run from Saskatoon to Fort à la Corne, and the amendment is that it shall go to a point at or near Fort à la Corne.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I understand the hon. gentleman to say that it crosses the South Saskatchewan, and goes to the North Saskatchewan. I think the intention is to keep on the south side of the South Saskatchewan to Fort à la Corne.

HON. MR. DICKEY—The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I said the line was to extend from a place called Saskatoon, on the South Saskatchewan, to Fort à la Corne.

HON. MR. MACINNES—There is another railway from Saskatoon, between the two rivers, on the north side of the South Saskatchewan and on the south side of the North Saskatchewan, proceeding direct to Prince Albert. According to the description which is given, this road will cross the South Saskatchewan and proceed between the two rivers to Prince Albert, and from there to Fort à la Corne. As I understood it in the committee, the intention was to keep on the south side of the South Saskatchewan, and to extend the road to Fort à la Corne without crossing the river.

HON. MR. DICKEY—That is what the Bill says.

HON. MR. READ moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill, as amended, was read the third time, and passed.

IMPORTATION OF AMERICAN CATTLE FOR SLAUGHTER.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté) rose to—

Enquire whether it is the intention of the Government to allow United States cattle to be brought into Canada to be slaughtered for exportation, without being subjected to the quarantine regulations that now exist?

He said: I may be excused for referring a second time this Session to this important subject. I think I will be excused when we come to consider the great interests involved at the present time in this section. In England their aim is not to check their food supply in any way by legislation, and at the same time to prevent disease by every possible means in their power, and when we know, as we now do by very recent information, that the Minister of Agriculture there has introduced a Bill in the British House of Commons providing that hereafter the expenses connected with stamping out cattle disease in England shall be borne by the Imperial exchequer instead of, as heretofore, by the counties in which it happens to exist, the importance of the step will be readily comprehended. Within the last three weeks, the first deputation (as will be seen by the March number of the British Magazine) waited upon the Government, claiming that where disease breaks out amongst cattle and the expense of meeting it has been borne by the county, it is not fair on behalf of the county if it breaks out in a contiguous county that they should be called upon to pay all the expenses, whereas every county in the vicinity is equally interested. The demand of the deputation was so reasonable that it received the assent of the Minister, and now the Bill is before the English Parliament, providing, amongst other things, that the expense of stamping out disease amongst cattle under such circumstances is to be borne by the national exchequer. When we consider the enormous losses that have been sustained in England through disease being imported from foreign countries, you can readily understand why the agriculturists of England should be very anxious that every effort shall be made to prevent cattle disease from being brought to that country. On a previous occasion, when the rinderpest existed in England, the Government of Canada gave authority to certain gentlemen in this country to land sheep at a Canadian port without being quarantined, on the assumption that sheep would not convey the rinderpest. I took the matter up then in the interest of the country, and from evidence that I adduced I so satisfied the Government of the danger that the Order in Council was rescinded; they were shorn of their wool, and the wool was destroyed, because the authority that I then produced were so unquestionable on that point that there could not be any doubt that sheep, while they themselves were not subject to rinderpest, would convey it to other animals. It is proved in this manner: A number of cattle belonging to the Prince of Wales, that were very carefully attended and could not come in contact with other cattle, took the rinderpest. The investigation that was made discovered the fact that in the next field, with only a wire fence betwen them, sheep had been brought from Smithfield and pastured. The veterinaries concluded that the sheep had conveyed the disease to the cattle, because the cattle had not been near any highway and were isolated from all others. We all recollect the great losses that English agriculturists sustained from this disease. A friend of mine I know had his whole herd swept away with it, though he had taken great pains with them. They all died from this disease. The rinderpest was first brought to England by a shipment of 300 cattle from a port on the Black Sea, and it was only stamped out after the utmost vigilance. Now, we are brought face to face with another disease—pleuro-pneumonia. This disease exists in other countries as well as in England, and it is our duty to see that we do not bring it from England or any other country into Canada—that we most carefully quarantine any cattle brought into this country from all other countries for our own safety. According to the last census in this country there were of—

Working oxen	132,593
Cows	1,595,800
Other horned cattle	1,786,596
Total	3,514,989

The vast importance of this question can be readily seen. According to the law of natural increase, at the present time we may conclude that we have at least five million head of cattle in this country, and we know that they are absolutely free from infectious diseases. It is of the utmost importance to us that we should continue the same vigilance that we have heretofore exercised. When it was proposed to bring in cattle through our ports by those who are interested in the shipping of them to Europe, I believe the Government refused to allow it. Recently it has been proposed that the Government should allow cattle to be brought in from the United States to be slaughtered in Canada and the products shipped to foreign countries. That I object to, because disease may be brought in by that means, and I think that I can prove, before I sit down, that it is likely to be detrimental to the interests of the agriculturists of the country. When we see the enormous strides we have made in the exports of animals and their products, it will be readily seen how important it is that we should protect that industry. I have before me the British Statistical Report, giving a schedule of the importation of live cattle into England. For a considerable time every country was allowed to send cattle into England under certain conditions, but now cattle disease exists to such an extent that from Germany, France, Belgium and Holland the importation of cattle into England is entirely prohibited. Holland has no disease, but they are told they are contiguous to Germany, where disease exists, and consequently their cattle are prohibited from being imported into England. From Schleswig-Holstein, Portugal, the Netherlands and the United States cattle are allowed to be brought in and slaughtered at the port of entry within ten days after landing. From Sweden, Norway, Denmark, the Channel Islands and Canada, cattle can be landed and sent to local markets for sale and slaughter. That advantage to us to-day is fully 20 per cent. on the value of the animal when the producer has to sell it. When we come to consider that 20 per cent. is a fair profit we can easily see that if we are not alive to our own interests, that if we do not do every thing in our power to keep disease from amongst us, we will very soon find that Canada, like the United States, will be scheduled in British ports, and especially when the evidence goes to show that although they schedule the United States the exports from that country to England increased between 1888 and 1889 over 120 per cent. The export in 1888 was 143,495 head, and in 1889 it had increased to 294,423 head. That would show the danger which we would have to face if we were obliged to compete with countries that are scheduled. I have here a schedule giving the imports of cattle into England from different countries in 1875 and 1888. It is as follows:—

Countries.	1875.	1888.	+ Increase. — Decrease.
Belgium	7,168	.....	— 7,168
Channel Islands	2,193	2,252	+ 69
Denmark	47,025	66,922	+ 19,897
France	9,025	.....	— 9,025
Germany	24,698	.....	— 24,698
Schleswig-Holstein	42,911	14,543	— 28,368
Netherlands	81,271	50,277	— 31,044
Norway	227	342	+ 115
Portugal	21,073	9,797	— 11,276
Spain	24,018	11,485	— 12,533
Sweden	4,542	16,144	+ 11,602
Canada	1,212	61,155	+ 59,943
United States	229	142,184	+141,885

The increase in the exports from Canada shows that we have great advantages in the English market, because we have a clean bill of health. So far as my information goes, we have no cattle disease in this country. The same remark applies to sheep. While sheep exported from the United States have to be slaughtered when they are landed in England, ours may be sent to any place in the United Kingdom alive, and this advantage gives us a profit of $2 or $3 a head more than if they were treated in the same way as the sheep exported from the neighboring country. The advantage that we derive from the existing regulations is between two and four pounds sterling per head on cattle. I call it three pounds per head, or fifteen dollars. There is not quite so much difference in the winter time, but the bulk of our exports is in the summer season. I am of the opinion that in the future one of our principal exports from this country will be dairy products. I am led to this conclusion by the fact that while the exports of cheese and butter from the United States last year amounted to $10,719,026, ours amounted to $10,651,790, or only $68,000 less than theirs. In twenty-four years, from being importers of cheese, we have become exporters to an extent which proves the suitability of our country and climate for the production of dairy products. We are in a good grass zone; we possess nutritious grasses, good water, and a climate adapted to the production of butter and cheese of the best quality. At the Centennial, and at various other expositions, our cheese took the highest prizes. We have succeeded in competing with the world in dairy products. England imported last year $50,000,000 worth of butter, and there is no reason why Canada should not try to capture a good share of that trade. Further, we see that Denmark, France and Sweden are putting up butter in tins for export to China: there is no reason why our farmers in the North-West, who are on the highway to China, and have exceptional natural advantages, should not compete for a portion of that trade. We have the very best advantages, and we should do all in our power to extend our trade. The Government have appointed Mr. Robertson, an excellent man for the position, to look out for markets and experiment with a view of producing articles adapted for the various markets of the world. I have no doubt that he will erect a model creamery and adopt the latest and most improved methods of producing dairy products, and thus further the great object which we have in view of developing this important industry. We know that pleuro-pneumonia is prevalent in Kentucky, Illinois, New York, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, New Jersey, Massachussets, the District of Columbia and Connecticut. To stamp it out, the United States Government first appropriated $100,000. This was increased until it reached $500,000, and last year they appropriated $1,000,000 to eradicate the disease. I have here the report of the Animal Industries, from which I will quote, to show how detrimental this disease is to the cattle industry. Speaking of Kentucky, the writer says:

"This outbreak in Kentucky, by itself indicates the great superiority of a method which secures the prompt extirpation of the contagion over any temporizing measures, the effect of which is to preserve instead of to destroy it. As soon as pleuro-pneumonia was known to exist in Kentucky the other States of the Union quarantined against Kentucky cattle, and the enormous commerce in these animals was prostrated. The local quarantine measures were looked upon by the authorities of other States as an insufficient guarantee of the safety of cattle from Kentucky, and therefore, no bovine animals were allowed admittance from there except under rigid and burdensome restrictions. These restrictions, maintained for nearly two years, are estimated to have caused a loss to the cattle breeders of the State of from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000, a loss which would have been entirely prevented if there had been authority for this Department to cause the prompt destruction of the infected herds when the plague was first discovered."

They go on to tell us here how many cattle were affected, how many were destroyed, and at what cost. They have another disease there which is called Texan fever. It does not seem to be so serious in the Texan cattle, but it is very fatal in other cattle affected by it. Other cattle take the fever from the Texan cattle, and this explains, to my mind, why we sold to the United States last year 37,000 head of cattle. We sold them because many feeders of animals were not prepared to run the risk of buying cattle that might be diseased, and they bought ours because they felt sure that they were sound. For these 37,000 head we received a little over $13 per head, which was a very low price. We sold the raw material for which we might have found a better market. I am inclined to think that we made no profit on them at all, and it would have paid us better to keep them. But a new disease has broken out in the United States among the cattle within the last two or three years. It is known as the cornstalk disease. Professor Burrill says that it cannot be stamped out in any way except by fire. He says it is caused by a microbe which is found on the corn stalk. The cattle eat it, and die in a very short time. He says:

"The disease in the growing corn may commence at any time during the warm season, frequently after the corn 'shoots;' very often it occurs only on patches in the fields. The corn fails to grow in the healthy parts. The lower leaves become yellowish green, then yellow, then wither away. Upon close examination spots will be seen—brown, watery-looking. These spots vary in size, from mere points to those of several inches across. In such diseased parts the microscopic organism, believed to cause the trouble, can be easily found. A feature of the disease readily noticed is that the roots are affected; they die and decay in the ground; the plant is easily pushed over, or pulled up from the hold it has. If the brown spots on the leaf sheaths be closely looked at, there will be seen little collections of gelatinous-like exudation. Crush a bit of this under a microscopical cover-glass, and examine with a high power, and the living organisms, to which we ascribe the disease, can be seen in innumerable numbers. Wherever such a disease has occurred, every stock and leaf on the field must be burnt, the field ploughed and put to another crop, or, better still, seeded down. Ploughing down the corn will only make matters worse. The disease is communicated to the cattle when diseased leaves, containing these microbes, are eaten. Medical treatment, in a curative sense, is the height of absurdity in any disease of this class, so some say; others recommend purgative doses of Glauber's salts to every member of a herd of which some have become ill. The herd must be carefully quarantined, and all the manure and litter destroyed by fire. It must be borne in mind that, if the manure from a cattle yard, where animals have had this disease, be put upon a field, ploughed in, and the field planted with corn, it is very liable to become invaded with the germ, and thus spread the disease. All such manure, and all animals which die, must be cremated—every particle burnt. No other remedy is known at present but fire, and that must be unsparingly used if the infection is to be checked.

"A farmer from Salina, Kansas, writes:—I have lost four head this winter of stalk disease. They die in from twenty-four to forty-eight hours after showing that they are sick. They groan pitifully, do not bloat, are not costive, but are somewhat laxative. They were salted the day they went on the stalk field and had free access to clean, fresh water. They were in the corn field three or four hours daily. On the fourth and fifth days one died each day. They were put on a fresh field. On the third and fourth mornings two more were down. We cannot afford to let the stalks waste, for heretofore we have nearly wintered the cattle on them. Others are losing cattle here.'

"Every thing possible must be done to keep this cornstalk disease out of Canada. It has spread with wonderful rapidity the past summer in the Western States. It may now be closer than we think. Better stop corn growing for a time entirely than risk the spreading of such a scourge. Nothing yet seems to be known as to its effect in ensilage, though it is not likely that the microbe would be affected by the amount of heat generated in a silo. Careful vigilance is needed—it is the price of safety—let it be exercised. Our frontier quarantine regulations for cattle will be useless against this disease, which is carried, not by the cattle but by the corn. There will be danger in seed corn from infected districts. Forewarned is forearmed."

One of the professors says that he had fifty letters on one day upon this subject. It is evident that the disease is something new. I have mentioned the reasons which I have considered sufficient to justify me in troubling the House on this subject as I have done. As I have said, there is a desire in England to place this country on the same footing as others. Agriculture in England is depressed, as it is all over the world, and when the farmers of the United Kingdom see Canadian cattle brought in to compete with theirs they look around for relief. As this report says:—

"I am extremely pleased to see that, with the necessarily strict regulations in force in Canada, no disease whatever has appeared there this season, particularly as there is an agitation being again started by some agricultural papers against the introduction of Canadian cattle into this country under the present system."

That is in Sir Charles Tupper's report of last year. The Government have asked for an appropriation of £150,000 this year, and last year a large amount of money was expended, the result of which is given in this report. If we are not alive and vigilant it will not be long before we are placed in the same position in this matter as our neighbors across the line. If we lose the advantage that we now possess we will lose the 20 per cent. of profit that we derive in this trade from not being scheduled. The cattle that we send to England are of a superior quality. They fetch $88 a head. An hon. gentleman here told me that he shipped 500 head of cattle, that had never been fed grain, from his ranche, and they averaged $90 a head. I think I have said sufficient to show the necessity that exists to take every precaution to maintain the existing advantage we enjoy.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not think my hon. friend has at all exaggerated the importance to this country of the precautions which we have hitherto taken with regard to the import of animals from the United States. The figures which he gave sufficiently demonstrate that it is already one of the most important subjects upon which we could possibly legislate, and it is increasing daily in extent and will ultimately become probably one of the largest, if not the largest, of the productions for export by the Dominion of Canada.

HON. MR. READ—It is now the largest article of export—larger than products of the forest or anything else. In the Trade and Navigation Returns for the year ending the 30th June last the amount in value of animals and their produce exported was $23,894,707.

HON. MR. REESOR—Larger than the manufactures.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—We do not profess to manufacture largely for export yet; we are seeking to develop our manufacturing industries, that we may do so hereafter. We are glad to encourage the cattle trade in order to find the means of paying for our munufactures among other things. I was under the impression that some one or two articles of export still exceeded in value the export of cattle.

HON. MR. READ—This report does not show it.

HON. MR. ABBOTT — Probably the balance has been disturbed by the increase since 1888. We derive a decided advantage in the price of our cattle in the English market from the privilege that we possess of having them landed alive. My hon. friend has shown that last year we exported to England eighty-five thousand head of cattle. These cattle are generally the choicest animals that we produce. It is said that the average of these cattle runs up to between twelve and thirteen hundred pounds, and that the advantage in price is equal to about a cent a pound or more. Hon. gentlemen may not realize exactly what that amounts to. A cent a pound on eighty-five thousand cattle, averaging thirteen hundred pounds per head, is equal to $1,003,000. This money goes into the pockets of our farmers; they would not get it if this country were placed in the same position as the United States, and all other countries except the two to which my hon. friend refers. We have an advantage over all other countries, but those two, which amounts already, at our present rate of export, to $1,000,000 per annum more than the corresponding quantity of cattle would produce from any of the four great cattle-producing countries that my hon. friend mentioned. There already of course has been a great deal of trouble and a good deal of negotiation in order to bring us to the position which we now occupy, where we possess the confidence of the English people that our cattle will be protected from disease, and that theirs will be protected from infection. And in consequence of this confidence we are allowed to export our cattle freely to England, to land them alive, and to have them freely dealt in on the same footing as British cattle. The only importation of cattle into Canada which we permit is that of cattle for breeding purposes, and such cattle are subjected to a rigid quarantine for three months, with perfect isolation, in stations, of which we have two only, one at Quebec, the other at the Detroit river. The only concession of the slightest kind that has ever been made with reference to the importing of cattle from the United States to this country has been the permission to carry cattle in our railway trains from the United States at one point to the United States at another point through our country. These cattle are carried under regulations which are agreed upon with the Privy Council. The negotiations therefor were conducted in England by Sir Hector Langevin and myself, some seven or eight years ago, and the privilege was obtained with great difficulty—in fact, not until after there had been a positive refusal of it. These privileges were so conceded on the condition that the precautions which should be taken with regard to these cattle should be communicated to the Privy Council, agreed upon with the Privy Council, and carefully and rigorously adhered to. The cattle are carried through the country in sealed cars, so that it is impossible for them to have any contact with any cattle in this country, and they never leave those cars, except at one point where they are stopped in a carefully protected quarantine, to be watered, when they are returned again to sealed cars, and in them carried to the frontier with the seals intact.

HON. MR. POWER—Where is that point?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—The point is at Lynn, in Ontario, on the route from one point on the frontier to the other. Hon. gentlemen will know, and if any are not informed of it I am glad to state, that no particle, even of the manure of these animals, is allowed to escape destruction or to get beyond the limits of this quarantine. Every particle of offal—everything that is touched or that comes in contact with those cars or these cattle within this quarantine is carefully destroyed, and the most minute attention is paid to this duty. It is well understood that the contact of any portion of an animal that is infected will communicate the infection to others, and the best proof that we have been successful in isolating these cattle in their transit across the country is, that no single instance has occurred of an animal having been so infected. There was a scare two years ago in England, in consequence of the arrival, in one of our ships, of an animal that was said to be infected—in fact, the English veterinary surgeon reported that it was infected. I understand that our Commissioner in England at once proceeded to Liverpool, when the fact was reported, and used his own anatomical knowledge to take part in the examination, and in a short time convinced the English veterinary surgeon that the animal had no disease of an infectious kind.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté)—The hon. gentleman will allow me to say a few words here: I have a good deal of knowledge of this matter, for the person whose cattle were stopped was a friend of mine, and he tells me that they slaughtered not only the animal that was said to be infected, but as many as they pleased, and that Sir Charles Tupper took off his coat there and assisted in making a thorough examination of all the animals slaughtered for inspection. The owner of them said that although it cost him fifty pounds a day for veterinaries—they had three of them, one from Edinburgh—it was money well spent, "for" said he, "I was a ruined man if they had not taken off the embargo from these cattle." He was the representative of a syndicate that year.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am glad to be confirmed by my hon. friend in my impression of what took place on that occasion. The whole of the facts and figures cited go to show the extraordinary importance to this country of protecting our cattle from the imputation of being capable of conveying infection to English herds. In answer to my hon. friend's question, therefore, I may say, that in view of the great and important interests of Canada in this large and important article of production and export, it is not the intention of the Government to relax or change in any manner or degree the precautions which they have hitherto taken with respect to cattle imported into the country, and which have been so uniformly successful.

REPRESENTATION OF CANADA AT THE JAMAICA EXHIBITION.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. POWER rose to—Inquire of the Government whether they have taken steps to secure the adequate representation of Canadian industries at the approaching exhibition at Jamaica.

He said: I regret that the subject to which my enquiry relates is not as interesting or as important as that which has just been dealt with by the hon. gentleman from Quinté division. His enquiry dealt with one of the most important industries of the country; my enquiry deals with one that may hereafter become a trade of some importance. Hon. gentlemen are, I presume, all aware that a great exhibition is to be held in the Island of Jamaica in 1891, and as is the case with all exhibitions of that kind, the people not only from Jamaica, but from all the neighboring islands, and probably from portions of South America and from the United States, will be gathered at that exhibition. I think that Canada should be represented there. Hon. gentlemen will remember that just previous to Confederation, in the year 1866, a commission was sent from British North America to the West Indies and South America, and a number of distinguished men took part in that commission. The commission made an elaborate report, but I am not aware that beyond that any result followed from the expenditure in connection with it. Again, some two or three years ago a commissioner was sent out by this Government to South America—to Guiana, I think, and to the Argentine Republic—and that commissioner did his duty apparently in a very thorough manner, and made a report which contained a great deal of valuable information; but, as far as I am aware, no pecuniary transactions with the Argentine Republic ever followed as a consequence of that commission. I presume hon. gentlemen are aware that there are rumors of other commissions to be sent to other foreign parts. Of that I cannot speak with authority. Probably there will be other commissions to the West Indies and that part of the world. My reason for calling attention to this matter is, that I think that by securing a fair representation of our manufactures and other products at this great exhibition to be held in Jamaica the people of the West Indies and of the surrounding regions will learn more of what we produce in Canada and what we have to sell, and what they may possibly be able to buy from us to advantage, than they could learn from a dozen commissions. I think this is so self-evident that it does not require any argument. If our products are put before the eyes of those people, and if the Dominion is represented by a business-like agent—I do not say a member of this House or a member of the House of Commons, or one of the prominent officials in the public departments—but, if it is represented by a good business man, a superior commercial traveller or commercial agent, this exhibition will do more to make us known and to promote trade, if there is any extended trade possible between those countries and Canada, than many commissions. That is the reason why I thought it desirable to call the attention of the Government to this matter. The cost of having Canada represented at this exhibition would not be large. The freight to Jamaica would be small, and one or two practical business-like men could be had for a comparatively reasonable figure; and I think that would be all that would be necessary. These agents could inform the people there as to the prices of the articles exhibited, and could also give information as to the mode of shipment from Canada and the cost of transit. I have intimated a doubt as to whether there would by any very large or substantial results from our being represented at that exhibition. I feel those doubts, and I regret that it is so; but one can not help the feeling. Some people think that our flour might be sold in the West Indies. Of course, the farmers cannot do anything to improve the wheat, but unless our millers adopt other methods of manufacturing—different from those which are now adopted—our flour will not suit the West Indies market. I do not know why some such improvement could not be made as would enable our flour to go to the West Indies. Looking at the fact that cotton has been shipped from Canada to China, and, as I have been informed, sold at a profit in the Chinese market in competition with English cotton, I thought that there was an article which we might send to the West Indies. Large quantities of cotton are used in the West Indies. I have been informed, however, by a gentleman more familiar with the business of the West Indies than I am, that where this has been tried it had been found that cottons were actually cheaper in the West Indies than in Canada. The duty in Jamaica is only 12 per cent., and in most of the other islands is less than that, and the prospect of selling Canadian cottons in those markets is not good. But there are a great many other products that we possibly might sell there. There is no reason why we should not sell some cheese there; and if, as the hon. gentleman from Quinté division said he hoped would be the case, our butter-makers improve their product, I do not know any reason why considerable quantities of Canadian butter might not be sold in the West Indies Although I have my individual doubt of any profitable trade with the West Indies, the Government do not entertain this doubt. They have shown in the past, by spending money on those commissions, that they think it is possible to create and encourage trade between Canada and the West Indies and the neighboring regions, and they have recently shown their confidence in a still stronger manner by giving very handsome subsidies to a line of steamers to ply between Canada and those markets, and that must be only upon the assumption that a profitable trade can be thereby built up. I think that there is some little trade growing up, and it is possible that it may increase in the future; but I do not think that anything would do more to increase that trade than our being properly represented at this exhibition; therefore, I think it is the duty of the Government to avail themselves of this opportunity to make Canadian products known to the West Indies and the surrounding regions. I hope they have already had the matter under consideration, and that they propose to take the necessary steps to have Canada represented at the approaching exhibition at Jamaica.

