OFFICIAL REPORT

Friday, March 29, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

PATENTS OF INVENTION

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the first reading of Bill No. 48 (from the Senate) to amend and consolidate the acts relating to patents of invention.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Yesterday I mentioned to my right hon. friend the acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley) that I would inquire to-day of the government as to the possibility of this house concluding its sittings by Easter, and in the event of it not being able so to do, what the plans of the government might be. I expressed the hope that if anything in the nature of an adjournment were necessary because of not having the business completed, it might be a very brief adjournment and that we might reassemble as soon after Easter as possible.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): It seems to me quite evident that we cannot get through the session before Easter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If hon. gentlemen will allow me I propose to give the reason.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to know.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The report of the mass buying commission has not yet come in, nor do we know exactly when it will come in. We also have a committee that is discussing the housing problem, one of the most important questions in this country, something in which we are all interested. When these reports come in, the mass buying commission report is handed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and then has to come before council for consideration, and I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, that we certainly expect them to make recommendations of importance that will need careful consideration by the government and afterwards by this house, and in order to have time to consider the report and prepare legislation I feel sure that we cannot in an orderly manner get through the business of parliament before Easter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has answered part of the question; unintentionally no doubt he omitted to answer the other part, that is, whether in the event of having to continue the session after Easter we may expect to have just the customary recess and reassemble as soon as possible thereafter.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am unable to give an answer to the question today, but it will be carefully considered, and I shall speak to my right hon. friend on the subject as soon as possible.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED USE OF BLOODHOUNDS TO LOCATE PERSONS LOST IN NOVA SCOTIA FORESTS AND TO TRACK CRIMINALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In the Montreal Gazette of March 28, I notice a dispatch from Halifax dated March 27, which reads:

Bloodhounds Will Aid Police in N.S. Woods

So many people are getting lost in Nova Scotia's woods that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are going to bring in bloodhounds to help track them down.

The announcement is made in the annual report of H division of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, tabled in the legislature to-day, which notes that more persons get lost in the Nova Scotia woods than in other sections of Canada.

Besides helping find them, the report says the bloodhounds will be used to trail escaped criminals.

I would like to ask whether, since we are beginning to prohibit the hunting of deer with dogs, the full cabinet have given their consent to this method of tracking down criminals.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The answer is in the negative.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I ask if the cabinet will consider whether or not they sanction this proceeding on the part of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. May we hope for an answer within a few days? May we hope for an answer as to whether the government sanctions this proceeding?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It does not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It does not. I thank the hon. member.

MERCHANT MARINE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGES BOUCHARD (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) whether the government has given effect to the Canadian Merchant Marine Act of 1934, according to which captains of ships of more than ten tons must have a certificate and such ships must have an engineer on board?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as I have already stated in the house, the Merchant Marine Act, adopted at the session of 1934, has not yet been promulgated and is therefore not yet in force.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on the same subject, could the hon. Minister of Marine make a statement or give instructions to the customs officers at seaports in order to remove the fears that exist regarding the putting into force of the act to which the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) has just referred?

I myself have received, during the last few days, numerous petitions from all parts of the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay. All the seamen are up in arms and are wondering if they will be able to obtain their certificate to go to Quebec, this act having been adopted. As there is some doubt, I should be obliged to the hon. Minister of Marine if he would supply the necessary information in that regard.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I am surprised that the hon. member has received so many petitions on that subject.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I can show them to you.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): All the seamen who have addressed inquiries to the Department have received a satisfactory answer, and I am told that at present they are all aware that the act of 1934 is not yet in force.

INTERIM SUPPLY

VOTE OF ONE TWELFTH FOR FISCAL YEAR 1935-36

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I would like to ask for unanimous consent to secure interim supply. Unless we do secure it, much inconvenience will be caused to the public service, because we shall have no money available to pay salaries for the month of April. According to the well established practice I asked the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) if we might secure a vote of one-sixth, which was the amount of the first interim supply granted last year. My right hon. friend did not concur in the suggestion that I should ask for one-sixth, but did intimate his willingness to concur in the granting of one-twelfth, plus an additional one-sixth in the case of certain items where the heavier expenses come in the early portion of the year, and those particular items I would be glad to indicate to the house if it so desires.

I might point out that I would have preferred one-sixth for the reason amongst others that we have this year a condition that has not obtained hitherto. Our estimates were set up this year, as the house was advised in the earlier stages of the session, upon the basis of ninety per cent of the normal vote, and the reason was explained at the time. It is proposed early next week to bring in a bill which will have the effect of restoring five per cent of the ten per cent deduction, but in the meantime when we get out one-twelth, that one-twelfth will have to provide not only for one-twelfth of the estimates as they stand to-day but also for the additional money which will be required to pay the additional five per cent in salaries which begins on April 1. As I say, I would have preferred the one-sixth, but inasmuch as we can secure interim supply only by unanimous consent, I have drafted a bill upon the basis of a general vote of one-twelfth plus one-sixth in the case of certain specific items which I shall be pleased to indicate to the house if it so desires.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance has just said that he had asked me if I thought it would be possible to secure unanimous consent to the government being given a measure of interim supply. Being desirous as always to be as helpful as possible, I told him that we might manage one-twelfth, but I doubted very much whether it would be possible to secure unanimous consent with respect to granting one-sixth. My hon. friend saw I think the force of the reason I gave; at any rate he has acquiesced in it to the extent of having had prepared a bill granting interim supply to the extent of one-twelfth of the total except in the case of a number of items for services which require at this season of the year outlays which are somewhat unusual and for which we are prepared to grant one-sixth.

The Minister of Finance has spoken about a condition existing at the moment which has not obtained hitherto. I might say the same with respect to the situation as it presents itself at this session of parliament; this is the last session of a parliament that is already in its sixth session. As my hon. friend knows, we on this side have been of opinion right along that the country should have an early opportunity of expressing itself on the question of who it wishes to continue to govern this dominion. We had rather hoped that expression would have been given before this, but at the beginning of the session we were told that the voters' lists would not be ready until April 15. In speaking on the address, I said that being the case, we naturally would seek to do all we could by way of furthering such legislation as might be introduced in the interval, but we hoped that just as soon as the lists were available, an appeal to the people might be had. I think that was and is still the correct position to take. There is no doubt that it being known a general election is to take place this year at some time, the uncertainty of the date is having its effect upon conditions throughout the country generally, and we cannot expect a return to a beginning of normal conditions or the revival of industry and trade until the country knows what administration is to be in office the next few years. For that reason we hope the government may find it possible to bring on a general election just as soon as it can. It is clear that the government will wish to carry on at least until the Easter recess, and possibly a day or two after. If a twelfth is given by way of supply at the moment that would be sufficient to carry the administration up to the end of the month of April. In the circumstances there would be no objection, so far as I gather, from the official opposition to giving unanimous consent for the twelfth. But I do hope my hon. friend will not find it necessary to ask for another twelfth later on.

Mr. RHODES: Even if I were in order I would not propose to traverse the ground covered by my right hon. friend respecting the date of the election or the date of the closing of this house, for the very good reason that it has no bearing upon the question of our asking for interim supply. If the house had concluded its session and prorogation had taken place before Easter it would still have been necessary to ask for interim supply. Otherwise there would be no money available from the first day of April to pay for salaries and for other governmental services. I merely wish to make that distinction here to indicate that it has no bearing upon the question of the election or the date of prorogation.

With respect to the last point raised by my right hon. friend I can give no undertaking that we may not have to call again for interim supply. I would indicate to him only that we would have to be moved by the necessities of the case, relying in all instances, as we must in this one, upon unanimous consent before we can secure interim supply at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the minister that once prorogation has taken place the government will have the supply bill in its entirety and there will therefore be no necessity to ask for further interim supply. If this house should prorogue before May 1, there would be no need to ask for interim supply at all. That is what I hope may be possible. The question of dissolution is of course a matter for the government itself to decide.

Mr. RHODES: To clear the situation, at least so far as I am concerned, I must take exception to the statement of my right hon. friend. Certainly with prorogation we would assume that supply in its entirety would have been voted. In the meantime however we cannot look in any event for prorogation until after the fifteenth, or in the neighbourhood of the fifteenth, and in the meantime we would have to have interim supply. That is the only point I raise.

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton): I thought the Minister of Finance in asking for unanimous consent would have settled the current rumour that there will be a six weeks adjournment at Easter. If that is the intention of the government then I say he will not get unanimous consent to such a proposal. Some hon. members come from western Canada at considerable expense, and if we are going to be held up for six weeks at great expense then we will have to assert the only authority which we have, namely, our rights as members of this house.

Mr. GOTT: What part of the party is the hon. member speaking for?

Mr. RHODES: This is Friday, and in the ordinary course Mr. Speaker would leave the chair without question put. I take it however that he asks unanimous consent for the purpose of considering the resolution. I move that the house resolve itself into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved that a sum not exceeding $16,058,144.05, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1936.

[Mr. Gott.]

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. RHODES moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1936, the sum of $20,250,290.38 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 49, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1936.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—$16,058,144.05 granted for 1935-36.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to point out how our attitude shows the spirit of conciliation that animates the opposition side of the house. Any member of this house could have spoken several times on the resolution preceding the bill, and then again on the different readings of the bill, and several times again when the bill was in committee, but we are dispensing with all that. So I do not see how members on the other side of the house can afterwards complain that they have received no co-operation from this side of the house.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They will never understand that.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, it will be apparent in the first instance that unanimous consent was asked, without which we could not proceed. While I am willing to concede to my hon. friend the truth of the statement he has just made, I might point out that so far as I can recall this has been the practice almost from time immemorial.

Mr. POULIOT: But the unanimous consent that was given corroborates what I have just said about cooperation.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, March 28, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment of Mr. Ralston, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coote.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, at eleven o'clock last evening I was about to say that the trade agreements negotiated in 1932 have consolidated the empire on a lasting basis of mutual benefit and security. A consolidated British empire is the world's best guarantee for universal peace, without which there can be no well-ordered advance or security. The Prime Minister in negotiating those agreements laid the best foundation that he could for his policy of reform of the capitalist system in this country and he has since then taken progressive steps to bring that about.

In 1933, for instance, a committee was set up of members of this house to investigate the spread between the producer and the consumer in the price of milk. That investigation revealed a deplorable condition in and around the city of Montreal. The middleman had extorted an unusual toll for his services. He had exploited the consumer and cheated the producer of milk.

Another committee was set up to investigate conditions in the tobacco industry. This industry was found to be in a somewhat similar condition. The manager of one of the companies had exacted the highest toll that the trade would bear. Two of these capitalist companies, with their long tenuous Shylock-like fingers, took their pound of flesh without regard to the misery or want of their victims, and it is no wonder that the people of this country are making a demand that the capitalist system should be remedied and its abuses corrected.

In 1934 a further step was taken in the passing of the Natural Products Marketing Act. This act was for the purpose of controlling and stabilizing the marketing of natural products from the land, from the sea and from the forest. That act has been in operation now for about one year, and many industries have taken advantage of it and have found it to their benefit. It could be of great assistance to the farming community, for whose benefit it was designed, if they would take advantage of it. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) mentioned yesterday that it was a good bill but that the farmers in western Canada had been rather dubious about asking for its benefits. Up to the present time it has not been in operation in the province of Ontario, but I believe that at the present moment a board has been set up in this province so that the benefits of the act will shortly be available to the farmers of Ontario.

The Canadian Farm Loan Amendment Act was also passed in 1934 to provide greater facilities for credit for the farmer who needed money to improve his stock or his buildings or his implements, the better to work his land. It is intended that this would make credit easier and that the interest rate on farm loans would be reduced. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is now in operation in Ontario and other parts of the dominion. It is giving very general satisfaction so far as I am aware, and I speak more particularly for my own district. It brings the benefits of the Bankruptcy Act to the farmer. Official receivers have been appointed to assist the farmers in getting their creditors together in order to make mutual arrangements for the scaling down of mortgages and debts and the arranging for lower interest rates. This legislation has proved quite beneficial in those cases where a farmer is unable to pay his debts. It has given general satisfaction in Ontario. I might mention that the expenses of administration, so far as the debtor is concerned, are borne by the government.

In 1934 the government introduced the Bank of Canada Act which brought into being the Bank of Canada which commenced operations this year. The bank will control currency in the dominion and will facilitate trade throughout the empire as well as with foreign countries. It is to be hoped that under this legislation the different countries of the empire will be able to trade on a parity of exchange. I am quite sure it will prove to be beneficial in bringing about further rapprochement between the various parts of the empire. I hope the day will soon come when exchange will be stabilized not only throughout the empire but throughout the whole world. When that occurs we will be relieved of the vexatious differences of exchange and the necessity for the payment of discounts and premiums.

This year the government introduced the Unemployment Insurance Act. In my opinion the introduction of such legislation is a little late as it should have been brought forward some ten or fifteen years ago. If that had been done then the legislation would have been on a sound basis to-day. This act received considerable criticism from hon. members in the opposite corner but I contend that it is a step in the right direction and is as far as the government could go at the present time. After it has been in operation for a year or two, any defects which may develop can be remedied. The number of people brought under the act is quite large and represents about as many as the government can look after at the present time.

A royal commission was set up by the government to inquire fully into the methods and practices of big business. The report of this commission will be brought down to the house very shortly and legislation based thereon will be introduced. As the administration of the legislation will devolve largely upon the next government I think it is essential that that government should be in full accord with it For many years the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has been watching the trend of events. He has taken careful note of what happened during the reestablishment period after the war and during the days of frenzied finance when merger after merger was brought into being. Many changes occurred in the period from 1921 to 1930. I contend that the Prime Minister is the logical man to be in charge of the enforcement of the legislation which he has introduced. This question will be soon placed before the highest court in the land, the electorate, and I have no doubt that the verdict will be in favour of the Prime Minister. I have a firm and abiding faith in the good sense of the electorate of this country.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the budget speech which he delivered in this house just a week ago to-day. I want to congratulate him with respect to both its contents and its form. We have had four budgets from the hon. gentleman and I think I can safely say that in so far as the budget system under British practice is understood, these budgets have been models which future ministers of finance may follow. This budget was in marked contrast to the Dunning budget of 1930. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has referred to this as a make believe budget, but I submit that if there ever was a make believe budget, it was the Dunning budget of 1930, the budget which the people of this country rejected and threw out of the window. I have studied the public press and other organs which have expressed an opinion on this budget and they have been almost universally favourable in their comments. I think it could be termed a prosperity budget as it definitely signalizes the return to this country of normal conditions and the return of this party at the next elections.

I should like to make a brief reference to the illness of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett): We are all delighted to know that his progress has been excellent and that he will be about his apartment in a day or two and back in this chamber before prorogation to resume his duties as leader of the government and the country. In due course he will make his appeal to the people. I do not doubt the bona fides of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the expressions of regret and solicitude for the health of the Prime Minister which he made a few days ago in this house, but I should like to refer to the malicious and mendacious statements with reference to the health of the Prime Minister which have been made to certain parts of the public press by parties unfriendly to him. These statements have been calculated to raise a false impression in the minds of the people of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend is not insinuating that any one on this side is responsible for anything of that kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not so say. My words will speak for themselves. I said that I did not doubt the bona fides of the right hon. gentleman and I made no reference to hon. gentlemen on the other side.

There is one point in connection with his budget speech upon which I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. Considering the length of his utterances I think it can be truly said that it was a marathon. He will soon rival his distinguished leader in this respect. I submit that in the main his criticism was picayune and wholly destructive with but a single exception to which I shall allude in a moment; he did not make a single suggestion which would improve any one condition in this country. And the possible exception was his reference to the establishment of a loan council, which suggestion I should like to observe is by no means new. In fact, in my humble opinion the best part of his speech consisted of his quotations from the Prime Minister's previous speeches.

Last winter, just before the Christmas season, the hon. gentleman delivered a public address in the city of New York before the life insurance presidents, a very distinguished body of men in the United States, and his subject matter was, "Some obstacles to recovery." When I read the report of that speech, delivered as it was before that distinguished body, showing a great deal of fine preparation and the most laudable sentiments, I must say that my heart warmed to the hon. gentleman, and I think his utterances on that occasion were highly creditable. Among other things which he said before that august and distinguished assembly was this:

> I don't intend to make you green with envy by going into particulars to-day to show you what a great country Canada is. I shall content myself and relieve your feelings by saying at once that I have read the speeches which have been made to you—

That is, to the same body.

> —by the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, Prime Minister of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Lapointe and the Hon. Mr. Guthrie, both ministers of justice at different times, and the Hon. Mr. Rhodes, Minister of Finance. I have read every word they have said about Canada and I here and now declare to you that I admit it all, even though I seldom agree with anything which two of these four gentlemen ever say in the House of Commons.

On that occasion the hon. gentleman was speaking as a Canadian patriot; on this occasion he was speaking as the official critic of the opposition. And when one understands the setting of the different situation, one can easily understand that he was just performing what is considered a partisan duty in this country and not speaking in the same sense that he was when he was addressing the life insurance presidents' association in the city of New York.

Instead of being a make believe budget, I suggest, sir, that on the contrary the budget is full of material calculated to give to the people of this country a true picture not only of the country's financial standing but also of its trade and outlook for the future. In passing, may I just say one word with respect to the amendment of the official opposition. It is purely negative, a vote of want of confidence in the administration; and of course it cannot be accepted. Let me say at once to my hon. friend and to the house that the business of this house will be concluded in an orderly and regular manner, that the program of the government will be fully and finally implemented by legislation and that the election will come in due course; and when it does come hon. gentlemen opposite will know that there has been a real election.

With respect to the amendment of the third party in this house, I have only this to say, that to me it means one thing and one thing only, unlimited inflation, a policy which this country is not likely ever to adopt.

The first attack on the government by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was with respect to its tariff and trade policies. Before making any examination into the subject matter of the attack, may I crave your indulgence for a moment while I pause to examine the position of Canada in 1930 when this government came into office. Among other things, the following outstanding conditions prevailed: 1. We had a huge adverse balance of trade. 2. We had a steadily declining volume of trade, both export and import, which had begun fully twelve months before. 3. We had declining revenues. 4. Even then we had unemployment on a scale theretofore unknown in Canada. 5. We had made huge foreign commitments, both federal and Canadian National, which had to be met in terms of the currency of the creditor country. 6. We had an unbalanced budget. It will be recalled in that connection that in the Dunning budget of 1930, absolutely no forecast was made as to the revenues for the then succeeding year. It was strangely silent in that respect, a matter that has called for comment on many occasions. And why was it silent? Because the government of the day then knew that although they were budgeting for a huge expenditure over and above what was warranted, they did not take this country into their confidence sufficiently to tell the people what the true picture was. We were also confronted, in the estimates of 1930, with huge commitments for public works and capital expenditures made just previous to the election in the face of declining revenues and of an unbalanced budget. And last, and by no means least, this government was confronted with a huge deficit to take care of the Canadian National Railways.

These were only a few of the problems that confronted the incoming administration, and the government tackled the situation man fashion. We called a special session of the House of Commons in the autumn of 1930 and put through two major pieces of legislation; first, provision was made for unemployment relief, and secondly, we made tariff adjustments for the purpose of protecting Canadian industry and Canadian workmen and to correct the adverse balance of trade. The tariff adjustments of the autumn session of 1930 were not made for the mere purpose of vindicating the principle of protection, but they had in view a certain definite purpose or group of purposes. These purposes were definitely fulfilled, and for the first time in years Canadian industry, which for years had been suffering from a policy of attrition at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, was given an even chance with foreign competitors in our own markets.

We are charged with adopting trade policies which have lost to this country markets for our exportable surplus. That has been repeated so often that hon. gentlemen opposite actually, I think, believe it. But I suggest to you, sir, and to this house that that charge was definitely disposed of during the budget speech of 1934 by my predecessor, the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens). The charge is not only untrue but is a deliberate misstatement of fact calculated to mislead and deceive the Canadian people. I make this statement on the record, that from December, 1921, when the Liberal party came into power until August, 1930, when they resigned office, the markets of all countries importing our surplus products except the United Kingdom were either definitely closed to us or their tariffs were raised so high that our export trade with many of those countries almost vanished. I have here the record. Take the United States tariff. It will be recalled that the Fordney-McCumber tariff came into effect on September 21, 1922, and that the Hawley-Smoot tariff came into effect on June 17, 1930. In a list of some twenty or thirty articles, primary products of this country, of most of which we have an exportable surplus, there was a definite upward revision against us at the hands of that country with which theretofore we had been trading. With respect to wheat there was a tariff of 30 cents a bushel; after April 6, 1934, it was raised to 42 cents a bushel under the Hawley-Smoot tariff, ten per cent ad valorem if unfit for human consumption. With respect to wheat flour the rate was 78 cents per hundred pounds under the 1922 tariff, and under the tariff of 1930, $1.04 per hundred pounds. The rate on potatoes, 50 cents per hundred pounds was raised to 75 cents. Prior to 1922 the rate had been 25 cents per bushel or 42 cents per hundred pounds. Or take cattle, 30 per cent ad valorem, raised to 1½ and 2 cents per pound and under the 1930 tariff to 2½ and 3 cents per pound.

I could go through a long list of primary products such as these, taken from the record, which establishes clearly that as far as the United States is concerned tariffs were definitely raised against this country while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, which rendered attempts to trade with that country almost ineffective. With the consent of the house I propose to put this statement on Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why not put the whole speech on?

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir, I object. Let the hon. gentleman proceed. I do not wish to be discourteous—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If objection is taken I will read it over hurriedly.

With respect to cream, which had been 5 cents a gallon, in 1922 it was raised to 20 cents and under the tariff of 1930 to 56·6 cents per gallon. Butter, raised from 6 cents to 8 cents per pound and in 1930 to 14 cents. Cheese, from 23 per cent ad valorem to 5 cents per pound but not less than 25 per cent ad valorem, and then up to 7 cents per pound but not less than 35 per cent ad valorem.

With respect to France, we all remember the inefficiency of the French treaty entered into by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1922-23, when after lowering tariffs in this country as against French products they went to Paris and negotiated a tariff with their hands tied behind them, and succeeded in getting what? In getting the French minimum tariff without any guarantee as to what that should ever be. What were the tariff increases against this country by France with respect to wheat? From 11 cents a bushel in 1924 to 85 cents a bushel in May, 1930. Wheat flour increased from 24-34 cents a hundredweight in 1924, to $2.28-$3.29 per hundredweight in 1930; oats from 4 cents a bushel to 18 cents a bushel; barley from 3 cents to 18 cents a bushel; boxed apples from 5 cents to 27 cents per hundredweight; crude zinc, free in 1921, to 25 cents per hundredweight in 1928; agricultural implements from 48 cents-$1.14 per hundredweight in 1926, to $1.07-$1.43 per hundredweight in 1927.

The same statement is true with respect to the tariffs of Germany, Italy, Belgium and Finland. If time permitted I could place on Hansard specific articles, which would show that the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in power was the time that Canada lost her markets for her exportable surplus, and that it was not due to any action of this government. During the nine years hon. gentlemen opposite were in power this country paid for American purchases no less than three billion dollars in excess of what they purchased from us. How this little country ever maintained its solvency in face of that adverse trade condition is almost beyond our comprehension.

I want to say this further with respect to United States tariff increases: Canadian wheat had been entering the United States duty free on a reciprocal basis during the Wilson administration, up to May 27, 1921. On that date the United States imposed a duty of 35 cents a bushel. The tariff act of September 21, 1922, reduced the rate to 30 cents, but on April 6, 1924, under the same flexible provision of the tariff, the duty was advanced to 42 cents a bushel, and the present tariff act of June, 1930, confirmed the rate. During the fiscal year, 1920-21, the last year of the old Conservative administration, the last year that Canadian wheat entered the United States free of duty, our exports to that country were $91,442,298. Under the tariff of 1921-22 our exports dropped to $23,335,277 and by the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930, under the 74 cents per bushel tariff, exports had fallen to $7,487,000. That market for our wheat was lost during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite. And the story is true all along the line with respect to the exportable surplus of our natural products.

What is the position with respect to wheat flour? During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1921, the last year wheat flour entered the United States free of duty, Canadian exports amounted to the huge sum of $12,000,000. The tariff was raised against us in 1922, 1924 and 1930 and the trade dropped after 1924 to $300,000 and the next year it was less than $100,000. In whose regime and in what period of time was the market for our wheat flour in the United States lost to Canada? The same thing is true of oats. Prior to March 31, 1921, we exported oats to the United States to the value of $4,694,519. The tariff was raised on September 21, 1922, to 15 cents per bushel, and increased to 16 cents on June 17, 1930, and by the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930, the export of oats to the United States had dropped from nearly $5,000,000 to a trifling pittance of $20,000.

Mr. RALSTON: On account of the one cent increase?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, the increase was to 15 cents first and then one cent afterwards. The total of 16 cents made it impossible.

Mr. RALSTON: But the 15 cents was 1922.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): September 21, 1922, after hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, and so far as we know they made no protest against it.

Mr. RALSTON: But the decrease was after the one cent was added in 1930.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was no decrease, there was a further increase of one cent.

Mr. RALSTON: But the decrease in exports.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know what the hon. gentleman is talking about

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about the decreased exports.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have only forty minutes; the hon. gentleman had unlimited time.

Mr. BRADETTE: He did not read his speech, though.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am reading from very full notes containing figures which I think I ought to read.

Cattle is an important item in Canadian production. Prior to May 27, 1921, cattle entered the United States market free of duty, and our exports of cattle to the United States for the fiscal year 1920 were $42,495,963. For the fiscal year 1921, the last year they were free, they amounted to $21,232,551. Next year they fell to $3,712,821, the 30 per cent tariff being in force most of the time. The Fordney-McCumber tariff of September, 1922, imposed 2 cents per pound on heavy cattle and 1½ cents per pound on lighter cattle. Exports increased, reaching $12,000,000 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930. Following this increase in trade the duty was raised in the tariff act of June, 1930, the new rates being 3 cents per pound on cattle weighing 700 pounds or more and 2½ cents per pound on lighter cattle. Under the increased tariffs, exports fell during the next fiscal year, 1931, to $1,369,000 and have dropped further each year since.

The same story is true with respect to beef cattle, fresh beef, mutton and lamb, cream, butter, condensed milk, cattle hides and skins, leather and fish, and I suggest that the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite, which they have repeated so many times in the house and oftener in the country, that the tariff policies of this party from 1930 on were responsible for the loss of our markets, has absolutely no foundation in fact and indeed is contrary to the record, which is as follows:

Fresh Beef

For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1921, the last year that fresh beef entered the United States duty free, exports from Canada reached $5,829,181. Under the emergency tariff, May 27, 1921, of 2 cents per pound, exports for the next fiscal year fell to $2,550,-093. From September 21, 1922, the rate became 3 cents per pound. Nevertheless the trade recovered and for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930, reached $4,115,625. Then the tariff law enacted June 17, 1930, increased the rate to 6 cents per pound. For the first fiscal year under this tariff exports dropped to $465,473, and have since undergone further reductions.