HON. MR. OGILVIE — Before the hon. leader replies, I would like to say a few words as to what the senior member for Halifax has said about our wheat and flour. I listened with a great deal of pleasure indeed to many of his remarks, and I think that he is quite right in most of them. As to our wheat, the farmers cannot very well improve it, because the best wheat that is grown in the world at present is grown in our North-West Territories. There is no wheat grown anywhere that has produced flour to equal in strength the flour made from the wheat of our North-West, and that was proved by tests boath in Milwaukee and in London last year. The tests that were made in London last year I am very proud indeed to be able to inform the House showed that the best patent Hungarian and strong bakers' flour was made by Canadian mills, ahead of any other flour in the world, and these are mills with which my name is connected. I have considered the difficulty of shipping flour to South America and the West Indies, and I looked very carefully into the process from end to end, as far back as twenty-six years ago. There is a very large firm in New York, Hager Bros., who manufacture flour specially for the West Indies and South American markets, the wheat for which is all kiln-dried before it is ground. That flour would not sell in this country at all. Nobody would use it. The only wheat that could be manufactured into flour without being kiln-dried to send down there would be the wheat from India. I have seen samples of that wheat, which I think could be ground and sent to Southern markets without being kiln-dried, but any of our Canadian wheat would have to be dried, and the best wheat that is grown is the wheat, the flour from which will spoil quickest in a hot climate, simply because it contains more gluten than dry wheat, so that the very best flour that we make is the flour that would spoil in the West Indies markets. The reason it is not sent out, therefore, is the same reason that we have not supplied the markets of South America and the West Indies with a very large amount of other goods. It would not pay any miller in Canada to manufacture it specially, as our Government, while they protect by their National Policy everybody else, exclude the millers. It was only the other day that they put us on an even keel. Before that, there was a bounty of 25 cents in favor of the American miller; now we have no protection at all. Wheat and flour pay about the same duty. The reason we have not manufactured flour in Canada for the South American market is that it is an expensive process, and all the flour manufactured in that way would have to be sent South to be sold, because it would not sell in this country. It is not for want of first-class wheat or lack of enterprise on the part of our millers. Speaking of cottons, a mill has been built at Montmorency within the last few months, in which I have a small interest, which is intended principally to manufacture cottons for China and Japan markets, and I think it is going to succeed remarkably well.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I may be excused for saying a word on this subject, as the county from which I come does a large trade with the West Indies, and particularly with Jamaica, and our people are deeply interested in that trade. As the hon. gentleman from Halifax has said, when we grant such generous bounties to vessels engaged in developing that trade, I think the comparatively small amount which it would cost to have us adequately represented at the Jamaica Exhibition would be well spent. In fact, it seems to be consistent with the policy of the Government in subsidizing lines of vessels that that should be done. We feel that heretofore we have not had a chance to compete with the United States in those markets. What my hon. friend from Montreal has said has been my impression for a long time—that is, that our best grades of flour would not keep in the hot climate of South America. I think if we were fairly represented at the Jamaica exhibition we might get such a trade that the demand for Canadian flour would warrant our millers in manufacturing flour specially suited for that market.

HON. MR. POWER—If I said that our wheat was not as good as any in the world, I certainly did not mean to convey that impression. I am quite aware that Manitoba wheat is the best wheat in the world.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am much gratified, and I am sure the House is gratified, to find the Senate occupying itself with subjects such as those which have been brought to our notice to-day, and that the hon. gentleman from Halifax is taking so much interest in this trade with the West Indies, which is specially important to Nova Scotia. I may say that I have great hopes of establishing a profitable trade between this country and the West Indies. There is no reason that I know of why we should not be able to supply them with manufactured goods at a more reasonable rate than those which they now buy from our neighbors to the south of us, who have to contend with a much heavier tariff and carry heavier burdens than we do; and therefore I presume, necessarily, according to the theory of all economists, more especially the free-traders, must pay much more for the production of their goods than they cost us where we live under a more beneficent system. In answer to my hon. friend's question, I may say that the Government is fully sensible of the importance of the exhibition at Jamaica, and of the opportunities which it offers for a display of the goods we can manufacture and furnish to the West Indies Islands; and this being a country differing altogether from their tropical clime, we must and do produce a large number of articles which we can exchange with advantage for those which they produce there. And with the view of taking all the advantage possible of those opportunities, we have applied for space in the buildings which are being erected for this exhibition, and have placed upon the Estimates a sum of money which the Government propose to ask Parliament to grant them for the purpose of defraying the expense of being represented there.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to inform the House on the subject to which the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Haythorne) referred yesterday. I brought the question of our printing before my colleagues, and although I have not yet been able to discover exactly where the difficulty lies, it has not been in this instance with the Printing Bureau. The report is that the nine Bills in question were sent out in proof on Saturday the 12th instant, at 11:30 a.m., addressed to Mr. McCord and Mr. Coursolles. The proofs were returned to the printing office on the 14th instant at 10:30 o'clock p.m.—that is, last night, at half past 10 o'clock. I do not know whether these are the proper officials to whom proofs of our Bills should be sent. I only received this report a few minutes ago, and I propose to ascertain to whom the proofs ought to have been sent; and if, in point of fact, these are the officials whose duty it is to correct those proofs and return them to the printers, I shall endeavor to procure the performance of that duty with more expedition in future.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—Perhaps some explanation is due from me to the House for the detention in the publication of some of the Senate debates. The facts are these: On Thursday I asked the official reporters for a proof of the debate which took place on the previous day. It was sent on my order, and I believe it first reached my namesake from British Columbia. It afterwards reached me, I think, on Friday, and, without reflection, I threw it into the waste paper basket. If the business of the House has been in any way interfered with by my inadvertence, or any hon. gentleman has been inconvenienced thereby, I have only to express my regret that I was not more careful in sending it back to the printer myself.

RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (Z) "An Act respecting Railways." He said: This is a Bill to make provision on two or three points which appear to require some legislation. They apply principally to incidental or minor powers of railways. The first has reference to a certain amount of embarrassment that has been experienced by railway companies connecting with the boundary line as to performing functions beyond the boundary, the ground taken being that they had no authority under their corporate powers—that their own constating Act did not give them any authority to deal with matters beyond the line. And it is to remedy that, and to give them power to do beyond the boundary whatever they can do in this country, in so far as the laws in force in the adjoining country permits them. In like manner, the next clause is to meet a difficulty which has been raised as to railway companies, which it is alleged are created only for the purpose of running railway carriages, selling and dealing with the lands which they acquire and hold in large quantities by subsidy and otherwise. A question has been raised as to whether they have that right, and it is to remove any doubt on that subject that the second sub-section is introduced. The second and third clauses have reference to a subject which has been made a matter of discussion extensively recently—that is, the difficulty that has been experienced from prairie fires, caused by sparks falling from locomotives, and a remedy has been suggested that there should be a fire guard created on each side of the railway by ploughing, and burning off the prairie grass which grows between the fire guard and the track itself. The next two clauses make it compulsory on the companies to do that in every case where it is found necessary. Then the fourth section makes a more perfect arrangement about the protection of cattle from injury on the track in partially fenced places than has heretofore existed. This clause, I believe, has been settled after consultation by three or four gentlemen who represent outlying districts on the Ottawa river, where there has been a considerable amount of difficulty arising out of that kind of casualty. I submit it to the House as the best enactment that we can contrive for that purpose. These are the objects of the Bill.

HON. MR. WARK—I think, perhaps, there will be a good deal of danger in setting fire to the grass between the strips that are ploughed. If a wind should spring up it might blow the fire across the strip and carry it into the adjoining fields. There ought to be a safer way of removing this grass than burning it.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—This is a plan which has been suggested by experts in the North-West Territories. It is a familiar device of old times, when people were in danger themselves of being burnt by the spreading of fire, and it is said to be effectual for this purpose. The grass does not grow long; it is quite short, as a rule, and of course a railway company burning it off would take care to do so under such circumstances as to attain the object which is desired—that is to say, to prevent the spreading of any conflagration.

HON. MR. DICKEY—That is done by ploughing, so that there is nothing to burn.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—My hon. friend will see that they do not plough up the whole space; they plough up a strip 200 feet from the track, and the strip between that and the railway is what is burnt.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I am afraid it will be rather onerous upon the railways. This strip will not remain without grass, because we all know how very rapidly grass will grow, so that in the course of two years it will be as abundant as ever, and this ploughing will have to be a constant thing on the part of the railways.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called,—Committee of the Whole House on Bill

(V) "An Act to amend the Acts respecting the North-West Territories."

HON. MR. BELLEROSE said: I do not rise to move the motion of which I have given notice, because I knew when I gave it that it was not in order. I put the notice on the Paper for two reasons—first, to let the House know that I would move it, as generally these Bills are pushed through in a day or two; and second, because I wished to ask the House, as this is an exceptional case, to let me move it. I am not at this moment ready to do so, but I rise to speak to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I was about to say that I am not prepared to take up this Bill to-day.

THE SPEAKER—I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bellerose) to the fact that his motion is out of order. His motion is, that when the Order is called for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on this Bill he will move that it be an instruction to the committee to amend the Bill by striking out a certain paragraph. Of course that would necessitate his making his motion when the Order is called, but I would submit that it is simply an amendment. It is very clearly laid down that an instruction is only given to a committee to confer on it a power which it would not have without such instruction, and if the subject-matter is relevant to the scope of the Bill then such instruction is irregular.

HON. MR. BELLROSE—That is why I said I would not move it, because I saw by some authorities which I looked into that it was not in order; but, as I have explained, my intention was to speak to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, because then the Speaker would be in the Chair. I know that on such a question as that I could not enter into details, but I could speak of the subject of the Bill. There are five or six subjects in the Bill which can only be spoken of separately. However, as the leader of the House says that he will not go on with the Bill to-day, I have no right to dwell on the subject any longer.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—There are some amendments talked of which I think it important to consider, that have only been brought under my notice within half an hour of the meeting of the House. I therefore move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that it be fixed for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. ABBOTT moved the second reading of Bill (129) "An Act to amend 'The Exchequer Court Act.'" He said: This is a Bill simply to grant an appeal from the Exchequer Court to the Supreme Court, or rather to remove doubts on that point.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

FRESHETS ON THE FRASER RIVER.

ENQUIRY.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.) rose to enquire:

1st. Is it the intention of the Government, during the coming summer, to devise such means as will prevent further destruction of property by the Fraser River washing away large areas of valuable land at Sumas and Chilliwhack, and doing serious injury to navigation? 2nd. Has the Government received any information from the Government of British Columbia on the subject: if so, when, and what was the nature of it? 3rd. Has the attention of the Government been called to this matter by the New Westminster Board of Trade, or the Municipal Council of Chilliwhack; if so when?

He said: Before asking these questions I desire to say, for the information of the House, that the two points indicated in the first question are situated between 50 and 75 miles from the mouth of the Fraser River, and that the Fraser River within the last sixteen years, to my own knowledge, has actually changed its bed over $\frac{1}{8}$ of a mile. The settlements of Sumas and Chilliwhack are situated in one of the most fertile, and probably one of the most beautiful valleys to be found in any country. The soil is all alluvial soil, of from 10 to 20 feet in depth. and, owing to huge logs, or rather trees, that are carried down with the spring and summer freshets lodging at certain points in the river, the current has been diverted towards the south bank of the Fraser, where it is composed of this rich alluvial earth, and enormous quantities of land are carried away each year. Not only are there large quantities of farm lands being destroyed in that way, but the chances are that unless some way is found to arrest this destruction of property it will gradually carry away the entire valley and convert it into a sandy or waste desert. Not only should steps be taken to prevent this great destruction of private property in consequence of the encroachments of the river, but something should be done by the Government to prevent it interfering with the free navigation of the river. A large amount of shipping passes up and down the river at these points, and my private opinion—not only my own opinion but the opinion of a great number of competent men who have knowledge of such undertakings,—is that if a few piles were driven or a few large trees were anchored at the mouth of the Sumas River, at a certain season of the year, the current would be diverted, and the water would be thrown back in a short time into its original channel, thereby preserving the navigation of the river, and preventing further destruction of property.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—In answer to my hon. friend, I have to say that the Government has already expended very large sums on the navigation of the Fraser River, and it is quite prepared to do anything further that may be required to protect it, or to protect its banks from being destroyed, or to protect its channel from being diverted, which I hear there is some possibility may be done, by taking part of it through the territory of a foreign country; and at this moment they are making inquiries and obtaining information as to the precise nature of the work required to be done. The answer to the second question bears on that. The Government have received a communication from the Government of British Columbia respecting the necessity of taking measures of this description, but this communication does not give any particulars whatever—does not say where the injury is being done, or what the difficulty is that is to be dreaded, and it is precisely on those points that the Government is getting information.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—When did you receive the communication?

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am unable to say, but it is not long ago. The New Westminister Board of Trade had called the attention of the Department to the necessity of protecting the river near the mouth of the Sumas River, and that is where the work will be needed. A thorough examination is to be made to determine what is necessary to protect the navigation of the river.

MONTREAL BRIDGE CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

HON. MR. GUÉVREMONT moved the second reading of Bill (97) "An Act to incorporate the Montreal Bridge Comany."

HON. MR. POWER—Before that question is put I think it would be well that we should have some expression of opinion from the leader of the House. Recently that hon. gentleman has not been able to attend the meetings of the Railway Committee, and I think it desirable that someone should be there representing the views of the Government on the subject. I have understood that the Government are rather opposed to the construction of any further bridges across the St. Lawrence River, and I think before the House deals with this Bill we should have some information as to the position that the Government occupy with respect to it. Is this proposed bridge one of the structures to which they object, or is it not? The committee have a right to get some information on that point.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I am very happy indeed to give my hon. friend all the information that I can as to the views of the Government. Their objection is not in the abstract to making a bridge from one bank of the St. Lawrence to the other, but it is to making a bridge which will impede the navigation of the river. I understand that changes have been made to this Bill in another place which will prevent this bridge from being an obstruction to the navigation of the river—that is to say, its piers will stand on the main land, and it will be high enough to permit the largest vessels, with the highest masts, to pass under it. It will be higher than the Forth bridge.

HON. MR. VIDAL—It will be 20 feet higher.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Under these conditions, it cannot be in any way an obstruction to the navigation of the river, and the Government have ceased to make any objection to the Bill. I do not propose to make any objection to it here, and there cannot be any reason for opposing it, so long as the structure will not interfere with the navigation of the St. Lawrence.

HON. MR. POWER—I have to thank the hon. gentleman for the statement which he has made. It will greatly facilitate the work of the committee, now that they understand the views of the Government on the subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILLS INTODUCED.

Bill (98) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of George T. Smith. (Mr. MacInnes.)

THE SAMUEL MAY RELIEF BILL.

THIRD READING.

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the third reading of Bill (16) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of Samuel May."

He said: This Bill has been before the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, and its merits have there been fully established, so that there can be no doubt about it. It was unanimously passed by that committee, and with reference to the principle of such Bills, the House has already affirmed it by the passage of three Bills exactly such as these. One is the J. B. Smith relief Bill in 1869; another the James Macnab Bill in 1873; and the Welland Vale Co.'s Bill in 1876. The Welland Vale Co.'s Bill is almost precisely the same as this, and the House has never refused to pass such measures, that I am aware of, after the merits have been satisfactorily proven. There was another Bill for the relief of Otto Morin, passed also in 1876, but not precisely in character the same as this.

HON. MR. DICKEY—There is a notice on the Paper in my name proposing an amendment to this Bill, which I will now proceed to move, and in answer to what my hon. friend has just said, I may say that I retain my opinion, which I expressed at a former stage of this Bill, that this legislation is of a character that ought not to be encouraged in this House, and I think there is a decided objection to the principle of the Bill, which objection was reserved as a matter that should be considered at this stage. But my hon. friend has adverted to two or three precedents, and by his courtesy I have been enabled to refer to them myself, and I find that they are not on all fours with the principle of this Bill. This Bill contains an allegation that by an accident the application was not made until after the long period of three months had expired, and it was explained, although it is not in the preamble, that that was done by the petitioner's solicitor. It occurred to me, as it did on a former occasion, that if there was ever a case in which a party ought not to have relief it is that in which an employed solicitor neglected his duty. It is a matter that should be settled between them, and for which the solicitor ought to be liable. It was not, in either of the cases referred to, the ground upon which the application for relief was made. In all cases the application was made before the five years had expired. I have not been able to look at the law in the seventies when this legislation took place, because of the short time I have had since I was informed of those precedents, but they were all based upon different facts. For instance, the application made in 1876 was on the allegation that there had been an inadvertent omission without any fault or negligence on the part of the parties for a period of five weeks. In the other case that has been adverted to, in 1873, the renewal was legislation for the purpose of giving effect to a patent which was granted under a law of the old Province of Canada. It was not a patent that had been granted under our laws at all, but it was asking power to give effect to a patent which had been granted in the year 1857, and to remove doubt as to the position in which the parties stood with regard to that patent, and whether he could make it a Dominion patent. It was no question of delay or negligence, the object being simply to remove any doubt that might exist as to a patent obtained under the law of the old Province of Canada. In another case, the petition stated that the petitioner had forwarded the money to the Government, but by some accident the petition reached the proper office eleven days too late. He had done everything he could, but the petition did not reach the office in time. In another case the money was placed in the hands of the clerk, to be transmitted to the office, and the clerk either supposed he had transmitted the proper amount or retained part of the amount—at all events, he only sent half the $20, and that was the amount that reached the office, and when he went a few days afterwards to get his patent, as he supposed, he was told that the whole amount had not been transmitted. It was a special case, and under the circumstances he was allowed a renewal of his patent by legislation. These are the precedents; but it is my duty to call the attention of the House, as this is a public matter in its bearings, to the singular fact that after all these cases occurred the objections which were so forceably and well put by the leader of the Government on a former occasion were made in Parliament by several distinguished men on both sides of the House against this class of legislation; and the result was, as far as I can ascertain by looking at the books, there has been no such application since that date—for the long period from 1876 to the present time. That is the position in which the matter stands. I content myself, therefore, with stating my views on that point, and reserving all the objections that I made to the Bill, and having stated them, I leave them in the hands of the House and of the Government to be dealt with as a matter of policy as they choose. But there is a principle in this Bill which seriously affects the interests of the public, whose interest is, to a certain extent, antagonistic to that of the man who claims an exclusive right, and I think that interest should be protected and there should be no doubt on the subject. This Bill has a clause in it which I shall read :

"2. Any person who has, within the period between the twelfth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight, and the extension or renewal hereunder of the said letters patent, acquired any interest or right in respect of such improvements or invention, shall continue to enjoy the same as if this Act had not been passed."

It is my duty to call the attention of the House to the fact that on a former occasion I took exception to that as one of my objections to the Bill, that even if an an appeal ad misericordium could prevail, the House should still protect the interest of the public, and I suggested that certainly there should be some such words as "acquired by user or otherwise," inserted; and curiously enough, by referring to those precedents, I find in every one of them these words "acquired by user or otherwise." And the reasons are perfectly obvious : a man may acquire a patent by assignment, and hundreds of people who use this article have acquired rights after the patent has lapsed. These people have a right to be protected. They may acquire the right by manufacturing or using the article in such a way as would render them liable to a penalty if the patent was in force. It is for that reason I prepared this amendment, which, I think, covers the whole ground. It protects the rights of parties who have purchased, and protects the rights of those who manufacture. I therefore move the amendment of which I have given notice, as follows : "That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by inserting after the word 'acquired,' in the fourth line of section 2 thereof, the words 'by assignment, use, manufacture or otherwise."

HON. MR. MACINNES (Burlington)—I have considered the amendment proposed by my hon. friend, and as the object of the Bill is not only to secure the extension required, but to protect the public in any rights they may have acquired under it since the patent expired, I have decided to accept it.

HON. MR. SCOTT—It may be satisfactory to some hon. gentlemen who have taken an interest in this question, and who have thought that a very serious inroad is being made on the ordinary legislation of the country, to be reminded that in England just such a provision as we are inserting in this Bill already exists, except that it is not necessary for a party to come to Parliament to obtain a renewal of his patent. I find that, under the English patent law of 1883, section 17, in case of accident, mistake, or inadvertence, if a patentee fails to make any prescribed payment within the prescribed time, he may apply to the comptroller for an enlargement of the time for making the payment; and thereupon the comptroller shall, if satisfied that the failure has arisen from any of the above mentioned causes (accident, mistake or inadvertence) on the receipt of the prescribed fee for enlargement, not exceeding £10, enlarges the time accordingly. But the time for making any payment shall not in any case be enlarged for more than three months. We put it on a much more satisfactory basis, because we provide in this Bill that any interests which may have arisen in the mean time shall be guarded. I do not think it is any serious innovation when we have English precedent for the legislation we are carrying out.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I am obliged to my hon. friend for having brought out this fact. When this matter was up before I stated distinctly that it was far better that a provision to meet cases like this should be in the General Act, and that it should not be the subject of special legislation, which I think is odious, and I quite agree with him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Bill was then read the third time, as amended, and passed.

THE EMILY WALKER RELIEF BILL.

REPORT OF THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE ADODTED.

HON. MR. SANFORD moved the adoption of the tenth report of the Select Committee on Divorce re the Emily Walker Relief Bill. He said : As the evidence with reference to this Bill has been before you now for two days, and as the case is one which specially commends itself to us for relief, I do not think it necessary for me to enter further into the subject than to move the adoption of the report.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I am surprised that my hon. friend has not explained the report of the committee. He having charge of it, I supposed he would have told the House what the recommendation is, how it affects the Bill as it came before the House, and as it proceeded from the committee. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in discussing the matter, although it is a new departure from divorces that have been granted heretofore, and involves a great many questions to which the committee gave considerable attention. I am glad to say that upon all the facts of the case the committee were unanimous, but on the enacting clause upon those facts I had the misfortune to differ from the rest of the committee. I do not consider that upon the facts found we are justified in making such a departure from the principles laid down here, and to which we have hitherto so strictly adhered—that is, to grant no divorce, except on the ground of adultery. Before I sit down, I shall show to the House the position in which this matter comes before us in the report which we are asked to sanction. The Bill has been changed, and there has been eliminated from it any allegation of desertion. It says that they have been married, and that the committee consider the marriage is a legal marriage. There is nothing in this Bill that alleges adultery, nothing that alleges desertion or cruelty; but the finding of the committee is, that they were legally married; that they did not cohabit together, and upon those grounds, and those solely, we are asked to confirm the report and the enacting clause, which will grant the petitioner relief. Before we move in this matter any further, we should consider the position of the parties. There has been a legal marriage; they did not live together; he did not desert her immediately after the marriage, but they lived separate by mutual agrement and there is nothing in the Bill alleging cruelty on his part, and it is such a departure from our usual practice, and creates such a dangerous precedent to grant a divorce under such circumstances, that we should hesitate before passing such a Bill. When this matter came before us, presenting as it did so many novelties, we decided upon certain points which we considered were worthy of consideration from a legal point of view. Each member of the committee desiring to have information, we formulated certain points, and with the assistance of our Law Clerk, who assisted us very much in getting precedents, we got all the information we could on the points of law as to what constitutes a marriage; and I am satisfied, after looking at those cases, and some that I searched up myself, that there was a legal marriage in this case and that was the unanimous finding of the Committee. One of the enquiries was, at what age can the parties contract? And that we found by precedent was 14 in males and 12 in females. Then, as regards what is necessary to consent, there must be an assumption of the status. To make a marriage invalid it must appear beyond question that it was the result of compulsion—that there was an apparent unwillingness, an apparent assent influenced by fear of violence. In this matter of consent, was it done under duress, fear, or restraint, fraud or violence? We found that there was nothing of that kind in this case; that there was consent between the parties, and sufficient age, they were capable of contracting marriage, and consent being established these points were beyond dispute. Then another question arose, as to the consent of the parents and guardians, these people being under age of 21.

HON. MR. POWER—The husband was not under age.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I think he was under age also—not quite twenty-one—and she was twenty years and six months old. Then we say here that it is not necessary to have the consent of the parents and guardians to make a marriage contract binding. There is no statute that makes it so. There was another point taken, whether it was void through any fraud in obtaining the license. We found that even if there had been, it would not vitiate the marriage, and there are authorities on that point. Then, as regards consummation, that, we find, is not necessary to make the marriage binding. It is a matrimonial right that they have, but it is not necessary in order to constitute a legal marriage. On these points we have the established authorities, and therefore having, I believe, satisfied ourselves that such was the law, we considered, under the facts of this case, that there was a legal marriage. This being a legal marriage, there being no desertion, no cruelty, nothing complained of on the part of either of them, except that they did not live together—nothing to show want of consent or desertion—the question came up whether, under such circumstances, without any charge being made of cruelty, desertion or adultery, we should create a precedent which has never been established here or in England by dissolving the marriage tie a vinculo. In cases of desertion, separation has been granted, but a dissolution of the marriage tie has never been granted in England for anything less than adultery, and it has never been granted in this country either by the courts or by Parliament for any less cause.

HON. MR. POWER—The hon. gentleman stated that it is in evidence that the husband was not of age when the marriage took place. Will he point out where that is to be found?

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I think it is stated in some part of the report that they were both under age or it is alleged in the petition or the bill. Now, what are the facts of this case? This young woman, an intelligent girl, properly brought up and of respectable parentage, had been acquainted with this young man for a year and a-half. They had been intimately together in social life, and, as she said, he had courted her for a whole year. They agreed to be married, and fixed upon the place where the marriage was to take place three weeks before the event. They went together, by appointment, in the day time to this place—the town of Dundas, five or six miles from Hamilton—and there they were regularly married under license. They went by the street cars and returned in the same way. The understanding was that they were not then to live together, as the mother of the girl had to be appeased in some way. It seems she had some objection to the marriage. They intended fully to enter into the matrimonial estate and to live together as man and wife. The evidence on that point is clear and unqualified. She was asked by myself:

"Q. At that time, did you consider you were going to be married, or was it simply some little lark on your part?—A. It was not any lark. We both understood we wanted to be married.