Mutton and Lamb

Mutton and lamb exports which under the duty free tariff reached over $1,000,000 per year have disappeared altogether under various tariff increases. The rate under the tariff of June 17, 1930, became 5 cents per pound on mutton and 7 cents per pound on lamb.

Cream

Under a tariff of 20 cents per gallon our cream exports to the United States reached $7,749,341 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1927. Even under a tariff of 30 cents per gallon, imposed June 13, 1929, exports for that fiscal year, ended March 31, 1930, were $4,679,804. The tariff then was raised (June 17, 1930) to 56·6 cents per gallon. When the fiscal year ended (March 31, 1931), the trade under this tariff had dropped to $2,168,849. For the next fiscal year, ended March 31, 1932, it had fallen to $129,285.

Butter

The United States tariff on butter was advanced as follows:

May 27, 1921, from 2½ cents to 6 cents per pound;

September 21, 1922, from 6 cents to 8 cents per pound;

April 5, 1926, from 8 cents to 12 cents per pound;

June 17, 1930, from 12 cents to 14 cents per pound.

The trade which under a tariff of 2½ cents per pound was $5,712,727 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1920, and $3,156,951 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1921, dropped to $1,080,357 the first year under the tariff of 6 cents per pound. The first year under the rate of 12 cents per pound, that is for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1927, exports dropped to $106,718 and with the exception of one year has been much lower each year since.

Condensed Milk

Exports of condensed milk for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1921, were $2,352,319, the last year it was free. The tariff was gradually increased becoming 1·8 to 3¾ cents per pound from June 17, 1930. The trade has dwindled to nothing.

Cattle Hides and Skins

Cattle hides and skins were duty free until June 17, 1930, when 10 per cent ad valorem was imposed. Canadian exports which had been averaging $5,000,000 per year had dropped to less than $2,000,000.

Leather

Exports of harness leather, upper leather and sole leather for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930, the last year they were free, totalled $4,763,535, but under new tariff rates of 12½ per cent and 15 per cent ad valorem, fell to $2,649,643 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1931. They have since declined further.

Fish

Fish which was mainly duty free under the tariff of 1913 was subjected to duties in the tariff of 1922 ranging from 1 cent to 2½ cents per pound while some classes were further increased in the tariff act of 1930.

Let us see what the effect in dollars and cents was of the tariff increases of other nations against this country. Let us take wheat and wheat flour under the French tariff. The French tariff on wheat was, as I have indicated, eleven cents a bushel prior to January 7, 1924. On May 20, 1930, it was increased to eighty-five cents per bushel. As other factors, notably the French crop and milling restrictions, influence the trade, we cannot attempt to trace the effect of the tariff on the actual trade, but this high rate of duty was undoubtedly a disadvantage to us. The actual rate being eighty francs for one hundred kilograms or 220 pounds, the equivalent is now much more than eighty-five cents per bushel on account of money being depreciated in terms of the French franc.

The same reasoning is true all the way down the line.

Wheat Flour

The duty on wheat flour entering France was increased at the same time as wheat. Rates on January 7, 1924, ranged from 24 to 34 cents per 100 pounds, depending on percentage of extraction of flour from the wheat. These rates were on March 20, 1930, advanced to a range of $2.28 to $3.29 per 100 pounds. It is true Canada has not shipped large quantities of flour to France but under the high tariff there has been no possibility of trade.

Oats

The French tariff on oats which on April 7, 1926, was as low as 4 cents per bushel became 18 cents on July 9, 1930. Canada's exports of oats to France for the fiscal year 1921 reached $1,180,000. The trade is intermittent but during the fiscal year before the tariff increase was $303,688 and none at all for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1931, during most of which period the increased new rate was the rate in force.

Apples

The French tariff on apples, which was as low as 5 cents per 100 pounds on April 7, 1926, was on March 2, 1928, advanced to 27 cents on boxed apples and 14 cents on others.

Farm Implements

The French tariff on mowing machines, binders and reapers which on April 7, 1926, was as low as 48 cents per 100 pounds was increased on September 6, 1927, to $1.07 per 100 pounds on some and $1.43 on others. Canadian exports of these articles to France were $2,090,668 during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1927, that is, immediately before the increase, but fell to $436,640 for the first complete fiscal year after the increase. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930, the exports of these machines had fallen to $367,666.

Crude Zinc

Crude zinc, which was duty free in 1921, became dutiable at the rate of 25 cents per 100 pounds on March 2, 1928.

Lead in Pigs

On May 17, 1922, France increased the duty on lead in pigs from 13 cents to 32 cents per 100 pounds.

The same story is true with respect to Germany and every other European country except Great Britain. The record with regard to Germany is as follows:

Germany: Tariff Increases

Wheat

All wheat entered Germany duty free from May 1, 1922, to September 1, 1925. On the latter date a duty equal to 23 cents per bushel was imposed on wheat except where concessions were granted on condition that a quantity of German wheat be exported equivalent to the quantity of foreign wheat imported. The rate on wheat imported in the ordinary way was increased from time to time until by April 25, 1930, it had reached the equivalent of 98 cents per bushel. While the direct bearing of the tariff increases on wheat is not traceable in our trade returns, obviously this German duty hampered our exports of wheat to that country.

Wheat Flour

Wheat flour which had been entering Germany duty free from May 1, 1922, was on September 1, 1925, subjected to a rate equivalent to about 85 cents per 100 pounds and was increased for practically each subsequent year until on April 25, 1930, the rate had risen to about $3.40 per 100 pounds. Canadian exports of flour to Germany for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1925, when flour was duty free, were $12,748,162. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930, the exports had fallen to $4,742,158.

Rye

Rye which had been entering Germany duty free from May 1, 1922, was on September 1, 1925, subjected to a rate of 32 cents per 100 pounds. The rate was subsequently increased at different intervals until on May 26, 1930, the duty had risen to $1.62 per 100 pounds. Canadian exports of rye to Germany for the year ended March 31, 1925, when rye was free of duty, were $1,073,922. The trade fluctuated and, while under the increased tariff exports were sometimes larger than formerly, the high duty, it will be seen, was a severe barrier to trade. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930, our exports had dropped to $321,151.

The situation with regard to Belgium is as follows:

Belgium: Tariff Increases

Cheese

The Belgian tariff on cheese between 1921 and 1926 was 24 francs per 100 kilograms. As the money fluctuates the rate in Canadian money during that time ranged from 35 to 81 cents per 100 pounds. For the last year of this low rate, that is the fiscal year ended March 31, 1926, Canada's exports of cheese to Belgium were $795,082. On June 28, 1926, the tariff was increased threefold in Belgian money, that is to 72 francs per 100 kilograms, equalling in Canadian money at that time about $1 per 100 pounds. Following this increase in the tariff Canada's exports fell from $795,082 for the fiscal year 1926 to $79,272 for the fiscal year 1927. The trade had declined to $29,329 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930.

Condensed Milk

In 1921 condensed milk entered Belgium at 30 francs per 100 kilograms ($1.05 per 100 pounds). On November 10, 1924 the rate was increased to 60 francs per 100 kilograms ($1.26 per 100 pounds), and again on June 14, 1926, to 125 francs per 100 kilograms ($1.68 per 100 pounds). Canadian exports of condensed milk to Belgium, which amounted to $168,018 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1922, when the tariff was 30 francs per 100 kilograms, decreased to $250 for the fiscal year 1926-27 under the tariff of 125 francs. Since then there has been practically no trade.

Upper Leather

The duty on upper leather entering Belgium was increased on April 11, 1921, from 15 francs per 100 kilograms to 60 francs, i.e. from 50 cents to $2.04 per 100 pounds at the current rate of exchange. The rate in Belgian money was further increased on November 10, 1924, to 90 francs per 100 kilograms ($1.89 per 100 pounds at current exchange), and again on June 28, 1926, to 120 francs per 100 kilograms ($1.51 per 100 pounds).

Therefore I think we may well conclude that the record itself is positive evidence that the position and charge of hon gentlemen opposite are wholly unfounded What was the policy of this government? Having corrected the situation so far as Canadian industry and labour were concerned, that is to say, in order to give an equal opportunity to Canadians in our own industries, this government decided and has always had in view certain major considerations We are a debtor nation, and it has always been recognized by everyone, by any right thinking man in this country, especially by the Conservative party, that after first making reasonable provision for Canadian industry and labour, we should endeavour by every legitimate means to extend our foreign trade The two are not incompatible. To this end the government devoted its energy, and I venture to say that in four years it has made more beneficial trade treaties than the former government did in nine years. This is the record and it speaks for itself:

We have made eleven trade treaties in that time with the following countries,

A comprehensive preferential agreement with the United Kingdom embracing within its terms the colonial empire as well.

A new and enlarged agreement with Australia.

For the first time, formal agreements with New Zealand, South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, and the Irish Free State.

A trade treaty of broad scope with France, which for the first time, is mutually binding and mutually satisfactory, in place of one which involved the granting of fixed rates by Canada without corresponding obligations by France and which did not give us the French minimum tariff on all our leading exports to that country.

A commercial arrangement securing most favoured nation treatment from Germany, a country with which our trade relations had long been unsatisfactory.

An arrangement securing most favoured nation treatment from Austria.

An arrangement whereby we obtained most favoured nation treatment from Brazil.

A comprehensive agreement with Poland now ready for signature.

Nor is that all. The government—this so-called "high tariff" government—is negotiating for a trade agreement with the United States; it is negotiating not only with those countries I have mentioned but with two other of the principal and important European countries as well, and also two other countries. No other government in the world, not excepting the government of England, strives more continuously or more effectively to clear the channels of trade.

This is a brief resume of the Canadian trade agreements since August 7, 1930, in the order of their dates, as follows:

Country	Date	Terms of Agreement
Australia	July 8, 1931	Each country accords the other reduced rates on schedules of goods, and otherwise (with a few exceptions in Australia) exchange their British preferential tariffs with each other. In force from August 3, 1931.
Brazil	December 4, 1931	By exchange of notes Canada grants her intermediate tariff in return for most-favoured-nation treatment in Brazil. Except for this agreement, Canada would be under new Brazilian tariff schedule adopted December 11, 1931, one-quarter higher than minimum tariff.
New Zealand	April 23, 1932	Exchanges specific preferences on scheduled goods and otherwise concedes British preferential tariffs reciprocally. Made for one year from date of going into force, May 24, 1932, but since prolonged and now in force until May 24, 1935.
United Kingdom	August 20, 1932	Various new concessions on both sides, increasing preferences formerly granted without written trade agreement. Also extends the preferential system between Canada and the colonial empire.

I want to make one reference to the United Kingdom agreement. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that this treaty has been one-sided and unfair to the United Kingdom, because it is alleged that we have secured under this treaty greater benefits than has the mother country. The figures of course indicate that we have sold more to the United Kingdom than we have purchased from them.

Mr. RALSTON I did not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it has been said. I think the hon. gentleman's own leader said it; he says almost anything that comes into his head. What happened is this: We have been selling to England primary products which practically sell themselves so far as immediate sales in the English market are concerned, while they have been wanting to sell us manufactured goods that in many cases have not hitherto been on our market; that requires high class salesmanship and requires time. That is one reason why they have not done quite as well as we have, but we have done our full duty in the premises, and in this budget we have enlarged, at the specific request of the British government itself, the number of articles on the free list. The hon. gentleman made a play on words the other day with respect to mechanical toys. I wonder whether he made any investigation with regard to that item before he made that statement.

Mr. RALSTON: I mentioned toy construction sets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought he did. I want to tell him if he does not know it—and I am sure he does—that is an important article of commerce in the United Kingdom. We annually import large quantities of that sort of thing into Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: How much?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot give the hon. member the figures, but I shall get them for him; they are readily available. I am not a walking encyclopaedia and I have not taken four days including Sunday in the preparation of this speech, either.

Mr. RALSTON: Apparently somebody else has.

Mr. EULER: It is not as good a speech, either.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That item was put into the budget at the specific request of the British government, and is evidence of the good faith of this country towards the motherland. I have no doubt it will redound to their advantage.

Then the list of agreements continues as follows:

Country	Date	Terms of Agreement
Irish Free State.. ..	August 20, 1932..	Canada concedes British preferential tariff in return for most-favoured-nation treatment in Irish Free State. Formerly each country exchanged. British preferential schedules without agreement.
Union of South Africa.	August 20, 1932..	Agreement extends list of preferences formerly exchanged in absence of written agreement.
Southern Rhodesia.. ..	August 20, 1932..	Confirms exchange of British preferential rates and provides for stated preference on some goods.
Germany..	December 27, 1932. Renewed March 31, 1933, and again on December 23, 1933, for indefinite period.	By exchange of notes Canada grants her intermediate tariff in return for most-favoured-nation treatment in Germany. Canada thus escaped a German super tariff 2 to 10 times higher on many items than the normal general tariff and also secured benefit of such German treaty rates as exist from time to time.
France..	May 12, 1933. In force June 10, 1933. Enlarged by additional protocol, mostly in effect from October 1, 1934, and approved by a Canadian act, assented to March 21, 1935.. ..	Canada as regards scheduled goods grants either her actual intermediate tariff or reductions from intermediate. France grants her minimum tariff on scheduled goods or percentage reductions from her general tariff. France also removes an 11 per cent ad valorem depreciated currency surtax against Canada and reduces to 2 per cent an "import tax" which was 4 per cent on some goods and 6 per cent on others.
Austria..	July 5, 1933. Renewed December 29, 1933, and again on January 14, 1935, for indefinite period.. .	Canadian intermediate tariff is exchanged for most-favoured-nation treatment in Austria, which secures for Canadian goods entering Austria guarantee of treaty rates existing between Austria and other countries.

These agreements extend the list of preferences formerly exchanged in the absence of written agreements.

In addition to these ten new trade agreements, the government has been actively engaged in the negotiation of others. Negotiations which have been in progress between Canada and Poland for a trade agreement with that country are now far advanced. Negotiations are also in progress with the United States and with some other countries, notably two in Europe, with which Canada does extensive trade. When the whole program is completed we will be in a position to say that Canada has the most extensive and most favourable trade agreements with the whole world she has ever had. It is a program greater in extent than ever attempted before by any Canadian government.

Mr. RALSTON: And less trade.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I propose to discuss that point in a moment; possibly I might as well deal with it now. In the course of his speech the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth stated that we had done a great deal less trade; I believe that is the effect of his observations. Apparently he is content to ignore the fact that since 1929 Canada in common with all other world trading countries has been going through the worst period of depression the world has ever known, whereby not only prices but also volume of commodities have greatly decreased.

Mr. RALSTON: I mentioned it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if you did, it must have been during the time you put us to sleep. I never heard the hon. member mention it, except—

Mr. ELLIOTT: "Stunned" I think, not "asleep."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have only forty minutes in which to speak, and I would ask hon. members opposite to allow me to proceed.

In the course of his arguments the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth made the statement, as reported at page 2103 of Hansard, that the average annual trade of this country for the five year period ending March 31, 1930, the time hon. members opposite were in power, was $2,372,192,198, and that the total trade in the same period was $11,860,960,000. On the other hand he stated that for the five year period ending March 31, 1935, the annual average was $1,190,985,038, and that the total during that five year period was only $5,954,925,194. I have not had an opportunity to verify those figures, but I assume they are substantially correct. No doubt the hon. member obtained them from the bureau of statistics.

My first observation in reply is that in the last five year period to which the hon. member referred world trade fell from 66 billion dollars in the year 1928-29 to just about 25 billion dollars, representing a decline of no less than 62 per cent. During the same period the trade of Canada declined only about 50 per cent, so that the statement made from time to time that Canada has come through the depression better than most countries has a real basis of fact.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the figure of 66 billion dollars for the five year period?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand figures issued by the League of Nations indicate that world trade fell from 66 billion dollars to 25 billion dollars.

Mr. RALSTON: In what period?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the second five year period.

Mr. RALSTON: The 66 billion dollars is for the first five pear period?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I do not think that is correct. There was a general decline of trade from 66 billion dollars to 25 billion dollars, representing a fall of 62 per cent, while in a comparable period the trade of Canada fell only 50 per cent. It must be borne in mind that the value of commodities during the previous period, on a dollar basis, was in many cases more than double.

Mr. RALSTON: What is that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The value on a dollar basis, prior to 1930, fell by about 50 per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: Did the dollar fall?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, but the value of commodities fell. The hon. member knows very well what I am trying to indicate, and the interjections are quite unworthy of him. The real reason however for the apparent great decline in our foreign trade is based on two important factors, namely (1) the great decline in the dollar value of commodities; and (2) the closing of the doors to nearly all our products by reason of the action of our neighbours to the south in placing practically prohibitive tariffs against us in the Hawley-Smoot tariff which went into effect in June 1930. When we consider these two elements we may well congratulate ourselves that our foreign trade came through as well as it did.

I should like to speak very briefly respecting the question of trade arrangements with the United States. I submit any extended statement as to the negotiations for a trade treaty with the president and the executive of the United States would be neither advisable nor desirable at this particular juncture, when representations and briefs have just been filed with the United States authorities under the terms of their legislation and are now under consideration. But it will do no harm at this time to restate briefly the position of the Conservative party as outlined by the Prime Minister in his speech in the session of 1933, found at page 2261 of Hansard, where he reviews the whole position, beginning as far back as 1879 when the national policy was introduced into this country, and in which he traced the history of the movement, including the legislation of 1888, 1890 and 1894 under the old Conservative government, and the legislation of 1897 under the Laurier administration, and again in 1923; in all of which there were standing offers of reciprocal trade arrangements on the part of the parliament of Canada. In the face of all these offers the tariff of the United States was steadily raised against Canada, with the exception of a brief period during the democratic administration of President Wilson. During which time we enjoyed practically all the advantages of the proposed agreement of 1911. I would particularly call the attention of the house to the language of the Prime Minister at page 2267, in which he uses the following words:

> We must concede the absolute right of the United States Congress to determine what it conceives to be best in the interests of that country. That is clear. In my judgment all we can do is follow the course that has been followed by successive governments and indicate clearly our willingness to negotiate on terms that are fair and reasonable, to quote the words that have been used by both Liberal and Conservative prime ministers and ministers of finance. We can only be ready and willing to avail ourselves of any proposals that are fair and reasonable and are not of such a character as will involve injury to this country if they are speedily terminated. I regard that as a factor of the utmost importance, and I believe I always shall, because I never have seen any answer to that argument, whether it be the notice that terminated that reciprocity agreement in 1864 or 1865, or the more recent termination of the Wilson tariff statute.

The negotiations are going on and in my opinion no good purpose will be served by continuing the discussion here.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, speaking to the subamendment may I say that on February 3, 1933, as appearing at page 1805 of Hansard the following question was put to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote):

> Mr. Pouliot: If the tariff is lowered will there be any further necessity for inflation? If trade becomes normal will not our currency also return to normal?
> Mr. Coote: The more tariffs we remove the sooner our money will return to its proper level.

The same matter was referred to on March 27, 1933, at page 3427 of Hansard, and the hon. member did not object to it. At page 4459 of the Hansard of May 1, 1933, the same matter was referred to by the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and the hon. member for Macleod spoke as follows:

> I do not think my hon. friend has quoted me correctly. Although we might have free trade, I think this country has been deflated to such a point that we must have inflation to correct the situation. I was in error if I gave the answer which the hon. gentleman attributes to me.

But he had said, "The more tariffs we remove the sooner our money will return to its proper level." That is very clear, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not insist any more about it.

In his speech this afternoon the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) said that it was when the Liberal government was in power that Canada lost her markets. I have a few remarks to make on that same subject of markets but with this difference, that I shall submit that the time when Canada lost her markets was from 1930 until the present under this Conservative administration. The hon. minister was kind enough some time ago to give me some information about the proportion of the United Kingdom's trade with empire countries to total world trade for the calendar years 1929 to 1933, and I find there that the proportion is as follows:

(Calendar Years, 1929 to 1933)

Years	Imports %	Exports %	Total trade %
1929..	4.9	4.8	4.8
1930..	5.1	4.6	4.8
1931..	5.4	4.1	4.8
1932..	6.2	4.5	5.4
1933..	6.6	4.6	5.6

I am not making any point about the percentage of imports and exports because they are about the same, but the figures in the above table that I wish to stress are those showing the United Kingdom's empire trade as a percentage of total world trade, namely, in 1930, 4·8 per cent; 1931, 4·8 per cent; 1932, 5·4 per cent, and 1933, 5·6 per cent. But that does not represent the whole empire trade because it does not also include the trade of all other British countries between themselves.

It has already been put upon Hansard that the total British empire trade amounts to 9·1 per cent of world trade. Therefore the total empire trade, including the United Kingdom's trade with empire countries, is about 9·1 per cent of the total world's trade. That means that in accepting the Ottawa agreements this government has sacrificed the chances of Canada in 91 per cent of the total world's trade for 9·1 per cent of that trade. It shows that Canada now has opportunities in only a very small fraction of the world's trade.

In sessional paper No. 127 B, of February 4, 1935, the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) answered as follows for the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson):

Imports from the United Kingdom and other British countries were less for the twelve months ended August 31, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934 than for the same period in 1930; while exports to the United Kingdom were less for the twelve months ended August 31, 1931, 1932, 1933 than for the twelve months ended August 31, 1930, but greater for the same period in 1934 than in 1930; while exports to empire countries were less for the twelve months ended August 31, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934 than for the same period in 1930.

That means that Canada's empire trade has been much less since this government has been in power than under the previous Liberal administration. The answer of the hon. Secretary of State was to a question about exports to the United Kingdom, and his answer refers only to domestic exports and does not include Canada's exports of foreign merchandise. If the latter were included, as it should have been, it would have shown that in fact our total exports to the United Kingdom were not greater but less for the twelve months ended August 31, 1934, than for the same period in 1930.

Now I am going to give Canada's imports from and its domestic exports to the United Kingdom and other British countries for the years 1930 to 1934 inclusive, from the official return, sessional paper 127B, and others tabled the same day:

I.—Canadian Trade with United Kingdom

United Kingdom—Twelve months ended August 31	Imports from	Less than in 1930
1930..	$172,473,524	.....
1931..	132,094,882	$40,378,642
1932..	94,374,040	78,099,484
1933..	90,915,897	81,557,627
		$259,748,285

That shows that the total loss in Canada's imports from the United Kingdom from August 31, 1930, to September 1, 1934, was $259.000,000 in round figures. That is the loss sustained in our imports from the United Kingdom. Here are our domestic exports to the United Kingdom:

Domestic Exports to United Kingdom

		Less than in 1930
1930..	$258,980,455	.....
1931..	195,414,843	$63,565,612
1932..	168,674,283	90,306,172
1933..	197,634,504	61,345,951
1934..	259,015,456	35,001*
Less..		$215,182,734

* Increase.

There was an increase of $35,001 in 1934 as compared with 1930, but the above table does not include the export of foreign produce from Canada, or the figures would have been considerably different. The total loss in Canadian domestic exports to the United Kingdom from 1930 to 1934 was $215,000,000 in round figures.

Let us see for the same period Canada's trade with other British countries:

II.—Canadian Trade with other British Countries excluding United Kingdom

Other British countries	Imports from	Less than in 1930
1930..	$66,465,042
1932..	36,448,736	30,016,306
1933..	33,214,572	33,250,470
1934..	41,050,621	25,414,421
		$109,732,526

That shows a total loss in Canadian imports from other British countries than the United Kingdom of $109,000,000 in round figures.

Now our domestic exports to British countries other than the United Kingdom are as follows:

Other British Countries	Domestic exports to	Less than in 1930
1932..	41,471,154	48,919,853
1933..	39,950,609	50,440,398
1934..	61,107,113	29,283,894
		$158,792,045

That shows a total loss in domestic exports to British countries other than the United Kingdom for those four years of $158,000,000 in round figures.

Canada's empire trade, that is our trade with all empire countries, including the United Kingdom, was as follows:

Twelve months ended August 31	Imports from	Less than in 1930
1930	$238,938,566
1932	130,822,776	108,115,790
1933	124,130,469	114,808,097
1934	153,811,613	85,126,953
		$369,480,811

	Domestic Exports to	Less than in 1930
1930	$349,371,462
1931	255,657,950	$ 93,713,512
1932	210,145,437	139,226,025
1933	237,585,113	111,786,349
1934	320,122,569	29,248,893
		$373,974,779

	Imports and Domestic Exports	Less than in 1930
1930	$588,310,028
1931	433,166,545	$155,143,483
1932	340,968,213	247,341,815
1933	361,715,582	226,594,446
1934	473,934,182	114,375,846

It would appear that Canada's domestic exports to the United Kingdom were $35,001 more in 1934 than in 1930; but Canada's total exports, including foreign produce, to the United Kingdom, were in fact less in 1934 than in 1930. This is only a fraction of Canada's British trade. Canada's domestic exports to other British countries were $29,283,894 less for the same period. Canada's empire trade, including imports, in 1934 was $114,375,846 less than in the last year of the Mackenzie King government.

What benefits have been derived from the Ottawa agreements? The results of the general policy of this government and the increased tariffs it has put into effect are contained in an official return made on February 4 by the Secretay of State. This document states that Canada's monthly imports and domestic exports from September 1, 1929, to August 31, 1934, were less than for each month from September 1, 1929, to August 31, 1930. Ever since this government has been in power the monthly figures for our trade, both imports and exports, show a decrease for the corresponding month in the last year of the Liberal government. I should like to quote some figures which give a comparison between the monthly imports and exports in 1934 and in 1930. Mention will have to be made of the last four months in 1929 because these were included in the figures of the last year of the Mackenzie King government. These figures are:

I want to give the accurate and official figures so that hon. gentlemen opposite will know just what is occurring in connection with the trade of this country. If we look at the last reports of the Department of National Revenue we see that for the month of January 1935, the imports were $37,000,000. In January, 1930, they were $84,000,000. Therefore, if they were $5,000,000 more than in 1934 they were $47,000,000 less than in 1930. With regard to exports, for the month of January, 1935, the figure is approximately $3,000,000 less than in 1934. It is $43,901,000 in 1935; in January, 1930, it was $73,507,000, which means about $30,000,000 less than in 1930.

I have also a summary of Canadian trade published by the Department of National Revenue, showing last February imports as $37,000,000. In February, 1930, the figure was $80,000,000. The exports in that month were $46,000,000, and in February, 1930, it was $66,000,000. It shows that there also there was a great loss.

Something has been said about the value of gold. In this connection I have a letter from Mr. R. H. Coats, Dominion Statistician, with regard to the gold value of the Canadian dollar. I will quote it:

Ottawa, February 8, 1935.

Dear Mr. Pouliot:

Below are listed average annual values of the the Canadian dollar reckoned in terms of its old gold parity. These figures might be considered as the gold price of the Canadian dollar during the years in question.