"Q. And you went there with a serious intention of being married?—A. Yes.

"Q. And living as man and wife?—A. Yes.

"Q. Was there any understanding beforehand that you were not to live together as man and wife?—A. Nothing of that kind. Of course, I should never have married him had I known his circumstances—had I known that he was not in a position to keep a wife.

"Q. Was it understood you were to go back home and not live with him as your husband?—A. I understood I was going home for a while. He gave me to understand he was getting a good salary, and he told me the figures. Had I known he was not in such a position I would never have consented to this."

They married, knowing all the consequences of the step they were taking, and she swears that she intended to be married and to discharge all the duties of a wife. Therefore, there can be no question about this being a marriage. Her evidence was not equally satisfactory throughout, because although she said plainly and unqualifiedly that her intention was to be married, she afterwards said there was no marriage. Expecting that the question would come up before us, I wished to ascertain whether she had consented to this marriage, and whether she had entered into it with the intention and and expectation that it should be binding. I asked her: "Did you consider at the time you went into it that you were going to perform all the duties of a wife?" and she answers: "No," in direct contradiction to what she had said before. She had considered the position in which her answers to those questions might place her, and she flatly contradicted her former statement. In another place she is asked: "Did he ever speak of your relations as husband and wife?" She says: "Yes." And the examination continues:

"Q. In what way?—A. Nothing very particular. He said as soon as my mother was aware of it she would be agreeable."

It shows that throughout this whole matter he was desirous of consummating the marriage, that she was evading this, and that she did not wish to communicate the fact of her marriage to her mother. He came to her house that day, according to agreement, in the evening, and he continued for a long time afterwards to visit the house. She was asked how long he remained there, after the marriage, coming to see her. She did not seem to know whether it was weeks or months, or how long he remained in Hamilton. Evidently she did not care sufficiently for him to ascertain what his movements were; her mind was changed. She found that he was not as wealthy as she had believed he was, and she got rid of him the best way she could. She made no pretence that she had endeavored to live with him, or that she had suggested to him the singular and unfortunate position in which she stood.

It is not shown in any way that she had any desire to fulfil her marriage vows. She endeavored to persuade the committee that she had done everything on her part, and that he had deserted her, but the evidence does not sustain her. The fault was evidently largely hers. The husband was a young man, not 21 years of age; he had not provided a home for her, but that is no reason why the marriage contract should be dissolved.

HON. MR. MCMILLEN—How does my hon. friend reconcile that with the letters he sent her.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I will come to that presently. She had a skilled and artful lawyer, who knew exactly how to present this case in the best manner possible, and to suppress everything which might appear unfavorable to her case. She brings two or three letters here, but she admits that she had four or five others from her husband which she destroyed, evidently because they did not suit her purpose.

HON. MR. MCMILLEN — There is no evidence of that.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—Why did she destroy some and produce others? Why did she try to show by his letters that he did not wish to live with her? One would think that, writing on such an important matter, she would have kept copies of her own letters, but she had no copies to produce. She says in one place that the letters produced are all she had to produce, but when pressed by me she admitted that she had others from him that she destroyed. My hon. friend suggests that I should read the letters. I will read them, and make a few comments on them. Here is the first letter—and bear in mind that it is a reply to a letter from her, and evidently, from the manner in which it begins, she must have written to him how to address her. He does not address her at all—does not say "My dear wife," or anything of the kind, but begins:

"Your letter of the 15th inst. duly received. I have no desire to call on you or yours. I only said in case we would not settle it satisfactorily. As far as the agreement goes, I meant a written one, legally signed by both of us, but as soon as I hear from my adviser I'll write you more on the subject. I expect to hear in a day or so. I do not think your mother's sickness was caused by this trouble or her conscience would have struck her when she said the things she did about me, without any foundation. I will write more as soon as the advice comes."

That shows that she must have written some letter by which she led him to understand that she did not wish him to call on her

HON. MR. MCMILLEN—He wanted to desert her.

HON. MR. KAULBACH — There was some negotiation evidently between the parties; she had written him that it would be displeasing to her if he called on her. I draw that inference; hon. gentlemen may draw what inference they please. It is evident that this young woman did not wish him to come. Her mother was dead at the time and there was no necessity for any further estrangement.

HON. MR. SANFORD—I beg to correct the hon. gentleman. The mother is still living.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I mean the father. He died two weeks before the marriage, so there was only the mother to object. I say that this letter convinces me that there was some communication with him in which she showed no disposition or desire to have him come back to her. If she wished to put herself in a right position she should have said that she was ready to fulfil her duty as a wife. If her letters were what they should be, she should have preserved copies of them, and produced them with all the letters she received from him. But she produced no copies of her own letters, and she destroyed his letters, with the exception of those which suited her purpose. There is no evidence here in any way that, by word or act, he had alienated his wife from him; there is no evidence to show that she desired to observe her marriage vow. She went through the solemn marriage cermony of our church; she called on her Creator to witness that she would forsake all others and cleave only to her husband. And this was not done hastily or on short acquaintance. She had known the young man for eighteen months, and been engaged to him for twelve months, and the marriage was arranged three weeks before it took place. It was her duty to tell her mother the position in which she was placed, and failing to get her mother's sanction to the marriage, she should have observed her vow and forsaken all others for him. But everything points to the fact that after the marriage she was dissatisfied, on finding that her husband's prospects were not as good as she supposed them to be, and I believe she has been the means of driving him out of the country. From her evidence it is clear that she endeavored by every means in her power to keep him aloof from her. The evidence is brief, and every member of the House must have read it. It shows that the young man was willing at all times to take his wife to his home when her mother would be reconciled to the marriage He seemed to hope, as long as he was there, that a reconciliation would be effected.

HON. MR. SANFORD—That is not in the evidence.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—We have evidence to show that he was in hopes that her mother would become reconciled to the marriage. She is asked by me :

"Q. Did he ever speak of your relations as husband and wife?—A. Yes.

"Q. In what way?—A. Nothing particular. He said as soon as my mother was aware of it she would be agreeable."

Again, she is asked :

"Q. Did you see him after the marriage ceremony?—A. He did not come in ; he went home.

"Q. Was that according to any agreement between you?—A. Well, of course I knew my mother had almost forbidden him the house. It was about our tea time, and I knew perfectly well I could not invite him to tea.

"Q. You did not see him afterwards?—A. He came up that evening.

"Q. And other evenings?—A. Yes ; he kept coming up occasionally until he went away."

In view of this evidence she does not appear as an injured person: in fact, the young man has been the injured person, and we cannot afford her even any charity at all, because I believe it would be setting a bad example. She has not shown that she has been injured in any way ; she simply complains that she found that her husband was not as well off pecuniarily as she expected, and on that ground she endeavors to evade the consequence of her marriage. A brief, skillfully prepared by her Counsel, has been put into our hands, in which it is stated that there are precedents for this application. I contended in the committee, and I contend now, that there are no such precedents. In the brief it is said that an Act precisely similar to this was passed by Parliament. Well, that is not true. I was chairman of the Divorce Committee when the case was investigated, and I have looked into all the facts connected with it. That was in 1887. The Lavell case was this: one of the parties to the first marriage was over age, the other under age. They were married under assumed names. The parents knew that they were engaged, but did not know of the marriage, and there was no consummation of the marriage. Lavell was a young doctor, who was without means to maintain a wife. He evidently liked this girl and wished to secure her. That appeared to be his motive, and evidently she was holding on to him, believing, probably, that it was not quite a marriage, until she got some person that she liked better. Another person named Fralick appeared, and she engaged herself to him. When Lavall heard of it he told her that she was married to him, and could not marry Fralick, and he told the same thing to Fralick. She showed an opinion from no less a person than Sir Alexander Campbell, which was supposed to be genuine at the time but was, I think, subsequently proved to be false, saying that the first marriage was a nullity. The young man believed that at the time, but found that he was mistaken. Fralick told Lavell to go and say to the young lady that he would give her up, and that he was going to the States, but instead of leaving the country he rushed up to where she resided and got married at two or three o'clock in the morning, and when Lavell appeared on the scene she was a married woman. The sympathy of the committee was strongly with the young woman, the impression prevailing that she supposed she was not married to Lavell. The Bill charged her with bigamy and adultery, and contained that charge when reported by the committee to the Senate. There was a general feeling in the House to avoid, if possible, having her family suffer from the imputation that she was guilty of the offences charged against her, and the Bill was amended by striking out the words "bigamy and adultery," but the words remained, that since the first marriage she lived and cohabited with a third person.

HON. MR. MCMILLEN—It was a case of pure desertion.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I am quite sure that I have stated the case correctly. The words that I have quoted were struck out, but the act of adultery was charged against her—call it by any name you please. No member of the Senate would grant a divorce on any other ground than adultery. The House decided in the Lavell case that there was a marriage in the first instance, and that after the marriage she lived and cohabited with a third person. The offensive words were stricken out of the Bill at the suggestion of some Senators who wished to protect her in her new relations with another man, but the words that remained amounted to the same thing—a charge of adultery—so that that case cannot be cited as having any bearing on the Bill that is now before the House. I am confirmed in this by the remarks of Senators Gowan and Clemow, both of whom, in supporting the Bill, said that unless adultery was proved they could not vote for it. There is no precedent here for granting a divorce except for adultery. It is a question for the House to decide whether this Bill should pass or not. Parliament possesses the power to dissolve a marriage; it is a question of public policy. Should we, under the circumstances of this case, depart from the well-established rule which prevails here, and which has never been departed from in England? I think not. It would be a precedent which would be prejudicial to public morality. We know how lax the divorce laws are in the United States, yet I do not know that they have ever dissolved a marriage in any State in the Union unless adultery, desertion or cruelty was charged. In this case there is neither; there was simply a disappointment as to pecuniary means of the husband. I do not see that this woman is entitled to relief. We cannot depart from strict justice in this matter for any consideration. She has not shown in any way that she is entitled to our sympathy; she has not shown that she has done her part to live with this man and to observe the solemn vows that she took on herself. If you pass a Bill like this you are doing a wrong to the public morals of this community. We must do justice to everybody, and this woman is not entitled to our clemency or charity, because she has been herself the transgressor. She shows no desire on her part, no effort of any kind, to treat him as a husband ought to be treated. She says they did not cohabit together. There is no evidence to the contrary, but it is a strange thing to me if they did not. It is a strange thing if, after being married, and he coming to the house some weeks or months afterwards, that there was no cohabitation. It seems to be contrary to the husband's rights and duties, and contrary to the obligations imposed upon him and her by the marriage ceremony that there was no cohabitation. This is a matter which does not tend in her favor, but rather condemns her. Therefore, as a change should not be made in our practice, we should not dissolve the marriage tie on such a pretext as this. She has not shown that he has failed in any way to perform his duty, and I do hope the House will hesitate before they relieve this woman from the obligation which she has imposed on herself under this contract. I will conclude by reading some notes that I have made on this case. They are as follows:—

"At what age can parties marry?—14 in males and 12 females. (See Robinson, C.J., in Regina vs. Bill, 15 U.C.Q.B.; p. 289); again in Regina vs. Robinson, 21 U.C.Q.B., p. 353; Hammick on Marriage and Divorce, Law of England, p. 43; Stewart, Marriage and Divorce, S. 56, note 3, Bishop, 6th ed., vol. 1, S. 144.

"Bishop, 6th ed., vol. 1, s. 122, p. 101—Nature of consent requisite between the parties. Must be a present assumption of the statute, ibid. s. 229; (see Stewart, Marriage and Divorce, chap. 14, s. 80 and 101); also see Hammick, Marriage Law of England, p. 3.

"To make marriage invalid it must appear beyond question that the marriage was the effect of compulsion, and that there was an absolute unwillingness, or almost apparent consent influenced by fear of violence, ibid. p. 49." "Consent is the efficient cause." Bishop, 6th ed., vol. 1, s. 229.

There is no suggestion in this case, or in the evidence, of mistake, fraud or violence.

As to consent of parents or guardians of minors: Before Lord Hardwick's Act, 22 George II., chap. 33. The absence of such consent did not affect the validity of a marriage (Hammick, p. 52), nor does it under the present Marriage Act in England. Under Lord Hardwick's Act marriages by license, where one party was a minor (not being a widower or widow), where the consent of parents or guardians was not given, were null and void. Not so marriage by banns, where the banns were not forbidden, ibid. p. 52; vide etiam p. 57, in fine and S. 6, p. 59."

"Consent of parents, licenses, etc., etc., though all of some or them are everywhere necessary to the legality of a marriage, are nowhere, under English or American law, necessary to the validity of a marriage. They are not so by the pre-existing law, and no statute has made them so." Stewart. Marriage and Divorce, sec. 91 and 97, and authorities in notes 6 and 7. Vide Bishop, Marriage and Divorce, 6th ed., vols. 1, sec. 283 and 284. How statutes providing formalities are to be interpreted, vide ibid. sec. 293, 294 Rex. vs. Birmingham, 8 B. and C. 29; vide etiam opinion of Sewell, Attorney General of Jamaica, in Mr. Crewe's case, as marriage not being void when solemnized without a license, even when statutes made it penal for the clergyman to do so. See Lawles vs. Chamberlain, 18 Ontario Reports, 296. Macqueen, House of Lords Practice, page 599. As to whether Lord Hardwick's Act 26 George II., chap. 33, is in force in Ontario, Query, Regina vs. Seekin, 14 U. C. Q. B. 604, semble it is not. Regina vs. Bell, 15 U. C. Q. B., 287. Semble that in any case section 11 of that Act is not in force in this country, and that marriage was not void. Regina vs. Roblin, 21 U. C. Q. B. 352. Note.—The marriage in Regina vs. Roblin was afterwards dissolved by the Parliament of Canada on the ground of adultery. Stevenson's Divorce, 32 and 33 Vic., chap. 75, in statutes of 1870, P. V.

Note.—The case of Scott, falsely called Sebright vs. Sebright (12 P. O., 21), cited by counsel for petitioner, is not in point. There the marriage was held a nullity on the ground of want of consent, the form having been gone through under gross fraud and violence, and then if they did not mean marriage, there would be no marriage to dissolve.

Consummation is not necessary to the validity of a marriage. The general maxim, "Consensus non concubitus facit matrimonium," Bishop's Marriage and Divorce, 6th edition, vol. 1, sec. 228, and authorities there cited. This is only in the absence of a celebration that the necessity of a consummation can be considered. Stewart, Marriageand Divorce, sec. 102. The above applies to marriage contract per verba de futuro "but in general no consummation is necessary to the validity of a marriage whether it be formed by celebration or by mere consent." "Consensus non concubitus facit matrimonium." Thus a marriage is valid though one of the parties absolutely refused intercourse or abandoned the other at once. * * * Sexual intercourse is, however, a marriage right, and gives rise to various questions." Stewart, s. 104, and authorities in notes thereto (24th March, 1890).

The Ontario Statute applying to marriage is Revised Statutes of Ontario (1887), chapter 181, containing same provisions as Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1887, chapter 124. It contains no provisions for nullity of a marriage if its requirements are not complied with. The license in this case (Exhibit 1) is the license referred to in Section 2. The Parliament of Canada has never granted any divorce except on grounds of adultery. The Stevenson case 32-33 Vic. chap. 75 (1869), to be found at page V, Statutes of 1870, and the Lavelle case, 50–51 Vict., chap. 128 (1887), are no exceptions to this rule. In the former adultery is specifically alleged in the preamble; in the latter, in which I was chairman of the committee, though the objectionable words "bigamy and adultery" were struck out, the preamble alleges (I wish hon. gentlemen to pay particular attention to this) that the respondent has since been living and cohabiting with a third person." But in both cases the adultery was made the ostensible ground, the other circumstances being really the effective grounds of the Bill. I am opposed to the granting of divorce on the grounds contained in this Bill; yet the question whether this Bill should pass is one purely of public policy. The Senate has undoubtedly power to grant a divorce for any case whatever, and is not bound by any precedent other than as a ratio decidendi.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—If this had been an ordinary case of divorce I should not have a word to say pro or con, but it seems to me that this is not an ordinary case, and I felt rather surprised, on reading the report, that after such evidence had been adduced there was anything more to be said about the matter. Clearly there is no need of going into the preliminaries that led up to that marriage. The marriage was solemnized — perfectly solemnized. The petitioner states how it was solemnized, and she states also that they courted long before it was solemnized, and that the intention was that they were to be married. The intention in that, as in other contracts, is very important. There is no question then of the validity of the marriage. It is not alleged in the evidence, or by any person whom I have heard say anything about it. that there was any defect in the marriage bond. If there was no defect in the marriage bond we must take that ceremony for all purposes to have been a valid marriage. If it was a valid marriage, before there is any competency to come to this court for relief there must be a violation—there must be what my learned friend has adverted to—I will call it a matrimonial offence, to give jurisdiction in this House unless we violate all the precedents and practice of this House and of the British Parliament on this subject. There are, therefore, two points to be looked at. First, was there a valid marriage? There is no contesting that. Then, if there is no matrimonial offence against that marriage there is no right to come before this court, any more than under any other civil contract. Is this House going to establish a precedent by allowing any two who chose to take a course like this to ask Parliament to arbitrate for their relief? I trust not. I hope the inclination of this House is not to enlarge the sphere of interference with marriage contracts. I can find no case that would be a precedent for this particular case. There are lots of cases in the books of mock marriages—marriages brought about in mirth, and in fun. Such marriages will not be allowed to stand when it is the intention of the parties that they should not. That is the distinction; but where the intention of the parties is clearly established, that there was an intention of marriage, and that there was a marriage, the matter is different—you cannot set aside such a contract. "It is remarkable," says Bishop, on Marriage and Divorce, "that this question has received very little judicial elucidation in this country. Among the follies with which people are sometimes chargeable are mock marriages. Now, if two persons, after going through with a sufficient ceremony, are therefore married, though neither of them intended to be, no subsequent mutual disregard of the bond can undo it." Now, that is very strong. Then, speaking of intention, which is so clearly expressed here, he says: "On this subject" (that is, of mock marriages) "however, there is a late New Jersey case which is quite distinct and satisfactory. It was there laid down that intention is an essential ingredient of the contract of present marriage, the same as in every other contract; consequently, the marriage ceremony that is gone through in jest does not make the parties husband and wife, and it is so, even though the ceremony is conducted by an official person, authorized to perform the ceremony." Now, the language of this applicant is that there was an intention to get married. Of course, of that there can be no question at all. There was a marriage, and there is no offence against that marriage: and why, I ask, should it come into this House any more than any other civil contract? I have no doubt at all that the leader of the Government will take good care to give us his view of this case, and will not lend any assistance towards making it a precedent for the House to be troubled with such cases in the future.

HON. MR. DICKEY—As I was chairman of the committee at the time the evidence was given in this case and the counsel were heard, it may be expected that, as a matter of duty, I should express what my view of the case is. I confess, after listening to my hon. friend from Lunenburg, that I found it difficult to understand exactly where he was, for my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Sanford) had moved the adoption of the report, and if I recollect, rather from the effect of what he said than his words, the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg is opposed to it.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—In my official capacity as chairman of the committee, I presented the report. I did not move its adoption.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Then, I am right in concluding that my hon. friend is against the report; but he has not given us any indication of how the report came to be adopted, the chairman being against it. However, with regard to one principle he has enunciated, I entirely concur, and that is the principle that where there has been a valid marriage between parties competent to make the contract that marriage should not be voided, save for adultery. In the next place, there is another principle involved, that a marriage may be void, or a marriage may be voidable—that is, capable of being made void.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—No; there is no such rule. There is no incohate or voidable marriage.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I have no hesitation in agreeing also with my hon. friend that the marriage in the present case was not a void marriage. I admit that fully, but I am bound to say that it was a voidable marriage. And why? Because it was a marriage by two minors.

HON. MR. POWER—That does not appear from the evidence.

HON. MR. DICKEY—It is quite clear from the evidence that the petitioner was not of age, and it is clear to my recollection, from hearing the evidence, that the other party was not of age. But let me state the proposition that if the parties to that contract were minors they were not capable of making that contract without the consent of their parents or guardians, and that element constitutes what I call a voidable marriage, though the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg seems to think there is no distinction.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—There is not in law.

HON. MR. DICKEY—Why and how? For example, suppose that marriage is consummated, the parties cohabit together and live as man and wife? In that case I take it the marriage cannot be interfered with, except for the cause which I have mentioned. These are plain principles with regard to marriages, and I content myself by stating that there are two or three things perfectly clear which cannot be disputed in this case. One of these is, that this was a marriage, not only without the consent of the parents of this young lady, a minor, but against their expressed will, as far as we know, and we have that from the testimony of the girl herself; and her sister clearly demonstrated, without contradiction, that it was a marriage entirely without the consent or knowledge of the father or mother. And that that was true is evidenced by the fact that months afterwards, when for the first time the unfortunate survivor of these two parents first heard that her daughter had gone through the ceremony of marriage with this man, she was struck down with a fit of paralysis. There is no dispute about the facts; the marriage was never consummated. They never lived together as man and wife. There was no cohabitation, and as far as that goes, the marriage is a voidable one, though it has never been made void. I do not wish to go into the evidence, because there are other gentlemen on the committee, I presume, who may not be in favor of the report, and they will speak for themselves; but I have yet to learn that I can be contradicted in my statement of the facts by any member of the committee. Reference has been made to the Lavalle case. That was a case something like this, but unlike it in this respect, that it was an application by the so-called husband to get rid of the marriage with his wife, who was a minor. The cases are reversed. I do not wish to go into the whole history of it, but it was a marriage made as this was, without the consent of the parents, and concealed from the parents, as it was in this case, and some considerable time afterwards this girl, who was then 17 or 18 years of age, naturally, under the feelings which animated her sex, became attached to another person who offered her marriage, and she went to her husband and told him that she must take steps to have the marriage ceremony that had been between them set aside. A correspondence took place, and the result was that it appeared by the preamble of that Bill that she lived with another man. The evidence was brought before this House and the report of the Select Committee recommended the passing of the Bill, but with an amendment that carried the implication that the respondent was guilty of adultery. This seemed to shock the feelings of some hon. gentlemen, especially of one hon. member who is absent, Judge Gowan, and Mr. Vidal, and they raised certain objections, and the result was, as I find it laid down in Mr. Gemmill's work on Divorce: "The Bill was accordingly amended in Committee of the Whole House, and parts of the preamble charging adultery by respondent were eliminated, and the character of the Bill was completely changed from an ordinary Bill of divorce into a Bill declaring the first marriage void," as in this case. The operative clause being the same as in the Stevenson case, namely, "The said marriage between the parties is and shall be henceforth null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever." "The Bill was read the third time and passed." Now, that is a precedent. Let me say that if in the Lavalle case, or if in this case, there was evidence of adultery, there would be nothing to talk about either of voidable marriages or consent of parents, for that would have settled the case; but in the Lavalle case they insisted on striking out this clause relating to adultery, and simply declared the marriage null and void, and allowed the parties to marry again.

HON. MR. READ (Quinté).—As a member of the committee who heard the evidence in this case, perhaps it would be well for me to say a few words on this question. I think the committee were all agreed, except the chairman, on their report, and I think they took this ground, that relief should be granted in this case, because it could be obtained by either party committing the crime of adultery. They said: Would it not be better that these people should get relief under this Bill than one should commit a crime by which they could almost demand relief? I think that was the feeling of the committee, as far as I could understand it. If it was not, I stand corrected, but it was my opinion. Is it not a fact that laws are being repealed all the time—that as opinions change in the world other laws are enacted, and if for no cause but adultery can relief be granted by our laws, Parliament is supreme, and can enact just such laws as it thinks proper to meet such cases as this. This Parliament is not bound in its enactments by the laws of any other country; it is only bound by the laws as we enact them ourselves. I may be wrong, for I cannot discuss this question as well as gentlemen learned in the law. There has been a good deal said about this young lady not keeping copies of her own and her husband's letters. Ladies are not like lawyers, accustomed to keep their papers and never destroy them. The respondent in this case never treated the girl as his wife. It was his duty to seek after his bride. It was not her duty to hunt him up. It is not the ordinary state of things that a young woman who has married should hunt up her husband; it is generally the other way. In this case he does not seem to have done anything of the kind; he seems to have deserted her after the marriage ceremony, which was performed without the consent of the parents, in a secret manner, and intended to be kept secret.

HON. MR. ALMON—I should not have spoken in this case, but I am unwilling to vote against the majority of the committee, which I intend to do, without giving my reasons. If it is established, as pointed out by the hon. member from Toronto, that no divorce can be granted in this House except on the ground of adultery, it is very clear that this is a legal marriage, because it is a mere quibble to say that a girl of twenty and a few months is not twenty-one, and, therefore, does not know her own mind when she is getting married. My impression was that, under the law, a girl of eighteen is competent to give consent to marriage. As this marriage has been proved, and no adultery has been proved, I think the contract cannot be annulled. I was astonished to hear the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, who is presumed to have a good deal of experience in this matter, say that ladies generally keep copies of their letters. I should say that it is a good thing for the hon. gentlemen if they destroyed all the locks of hair they got from him, let alone the letters. The hon. gentleman from Quinté has told us that the majority of the committee gave as a reason for recommending this divorce, that if they did not do it this girl, driven to despair, might commit adultery, to get a legal divorce. That puts me in the mind of the girl who made application to be admitted to the Magdalen Asylum and was refused. She asked the reason why she was refused, and she was told it was a place only for abandoned women, and was asked if she was not a decent woman: "Yes; I am now" she said, "but there is no reason why I should not qualify." I am afraid that is the way with this committee—they allow their feelings for this petitioner to mislead them into doing what they know is not right. She may be an attractive looking woman, but from her evidence I am strongly prepossessed against her. She married this man against the wishes of her mother, who was then only a widow one fortnight, and against the dying wishes of her father, who had warned her against this man—against her sister's warning, who says he was an idle fellow, and that she was opposed to it. Therefore, not having seen her, though she may have been very good looking, my feelings are entirely against her, and I cannot in justice grant a divorce, and I simply will not vote for it.

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—As a member of the committee, I would ask the indulgence of the House while I make a few statements relative to this Bill. Before touching upon the facts of the case, I might observe that the principal consideration which entered into the minds of the committee in framing this report was based upon this fact: that in the first place Parliament is not limited by any means in granting whatever relief may be sought, and that if the circumstances are of such a nature as to warrant the intervention of Parliament, the committee might consider itself justified in placing those circumstances before the House, and recommend to the House to grant the relief sought for. We know very well that very few cases of this kind come before Parliament for consideration. There are very few precedents, and very few authorities which might be said to govern a case of this kind. I might observe, in the last place, that my hon. friend from Lunenburg is somewhat astray when he says there are no precedents where divorces have been granted in England for any other crime than adultery. The opinion prevails amongst many members of the profession that the Act 26 George 2nd was in operation in Canada, and that the marriage of minors without the consent of parents was null and void. The mere fact of entering into the marriage was a nullity; but I find several legal decisions of a very recent date holding that owing to the repeal of that Act in England it is not in operation here, and consequently a marriage entered into by minors might be a valid marriage. So that there are numerous cases in England, and, I have no doubt, in Canada, in which minors entering into a marriage entered into a null and void contract. If this Act had been in operation here, as is contended by some lawyers, even at the present time, this marriage would have been null and void; therefore, I think this is a case worthy the consideration of this House. It turns upon this very delicate point: This Senate would not for one moment hesitate to grant the relief sought for if it were held that that Act was in force. The tendency of modern law has been to relax the legal restrictions which have been placed upon marriage. That, I think, is generally admitted, and there is a greater relaxation now than there was half a century ago. At that time this marriage would have been null and void. If we come to the conclusion that because by an Act of the English Parliament, this Act that I refer to, 26 George 2nd, was repealed, therefore, it must necessarily alter not only the law of this country, but alter the position which would be taken as well as the principle contained therein by this House with respect to a marriage of this nature. Therefore, I say that half a century ago, where such a marriage as this would have been a nullity by reason of the repeal of this Act, hon. gentlemen should not necessarily come to the conclusion that this case is not one for the consideration of this House and the intervention of the powers of this Parliament. I submit that is the very best way we can present this case; leaving out of our consideration the fact that that law has been repealed, then should not the law be to-day as it was half a century ago, so far as the moral principle involved therein is concerned, and with the tendency which I adverted to a moment ago as to the general relaxation of principle in respect to granting relief in matters of marriage, why should we not exercise the power which is inherently vested in this House, the same as a court would exercise it half a century ago, before the repeal of the Act? The functions of Parliament are of such an extraordinary a nature that it is proper for them to exercise those functions on extraordinary occasions. We have frequently brought before us cases in which it is considered proper that Parliament should exercise its powers relative to circumstances which warrant its action. I say in this case the circumstances fully warrant our interference. In the first place, we have come to the conclusion that there was a marriage in this case; we have come to the conclusion that there was a technical marriage, but those elements which enter into a marriage in fact did not come into this marriage. There are extenuating circumstances attendant upon it which make it in the strictest sense of the word a technical marriage. We find that this couple entered into the marriage without the consent of their parents, being minors. This is a consideration which should not be lost sight of, and which was an element a few years ago that would of itself have rendered the marriage null and void.

HON. MR. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman point out in the evidence where the man is a minor?

HON. MR. LOUGHEED—The statement was made before the committee, and the committee were satisfied that the man was a minor though looking over the examination as taken by the stenographer I do not find that the statement is given as evidence. But the committee thoroughly satisfied themselves that the two were minors. At all events, she was a minor, and under the Act of George the 2nd the marriage would have been void. The next factor which enters into our consideration in this case lies here, that these two did not comprehend the nature of the solemn contract into which they had entered. That must be apparent to all gentlemen who read the evidence, for we find from the woman's evidence that the husband never made any statement to her after the marriage contract had been entered into as to their performing the functions which relate to the marriage. He never provided for her a house; he never made any preparation to give her a home; he never intimated that he would support her; he never spoke to her about future intentions, but I find him casually visiting her on a couple of occasions, and then absolutely deserting her, and having no correspondence whatever with her until a date long subsequent. She states in her evidence that she did no comprehend that she was his wife at the time. She states that distinctly, that she did not comprehend the act that was solemnized, or that she was a wife in anything but in name. The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, I might say, has endeavored in every possible way to torture the evidence that has been adduced for the purpose of leading this House to a conclusion which is really contrary to the facts found by the committee. My hon. friend prefaced his remarks by saying that he was pleased to state to the House that the committee were unanimous in their finding of the facts, but I must demur from the statement of the hon. gentleman when I take into consideration the fact that he endeavored to impress upon this House that we came to the conclusion on facts which are entirely at variance with the merits of the case. I say that the committee were unanimous in the conclusion at which they arrived relative to the merits of the case, and that the woman did everything which devolved upon her relative to merits which would warrant us in granting the relief which is sought, were it not for the barrier which raised itself before the hon. gentleman's vision, namely, that we could not grant divorce here except for adultery. The hon. gentleman stated to the committee that were it not for that he should be pleased to support the Bill. I say here, my hon. friend's version and review of the facts would be entirely at variance with the finding to which I have referred. Speaking of precedents, I submit to the House that the Lavalle case is a precedent which would justify the House in granting the relief here sought for. When we speak of precedents or authorities we must take an Act of Parliament as we find it—we must read the Act as it appears on its face and interpret it accordingly. Now, if hon. gentlemen will look at this Act they will find it exceptional in this respect, that Parliament has declared that "the marriage was null and void." To declare that the marriage in the Lavalle case was null and void, it must refer to facts antecedent to the marriage that was entered into with Fralick—the second marriage. If you look at the enacting clause of chap. 128, 51 Vic., you will find that Parliament declared this marriage to "to have been null and void and the same is hereby annulled to all intents and purposes whatever." That is to say, that Parliament declares by this Act that when this marriage was entered into it was a null and void act, and no marriage, and therefore I say that Parliament has placed upon the Statute-book here a precedent which is on all fours with the case before us. This marriage of William Arthur Lavelle was entered into the same manner as Emily Walker entered into marriage, yet we find Parliament declaring that although they entered into that marriage, and had not consummated the marriage though there was a performance of the ceremony, the same as in this case before us, that that marriage was null and void. Now, Parliament having declared that it does not rest with hon. gentlemen to say that that declaration could have alluded to some subsequent event after the marriage had occurred. I say it related back to the time antecedent to her cohabitation with Fralick. You are asked by the petition to declare that this marriage is null and void. It was the intention of the committee to report to the House that it was desirable to pass the Bill in that form, and this House could have passed it. This Act for the relief of William Arthur Lavalle is directly in point. Now, I submit that the intervention of Parliament is asked for on the ground of public policy. It is in the interest of public morality that this relief should be given. We know very well that by the commission of a criminal act by the man, the act of adultery, these people could claim the relief which they now seek. Are we to place these two persons in such a position that they may be induced to commit a criminal act for the purpose of obtaining the relief which they now ask for? Furthermore, I say this, in the interest of public policy, that those people should not be driven across to the United States where that relief can be obtained. Consequently, I say it is not in the interests of public policy that an iron rule should be followed here possessed of no elasticity whatever. Under the circumstances of the case, the House should grant the relief that is sought.

HON. MR. POWER—As a rule, I do not take part in discussions on divorce Bills, and if this were an ordinary case of divorce, where, according to the rules generally followed in this court, the grounds for divorce had been established, I should not say anything; but to my mind it is a case so remarkable as to call for attention from every member of the court. We are here as members of a court. The hon. member from Calgary finding that there is really no precedent for what we are asked to do, either before this court or before any other court, has to fall back upon the omnipotence of Parliament, which, as some English writer once said, has power to do everything except to make a man a woman. We have heretofore been guided in this court by precedent, and it has been an established rule that unless adultery was proved, there should be no divorce. The hon. gentleman told us that the Lavalle case was a precedent exactly in point. Now I think there were some serious differences betwee this case and the Lavalle case. In the latter the parties were married under false names. They do not appear to have been altogether in earnest, whereas in this case we have the testimony of the petitioner that she was perfectly in earnest and knew what she was doing. In the Lavalle case it was shown that the person against whom the divorce was sought, had gone through the ceremony of marriage with another man and had cohabited with him for a long time—had actually been committing adultery for a number of years, and so there was the clearest possible ground for granting the divorce, according to the rules which govern this Parliament. It is perfectly true that members of this House, influenced largely by a feeling of sympathy with the family of the woman in the Lavalle case, asked that the Bill should be worded in such a way as not to declare in so many words that the woman had been guilty of adultery; but the fact that she had been guilty of adultery was recognized and admitted. Now there is nothing of that sort in this case—nothing whatever. The hon. gentleman, too, told us that we ought to grant this divorce because otherwise the parties might go to the United States and get a divorce there. That is a most extraordinary ground to take. It is simply this: we are asked to do a thing that is wrong and indefensible, because if we do not do it some one else may. He might as well suggest that we should kill a man because if we did not kill him he would be killed by somebody else. I do not think that that sort of logic will commend itself to the good judgment of a majority of this House, and I hope it will not. The preamble to this Bill says that these people were married. The preamble of the Bill as reported by the committee admits the marriage; it could not very well deny it. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the marriages of minors, and suggested that the 26 George 2 really ought to be held to be in force here. That was a statute which I think was not a very wise one, perhaps, at any time. It was felt in England to be so unwise that it was desirable to repeal it, and it has been repealed; but it was held before the actual repeal in England that the statute was not in force in Canada. So any argument built on that old statute is not good for very much. What are the facts? We have to go here by the evidence, and not by the allegations in the preamble of the Bill and in the petition. In the evidence which has been submitted by the committee there is nothing whatever to indicate that the husband was not of full age. The girl is spoken of as a minor; she was twenty years and six months old. Now, here we have everything that is necessary to a valid marriage. These were parties competent to contract. There was a man who, as far as we know, was over twenty-one years, and the woman almost twenty-one. These parties had been engaged for twelve months. It was not a sudden thing at all; there is no fraud on the part of the husband to bring about the marriage and no compulsion alleged. If ever there was a valid contract entered into by parties with their eyes open this is one. After having been engaged for twelve months these people go to a clergyman of the Church of England, and are married, not under false names but under their own names. Now, what is the evidence? The question is asked:

"Q. Had you agreed to go through the ceremony with this man?—A. We agreed to be married slily, about three weeks before, but I did not know anything about the arrangement until the day before.

"Q. At that time, did you consider you were going to be married, or was it simply some little lark on your part?—A. It was not any lark. We both understood we wanted to be married.

"Q. And you went there with a serious intention of being married?—A. Yes.

"Q. And living as man and wife?—A. Yes.

"Q. Was there any understanding beforehand that you were not to live together as man and wife?—A. Nothing of that kind. Of course I should never have married him had I known his circumstances—had I known he was not in a position to keep a wife."

Some hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear" to that. I think that is an extraordinary avowal for a young woman to make, that she was not marrying a man but marrying his property. If the fact that the party married does not turn out to be as well off as the other party to the contract thought before the contract was made is ground for voiding a marriage, there will be a great many marriages voidable. She says:

"I understood I was going home for a while. He gave me to understand he was getting a good salary, and he told me the figures. Had I known he was not in such a position I would never have consented to this."

And ten months afterwards, when she was of age, she recognized the marriage by having her mother told about it. Here we have, as I say, a marriage as good as ever was entered into, and on what ground are we asked to set that marriage aside? It has not been proved that there was any adultery on the part of the husband; it has not been proved that there was any cruelty, not insinuated that there was, and it has not been proved that there was any desertion. It has been hinted by some one that there was desertion, but there is no evidence of it. As far as we can judge from the woman's evidence at page 6, she refused to live with the man more than he refused to live with her. There is no allegation whatever on her part of desertion. If she had alleged desertion she should be prepared to offer evidence that she was willing to consort with him. These proceedings have been altogether ex parte. We have before us now the evidence solely of the petitioner. If we had had the other side of the story we probably would have had a very different kind of case, but even with this ex parte statement and with no one representing the husband we have really no ground at all upon which this court could be called upon solemnly to put asunder those people whom God has joined together. If it is sufficient to set aside a marriage because it turns out that the man's circumstances are not quite as good as the woman fancied they were before the ceremony, we shall have plenty of applications I presume. One might almost fancy that some of the reasons which are ridiculed in this country as being held good in the United States courts for granting a divorce would soon be recognized here—the fact that a man's beard is not of the right color, or some similar reason, would soon be held by this court sufficient ground for severing the marriage tie. As I said before, I should not have said anything in connection with this Bill were it not for its extraordinary character. Very strange things have gone abroad about this Senate during the last few months, statements with respect to our mode of transacting business have been published in newspapers, even in England, which are calculated to throw much discredit upon the Senate, but I can fancy nothing that would be more calculated to discredit the Senate than the fact that we had passed a Bill to divorce a couple, simply because after the parties had been validly married the woman found the man was not as well off as she thought he was.

HON. MR. MCCLELAN—My opinion is, that so far as discredit to the Senate is concerned, it might deserve it if we refused to pass the Bill. As a member of the committee, and one of the six who agreed to report this Bill without much difficulty after hearing the evidence, I must say that this is a case, whether there is a precedent for it not, in which the Senate should grant the legislation sought. If there is no precedent we should make one. I cannot see why we should not act on the same grounds as Parliaments have acted when precedents were first established. If this is a case that is entirely new and exceptional it is one that is not likely to occur again; and if a similar case should occur again this could be quoted as a precedent. I think we are justified in taking into consideration the circumstances of this unfortunate affair, and granting the separation as requested by the petitioner. Whether we have a precedent or not, I think we should pass the Bill. However, from the working of the Bill in the Lavalle case, I think that that would be a precedent for those who really require one, because in that particular case it was stated that inasmuch as the consummation of the marriage was not entirely proven, therefore the Bill should be granted. So far as that goes it is a good precedent for this case, because no one disputes the fact that it was made clear that the marriage in this instance was not consummated. But there are other circumstances which have been brought forward by my hon. friend from Amherst, who acted as chairman of the committee during the progress of the investigation of this case. There was the fact of its being a marriage of minors, or at least the bride was a minor, and we have had sufficient evidence to justify us in concluding that they were both minors at the time of the ceremony. We have the fact that the marriage was clandestine, and contrary to the wish and inclination of the young lady's parents. The father of the young lady died, unfortunately, two or three weeks before the ceremony took place. Ten months after the ceremony the mother, on finding out the fact that her only remaining daughter had contracted this marriage, immediately fainted away, and has been afflicted with paralysis ever since. Not only were they minors who could not lawfully contract a marriage without the consent of their parents, but it is stated in the form of license used in Ontario that where any fraud or evasion of truth occurs the contract shall be null and void. That is a matter that does not come within our cognizance, inasmuch as the marriage ceremony makes the marriage a legal one. We have, then, the clandestine nature of the marriage, the fact of their being minors, the absence of the consent of the parents and guardians, the fact that there was no consummation whatever of the marriage, and in point of fact the desertion on the part of the husband, because what constitutes desertion is when the husband fails to provide a home and do those things which a husband would naturally be expected to do. There was not only no evidence to show that he had provided such a home, no evidence to show that he invited his wife to live with him, but shortly after the ceremony he left her at her father's house. There was no consummation of the marriage, no cohabitation, and soon afterwards he went to Texas to live, and from there he has written letters to her, addressed to her in her maiden name. It was not set up at all, and was not considered a necessary part of the investigation or conclusion of this case, that the Lavalle case was an exact precedent. It was not considered—I can only speak for myself—that it was absolutely necessary that we should follow that precedent, or that we should search out any particular precedent applying to this case, but we felt that the circumstances of this particular case were such that Parliament would be justified, and not only justified, but would be doing their duty, to grant this Bill, and hence they came to such a unanimous conclusion to recommend it to the House. I firmly believe if there is any discredit to be attached to the Senate—and I am sure there will not be any whichever way they decide—the discredit ought more surely to rest on them for rejecting this Bill than for passing it.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—I do not propose to prolong the discussion, but I have learned something from my hon. friend from Halifax which I did not know before, and I wish to say a few words about it. I have lived all my life in the Province of Quebec, where we have judges and courts as respectable and as much honored and respected throughout the world as any courts and judges in other parts of the Dominion of Canada or England, and ever since I have been able to understand public affairs I have been in the habit of seeing those judges in those courts doing precisely what we are asked to-day to do—setting aside marriages between minors, or between a minor and a major, contracted without the consent of their parents. That is the law at this moment in at least one-third of the Dominion of Canada, and I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Halifax in believing that the Senate is so ridiculous or contemptible as to be held up to the scorn of the whole world because it acts on the proposition that minors cannot marry without the consent of their parents, or that the Senate by passing this Bill will be dragged down to the low level of Quebec. I propose to vote for this Bill and I desired to give my reason for doing so. I did not wish to be held up as consenting to something which was going to have such a baneful effect on the character of the Senate, and I think it only right to say that if the Senate is to be discredited by passing this Bill it will be discredited in company with all the courts of justice and the laws which have existed since the Province of Quebec was settled, and which prevail there now.

HON. MR. BELLEROSE—I should like to know whether, under the laws of Ontario, a marriage with minors without the consent of their parents is void? In Quebec minors cannot contract a marriage and the courts can declare such a contract null. If in Ontario there is no such law, then it will make a difference with us. In one instance we will have to vote for the report; in the other we will have to vote against it. I should like to have an answer to this question from some lawyer in the Province of Ontario.

HON. MR. DICKEY—The principle is the same in both Provinces.

HON. MR. POWER—In Ontario it is not. The Ontario courts have decided the other way.

HON. MR. MASSON—The question is, whether, in the Province of Ontario, they have relief by law.

HON. MR. DICKEY—No.

HON. MR. MASSON—Am I to understand that in the Province of Ontario minors can contract marriage?

HON. MR. POWER—Yes.

HON. MR. MASSON—If that is so, the sooner Ontario passes a law to prevent such marriages the better.

HON. MR. O'DONOHOE—In Ontario the marriage contract between minors is like any other contract between minors; if it is brought before a court before it is consummated by cohabitation it can be annulled and the contract set aside. Minors are not competent in Ontario to make a contract of any kind. They are all voidable contracts when made by minors, but the place to try whether they are void or voidable is in the courts, not before Parliament.

HON. MR. DICKEY—I have under my hand a decision of Chancellor Boyd in a recent case, Lawless vs. Chamberlain, which puts it beyond all question that the ordinary courts cannot grant relief in this case, and Parliament is the only tribunal that can be appealed to.

The Senate divided on the motion, which was adopted by the following vote:—

THE PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SUBWAY.

MOTION.

HON. MR. HOWLAN moved the following resolution :—

Resolved, That this House recommend to the favorable consideration of the Government the appointment of a Board of Civil Engineers, accustomed to hydraulic works, and works altogether or principally in the water, with a view of ascertaining—1st. The feasibility of construction and maintenance and the cost of a metallic subway across the Straits of Northumberland, commencing at or near Cape Traverse, in Prince Edward Island. 2nd. Any other plan which they can recommend to fulfil the terms of Confederation made with the Province of Prince Edward Island, viz.: "To establish and maintain efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between the Island and the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion."

He said: Some little apology ought to be offered by myself to the House for again bringing forward this question. Many have thought that I permitted the subject to drop, as I had no faith in the practicability of the construction of a subway under the Straits. Such is not the fact. I have never lost faith in the work, but as there were other similar structures being built in different parts of the world, and one, particularly, near ourselves, I thought it would be a good thing to wait until some progress had been made in the construction of the one near home on the plan then proposed. During last year a subway has been in course of construction under the St. Clair River, which passes through a material very much like that under the Straits of Northumberland, and although the subway is not of the same length or extent as the one proposed at Prince Edward Island, still sufficient information has been acquired to strengthen the opinion and belief that a subway could be constructed to unite Prince Edward Island with the mainland. I will read to the House a report of comments made upon the building of this subway at a meeting of the Institute of Canadian Engineers by the president, Colonel Gzowski. It is taken from the Empire newspaper, and is as follows :—

"The St. Clair Tunnel, under the Detroit River, to connect the Grand Trunk system in Canada with its connections in the United States at Sarnia.—The total length of the tunnel with approaches will be two miles and 1,145 feet. The length from face to face of the portals is 6,000 feet. The depth of an open cutting at the east (Canadian side) of the tunnel is 62 feet; at the west (United States end), 52 feet. The length of that part which is under water will be 2,310, feet with a gradient to the west, rising 1 foot in 1,000. The greatest depth of the River St. Clair on the line of the tunnel is 40½ feet. The minimum thickness of the roof is 16 feet. The bottom of the tunnel is about 10 feet above the rock underlying the clay. This has been ascertained by very accurate soundings and borings taken near the line of the tunnel at each 20 feet. It may be well to say that the flow of gas was found immediately above the rock, indicating that its source was in or below that strata, the gas escaping through fissures in the rock. Locating the bottom of the tunnel above the rock and yet securing sufficient thickness of material to support the roof was in order to avoid meeting with gas. The material through which the tunnel is driven is clay, with pockets of wet sand and gravel. The tunnel in cross section is circular, with an inside diameter of 19 feet 10 inches. It is a circular tube, lined throughout with flanged plates of cast iron, 2 inches thick, 5 feet long, bolted together. The ends of these plates are planed to make a close joint, and before being used they are heated and soaked in tar. The lower half of the lining is encased outside in 3 inches of grout, formed of the best Portland cement and coarse, sharp sand. Holes are made in the upper part of each plate, through which the grout is poured in. Under the river the whole of the outside of the cast iron lining will be covered in this way. In the prosecution of the work an iron shield is used, under the protection of which the excavation is carried on, enough to enclose the cast iron lining, and as the excavation in front of it is advanced it is moved forward just far enough to put together one section of the tunnel lining. As the width of these sections or rings is only 18 inches, and as the rear portion of the shield which encloses the lining overlaps it 39 inches, the forward end of the lining is always within the shield. To ensure safety as far as possible in the event of a sudden strong flow of quicksand or water, an iron diaphragm or bulkhead is built across the shield 48 inches from the rear of it, with two sliding doors which can at once be closed. The total length on both sides of the river of the completed tunnel to 22nd January is 2,006 feet; in Canada, 844 feet, in the United States, 1,162 feet. The time named for the completion of the tunnel is July, 1891.