	Gold value of the Canadian dollar Cents

Yours very truly,

R. H. Coats,
Dominion statistician.

With regard to the external trade of Canada, the figures are appalling, because since this government took power the external trade of the country has decreased by $4,000,000,000 over four years or an average of $3,000,000 a day. This I submit is astounding. Let me quote from a return, reference No. 59, February 2, 1935, tabled by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), being sessional paper No. 127. It shows that Canada's imports and exports in each month from September 1, 1930, to August 31, 1934, were less than for each month from September 1, 1929, to August 31, 1930. This table shows that the imports and exports have been less, each month, during the four years that this government has been in power, than they were during the corresponding month in the last year of the previous government. The imports, by years, were as follows:

Imports—		Decrease compared with 1929-30
1929-30	$1,114,307,827
1930-31	752,507,457	$ 361,800,370
1931-32	492,797,822	621,510,005
1932-33	380,695,437	733,612,390
1933-34	493,889,477	620,418,350
Total decrease		$2,337,341,115

The figures for the domestic exports from Canada for the same years are:

Exports—		Decrease compared with 1929-30
1929-30	$988,803,451
1930-31	693,862,469	$ 294,940,982
1931-32	521,707,343	467,096,108
1932-33	489,535,426	499,268,025
1933-34	630,616,527	358,186,924
Total decrease		$1,619,492,039

The total decrease was $1,619,492,039. The decrease in external trade from September 1, 1930 to August 31, 1934 was: Imports, $2,337,000,000; domestic exports, $1,619,000,000. The total decrease in trade during that period was $3,956,000,000.

With regard to our trade with the United States, for the twelve months ended August 31, the figures for the following years are:

United States
(Twelve months ended August 31)

1930	737,192,834	459,881,761	18,994,624
1931	474,188,829	292,838,351	10,878,989
1932	292,047,964	195,722,361	7,696,894
1933	210,804,261	148,587,571	4,585,445

I have here a letter from Mr. D. Leo Dolan, Director of the Canadian Travel Bureau of the Department of Railways, which is as follows:

Ottawa, January 22, 1935.

Dear Mr. Pouliot:

In compliance with your telephone request of this afternoon I am pleased to set out below the approximate amounts spent by United States citizens in Canada from 1929 to 1933, inclusive:

1931	250,000,000
1932	200,000,000
1933	117,000,000

With regard to the 1934 figures I may say that these have not been officially released as yet but I think it is safe to estimate that there will be an increase of about twenty-five per cent for 1934.

I shall endeavour to get you some further figures with regard to European traffic.

Very truly yours,

(Sgd.) D. Leo Dolan,
Director.

Canadian trade with the United States during the twelve months ended August 31, 1930, was:

Imports	$737,192,834
Total exports	478,876,385

The unfavourable balance of visible trade was $258,316,449, but the invisible trade was $275,000,000, therefore the favourable trade balance of Canadian trade with the United States, visible and invisible, was $17,000,000, during the last twelve months of the Mackenzie King government. Those figures are most important, although they were overlooked by our hon. friends on the other side when they were speaking all the time of the unfavourable balance of trade with the United States. They could not see it because it was invisible, but it was there just the same, and it was in the pockets of the Canadian people.

I shall not take up the time of the house further, as its time is very precious. I have put these figures on record in order that they may be available to those who want to study the true picture of our trade, as given by the government themselves and by their departments. It is astounding to note the great, the terrific decrease in Canadian trade since our friends opposite have been in office. I would not have spoken of it if they had not put the blame on the Liberal party, but as they did so an answer was called for. Now they have the figures and they should look at them because they originate with them. Perhaps they did not glance at them, but it is most important for them to know the real facts. It is absurd to make any comparison between this year or last year or the year 1932, because at that time the blasting had been done, our trade had been already destroyed; it is most unfair of the government to compare themselves with themselves. They should compare their record with that of the administration of this party. They blame us for the loss of our trade but they dare not go back and compare themselves with us. It is most unfair, it is unbelievable. President Roosevelt in the United States compares his administration with that of the last year of President Hoover's regime. That is fair. Why not make a similar comparison here? It is because the propaganda which was used during the last campaign, that things were bad then, cannot be used any more. Then the present Prime Minister and his satellites said everywhere, "Things are going bad, the country is going to the dogs." I heard myself some young men of McGill university, following the radio broadcasts, discussing whether our country was going to the dogs. We have lost since then and in four years, $3,000,000 a day in trade, the enormous and incredible sum of $4,000,000,000; each year since this government came into power we have lost $1,000,000,000 and now they try to blame us for that. The people will not take the supporters of this government seriously.

Before closing may I tell my friend the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) how much I was interested in hearing his speech. It was very complete. If I have taken the liberty of giving some figures to the house it was not in the least to add anything to his observations, which were to the point and gave a true picture of conditions in this country, but I just wanted to put some official figures on record, in view of the distortion of facts which has come from the other side of the house.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): At the outset of my remarks may I extend to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) my congratulations upon the very able manner in which he presented the budget for this fiscal year. It is not a political budget, not a budget to mislead the people of this country but the budget of a business man setting forth the facts as they are, and one which the future will justify.

Until I heard the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, especially that of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) I was undecided whether or not I should participate in this debate. But as they have repeated the assertion that this government and the Conservative party have strangled the external trade of our country and, as they are constantly doing, have claimed that this party is a party of high tariffs, and as I come from a constituency bordering on the United States I felt that I could not let this occasion pass without stating once more the actual facts in regard to the tariff. Before going into that, however, I should like to say a few words concerning the speech made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. At the beginning of his speech he said:

> I am of the opinion that the people of this country want a general election at the earliest possible moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GOBEIL: I hear some hon. gentlemen saying "Hear, hear."

Mr. GERSHAW: That is right.

Mr. GOBEIL: Are hon. gentlemen opposite as anxious as they seem to be for a general election? Have they confidence in the judgment of the electors? I hear nobody saying, "Hear, hear." I can only conclude that they are not as confident of the result of the coming election as they would try to lead people of this country to believe. I see two principal reasons for that. One is not only a reason but a proof that my hon. friends are not at all anxious to have an election now, "without delay," as they say. If that be true why should they want to disfranchise a couple of hundred thousand electors? If they were so confident of the verdict of the electors why should they be clamouring to have an election now or within a couple of months, thereby disfranchising all the boys and girls who have come of age or will come of age between the date of the making up of the list last year and the next revision in May? If my hon. friends were as confident as they claim to be they would want to have these boys and girls vote so as to enlarge their majority. But they know that these boys and girls are not going to vote for the Liberal party. They know very well that the youth of to-day are thinking seriously, that they realize that the civilized world is at the parting of the ways and that this government has done all that could possibly be done. The youth of this country do not overlook, as my hon. friends opposite always do, that we have been passing through a depression for six years. They are aware of that, and they also realize that this government has done everything that could be done to minimize the seriousness of the depression, and that it is now passing legislation which will give the youth of the country a chance. Of course I can only speak for myself, but personally I would urge the government not to dissolve parliament, or at least not to have a general election, before all those young people, who will probably number around two hundred thousand, have their names put on the lists and have a chance to have their say in the election of the next parliament.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it the intention of the government to defer the election until the Dionne quintuplets are able to vote?

Mr. GOBEIL: I said that I was speaking for myself. At all events I am not aware of the intention of the government, but even if parliament were to prorogue before Easter—and every hon. member knows that is impossible—we could not have a general election before the end of May or the first part of June. This would mean that the electorate would be called upon to cast their votes while the revision of the lists was in progress, with the consequence that all the boys and girls who should have an opportunity to express their opinion at the polls would not be able to do so.

I want to refer to another remark made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. In the course of his address he said: "The farmers are submerged." I am not going to dispute those words, but I am afraid many people forget that the farmers have not got into debt since 1930. I do not think there is one farmer out of a hundred who since 1930 contracted a new mortgage or went into debt heavily. My hon. friends opposite claim that the farmers are in a desperate plight, and we agree with them in that. But if the farmers are in a desperate condition, it is because they went into debt during the supposed prosperity from, if you like, 1925 to 1930; that is the time when, as every hon. member knows, the farmers contracted their debts. Since 1930 they have not been able to repay their debts, but those who did not have any, have managed to live fairly well. The troubles from which the farmers are suffering to-day were contracted under the previous administration; no one can dispute that.

To come to the main remarks I intend to make, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) at the beginning of his speech said:

> At long last the government had come to realize that the trade and tariff policies which had been nearly the ruination of this country for the past four years had been futile.

Those are the words that caused me to decide to make a few remarks in this debate. I have absolutely no apology for saying that I am a party man, that I believe in the party system. Under our system of government we must have parties. I believe also the role of the opposition is perhaps just as important and necessary to good conduct of the affairs of the country as is the role of the government of the day. The duty, the role of the opposition is to criticize the government when it deserves criticism. But in order to fulfil its function, the opposition must make honest criticism, criticism that will not mislead the electorate. I say very definitely that my hon. friends opposite know very well that the tariff changes that have been made since 1930 have not been the cause of the ruination of this country in the last four years.

I want to put on Hansard some actual and specific figures. My notes are pretty well along the lines of the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson), so that as I do not want to duplicate his observations, I shall have to be careful and cut down some of mine. In view of the repeated declarations of hon. gentlemen opposite—and they make declarations in a general way; they do not point to any specific rate of duty raised by this government as being the cause of loss of trade—it is necessary that we dot some of the i's and cross some of the t's. I am going to mention just a few items, but before doing so I want to repeat in a general way what has already been said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, namely, that almost every country in the world during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite raised its tariff duties against Canada, in such a way that in many cases the tariffs were absolutely exclusive. Let me cite a few items of the French tariff, as follows:

Commodity	When tariff imposed	Tariff
Wheat	January, 1924	11 cents a bushel
	May, 1930	85 cents a bushel
Cheese	April 7, 1926	45 cents per cwt.
	1928	$1.78 per cwt.
Butter	April 7, 1926	40 cents per cwt.
	June 3, 1930	$3.55 per cwt.
Refined lard	April 7, 1926	60 cents per cwt.
	July 19, 1930	$4.45 per cwt.
Fresh apples (in boxes of 44 pounds)	April 7, 1926	05 cents per cwt.
	March 2, 1928	27 cents per cwt.

So much for France. I could keep on mentioning pretty nearly every natural product in Canada where tariffs of foreign countries against Canada have been almost prohibitive. Let me now quote a few items from the German tariff duties, as follows:

Commodity	When tariff imposed	Tariff
Wheat	May 1, 1922	Free
	April 25, 1930	98 cents per bushel
Butter	May 1, 1922	Free
	July 15, 1929	$ 5.50 per cwt. (or 5½ cents a pound)
Cattle	May 1, 1922	Free
	December 21, 1929	$ 2.90 per cwt.
Rubber footwear (unvarnished)	1921	$ 7.61 per cwt.
	October 25, 1923	$22.70 per cwt.
Oats	May 1, 1922	Free
	March 27, 1930	44 cents per bushel

Then we have the figures for the following countries:

Italy

Commodity	When tariff imposed	Tariff
Wheat	1921	Free
	May 4, 1929	73½ cents per bushel
Ham	1921	Free
	April 20, 1927	$2.19 per cwt.

Belgium

Cheese	1921	81 cents per cwt.
	1926	97 cents per cwt.
Evaporated milk	1921	Free
	June 7, 1926	40 cents per cwt.
Condensed milk	1921	$1.01 per cwt.
	June 7, 1926	$1.68 per cwt.

Japan

Wheat	1921	18 cents per bushel
	1930	34 cents per bushel
Oatmeal	1921	$2.00 per cwt.
	1930	$3.57 per cwt.
Douglas fir	1921	Free
	1930	$4.55 per 1,000 feet

China

Bacon and ham	1921	$1.02 per cwt.
	1930	$5.14 per cwt.
Butter	1921	$1.54 per cwt.
	1930	$5.88 per cwt.
Condensed milk	1921	55 cents per cwt.
	1930	$1.96 per cwt.

Mexico

Wheat	1923	60 cents per bushel
	August, 1930	$1.05 per bushel
Bacon	1923	05 cents
	1930	12½ cents
Butter	1923	3¾ cents
	1930	15 cents
Cheese	1923	2½ cents

I should add that rates were changed, so far as Japan was concerned, on ham, bacon, butter, cheese, and condensed milk. I wonder, further, what the members from British Columbia think about the change made in the rate on Douglas fir. Then, in addition to the rates I have indicated for Mexico may I add that the duty was raised on lard, eggs, apples and on canned fruits from 12½ cents to 50 cents.

I do not wish to take further time in quoting the rates, but the figures I have given will serve to indicate the amount of the increases. I could go on at greater length, giving the rates for different countries, but because I have further observations to make I shall not take time to do so.

May I now turn to our position so far as the United States is concerned. This phase of the matter has been fully covered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson), but I believe I would do well to repeat the changes of tariff which have taken place in connection with cattle, particularly in view of the fact that my constituents are very much interested in this phase of the matter. I feel confident that when the next election is held the electors of Compton will not forget that when hon. members opposite took office in 1921 Canada could export cattle free to the United States. I do not think they will forget further that in the twelve months previous to placing a tariff of three cents per pound on cattle weighing more than 700 pounds and two and a half cents per pound on cattle weighing less than 700 pounds we exported over a quarter of a million head of cattle to the United States. I do not think either that they will forget the fact that during the term of office of hon. members opposite the tariff was raised. Although they will not forget, I should like to remind them.

Concerning trade with the United States may I place only one figure on Hansard. All hon. members know that due to tariffs against us in 1930 all natural products of Canada were shut out of the American market, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce made reference to our adverse trade balance with the United States. I have before me a statement prepared by the bureau of statistics indicating that in the eight years hon. members opposite held office the total adverse balance of trade in goods with that country was valued at $1,583,141,921.

What was the result of raises in tariffs imposed against Canada by almost every country? It was that between 1925 and 1930 our exports from year to year decreased while, on the other hand, because of the fact that hon. members opposite took no action against the United States when the markets of that country were closed to our products, our imports increased. I find that in the year 1925 our imports from all countries amounted to $878,000,000, in round figures, and for the same year our exports were valued at $1,271,000,000. Hon. members will recall that many of the figures I gave previously related to tariffs imposed against us by different countries in the year 1926. We find that in 1926 our imports had increased to $993,000,000 and our exports decreased to $1,269,000,000. That may be only a slight decrease, but that small figure taken in conjunction with the increase in imports of over $115,000,000 was quite alarming. We find that in 1927 our imports were valued at $1,068,000,000, again an increase of nearly $75,000,000. In that year our exports decreased to $1,218,000,000. In 1928 our imports continued to increase, reaching in that year a value of $1,198,000,000, while in the same year our exports were $1,350,000,000. This was our peak year.

In examining the trade figures for the eight principal countries of the world I found that in each, with the exception of Canada, the peak trade year was in 1929, while our peak year was in 1928. In my view that is a clear indication of the effect of tariffs imposed by different countries against Canada. However there is another significant fact. As I have said, our peak year for exports was the year 1928, and one might imagine that under normal circumstances it would be the peak year for imports. That however is not the fact. While our exports to the world decreased from $1,350,000,000 in 1928 to $1,182,000,000 in 1929, our imports increased from $1,198,000,000 in 1928 to $1,273,000,000 in 1929. The result was, as mentioned by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that for the first time in the last twenty-five years Canada had an adverse trade balance of over $100,000,000, or to be exact $103,000,000. That was due undoubtedly to the effect of the raising of tariffs against us by the different countries of the world, and hon. gentlemen opposite never objected to that action. I think that is an honest picture of the facts, Mr. Speaker, and I invite hon. members opposite to correct me if I am wrong. If I am wrong, then the figures given me by the bureau of statistics are wrong, but in my opinion there is no clearer indication or proof that Canada lost all her foreign markets under the administration of hon gentlemen opposite. When I say all, I do not mean that we did not trade with anybody else at all, but we had the wrong end of the stick. Although other countries were raising their tariffs against us we stood still, and in the years 1929 and 1930 we became the dumping ground of the whole world, with the result that we had an adverse balance of trade of $103,000,000.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) in his speech quoted some of the remarks that had been made by the right hon. the Prime Minister, and I want to quote them too. He quoted the Prime Minister as saying:

> Tell me, when did free trade fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you.

That promise of the Prime Minister has been fulfilled one hundred per cent. My hon. friend quoted the Prime Minister further as follows:

> It is true we must have foreign markets, and as I said the other evening, we will blast a way to those markets with any exportable surpluses. We do not have to worry about that.

The Prime Minister has made good on that too. The Minister of Trade and Commerce gave to the house this afternoon the number of treaties that have been made with foreign countries by this government, but, Mr. Speaker, it is results we want, and the results are here. Although this country was passing through the worst depression that the civilized world has ever experienced when this government took hold of affairs in this country, and although we had then an adverse balance of trade of $103,000,000, the action of this government under those difficult circumstances has changed an adverse balance of trade of $103,000,000 into a favourable balance in 1934 of $147,000,000.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite may say, as they have said before, that trade balances do not tell the whole story, but it is a well recognized fact that there is a big difference between a debtor country and a creditor country. Everybody knows that a new country which has to be developed must have money in one of two ways; it must either borrow a lot of money from the outside world or it must have a favourable balance of trade. In other words, it must have foreign money coming in by other channels than borrowing if it is to develop. I do not think it is disputed by anybody that it is better for a new country to have that foreign money coming into its borders through a favourable balance of trade than through borrowing, and so, Mr. Speaker, both in regard to the trade of this country and the tariffs of this country, I feel absolutely confident that the government will receive the full support of the electors because I believe that the electors are more interested than ever in public affairs, are reading more about them and are better posted on them than at any time in the past.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then why aren't you willing to give them a chance?

Mr. GOBEIL: This government is willing to give them a chance, and they will have full opportunity to decide whom they want to govern during the next four years, but at the same time it is only fair that this government should have the opportunity to pass all the legislation that has been brought down and that was broadcast by the Prime Minister, and my hon. friend knows very well that that legislation cannot be passed and an election held in a month from now. But, Mr. Speaker, I say that this government will have the full support of the people because it is a government of action, and what this country wants now, and more especially the youth of this country, is a government of action.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, not a government of words.

Mr. GOBEIL: My time is nearly up, Mr. Speaker, or I should have liked to mention a few of the bills that have been passed this session, but it is not necessary because my hon. friends know what has been done, although they may not know all that is going to be done. Unless they are absolutely insincere when they speak in this house, it must be that they do not feel the pulse of the people, or they would not have opposed many of the bills which this government has brought down. I will mention the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. That was a good law, and my hon. friends opposite should have realized that since it has been passed it has been very well looked upon and has rendered invaluable service to the farmers of this country although it is just beginning to operate. When we hear hon. gentlemen opposite making statements about that act such as we heard a few days ago, it simply means that they are not aware of what the electors are thinking or they would not make such statements. Only yesterday a Liberal member of the legislature of the province of Quebec made a speech in the provincial legislature praising the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. That was a Liberal member of the provincial legislature, Mr. Lamoureux, representing the county of Iberville. He said that that law was very advantageous to the farmers of the province of Quebec and to the farmers of Canada generally. I might also mention the marketing act, the amendments to the Farm Loan Act, and the legislation that has been brought down this session, the minimum wage law, the eight hour day law, and so on. Again I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that it is absolutely necessary in order to do justice to this government as well as to the electors of this country that all the legislation that has been brought down by this government should be passed before there is an appeal to the people. It is also necessary that everyone entitled to vote should be given the opportunity of voting at the next elections. The electors should have the opportunity of forming an opinion as to the effect of the legislation passed by the present government and I do not think this government should be in a hurry to have the elections. Personally, I am not.

Mr. CHARLES BELEC (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with other hon. members in congratulating our exceedingly able Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon the presentation of such a splendid budget. This budget has been described as a poor man's budget and I think that is the proper description, because it goes further than any other budget in the history of Canada in redistributing the wealth of the country and in placing the burden of taxes upon those most able to pay them. I want to emphasize the fact that the reform policies started last year by this government have helped the country through these very trying times. I should like to outline a few of the achievements of the Bennett government.

This government introduced the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which has saved and will save thousands of farmers from the foreclosure of the mortgages against their properties. Many farmers in the county which I have the honour to represent have already taken advantage of this legislation. By means of the official receivers who have been appointed an effort is being made to arrange for settlements between the farmers and their creditors. It has been felt essential that any feeling of distrust which may now exist between the two groups should be dissipated and that simple machinery has been constructed for the purpose of providing a better understanding between the farmer and his creditors and to bring about a feeling of renewed hope in the rural sections of Canada.

The Bennett government passed the Natural Products Marketing Act which has been of great assistance in raising the prices of agricultural products. I would remind hon. members who come from rural constituencies that the value of our field crops produced in 1934 was $544,975,000, a gain of $91,377,000 over 1933. It might be interesting to note that we are again exporting cattle to the United States.

It must be admitted that conditions in agriculture still leave much to be desired but a decided improvement has been effected in the last year and I am sure it will continue. Enhanced world prices have reflected the increasing prosperity and greater purchasing power of the important centres of the world. This fact greatly benefited Canadian producers last year and should be of benefit again in 1935. Last year an increase of twelve cents per bushel occurred in the price of wheat as compared with the prices for the preceding year and this added nearly $32,840,000 to the value of our wheat crop. There was a similar increase from twenty-five cents a bushel in 1933 to thirty-three cents a bushel in 1934 in the average price of oats which netted the Canadian farmer an additional $25,197,000. More than $10,000,000 was added to the value of the barley crop and over $500,000 was added to the value of the rye crop because of enhanced world prices.

Not only has the government endeavoured to aid the farmer by such legislation as the marketing act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act but it has passed various amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act which are designed to provide agricultural credit at low rates. The government has also taken action to promote a general reduction of interest rates. These things have helped the farmer and that is why I am proud to support the Bennett government, an administration of achievement.

I should like to recount some further achievements of this government during five of the most trying years in the history of our country. This government has spent $175,000,000 in relief, for public works, to assist the provinces and the municipalities, to build a trans-Canada highway and maintain relief camps. It is with considerable regret that I report that relief works expenditures in my county were curtailed because I could not secure the cooperation of the two local provincial members, Mr. W. R. McDonald and J. E. Piché. In 1933 I advocated the construction of the Sheenboro highway and could have secured an appropriation from this government for that purpose. However, the two provincial members would not join me in getting the Taschereau government to help to build a road which would have provided a new means of communication with the north country. Not only would the building of this highway have provided work but it would have been an all-Quebec road. At present we must leave our province and reach our rich mining centres by way of Ontario. I am sure there are many hon. members on both sides of the house who do not realize just what the building of this road would have meant to this particular district. On May 11 of last year I placed on Hansard the whole situation with regard to this highway and how the county of Pontiac had lost this means of communication because of lack of cooperation by the provincial members. I place the blame for this road not being built squarely upon the Taschereau government and its two lieutenants in my county. I would like to have these two gentlemen look up Hansard of March 22, 1934, and read the following remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) with respect to this highway. He said:

As far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned I do not think the hon. member wants to be understood as saying that in his judgment the trans-Canada highway should go up to Senneterre and out to Manitoba in that direction. And I do not think he means that the road from Sheenboro to connect with Kipawa in Quebec is not being built because of any neglect on the part of the dominion government, because the fact is we have received no schedule and no request for any contribution to that road which would connect with the Ontario roads passing through Rouyn down to Ottawa and Montreal. The Sheenboro-Kipawa-Ville Marie road is the one break which has necessitated the people in the north end of Pontiac and the Rouyn mining country coming down to Montreal and Toronto by the Ferguson highway in Ontario. I do not think the hon. member wants to be understood as meaning that the province of Quebec has given the lead to Ontario as far as opening up that part of northern Quebec is concerned, as compared with the efforts of the provincial government of Ontario in opening up roads in Ontario, which has been going on steadily and to an increasing extent each year. The Ferguson highway has been the outlet to the front, both Toronto and Montreal, for all of that north part of Pontiac to the present time, and still is as far as vehicular and motor traffic is concerned.

Let me tell the house that the government has preserved the credit not only of this dominion but of the provinces and the railways as well, and it has looked after 300,000 people and is taking care of about 150,000 in the drought areas of Saskatchewan. Furthermore, the government negotiated the British empire trade agreements which gave Canadian farmers an assured market in Great Britain. This all tended to increase the prices of farm products. These trade agreements, it is said, have saved Canada from bankruptcy. Let me give the trade figures for 1934. Canada's trade in the calendar year 1934 exceeded the billion dollar mark for the first time since 1931; the total was $1,173,373,000 compared with $939,000,000 in 1933; in 1932 it was $954,-454,000; in 1931 it was $1,245,341,000. This was an increase of 24·9 per cent over 1933 and 22 per cent over 1932.

Domestic exports increased from $493,-808,000 in 1932 to $531,751,000 in 1933 and $652,887,000 in 1934, a gain of 22·8 per cent over 1933 and 32·2 per cent over 1932. Domestic exports were $605,336,000 in 1931, so that 1934 showed a gain of 7·2 per cent over that year.

I do not think I have emphasized sufficiently what the government has done for the farmer. The measures which have been enacted and to which I have made reference have been of the most vital importance to the agriculturist. The government has helped him in every way—by reducing interest rates and in other ways. In all the nine years of Liberal government no efforts were made to reduce interest charges.

The Prime Minister's reform program has been received with great enthusiasm by the people of my county. The five major pieces of legislation presented were unemployment insurance, the eight hour day bill, the six day week, minimum wages and the economic council. Besides, there is the price spreads committee's report, which will mean new legislation to protect the consumer and primary producer against unfair trading practices and to regulate concentration in production and distribution. There will also be measures to protect the investing public against exploitation. This is a very important question in my riding.

There was a tax on gold and this will be abolished at the end of next May. Of this action I heartily approve. My county, the county of Pontiac, produced 390,052 ounces of gold in 1934, valued at $13,456,749. The silver produced reached a total of 455,021 ounces, valued at $215,957. Copper production amounted to 69,057,942 pounds, valued at $5,123,616. It will be seen therefore that the removal of the tax on gold will mean that our great mining industry will advance by leaps and bounds in the coming year. There will be no restrictions, but this industry, which has done so much to stabilize distressed conditions during the depression, will continue to new heights of prosperity. In my county there is no depression in the mining centres. I wish the other parts of Pontiac could be equally prosperous.

In the budget there is also a reduction in the taxes and duties on liquor, and this will reduce the price about 50 cents a quart. I think we all agree that the price of liquor has been too high, and the reduction in the tax will lower the price and thus drive the bootlegger and smuggler out of business.

The budget, as I see it, is essentially a poor man's budget and is therefore worthy of support and high commendation Let me say in conclusion that the county which I am proud to represent is diversified in its wealth. It has gold mines, silver mines and copper mines, it is the cradle of the lumbering industry, and possesses some of the finest farms in Canada. We have not escaped the plague of distress and unemployment, but the lumbering industry I am glad to say seems to be advancing after having been at a standstill for the last four years. In order to help the unemployed among my constituents I have done everything in my power to initiate public works. In this connection I would reiterate the fact that the Bennett government has expended more than $1,000,000 in Pontiac county since 1930 as compared with $534,090 spent in the county in the nine years of the Liberal administration. I am amazed that our opponents should be so anxious to hurry the election, especially when our leader (Mr. Bennett) is recovering after a serious illness. I am also amazed that our Liberal friends, while opposing our reform measures, vote for them just the same. Our Liberal friends want an early election. When the time comes they will realize that the people of Canada want a government of action and not one of laissez-faire. I am certain that the Prime Minister will be given a mandate to continue his progressive administration for the benefit of all classes of the people.

On motion of Mr. Beynon the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

SUPPLY

NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Salaries, $402,692; contingencies, $45,948.

Mr. MacINNIS: When adjournment came on Friday last I was discussing under this item the unemployment relief camps. I had stated that while in the regulations the foreman in the camp was asked to have some of the other persons in charge with him when interviewing the men on matters of discipline, the same right was not allowed to the men in the camps. I think the minister did not agree with me on that point, and I would like now to ask him whether he can assure me that a man when appearing before the foreman or anyone in charge is entitled to have someone with him if he so wishes.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): I am not aware of any regulation which prevents a man being accompanied by a companion when he wishes to discuss a complaint he wants to make to the foreman.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is there any regulation that allows this? As the matter stands now and as it is definitely stated in the regulations, anything savouring of combination in the presentation of grievances is disallowed; the rules are very emphatic on that point. One of the first things that must be done, if we are to administer the camps with any degree of satisfaction to the men in them, is that they should be allowed to organize in such a way that they can properly present their grievances to the foreman. Moreover, after they are discharged from the camp they are never called before any board or committee to state their case. The superintendent, if the case comes before him, gets only the foreman's side of it; he never gets the man's side

Mr. STIRLING: Can my hon. friend prove that?

Mr. MacINNIS: I have been asked repeatedly to take up cases of that kind and I have always been met with the same story. I have before me a report that was prepared a year ago by a committee appointed by the Vancouver council of social agencies. I doubt very much if there are on that committee any members who hold the same point of view as I do in regard to social and economic problems. However, this report goes some way towards substantiating what I have said and also favours some of the things that I have advocated. Before reading the report, I will give the names of those who were on the committee that prepared the report. It is signed by the following:

A. B. Carey,
Chairman.
Reverend G. H. Wilson,
Vice-Chairman.
Rural Dean in the Diocese of
New Westminster

The committee is composed of the following:

O. D. Austin, Young Men's Christian Association.
The Rev. Willard Brewing, D.D., St. Andrews-Wesley United Church.
The Rev. T. C. Colwell, Social Worker, Central City Mission.
The Rev. W. Cooper, St. James Anglican Church.
J. H. Corbett, Superintendent, Vancouver Men's Institute.
H. M. Cribb, Board Member, Central City Mission.
J. H. T. Falk, Executive Director, Vancouver Council of Social Agencies.
The Rev. N. A. Harkness, Board Member, Central City Mission.
The Rev. J. D. Hobden, Executive Secretary, John Howard Society.
R. J. Lecky, Director of the Vancouver Men's Institute.
Major Victor MacLean, Officer Commanding Ex-service men's Billets.
W. E. Pinchin, Chairman of Board of Directors of the Central City Mission.
The Rev. Andrew Roddan, First United Church.

And the secretary:

F. Ivor Jackson, Staff Member, Vancouver Council of Social Agencies.

This committee was appointed by the council of social agencies to investigate the condition of single unemployed men in camps and single unemployed men in the cities. I am not going to read that part of the report covering men in the cities as it is not particularly germane to the point under discussion. First of all, the committee gives the agreement between the Department of National Defence and I presume the provincial government. This is signed by A. McNaughton, Major General, C.G.S., and it reads:

Men in Camp

Between June 1 and June 15, 1933, the transfer of judisdiction from the Fordham commission to the Department of Militia and Defence was accomplished and the introductory statement of the policy in administration of the camps is set forth in a Department of Militia and Defence document which reads as follows:—

"As a measure designed to care for single homeless men without present employment and in need of relief the Department of National Defence has been entrusted with the organization and execution of a series of projects on works to the general advantage of Canada which otherwise would not have been undertaken at this time; these will be added to in accordance with the requirements for this form of relief."

In that connection I should like to say that the last time this matter was up I asked for the value of the work done by the men in the camps and was informed by the minister that it amounted to over $6,000,000 during the last year. Therefore in any case these men are paying at least in part, if not altogether, for the relief they are receiving. It is quite probable that the work would not otherwise have been undertaken, but in any case when the country needs that particular work, it will be there. The statement of the agreement continues:

"The conditions under which these works will be carried out are as follows:

"Accommodation, clothing, food and medical care will be provided in kind, and an allowance not exceeding twenty cents per diem for each day worked will be issued in cash.

"Eight hours per day will be worked; Sundays and statutory holidays will be observed; Saturday afternoons may be used for recreation, et cetera.

"Personnel will be free to leave the work to accept other employment offered; they may be discharged 'for cause' and if so discharged will subsequently be ineligible for reemployment under the scheme."

That is one of the conditions for which some remedy must be provided.

"Free transportation will be given from place of engagement and return thereto on discharge—except for misconduct.

"The standard of rations shall be that prescribed for the army.

"No military discipline or training will be instituted; the status of the personnel will remain civilian in all respects.

"Officers in charge of projects are responsible for the care of the men placed under their supervision and it will be their object to ensure that their efficiency—mentally, physically and at their trades—is improved so that when conditions permit they may be returned to the economic life of the country well able to again take up their usual work. To assist in this, educational and instructional classes will be organized; recreation, amusements and games will be arranged; every possible opportunity will be given to men to work at and to become proficient in their own selected trades.

"All concerned are reminded that the funds are limited and that it is desired to care for the maximum possible number of men in need; that the possibility of obtaining additional funds depends to some extent on the value of the work done and, in consequence, that efficient direction and strict economy in all matters are, therefore, of great importance."

A. McNaughton,
Major-General, C.G.S.

The committee finds that the first part of this arrangement has been lived up to by the Department of National Defence, that is in the matter of providing food, clothing and shelter for the men, but that the second part, that is of seeing to the psychological side of the men's lives, has not been lived up to. I will read from the report:

A period of eight months has elapsed since this policy was put into operation, and during that period your committee has kept in close touch with conditions in the camps and the difficulties confronting the administration. It has through direct personal contact with officials administering relief, as well as with men in the camps, obtained a great deal of information which has been carefully considered.

The conclusions arrived at are submitted as suggesting a constructive policy acceptable both to the government and to the men, which whilst practical would not necessitate heavier financial outlay. In general we find that in the matter of accommodation, clothing, food, medical care, work and allowances, the Department of National Defence on behalf of the Dominion of Canada has fulfilled its obligations and carried out its promises and we are particularly impressed with the high standard of living in the camps and the moderate cost of the ration maintenance.

There is, however, a broader and, in the opinion of this committee, a more important aspect to the whole situation which cannot longer be ignored and must in any plan for unemployment relief be recognized as the most important factor in the whole situation—we refer to the maintenance of morale and the recognition by the government that food for the mind is as important as food for the body and that healthy recreation in addition to the daily work is so essential as to need no further emphasis.

I quite appreciate the fact that the present Minister of National Defence has been administering his department for only a short time, and that even if he were anxious to do something towards reorganization he may not have had the time to give the matter the consideration it merits. I find however that speaking in this chamber on Friday evening last the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland), formerly Minister of National Defence, made this statement:

If the men are warm, if the clothing provided is good and the food substantial, I do not think there can be anything to complain of.

I wonder if the hon. member ever heard the saying that man cannot live by bread alone. He requires something more than food, shelter and clothing. Animals can get along with limited requirements, but even with respect to animals, if we wish to obtain the best results we must treat them kindly and give them attention. Then, the minister went on to say:

The camps are not permanent; it is not as though the men were going to be there for some time and had to build up some system of rights.

As a matter of fact, so far as we can see at the present time the camps are permanent. That is one of the difficulties. The men feel when they go to the camps that there should be written over the doors of the camps the words: All hope abandon ye who enter here. There is no hope for the man going into a camp to-day; he may be in there for the next five years or possibly for the rest of his life. The minister cannot say, the government cannot say, and no hon. member in this chamber can say when the camps may be abolished. Continuing the report says:

It is our considered opinion that there are classes of single unemployed men for whom more or less permanent provision will have to be made and that failure to recognize this fact and plan accordingly will have serious effects on the whole situation. The presence of 5,000 single men in the city of Vancouver registered as unfit and homeless seems to justify this statement.

We believe that the whole situation should be surveyed throughout the dominion by a commission competent by reason of the experience of its personnel to advise the government as to the policy to be pursued.

When we were advocating a committee to investigate camps I was not aware that this report existed. I believe it goes considerably farther than the suggestions we made, and indicates that the whole governmental policy should be considered. The report continues:

The main points we desire to emphasize are as follows:

(a) A work and wages scheme in lieu of the allowance system.

(b) Coordination between the government employment services and the camp authorities.

(c) Organization of recreational activities.

(d) Regular periods of leave.

(e) Segregation of age and youth within the camps.

(f) Welfare committees of the men elected by the men in each camp.

(g) The necessity for suitable personnel.

Your committee has urged in the past the necessity for a work and wages scheme and is still of the opinion that this would largely diminish the present unrest in the camps, without extra cost to the government.

There are many problems due to the present basis of administration, connected with clothing, tobacco and snuff issues, and transportation which we think could be obviated by a wages system, and, most important of all, we think that such a system would help to preserve a man's self respect.

To arrive at a satisfactory basis of pay, it is suggested that men should be required to work for a sufficient number of hours each week to enable them to earn at the minimum wage rate for unskilled labour enough to pay for their board, clothing, lodging and issues, an actual cost basis plus a cash surplus of not less than twenty cents per working day.

The committee feel that when skilled tradesmen or mechanics are used at their trades, the rate of pay should be increased and the hours reduced if necessary.

On several occasions complaints have been made to me, more particularly during the last session of parliament, to the effect that the department was using men skilled in various trades and giving them relief camp allowance pay.

Then a section of the report is headed "Coordination between the government employment services and the camp authorities." I shall not read the suggestions in detail, but would state briefly that the committee recommended very close coordination between the government employment service and the camps, because the men in the camps are away from the cities and for that reason are not in a position to look for work for themselves. Then the report continues:

There is no organization of games and recreation; books and magazines are circulated regularly to all camps, but this does not suffice, and proper supplies of recreational equipment such as footballs, soft balls, fishing gear, etc., should be provided. We are of the opinion that a sum of $4,000 annually would be sufficient for the men's needs in this respect and would go far towards preserving the morale of both old and young. Any expenditure of this character should be very carefully laid out; as there are many articles such as softball bats and cricket bats which can be made by the men themselves. The camp visitors for the Church Cooperative Camp Council have reported the pleasure derived by the men in the camps and their gratitude for issues of sporting goods which were distributed in fifty camps of this province during the summer of 1933 from private funds, and this committee regards the recognition of this need by the government as one of the most urgent problems in the administration of camp relief.

A man sent to camp tends to lose hope and to become resigned to his fate. He feels that he is forgotten as "disposed of." Before he reaches this mental state and as an outlet for his dissatisfaction he makes trouble and is a fruitful field for "red" propaganda. If a short period of leave were granted every two months to the nearest town, conditional on good behaviour, despondency would be diminished and the men would have something to look forward to. Periodic leave is necessary for the maintenance of morale.

More consideration might be given by the camp management to the effect of unemployment and isolation in camp on the mental life of the men.

As a matter of fact may I say that my experience was that this factor was overlooked in the camps, the management feeling that if they supplied reasonably good food and sufficient clothing to keep the men warm, that was all they were required to do. I quote further:

Segregation of youth and age within the camp. In certain of the camp areas it has been stated that the blending of age and youth has been adopted with the idea that the older men would have a steadying effect on the younger. This is, in the opinion of the committee, an unwise policy.

I am told, but I have no proof of it, that there are rather unfavourable moral effects arising from the mixing of old and young men in these camps. Continuing:

Welfare committees of the men elected by the men in each camp.

That is what I would like particularly to impress upon the minister because I feel quite satisfied that no group of self respecting men can submit to discipline and accept orders in regard to matters over which they have absolutely no control and in which their opinion is not asked. Continuing to quote:

Committees or organizations of men within the camp areas are not officially recognized as they are considered to be subversive of discipline and order. Committees, however, do operate within the camp areas with or without tacit approval, and we ask the question: Is it better to have a properly constituted camp committee operating in the open, or a bush committee acting under a sense of grievance?

We recommend that more trust and confidence be placed in the men and that grievances are better ventilated in the open than suppressed. It should not be a difficult matter to devise a scheme whereby grievances may be heard, examined and dealt with in a satisfactory manner.

I suggest to the minister that he give this particular section of the report his very serious consideration, as I am convinced that the carrying out of these recommendations would overcome many of the difficulties that now exist in the camps. I am convinced of that because I have worked with men and I know men, and I know how easy it is to get their cooperation when you go half way to meet them. Again quoting from the report.

The necessity for suitable personnel. We are of the opinion that the whole atmosphere of a camp depends on the personality of the camp foreman.

Your committee knows one camp where the foreman issues no restrictive orders, where the men have supported him in refusing to allow communists to come into the camp, and where no "bush" committee exists.

In this camp the foreman leads his men in recreational activities, plays with them; he listens to their requests even though unable to grant them. In this camp there has been little or no trouble at any time.

This foreman has proved under two systems of relief, provincial and dominion, over a long period in one camp, that the human factor is all-important, and that men can be controlled and even made happy in adverse circumstances by the exercise of humanity, fellowship and tact.

We submit that what is needed in the camps is a positive program of work and welfare activities for the men in preference to a list of prohibitive orders.

We think that camp foremen as well as supervisors should be chosen as far as possible from men who have proved their worth in subordinate positions in camp administration.

This is along the line I suggested to the minister the other evening, that the man who makes a good foreman in a construction camp does not necessarily make a good foreman in a camp of this kind, which requires a different type of man altogether. Again quoting from the report:

Men expelled from camp. Under the regulations laid down by the Department of Militia and Defence a man may be summarily discharged for cause, and neither the department nor any other relief authority appears to have any further responsibility for his care.

Furthermore, it appears that there is no court of appeal to whom such a man may refer his case for reconsideration except this same department.

The committee is of opinion, in view of the possibility of unfair action by a camp foreman being sustained by his higher authority, that there should be set up an independent board to review such disciplinary action and make a final judgment on such cases.

I would also ask the minister to give his attention to that. I shall pass over the next part of the report, which refers largely to men in the cities, and come to the two concluding paragraphs:

In conclusion, this committee desires to place on record its considered opinion that a commission representative of the governments concerned should be appointed to coordinate the work of the various relief authorities at present caring for destitute persons, both married and single, as only by such means can some of the present anomalies and injustices be avoided.

The issues are so vast and so far-reaching in their effects on the men and women of future generations that nothing less than a complete control of the whole field of relief administration can prevent incalculable harm from being done to the moral and physical stamina of the nation.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Then follow the names of the committee which I have already given. This I believe is a very reasonable report. It has been issued for over a year now, since March, 1934, and yet the conditions in the camps, as far as the subject matter of this report is concerned, are worse than they were a year ago. I know that you cannot abolish these camps in a day or at a moment's notice, but until such time as the camps can be abolished I think this government and parliament should not rest until they have made conditions in the camps where the men now are, and may be for some considerable time, just as good as they can possibly be made. I hope the minister will give this matter his consideration and be able to report in the very near future that he has found it feasible to put some of these long-needed reforms into effect.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, I cannot say that I have in front of me the report from which the hon. member has been reading, but if it has been received in the department it certainly has been considered and considered most carefully.

I notice that one appeal the hon. member made was that we should keep in close touch with the Employment Service of Canada. I may inform him that we receive the men into the camps through the agency of the Employment Service of Canada.

My hon. friend read out a list of names of the people on the committee that produced this report, and I noticed there were several clergymen thereon. In the course of my remarks I shall draw the committee's attention to the report of another clergyman who has spent the last two and a half years travelling up and down British Columbia visiting these camps, because I think the committee may be interested in hearing his account of what he finds.

On a previous occasion when this matter was before the committee several statements were made by hon. members which I undertook to investigate. One of them was made by the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. MacInnis). He referred to the case of a cook in a camp who quit when told that he was exceeding the per capita allowance and instructed to cut down, and said that this cook had made reference to a still being operated by the supervisory staff, using camp supplies.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I correct the minister? I did not say this cook referred to it. I said that a cook came in after this man quit, and the men in the camp found the still. That had no relation to the first cook at all.

Mr. STIRLING: Then it was two different people, one cook who was discharged for having given the men too much to eat, and another who made a statement with regard to a still in the camp.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, it was the men themselves who made the statement in regard to the still.

Mr. STIRLING: Well, a man made a statement with regard to a still.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Amen.

Mr. STIRLING: As these charges were vague I wrote to the hon. member a day or so after the incident was mentioned in the committee and asked him if he would be good enough to give me closer information so that the charges could be investigated. On March 7 the hon. member replied that the statement had been made by one of the relief camp workers by the name of Cumber. The hon. member went on to say that regardless of whether or not the statements were true, they were of such a nature in his opinion as to warrant an investigation. An investigation was made and it was found that this man Cumber has something of a record in British Columbia. He first came to the attention of the department when a request was received from Robert Macnicol, secretary of the provincial command, Canadian legion, under date of December 5, 1934, that Cumber should be reinstated. The case was fully investigated at that time and on January 4 the following report was made:

He was in project 25 from 23rd August, 1933, to 22nd September, 1933, when he was discharged for refusing to work. A week later he was sent to camp 227 where he stayed from 1933 to 7th March, 1934. While in camp 227 he was prominent in three strikes, but worked in the background, not giving the foreman of the camp any specific grounds to discharge him until he finally came into the open in a strike on 7th March, 1934, when he was discharged as one of the ringleaders. The activities of the leaders in this strike unfortunately resulted in the discharge of between 30 to 40 men. The superintendent of the group to which camp 227 belong considers Cumber is one of the most dangerous types of agitators, and were he readmitted to any camp he would make trouble by his clever undercover methods.

After his discharge on 7th March, 1934, Cumber applied for reinstatement twice, but his applications were not approved. His second application was made on 23rd October, 1934, and this headquarters made further enquiries into his case before refusing his application again. However, Cumber did not wait for a reply but applied for relief under an assumed name (E. Tuckett) at the same time making a false statutory declaration that he had not previously been in any relief camp, and was sent to camp 209 on 6th November, 1934, and was later recognized as Cumber. Apparently he realized he had been recognized for he left at his own request on 20th November. Action is being taken to institute proceedings against him for obtaining relief by false pretences.

Acting Secretary out on bail. Huge campaign to bring pressure on the authorities launched.

Vancouver, March 5th.—Comrade E. Cumber, the acting secretary of the union, appeared in court yesterday at New Westminster where he had been transferred from Hope. He is charged with obtaining relief under an assumed name.

It appeared to me to be useless to endeavour to get any more information that could be relied upon from that source, and the investigations were discontinued. I think it is quite evident to hon. members of the committee that agitators of this description exist in all these camps.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Not all.

Mr. STIRLING: With very few exceptions.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Except Quebec.

Mr. STIRLING: I think I will be able to show the hon. member that they are pretty widely spread. They appear to exist only for the purpose of agitating and it is interesting to note that in communication after communication appears the statement that the majority of men in the camps do not want to be bothered with the agitators. They want to be allowed to continue to do what work they can do and on frequent occasions they have intimated to the agitators that their presence in the camp was not wanted. Considerable correspondence has been received on this matter by myself and by hon. members. Different citizens who have paid voluntary visits to these camps inform us that the conditions are good. They state that they do not consider the complaint of the agitators that grievances should be handled by a committee is a valid one. The statement has been made on the last two occasions on which this matter was discussed, particularly by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis), that these men would not make complaints because they dreaded being discharged, but I submit that this statement is not founded on fact. There are a number of instances on record where individuals in the different camps across Canada have made complaints to the foremen. Some of these complaints have been carried to the superintendent but they have all been handled in a sympathetic and tactful manner. Time and time again certain things have been adjusted and methods have been altered to the entire satisfaction of the man complaining. But the agitators still exist.

I should like to direct the attention of the committee to a statement which appeared in The British Columbian of March 13. The Reverend G. H. Finlay has devoted himself for the last two and a half years to the spiritual needs of these camps. He has visited many of the camps and has made short stays in some of them. The article reads:

In the two and a half years I have been visiting the camps, I have never found the food served disappointing, either in quantity or quality, despite whatever criticisms has been offered by speakers or wild statements appearing in the press.

The men in the camps are well off. The camps are comfortable, sanitary conditions are well looked after, there is first aid equipment and each camp is visited by a medical man twice a week. In fact the provision made for the men in the camps is immensely better than for many families on relief in New Westminster and Vancouver.

Men accommodated in the relief camps in the Fraser Valley, Mr. Finlay said, come from every province in Canada, with scores of others from the British Isles. They represent a cross-section of the average citizenship of British Columbia or any other part of Canada. The troublesome element is in just about the same proportion as in a city of a similar number of inhabitants.

The relief camps were not started with the idea that they were a solution of the present economic difficulties. They are not permanent, but are just a "port in a storm", a temporary shelter, established to save men from dying in the ditch and to give them a chance to take care of their health.

There is dissatisfaction in the camps. But the dissatisfaction is purely a mental trouble, caused through discontent and the lack of any apparent hope for the future and the inability of the men to find an outlet for their ambitions. The dissatisfaction is not with the camps themselves, but with the system which brought the camps into being.

The work the men are called upon to perform is merely exercise, Mr. Finlay said. No attempt is made by the officers in charge "to push them". Speaking of the officials he said:

"I have never seen a better class of men than those in charge of the Fraser Valley camps. They are men who know how to handle men and some are more like fathers than bosses."

[Mr. Stirling.]

Referring to the malcontents, Mr. Finlay asserted that much of the trouble in the camps was caused by only two per cent of the total number of men accommodated. This minority believes that revolution is the only solution of the present difficulties and are determined to make the camps impossible. They refuse to work and no camp officials can tolerate them under their care; hence the blacklist. It is impossible for the average citizen to form an opinion on any debatable question that arises in the camps unless both sides are heard. In the past, Mr. Finlay said, only the disgruntled men have been heard, as the officials do not make a practice of stating their side of the case.

"Any stories of downright unfairness or ill-treatment have been grossly exaggerated and in many cases are wholly untrue," the speaker declared.

When a strike was called during the winter, only fifteen per cent of the men in the valley camps participated. The remaining eighty-five per cent, although discontented over economic conditions, had no complaint about the camps and refused to take part in the strike.

The statements made by this reverend gentleman and published in The British Columbian are statements which could well have been made by officials of the department. But surely they come with added force to hon. members of this committee as coming from a clergyman who has made it his duty to visit these camps for the purpose of studying the welfare of the men in the camps and so reporting. There is no question that the agitators exist. I think it would be desirable for me to draw the committee's attention to one or two pieces of information out of many which have come into the department in recent weeks.

I have under my hand a copy of some propaganda which has been circulated through the camps by subversive organizations whose one object is the destruction of law and order in this country, and who see, in the breaking up of the camps and the return of the men to the conditions of misery in the larger centres of population, a means through which their destructive purpose may be achieved. This is a copy of a sheet published in Calgary, head office given, the name of the secretary given, dated March 3. It is headed: "Relief camp workers' union, Alberta section." It was picked up in one of the Ontario camps. It begins:

To all workers in relief camps.

I will not read it all, but the first sentence reads:

The time has come to take some action to improve the position of the single unemployed workers.

It goes on with three or four inches like that, and then comes to the setting up of the camp committees:

On arrival in camp it should be the duty of all workers who realize the need of organization to set up a camp committee, in case one does not exist. This committee would comprise a small group of active workers. They would make a survey of camp conditions, note the immediate grievances and the attitude of the men toward organization. After a plan of work is decided upon, the committee can draw others around it.

And so on. That apparently is circulating in the camps throughout Canada. This circular describes the method of organization of these camp committees. The camp committees desire to find out which of the men are useful soil in which agitation can be seeded so that at a given time when the opportunity is ripe they may act in a concerted fashion in the direction they desire to go. There is nothing particularly new about this method; for I would remind hon. members that it is extraordinarily similar to other documents which we read in 1917 at the time of the breakup of Russia, and they were used again in extraordinary similarity at the time the German fleet went to pieces and bloodshed ensued. Further than that, there is evidence in the department of a widespread and well organized plot, that on a given date in the near future these subversive organizations will attempt the destruction of the camps throughout Canada. Needless to say the necessary steps to safeguard against any such contingency have been taken.

It is interesting to note that definite instructions have been sent by the organizations to their agents in our camps, that when the uprising takes place it will be possible to accomplish their end. I have in my hand a copy of the Relief Camp Worker, which was published on March 19 and is the organ of the relief camp workers' union, British Columbia district. The address of its office in Vancouver is printed and at the top of the page is "Conference Number" and at the bottom of the page, "Not a man left in camp, April 4." Again, I will not read it; there is a good deal of it—four pages of it. On the front page I note that it says:

> On April 4 British Columbia and Alberta will be the scene of the greatest attempt by the camp workers to emancipate themselves from the yoke that predominated in the dim past.

And lower down:

> Let us go forward in the coming struggle with the only weapon that gets results; that is, organized militant action; no dallying with these political heelers whose promises are not worth the paper they are written on, but forward with a determination to show the people of B.C. that the camps are a menace to the youth.

Further on:

> Start by building such a solid organization on a district basis that there will not be a man left on April 4. Cooperate with your district organizer and look to your mail contract.

I think that is evidence sufficient to demonstrate that we are face to face with a definite organization of men who are desirous of raising trouble so considerable that it may be handled but with difficulty. I need not repeat the arrangements under which the dominion government came into this relief picture; I have stressed them again and again. When the dominion government came into it, it was for the purpose of assisting the provinces to handle a certain load which they had to carry, and it was arranged that the Department of National Defence should be given the task of carrying out the work. The reason that was done was that under the Department of National Defence Canada is divided into certain districts. In each of these districts there is a certain organization including engineer services. There are store services and supply services. It was not necessary therefore to set up a whole piece of new machinery throughout Canada to carry out this rather extensive piece of work, and so it was handed to the Department of National Defence. That department has carried it out, always with that idea in view, that we were there to give the assistance laid down by agreement with the provinces in connection with work arranged with the provinces and with machinery lent by the provinces, in order to give food, shelter and certain other things to the single, homeless unemployed in need of relief and who were physically fit.

Certain criticism was made—rather strong criticism—on the last occasion these estimates were being discussed, of the wording of certain regulations. But let me remind the committee that regulations are enacted for the purpose of handling the work carried out in these camps. The law abiding man in the camp does not fall foul of the regulations. If he has complaints to make he makes them and they are handled to the best of their ability by the several ranges of authority, from foreman up to headquarters. But as we know that we are dealing with agitators and as we know that we have to make arrangements that law and order shall be preserved not only in the camps but in the countryside, it is necessary that regulations be formulated to direct the foremen and superintendents how to handle anything in the nature of roughness or revolution which may crop up. I have to assure hon. members of the committee that we have knowledge what I have read here is actually extant in our midst to-day, and proper regulations and arrangements have been made to cope with the difficulty.