"Early experience in Canada.—The chairman then referred to his early experience in Canada. In 1841 he was appointed to take charge of the construction of all kinds of roads, harbors, lighthouses and bridges. His district extended from Kingston to Sarnia in the west and Owen Sound to Penetanguishene on the north, including about 40 district works. Then 35 to 40 miles a day was considered good travelling, and was done sometimes on wheels, sometimes in the saddle, sometimes on foot. There were in all about 600 miles of varied classes of roads. To show the novelty in those days of engineering work, I may be allowed to narrate an incident: I had to build a bridge across the River Thames, near London, now within the limits of that city, on the road to Sarnia, to replace a temporary structure then in use. The new bridge was on the Howe truss plan, with the roadway on the bottom chord one span of 160 feet. When this bridge was completed ready for traffic, and just before the removal of the temporary one, I was waited upon by several leading citizens of London, who enquired if I had absolute confidence in the stability of the bridge to carry the heavy traffic that the improved condition of the road would bring upon it. They thought it too light and spidery. Fortunately, batteries of royal artillery were quartered in London. I asked the commanding officer to take them across the bridge to test its strength. He replied: "Yes, if you will agree to stand under it." The batteries crossed the bridge at a walk, then at a trot, without disturbing the camber. That established confidence in the bridge. The introduction of plank and macadam roads gave rise to a desire for better means of communication as their construction gave such striking evidence of great saving of time by the ability to carry heavier loads more rapidly, with reduced wear and tear of horses and vehicles, hence with greater economy of carriage. This practical beneficial evidence pioneered the way to the construction of railways, towards which counties, cities, towns and townships voted subsidies in the form of bonds towards the cost of building them. After 1841 and 1842 there was a rapid development throughout Canada of large enterprises undertaken by the Government and private organizations. The first enlargement of the Welland Canal to 9 feet of water on the mitre sills was commenced in 1842. The earliest railway in Canada, the Laprarie and St. Johns, was built in 1836. The Montreal and Lachine Railway was opened and worked with imported English equipment in 1847. The St. Lawrence and Atlantic Railway (now Grand Trunk) on which I was chief engineer, was opened for traffic to St. Hyacinthe in 1849. The first deepening of a straight channel in Lake St. Peter, upon which I reported with Sir William Logan, General McNeil and Captain Child, of the United States engineers, was begun in 1850. The Bytown and Prescott Railway, known as the St. Lawrence and Ottawa, now part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was commenced in 1851, and in the same year the Northern Railway from Toronto to Owen Sound, as was also about the same time the Great Western Railway, from the Niagara River to Windsor (now Grand Trunk).

"Canada has now in operation within her borders no less than 13,410 miles of railways, representing a capital of $727,180,448."

Another reason why I did not bring it before the House last year was the fact that the Government had recently placed a steamer called the "Stanley" on the route between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Last year was her first year, and last season was one of the finest winters in fifty that we have had in Prince Edward Island—in fact, any steamer could last season have performed the service between the Island and the mainland; but I was satisfied that no steamer could perform that service every winter, and felt certain that when we had one of our ordinary winters in Prince Edward Island it would be placed beyond doubt that the opinion entertained was correct. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen are impressed with the idea that the service is performed and that there is no dissatisfaction in Prince Edward Island on that ground. The steamer is no doubt a good one—in fact, in my judgment too good for the service in which she is. To put the House in possession of the view held by the people of Prince Edward Island on that particular point as a settlement of the question of winter navigation and the fitness of that boat to perform the work, I shall read an extract from a paper published in the interests of the Government in Prince Edward Island. On the 5th of February last the editorial correspondence of the Government paper at Charlottetown says:

"We publish to-day two letters from Ottawa. One was written on the 24th January; the other on the 31st. Both came to hand, together, last evening. How the contract to afford continuous communication for mails and passengers between this Province and the mainland is being performed may be judged by the officials and legislators at Ottawa from this fact: Hundreds of merchants, and thousands of men and women of all sorts and conditions in this country, have received their letters after the same slow and irregular process as The Examiner. In a time of comparatively fine weather it has taken the inhabitants of Prince Edward Island just about as long to hear from their business relations and their friends in Canada as it has taken the inhabitants of the rest of Canada to hear from Great Britain and Europe. Persons who live in other parts of Canada can hardly be expected to grapple actively with this question. We have no doubt that members of the Government fondly imagine that by providing the "Stanley" they have solved the difficulty."

That is the view entertained by the Government newspaper there. But the Government of Prince Edward Island have, from time to time, memorialized the Government at Ottawa with regard to the facts. When the terms of Confederation were made, two of the gentlemen, one of whom has now a seat in this House, who negotiated those terms, made it one of the conditions precedent that we should have daily communication for our mails and passengers between the Island and the mainland throughout the year. It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that Prince Edward Island did not come into the Confederation with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the other Provinces, at the time of the Union. It came in some five or six years afterwards, and several overtures were made to the people of Prince Edward Island with regard to their entrance into the Confederation. Two of the terms which enticed our people were, the settlement of the land question —a question which excited our people a great deal—and winter communication with the neighboring Provinces. We were told at that time that the Provinces were to be all connected together by the building of the Intercolonial Railway, and when we stated that we did not see how we could have any communication with that railway, we were told that ways and means would be provided us, that we would have communication with the mainland, and in order that no misunderstanding might exist about those terms, the words adopted were:

"Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the Island and the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion."

These were the terms. Seventeen or eighteen years have intervened since then, and from time to time the Government of Prince Edward Island have memorialized the Government at Ottawa with regard to the difficult position in which they were placed. I do not know that I could possibly express in language of my own the matter so clearly and satisfactorily as it is set out in the memorials which I hold in my hand. Two memorials came from the Government of Prince Edward Island to Ottawa. The first was previous to the unpleasantness that we had in the North-West, and while that was going on a memorial was sent by the Government stating that until this trouble in the North-West was put down they did not want any consideration of our case. Time and again these memorials were sent to Ottawa without result, and, finally, getting no satisfaction, the Legislature, by a joint memorial, commissioned the Prince Edward Island Government to proceed to the foot of the Throne, which they did. I will read some extracts from the memorials. The first memorial is dated in 1883. It said:

"Cut off, as they always were, for nearly five months of the year from all communication with the mainland, except by a most uncertain and dangerous route, a promise of continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railways of the Dominion was indeed a strong inducement to them to surrender their self-government and unite with Canada. They naturally expected that, within a reasonable time, they would possess uninterrupted communication, at all seasons of the year, with the rest of Canada and of the world—that they would enjoy equal facilities for intercourse with the other Provinces as those Provinces enjoy between themselves, and would participate in all the benefits arising from the Intercolonial Railway and other public works upon the mainland, from which they had previously been debarred for a great portion of the year.

"The inconvenience and loss which they have suffered in consequence of the failure of the Federal Government to provide them with the efficient communication promised are incalculable, while the disappointment to their expectations has not tended to enhance, in their estimation, the value of a connection with the Dominion, but, on the contrary, has awakened a feeling of discontent which, though a matter of regret, is not unnatural under the circumstances.

"Were it only the transport of freight and merchandise that was stopped during the winter season, they would have good reason to complain of being precluded from the benefits of the Intercolonial and other railways which their more fortunate neighbors on the mailand enjoy; but their complaint, as well, is that in direct violation of the compact upon which they entered the Confederation, no efficient and continuous means of steam communication have been provided, whereby mails and passengers can be transported to the mainland. The derangement of business consequent upon the irregularity of the mail service, when, for ten days at times, no communication whatever is had with the rest of Canada, exercises a most prejudicial effect upon their interests. The hardships of travelling, which only the strong and robust are able to endure, and the dangers attendant upon the present mode, are other disadvantages from which they suffer most acutely."

Then, in 1885, they say in another another memorial:

"The Address of last Session imposed upon the Provincial Government the duty, in the event of a favorable answer not being accorded thereto without delay, of invoking the interference of Her Majesty the Queen to obtain that justice which the Island has been so long denied. While it is a subject of deep regret that the Dominion Government have not seen fit to take any action in the matter therein pressed upon their notice, the Council in committee feel that no alternative is left to them than to lay at the foot of the Throne a statement of the grievances so long endured, and ask of Her Majesty, as one of the contracting parties to the Articles of Confederation, that She will be graciously pleased to secure to Prince Edward Island that redress which has so repeatedly been sought, but which has not yet been obtained."

Then the Rebellion broke out, and the Government sent a despatch stating that they did not desire any consideration of this question until all matters appertaining to the Rebellion were settled to their satisfaction. The Island Government applied the year afterwards for an answer to this memorial which I have just read, and finally the reply was sent, and this answer is signed by two gentlemen, members of the Government at that time, Sir Alex. Campbell and the present Governor of Nova Scotia. That answer was the statement which was forwarded. The delegates came here and from here went to Europe, and the answer of the Government was sent to London, and there they met it. The whole of that answer is based upon two facts, one that the Government had performed to the best of their ability the conditions which they had agreed to carry out, and the other that the expenditure of money in Prince Edward Island was in excess of that sum of money which was received from Prince Edward Island in the way of customs and excise. Those statements were so entirely erroneous that the gentlemen who composed the delegation had very little difficulty in proving them to be so. Previous to Confederation, the trade of Prince Edward Island came direct in ships of her own from England, the United States and the neighboring Provinces, and the Customs duties were paid at the Customs houses of the Island, and of course were accounted for in the returns, as hon. gentlemen can readily understand; whereas, after Confederation, the goods consumed by the people of Prince Edward Island, to a very great extent (in fact, three-fourths or more of them), were bought from the wholesale merchants of Montreal, Toronto, Quebec, Halifax, St. John, etc. No account of the goods appeared in the public records of the country, and therefore the gentlemen who prepared this statistical extract were led to the conclusion that the Island was receiving more than it was entitled to. Now, as an illustration of this, let us take the Inland Revenue returns of the Dominion:—

	Revenue.
Derived from Toronto distillery.....	$3,211,866 5[illegible]
do Windsor do	2,663,951 95
do McDonald's tobacco factory	1,059,293 60
do Prescott distillery.....	615,026 54
do Guelph do	364,732 60
do Hamilton do	227,565 31

No one contends that the excise collected at the Toronto distillery, of $3,211,000, is paid by the people of Toronto; it is paid by those who consume the liquor throughout the Dominion. And so it is with regard to the distilleries at Windsor, Prescott and Guelph. Then take the revenue derived from one single tobacco factory—the McDonald factory of Montreal. It contributes to the public revenue over a million dollars annually, but no person believes that the people of Montreal pay the whole of that amount. That is the best explanation that I can possibly give to this House of the character of the figures prepared by those gentlemen, no doubt in good faith, taken from the Public Accounts. Nothing could have been further from the truth. The fact is, that the statement of the revenue contributed by Prince Edward Island from Customs and excise shows a smaller sum now than we had twenty-five years ago. Nobody believes that that is so. We know that the revenue and expenditure of every country nearly balance, and it is absurd to say that Prince Edward Island, with 25,000 more people today than the colony had twenty-five years ago, pays a smaller revenue than it did before Confederation.

HON. MR. McINNES (B.C.)—What was your tariff then?

HON. MR. HOWLAN—Much lower than it is now; but even with that low tariff our revenue was larger than we are now credited with. The gentlemen who proceeded to England met the statements by counter-statements showing that the figures furnished by the Dominion Government were not correct. Sir Charles Tupper was also called upon by the Earl Granville to make a statement in answer to the delegates. He did so, and the delegates very easily answered it. Speaking of the allegation that the Dominion Government had not done all that they possibly could at the time, he states:

"Messrs. Sullivan and Ferguson admit, in a subsequent paragraph, that the Island has prospered, as they put it, 'notwithstanding the inaction of the Dominion Government.' This statement, in view of what has already been stated, may be left to take care of itself; but the object of their representation appears to be to secure the laying of a metallic subway across the Straits of Northumberland, through which railway communication could be effected, 'the cost of which undertaking,' Messrs. Sullivan and Ferguson say, 'would not exceed a sum which would not be unreasonable to ask the Government of Canada to expend.' If it can be shown that such a work is practicable, that it can be constructed for a reasonable outlay, and maintained without a large expenditure, the matter seems to be one that may fairly be placed before the Canadian Government for consideration."

That was the answer of Sir Charles Tupper on the 1st March, 1886, to the memorial of these gentlemen. Then Earl Granville, in his despatch to Lord Lansdowne, states:

"There seems to be reason for doubting whether any really satisfactory communication by steamship can be regularly maintained all the year round, which makes it all the more important that the proposed 'metallic subway' should receive a full and, if feasible, favorable consideration on the part of the Government of the Dominion.

"The establishment of constant and speedy communication by railwould be a great advantage, both to the Province and to the Dominion, and I should suppose that the development of the traffic on the Island railroads, and of the capabilities of the Province generally, would produce a large direct and indirect return on the expenditure.

"It would reflect great credit on the Dominion Government if, after connecting British Columbia with the eastern Provinces by the Canadian Pacific Railway, it should now be able to complete its system of railway communication by an extensien to Prince Edward Island."

Since that time we have had a survey across the Straits, which shortens the distance to six and a half miles, and at every one hundred and fifty feet of that distance borings have been made to test the character of the bottom. The plan which I have here shows the nature of the material through which the sub-way would have to go. It is not unlike the bottom of the St. Clair River at Port Huron. The bottom was bored and showed as follows, commencing at Carleton Head, P.E.I.:—

Distance from Shore.	Depth of Water.	Bottom of Strait.
¼ miles.	38 feet.	Soft sandstone rock.
½ "	44 "	do
¾ "	49 "	Red pipe-clay.

I alluded just now to the subway that is being built at Port Huron, and I stated that the length of that tunnel was about half the length of ours, but an opinion prevails that our tunnel would be too long—that it is impracticable; that no tunnel of such length is to be found anywhere in the world. I differ materially from those who take that view. I can show that there are tunnels nearly twice as long as this proposed subway. The following are the most important:—

			Miles.
"St. Gothard	tunnel		9½
Mont Cenis	do		7½
Areberg	do	(Austria)	6½
Hoosac	do	(Mass, U.S.A.)	5
Standege	do	(London and North-Western)	3
Box	do	(near Manchester)	3
Severn	do	(nearly)	5

" and 2½ miles of this has been constructed from 45 to 100 feet below the bed of the rapid flowing tidal estuary, offering engineering difficulties which make it the most remarkable tunnel in the world.

		Miles.
Nochestingo	tunnel	4½
Sutro	do	4
Reginal	do	3½
Nerthe	do	3
Blainy	do	2½
Thames and Medway	tunnel	2
Mersey	tunnel, including approaches	4½

" Another tunnel is now being contemplated in the Simplon Pass, 12½ miles."

It was the experience gained in combating water in the Severn tunnel that led to the adoption of the present mode of construction. Some ten or eleven years after Sir John Hawkshaw had tried to build it Mr. Walker's shield was used. Mr. Walker is well known in this country as the contractor who undertook to build the old European and North America road from St. John to Shediac, N.B. He went back to England and took up this question, and finally succeeded in completing the tunnel. I only make use of that to show that greater difficulties than we would have to meet have been overcome in other places and are being surmounted every day.

HON. MR. POWER—Is the work at Port Huron a subway or a tunnel?

HON. MR. HOWLAN—Both terms are used. Generally speaking, a tunnel is something built of stone and mortar; but those materials are not now used.

HON. MR. POWER—The point I want to get at is, whether the structure at Port Huron is built beneath the surface of the bottom of the river or whether it projects over it.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—Beneath the surface. So is the one at London that is now being built, the City and Southwark subway. A writer in the Graphic referring to it says:

"This new means of intercommunication between the city and South London is now rapidly approaching completon. The original Act (1884) empowered its construction from King William street, city, to the Elephant and Castle; but the company subsequently received permission to carry on the line to Clapham Road and Stockwell. The line is a double one; but each pair of rails is laid in a separate tunnel, the two tunnels, of course, running mainly in parallel lines. The city terminus is in King William street, near the monument. The railway is reached by a circular shaft, down and up which passengers will be conveyed by a hydraulic lift; or they can proceed by stairways, which are also provided. After passing beneath the Thames the successive stations are at Great Dover street, Elephant, New street, Kennington, Oval and Binfield road, Stockwell. Hydraulic lifts and stairways will be provided at all the stations. The total length of the line is three miles and a-quarter, and its two chief peculiarities are the great depth at which it lies beneath the surface and the employment of electric locomotives. Each engine weighs about ten ton: and the motor, which is of the Edison-Hopkinson type, takes the current from a conductor carried on the wooden sleepers between the rails of the line. The subway is lighted by electric glow-lamps; the brake used will be the Westinghouse automatic; and there will be a three-minute service each way of trains of three coaches, each capable of carrying thirty-four passenger. The line, of which a satisfactory trial was made on 5th March, is expected to be open for traffic early in the summer."

That is the description of the one they are now building. Hon. gentlemen may be surprised that I stick so persistently to this question. It is true that I am not an engineer, nor do I contend that my opinion is more valuable on such a question than the opinion of any other hon. gentleman in this House, but when such men as Mr. Walter Shanly tell me that this project is feasible—and he allowed me to use his name in saying so—when men like General McAlpine, General Newton, and others who have been consulted with regard to the harbor of Montreal and the harbor of Toronto—past engineers of the Institutes of England and the United States—say that this can be done for a certain amount, an amount which, in my judgment, is not outside the realm of practical politics, it is a reason why I am so persistent in urging this particular project. If it can be proved beyond any kind of doubt that this tunnel would cost $10,000,000 I do not think that I should be justified in asking the Government to expend $10,000,000; but if it can be done for $5,000,000, there is no reason why I should not urge it. Suppose it can be done for $5,000,000 it would not cost the Government of Canada one cent more than it is costing now to maintain the summer service and winter service, and the accessories belonging to it. It is proved conclusively that the Government have paid some $214,000 per annum for the performance of this service in a manner that is not satisfactory to themselves or to the public. That is the reason why I have asked that the matter should be submitted to a commission of engineers who are competent to judge in such matters. Outside of the abstract question that we are entitled to have the terms of Confederation carried out, I urge this scheme upon the economic ground that it is merely taking the same amount of money that we are now expending, and using it in a manner more satisfactory to the public. It may be said that we should not come here and ask for an expenditure of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 for a small Province like Prince Edward Island. I am not coming here with any such demand; I simply say that the terms made with Prince Edward Island ought to be carried out, and if I can point to a way in which they can be carried out without greater expense to the country than the present unsatisfactory system I am doing a service to the Government. That must be decided by engineers who are competent to investi- such a scheme and give an estimate with regard to it. We see that recently, with regard to the harbor of Montreal, the Government submitted the question to Mr. Walter Shanly, Colonel Gzowski and another engineer whose name, at the moment, I do not recollect. These gentlemen will make a report on the question, and no doubt the same gentlemen could also give a report on the proposed subway under the Straits of Northumberland, and some such course will have to be taken before the people of Prince Edward Island will be satisfied on this question. We have to-day the same summer service that we had nearly thirty years ago, and it s unsatisfactory, as members of the Government must know. If we had in this Chamber a Minister of Marine and Fisheries and a Minister of Finance they would, no doubt, be able to explain to the House why it is so; but we have not got them here, and therefore we must address the gentlemen who represent them here regarding this particular matter, and I contend that the service as it is performed at the present day is not satisfactory to the Government, nor can it be satisfactory to the Government. No Government like to have fault found continually with them, and much less should we in this branch of the Parliament of Canada, by any act of ours, cause any Province of the Dominion to continue to be dissatisfied. I have shown to the House by the memorials from the Government of Prince Edward Island from time to time that they are dissatisfied, and I have shown that they have gone to the foot of the Throne. I quite understand that it is a most unfortunate thing for me, as an advocate of this scheme, and unfortunate for the people of Prince Edward Island, that we have no sepresentative in the other branch of the Legislature supporting the Government. But that has nothing to do with the merits of this question. I am not guilty myself on that point; but it is, perhaps, an unfortunate matter, and it is to this branch of the Parliament of Canada that the smaller Provinces must look to have their rights guarded. That is the reason why I have been so persistent in following up this question from year to year. There are people who believe that the National Policy has not been of any use in Canada. There are others who believe it has. I know in the Maritime Provinces towns have been built up which have given a great deal of work to people living near them, and the commerce of the country has increased, and these towns are growing in population. We know also that Prince Edward Island has been unable to avail herself of the advantages that have been afforded to the other Provinces under the National Policy. We have no manufactures in our Province, and cannot have them, from the fact that we have no continuous communication with the outside world. If we had daily communication with the mainland our people would be able to establish industries and manufactories which they have not at present, and for want of which they necessarily suffer. You may as well say that if you sever one leg from the body that the pulsations of the heart could follow it, as to say that the pulsations of trade and commerce, and the enterprise which marked this Dominion, can extend to Prince Edward Island while she is isolated from the rest of Canada for so many months of the year. While we have fulfilled our portion of the contract made with the Dominion many years ago, no public works of any account have been done in our Province. It is continually stated that the Dominion has paid for the railway on Prince Edward Island. There is not one word of truth in that argument. Prince Edward Island entered into Confederation on a basis of 100,000 people, at $48 per head. The calculation was made up on the then existing debt of Canada, and also some $60,000,000 that were to be expended on the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and on that basis we took $48 a head, which amounted to $4,800,000. Out of that $4,800,000 the first year we paid for the cost of our railway $3,114,735. If we had not built the railway we would have had that amount to our credit to-day in the Dominion Treasury:—

"The several railways built by the Dominion in each Province, including the Intercolonial branches and extensions, but not the main line as originally constructed, cost as follows:

Quebec, including the purchase of the Rivière du Loup branch....	$5,520,323 26
New Brunswick.....	3,371,854 74
Nova Scotia.....	7,821,070 19
Total.....	$16,713,248 19

So that while the Dominion spent some sixteen millions since then in building railways in the other Provinces, less than $200,000 was spent in Prince Edward Island in building some thirteen miles of railway to connect the main land with Cape Traverse. We find no fault with that. We know also that some 96 miles of railway has been built across Cape Breton, at an expenditure of $3,000,000. We find no fault with that. We know that $175,000 a year for twenty years has been appropriated for building a ship railway at Chignecto. We find no fault with that, but we do think that our terms of union should be carried out. We have memorialized the Government and the Queen, and we have asked for consideration in every way. Now, with regard to the position we occupy toward the other Provinces—we are told: "You people in Prince Edward Island do not suffer." If we take the exports of Prince Edward Island, which form the basis of trade, as shown in the Blue-books, and enquire into what they are, we will find that Prince Edward Island is one vast farm. From the Census of 1881 I find that the products of the Province were:

Oats.....	$3,538,219
Potatoes.....	6,042,191
Turnips.....	1,198,817
Total.....	10,779,227
Horses.....	$ 25,182
Colts and fillies.....	6,158
Working oxen.....	84
Milch cows.....	45,895
Other horned cattle.....	44,743
Sheep.....	166,496
Swine.....	40,181
Wool.....	552,083
Honey.....	14,945

If we take one item, potatoes, we find how we are handicapped as compared with our brother farmers in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. Our farmers have to ship their potatoes at a season of the year when they are unfit for shipping, when the markets are overstocked and prices are low; whereas, the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick farmers can hold their potatoes until the markets want them. Hon.

members will see at once the disabilities which our people labor under in this regard. Turning to the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find the following to be the comparative exports of potatoes from the different Provinces for the year ended 30th June, 1888 :—

Provinces.	Bushels Exported.	Value Realized.	Average Price.
	Bushels.	$
Ontario	102,253	66,615	65·2 c. p. bush.
Nova Scotia	677,872	355,655	52·5 do
Maniba	99,858	47,059	47·1 do
New Brunswick	350,846	161,482	46·0 do
Quebec	169,845	76,507	45·0 do
P. E. Island	1,294,056	343,177	26·5 do
Total	2,694,730	1,050,495

1887.—Total export of starch, $1,229,399. Prince Edward Island exported $1,164,600, or 94⅞ per cent. of the above.

It will be seen from this comparison that Prince Edward Island gets less than one-half of what Ontario gets; less than one-half of what Nova Scotia gets; about half what Manitoba gets; about half of what New Brunswick gets, and about half what Quebec gets for her potatoes. To put the matter more forceably for her 1,294,056 bushels, Prince Edward Island does not get as much as Nova Scotia gets for 677,872 bushels. That cannot be otherwise, for want of proper communication with the mainland and the markets of the world. If our Province was tacked on to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and could ship every day with the same freedom that they can from St. John or Halifax, the exhibit would be largely in our favor. The result of the existing condition of affairs is that she now loses, for every head of her population, about $3, or $17.50 per family, on this one item of potatoes alone, for want of proper communication with the mainland. We are compelled in the fall of the year, in frost and snow, to ship our products, because we know, when our ports freeze up, we are shut out from the markets. And again in the spring of the year, when potatoes are high in the markets of the United States and in the neighboring Provinces, we cannot ship our produce from the fact that our harbors are frozen up. I have to-day a telegram from Summerside stating that there are nine vessels loaded there for market, and asking for assistance of the steamer Stanley to open the harbor, still frozen over. On every item of farm produce we find that we are at a disadvantage in our shipments as compared with the other Provinces. I know that it will be said in reply that the Dominion Government spend a large amount of money on postal service in Prince Edward Island. I admit that they do, and it is for the simple reason that while other Provinces have a population of only 4·72 to the mile, we have 51 to the square mile, and the expenditure for post office service is comparatively large. It looks large without investigation, but on enquiry it is found that our expenditure for postal service is not as great as in some other portions of the Dominion. The comparative expenditures for postal service in the different Provinces are as follows :—

Prince Edward Island—Population 108,891.

Expenditure	$ 50,682.31
Net revenue	31,390.83
Deficit	$ 19,291.48

British Columbia—Population 49,459.

Expenditure	$ 158,542.39
Net revenue	51,545.81
Deficit	$ 93,997.37

Manitoba—Population 65,954.

Expenditure	$ 286,554.77
Net revenue	151,658.49
Deficit	$ 134,896.28

New Brunswick—Population 321,233.

Expenditure	$ 280,109.99
Net revenue	142,342.82
Deficit	$ 137,767.17

Nova Scotia—Population 440,572.