Mr. MacINNIS: After I made the statement about the evidence given in regard to the still in the camp, the minister wrote to me asking for further information. I gave him that information, furnished him with the name of the person who made the statement, and described the circumstances in which the statement was made. I now find that he tracked down the individual who made the statement but did not track down or try to track down the still or those who were operating it. The reason he gave for not doing that was that the man was supposed to be an agitator. Evidently everyone who disagrees with conditions in the camp is an agitator. But let me tell the members of the committee that the world owes a great deal to agitators. Without agitators there would be no progress, so let us put its proper value on agitation.

The article that the minister read from The British Columbian is not essentially different from the report I read; in fact it is practically the same thing. They agree that conditions in the camps are in some respects all right, but more is required than mere food, clothing and shelter. Then the minister says only two per cent of the men are agitators or have leanings that way. Surely then if there is proper organization in the camp the other ninety-eight per cent will not follow the misguided two per cent. The fact is that there is no agitator but injustice. Do away with injustice and agitators will find nothing to thrive on. I have information in regard to the agitation that was carried on in the summer of 1930 before this government came into office, what was said about the government of that day, comparing the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to Judas. Who organized the unemployed in Regina?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Who referred to him as Judas?

Mr. MacINNIS: The present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he was an agitator. Who organized the unemployed at Regina and gave them buttons to wear in the lapels of their coats?

Mr. DONNELLY: The Tories.

Mr. MacINNIS: Chickens will come home to roost. Now we are not going to meet this situation by suppression. We should meet it by removing the injustices, and then, as I have said, agitators will find nothing to do.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HEAPS: Before the item carries I should like to ask the minister if it is the policy of his department to send around officers to investigate conditions in the camps, not merely those in British Columbia but in other parts of the dominion. Also, assuming these investigators are making rounds of the camps, whether their reports are submitted to his department, and if he has any such reports with him at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: Officials of the department are constantly travelling around to the camps. I have not any collected reports here. Their reports come in from time to time and close check is kept on them. But as Canada is divided into districts the reports are made to district headquarters, which in turn report to the department. There is no book of reports like this that I can refer to, but the reports are continually coming before us.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the department made any investigation of the camp at Lac Seul?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, there have been rather extensive reports on Lac Seul.

Mr. HEAPS: I would like some information in regard to conditions in that camp. I have had complaints in regard to the inefficiency of the whole administration there. I would like to know the total cost of the work done in that camp and also something in regard to what has been accomplished.

Mr. STIRLING: My information is that up to some months ago there was a considerable amount of trouble and disaffection at Lac Seul, but for the past five or six months the camp has quieted down to a very considerable extent, and since I have been in this position I have not had reports of any unfortunate happenings at Lac Seul.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister inform the committee what the official reports were in regard to the cause of the dissatisfaction and trouble in that camp?

Mr. STIRLING: Total expenditures to September 13, 1934, were $664,373. I am not in a position at the moment to answer my hon. friend's question, but I shall be glad to report to him by letter.

Mr. HEAPS: My information which has come to me from more than one source, is that this is a most extravagantly conducted camp, and that the work, although done by the cheapest labour available, could have been done for a very small proportion of the amount that has been spent by the department. The reports I had, which came from a reliable source, included for example the statement that four carloads of beef were destroyed; they had been there so long that they were totally unfit for human consumption. Does the minister know anything in regard to that?

Mr. STIRLING: No, I cannot corroborate or deny that statement, but it certainly will be looked into. We must remember that Lac Seul is an isolated place. The work was undertaken in accordance with the views of both province and dominion, to achieve a certain purpose, the clearing of the shore at the present water level of Lac Seul and to the height to which the water will rise. It will be a feeder for a future power plant, a work that will be of advantage to that part of Canada at a later day. If men are placed in camp in an isolated place like that, however desirable the work that may be accomplished, it is probable that it will not be done as economically as if it were close to centres of supply. I think I can meet the contention of the hon. member with regard to enormous extravagance, and I shall be happy to do so if he wishes it.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister say how much land was cleared there?

Mr. STIRLING: No, I am afraid I have not that detail here.

Mr. HEAPS: How many men are employed at the present time?

Mr. STIRLING: I am reading from the list which I tabled earlier this month. In the Lac Seul camps there were the following labourers on February 28:

Camp—	Number of labourers
Sawmill	147
No. 3	110
No. 4	94
No. 5	105
No. 6	100
No. 10	78
No. 16	36

Mr. HEAPS: Besides clearing land, what other work are these men doing?

Mr. STIRLING: They are clearing the land around the lake.

Mr. HEAPS: What other work are they doing?

Mr. STIRLING: That is the main work—clearing the foreshore.

Mr. HEAPS: So far, then, almost two-thirds of the million dollars has been expended in clearing the land at that point.

Mr. STIRLING: I can describe the work in much greater detail on a later occasion. I could not even tell the hon. member offhand the size of Lac Seul. If it is a big enough lake, the sum is not very large.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Have regulations been passed recently, especially with regard to the relief camp at Trenton, that the men employed there shall be deprived of their twenty cents a day allowance on wet days or days on which they do not work?

Mr. STIRLING:: The regulation hitherto has been that the allowance of twenty cents is paid on days that some work is done.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Only on days that work is done?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In that case may I inquire of the minister why it is called an allowance? Evidently, according to the statement of the minister, it is money paid for work done, but on several occasions he has referred to it as an allowance. I do not suppose there is very much use in pressing these objections, since the minister has declared himself satisfied with the relief camps, their function, operation, the personnel running them, and so forth. I also regret that he has seen fit to class all those who object to conditions in relief camps as agitators. In any representations I have made to him I have been very careful to see that they were based only on facts presented to me by respectable and responsible bodies of citizens, one of them, for example, the Calgary city council. I sincerely trust the minister will not describe that body as inspired by agitators. I also hope he will not suggest that the board of the Vancouver council of social agencies is to be described as a radical, agitating body, or one inspired by motives such as those implied in the letters, pamphlets and statements the minister put on record in the closing part of his remarks. I have had complaints from many sources in regard to these matters, but have refrained from taking up any except official complaints. Interestingly enough, the official complaints registered coincide identically with those presented in this house by other hon. members and all of them ask exactly the same type of redress. They ask first for permission to the men in camps to have their own government, as it were, such as I suggested to the minister is the practice in universities, of course always subject to the general regulations of a superintendent which are necessary for proper procedure. Further, they should have a complaints committee. I would suggest that if the government were wise, they would go further and inaugurate sports committees. In other words, there would thus be a devolpment of self respect and self government in those camps; that would be the finest protection against the danger that the minister attempted to place before the committee, the danger of organized revolt.

Mr. STIRLING: May I interpose a remark at this point? The hon. member surely does not want to suggest there are not sports committees and social committees in those camps?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): All I have to say is this: I read from the regulations. By the way, I may say that I do not hold Brigadier-General D. W. B. Spry responsible for them; they quite clearly emanated from headquarters, but these are the regulations that went out under his signature:

(a) One of the fundamental and most necessary rules for the administration of unemployment relief camps is to forbid anything bearing the appearance of combination to obtain redress of alleged grievances. Appeals for redress by means of any document bearing the signature of more than one complainant, or by organized committees combining to make a complaint are strictly forbidden.

That is quite clear; there can be no dispute about that at all. Furthermore, since that point has been raised again, I would like to know upon what authority even the Department of National Defence, merely because it has the function of operating what is normally a civil camp, a relief camp, has undertaken to take away from those people their civil liberties. Note regulation (f):

No application or complaint should ever be made to the civil power, except through the camp foreman or with his sanction.

Frankly, that is going just a bit too far, as I said the other evening. However I do not want to strain the point or continue this discussion unnecessarily, but I would like to point out to the minister that in the Calgary Albertan of March 23, that is of Saturday last, there appeared the following dispatch:

At its last two meetings Calgary city council has expressed opposition to the relief camp regulations which drew fire in the House of Commons Friday night.

The council passed a motion requesting information on the following four points:

1. Rescind "vicious" regulations regarding appeals to outside sources.
2. Permit group organizations and grievance committees.
3. Send no men to camps which were not fully ready for occupancy.
4. Provide additional recreational facilities.

Organizations opposed to the relief camp principle, and protesting alleged grievances, have called a convention in Calgary April 5.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

It is not of much use, but I would again raise my voice in protest against these regulations.

I also ask the minister to take into serious, nay, into more than serious consideration, the effect on character, on morality, on the general fibre of the people in these camps. I have complaints that I intend to send to the minister in writing—they are not the kind that I care to give expression to on the floor of the house—with regard to the moral conditions in those camps, where 'teen-age boys and older men are all mixed up together, where because of distance from centres of population they are separated entirely from the normal enjoyment of an ordinary life. They are not permitted to go into those places for more than two days in, I think, a month. They have therefore no opportunity to hunt for jobs for themselves or to seek relief from the oppressive routine of camp work. I want to be accurate on this point; is it two days a month?

Mr. STIRLING: I think it is two days a month.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have complaints on that point, and also complaints that the comfort funds, as they call them, in some camps are not being properly administered. I am told the dormitories in the Trenton camp are overcrowded. In the dormitories occupied by the air force men there are only five beds, the men in the employment camp having sixteen. The communication I have before me indicates that sixty-four men on one floor use one bathroom. The correspondent states:

I think that we should receive more assistance in trying to get a job. As it is, the government seems to put every possible obstruction in our way, the chief of which is the limited time allowed for leave. We can only take a maximum of two days. If we go for longer than that we must check out. How can we hitch hike and look for a job in two days from a place as isolated as this? If we check out we have no certainty of getting back. In any case we lose any and all of the provileges and position we may have worked into and up to during our original term. If we return we are set back right at the beginning at the pick and shovel, without any precedence or prestige to our name.

Of course under present conditions I do not know where the poor beggars would find jobs, but still we know that hope springs eternal in the human breast, and I suppose they will continue to drift in the hope that conditions may have improved and that they may have an opportunity to do something.

I have received another complaint to the effect that skilled labour is being paid no more than unskilled labour on relief work. I believe the minister knows this fact. Truck drivers, mechanics, carpenters, machinists, stenographers and so on are all paid the same, namely twenty cents per day. That is bad enough where there is no comparison possible between that rate of pay and other rates, but unfortunately in the camp at Trenton there is an intermingling between relief project men and air force employees, with the result that anomalies are inescapable. The correspondent states:

> We have seen first class mechanics taken from our ranks to work side by side with air force mechanics for twenty cents a day, while the air force mechanic doing less work and being less skilled received his full stipend. We have had carpenters working for twenty cents a day beside carpenters brought in from outside working for forty cents an hour. Last summer while we were constructing a cement sidewalk from the camp to the village three different systems of relief were in operation side by side; the provincial highway scheme paying twenty-five cents an hour, the municipal scheme paying (I believe) forty cents an hour, and the project gang, doing just as much work as the other two, getting twenty cents a day.

Obviously under those circumstances the minister must not be surprised if there is some dissatisfaction and if indeed there may even be some British citizens there who have enough of the old British spirit in them to resent such treatment and to agitate against it. He continues:

> The twenty cents a day wage and several of the routine and disciplinary injustices inflicted on us are due to the fallacy of calling us unemployed. Obviously when a man works eight hours a day he is no longer unemployed.

They are really in the camps and employed. It may be that they are employed only for their clothing—or part of it—their board and twenty cents a day.

I do wish we could arrive at a solution of this problem. In spite of the minister's endorsation of these regulations I am convinced that in his heart of hearts he does not endorse them. I believe he is as much satisfied as any hon. member in this committee that there has to be an improvement of conditions. Some action must be taken to stimulate the self respect of these men and to help them to hold themselves steady until conditions improve, if ever. I would ask the minister at this stage not to harden his heart against the necessity for speaking strongly about the rigidity of the military discipline originating at headquarters in Ottawa. These people in Ottawa doubtless have their place; the type of man in question is necessary for certain kinds of work, but certainly their work is not that of governing a body of civilians who, through no fault of their own, are placed in a position where at least temporarily they are subject to the Department of National Defence. I suggest that there be a complete relaxation of disciplinarian measures to a degree where these men may be allowed their complaints committee and given greater recreational facilities. The purchase of footballs or softballs would not require a great deal of money, and I believe the government could make the expenditure without endangering its financial standing. I am sure an expenditure of that kind would be appreciated. A little greater cooperation between the superintendent and the men might be recommended by the minister.

Mr. STIRLING: Certainly these matters will be looked into. But the minister who could give a ready answer to the pages of criticism which have been read would have to be a superman. I cannot do it; it is impossible for me to do so. Consequently I am driven to ask this question: Is it quite fair to read stuff of that sort, to reel it off in committee where an answer cannot be made, when it would have been quite possible to hand the information to the minister, in which event he would have had an opportunity to make inquiries? Three or four weeks ago I paid an interesting visit to Trenton upon which occasion I was shown everything. I did not consider that the men were crowded in their dormitories. My very clear recollection is that nothing like the condition described by the hon. member existed, and that nothing like the number of men mentioned by him had to share one bathroom. The air force employees and relief men were not working side by side. There were at least half a dozen carpenters, more electricians and more men in other trades who were receiving the ordinary trade wages obtaining in the neighbourhood, and who were assisted in their operations by the men on the twenty cent allowance. My hon. friend made the statement on the authority of a person who had communicated with him that the men were all jumbled together and that all received an allowance of twenty cents per day. That certainly is not the case at Trenton. However I shall be happy to have the matter looked into and a detailed reply given to the hon. member.

Mr. MULLINS: It happened to be my privilege to go through these camps, and I am at a loss to understand hon. members opposite. If they have never been through relief camps I would advise them to go and observe the conditions. The statement I am about to make can be borne out by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who, I believe, is in his seat. While in his section of the country I visited a camp at Vermilion Bay, and I can assure hon. members that the conditions in that camp were better than the conditions which existed in Camp Hughes from 1915 to 1918. I would like to tell hon. members opposite that when I entered the cookhouse door I saw a huge pan of doughnuts of the very best quality sitting on the stove and being prepared for supper. The hon. member for Vancouver South took exception to an article I read a short time ago. This evening I should like to make a correction concerning that letter which, on that occasion, I indicated was from a young man in one of the camps. The letter I have before me at this time states:

> You can certainly tell Mr. MacInnis that everything the boy said was perfectly true and I have been away from there six months or more. Apparently after reading Mr. MacInnis's speeches he could never have had much experience with the interior decoration of a bunkhouse. The boy was mistaken in so far as the horse blankets are concerned. They are not horse blankets; they are regulation army issue.
> The family said after I came back to Winnipeg that I was spoiled in so far as my eats are concerned. When I read the speeches in there I simply could not stop sending you this letter. I hope you are in the best of health.

I have another letter here from the superintendent of a park that has 650 men in one of these camps; they get nothing but the very best. There must be something wrong with my hon. friends over on the other side of the house. They must be saying these things for some purpose. At the camp at Vermilion, for instance, and I am sure the hon. member for that district will bear me out in this statement, the men are fed the very best, are housed the very best, and are living under the very best conditions. Of course it is a camp; it is not the Royal York hotel or the Chateau Laurier. What do you expect? If it is any information for the hon. gentleman, personally I would turn these men loose and tell them to go out to work. There is plenty of work for them on the land. The farmers in my constituency are asking for them. I just got a letter to-day from a farmer in my constituency who offered one of these men $30 a month. I know that farmer very well, and I know he would treat the man well, but the man stayed with him just one day. He left because the farmer called him for breakfast at six-thirty in the morning. These men are spoiled, and if you keep on pampering them and feeding them with the very best of food, such as the minister gives them, you will never get rid of them. Turn them out and let them work the same as we had to do as pioneers. Those of us who were out west in the early days never got such pampering nor lived under such good conditions. I do not know the object of hon. gentlemen who are making these complaints, but I have my own idea. If they will go into the camps and see the conditions I am sure they will change their minds. I have been through the camps at Vancouver and New Westminster, and I did not see anything to complain of. The hon. member for New Westminster is in his seat, and he knows very well that these men are well fed and that everything is all right. There is nothing wrong in the camps. They are comfortable and everything is of the very best, unless conditions have changed since I visited them not long ago. I certainly would recommend that hon. gentlemen go through the camps and look at them for themselves unbiased, and then I am sure they will come to the same conclusion that I have come to.

Mr. HEAPS: I have a communication dated March 23, 1935, and if the minister will assure me that the person who sent me this letter will not in any way be discriminated against for doing so I shall be glad to hand the communication to the minister. I ask for that assurance, because sending this letter is directly against the regulations of the department.

Mr. STIRLING: I shall be delighted to do what the hon. member suggests.

Mr. HEAPS: On that understanding I will let the minister have the communication. In reply to the hon. member for Marquette, I may say this correspondent states that the meal allowance is seven cents, or twenty-one cents per day for the three meals. I know from my own little experience in providing meals, not exactly in camps, that seven cents will not provide a very sumptuous sort of meal. This man further complains about the diet, and there are other complaints worse than that. One is that they have found in these camps a shortage of food. I do not know whether the shortage of food is due to the insufficiency of the meal allowance of twenty-one cents a day for the men who work in the camps, or whether it is due to a certain amount of pilfering that may be going on in the camp, but this man writes that there is a shortage of sugar, and he believes it is due to the fact that it is taken away in order to make home brew for the camp staff. There have been many complaints along that line. But the most important complaint this man makes is that there is a smouldering resentment against what is termed the slave conditions in the camp. I am going to hand this communication to the minister and I would ask him to look into these complaints. There is a large number of men, I believe, employed in this camp, and the complaints are along the line of those that have already been brought to the attention of the committee.

There is one further question I would ask of the minister. The last time this matter came before the committee, a week ago to-night, the minister said that he would deal sympathetically with the request that had been made by the hon. member for Vancouver South that the men employed in these camps should receive their indemnity of twenty cents a day for their services whether the weather is fine or not.

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member asks me whether I will deal sympathetically with the request that he has made. I may inform him, Mr. Chairman, that I have begun to deal.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I have visited two of these camps. One of them is located in my own constituency. Prior to the establishment of these camps the city in which I reside operated a camp at the exhibition grounds, and they were quite unable to run it as efficiently as the camp is being run to-day under the department. As a result a lot of agitators and communists got into the camp in the city. The police tried to take fifty of them out one day and send them to another camp, but they refused to go, and as a result a riot broke out and Captain Sampson, who had bottles and bricks and everything else thrown at his horse, was killed. That was in the city of Saskatoon. Now there is a camp being operated by the department at Dundurn, thirty miles from where I live, and it has been my privilege to be there on several different occasions. I have talked with the men, and by and large they are all very well satisfied. They are well housed and well treated; there is no question about that. One day three men were thrown out of the camp because they refused to abide by the regulations. They were agitators trying to create trouble and a disturbance among the men in the camp. There were some fourteen hundred men in the camp at the time. These three men came back to Saskatoon and placed their troubles before some citizens, and a delegation of these people came to see me. They had not made inquiries as to the offences for which these men were thrown out; they simply came to me weeping and wailing because of the so called bad treatment these men had received. A day or two later these three men who had been thrown out of the camp called on me and told me a great tale of woe. I must say that I did not receive them with outstretched arms or anything of that kind. Then these three men went to the chief of police and demanded beds in the police station. They did not get them. Finally they went to the Salvation Army, where they stayed. The next day I succeeded in getting a friend of mine who had a contract to take out railway ties in the constituency of my hon. friend from North Battleford to give these three men a job. I telephoned the chief of police and said, "You had better round them up and see if they want to work." He rounded them up and informed me that they did not have proper clothing. I asked him to inquire how much it would cost, and he bought sixty dollars' worth of clothes for them, which I paid for. They were sent out to the tie camp and given a job, but three days afterwards the mounted police were called in and these men were taken out of the camp, and eventually one of them found himself located in the gaol at Prince Albert. They were just communist agitators. They did not want to work.

There is another camp I have visited in Prince Albert national park. Several hundred men have been located there for a number of years. I went through the bunkhouses, the dining rooms and kitchen, and found them all in excellent condition. Two or three other men and myself spent a day or two at this park. We were in bathing at a spot some distance from the beach where most of the people live and three men came down to water some horses. We got talking to these fellows and they told us how delighted they were at having been able to get in the camp. The camp was about to be closed for the summer. They said they had been very well treated by the officials. It would almost seem as if British Columbia has a peculiar type of citizen, they have so much trouble out there with these agitators. There does not seem to be the same trouble in other camps. If these men would abide by the rules of the department I think they would find everything all right. Generally speaking, they are architects of their own misfortune. I think the department is to be commended for the manner in which they have handled this very difficult task and, on the whole, the men in the camps are to be commended for the manner in which they have handled themselves.

Item agreed to.

Administration, $359,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What is the explanation for the increase of $41,000?

Mr. STIRLING: This is made up of pay and allowances for defence headquarters which are necessary because of a change in bookkeeping. Seven officers are being transferred from the permanent force, one of whom is employed on unemployment relief. There will also be allowances for the extra day for leap year. Instead of these staff officers being paid under the vote for the permanent force, they will now be paid from this vote, which is considered the proper place. That accounts for $30,700 of the increase. Transportation, travelling and removal expenses incidental to completion of staff appointments account for $5,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I notice the vote for the permanent force is increased from $4,910,034 to $4,964,700. If the minister is taking $30,000 from the vote for the permanent force and transferring it to the vote for administration, the permanent force vote should be reduced by that amount.

Mr. STIRLING: Shall I deal with that now or wait until we reach the permanent force vote?

Sir EUGENE FISET: I think this would be the proper place to deal with it.

Mr. STIRLING: The explanation is as I have given, that these officers are now paid under administration. When we reach the permanent force vote I shall be glad to give an explanation then or I can give it now if the hon. member desires.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It would save time to give it now.

Mr. STIRLING: This estimate is based on a strength of 332 officers and 2,988 other ranks, also six officers of the non-permanent active militia attached for duty and 31 civilian employees.

Sir EUGENE FISET: May I interrupt? The minister is simply giving a general explanation of the vote. I do not want him to go to that trouble because that is not what I want.

Mr. STIRLING: If the hon. member will permit me, I am just reaching the explanation he wants. The increase over 1934-35 is six officers and eight other ranks.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is that an increase in the permanent force?

Mr. STIRLING: Could we stay on the vote for administration?

Mr. DONNELLY: How many officers?

Sir EUGENE FISET: I do not understand the explanation given by the minister. A minute ago he told us that seven officers of the permanent force had been transferred from the permanent force to administration. If the vote for administration has been increased by $30,000, the vote for the permanent force should be reduced by the amount necessary for the salaries of these officers who have been transferred.

Mr. STIRLING: That is the explanation I have given. It has been considered necessary to augment the permanent force by that small number and the staff officers will in future be paid from the administration vote.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am sorry but I do not understand the explanation. The minister stated that seven or eight officers of the permanent force, whose salaries had been paid from the permanent force vote, were being transferred and their salaries would now be paid out of the administration vote. The salaries for these officers cannot be provided for both in the administration and in the permanent force votes; if one is increased the other should be decreased.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the minister making a further explanation?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister state the officers who are being transferred?

Mr. STIRLING: The increased amount is to cover the following appointments now being paid from permanent force vote:

Staff officer, medical services,
Assistant director, personal services,
Assistant director, organization,
G 2 training,
Assistant director, intelligence,
A.A. & Q.M.G. (unemployment relief),
Artillery liaison officer, R.C.A.F.

These positions are usually held by a major or senior captain and the units to which these officers belong are without the services of their corresponding ranks. The result is that other officers of lower rank are carrying out their regimental duties but cannot receive the appropriate rank or pay for the responsibilities they are forced to assume.

Mr. RALSTON: Do I understand that this is really an addition to the staff?

Mr. STIRLING: These are transfers from the permanent force to administration.

Mr. RALSTON: An addition to staff by transferring regimental officers to staff appointments; is that it?

Mr. STIRLING: Hitherto these officers have been paid out of the permanent force vote and it has been considered more desirable that they should be paid out of the administration vote.

Mr. RALSTON: And they will perform the same duties which they performed when they were paid out of the permanent force vote?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there an addition to the staff?

Mr. STIRLING: No, except that one now working on unemployment relief.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am afraid both the minister and even my colleague, the former Minister (Mr. Ralston), are under a misapprehension. In the past these officers were paid from the permanent force vote. They were acting in a certain capacity, perhaps on the staff, but I understand that the payment of their salaries will now be made from the administration vote and that new staff appointments are being created for them. The minister has just stated what they were and he adds that they were transferred from the permanent force vote to administration because the department could not pay them adequate salaries for the work they did. I submit therefore that new staff appointments are being created.

Mr. DONNELLY: I must protest against this militia vote which has appeared in the estimates year after year. I have protested against it before and I do so again. Here we have an increase of $117,000. This week there was in Ottawa a meeting of all the mayors from the Atlantic to the Pacific protesting against the expense of keeping the unemployed in their cities. They told us it was impossible for them to continue handing out relief after the first of May; the taxes were so high that they could not raise sufficient money to support the unemployed. Yet here we find the militia service with an increased allowance of $117,000. Year after year the same thing happens: there is an increase in militia services, in police and in all forms of protection throughout the dominion. It is impossible for me to justify this vote. When we think of the number of people out of employment, when we think of the poverty and want throughout the country, on the farms and in the cities, when we remember that our boys last summer were going to militia camps on a holiday, drawing $1.10 a day, and furnished with new equipment, clothing and so on, while their fathers at home were not able to earn $1 a day, it seems to me that we are all wrong; we have gone astray—yes, as someone says, we are all wet. This vote ought to be reduced substantially year by year, and, I repeat, I cannot justify it on any ground. Those in the permanent service are being advanced every year just as if conditions were normal. The thing is ridiculous.

Mr. RALSTON: Do I understand the minister clearly to say that there has been no creation of any new staff positions by this operation, except the creation of one new A.A.Q.M.G. for a particular purpose?

Mr. STIRLING: That is my information; there have been no new staff appointments.

Mr. RALSTON: I take it that the position of staff officer, medical services, has always existed.

Mr. STIRLING He is performing this service but under a different name. That is the man.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not the man I am talking about but the post.

Mr. STIRLING: The post is the same. The officer is no longer called deputy director general of medical services; he is now called staff officer, medical services. The same man is doing the same work.

Mr. RALSTON: A new post is created and the old post abolished?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister go through the list and show us what the previous post was that is now represented by the post paid for under the administration vote?

Mr. STIRLING: That is the only one in the list that is changed.

Item agreed to.

Cadet services, $150,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: How many cadets were trained in the province of Quebec last year?

Mr. STIRLING: There were 320 units, the same as the year before.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I mean the number that actually underwent training.

Mr. STIRLING: As far as I am aware, that is the number that did train—320.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister give the number of cadets trained, by provinces?