Expenditure	$ 306,860.66
Net revenue	197,450.15
Deficit	$ 109,410.51

Quebec—Population 1,359,027.

Expenditure	$ 753,066.99
Net revenue	555,823.54
Deficit	$ 197,243.45

Ontario—Population 1,923,228.

Expenditure	$1,632,273.51
Net revenue	1,470,044.72
Deficit	$ 152,238.79

So that, as far as the expense of the post office is concerned, which is sometimes brought up against us as a great expenditure in Prince Edward Island, it is not proportionately as large as in some of the other Provinces. I am not finding any fault with the expenditure in other Provinces. I think it is perfectly right that they should have this postal service, but what I object to is hearing gentlemen say that the Dominion spend so much more in Prince Edward Island for postal service, which, on investigation, I find is not correct. I have stated that we were compelled for want of proper accommodation in the fall of the year to ship our produce at very inconvenient seasons. Speaking of the fall traffic, an article in a local papers says:

"In former days almost all our shipments of produce were made late in the fall or early in the spring; now we are shipping continually by steamers so long as navigation is open. Consequently, though the volume of our shipments is much larger than it was, the fall rush is usually (and naturally) not so great as it used to be.

"But the freight traffic of this fall is already taxing to the utmost the capacities of our steamers and sailing craft. The steamer at Summerside cannot take away the freight as fast as it offers, and quantities are every morning left on the wharf."

I only read this to show to hon. gentleman the difficulty in which we are placed with regard to our fall shipments. The reason why I suggest in my memoradum that the Government should adopt any other plan to carry out the terms of confederation is, that I am looked upon by some gentlemen as perhaps being rather a crank on this subway question; but if they derive any pleasure from thinking so, there are other cranks on this question as well as myself. We have had, this year, a Bill presented to Parliament for another way of getting to and from Prince Edward Island, by carrying cars over on steam barges. Another man from Halifax, named Way, has another means of getting over, and if the Government have still some other way to offer, it is well to let us know it. At any rate, there is a great deal of dissatisfaction existing amongst the people of our Province, and I may say that I speak here for the people of Prince Edward Island. I have held meetings all over Prince Edward Island, and if the resolutions passed at those meetings can be accepted as the views of the people, no one can come to any other conclusion than that they are a unit on this question. They do not look for impossibilities. All that they ask is the terms of Confederation—or some energetic plan to settle this grievance. If it was asked for by any one portion of the people it might not be so important, but it may be as well for me to inform the House that in the Legislature of the Island at present the Upper Branch is Liberal by a large majority, while the Lower House has a majority of Conservatives, and from these two branches, as, no doubt, the hon. gentleman who comes from one of them will be able to tell you, a unanimous memorial was forwarded to the Throne on this subject. That must show that the people of Prince Edward Island are entirely dissatisfied with the present arrangement. There is a certain class of our people who have confidence that the Government will take up the terms of union faithfully and carry them out; another class have joined the Opposition, and we have these two parties thrown into hostile camps almost evenly balanced. But supposing a strong Government secured office there, strong in the confidence of the people, all these memorials having gone before, what course do you think would likely be pursued? I have not the most remote doubt in my mind that a great deal of dissatisfaction would be expressed throughout the country, and no Government, I take it, wants to have dissatisfaction in the country; on the contrary, they are more desirous that peace, contentment and happiness should reign throughout the Dominion. Therefore, the sooner this scheme is investigated the better, and if it is found to be feasible and practicable we have a right to call upon the Government to carry it out. The people of Prince Edward Island are not a people who will readily give up what they consider are their rights, nor will they allow themselves to be bamboozled very long. The time will come when they cannot be satisfied with promises. I do not think the Government desire to bamboozle Prince Edward Island, but I cannot understand why some better arrangement has not been made for a steamboat service in the summer time—at any rate, a better service than we now have. I have not the least hesitation in saying that a better arrangement can be made, that it is time it was made, and that the people of Prince Edward Island expect that it shall be made. In the interest of Canada and of the people of Prince Edward Island this question ought to receive a solution in some way, so that hereafter we shall not be troubling this House year after year asking for redress.

It is not a pleasant duty for a man to have to urge this grievance Session after Session, or that I should be taking up the time of the House, almost repeating the same thing year after year, and I am sure that it is not pleasant for you to have to listen to it. It is here we have a right to come; the Senate was constituted as a guarantee that the rights of the smaller Provinces should be protected, and we have a right at any rate to ask for an investigation into this matter, and if the Straits of Northumberland cannot be tunneled for what may be called a practical sum, let some other course be taken to set the matter at rest; because there is in the minds of the people of Prince Edward Island a belief that this thing can be done, and that belief is supported by the opinions of gentlemen who are eminent as engineers. I am satisfied that if the Government felt that five millions of dollars would do this work they would take it up with confidence, but they have not investigated it. In England there is attached to the Imperial Parliament a Bureau of Engineers, and before you get a Bill through that Parliament you have to submit your scheme to them, and then when it comes before the Legislture the members have an estimate of the cost and a guarantee from an engineering standpoint that the work is feasible, practical and safe. In the United States they have also a bureau of experts, to whom such matters are submitted, but here every man is his own engineer. I do not ask this House to take my opinion as an engineer. I am not one, but I must have respect for the opinion of Walter Shanly, who has been an engineer all his life, and who successfully completed one of the greatest works on this continent—the Hoosac tunnel. If such an eminent engineer tells me that this scheme is feasible, surely I must believe him. I do hope the Government will see their way clear to sending the matter to a commission of engineers such as I have named, so that we may have an official report with regard to the practicability of doing this work. I am sorry to have trespassed on the time of the House so long. I am much obliged to the hon. gentlemen for hearing me so patiently, after bringing this matter so frequently before the House, but while I am here as the representative of Prince Edward Island my duty is to present the views of the people of that Province in a matter of so much importance.

HON. MR. KAULBACH—I do not rise to oppose the motion before the House, and I must say that the hon. gentleman has made great progress in this matter since he took it up. When he first approached this scheme, and showed us a model of his tunnel, everybody looked upon the scheme as visionary—in fact, even the members from Prince Edward Island looked upon it as impracticable, and gave very little attention to it. I do not think my hon. friend in his motion to-day is going far enough. The motion should not be only to ascertain the cost of this project, but its durability and its freedom from destruction or injury from any reasonable cause. I think that should be also included in the motion. And as far as that goes I should be in favor of it. The hon. gentleman has almost stood alone in this matter from the beginning. I know the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown (Mr. Haythorne) did not give it his full support, for my recollection of what he said was, that it would tend to detract from the efforts now being made to have more efficient steamboat communication with the mainland. My hon. friend says that when the "Northern Light" was found to be not altogether suitable another boat was put on, and was got largely upon the advocacy of all the hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island. The hon. member from Alberton struggled here to a large extent alone for a long time, but my friend at the head of the room has been gradually giving him aid in this matter. What he has done outside I do not know. We are told that because the representatives of Prince Edward Island in another branch of the Legislature have not been in harmony with the Government, therefore they have not had the weight and influence which they should have possessed; but I cannot see that they have ever put forth any efforts in the direction of asking for an appropriation to make an enquiry into the best means of establishing winter communication between the Island and the mainland. Therefore, I think my hon. friend has not been treated fairly. It strikes me as singular, if they considered this scheme feasible and desirable in the interests of the Island, that they would not ask for an appropriation to make the enquiry that has been suggested. The question arises whether, if this is granted, the terms of Confederation will have been complied with, because if we look at the terms as cited in this resolution, we find they are "To establish and maintain efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between the Island and the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial and the railway system of the Dominion." Now this steam service means steam navigation. Certainly it was not contemplated at that time to build this subway, and I think the Government has done a great deal towards improving the service across the Straits. My hon. friend says that the railway was not constructed at the expense of the Government but out of the grant given to the Island at the time of Confederation. That may be so, but my hon. friend should consider at the same time that year by year that Island Railway has had a deficit of $60,000 or $70,000 which the Dominion Government has had to pay. If this tunnel is to form a communication between the Island Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, then I believe that the construction of the tunnel would put a stop to the deficit and in that way would be an advantage. I will not disparage the advantage that this project may be to the Island. If it can be proved that it is not only practicable, but that the cost will not be too large, and that when built it will be durable, and not subject to destruction from any known cause, and if my hon. friend would strike out the second part of this resolution, I should support it most heartily, because I think everything practicable should be done to make the communication with the Island satisfactory. But the second part of the resolution says that we have not carried out the terms of Confederation with the Island, and I feel some difficulty about committing myself to that proposition. I hope my hon. friend will not press that portion of his resolution. I cannot support the conclusion that the terms of Confederation have not been virtually carried out—carried out in the spirit if not to the letter—carried out as far as practicable, and as far as the people of the Island at the time of Confederation contemplated they would be—carried out as far as the elements which surround the Island make it practicable to do so A large amount of money has been expended to provide steam navigation between the Island and the mainland. As I said before, my hon. friend has made great progress, and he should not be discouraged in his efforts. If he had approached the House in the same way that he has done now at the inception of his scheme I doubt if he would have been listened to; but he has made progress, and I hope his efforts will be crowned with success. It is in the interest not only of Prince Edward Island, but of the neighboring Provinces as well, that this tunnel should be built, if it can be constructed at a reasonable price, and can be made a permanent and durable structure. All these things should be considered in coming to a conclusion. The terms of union never contemplated anything further than to provide efficient steam navigation between the Island and the mainland. When we remember how the Island was situated before Confederation, that they had to pass between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse in little boats, and the mails were often interrupted for ten or twelve days at a time, we can realize the great improvement that has been effected by the Government. Although I am in favor of my hon. friend's object—that is, to get this board of engineers to ascertain whether the work is feasible or not—yet I am unwilling to vote for the second part of the resolution, which in effect says that the Government of the Dominion have not carried out the terms of union with the Island.

HON. MR. POIRIER—The resolution deals with two branches of the subject, first, the feasibility of constructing and maintaining the subway across the Straits of Northumberland, and second, any other plan which can be recommended to fulfil the terms of Confederation made with the Province of Prince Edward Island. The first part of the resolution has been thoroughly explained, and my hon. friend from Alberton deserves praise for the energy, intelligence and perseverance he has displayed in promoting this very important project. I will not deal with that question which has been so exhaustively discussed; I will only say that I fully agree with his conclusions, and if the scheme is feasible at all it should be adopted, because the difference it would make in the value of the crops and exports of the island would go far towards paying the interest on a very costly structure.

He says that his engineers guarantee the feasibility of the subway, and I have no doubt that they are correct; at all events, I am not in a position to contradict this statement. However, I believe that the great objection to the project is the cost of the work. I do not say that it should be regarded as an insurmountable difficulty, but I believe it is the main difficulty which the Government see in the way just now. The question being uncertain, I may be allowed to say a few words relative to the other part of the resolution, still admitting that the scheme of my hon. friend, if practicable within certain limits, is in my estimation the best: but if the Government should not decide to spend so large a sum of money as the undertaking involves, there are other schemes which may answer the purpose of fulfilling the contract made between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of the Island at the time of the union.. Not later than three or four months ago meetings were held at Shediac, N.B., and Summerside, P.E.I. The latter point is about the middle of the Island, and there is constant and active communication between Shediac and Summerside during the summer season. Meetings have been held this winter to petition the Government for an appropriation to dredge the harbor of Shediac a few feet deeper to enable the steamer "Stanley" and other vessels to maintain constant communication across the Straits throughout the winter. People who live in the vicinity of those places say that it is feasible to maintain such communication, and the Government should send competent engineers to report upon the subject. If it is feasible, while it will not furnish such complete communication as the subway would, it will go a great way towards fulfilling the terms of union. But there is another scheme which, while it does not involve so large an expenditure as my hon. friend's project, is, I believe, adequate to fulfil the demands of the Island, if it is feasible. It is the scheme embodied in the Bill which I introduced myself this Session for a steam ferry between Cape Richibucto and Cape Wolfe. Dr. de Bertram has that scheme on hand and has had engineers to report upon it. He has had preliminary surveys made and the engineers report the perfect feasibility of the project. They say that it is quite practicable to have ferryboats on that route which will carry a train of cars from the Island to the mainland and vice versa, not only in the summer season but also in the winter season, without interruption. Those views are corroborated by many persons who have studied the question. Three or four years before I left Richibucto and accepted a position here I visited the coast, and was told by persons residing there that the passage was clear the whole winter through, except a few days in the spring time. There is no tide in the Straits of Northumberland, and there is no difficulty in providing wharves on both sides for a reasonable outlay. There is a reef there, and, moreover, there is in winter hardly any bond ice, on account of the current, which runs in such a way as to leave a passage up to the shore free from ice at both ends. The distance between the two points is only twelve miles. At each end the water is sufficiently deep to permit vessels suitable for the service to approach near the shore, which will make the cost of constructing wharves very low. I wish now to give some testimony in support of what I have advanced. Dr. de Bertram had among other engineers one named Edwin E. Glaskin, employed to make the preliminary surveys of the work. I will now read some extracts from his report to show that the scheme is not by any means visionary and that it is approved of by competent engineers:

"As a result of my personal observations and the full and careful examinations which I have made on the shores of the Island and mainland, assisted and confirmed by the evidence collected from the keepers of the lighthouses, fishermen and others most capable of making correct observations, as well as the evidence laid before the Government by the Select Committee, I am convinced that there is not at any time during the winter sufficient ice at Cape Richibucto to obstruct daily communication between the Island and the mainland by properly constructed steamers having suitable piers provided for their accommodation.'

This view, says the engineer, was supported by a commission appointed by the Government, composed of Messrs. Prowse, Jenkins, Howlan and others. He gives an extract from their report, which I assume is correct:—

"It is possible to maintain constant communication between the Island and the mainland winter and summer—that there is always open water at the western end of the Straits—that there is never a day during the entire winter when there is not a clear channel across at the Capes (above mentioned) and that a steamer could make the passage any day in the year winter and summer."

HON. MR. PROWSE—Is that a statement to which my name is attached ?

HON. MR. POIRIER—I find the name of Mr. Prowse attached to it.

HON. MR. PROWSE—I never signed such a statement.

HON. MR. POIRIER—I said that I had not seen the report.

HON. MR. PROWSE—My name may have been attached to it, because in 1873 I was examined before a committee of the House of Commons in reference to this question, and my opinions are there given in their report. Of that engineer I know nothing, and have never met him, that I remember.

HON. MR. POIRIER—He does not say that he approached the hon. gentleman, but he says that this is the result of an examination made by a commission of which the hon. gentleman was a member. There was a priest at Richibucto, Mr. Carson, who writes as follows:—

"That the Straits never freeze, that the ice which comes from the north is broken up into small patches, and that between these scattered bodies there is always an open channel, where a steamer could pass without the slightest difficulty ; that a pier could be built 250 to 300 yards from the shore clear of the beech ice, where the depth will be from 18 to 20 feet—and that if such a vessel were to be put on this route it would be able to make regular trips every day in the year."

"We find that the heavy ice comes from the east and north-east down from the Straits of Belle Isle through St. George's Bay and becomes blocked or gorged at the Cape Tormentine and Traverse (a distance a little over 40 miles south-east from Cape Richibucto) and that which passes Cape Wolf is the light ice from the Gulf of St. Lawrence carried by the tides into Egmont and Halifax bays, where it remains until dissolved. The testimony on this point is unanimous, and therefore beyond dispute."

I will not take up the time of the House by reading any more extracts. This is sufficient to show that there is ground for the Government to study the question, to investigate the feasibility of establishing constant communication through the winter season, as well as through the summer, between those two points that I have mentioned. Dr. de Bertram is so convinced of the feasibility of the scheme that he is ready to invest large amounts of money himself to undertake the project. Of course, he would not undertake such a scheme if he saw that the Government were to favor some other enterprise which would be hostile to it; but the gentleman would be glad to know if the Government are willing to send engineers to examine the route. It is in the interests of Prince Edward Island and of New Brunswick, and I may say in the interest of the whole Dominion, which is required every year to meet a deficit on the Prince Edward Island Railway, which might be a paying road if the people of the Island had facilities for exporting their produce in the winter season. It would increase the revenue of the road sufficiently to enable the Government to collect a revenue equal to the expenditure. Several attempts have been made to establish communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, but a remarkable feature of such attempts is this: It appears that nature has provided that the proper place for such communications is at the west end, while the capitalists and gentlemen interested in the communication are located up towards the east, or have their interests in the east. Thus it happens that mostly all the efforts to establish communication have been made between Charlottetown and Pictou, or between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine. It strikes me, and everyone who has studied the question, that such were not the views or the designs of nature. That part of the island where the attempts have hitherto been made is blocked by heavy ice every winter, not only local ice, but heavy ice coming from the Atlantic by way of the Straits of Belle Isle and from the east generally. The reason of this is that that ice which is carried in by east winds, added to the local ice, forms jams, through which it is impossible for a steamboat of any power that the ingenuity of man could devise can get through. Moreover, the Bay of Pictou freezes very hard in winter, and that accounts for the "Stanley" being imprisoned there this last winter. At the other end of the Island the passage is clear, because no ice is to be found there, except local ice, and that place is almost constantly as free in winter as it is in summer, making it feasible, without having to struggle with such obstacles as I have mentioned, to have free communication between these two points in winter as well as in summer. Hon. gentlemen will understand that if a service by steam ferry boats can be established so as to carry loaded cars from one side of the Strait to the other, connecting the Prince Edward Island system of railway with the Intercolonial, and to have that service constantly maintained this will enable the Government to carry out not only the letter but the spirit of the terms of Union. I believe that the contract has been fulfilled to a certain extent as to the letter, but not perhaps as to the spirit of the terms of the Union. In having this project carried out, both the spirit and the letter will be fulfilled, and the Prince Edward Islanders would greatly benefit by it, because the result would be to enhance the value of their crops and produce by at least 25 per cent. Moreover, it would give satisfaction to a very interesting Province of the Dominion, which is a very desirable object to attain. I believe, therefore, that the Government should send competent engineers to examine and report upon the several schemes submitted for the keeping of constant communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—It seems to me that the proposal which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Poirier) has put before the House is not the one of which notice had been given, and I also think that the inhabitants of King's county would find it very inconvenient to send their produce to the markets of Nova Scotia by such a roundabout route. They would have to convey it first the length of the Island, then carry it across the Strait, and then take it eastward again to the markets on the mainland. That would at once set them against the scheme which the hon. gentleman has been advocating. If it were a case of shipping eggs and other produce in the spring of the year, when prices are high, it might be better to take them by the proposed route; but as an ordinary matter of commerce, I cannot think that it would be for the advantage of the people of King's county to depend solely upon the means of communication which the hon. gentleman has described in his speech. I think that the interests of Prince Edward Island are decidedly looking up at present. We have an excellent steamship performing her duties in a manner which we scarcely expected she could perform them, and although it is undoubtedly the case that she has had the advantage these two winters past of unusually moderate seasons, with very little accumulation of pack ice on the Nova Scotian shores, not having that great obstacle to contend against, she has been able to perform her winter service for these two winters past in a very satisfactory manner. But I quite agree with the statement that the hon. gentleman from Alberton made, to the effect that we cannot judge of all seasons by the two which have just passed by. They have been unusually mild, and with very little accumulations of ice. Consequently, they were very favorable for the operations of that ship, but we cannot expect that to be the case always. It is therefore necessary, in taking into consideration this important question of permanent winter communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, that means should be found which could be depended upon under all circumstances. My hon. friend certainly deserves great credit for the persistency with which he has advocated his subway scheme. When I first saw his model in one of the rooms of this Senate I certainly entertained serious doubts whether such a subway as that could ever answer the purpose intended, but it has since been improved upon in a way that leaves scarcely any difference between what is known as a subway and what is known as a tunnel. In fact, during his speech the hon. gentleman spoke of it indifferently as a subway or tunnel. He gave us a definition of what a subway was and what a tunnel was—that one lay on the surface only partially buried, and the other was entirely buried in the subsoil of any river or creek across which it was to go. The course the hon. gentleman has taken now is pretty nearly the same that I ventured to advocate when he first brought that question before this House, when the present Governor of Ontario was the leader of the Senate, and I certainly was not supported—I will not put it more harshly—by the leader of the Government. He said, in emphatic terms, that the Government would not undertake to assist this project in any way whatever. I told him I considered it was the duty of the Government to ascertain by a proper investigation by experts whether the scheme promulgated by my hon. friend from Alberton was practicable or not, and if it was reported to be feasible at any reasonable cost it was the duty of the Government, standing, as they did, pledged to establish daily steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, to undertake that work themselves. However, the Government declined any such responsibility and the scheme has hung fire from that time to this. In the meantime, we have had a select committee of the House of Commons, and I date the progress that has been made in the matter of communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland from the sittings and the report of that committee. The hon. gentleman from Alberton himself, the hon. gentleman who has recently taken a seat in the Senate, the present Governor of Prince Edward Island and myself, were called as witnesses before that committee. I put in a written memorial, and I am glad to say I can look back upon that memorial to-day with great satisfaction, because I see that the substance of it and of the evidence given by those gentlemen before that committee has been to a certain extent followed out by the Government, and, consequently, whatever little success has attended their efforts has been since they changed their course altogether, and instead of snubbing members of Parliament when they got up in this House or elsewhere to advocate the interests of their Province, they began to see that the members were right and the Government were wrong. I recollect there was a struggle for a considerable time to obtain a moderate concession while our only means of getting across the Straits in winter was by ice boats. It was only by a great and strong effort that we at last induced the Government, after the sitting of the committee, to build at each side of the Straits a boat house, in order that the craft we had to cross in should be water-tight and fit for the service they had to perform. Before that it was utterly impossible on the open bord ice to so patch up a damaged boat that she was fit for the service when next called on. This was one of the results of the Government changing their course and adopting the advice of competent experts and members of Parliament of both Houses. I think, further, that if they would pursue that course the probability is that they would meet with still further success. I look upon the "Stanley" as the result of advice given to the Government by various members of that committee. A competent person was sent to the north of Europe and to Scotland, and in a marvellously short time that vessel, whose services we so highly appreciate now, the "Stanley," was across the Atlantic ready to enter on her winter service here. Although it cannot be said that she is capable of performing it under all circumstances, yet she is an exceedingly useful and valuable vessel to our Province. With reference to the course the hon. gentleman has taken this evening with regard to calling on this House to recommend a certain piece of advice on the Government, I must point to this fact, that the idea originally contemplated by those who framed the conditions of Confederation was steam communication on the water and not steam communication under the sea. That is one very great difference. It is true we were glad to discuss and to consider the project of a subway or tunnel when we were almost hopeless with regard to getting across the Straits of Northumberland in the winter by means of steam, but I think the prospects of steam communication on the water are rather improving, while the subject of the subways and tunnels is still rather, I may say, very uncertain. I would prefer hon. gentlemen who desire to appreciate what the real difficulties of this project are to get out of the library a book called the "History of the Severn Tunnel." Now, that great river is very similar to the Bay of Fundy. The tides are exceeding high there, and run with great force and violence at times, and in order to carry on communication between the mining districts of Wales and the manufacturing districts of England it was necessary to carry the Great Western line of railway into Wales by a more direct course than they had been up to that time able to secure. Before the tunnel was constructed the ordinary way of connecting the English lines with the districts in Wales was by going round the head of the Severn, but that was a circuitous route, and caused a great deal of delay. With the energy which has characterized railway enterprise during the last few years it was natural that some such scheme as a tunnel should be formulated, and it was. It was commenced, I think, somewhere about 1870, but I am free to acknowledge that the first contract which was let for the purpose of building the tunnel was a complete failure. The water got in and completely filled the works, and the contractor was broken and obliged to abandon his contract. It remained in a hopeless state for several years, until the pressure of the times compelling the railway company to do something in this matter, they at last undertook to proceed with the scheme. I have a few extracts here which I made more than twelve months ago from the work to which I have alluded. I observe that the hon. gentleman from Alberton made some brief reference to this same work. On the 2nd of November, 1881, Mr. Walker, the engineer to whom the hon. gentleman alluded, received orders from Sir John Hawkshaw to go on with the whole of the works as rapidly as possible. He says:

"The contract had contemplated that for the first eighteen months only the works under the shoots——

I may explain to the House what the meaning of that term is. It is simply the channel of the River Severn, which may be represented as something like a sheet of paper doubled together, the top of the water being under the crease—

"should be proceeded with; but it took, as nearly as possible, twelve months from the date of signing the (2nd) contract to clear the works of water. Twelve months more had been used in completing the heading under the river, securing the old shafts, sinking the new ones, and commencing the brick work under the shoot and under the salmon pool."