Mr. STIRLING: As at August 31, 1934, they were: Nova Scotia, 2,282; Prince Edward Island, 754; New Brunswick, 3,491; Quebec, 51,337; Ontario, 21,126; Manitoba, 2,095;

Saskatchewan, 2,669; Alberta, 1,792; British Columbia, 1,800. That makes a total of 87,346, a reduction of 46,986 compared with the year before.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In what provinces were there reductions?

Mr. STIRLING: In all the provinces.

Mr. DONNELLY: In what school are the cadets training in Saskatchewan?

Mr. STIRLING: I have not got it divided up according to units within the provinces. In Saskatchewan there were forty-one units on the last day of last year compared to forty-three the year before.

Item agreed to.

Contingencies, $31,500.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Why are there, practically speaking, three votes for contingencies? We have civil government, $45,000; we have contingencies,—I take it, for the permanent force—$31,000; and over and above that, in the vote for administration, there is provision for printing and stationery. I understand that the contingencies vote, so far as civil government is concerned, pays for expenses of civil printing in the department, and in the past it used to cover all printing and stationery expenditures for the whole department. Provision is being made here for the same kind of machinery in the administration vote. What is the purpose of these three different votes in one department?

Mr. STIRLING: The desire is that within each department the expenditures should fit with the work of that department. Shall I give the subdivisions?

Sir EUGENE FISET: I know them by heart, thank you.

Mr. STIRLING: The printing referred to amounted to only $75.

Item agreed to.

Engineer services and works, $297,500.

Mr. RALSTON: I call the minister's attention to what is a very small matter as far as the total vote is concerned; I refer to the armoury accommodation at Yarmouth in my own constituency. The minister was good enough the other day to bring down a return showing the correspondence in connection with that matter. Summing up the return I think this is the situation: negotiations have been on foot for some time with the authorities of the United Church of Canada as to the possibility of utilizing a United church property there by way of either purchase or lease. A definite price has been fixed as far as purchase is concerned, but as the correspondence discloses, no proposition has been received from the church authorities in response to a request for such proposition by way of lease. I do not know whether the minister has in mind continuing negotiations along that line or not. Pending that and pending some better general armouries accommodation there, I hope the minister will consider favourably a suggestion which is made in this return by the officer in command of No. 3 company, 6th Division Signallers, for some better accommodation for that unit. That does not mean that the 84th Field Battery, which is the other militia unit down there, does not need better accommodation, but it would appear from the correspondence that the commanding officer of the 84th battery is not particularly enthusiastic regarding the United church property; he indicates that it does not provide the fireproof accommodation which the battery would wish to have. But he does intimate that the signals in his opinion require better accommodation. There is a proposition on the file whereby signals may get separate accommodation outside the agricultural building—which is now being used by both units—in a building owned by E. H. Spinney at what appears to be a very small rent. At the present time the room for signals in the agricultural buildings is being paid for at the rate of $5 a month. The Spinney proposition would involve $10 a month instead of $5, and an expenditure of probably $500 in all to fit up the building. It would apparently give the signals very much better accommodation, as at present they have only one room in the agricultural building. I would ask the minister to go into the matter carefully, in the hope in the first place of providing better armoury accommodation all around, but in any case of providing at least better accommodation for the signals if it is found that there is no building sufficiently attractive to the military people to justify their recommendation.

Mr. STIRLING: I recall the matter that the hon. member has outlined. We are continuing to explore the possibilities of leasing.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I understand that representations have been made to the minister in connection with armoury accommodation at Swift Current, Saskatchewan. Have any steps been taken towards furnishing better equipment along the lines of the suggestion that has been made?

Mr. STIRLING: All that I can say is that the Swift Current armoury suggestion is being given consideration along with all the other armouries which have been suggested throughout Canada.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is there at present an armoury at Calgary, and when does the minister expect to build that million dollar one which was passed in the public works program last year?

Mr. STIRLING: If the hon. member will recall, there is armoury accommodation at Calgary, which has been used for a considerable time by the permanent force. The barracks project which has been started on the plateau outside Calgary is for the purpose of restoring that armoury to the non-permanent active militia, for whose purposes it was built.

Item agreed to.

General stores, $837,800.

Mr. BOTHWELL: This item shows that the total last year was the same, whereas last year's estimate show that the vote was only $667,800. Was there some supplementary vote last year, or how is it the estimates this year show an increase over last year?

Mr. STIRLING: The difference is that the hon. member has not added to the figure printed in last year's estimates the amount voted in the supplementary estimates of that year.

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent active militia, $2,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister tell us what this item provides for as to the number of men who will be trained?

Mr. STIRLING: The estimates provide unit training for the total 29,803 all ranks for a period of ten days.

Mr. RALSTON: Is it the same number as last year?

Mr. STIRLING: Very much the same as last year.

Mr. RALSTON: I see a $6,000 increase. What is that for?

Mr. STIRLING: The increase for salaries and wages is necessary to cover adjustments in salaries of individuals who are exempt from the ten per cent deduction under the Salary Deduction Act. Provision for such adjustment was not made in the 1934-35 estimates.

Mr. REID: I should like to draw attention to a matter in connection with the militia department of this city, the 79th Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders. I ask the indulgence of the committee and the minister for doing this. As will be well understood, the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders should have as their foremost band a pipe band. Surely the pipe band should be the premier band of a kiltie regiment, especially the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders. My complaint concerning the Ottawa regiment is that all preference has been given to the bugle band in the matter of dress. I am asking the consideration of the minister because I know the pressure that has been brought to bear in this city that the bugle band shall stand out prominently, but I am in a position to offer practical criticism. This regiment has a tradition behind it, going back to 1710, I believe, or even further.

Mr. STIRLING: I shall be very glad to give consideration to anything relating to such a matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suggest that the band be transferred to the sixth floor.

Mr. REID: If there was as much sense on all floors as comes from the sixth, this house would be all right.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understood the minister to say that this increase of $6,000 was to provide for restoration of cuts in certain salaries. Would the minister explain more fully who are exempt from this ten per cent cut and why?

Mr. STIRLING: I had begun to read the explanation of the increase as it appeared in the general statement. There have been increases and decreases this year compared with last year; the $6,000 is the balance. I shall continue to read the note that I have.

Eleven new positions are included, three of these having been taken over from the public works department, and the balance for new armouries recently completed or at present under construction. When an armoury is completed the caretaking is taken over by national defence; while it was building it was in the hands of public works. Offsetting the eleven new positions are five which have been abolished. This is a plus and minus proposition, a give and take, but the balance is an increase of $6,000. The amount of training will be affected by restricting certain activities and limiting the number in attendance at instructional schools.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understood the minister to say that there were some men who were exempt from the ten per cent cut. Who are they?

Mr. STIRLING: I am afraid I have not with me the details as to who they were. If the hon. member wishes, I will obtain the information for him.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are there any exempt and, if so, why are they exempt from the ten per cent cut?

Mr. STIRLING: Those that receive less than $1,000 had salary deductions made and then, if the hon. member will remember, those were restored to them. Provision has to be made to replace that which was taken from them before the legislation was changed.

Mr. RALSTON: A very small portion of the $6,000 is for adjustments. Apparently the larger portion is for the creation of new positions, is it not?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Permanent force, $4,964,700.

Mr. RALSTON: There is a substantial increase in this item. Will the minister explain the increase, keeping in mind the fact that apparently, as pointed out by the hon. member for Rimouski, there should be reflected somewhere a $30,000 reduction owing to that amount having been transferred to administration.

Mr. STIRLING: This increase is divided up as follows: there is an increase of $5,850 in connection with training, to enable training which has been extremely limited in the past to be carried out in a rather more extended form, so that the efficiency of the units will not be impaired. I may say that running right through these estimates are evidences of the fact that this year we do not find the same necessity for drastic curtailment that existed for the last two years. During those two years when estimates were cut to the very bone, it is obvious that in matters such as stores and in other directions we have let stocks down pretty far. That applies to stores; it applies even to training; it applies in many directions. A slight effort has been made in most directions in these estimates to endeavour this year to catch up a little bit on what we had to let slip for purposes of economy in the past.

The second portion of the total increase comes under the heading of maintenance. This is another case where there are some increases and some decreases; for instance as regards the allowance made for freight, express, cartage, we consider $1,000 will be sufficient. But for food and ice an increase of $8,000 is anticipated due to increases in prices of commodities. The same applies to forage; it also applies to fuel and gas, chiefly due to increased prices for coal and coke. There is an increase in laundry costs due to an increase in contract washing rates. There is an increase in cost of water due to an increase in rates. The decreases are based on expenditures for the coming year. It is anticipated that the amounts estimated under the several headings will meet requirements for 1935-36. In other words, the provision made for those particular items last year was a little more than the actual requirements.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the total increase under maintenance?

Mr. STIRLING: The increase is $22,249. The third portion of the increase, $26,567, comes under the category "general." There again there are increases and decreases. The increases come under the heading of pay and allowances, due chiefly to an increase of six officers and eight other ranks in the strength of the permanent force over that for the fiscal year 1934-35, an additional day's pay having to be provided for leap year, also an increase in the number of married officers. Perhaps I should point out to the committee that for a good many years, I mean since the reorganization after the war, a certain establishment has been looked forward to in Canada. In the last year or two nothing in the nature of reaching out toward that establishment was possible. This year a little reaching out toward it has been considered possible, hence this small increase in the number of officers and other ranks.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the increase in the number of regimental officers?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Does this mean another major or another captain or another lieutenant per battalion?

Mr. STIRLING: They are junior officers brought in. I cannot give the hon. member the exact units to which they are attached; I have not those details with me.

Item agreed to.

Royal Military College, $359,500.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the explanation of the increase?

Mr. STIRLING: This starts off with a decrease of $1,990 in pay and allowances of military staff due to change in appointments with replacements being made at lower rates of pay and allowances. As regards salaries of civilian personnel, sufficient funds are included to cover the restoration of one-half of the current ten per cent deduction, also statutory increases for the civilian members of the staff.

Mr. RALSTON: Are there any increases in pay?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does the Minister of Finance concur in the statement made by the Minister of National Defence? I understood the estimates represented only ninety per cent of the total amount that was to be provided for salaries and that a special bill was to be introduced to provide for the five per cent increase, so I do not think the minister's explanation can be correct.

Mr. RHODES: The general set-up was that the estimates were prepared on the basis of last year's, which included the ten per cent deduction. There may be some exceptions in connection with this department.

Mr. STIRLING: No doubt my hon. friend heard me read a portion of—

Sir EUGENE FISET: Never mind; I am satisfied.

Item agreed to.

Naval Services—
To provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service, including the Royal Canadian navy, the Royal Canadian naval reesrve and the Royal Canadian naval volunteer reserve, $2,250,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister give an explanation of the increase?

Mr. STIRLING: The increase is for the Royal Canadian navy, no increase being provided for the other naval services. In order to meet the increased cost of pay and allowances for the Royal Canadian navy it has been necessary to increase their vote by the sum of $39,750, and the medical vote has also been increased by $3,000. The vote for miscellaneous effective service has been increased by $8,050 and for non-effective by $800. So that the net increase authorized may not exceed $28,000. The stores and allowances vote has been decreased by $23,600, bringing the net increase to $28,000.

The explanation of the reason for the increase in this year's estimates is that there are three engineering midshipmen doing courses at Keyham while last year there was only one. Additional officers in this branch, as the hon. member will recall, are badly needed. There is another cadet under training, there being six instead of five. There is a long torpedo course for 1935-36, there being no such course in the past year. An additional torpedo officer was urgently required, there being no officer available until the present year. Other courses were estimated for last year and are to be carried out in the present year.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister has said there is an increased cost for pay and allowances amounting to $39,750. Are there any increases in individual amounts of pay?

Mr. STIRLING: Only in cases where promotion would carry with it the pay of a higher rank.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would the minister inform me if there is any possible way for a young French Canadian, for instance, of about sixteen or seventeen years of age to join the Royal Canadian navy or the cadet school? What steps must be taken if he desires to follow that course?

Mr. STIRLING: Does the hon. member refer to an executive rank?

Sir EUGENE FISET: To start from the bottom as a cadet, if necessary.

Mr. STIRLING: As an officer?

Sir EUGENE FISET: As an officer, if possible, or even as a seaman.

Mr. STIRLING: Two different answers would be given, and I should like to know which the hon. member wishes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: As an officer.

Mr. STIRLING: There are two ways of getting into the Royal Canadian navy, one after being accepted in the Royal Military College at Kingston where the cadet would spend two years and if successful would be chosen for entry into the Royal Canadian navy, and the other by taking a naval examination open to all Canada.

Sir EUGENE FISET: When and where do the examinations take place?

Mr. STIRLING: They take place in different Canadian centres. The applicant must not be older than eighteen and one-half years or younger than seventeen years.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I know that graduates of the universities and seminaries of the province of Quebec with the degree of bachelor of arts or bachelor of science are admitted to the Royal Military college without further examination. Would the same apply to our naval academy?

Mr. STIRLING: No, the applicant would have to take an examination, if I follow the hon. member correctly.

Sir EUGENE FISET: At what time of the year would he apply?

Mr. STIRLING: The application ought to be sent in by this time for the examination to be held in May.

Mr. DONNELLY: Of what is the navy composed at the present time? Where is it? Do you ever get it out of the garage?

Mr. STIRLING: There are two destroyers on each coast.

Mr. DONNELLY: What are their names?

Mr. STIRLING: The Skeena and the Vancouver on the Pacific coast, together with the Armentieres, a mine sweeper, and on the Atlantic coast we have the Saguenay and the Champlain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What services if any have been performed by these cruisers during the past year?

Mr. STIRLING: Torpedo boat destroyers?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: At the present time their services are largely those of training. They take the trips necessary to keep the ships' companies up to the mark in training. Also at this time of the year they join with the home fleet when the fleet of Great Britain comes into West Indian waters. To that point our two destroyers from each coast proceed. The destroyers on the Atlantic coast proceed directly to one of the more northern West Indian islands, and the two destroyers from the Pacific coast come down through the Panama canal to that rendezvous. They spend so many weeks together carrying out tactical exercises, gunnery, torpedo drills and manoeuvres, both by day and by night.

Mr. REID: Do the ships passing through the Panama canal pay the tolls, the same as the liners?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, the destroyers pay the usual toll.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have they any specific duty in connection with patrolling the coast?

Mr. STIRLING: There is what is known as the Bamfield patrol on the western coast. I do not know that I can outline any specific duties; as a matter of fact I do not just know what the hon. member means by the term "specific duties." Undoubtedly they do patrol the coast and if they were to discover something which was not carried on properly they would make adequate report to the authorities.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any connection between the work of these ships and the work of any other department? For instance, on the Atlantic coast we have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Is there any specific work in connection with the defence of the coast which they are regularly called upon to perform?

Mr. STIRLING: There is no police or detective work. I can only repeat what I said formerly, namely, that if trouble existed or an occasion arose they would act. Instances have occurred where ships of the Royal Canadian navy have been able to render considerable service to isolated dwellers along our coast. They have been able to give service also to distressed shipping. But with regard to definite patrols for a certain purpose other than just patrolling the coast and carrying out the training, I know of no such definite operations.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Air Force—expenses in connection with the general maintenance and training of the permanent and non-permanent active air force, and provision of facilities therefor, $2,630,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the minister should make a statement with regard to this item, because there is a very substantial increase.

Mr. STIRLING: There is an increase of $700,000 in the Royal Canadian Air Force vote. I think it is obvious that in the national defence force which Canada indulges in, the three branches of the service take their certain place; they are proportionate one to the other. There has been a considerable increase of interest the world over in the force in the air, and these forces in the air have modulated their operations in conjunction with the forces of the sea and the forces of the land. Aviation, and particularly the air forces of the various nations, has developed with very great rapidity not only as a result of the experience of the war but as a result of aviation experience generally since the war, and consequently increases for aviation, provided the force which is being considered is to be kept really up to date, are in some ways more considerable than those for the sea service and the land service. Some few years after the war, reorganization of the Royal Canadian Air Force was planned. It has not been possible in these years of difficulty to keep up the increase which was started prior to the depression for the purpose of obtaining that nucleus development which in the interests of national defence it was considered desirable that the forces should have so far as the air was concerned. This year an attempt is being made to catch up some of that slack, to move a little further towards the attainment of the desirable quantity of machines and personnel which are required to put the Royal Canadian Air Force into its proper relation to the other defence forces in the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister give us some idea of what he considers the desirable force? He mentioned a little earlier plans for a certain establishment that was thought desirable. What has the minister or the department in mind as to the force considered desirable in this country?

Mr. STIRLING: This estimate provides for a strength of 969 permanent and 526 non-permanent air force personnel, compared with 785 permanent and 399 non-permanent provided for the previous year. I do not know if that answers the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it does not go far enough. If I understood the minister aright, he said he had larger plans in view and that this was a step in the direction of that larger plan. I should like to know what is that larger plan. What is considered the desirable air force that we should have in Canada?

Mr. STIRLING: I am not in a position to lay down here to-night what perhaps the hon. gentleman is thinking of, the ultimate aim of Canada in the air. I cannot give it. Probably plans and arrangements will have to be modified as the years go by.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am just taking the minister's own statement a few minutes ago when he said that the department had a certain force in view as desirable for Canada. I take it that there must be some plan, some definite establishment which the minister would like to see created, and that this is one step in that direction.

Mr. STIRLING: I am not aware that that is in the form of a list which could be read off. Certainly I have not got it here.

Mr. REID: Has the minister information before him regarding the number of sites that have been or are about to be purchased for airports and landing fields? In a return that I received the other day I was very much surprised to see the number of sites purchased in British Columbia. Is that policy being carried out throughout the whole of Canada?

Mr. STIRLING: To answer the hon. member in detail would take a little time.

Mr. REID: I do not want it in detail, but has the minister the amount that has been expended or is to be expended on sites for airports and landing fields?

Mr. STIRLING: I cannot pick that out now, certainly, but of course in regard to the sites which have been worked on under relief measures, for instance, a very considerable number of them have been acquired without the expenditure of money. Some have been transferred from the interior department and some have been taken over by arrangement with the province concerned. I think that comparatively few pieces of land had to be purchased for the purpose.

Mr. REID: Perhaps an answer to this question will serve my purpose. Is the department carrying out a policy of purchasing sites for airports and landing fields throughout Canada?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, the department certainly is making a gesture towards the day when Canada will have dotted right across this country from coast to coast aerodromes, airports and emergency landing fields. But that is in the future, certainly not in the present.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the department paying for airports in cities? I do not think so.

Mr. STIRLING: No, but the department is endeavouring to see to it that there are emergency landing fields right across Canada, the total distance being divided up, if I remember rightly, into distances averaging thirty-five miles apart. The problem of a trans-Canada airway has been engaging the study of the aviation branch of the department for several years, and its development was commenced in 1927. In 1930 thirty landing fields had been established and equipped for night flying, the section traversing the prairie provinces being practically completed. Lack of funds prevented further development and necessitated the discontinuance of the inter-city air services of Winnipeg-Lethbridge-Edmonton and Toronto-Winnipeg. In anticipation of improved financial conditions the aviation branch is continuing to watch closely the development of air transportation in other countries in its various forms.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister has indicated that he is not able to state the objectives which are sought to be reached in connection with personnel and machines. Could he tell us the present personnel of the Canadian air force, that is officers and other ranks, and then tell us what addition to this personnel is contemplated?

Mr. STIRLING: There will be an increase of seventeen officers and 167 men.

Mr. RALSTON: And the number of machines?

Mr. STIRLING: The purchases which will be required under this estimate are four fighter type, ten training type and seven bombing type machines.

Mr. RALSTON: Is it expected that these machines will be purchased in England?

Mr. STIRLING: If the requisite machines can be obtained in Canada, it will be desirable to obtain them here. This is a matter of close examination of all factors.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the force and the country are primarily interested in training machines. There is much difference of opinion as to what type of training machine is desirable and I should like to know if the department has arrived at a definite conclusion as to what type will be purchased.

Mr. STIRLING: In the past we have kept in close touch with the Royal Air Force and many machines have been purchased from that organization. Others have been purchased from other sources. I am not in position to say that a definite decision has been arrived at as to the type of training planes to be purchased.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister contemplate taking on at least some of the men who were dropped two or three years ago at the time the drastic reductions were made in the force? I believe about eighty officers were let out.

Mr. STIRLING: It is the intention of the department to consider the applications of those men who were let out for purposes of economy, but it must be remembered that a younger type of man is coming along ready to start at the bottom.

Mr. RALSTON: There used to be a system of summer courses for college students carried on at Camp Borden. Are these being continued, either at Camp Borden or at Trenton? How many students are expected to take these courses?

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. STIRLING: In ab initio flying, eleven officers and four other ranks; instrument flying, Trenton and Ottawa, three officers and three other ranks; air pilotage, Camp Borden, three officers; army cooperation, Camp Borden, ten officers; for army officers, fifteen officers; flying instructors, Camp Borden, four officers and squadron armament, Camp Borden, four officers and three other ranks.

Mr. RALSTON: What I was asking about were the Camp Borden courses. I should like to know how many will be taking those courses.

Mr. STIRLING: Eleven officers and four other ranks.

Item agreed to.

Civil Aviation—
Expenses in connection with the control of civil aviation, airways, government and public air ports and grants to aeroplane clubs, $250,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I notice that the British government has decided recently to separate civil aviation from military flying. I should like to quote an article which appeared in the Spectator of December 21, as follows:

> Recent decisions show that the government is now fully alive to the necessity of freeing civil aviation from the dominance of military aviation, and of a more vigorous policy in conjunction with the dominions for the development of commercial air routes within the empire. The air council henceforward will be concerned exclusively with the military side. The Director of Civil Aviation will become Director-General, and will take decisions in conjunction with the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary. Expenditure on civil flying will have to be judged independently of military expenditure, and on its merits. The hope must be that international agreements will admit of the enlargement of the civil vote through the reduction of the military. If we are to hold our own in competition with foreign countries, ground organization must be improved and regular services must be quickened. To no small extent the future cohesion of the empire depends on the air—not on the air force, but on the efficiency of civil services.

If such a decision has been arrived at in England, it seems to me highly desirable that we should proceed along somewhat similar lines. Perhaps this would be even more desirable in Canada than in England because we are so closely in touch with the American air routes. If civil flying is to be developed to the extent to which it should be developed, we should not be tied up with military operations. Has the minister's department given consideration to this matter, and is it prepared to recommend to the government action along these lines?

Mr. STIRLING: I do not consider that any division other than exists at present is required in this country. There is no connection between civil aviation and the Royal Canadian Air Force; they are two separate branches. True, they come under the one minister, but they are entirely separate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it necessary that they should come under the military arm? I do not see how the minister can say that they are quite separate, because a few minutes ago he suggested that there should be the closest cooperation with regard to landing fields and so on, and in the training of pilots I think the two are closely connected. At any rate, that is my information.

Mr. STIRLING: I am afraid I do not follow the hon. member. One might as well argue, it seems to me, that a man who drives a taxicab is not the same type of individual as the man who drives a motor ambulance. They are the same type of individual, they have to perform the same sort of operation; but there is no connection between the two. Both types might have to use the same airfield or seadrome and they both fly airplanes. They both know something of the design of machines and engines, but I do not see how they are connected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the first place, this comes under the military department. That is the first and essential thing we are discussing to-night.

Mr. STIRLING: They happen to come under one minister but they are not related in any other sense.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are we not discussing the affairs of the Department of National Defence, or have we passed entirely from the Department of National Defence?

The CHAIRMAN: This is civil aviation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but it comes under the Department of National Defence.

Mr. STIRLING: It comes under this minister, who happens to be Minister of National Defence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I understand rightly, in England there will be provision to take it completely out of the Department of National Defence, making some other arrangement.

Mr. STIRLING: Perhaps Canada will do the same some day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have asked the minister whether consideration has been given to the idea of taking it out of the Department of Defence.

Mr. STIRLING: I cannot say that I have given it consideration. Obviously the day may come when all sorts of changes will be made within these departments, but at present I am not giving consideration to civil aviation doing anything but remaining where it is.

Mr. RALSTON: To emphasize the fact that there are civil activities in this military department, may I as a last word bring to the attention of the minister the matter of having, if possible, an airplane located on the eastern coast of Halifax for the benefit of navigation during the winter months?

Mr. STIRLING: At Dartmouth?

Mr. RALSTON: Well, that is across the harbour. I have already brought it to the minister's attention, and other representations have been made to him. It is well worthy of consideration. It would have done valiant service if it had been located there last winter during the excessive storms; it would have assisted in locating a ship that was adrift for between twenty-four and forty-eight hours. Has the minister come to any conclusion in the matter?

Mr. STIRLING: It has not been definitely decided, but it is under close observation and a decision will be arrived at shortly.

Item agreed to.

Radio services—For the maintenance and operation of the northwest territories radio system, $199,425.

Mr. RALSTON: There will not be a department of communications this year?

Mr. STIRLING: I am not in a position to make a statement at the moment.

Item agreed to.

Battlefields memorials, $86,789.

Mr. RALSTON: The Vimy memorial comes under battlefields memorials?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Will it be finished in time for the pilgrimage which is planned for July?

Mr. STIRLING: It is anticipated it will be ready.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda or written representations, exchanged between any member of the government or the Deputy Minister of Finance and any chartered bank with reference to the appointment of any officer of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: There is no objection to this motion passing, but may I point out to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that I rather fear it will be barren of results, because so far as I know there is no such correspondence. The same observations apply with respect to the next motion.

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda or written representations, exchanged between any member of the government or the Deputy Minister of Finance and any member of the House of Commons or of the Senate with reference to the appointment of any officer of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: This motion will have to be accepted with marked reservations. So far as the information with respect to the quantity of gold is concerned there is no objection to that information being given. I must say however that the correspondence deals with intimate details of foreign exchange accounts of customers of the bank, and it would not be in the public interest to disclose that intimate information. Subject to this reservation I am content that the motion should pass.

Motion agreed to.

ILLNESS OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to inform the house that yesterday I had a long talk with the Prime Minister and found that he is making continued progress towards recovery. We are expecting his time in bed will be over next Thursday, and that he will then be able to move about in his room for a few days after which he will be able to get out. The doctor handed me the following statement this morning which I will read so that it may be on Hansard:

The Prime Minister's convalescence has proceeded satisfactorily and without incident during the past week. It is expected that he will leave his bed some day this week.

April 1, 1935. R. S. Stevens.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the country as well as the house will be pleased to receive this favourable word of the Prime Minister's convalescence, and I hope that the acting leader of the government will convey to the Prime Minister from all of us our pleasure at knowing that he is making such a splendid recovery.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Thank you.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

QUESTION AS TO INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 50 BEARING UPON DURATION OF PRESENT PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a question of the ministry with a view to removing a doubt as to the meaning of section 50 of the British North America Act and its bearing upon the duration of the present session of parliament. I shall not expect an answer from the ministry at the moment, but the question might perhaps stand as a notice of motion. I would like to make clear before asking the question that I am aware of the rule which provides that members are not to seek legal opinions from the government. I am not seeking a legal opinion. The matter is one that concerns the proceedings of this house and is of great public interest and therefore I hope the government will be able to give a definite reply.