It has been supposed that the principal difficulty of building this great work would be in passing under that bed of the Severn River, consequently when the second contract was entered on, directions were given that the grading should be, I think, 15 feet lower than had been originally contemplated, thus showing that the apprehension of the engineer was from the bursting in of the water under the tide way. It only shows the great uncertainty which prevails in any undertaking such as that proposed by my hon. friend, even though it should be reported on by competent engineers in our own country, or should those men who carried through the tunnel under the Severn be employed. It is almost impossible for any engineer to predicate what difficulties may be encountered. These engineers presumed that their difficulties would arise from the deep bed of the Severn River. They actually encountered scarcely any difficulties in that respect: but the difficulties they did encounter and which cost them in the course of the work immense sums of money to counteract arose from a different source. They arose from sources which we are likely to encounter if we undertake to carry the tunnel under the Straits of Northumberland; they arose from springs. Here is a description of one of the great springs that was met with. This is what the engineer says in his report in 1885, after he had proceeded very far with the undertaking:

"On opening out the full sized tunnel, the fissure through which the great spring had passed was found to follow a most erratic course. In one place it passed directly across the tunnel from side to side, nearly at right angles to the centre line of the work. At another place it passed from side to side in an oblique direction, running for some small distance directly under one of the side walls. At another point where the tunnel had been perfectly dry, while the mining was done, the lifting of almost the last stone out of the invert set free an immense body of water which no pumps underground could cope with. At another point the water burst up from a hole 18 feet deep under the invert with such force that stones the size of a man's fist dropped into the water would descend into the water about 10 feet, and then begin to flutter like a leaf in the wind, and be thrown out again by the water."

Hon. gentlemen must see that it is by no means easy even for a most experienced engineer to be sure what impediments he will meet with in working under water. These gentlemen, experienced as they were, formed no idea of the difficulties they would have to encounter in meeting this spring. They anticipated that their difficulties would be from the salt water from the channel of the Severn. They met no difficulty there, but they did meet very great difficulty elsewhere. I have here a statement of the amount of water that they had to handle. The report says:

"The minimum quantity of water pumped when dealing with the big spring was 23,000,000 gallons daily; the maximum quantity was 30,000,000 gallons daily. For more than a year the average quantity pumped daily was 24,000,000 gallons."

But after all, a statement as to so many millions of gallons gives one a very inadequate idea of the amount of water represented by it, and accordingly the author of that work has elucidated it still further by this statement:

"To give an idea of this immense quantity of water, it is sufficient to supply a town of the size of Liverpool or Manchester, and in one year would form a lake 1000 acres in extent and 10 yards deep."

There was no more appearance of that spring when the work was undertaken, perhaps not so much as there is at the Straits of Northumberland, and hence it is that great caution should be exercised before the Government undertake a work in which they are likely to meet with such formidable difficulties.

HON. MR. ABBOTT—Could my hon. friend state the cost of the Severn tunnel?

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—I think it cost about £3,000,000 sterling. I have endeavored to shorten my statement as much as possible, partly because I have a very bad cold, and partly because this House is getting wearied. The length of that tunnel is 7,000 yards, against some 11,000 or 12,000 yards across the Straits of Northumberland. I do not want to throw difficulties in the way of my hon. colleague; I would rather help him, but I do not think I could help him in the way I wish to do if I did not give full expression to the difficulties which such undertakings are always subject to. I know myself that springs are quite common, particularly on the shores of the Island. I know from experience, on the Cape Tormentine side, you may see them at the railway stations. In the corner of one of the waiting rooms is a living spring which empties into a barrel, and there is a little hotel near the railway station where I have taken my meals, and there I found another spring boiling up in the same way, and it is a matter of probability that considerable difficulty may be found in this work from springs. I think the hon. gentleman has taken a fair and wise course. If the Government can find engineers accustomed to hydraulic work, and willing to undertake a survey, and report on this scheme, it would be a reasonable guide to us as to whether the thing was within the bounds of practicability or not. If it should prove to be so, we could then fairly press the Government to go on with this tunnel, providing other means should fail altogether. But I have to point out, before I leave this subject, that up to the present day no attempt has yet been made to navigate the Straits by steamship. The "Northern Light" made one or two attempts to navigate the Straits in winter, but hers was a course through the worst part of the Straits, and besides she was entirely unfitted for such work. She drew too much water, and could not get within easy distance of shore, so that I do not attach much importance to that experiment. I do not suppose the "Stanley" is very well adapted for such service either. She is very well adapted for the purpose she was intended. We have before us the fact that a stretch of fresh water a few hundred miles from us has been navigated successfully in the winter by a steamship. I have been unable to ascertain full information of the daily running of the "St. Ignace" in the Straits of Mackinaw, but I have here a statement which appeared in one of the illustrated newspapers at the time that vessel was about to commence the undertaking. I may say that I have crossed the Straits of Northumberland a great many times myself, and I have seen those Straits under almost every possible phase of their winter appearance. I have seen them when they were nearly clear of ice. I have seen them when they were covered with lolly from one side to the other; and I have seen them when the pan ice was so glare and smooth that all the men had to do was to run along with the boat almost without effort. I have seen it also when the ice was so thin that it actually bent under the weight of the boat and passengers as they were hauled along for miles together. With that experience I think I am entitled to offer an opinion as to the possibility of a steamer crossing those Straits in the winter, and I believe honestly and fairly that a steamship designed and built expressly for that purpose, and no other, would keep communication open all winter. I dare say the time will come when the increase of trade between the island and the mainland will be so great that public opinion will call for something more convenient, something which will cause less exposure to the weather than a winter passage over the ice—quite possibly within the next decade or so, and a demand may spring up for a tunnel, or a sub-way as the hon. gentleman pleases to call it. But if the report of the commissioners were in the hands of the Government today I think there would necessarily be a long interval during which the building of that tunnel would be proceeding. It would take perhaps as long to finish it as to build the Severn tunnel. It would perhaps meet with difficulties and obstacles as great, or very similar to what were met with in the case of the Severn tunnel, and therefore during all that period the island would be fairly entitled to have its produce and passengers and mails carried backwards and forwards in some way more convenient than by means of the small ice boats when the bord ice forms off the island and prevents vessels from performing the service there. I do not intend to put forward my own ideas very forcibly on this question. I will take the opinions of a gentleman who was examined before a Parliamentary committee—in fact, he was a member of the House of Commons and had been unseated. During the time he was in the House he asked for a committee, and the committee was granted. This was the evidence of Dr. John Jenkins, an intelligent man, who had seen not a little of the world elsewhere than in Prince Edward Island. He had been amongst the first men in the local House of Assembly to enquire into this matter of winter communication, and he was accordingly called as a witness before the Parliamentary committee. I will first give his opinion with regard to the ice. He would not take it for granted that the ice which we generally find our way over in the winter was anything like as thick or as heavy as it had been represented. He says that men travelling over pan ice and their boats following them, with little effort, can form a very inadequate idea of the thickness of the ice. Unless a special examination were made and recorded he would not take it that the pan ice was too formidaable to be overcome by a steamship properly constructed. After having cleared away the formidable character of the ice that had been anticipated, he says with regard to a steamship passage of the Straits:

"Therefore, I think if we are ever to acquire daily communication between the Island and the mainland in winter, it will be by having a steamer built solely for the purpose, and for no other. I think it would be well for the committee to divest their minds of any opinion they may have formed as to the capability of the steamer, and not to judge the steamer of the future by the performances of those of the past or present; because I consider a steamer can be built that will just as far outstrip the performances of the "Northern Light," as the magnificent Cunard steamers which now cross the Atlantic surpass the little steamer that half a century ago passed down the Clyde for the first time."

Now, I think if Dr. Jenkins was here we should be able to offer him our congratulations on his foresight in making that statement. I agreed with him myself, and have often expressed my sentiment in this House, and I think before that committee, that I trusted to the progress of inventive science to overcome a great many of the difficulties we had to encounter. At that time the project of the hon. gentleman from Alberton for a subway was scarcely known—at all events, it was not very much thought of, and we still trusted to the possibility of navigating those straits by steam. I will just trouble the House with a statement which I took from the New York Daily Graphic at the time it appeared, in April, 1888. It was just at the time the steamer "St. Ignace" was about to make her first trip, and her work was to be done at the Straits of Mackinaw, with a view to keeping open communication between two railway termini, where it was found that ordinary steamers had their powers taxed too severely in breaking the pan ice. It must be observed that this fresh water ice is very much harder and more difficult to deal with than salt water ice, apart from the question of the tides. The article states:

"Ever since the construction of the Detroit, Mackinac and Marquette Railroad, which brings into closer commercial union the upper and lower peninsulas of Mackinac, the problem of a winter crossing at the Straits of Mackinac has given railway men and marine engineers a great deal to think about. Crossing with teams was at first the only method, but it was fraught with much danger and discomfort. A few years ago the steamer "Algoma" was constructed to force a passage through the ice, but although she did satisfactory work in thin ice, the heavy 'windrows,' piled up by late autumn gales, proved to much for her powers. These 'windrows' are formed of broken ice piled one lump above another, until the mass reached to a depth of twenty feet under the surface, and often as high above the level of the water. It often happens that these masses ground near the shore, and it is impossible to effect a passage through them. * * * The new steamer "St. Ignace" a picture of which is presented in the Graphic of to-day (6th April, 1888) has been built to overcome the 'windrow' difficulty. In addition to the usual propelling engine and screw at the stern, she is furnished with a heavy propellor at the bow, about six feet below the surface. It is expected that the forward screw will enable her to tear a passage through the 'windrows;' it will lessen the lumps of ice which will be carried aft by the current and forced action of the propelling engine. Each screw is driven by an independent engine of great power, and the whole steamer is constructed in the strongest possible manner. She is 235 feet long, 52 feet beam, and 25 feet deep, and will carry ten freight or eight passenger cars, half the number on each side of a thin cabin situated amidships. The steamer leaves Detroit in a few days for Mackinac, and her success or failure will be watched with much interest by marine men."

I subsequently saw, and I think on a former occasion I read, an account to this House of her first performance, which was eminently successful. I cannot say what kind of success she has met since, but the first experiment clearly demonstrates the accuracy of Dr. Jenkin's estimate when he says that the steamer of the future is likely to far excel the best of the steamers that we have to-day. I remember also that in the course of the evidence which I think is to be found in my own memorial, that I certainly did not think it incumbent upon me to expect that a member of the Government holding the position of Minister of Marine should be competent in his own person to deal with every contingency which may arise in the course of his official business, but I pointed out, and I am very glad to say I think he and his successors have availed themselves of the hint, that what they could not do themselves they had authority to employ assistants to do for them. That was the course adopted by the Government, and I rejoiced when I found that they had recourse to that expedient in the matter of carrying out these conditions. A competent marine gentleman, Captain McElhinney, was despatched to the north of Europe, and by his skill and experience he was enabled to design and to carry out to perfection the steamer we have all approved of so much, and I cannot help thinking that before the Government involve themselves in any entanglement in regard to building a tunnel under the Straits of Northumberland, that it would be wisdom for them to ascertain, by having recourse to the same means and sending experts to enquire into the performance of this winter steamer in the Straits of Mackinac, whether such a steamer as that could not be trusted to navigate the Straits of Northumberland in the winter season. I read that extract because I was persuaded that it presented to the mind of every gentleman who has lived near the Straits, as I know my hon. friend from Wallace has, and my hon. friend from New London who has also crossed it a good many times, and they could not avoid seeing that that is a description even of a more formidable crossing than an ordinary crossing of the Straits of Northumberland, because to a large extent the obstacles which render that crossing difficult would be no obstacle to a steamer such as this upon the Straits with ice such as I have described. Therefore all these points make greatly in favor of a steamer doing our work properly. I would impress still further on the Government the fact which I have urged upon them before, that the experiment has never been tried. Considering the probability that if a tunnel or subway is undertaken, the time during which it will be in progress, and the difficulties which may be encountered in doing so, render it essential in the interests of the Island that some better means than the ice-boats should be found for crossing the Straits in the winter. I would point to this circumstance that the mails, when the boat service is well organized, and they make quick passages, are now delivered in Charlottetown several hours earlier in the day by that route than they are by sending them on to Georgetown, and carrying them across in the Stanley. This is a point which makes in favor of crossing at the capes. But I have this much further to say in regard to it before I sit down, and I must apologise to the House for the time I have occupied, that something is still due to the Island, not only because, as my hon. friend has stated, of the large amount of Dominion capital which has been expended in building interoceanic lines for the Provinces generally, with which Prince Edward Island is identified to the extent of one-fortieth part, but the trade which we had before we entered Confederation has been annihilated by the policy which has been adopted. It has had this undoubted effect on Prince Edward Island; it has destroyed our old trade with British ports, a trade which was conveyed in our own ships for the most part, and returned it almost to our own doors. That trade has been annihilated, and we are not in a position to avail ourselves of any advantages which we are offered as indemnity for that loss, because we cannot get across those Straits with regularity in winter. It is for that reason, I say, that it is essential, even though the Government should take hold of the proposal of the hon. gentleman from Alberton, that they should obtain a favorable report as to building the subway or tunnel, that something should be done during the interim that must unavoidably elapse before that tunnel could be in operation, and the interests of Prince Edward Island demand that an improvement in the service in the Straits should be provided for in that interval.

HON. MR. PROWSE—I look upon the question before the House as being one of the greatest importance to Prince Edward Island that could possibly come before Parliament, and I think also that it is one of very great importance to the Senate of the Dominion of Canada as well. You are aware that Prince Edward Island did not enter the Union at the time of the Confederation of other Provinces. That was a Union which took place in 1867, and although the first meeting, as I said on a former occasion, to bring about that Union, took place in Prince Edward Island, yet the terms then proposed on which to effect the union were not considered applicable and acceptable to the people of that Province, and the consequence was that the Union took place between Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, while Prince Edward Island did not come into the Union until six years afterwards, in 1873. It was well known, however, not only to the Dominion of Canada at that time, but also to the people of Prince Edward Island, that it was the earnest desire of the whole people of this Canada of ours, as well as the desire of the British Government and the British people, that a Confederation of all the British Provinces should take place, and overtures were repeatedly made and efforts put forth to induce not only Newfoundland, but Prince Edward Island also, to enter the Union from 1867 to 1873. In 1869 I think was the first time that a proposition came to the Island embodying the terms which are now under consideration. and I think it is well worth considering a little closely the peculiar wording of the terms of Union embodied in the resolution of my hon. friend from Alberton. Before doing so I may say, however, that one of the reasons why Prince Edward Island did not enter into the Union with the other Provinces was principally owing to her isolation. We said we had in Prince Edward Island a people as intelligent, as well qualified, and as strong armed as any in the rest of this Dominion, but owing to our isolation for half the year, being cut off from the markets of the other Provinces, it is impossible for Prince Edward Island to enter into the race with the other Provinces while this barrier is in the way. In 1869, the Dominion Government offered to remove this barrier, in the terms of Union now under consideration. I wish to call the attention of this House to the peculiar wording of the terms, and I was a little surprised and sorry to hear my hon. friend from Charlottetown state, for the first time in my recollection, that those terms simply meant steamship communication, or communication by water. I can remember long enough back to recollect when these terms first came to Prince Edward Island, and I can understand the circumstances under which they were offered by the Government of the Province at that time. My hon. friend was leader of the Provincial Government at that time and he and his colleagues found themselves getting rather under water and they came to the Dominion Government and asked for admission to the Confederation. They came to the Island and offered the terms that had been agreed upon to the people of the Island, and these were part of the terms. Very honestly and very properly the Government did not attempt to carry out the Union without submitting the terms to the people. They appealed to the people and I contested a constituency in opposition to the terms that those gentlemen had negotiated, because I did not believe that they were sufficient for the Province. I never heard during that campaign, and I have never heard up to this time, that the terms referred to here meant simply and solely communication by water. It is the first time that it has ever been stated in Prince Edward Island or here, but whatever the hon. gentleman's opinion may have been, or whatever may have been the opinion of his colleagues, I take it that it does not bind the people of Prince Edward Island. We must take the terms as they were submitted to the people and examine them as they are. There is not one word in them about water communication. They knew perfectly well or ought to have known that it was impossible to maintain efficient and continuous communication by water in the winter season.

HON. MR. POWER—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that these terms of Union that were originally agreed upon were not accepted by the people—that the Government was defeated. Did the hon. gentleman when he made his terms of Union understand that the communication was to be by means of a tunnel or subway?

HON. MR. PROWSE—If the hon. gentleman will wait he can have an opportunity to reply afterwards. The people of the Province did not accept the terms negotiated by my hon. friend, and they returned a party to power which negotiated better terms with the Dominion Government. I may say, however, that there was no change made in this particular part of the terms.

HON. MR. HAYTHORNE—The first proposal to give Prince Edward Island steam communication all the year round occurred in 1869. That was at the period when what are called Better Terms were proposed. Subsequently, when the same Government came to Ottawa on a deputation, other terms were proposed which were accepted, and when the Government went to the country they were defeated.

HON. MR. PROWSE—That is what I have just been stating. Now, let us see what the offer is, because I take it we are bound by the terms as they appear in the Act of Union and not by the opinions of those who negotiated them.

It being 6 o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

HON. MR. PROWSE resumed his speech. He said: Just previous to recess I was about to give my views of the literal and common-sense way in which I read the terms of Union embodied in the resolution now before the Senate. In my opinion it does not necessarily follow that the words "steam service" mean communication by steamship. I have no fault to find with the words in the terms of Union. They are comprehensive enough to include communication by steamship or any other way in which steam can be applied for the purpose of accomplishing the object in view. It is guaranteed that we shall have established and maintained an efficient steam service. Now, I like the term "efficient" in connection with this service. I take it that means effectual or something that causes effects. Now, what is the effect that is sought for in the terms of Union? It is steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between the Island and the mainland, winter and summer—efficient steam service for the purpose of placing the Island in continuous communication with the mainland. "Continuous" is another word that is acceptable to me as an Islander. No better word could be used there, because if the service is not continuous it would be no better than it was before, but it indicates such communication as the other Provinces enjoy—placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion. That is, I take it, really to have continuous communication with those railways not only for the conveyance of mails and passengers but for the ordinary trade and commerce of the country, so as to give us the same privileges and advantages for trade as the other Provinces enjoy between themselves. The objection may be raised against this contention that we have slept upon our rights, that we have not been as energetic in pushing for our rights in this respect as the importance of the question really demands; but I think I can show that we were justified, to some extent at all events, for the way we have deferred pressing our claims unduly up to the present time. I may say further in reference to the terms, that it appears to me that the gentlemen who penned that clause of the terms of Union and agreed to it were not themselves fully satisfied as to the way that those terms should be carried out. No doubt it was in their minds at the time that it might be done by navigation, but the terms are so worded that if they failed to do it in that way they would accomplish it some other way, and I think they were justified in coming to that conclusion. It was not unreasonable to expect that tunnels might be built of that length to connect one portion of land with another. Only a short time ago a project was started in England to have railway communication between England and France by a sub-way or tunnel, and there were two companies fully prepared to carry out that undertaking. A good deal of preliminary work was accomplished by one of those companies at least, and was only put a stop to by the British Government interfering and saying that it should not be done. With reference to the unforeseen difficulties that might arise in the way of springs of water, referred to by my hon. friend from Queen's County, I wonder that the hon. gentleman did not go further and say that this subway might be destroyed by an earthquake. There is no enterprise that a man can enter into that is free from such unforeseen difficulties. The farmer might as well say that it would be useless for him to sow his grain, because he does not know whether Providence will send him sunshine and showers to give him a harvest. We have to face those difficulties in every undertaking in life, and I do not think there is any greater difficulty in the way in that respect considering the magnitude and importance of the question, than there is in many other matters that people undertake. Reference was made to the difficulties encountered in building the tunnel under the Severn; the great difficulties experienced by the engineers in that undertaking will help us in this matter, because we can profit by their experience. They know better now than ever they did before how to overcome difficulties of that kind. I stated that there were some good and sufficient reasons why the Local Governments and the Province as a whole did not unduly press their claims up to the present time. In the first place, it was an untried scheme. For the first year or two the Government only placed on the route a boat offered to them by some gentlemen in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and she was found, after a year's trial, to be totally unfit for the service. Then the Dominion Government bought a steamer which was under construction at the time, intended, I think, for the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence. She was completed and called the "Northern Light" and placed on the route. The people gave them an opportunity to test the capabilities of that steamer and see if she could accomplish the work. She did good service, but it was demonstrated from the first that she did not fulfil the terms of Union and was not satisfactory on the whole. Then came the great undertaking of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, which taxed the resources of the Dominion, and we know that the Government of the day was handicapped and opposed by the great monopolies of the world. It took men of great minds and strong resolution to overcome all the difficulties they had to face in building that railway, and it would have been ungenerous on the part of the Island to press their claims on the Government while their hands were full with an important work. Then, when the railway was completed, they had another difficulty almost as great, the rebellion in the North-West. During that time the Island did not press on the Government the claims of the Province in this regard, but in 1881 they began to agitate this question. They brought it to the notice of the Dominion Government by an Address passed by both branches of the Legislature in the Session of 1881, which was acknowledged by the Dominion Government. They did not promise to undertake the work, they did not ask that a tunnel should be built or that a better steamer should be put on the route, but simply that the terms of Union should be carried out. In response to that address the Government of Prince Edward Island received the following reply, dated the 16th of April, 1881:—

"OTTAWA, 16th April, 1881.

"SIR,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch of the 7th instant, enclosing a Joint Address of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of the Province of Prince Edward Island, in reference to the establishment and maintenance of steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between that Province and the mainland.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"EDOUARD J. LANGEVIN,
"Under Secretary of State."

The next step taken by the Government of Prince Edward Island was to cause a despatch to be sent by the Lieutenant Governor of that Province, dated the 28th February, 1882, calling the attention of the Dominion Government to the address that had been passed by the Legislature of the Province the previous Session, which was acknowledged on the 8th of March, 1882, in the following words:—

"OTTAWA, 8th March, 1882.

"SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch, No. 9, of the 28th ultimo, requesting a reply to the Joint Address of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of the Province of Prince Edward Island, passed during their last Session, respecting continuous communication between that Province and the Mainland Provinces of the Dominion.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"EDOUARD J. LANGEVIN,
"Under Secretary of State."

Next came on the 31st January, 1883, a minute of the Executive Council, the last clause of which I will read, showing that the Island Government were fully alive to the rights of that Province to a fulfilment of the terms of Union. The last clause is as follows:—

"The Council in Committee feel that the Government of Canada are justly chargeable with a most serious violation of the terms of Union in this respect; they desire, once more, to bring the matter prominently before Your Excellency in Council, with the earnest hope that the ensuing Session of Parliament will not be allowed to pass without the adoption of effective measures for the immediate fulfilment of the Terms of Confederation; they request that they may be furnished with a reply to the Address of the Council and Assembly herein referred to, as well as to this Minute, in sufficient time to submit the same to the Legislature of this Province, at the approaching session thereof. Should the Dominion Government fail to comply with the just request of this Province, its Government will be reluctantly compelled to lay the grievances complained of at the foot of the Throne, and to appeal for redress to Her Majesty the Queen, as one of the parties to the Articles of Confederation."

During the same year a delegation was sent from the Province to wait on the Dominion Government and to urge the claims of the Province. After the delegation had returned on the 27th March they caused a telegram to be sent to the Dominion Government asking for a reply to their several Addresses and Minutes of Council. The telegram is as follows.

"CHARLOTTETOWN, 27th March, 1883.

"To the Secretary of State, Ottawa :

"Required immediately to lay before the Legislature now in Session, Dominion Government's answer to Joint Address of Legislature of April, 1881, relative to steam communication with mainland, and also to Minute of Council of January last upon the same subject.

"T. HEATH HAVILAND,
"Lieutenant Governor."

To this they received a reply stating that the subject was under consideration. Now we gained an important step in that communication. We had the assurance given us then for the first time that this matter was under the consideration of the Government. On the 18th April, 1884, the Legislature passed a second Address, and I may say that although party spirit runs high in the Island, these Addresses were passed unanimously by both political parties in the Legislature. On a question of this kind they were united as one man. The answer to this second Address is dated the 24th April, and is as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 24th April, 1884.

"SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Despatch No. 8, of the 18th instant, transmitting, in order that the said may be laid before His Excellency the Governor General, a Joint Address from the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island, on the subject of an efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between that Province and the Mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, and to state that this matter will receive due consideration.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"G. POWELL,
"Under Secretary of State."

Following that there was a Minute of Council passed on the 20th February, 1885, which was acknowledged on 6th March, 1885, and the same expression is used, that it will receive due consideration. In the Session of 1885 an Address was passed by the Legislature to Her Majesty the Queen, in which the whole question is so concisely put that I will venture upon the time of the House to read it. The Address is as follows:—

"To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty :

"MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,—We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island, in General Assembly convened, humbly approach your Majesty and represent that :

"1. Prince Edward Island entered the Confederation of the Dominion of Canada upon the 1st July, 1873, on certain terms and conditions set forth in the Order of Your Majesty in Council, dated 26th June, 1873, and of which terms the following is one :—'The Dominion Government shall assume and defray all the charges for the following service, viz. :—Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers, to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion.'

"2. During no winter season since the time of the said Union has the service provided by the Dominion Government been efficient, or the communication with the mainland continuous.