Sestion 50 of the British North America Act reads as follws:

> Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the house (subject to be sooner dissolved by the governor general), and no longer.

In the minds of some there is an ambiguity in the words "the day of the return of the writs" as to whether they mean the day fixed in the proclamation of the election for the return of the writs, or the day of the receipt by the chief electoral officer of the last writ to be received.

The proclamation that was issued on May 30, 1930, ordered that writs were to issue in due form for calling a parliament "which writs" it set forth, "are to bear date of the 30th day of May, 1930; and to be returnable on the 18th day of August." If the construction of the government is that the day referred to in the expression used in the proclamation with regard to the election "returnable on the 18th day of August" is that of the day referred to as the cessation of the continuance of this House of Commons that I believe will accord with the view which is most generally held and which I believe to be the correct view. On the other hand, as I have said, there are some who believe the date is that on which the last writ was received by the chief electoral officer. No doubt the chief electoral officer himself will be able to give a definite opinion on the matter.

The questions which I wish to ask in the circumstances are the following.

In the opinion of the government:

(1) Which was the day of the return of the writs for choosing the present House of Commons?

(2) When does the present House of Commons cease to continue?

(3) Is it necessary that the writs for a general election be issued during the duration of the House of Commons?

(4) Is there a limit to the period of time which may elapse between the date of the issue of the writs for a general election and the day of polling?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think those are proper questions and the replies will be submitted in due course. I will make inquiry to-morrow in regard to the matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the unemployment relief measure expiring yesterday, may I ask the Minister of Labour if he has any announcement to make with respect to new measures to be taken in the situation?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the act of 1934 expired by the effluxion of time at the end of March. The bill which went through this house a few days ago has not yet passed the Senate or received royal assent, but I do not anticipate that there will be any considerable delay in the bill passing through the other house and receiving royal assent. I do not anticipate that there will be any confusion in the meantime because there will be a very short interval between the expiration of the one act and the coming into force of the other.

EASTERN POTATO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with further reference to a question that was asked on Monday last by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) if I had any information as to whether Quebec was wishing to come in under the eastern Canada potato marketing scheme, for his information I advise that I received this morning official notification from the Hon. J. A. Godbout, Minister of Agriculture for Quebec, which translated reads as follows:

In reply to the requests of a large number of interested growers, I am enclosing herewith a memo. in which I recommend the application of the eastern Canada potato marketing scheme to the province of Quebec.

I trust that you will see your way clear to grant the above request, and I remain,

Yours very truly,

J. Adélard Godbout,
Minister of Agriculture for Quebec.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF MEETING OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the house I should like to say that I had hoped to be able to table to-day the reports of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National Steamships, and the auditors' reports connected therewith, but through some slip-up they were not quite ready. I shall table them to-morrow. My reason for mentioning the matter is this. If it is satisfactory to the members of the special railway committee which deals with these matters I shall ask the officers of the railways and the steamships to be here for a meeting of the committee on Wednesday morning, and we can hold the meetings of that committee from that day on for the length of time that is necessary. If there should be any objection from the members of the committee to that date, we can change the date to suit them. I am merely giving this notice in order to give the members of that committee an opportunity to express their opinion as to the date, and if I hear nothing to the contrary I shall ask the officers to be here on Wednesday morning next.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): I would remind the minister that Wednesday morning will probably be the last caucus held by the Liberal party before the general election, and we have much to discuss.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): May I suggest to the minister that the meeting be called for Thursday instead of Wednesday?

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. MANION: I have no objection. I shall be glad to make it Thursday instead of Wednesday. It makes it rather a short week, but I certainly wish to meet the desires of hon. members, so if it is the wish of the committee we will make it Thursday instead of Wednesday.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TELEGRAM URGING COMPLETION OF ST. WALBURG-EDMONTON BRANCH LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Railways. It is based on a telegram dated Loon Lake, Saskatchewan, March, 27, via Meadow Lake, and reads as follows:

C. R. McIntosh, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Telegrams have been forwarded to the following: Hon. Doctor Manion, M.P., John Vallance, M.P., F. R. MacMillan, M.P., advising that petitions are being mailed from residents of Barthel, Loon Lake, Loon River, Makwa, Flat Valley, Goodsoil, Beacon Hill, Pierceland in northwestern Saskatchewan, and Cherry Grove, Beaver Crossing and Cold Lake in northern Alberta, asking completion of railway and steel on St. Walburg-Edmonton branch Canadian National Railways.

Northern Railways Development Association,
Charles F. Marshall, President.

The question I want to ask is this. May I inquire of the minister if he can, for the information of parliament and the country, add anything to his answer to a similar question of Wednesday, March 6, when he intimated that there might be some action taken and a sum of money set aside for this pressing railway project?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I intimated that there would be any money set aside. As a matter of fact I am not in control of that matter. The management of the railways make their own estimates. However, the hon. gentleman has just heard me announce a meeting of the special railway committee for Thursday next, and I invite him now to come before that committee and ask the officers of the railway what their recommendation will probably be. My hon. friend will be very welcome to come before the committee so far as I am concerned, and I do not think there will be any objection from anyone.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Speaker, I shall accept that invitation.

RELIEF PAYMENTS TO ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. P. MULOCK (North York): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour when I may expect an answer to the question standing as No. 1 under Questions of March 11, and reading as follows:

What contributions, if any, did the dominion government give to the province of Ontario for relief expenditures in each of the months of July to December inclusive, 1933, the month of January, 1934; the months of July to December inclusive, 1934; the month of January, 1935?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the form of the question has caused any delay which has occurred in its being answered. It is very difficult to allocate to any month the amount of money which has been contributed to any province. The books of the department indicate the contributions which have been made in connection with approvals given under particular statutes, whether it be 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 or 1934 and an effort is being made to allocate these amounts to the different months as nearly as possible. I had hoped that I would be able to table an appropriate explanation to-day but on inquiry this morning I find it is not yet complete. I hope to do this to-morrow.

SEED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) asked if any requests had been received from the province of Saskatchewan for the guaranteeing of accounts for seed oats and wheat. I saw the hon. member later on and he told me he was leaving town. I told him I would submit an answer in his absence but I have been unable to do so until now. A telegram was received from the premier of Saskatchewan, I believe shortly after the hon. member asked his question although at that time it was no doubt en route. At the request of the government of Saskatchewan last autumn this government agreed to arrange for the purchase by the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited of options covering a large quantity of wheat and oats and at the present time is in communication by telegram with the premier of Saskatchewan to ascertain to what extent the province proposes to exercise these options. A definite answer cannot be given to the hon. member's question until a further reply is received from the premier of Saskatchewan.

THE KING'S SILVER JUBILEE

PROCLAMATION OF GOVERNOR GENERAL ADDRESSED TO RELIGIOUS BODIES AND SETTING APART MONDAY MAY 6 AS DAY OF THANKSGIVING AND REJOICING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the house to make a statement in connection with the celebration throughout Canada of the King's silver jubilee. On February 27 last a proclamation was issued by His Excellency the Governor-General, requesting the heads of the clergy of all religious denominations throughout Canada to have appropriate references to His Majesty's silver jubilee made at church services on Sunday, May 5th. Special orders of service have been arranged by the heads of some of the religious denominations and intimations have been received from the heads of other churches that appropriate measures will be taken to give effect to the request contained in the proclamation.

The proclamation of the 27th February also proclaimed Monday, the 6th May, to be observed throughout the dominion as a day of general thanksgiving and rejoicing on the occasion of the jubilee. It is, therefore, proclaimed a public holiday throughout Canada and it will undoubtedly be observed accordingly throughout the country.

On Monday, May 6th, a ceremony will take place on parliament hill in Ottawa, which will be attended by His Excellency the Governor-General. At the various provincial capitals similar ceremonies are being arranged which will be attended by the lieutenant-governors of the provinces. In other cities, towns and municipalities throughout the dominion, local celebrations will be arranged by the mayors or other civic authorities. The ceremony at Ottawa will, it is expected, be broadcast by the Canadian radio commission and will commence at eleven o'clock, Ottawa daylight saving time.

On parliament hill the units of the defence forces, veterans and ex-service men, police force, firemen, school children, boy scouts, girl guides and other organizations and formed bodies will be assembled in front of the peace tower. It is planned to arrange, if possible, that there shall be a massed choir to lead in the singing. While the audience is assembling, commencing at 10.30, there will be a program of appropriate music on the carillon. At 11.00 o'clock a 21-gun salute will be fired, and church bells well be rung and church chimes played. At 11.07, the massed choir will lead in the singing of "God Save the King".

This will be followed by the address of His Excellency the Governor General. The massed choir will then lead in the singing of "Land of Hope and Glory". Then will follow the address of the Right Honourable, the Prime Minister or, in his absence, the minister who speaks for His Majesty's government in Canada, and an address by the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition.

His Excellency the Governor General will then present His Majesty's silver jubilee medals to some of those residents of Ottawa to whom they will be awarded. As the number may be considerable, it is not expected that all the presentations will be made at the ceremony. The massed choir will then lead in the singing of "O Canada", and this will be followed by the "March Past" of the formed bodies.

His worship the mayor of Ottawa and the city council have kindly offered to cooperate in the arrangements for the ceremony, and their assistance in the arrangements is greatly appreciated.

The ceremonies in the other communities will likely follow the outline of the program at Ottawa. It is earnestly hoped that the civic authorities in the cities, towns and other municipalities throughout the country will take early steps to arrange appropriate programs for the celebration, and that members of parliament will communicate with the civic and municipal authorities in their several electoral districts soliciting their cordial cooperation.

Mr. MARCIL: Is any part of that program to be in French?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not now know the details.

Mr. MARCIL: There are two or three million Canadians who speak the French language and it would be a compliment to them to have part of this program in French.

Mr. CAHAN: This announcement is being made both in French and English and I have no doubt that in all communities where there is a considerable population speaking French arrangements will be made to have the whole or a part of the programs in French.

Mr. MARCIL: I am referring to the federal program.

Mr. CAHAN: The announcement I have made refers only to the celebration at Ottawa. The government of Quebec will no doubt arrange for its provincial program and there will be celebrations in the different communities.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. MARCIL: I should like the federal program to be part French and part English. No doubt there will be a large number of French speaking Canadians who will be present and if they do not understand English they will not be able to enjoy the program.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman may rest assured that every care will be taken to see that the celebration of the King's silver jubilee will be satisfactory to both of our old races.

Mr. DUFF: No reference was made as to the part to be played by the members of the Senate and House of Commons. I should like to know why that omission has been made.

Mr. CAHAN: I am simply making an announcement but later on a special program will be printed and distributed. This program will provide for the presence of members of the Senate and House of Commons. However, it is quite possible that on that day the members of the Senate and House of Commons may be in their own constituencies where it is hoped they will take a special part in the local celebrations.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table copy of order in council P.C. 861, dated to-day and to make a short statement in connection therewith. This order in council provides for the setting up of a commission to inquire into the complaints which have been made with respect to the administration and management of the relief camps established by the Department of National Defence in British Columbia. The dominion government has held the view that as these camps have been set up in aid of the province of British Columbia it was proper for the members of the British Columbia government to visit them and satisfy themselves and the public as to conditions existing therein. On many occasions they have been invited to do so but have repeatedly declined the invitation. The government has therefore decided to appoint a commission, to listen to complaints from men who are or were in these camps, to investigate and report, the purpose being to inform the public of conditions obtaining in the camps. The commission consists of the Hon. W. A. Macdonald, late of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, chairman; Mr. Charles T. McHattie, vice president, Gaults Limited, and chairman, board of directors of the Vancouver Welfare Federation; and the Reverend E. D. Braden, organizing chairman and United Church representative on the joint committee of relief camp religious work.

FARM LOAN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): In consequence of several letters I have received, may I ask the Minister of Finance when he anticipates that the federal farm loan legislation will be available to applicants from Saskatchewan.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend can inform me when the bill which is now before the Senate will pass and receive the royal assent I can answer him; otherwise I am not in a position to do so, because the machinery cannot function until the amending bill is passed.

Mr. VENIOT: Will it apply at the same time to all the provinces?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

OYSTER FISHERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): May I ask the government whether parts of East river, North river and West river, Prince Edward Island, are closed or will be closed to oyster fishing for the season of 1935?

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries): I shall be very glad to look into the matter raised by my hon. friend and see that he gets an answer.

EXECUTION OF THOMASINA SARAO

PROVINCIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): May I be permitted to mention a matter which has received a great deal of prominence in the press and caused a great many inquiries of the Department of Justice in regard to the unfortunate incident which occurred in Montreal on Friday last during the execution by capital punishment of a woman by the name of Sarao. It has been stated in some of the newspapers, and certainly has been intimated to me in a good many telephone messages, that in some way or other the Department of Justice should take this matter up and have an inquiry into it. For the information of those in the house and out of it, may I say that the administration of law in Canada, both civil and criminal, is under the jurisdiction of the various provinces and not of the dominion. This dominion has nothing to do with executions or with capital punishment; that is a matter entirely under the jurisdiction of the provinces. While we pass the criminal code the law is carried out in all respects by the provincial authorities. I believe that in the province of Quebec, as in other provinces, the sheriff is the official who is charged with the carrying out of such sentences. I know nothing about the matter, but I see by the paper to-day that complaint has been made to me by a Mr. Lattoni, who was counsel engaged for the unfortunate woman at her trial. He says in his letter, as I read it in the newspapers—because the letter has not yet been received by the department:

> In view of the unusual circumstances above mentioned, I earnestly request that a complete investigation be made of all the facts surrounding the execution of Mrs. Sarao.

All I can do in regard to the matter is to refer the letter, when it does come, to the attorney general's department of Quebec.

SUPPLY—EUROPEAN SITUATION

AMENDMENT BY MR. BOURASSA REAFFIRMING ADHESION TO TREATY FOR RENUNCIATION OF WAR

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Before we proceed with this order of business I would ask the patience of the house while I endeavour to impress upon hon. members, irrespective of party, the gravity of the situation that now exists in Europe, threatening the peace of the world, with its possible consequences to our own country. In the name of all the true friends of peace in Canada, I thank the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) for having given me this opportunity. I wish it had fallen to the lot of one higher in authority and with more power; though perhaps that defect will be compensated by the fact, which I think is generally acknowledged now, that, being detached from all parties, I am perhaps in a better position to submit this question to the house without any party consideration, either for or against the government or for or against the opposition.

Ever since the opening of the session I have received communications from various provinces of Canada asking me to take this initiative. Some of these communications, I may say, are from men who played a valorous part in the last war, both officers and privates. Had I followed their advice, the motion that I am going to present would be couched in much stronger terms. However, I thought it preferable, while making clear the object in which I will crave the concurrence of the house, to put it in the mildest terms possible, so as to make it easy for all men of good will to cooperate towards the end I have in view. The motion I will submit at the close of my speech will read:

That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this house reiterates the adhesion of Canada to the general treaty for the renunciation of war signed at Paris on the 27th day of August, 1928, and approved by this house on the 22nd day of February, 1929."

It invites the government to lend its support to all effective measures to ensure the world's peace, either through the League of Nations or otherwise, in cooperation with other governments pledged to the cause of peace.

That Canada stands pledged to the cause of peace need not be argued. At almost every meeting of the League of Nations, the authorized representatives of this dominion have asserted unequivocally, not only the wish, but the decision of the Canadian people to renounce war. May I mention the remarks made at the first meeting of the league, in 1920, by Mr. Rowell; then a pronouncement by Mr. Doherty at the second meting in 1921; declarations made by Senator Dandurand, as a member of the government, in 1924 and 1925; then after the signing of the pact, remarks made by Sir George Foster in 1929 and by Sir Robert Borden in 1930. But I wish especially to quote, unfortunately not as much as I would like, parts of the very eloquent speech delivered at the general assembly of the league on September 27, 1933, by the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion):

It appears to me that at no time in the history of the world have so many agreements and pacts guaranteeing the security of nations been in existence; and yet it also appears to me that at no time since the armistice has there been quite so much uncertainty and fear in the world as there is at the present moment.

Could not those words be repeated to-day?

The pact of Paris expresses the Canadian attitude towards war almost completely. In other words, we believe that war as a method of settling international disputes should be outlawed, and that all disputes, whatever their kind, should be settled by pacific means. Until that pact is accepted in principle and adopted in practice among the nations of the world, it would appear that civilization as we know it is in great danger of complete destruction....

Canada, in its dealings with the league, has been in the habit of putting first things first, and it is felt very generally among Canadians that, while there are both primary and secondary functions of the league, the primary function, the main objective, the real goal of the League of Nations is to preserve international peace; in other words, to prevent war among the nations of the world.

And then he said, I think, in conclusion:

Let us remember this individually, and let us at the same time keep in mind as a motto among ourselves these splendid words of Goethe written from Rome over a century ago: "I am a man of peace and I want to preserve peace constantly."

But, without being unjust to anyone, may I say that the one Canadian statesman who has done most for the cause of peace, not only in words but in deeds, is the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), when he was Prime Minister of Canada. Is it necessary to refer to his firm attitude at the time of the Chanak incident, in 1922, when he resisted on the one hand the frantic appeals of two ministers of the crown in England, and on the other an equally frantic appeal launched in Canada, an appeal which I might call the last cry of blatant imperialism? In doing so, the then Prime Minister, not only did his duty by Canada, but rendered to Great Britain, the British empire and the world at large the best service that it was in his capacity to render; and all leading men in England, irrespective of party, have since admitted that.

Not only did he assume that attitude then; but when the terms of the then so-called Briand-Kellogg pact were being discussed, befor the signing of the treaty, the Prime Minister, in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs, wrote to the United States minister at Ottawa, Mr. Phillips, to express his unreserved adherence to the proposal. From that letter I want to extract and put on record these two short sentences:

The preeminent value of the league lies in its positive and preventive action. It is true that the covenant also contemplates the application of sanctions in the event of a member state going to war, if in so doing it has broken the pledges of the covenant to seek a peaceful solution of disputes. Canada has always opposed any interpretation of the covenant which would involve the application of these sanctions automatically or by the decision of other states.

In that short sentence the Prime Minister of the day took away from that covenant one of its most equivocal and dangerous dispositions, as far as Canada and other countries were concerned. In that respect also he has deserved the gratitude of the people of Canada and of all friends of peace in the world. That unequivocal acceptance of the spirit of the pact, on the part of the then Prime Minister of Canada, stood in contrast to a singular reservation expressed by the Foreign Secretary in London, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, to which I shall refer in another part of my remarks.

The treaty was signed at Paris on August 27, 1928. A few days later the League of Nations was again convened, and on the 7th of September, at one of the plenary sittings, dealing, I think, with the arbitration court, the then Prime Minister, who represented Canada at that meeting, made these statements:

> Our country is a land of reconciliation. In achieving racial concord within our borders, we have for more than a century successfully exemplified the fulfilment of at least one fundamental principal of the league.
> In another particular, namely, in achieving international peace with our great neighbour, we have fulfilled for more than a century another fundamental principle of the league....
> For a distance of over three thousand miles, stretching from the waters of the Atlantic ocean on the east to those of the Pacific ocean on the west, the frontier of Canada is divided from that of the United States by a boundary which is undefended from coast to coast....
> Of that undefended frontier of more than three thousand miles, I should like to say just a word, for it is intimately related to the subject matter of the treaty recently signed at Paris. It symbolizes the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy.

And toward the conclusion of his remarks, he said:

> There, I believe, is the key to our prosperity. That is why we believe as we do in disarmament, not only as a means of preventing war and maintaining peace, but as an essential of prosperity. It is the reason why we are proud to be numbered among those nations which belong to the League of Nations which aims at providing effective guarantees for the peace of the world; it is the reason why we welcome, from any and every source, any and every instrument which gives promise of eliminating fear and establishing confidence in the relations of nations with each other.

I just mention in passing, because quoting it would carry us too far, the speech delivered by the then Prime Minister in this house on February 19, 1929, when he moved that the house approve of the treaty. Now let us come to the treaty itself, the gist of which is contained in two short articles:

> I.—The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.
> II.—The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be solved except by pacific means.

Now, sir, to that solemn profession of faith in peace we have committed ourselves, first by the signature of the Prime Minister of Canada given at Paris on the 27th August, 1928, then by the formal and unanimous approval of that treaty by the Senate of Canada on the 15th February, 1929, after six months of reflection, and again by the unanimous approval of this house on the 22nd February, 1929. If those speeches were made in all sincerity; if the Prime Minister of Canada spoke for the Canadian nation at Paris and Geneva; if the Senate and House of Commons spoke for this nation, through the speeches of some of their members and by their unanimous votes, when they declared that this country renounced war forever and never would have recourse to war under any pretence, whatever the cause or the origin might be, I say the time is upon us when those words must be made good and declared to the world as being the standing policy of Canada and the declared policy of its government, or rather of its parliament as representing the will of the Canadian nation. If we were sincere, and I believe, I know, we were sincere, we must do all we can in our humble capacity as a weak nation, but in our strength as a nation unfettered with any alliance, holy or unholy, for war, to take means or help other nations to take means to prevent war.

If that cannot be done we have another duty to perform; it is to take means now to preserve Canada from being engulfed once more in the turmoil of war. To accomplish that purpose we have four methods to pursue, not parallel, not divergent, but converging. The first method is to define and frame our own policy for peace. The second is to cooperate as much as we can with the government of the United Kingdom, provided, of course, we are sure that the government of Great Britain works for peace. The third is to cooperate if possible with the government of the United States, with the same object. And the fourth is to do all we can, through the League of Nations, to attain that same object, if that league is still willing to maintain and capable of maintaining peace.

With regard to Canada's policy I will state my views quite simply; but in order to make them more acceptable I will express them in the terms used in the Senate last year by a gentleman who once occupied a seat in this house, a gentleman who I think is still one of the leaders of the Conservative party and who, which is more to my purpose to-day, proved on the field of battle that he was not a slacker. I am referring to

Senator McRae, who on the 17th April, 1934, in one of the most eloquent denunciations of war I have ever read, made this statement, to which I direct the attention of all hon. members of this house:

> The horrors of the last war have not been forgotten. That the next war will be infinitely worse is generally appreciated. People, as always, have learned nothing and forgotten nothing, and in the circumstances there will be war in Europe. The situation presents this remarkable paradox, that while the nations all agree that another war will mean the end of European civilization, the same nations are to-day preoccupied in preparing for that war!

As I said a moment ago, in referring to the speech delivered in Geneva by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), could not those words be uttered this week? Then General McRae went on:

> Doctor Nicholas Murray Butler says, "The safest nations in the world are the unarmed nations, the Switzerlands, the Denmarks, the Norways and the Swedens."

To which he added these few but pregnant words:

> Let us add Canada to the list.

If there are any members of this house who are disposed to be astonished at the suggestion that Canada should proclaim her neutrality to the world at large, may I remind hon. members that this is no new suggestion. As far back as 1862, one of the founders of confederation, to whom a monument has been erected at the back of this building, facing the Ottawa river and the Laurentian mountains, looking over a broad horizon on which his eagle eye gazed as he thought of the great future of Canada, brought forward this suggestion. I am referring to D'Arcy McGee. What did he suggest as a counter-proposition to the proposal of the then government to organize the defence of Canada? He suggested that Canada should proclaim her neutrality to the world at large, and on that stand he was reelected for his constituency of Montreal West and invited by John A. Macdonald and George Etienne Cartier to become a member of the coalition government which brought about confederation. Surely if one of the founders of confederation could propose Canada's neutrality in 1862, and if in 1934 one of the most distinguished officers of the Canadian army could proclaim the same thing, are we not on safe ground in saying that this should be the basis of our national policy?

For a century after the conquest of Canada by England, the whole policy, first of England, and then of the growing colonies of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, then Lower and Upper Canada, was directed with one thought in mind: arming Canada to defend herself against the United States. That was the idea that D'Arcy McGee denounced as being both absurd and irrational. His voice remained unheard at the time, but as time went on common sense prevailed. To-day it has come to the point when all parties, all governments, all leaders boast of the fact that as against the only powerful nation whose attack we may dread we have not a single fort, not a single cannon, not a single arm of defence. Again I could quote the leader of the opposition, when in Geneva he cited that example as being an illustration, a century in advance, of the attitude of Canada with regard to the renunciation of war. Why not make this true for the rest of the world? If it has been found that the safest defence for Canada against the only nation which may think of attacking us is to disarm, why should we arm against Germany, Italy, Russia, Japan, China or any other country?

Suppose we had in the last fifty years educated and directed the public opinion of Canada towards the goal which has been realized on paper—but I am afraid not otherwise—in the terms of this great treaty; had we thus directed the thoughts, the aspirations and the common sense of all classes of Canadians, do you not think, sir, that we would now be proud to boast that Canada stands disarmed in the midst of nations armed to the teeth? Had we done that, had public opinion been educated along those lines twenty years ago, would 50,000 of the best sons of Canada lie buried to-day in the soil of Flanders? Would hundreds of thousands of Canadians, young men and women, have been unrooted from the fertile soil of the plains of Canada to become human wrecks and dole receivers in our large cities? I was going to say it would take fifty years to repair the evils—but no, the evil will never be repaired. Those dead men will never resurrect. Those hopes will always be buried in the soil of a foreign land with which Canada had nothing to do. Generations of Canadians will remain under the yoke of debts, public and private, which we have incurred to kill, to destroy, to brutify the world.

But at least, if we cannot repair the past, shall we not think of the future? I appeal to the fathers of families, inside and beyond the walls of this house, to the hearts of the mothers: Shall we not do something now to save our children and our grandchildren the agonies through which the generation of to-day has passed? Yes, let us here and now signify to the world that the words pronounced a year and a half ago in Geneva by the Minister of Railways and Canals were true, that we stand by them, that we are men of peace and that we are ready to help maintain peace. Let us also serve to the world as a notice this second declaration of Senator McRae:

It is bad enough to send our boys to kill in defence of their country. It is unthinkable that Canadian sons should be sent to Europe to war with these nation-mad sons of a decaying civilization.

Had I to express those words in my own terms I would change the two last words. I do not believe European nations are any more decayed than we are. Those who know the circumstances—historic, geographic, ethnical, economic—through which those great and antiquated nations have passed in the centuries should be sober in the judgment they pronounce. But surely we ought to stand behind the rest of the statement and say that we have no reason to risk the lives of our sons and the future of our country through quarrels in Europe over which we have no control whatever—in their origin, in their direction or in their conclusion.

My second point is that in order to accomplish something we must as much as possible cooperate with the government of Great Britain. For years I have been depicted as an enemy of everything British because, forsooth, when I had to choose between the interests of Canada and those of Great Britain I stood by Canada; or because, again, when I had to choose between the principles of English Liberalism, in the broad sense of the word, and the ambitions of English Toryism, I preferred to stick to the traditional policy of the Brights, the Gladstones and the English Liberals rather than to become an instrument of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain or any other new imperialist of Great Britain. That was a matter of choice, and I still think the best homage I could render to Great Britain was to act as a free British subject and to choose for my country the policy I thought best.