"3. The Dominion Government having shown no sufficient disposition to fulfil their obligation towards the Island in this matter, we are reluctantly compelled to approach Your Majesty, as one of the parties to the articles of Confederation, and pray Your Majesty's intervention to obtain for us that justice to which, as a Province of Canada, we are entitled by the terms of Union.

"4. Prince Edward Island is separated from the mainland Provinces of Canada by the Strait of Northumberland, and during the winter season, which generally begins about the first of December and lasts until the end of April, the harbors and rivers are frozen, while the passage of the Strait is impeded, though at no time wholly prevented, by floating ice. Previous to the Union the only connection with the mainland during winter was by means of ordinary boats, dragged across the drifting ice and propelled by oars through the stretches of open water between Cape Traverse and the Island, and Cape Tormentine in New Brunswick—a distance of nine miles.

"5. During the first winter after Confederation (1873-74) no attempt was made by the Dominion Government to provide such steam service. During the two subsequent years (1874-75, 1875-76) an old wooden steamboat, which had for years been engaged in ordinary navigation, but without a single qualification to fit her for the winter navigation of the Strait, was placed upon the route between Georgetown, one of the Island ports, and Pictou, in the Province of Nova Scotia; and, as was to be expected, she utterly failed in the service required of her. At the commencement of the winter of 1876-77 a new steamer called the "Northern Light" was placed upon this route. This steamer was not constructed for the service, but was designed for another purpose, and therefore her work can be regarded only in the light of an experiment.

"6. The service performed by the "Northern Light" has been most unsatisfactory, her trips being irregular and the accommodation she afforded has been neither continuous nor efficient. According to the official returns for the last four years, there has been an average in each winter of sixty-four days during which she has been entirely laid up. Nor does this furnish any idea of the irregularity of her trips before she entirely ceased running in each of these years, but only of the continued period when she was laid up and inoperative. At times she has been ice-bound for periods ranging from ten to twenty-four days, to the imminent danger of passengers and mails. Upon one occasion, four years ago, some of the passengers —among them women and children—were forced, after remaining on board several days, to leave her and walk a distance of many miles to the shore, when night overtaking them they received injuries from cold and exposure which resulted ultimately in the death of one of the party.

"7. During the time when the "Northern Light" is laid up the people of the Island are obliged to resort to the old method of crossing between the Capes (Traverse and Tormentine) already described, a route attended with many hardships and great danger. In the month of January last a party of twenty-two persons were detained on the ice for two days and one night in an attempt to make the passage, when they suffered most severely from cold and exposure—the majority of them being badly frozen—and several have since suffered amputation of their limbs as a result of the injuries then received.

"8. One of the principal inducements held out to the people of this Island to enter the Confederation, was the promise contained in that clause of the terms of Union quoted at the opening of this memorial, and they naturally expected that a union with the Dominion would bring them uninterrupted communica ion at all seasons of the year with the rest of Canada and the world. They believed that they would, therefore, enjoy equal facilities for intercourse with the other Provinces as those Provinces enjoyed between themselves, and that thenceforth they would participate in many benefits and advantages accruing from the Intercolonial Railway and other public works upon the mainland, from which they had previously been debarred for a great portion of the year. Cut off, as they had always been for nearly five months of the twelve, from all communication with the mainland, except by a most uncertain and dangerous route, the promise of continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion was, indeed, a strong incentive to them to surrender their self-government and unite with Canada.

"9. The inconvenience and loss which they have suffered in consequence of the failure of the Dominion Government to provide them with the efficient communication promised, are incalculable, while the disappointment to their reasonable expectations has not tended to enhance, in their estimation, the value of a connection with the Dominion, but on the contrary, has awakened a feeling of discontent which, though a matter of regret, is not unnatural under the circumstances. Were it only the transport of freight and merchandise that were stopped during the winter, they would have good reason to complain of being precluded from the benefits of the Intercolonial and other railways which their more fortunate neighbors on the mainland enjoy; but their chief grievances is that, in direct violation of the solemn compact upon which they entered Confederation, and to which Your Majesty was graciously pleased to be a party, the Dominion Government have not provided that efficient or continuous means whereby mails and passengers can be transported to and from the mainland.

"10. The people of this Province, we submit, have just grounds of complaint at the inaction of the Dominion Government, and at the extraordinary apathy which has been shown in regard to the interest of this Island, in the matter of communication with the mainland. Nine winters have passed since the "Northern Light" was first placed on the route, and, notwithstanding the fact that her inefficiency for the service was apparent from the outset, no other steps have been taken to fulfil the terms of Union. From the time the "Northern Light" ceases running until she again resumes her trips, a period averaging, as already mentioned, sixty-four days each year, the Post Office Department transmits the mails by the route between Capes Traverse and Tormentine, and during this period in each year, the Dominion Government have, at no time since Confederation, made any provisions whatever, for the transport of passengers, who are forced to make such arrangements as best they can for crossing to and from the mainland. This unaccountable neglect on the part of the Government of Canada is the most direct violation of the terms of Union which we are called upon to represent to Your Majesty. Moreover the Dominion Government have established no communication between the Intercolonial Railway and Cape Tormentine, so that travellers are compelled in passing between these points, to drive in open sleighs a distance of forty miles, in the coldest and most stormy portion of the year. Between Cape Traverse and the line of the Prince Edward Island Railway, a distance of about twelve miles, railway connection has been opened, and that but partially only this winter, although provided for by Parliament three years ago.

"11. The derangement of business consequent upon the irregularity of the mail service, when for many days at a times no communication is had with the rest of Canada, exercises a most prejudicial effect upon the interests of the Island. The hardships of travelling, which only the strong and robust are able to endure, and the dangers attendant upon the present mode which have been most painfully exemplified this winter, are other disadvantages from which the people of this Province suffer most acutely.

"12. The feeling that they are being unjustly treated is not without strong foundation. In order to fulfil the terms of Union with British Columbia, a Province of less than 15,000 of a population, exclusive of Indians and Chinese, Canada has contracted for the construction of nearly 3,000 miles of railway at a cost of more than eighty millions of dollars.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That statement about the white population of British Columbia is wrong. At that time there were at least 60,000 white people in the Province.

HON. MR. PROWSE—I have seen similar figures to these frequently quoted and have never known the statement to be contradicted before.

HON. MR. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have never heard or seen these figures before.

HON. MR. PROWSE—At all events the white population of British Columbia was not at that time as large as the population of Prince Edward Island, or anything near it. I have some recollection that British Columbia was admitted to the Union on an assumed population of 60,000, but I am quite satisfied the statement here made is correct. The Address continues:

"This gigantic undertaking is being pushed forward at a rate unparalleled in the world's history, and a vast expenditure is being made, and still more is contemplated, in acquiring and subsidizing other railroads and in forging the links to bind the scattered Provinces from the Atlantic to the Pacific; yet the fulfilment of the terms of Union with this Island, by providing the means of communication over a Strait, only nine miles wide, is postponed from year to year, without any thought, it would seem, that thereby a sacred obligation is being violated, and an immense injury being done to a large body of people.

"13. This grievance of which we here complain has been repeatedly brought to the notice of the General Government, while, session after session, the representatives of the Island in the Dominion Parliament have called attention to the non-fulfilment by Canada of her pledged faith with this Island. In 1881 we addressed the Governor General in Council upon the subject, and prayed for the adoption of measures to remedy the state of affairs complained of as well as compensation for the loss sustained on account of the non-fulfilment of the terms of Union. This Address was duly acknowledged, but no practical results followed, and upon the notice of the Dominion Government being again directed thereto, assurances were returned in both of the years 1882 and 1883, that the question was under their consideration. Again last year we addressed His Excellency in Council with a like petition, and claiming five millions of dollars for the loss sustained to that time on account of the non-fulfilment of the said terms, and we also informed the Dominion Government that we then approached them for the last time, and that unless a favorable answer was accorded without delay, Your Majesty's interference would be invoked. Beyond a simple acknowledgment of this Address no attention has been paid to it. Again on the 20th February last, the Executive Council of this Island called the attention of the Dominion Government to the various steps which had been taken by the Island to obtain a settlement of the question, and reminded them of the decision at which we had arrived last year to appeal to Your Majesty, and that no alternative was left except to carry that determination into effect. To this Minute the same unsatisfactory answer was received, which has been invariably given. Copies of the correspondence referred to will be transmitted to Your Majesty herewith.

"14. In this the twelfth year of their connection with the Dominion, instead of enjoying that efficient and continuous steam communication with the mainland which was guaranteed them, the people of Prince Edward are, for a very considerable portion of the year, dependent upon the mode which their fathers initiated upwards of sixty years ago, before steam power was ever applied for purposes of locomotion. During these twelve years, they have patiently awaited the fulfilment by the General Government of the terms of Union in this particular, until we are reluctantly constrained to say that the Dominion Government have evinced a marked indifference not only for the welfare of this Island, but for the sanctity of their own obligation as well.

"Satisfied that this state of things cannot longer continue without a breach of that harmony which is so indispensable between the Provinces of the Confederation, and feeling that the Island is being treated unjustly, and its prosperity seriously retarded, we appeal to Your Majesty, and humbly pray, that you will take the premises into your most gracious consideration, and require that justice be done by the Government of Canada to your Majesty's loyal subjects of this Province, by the immediate establishment and maintenance of efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between this Island and the mainland of the Dominion, both winter and summer, so as to place the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion; and further, that Your Majesty will be pleased to require that the Government of Canada compensate this Island for the loss which has resulted to its inhabitants, by reason of the non-fulfilment of the terms of Confederation, in the particular complained of herein.

"Certified,
"JOHN BALL, C.L.C.,
"FREDERICK W. HUGHES, A.C.H.A."

I may say that that Address was supported by a delegation from the Local Government, and after having had several interviews with Earl Granville on the question and discussing the matter with that able statesman and the representative of Canada in London, Sir Charles Tupper, Earl Granville sent a very satisfactory despatch to the Dominion Government, which I will refer to further on. I may say that the importance of this communication to Prince Edward Island can scarcely be realized by those who live in other parts of the Dominion. Agriculture is the leading industry of Prince Edward Island, that and the fisheries. We have only from four to six weeks in which to transport our large quantities of agricultural products after they are harvested—you may almost say that they have to be exported within three weeks. We have a limited market for this produce, Nova Scotia being our best customer and next to that the United States. We invariably find that while the produce of the Island is being exported from every harbor in the Province, it gets into the markets about the same time, and the result is that prices immediately drop 25 per cent. or more in a few days. Add to this the inconvenience that the people suffer for want of suitable vessels for transportation, there is such a demand that the freights advance 100 per cent. Vessels that you can secure in the middle of summer for $200 you cannot get in the fall of the year for the same voyage for less than $400. Looking at it in this way, you see the great disadvantage it is to the people of Prince Edward Island to be without communication that we were promised at the time of the Union. The result of our produce being forced into the adjoining markets is to immediately demoralise these markets and bring down the prices. Then again we also suffer in our imports. Unlike the retailers in other parts of the Dominion, who buy supplies as they require them, we have to lay in our stock of imports five or six months in advance.

This you will readily understand is a very great risk, a great loss to the people of Prince Edward Island, and the people feel it most keenly. Previous to 1879 our loss was very serious indeed, for the cause which I have already stated; but in 1879 a new policy was adopted by the Dominion Government, a policy which I, for one, have always believed in—a policy for the Dominion; and that was to encourage home manufactures and provide employment for our own people, a home market for our own produce and the products of our manufactories. But it has had a contrary effect on the people of Prince Edward Island. Nature has debarred us from the markets of the world for five months of the year by the ice which surrounds Prince Edward Island. The National Policy steps in and prevents us from trading with other parts of the world for the other seven months and obliges us to trade principally, if not entirely with the other Provinces. How necessary then it is to us, therefore, that the Dominion should give us every opportunity of exchanging our products with those of the other Provinces—an advantage which the latter have now for some years enjoyed. Our loss in this respect cannot be valued or computed in dollars and cents. We have as industrious, as intelligent and as thrifty a population in Prince Edward Island for our numbers as can be found in any part of the Dominion of Canada. There is no reason why Prince Edward Island should not be one of the manufacturing centres of this Dominion. We have access, and close access, to the magnificent coal fields of Pictou, in Nova Scotia and Cap Breton. We are in close proximity to the iron mines of Londonderry, and we have in Prince Edward Island the advantages of cheaper food for operatives than in any other portion of the Dominion, and if we had the same facilities for intercourse with the markets of the Continent that the other Provinces enjoy we have not the slightest doubt that large manufactories would have been established in Prince Edward Island long before now. But we are debarred from that because we are excluded, for want of proper communication, from the markets of the Dominion for five months of the year, and by the National Policy from the markets of the world for the remaining seven months of the year. To show that we are not lacking in enterprise we have gone into manufactures there, all that the people can possibly undertake, or that there are facilities for carrying out successfully. Fisheries are successfully carried on; we have lobster factories perhaps second to none in North America, and, as for starch factories, there is more starch manufactured in Prince Edward Island, five times over, than in all the rest of the Dominion put together. We have boot and shoe factories and cloth factories, and we have more than double the amount of money in the Savings Bank per head of the population of our Province than any other Province of the Dominion. Even during the past year, while the amount of the deposits in the Savings Bank of every every other Province in Canada have decreased, they have increased in Prince Edward Island. The following is a comparative statement of the deposits in the Savings Banks of the Dominion, for the year ended 30th June last.

SAVING BANKS, 1888-1889.

	1888	1889	Decrease.
Ontario.....	$ 794,926.97	$ 752,705.15	$ 42,221.82
Manitoba.....	948,527.14	892,036.99	56,490.15
British Col'bia.	1,628,968.80	1,598.945.89	30,022.91
N.-Brunswick	6,269,587.77	6,046,345.76	224,242.01
Nova Scotia....	8,879,584.88	8,411,511.17	468,073.71
P. E. Island...	2,160,430.05	2,224,390
		Increase	$83,960.10

What is the reason of this decrease of deposits in all the other Provinces? It is owing to the rate of interest being reduced from 4 to 3½ per cent? I have heard it stated in this House before now, even this session I heard it in another place, that the deposits in the Savings Banks are no indication of the prosperity of the country. We have to deposit in the Savings Bank of Prince Edward Island because we have no opportunity of investing money in manufactures, to send them to other countries where they can be sold. In addition to that I may say there is money seeking investment in Prince Edward Island, but there is no opportunity to invest it. We have money invested in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick in sugar refineries, cotton factories, insurance companies and bank stock, which, if we had the communication with the mainland that was guaranteed us at Confederation, would be invested in our own Province, developing our own resources and establishing new industries in Prince Edward Island. Our loss in that way cannot be fully realized. We cannot estimate it in dollars and cents. If we had this communication to-morrow, we would not be even then in the same position as the older Provinces. Since 1879 the manufactures of the other Provinces have been fostered and encouraged by the National Policy, markets have been opened up and secured to them in every way, and if we had communication now established we would have to compete against these older establishments of the upper Provinces and our operatives would have to learn their business. I say, in this regard, we have suffered immensely for the want of communication up to the present time, and when the time does come there will be a heavy bill for compensation to be settled for the losses sustained by our Province, through the non-fulfilment of the terms of Confederation. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but all I have to say to these gentlemen is, if my argument does not bear criticism, if I have stated anything that is untrue or misleading, I would like them to say where it is. But I would suggest to them to place themselves in the same position that we in Prince Edward Island occupy. Shut off Nova Scotia from the rest of the Dominion for five months of the year, having only the same access to the other Provinces that we now have in ice-boats across the Straits of Northumberland, and shut out from the rest of the world for seven months of the year, I ask them what their loss would be? I am astonished to hear hon. gentlemen laugh at a proposition of this kind. I think that we, in the Senate, should see that the small Provinces, powerless to help themselves by force of numbers, shall have their terms of union carried out, or that we should be supported in our demands by the Senate of Canada. It is not my intention to say in what way the terms of union shall be carried out. That is a matter, I take it, for the Dominion Government to investigate into the way in which these terms of union can best be carried out. If they can be carried out with a moderate expense—if the Government can fulfil the terms of union by means of navigation, we shall be satisfied. The less cost the better we would be pleased, but we think they must be carried out. We have a right to expect it and must insist upon it. I have no fault to find with the steamer "Stanley," she is an able steamer—an expensive steamer, but I do say that the service she is rendering Prince Edward Island is not equal to the cost of the steamer—that if we can get no better service and no greater good to the Province, it is a pity to see such a steamer being forced through ice when she ought to be very well secured in the harbor. That she is able to do good service for a month later in the fall, and possibly a month earlier in the spring, I do not deny, but to force that fine steamer through vast fields of ice in winter is a waste of public money, and if it was given to Prince Edward Island for some other purposes, and allow the mails and passengers to be taken across the straits by some other route it would be better than to see it squandered in destroying the "Stanley", as she will be destroyed in a few years if forced across the straits at a time when no such vessel should be forced across.

With these remarks I trust that the House will see the reasonableness of the proposition that has been made to have a thorough investigation instituted by the Government to ascertain in what way the terms of union will be carried out so as to place the people of the Island in the same position that the people of the other Provinces occupy. And to-day that it will endorse the recommendation and the wishes of Earl Granville after hearing the whole question discussed before him when he said:

"The expectations of the Province in regard to the establishment of a constant and efficient communication with the mainland have not been fulfilled."

* * * * *

"There seems to be reason for doubting whether any really satisfactory connection by steamship can be regularly maintained all the year around, which makes it all the more important that the proposed metallic subway should receive a full and, if feasible, favorable consideration on the part of the Government of the Dominion."

"It would reflect great credit on the Dominion Government if after connecting British Columbia with the Eastern Provinces by the Canadian Pacific Railway it should now be able to complete its system of railway communication by an extension to Prince Edward Island."

I may say it would be the crowning glory of the leader of the present Government after completing the union between all the separate Provinces of this Dominion, that he should fulfil its terms to the letter with Prince Edward Island. It would be a direct incentive to Newfoundland to join the Confederacy, which is the only thing wanting to complete the monument to the memory of the present Government and its Chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald.

HON. MR. POWER—I should like the hon. gentleman, before finally closing, to give the information which I asked for during the course of his speech, and which he thought I had no right to ask, but which seems to me to be very pertinent to the question before the House: That is, whether it was contemplated by any of the parties to the bargain between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion that there should be a tunnel or subway built across the Straits of Northumberland?

HON. MR. PROWSE—The hon. gentle man asks a question which would take a philosopher and more than a philosopher to answer. How it is possible for me to say what intention the delegates had in their minds? Our Government and people take the terms as they find them. I am no lawyer, but I do claim to have a little common sense, and I take it that this is perhaps a good point in law, that where an agent or representative enters into a contract with another agent or representive, for their employers, it does not matter what is in the mind of the agents. The important question is what is in the body of the contract.

HON. MR. DEVER—Shylock once had a contract also.

HON. MR. PROWSE—These terms came before the people, and the people took them as they found them in print, and not as they were impressed upon the minds of the delegates who entered into the contract. There might be many considerations which would induce the agent to say: "Put something in there that will please the people and satisfy the people and secure their votes, and I will do the best I can to get the people to consent to it if you will secure me afterwards." There might be an arrangement of that kind, but here are the terms written in plain English, well worded, and we only ask that these terms shall be carried out according to the reasonable acceptation of the agreement.

HON. MR. POWER—The hon. gentleman says he is not a lawyer? Still he shows a certain amount of skill in evading the question. Leaving the agents aside, will the hon. gentleman say whether or not, about the time the terms were made for union with Prince Edward Island, it was stated by any one at that time that these terms involved the construction of a tunnel or subway?

HON. MR. PROWSE—We were never told that it would only be communication by water—by navigation.

HON. MR. READ—It might be an aerial communication.

HON. MR. MACDONALD—The hon. gentleman from Murray Harbor stated that the population of British Columbia when the Province entered the Confederation was only 15,000, and he declined to take my word for it that it was more than that. I would refer him to the Statutes of 1872, sec. 3 of the British Columbia terms of Confederation.

HON. MR. POWER—That does not prove that the population was 60,000.

HON. MR. PROWSE—They were allowed to come in with a supposed population of 60,000, but the population was not 60,000, and I must see the Census before I can believe it, because this document was prepared very carefully, and if any wrong assertion was made in it, it would be discovered. I have some recollection of the terms with British Columbia, and my recollection is that that Province was allowed to come in with a supposed population of 60,000.

HON. MR. POWER—This has been a Prince Edward Island day up to the present time, and I suppose we may as well make a whole day of it. I think that the terms of union between Prince Edward Island and Canada have to be regarded with respect to the state of engineering and scientific knowledge at the time the arrangement was entered into. I am informed on the very best authority, that is by the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown, that when the negotiations took place between the two Governments, that hon. gentleman, who then led the Government of Prince Edward Island, proposed winter steam navigation; and Mr., now Sir Leonard Tilley, who was the delegate fron the Canadian Government, and who was dealing with the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown, as representing the Prince Edward Island Government, in reply to the proprosal made on behalf of Prince Edward Island, spoke of the recent successful experiment in keeping navigation open in winter between Quebec and Point Levi by means of a steamer, and Mr. Tilley inferred from it that there would be no greater difficulty in keeping navigation open across the Straits of Northumberland than there was in keeping the navigation of the St. Lawrence open. The terms used in the bargain were the terms adopted by the report of the Privy Council of Canada, and submitted to the Island Government. They were accepted by the Island Government, and although an hon. gentleman has chosen to reflect somewhat on the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown, the fact is that this particular provision in the terms of union was accepted by both parties in Prince Edward Island. The idea of a subway never occurred to any of the parties, for the simple reason that at that time such structures were unknown—unknown at least to all the parties to this arrangement, and the first time that a proposal for a subway came before Parliament, or before the public in any way, was at the instance of the hon. gentleman from Alberton. The terms of union, as understood by both parties, were that an efficient steamer should ply between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the early efforts in this direction as being ineffectual. Then came the "Northern Light." She was better than the vessels that had gone before her; but after a while it was felt by the people of Prince Edward Island that the accommodation afforded by her was not satisfactory, and this dissatisfaction found expression in the various documents read by the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbor and in some read by the hon. gentleman from Alberton. While the "Northern Light" was still running, the hon. gentleman from Alberton brought before this Chamber his proposal for a subway; and up to that date I do not think it had ever been suggested by any one that communication with the mainland should be by a subway or tunnel. The hon. gentleman from Alberton, I think, deserves a great deal of credit for the persistence with which he has brought this matter before the public, before the Government, and before this House; and I am glad to see that he continues to bring it here. Since the hon. gentleman has agitated the subway question another steamer has been put on the route which, I understand, is more efficient than the "Northern Light," but which is not quite satisfactory to the people of Prince Edward Island. But while it is perfectly true that the hon. gentleman from Alberton has done his best to see this subway—I rather think from the way he speaks to-day he is not so clear about the subway, and thinks that a tunnel might be better—constructed, I do not think that it is fair that the efforts of the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown should be ignored. That hon. gentleman, ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, has brought up nearly every session the question of the improvement of communication with Prince Edward Island, and the memorial which he submitted to the Committee of the other House some years ago contained as much valuable information as any other document submitted by any one individual. No fault can be found with any of the gentlemen from Prince Edward Island; and I think it is, to say the least, somewhat ungenerous for the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbor to endeavor to reflect upon the conduct of the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown. The reflection is quite undeserved. Having said so much on the history of the question, I wish to say a few words as to my own views of the duty of the Dominion Government. I do not say that the Government have not complied with the terms of Union. That is possibly a debatable question. Prince Edward Island people think that the Dominion Government have not complied with the terms of Union, and the Dominion Government think they have—that they have done all that could be expected to establish a reasonable communication by water, and that that was all they were bound to do. But I think, apart altogether from the terms of Union, it is the duty of the Dominion Government to give to the people of Prince Edward Island the best means of communication with the mainland that can be afforded at a reasonable cost.

HON. MR. PROWSE—What is a reasonable cost?

HON. MR. POWER—My opinion as to what is a reasonable cost may not be the opinion of the majority of this House, and it may not be the opinion of the Government; but I shall select one criterion: The Domiion Parliament a little while ago voted a sum of something over $3,000,000 for the purpose of constructing an entirely useless work across the Isthmus of Chignecto—a work that was not asked for by any considerable number of persons—and I think it would certainly not be unreasonable for the Dominion Government to spend at least as large a sum in securing a communication with the 125,000 inhabitants of Prince Edward Island as they expended.

for no good purpose in that ship railway, I am not prepared to say that the Government and the country would not be justified in spending a larger sum for that purpose. My own impression is that if this work could be done for about $5,000,000 the Dominion Government would be quite justified in undertaking it. As the hon. gentleman from Alberton has shown, I think the country would not really lose very much if they constructed the work at that cost. With the rate of interest as low as it is at present, the probabilities are that the interest on the cost of constructing the work, if the principal was not more that $5,000,000. would not be much more than the annual cost of maintaining the existing service.

HON. MR. HOWLAN—Not quite so much.