It is said frequently that the British empire is the strongest bulwark of peace. Well, this is partly true and partly false. I think it would be more accurate to say it is alternately true and false. As a matter of historical fact, not to go beyond the end of the eighteenth century, namely, during that period of transition from the old world preceding the French revolution and the new chaos which is still in process of readjustment, Great Britain has waged, provoked or sustained more wars than all other nations of Europe combined. Of course that is easy to explain. It is not that the British people like war any more than any other nation. Instinctively the average Englishman is a lover of peace. But because of the extension of the British empire, Great Britain had more causes of war the world over than any other nation. Then her pretension, justified or not,—I am not disputing it at the moment—of commanding the seas and of being the sole arbiter in respect to neutral trade during all wars, was in itself a constant provocation and brought England into war or to the verge of war alternately with Spain, France, Denmark, Holland, Russia and the United States. But, fortunately or otherwise, that phase of British history is passing.

What is better for our present concern is this, that after every great war in which England took a share, either directly or through subsidized armies on the continent, the British government has always stood for peace, and this for several reasons. At times it was to digest the conquests she had made, either by herself or through her allies. At other times it was because, with their solid common sense, the British realized that it was not sufficient to claim and enjoy victory, but that the economic balance of the country must be restored. That was the part played by Castlereagh and by Wellington at Paris in 1814 and at Vienna in 1815. Lloyd George himself, at Genoa, was proud to declare that he was simply going back to Castlereagh's policy in his endeavours to conciliate Germany and prevent France from crushing her under impossible conditions of peace. I do believe that the English government and the English nation are still in that mood, but I also believe it is passing.

The reservation made by Mr. Austen Chamberlain before the conclusion of the Paris pact is ominous. Under paragraph 10 of his note delivered to the American ambassador in London on the 19th of May, 1928, he says:

The language of article 1—

Which I read a moment ago:

—as to the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy renders it desirable that I should remind Your Excellency that there are certain regions of the world the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety. His Majesty's government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interferences with these regions cannot be suffered. Their protection against attack is to the British empire a measure of self-defence. It must be clearly understood that His Majesty's government in Great Britain accept the new treaty—

The treaty for the renunciation of war:

—upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect.

In other words, under this extremely important statement, the foreign secretary, speaking for his government and for the English nation, reserved to England the right to designate at her choice, upon any future occasion, which parts of the world where she would renounce war and which parts of the world where she considered herself free to wage war without defining them at all. It might be Egypt one day, the sea of China another day, the Straits Settlements another —there was no definition. The minister reserved to his government complete freedom of action. It might be Copenhagen one day, where a fleet might endanger the British empire. Nobody knows. He never defined it.

It was then, I repeat, that quite rightly, the Prime Minister of Canada adhered to that treaty without such a reservation. But I hope that we owe it, to ourselves first, and secondly in due loyalty to the British nation, and thirdly in due loyalty to the other signatories of the pact, to declare that we are not committed by that reservation, by that undefined reservation. In other words, we should signify politely but firmly to the British government that we are prepared to stand by them to help the British nation carry forward all measures for peace, but also that we are prepared to act according to the word given by Senator McRae last year, to stay at home if England chooses to go to war for causes which are foreign to Canada.

Now on the question of enlarging the scope of our relations with Great Britain in matters of peace and war, may I repeat here in my old days what I began stating some thirty-five years ago: Beware of undefined obligations, so-called moral obligations. Remember what effect they have had upon the British nation herself. There is no book I have read on the war or the policies connected with it which I have found so poignant as the Twenty Years of Lord Grey of Falloden. Here I believe was one of the most honest men that has ever played a prominent part for a long time in public life. Nevertheless, because of the lack of clarity of his mind, the lack of decision in his will, because of that misty atmosphere in which he entered the foreign office and which he kept more misty still, he came to the point of deceiving his colleagues, of deceiving the House of Commons, of deceiving the people of England, and of deceiving alternately the Germans and the French. No man has put it, I think, in clearer form than one of his colleagues, of an absolutely different type of mind, but an equally good servant of the British crown, I refer to Lord Loreburn, who resigned from the English government about a year previous to the war. In his book he analyses the policy of Sir Edward Grey, as he was then, by saying in substance that there were two policies open to the government on the eve of the war. He states that the French and Russians could have been told that England had no commitment to stand by Serbia or Russia as against Austria and the Balkans. That might have stopped them, or at least it would have saved us. On the other hand England could have served a clear notice to the Germans that whatever the cause of the war might be, she would be on the side of Russia and France. That could have been done with the assent of a majority in the house; but unfortunately, for nine years, half the members of the government were ignorant of what the other half knew. If Sir Edward Grey did not think it necessary to inform one half of his colleagues, did he take the trouble to inform us? Of course, he did not. Neither did he inform any other chiefs of tribes. The only thing that was done was to sound the bugle of war, in August, 1914, and issue a declaration which called us to go and kill the Huns, those barbarians who threatened the peace and the liberties of the world.

There was an undefined obligation. Here is another. The house will remember articles 10 and 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations. Explanations had to be given as to why we dissented. It was Sir Robert Borden first, then Mr. Doherty, and then the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), in the very letter of which I read an extract a moment ago. I think it is better not to sign than to be obliged to erase our signature later on.

Then, I would refer to the imperial conference of 1926 at which our representatives, along with the representatives of the rest of the empire, acknowledged that the question of Egypt was one of imperial concern. Of course it was of imperial concern to England, to Australia and New Zealand, but was it of imperial concern to Canada or South Africa? Mr. Amery, a shrewder politician than Sir Edward Grey ever was, had prepared a series of resolutions. One of these resolutions was very strong in support of the English policy in Egypt, but he had milder resolutions up his sleeve. He kept presenting these until he got adopted the one he wanted adopted. Fortunately, a year later, occasion was granted to our Prime Minister practically to erase that moral engagement. This appears in the correspondence with Lord Salisbury of which the house was made cognizant during the session of 1928.

Shall I refer to Locarno? I intend to do this for two reasons. First, I should like to know where is the spirit of Locarno, as between France and Germany, or as between England and Italy? I am afraid the only answer that can be given to this question is that it lies in the tombs of those two great men, Aristide Briand and Gustav Stresemann. After years of slaughter and distrust, these men attempted to repair in a few months the evils which had been accumulating for years. They succeeded on paper, but it was not long before they were denounced by the public opinion of their respective countries as traitors. This is what happened because they dared attempt to counteract the spirit of narrow jingoism and nationalism which has been prevailing in Europe ever since the war.

We hear to-day of a Locarno of the east. I have spent forty years in the reading of history and diplomatic documents; and perhaps I may also take advantage of the knowledge I have gained of some of the men who have formed public policies during the last half century, to tell this government or the next government—it does not matter:—Beware of the Locarno of the east. Keep aloof, for heaven's sake and for the sake of Canada. Perhaps it would be out of place to indicate what it would mean although I have a pretty clear idea of what the end will be.

But I should like to show the danger of following blindly any lead which may be given by London in these matters, especially in matters far away from the land of America. I would remind the house that in 1921, when the British government made an agreement with the Soviets, we adhered to it and representatives of the Soviet were accredited to Canada. In 1927 Mr. Joynson-Hicks, more commonly known in London as Jix, in order to please his friend Sir Henry Deterding, found a great conspiracy in the offices of the Arcos. Raids were made, and after this action the government of Canada expelled the representatives of the Soviet from Montreal. This was done in spite of the fact that in the official letter sent by the Canadian government to London it is admitted that we had no reason for doing this. Then we come to September, 1934, when it is learned with the greatest surprise that in Geneva we embraced the murderers of the Czar and voted to get the Soviets into the League of Nations. Again this was done because the British government had changed their policy.

In all fairness I ask the hon. members of this house: Do you think this process of kicking and kissing alternately is doing our country any good? I have nothing but admiration for the manner in which the English government conducts its foreign policy. They have to deal with all the nations on earth, and the problems facing their government have been the most difficult in the history of humanity. The policy must be changed from year to year, they must kick and they must kiss; but they do it at normal level. Must we follow behind like a puppy and bite or kiss the toes of those nations which the British government finds itself big enough to kick or kiss in the face? Such a practice is undignified, it is dangerous, it is full of possible misunderstanding. These misunderstandings may occur, first, between Canada and Great Britain; second between Canada and the United States, and third, between Canada and the rest of the world.

I sum up this whole chapter by saying: In our dealings with the British, let us try to show the same firmness, the same common sense, the same sense of give and take which the British show—and it is the most admirable trait in their policy, both internal and external. But let us at the same time realize that the consequences of an error may be much less dangerous to the British nation than the consequences of the same error might be so far as Canada is concerned. In other words, a nation with the wealth, the power and the prestige of England can run risks in war or in peace, on land or on sea, which we have not the right to make our people incur. Let us be modest and sensible; let us be dignified and respectful, but let us reiterate in perfect truth the old saying, that while a daughter in our mother's house we are mistress in our own, especially since we have proclaimed to the world that we are a nation and that we can frame our own policies, internal or external, just as we wish.

And mind you, that is exactly the attitude which the British appreciate. I was never so struck with the truth of this thought as in my short stay in London in the week which preceded the conference of 1926, when I met one of the leading Tory publicists of Great Britain, one of those who shape public opinion in Great Britain, but especially Tory opinion. He asked me, "What will be Mr. King's attitude at this conference?" I replied, "I have no mandate to speak for Mr. King; but if he rightly interprets the mandate which he has just received from the people of Canada he will tell you—politely enough, because he is a gentleman—Mind your own business and I will mind mine." And this gentleman said to me then, "I hope he will do so; but I am afraid that Amery will circumvent him and make him admit things which he should not.

Between ourselves, we British are rather tired of colonial loyalty. We like to be friends with you, but we do not like flatterers. It is enough to receive the homage of the black and brown tribes of Africa and Asia; but we like men of white skin to stand erect in our presence and talk to us as we talk to them." I thought that was a very good lesson which Canadians should take to heart.

With regard to our cooperation with the United States, I am here perhaps on more delicate ground, but I make this statement at once—that there is no great problem of policy, internal or external, which we can solve in Canada without regard to the policy of the United States. What is the use of being childish and boastful? Can we pretend to rule North America as against the United States? What I think is desirable, and what I think we should always cultivate, is friendly cooperation with the Americans and as much as possible simultaneous cooperation with the United States and Great Britain.

I hope that hon. members of this house have not forgotten the sound advice which was given once by Sir Esme Howard when he was British ambassador in Washington. Without too much flattery—just enough to satisfy Canadian vanity—not too much, just one or two cocktails—he said: "Your part in the policy of Great Britain, especially in America, may be a very useful one; it is to be the interpreters of affairs British to the Americans, and the interpreters of American opinion in England." Between ourselves, I think that the English and the Americans can correspond with each other without having recourse to Canada. Nevertheless there is something in that bit of advice. I suggest that we should make it clear to the Americans that we stand loyally by Great Britain so long as Great Britain stands for peace; and we should intimate to the British government that if England chooses war and the United States decides for peace, then we also shall decide for peace.

But it may be said that I am raising the Monroe doctrine once more—that bogey! After fifty years' reading of history, one of the things that astonish me most is the absolute contrast between the way in which the Monroe doctrine is viewed in England and the way it is viewed in Canada. As our late lamented friend, Mr. John S. Ewart, once wrote picturesquely, "The Canning policy is sometimes called the Monroe doctrine." Anyone who has read the elements of history should know that it was George Canning who prepared the so-called Monroe doctrine. After Spain and Portugal had lost their colonies in America, with a stroke of genius, Canning, to whom I think only one man can be compared among modern Englishmen, and that is Joseph Chamberlain, understood that if the United States could be got to proclaim to the world that no European power should be allowed to make conquests on the free soil of the two Americas, then the United States would become the willing policeman for Great Britain as against the rest of the world; because, of course, it was understood that those possessions of Great Britain which remained under the British crown were excepted, or rather that the Monroe doctrine was against any future acquisition of territory, while it respected actual possession. And as England alone was left with possessions on the American continent, the proclamation by President Monroe of Canning's policy was perhaps the greatest diplomatic victory of the British government in the last century. And it has remained the basic policy of the British government. I remember a statement made by Sir Edward Grey not ten years prior to the war. Speaking at one of the Guildhall banquets, if I remember aright, he said that ever since the time of George Canning down to his own regime, the Monroe doctrine had remained the mainstay of English policy. It is perhaps the only point in English policy that has not changed in a century, and it is more than ever England's policy.

Now why should we choose to be more sensitive of British honour than are the king and the government of England and the British parliament, representing all the people of the British Isles? Of course, I acknowledge a difference. We are a small nation with an immense territory; and it was natural that we should have a certain dread of that fast growing giant occupying the rest of the continent. Then there was also the colonial vanity, a plant hard to destroy; in fact, I think it is indestructible. And then there was blind reliance on the power of England—a dangerous illusion! Never was it brought so clearly to my mind as in one of the most interesting conversations I have had in my life.

In the month of June, 1914, I was passing a forenoon with dear old Lord Fisher, then retired. War was declared before he was called back to the head of the admiralty. He was a very easy talker; he talked quite freely. This was just after the defeat of the naval policies of both parties in Canada; that is, the building of a Canadian navy as proposed by the Laurier government and a contribution to the British navy as proposed by the Borden government. I asked Lord Fisher what he thought of them. "Oh," he said, "they are equally stupid. What need have you of a navy?" "Well," I said, "I always thought so, but you ought to know; you know something about naval matters." He said: "Any fool knows it is as ridiculous for Canada to have a navy as it would be for Switzerland. Only one country on earth can attack you, and that is the United States. What can you do with a navy against the United States?" "Well," I said, "what about the British navy and Mr. Borden's contribution?" "Well," he said, "that is equally foolish, because put in your mind that whatever number of ships you give us, Great Britain will never fight the United States for Canada or for any other cause. We will not do it, not because we are cowards, but because it would be foolish and criminal. We cannot fight the United States and the United States cannot fight us. Therefore if you want to arrange your own defence, do not come to London; go to Washington." "Oh," I said, "but that would never be accepted by the Canadian people; they would consider it an affront to their dignity." He said: "Are they really as foolish as that in Canada? Do you not realize that interdependency is the basis of policy all the world over? We British people are as proud as any people are, and yet we rely on the strength of the French Army to defend us against Germany, just as many years ago we relied on the Prussians and Austrians to fight against France for us. The Belgians rely on both the British fleet and the French army to defend their country against Germany, just as in the time of Napoleon they relied on us and on the armies of Prussia to resist their conquest by France. Likewise the French nation, which is as proud as any other on earth, expects us to defend her coasts against any other fleet in the world. You should come to your senses; your best arm of defence is to have none." Therefore, when I have on my side the opinion of a man like Lord Fisher and a more recent opinion expressed by General McRae, I say: Let us go straight to the root of the question, and let us proclaim to the world that we are disarming, as the best means of defending Canada.

Some people may say: But that exposes us to absorption by the United States. Yes, but we have no means of preventing the absorption of Canada by the United States, should they want to absorb us. So long as we kept up armaments against the United States, there were always currents of opinion in favour of the annexation of Canada, but ever since we have declared that state of permanent and complete disarmament, where is the current of thought in the United States favouring the annexation of Canada? Business men as well as statesmen in the United States know that they have for many years to come sufficient problems to solve within their own borders; they would not complicate their situation by annexing the rest of the continent, with all our own problems of race, religion, provinces, east and west, and so forth. No; better rely on the common sense of the United States as our best preservation.

I conclude this third chapter by saying: Let us stand without shame by the Monroe doctrine, well defined and enlarged as they understand it in England. In order to accomplish that, why not join the Pan-American union, in which we would be far more at home than we are in the League of Nations? There we would meet the representatives of all those states of South America which, in some respects, are in close understanding with the United States, but in others have the same feelings of diffidence that we have and which are natural in small or weak nations toward a very large one, dominating the continent? We would go there, on the one hand, as friendly to the United States and, on the other, as allied to that galaxy of young and gallant Latin-American nations whose influence we would strengthen and who also would strengthen our hand by exercising their influence in the sense of making peace a reality, at least in America.

We must not forget that we are an American nation. Whatever flag floats on our parliament buildings or on our fortresses, no conquest, no treaty, no acknowledgment of this or the other country, will ever change the fact that it was decided by God at the time of creation that America is America, Europe is Europe, and Canada is a nation in America and not one in Europe or Asia. Let us first base our policy on that permanent fact and then adapt ourselves as much as we can to the passing facts of conquest, domination, alliances and so forth.

Finally, I come to the League of Nations. I must admit, I suppose with the rest of the world and probably with this house, that my confidence in the league is somewhat shaken. Last year, as a conclusion to the speech to which I have alluded, Senator McRae moved that Canada should step out of the league. His motion was defeated. Had it been proposed in this house I suppose I would have applauded the speech with both hands and voted against the motion. I am not quite sure that I would do the same this year; and I presume any responsible man who has followed the trend of affairs in Europe and who is following events as they develop from day to day and from week to week will come to the conclusion, not that we ought to step out of the league at once, but that we ought to beware of what is going on and will go on there in the next few weeks or in the next few months. Of course the league has been disappointing, perhaps because too much was expected of it. It has suffered from, I was going to say the false prophet spirit of its founder, Mr. Wilson. Everybody knows the famous words of old Clemenceau when he was asked: Why do you not get along? How is it that matters are so slow in regard to the conclusion of peace? "Well," he said, "what can I do when I am sitting between one man who thinks he is Napoleon and another who thinks he is Jesus Christ"?—referring to Lloyd George and to Wilson. If the league had been organized on a more modest basis, if the nations of Europe had been brought together to settle first their own affairs, the immediate result would have been that the United States senate would not have cut Wilson's plan into two from the beginning and shaken its basis; it would not have put us in the awkward position of being the only nation north of the Rio Grande representing America in the league.

Nevertheless, taking the league as it is, or as it was until a few months ago, it has accomplished some good, it has prevented some evils; it has given time for discussion and for tempers to cool. That avoids quarrels; it may have avoided some wars. For us it has been a good training school. It has brought some twenty or twenty-five Canadians in contact with the representatives of various nations. They went to Geneva and came back with a strange notion that there was someone in the world outside of the British empire, the United States and France, that there were some nations on earth that counted for something apart from the English and French nations. Therefore, there was something learned by that contact with different nations, different races, different civilizations and different types of government.

But so long as we remain in the league—and I am not prepared to say that we should remain very long; the near future should tell us—I venture to state that we must support there all sincere, effective measures for peace, from whatever quarter they come. We must stand for the revision of those nonsensical and iniquitous treaties to which we affixed our signature in 1919, and which are the root cause of the present threat of war. We must combat all intrigues and secret alliances; and above all, we must on every occasion repeat what was said by the Minister of Railways in 1933 and in the Senate last year by General McRae, that we are for peace, that we have signed the renunciation of war in good faith and that we mean it. That we should do irrespective of the attitude taken by the representatives of Great Britain. If they stand for peace so much the better; let us support them and echo their words. If they stand for war or if they stand for that vacillating policy which was followed by the British government previous to 1914, then let us keep our skirts clear, at the risk of being lectured by the new friends of the British government, Messrs. Stalin and Litvinoff; and this brings me to the last part of my remarks. I hope they will not be taken in bad part.

It would be more diplomatic if I did not make this reference but I should be untrue to my deepest convictions; I should be untrue to my conscience and my responsibility if I were not to say now that I deply regret that Canada voted for the admission of Russia into the League of Nations. I hope I will be forgiven by the house if I read a few extracts from the speeches and declarations made at Geneva on the 17th and 18th September last. First, I should like to refer to the meeting on September 17th of the sixth committee, where the whole question was discussed. Here is the declaration of the representative of Portugal, one of the three countries which voted against the admission of Russia, Mr. Caeiro da Mata. I commmend this to the attention of the house, especially of those who four years ago considered that the religion and morals of Canada were in danger if Russian coal entered Canada in competition with Senator Webster's monopoly:

> There is manifest opposition—I may even say incompatibility—between the principles advocated by Soviet Russia in the economic, juridical, political and moral spheres and the conceptions which form the basis of our ancient civilization and constitute the very essence of our culture and ethics.... I do not hesitate to say that the admission of the Soviets will be in contradiction to the ideas which have guided the most highly civilized nations during the last few centuries, and on which they have built up their honour and glory....
> I must confess in all sincerity that I do not see how the admission of the Soviets can create favourable prospects for the work of peace and world security invoked in the preamble of the covenant of the League of Nations, which ought to constitute the magna charta of all modern states.

If I had time I would read to the house the whole speech delivered by the president of the Swiss republic, Mr. Motta, one of the highest minded men in Europe to-day, and one of the safest. He represents a small country, but he is a big man. Mr. Motta delivered a speech against the admission of Russia from which I would like to quote a few sentences:

In every sphere—religious, moral, social, political, economic—this form of communism—

The Russian form.

—is the most radical negation of the ideas by which we breathe and have our being....

Communism dissolves the family—it abolishes private property; it organizes labour in forms which it is difficult to distinguish from forced labour.

Were not those words used in the order in council which prohibited the entrance of furs and coal from Russia into Canada? Then Mr. Motta proceeds to express the opinion of those who were favourable to the admission of Russia:

May we not hope that continuous cooperation with other states within the league will promote an evolution beneficial for all and for Russia itself in the first instance?

And he goes on to give the answer:

No, we cannot believe in this evolution of the bolshevist regime, for which we hope no less than you. We cannot sacrifice to the principle of universality the idea of a necessary minimum of moral and political conformity between states....

To-day the common feeling of all patriotically and nationally minded Swiss is that the league is embarking on a hazardous undertaking. As we see it, it is venturing to wed water and fire. If Soviet Russia all of a sudden ceases to insult the league, which Lenin defined as an institute of brigands, we read the explanation of this novel attitude in the fiery letters of the far eastern sky.

Read the dispatches of to-day in regard to the Russian policy, and you will understand those words pronounced six months ago by a man who knew in advance, and who had a clear sight.

We have no confidence. We do not feel able to cooperate in an act which will confer upon Soviet Russia a prestige which it has not heretofore enjoyed.

That was at the meeting of the sixth committee. The admission of Russia was voted by thirty-eight nations; there were seven abstentions and three negative votes, the Netherlands, Switzerland and Portugal. At the plenary session, the following day, Mr. de Valera, representing the Irish Free State, delivered an address. May I say that Mr. de Valera is a gentleman for whom I have the highest consideration, whom I knew in his days of poverty and struggle against tremendous odds, and who in the last few years has accomplished much to prove that he has the fibre of a great statesman. Speaking at the plenary meeting, on the following day, Mr. de Valera echoed admirably the words of Mr. Motta. He said:

In speaking as he did, Mr. Motta voiced the concern, not of the people of Switzerland alone, not merely of the 300,000,000 who belong to the Catholic church, but of those many millions more—in all, more than one-third of the inhabitants of the globe—who proclaim themselves followers of Christ and place all their hopes here and hereafter in the truth of His teaching.

And again:

Christians believe that the one hope of securing peace among men is to be found in obedience to the primary Christian commandment that men should love one another for God's sake, and if Christians lose confidence in the League of Nations—there are 600,000,000 of them, remember; more than one-third of the population of the globe, as I have said—if they lose confidence in the League of Nations as a means of promoting peace in this way, then the League of Nations cannot possibly succeed.

And in—how shall I say it?—a state of semi-dramatic inconsistency he announced he would vote for the admission of Russia to the league, but requested that country to make a declaration similar to the engagements they have taken in Washington and the engagements they took with our government, before the Liberal administration broke relations with them—in other words, that they would carry on no propaganda, and also that freedom of worship and conscience would be established in Russia.

Then came the turn of Canada. In this connection I am somewhat embarrassed, because the Prime Minister was absent. May I say that Canada was represented by a gentleman who has no seat in this chamber but whom I consider one of the straightest, cleverest men we have had in the service of Canada for many years. I refer to Doctor O. D. Skelton, Under Secretary of State for External Affairs. Of course his attitude was dictated by the government. I think on the whole his attitude was more logical than that of Mr. de Valera—having to vote for the admission he could with difficulty denounce Russia as the most abominable nation on earth. He stated in a simple and dignified way the principles of government prevailing in Canada, and added:

While believing firmly that, in the long run, the league can succeed only by the application in the international sphere of these ideals of liberty and democracy, we recognize that, for the present, we must agree to differ and that we cannot require other states to conform to such principles, or reject their collaboration in the league as long as they share in the one indispensible condition of readiness to work together for the peace of the world.

And so on. He ended by stating he would vote for the entrance of Russia into the league, and expressed the hope that Russia would not carry on propaganda in Canada

What was the answer? Russia entered supported by thirty-nine votes, mostly of so-called Christian nations, and opposed by only three votes of small nations. What was the answer? What was the answer of Mr. Litvinoff to the invitation of Canada, Portugal, Switzerland and even of France to respect conditions of other countries and to come nearer the articles of Geneva? Here is the answer:

To-day—

And he was referring to past enemies of the Soviet, as well as to present opponents—

To-day we are happy to be able to state that the exponents of those utopias—

Utopias! your principles and mine—

—and the advocates of the policy of ignoring and isolating the Soviet union are no longer to be met among broad-minded statesmen, among the representatives of the more important states moulding international life who think on realistic lines and understand the needs of the present day, but must be searched for among narrow-minded politicians—

That was thrown in the face of Mr. Motta, Mr. De Valera, and even in our own face.

—unable to rise above their petty political passions and strong prejudices and deriving their knowledge of countries and peoples from muddied sources.

Note the expression, "muddied sources."

It remains only to pity such people and to wish them a speedy enlightenment and a return to more reliable sources of information.

That was the language of contempt. Note now the triumphant rebuke. Did he agree to establish in Russia liberty of conscience as it exists in England and in the United States? Did he promise to stop propaganda? No. Here is what he said:

The Soviet union is entering into the league to-day as representative of a new social-economic system, not renunciating any of its special features, and—like the other states here represented—preserving intact its personality.

That is the nation we have kissed on both cheeks, we, a Christian nation, we a nation whose government and policy repose on old traditions, on the liberty of conscience, on respect for the dignity of man and the divinity of God. That humble attitude, that crouching attitude of 38 so-called Christian nations before the outstanding apostles of atheism, will it make for peace? Read the papers from day to day. The answer has been given in a brutal form, but better have it that way than to go on with the hyprocrisy which has prevailed for years. The answer has been given by Adolf Hitler. True, Hitlerism is to-day perhaps the most outstanding menace to peace. Why? First, because of the iniquities of the treaty of Versailles, to which we have affixed our signatures and crucified the honour of Canada. Secondly, because we dared not protest against the obstinacy with which the French government, more or less supported by the British government, refused to correct those inequalities. I was forgetting about the one British representative who protested, namely General Smuts, who in the glass gallery at Versailles, before affixing his signature to the historic document, had the courage to stand up and say, "I sign, but peace will not come out of these treaties." He was the only one who dared open his mouth. Surely if the Prime Minister of South Africa could speak out, had not the Prime Minister of Canada, to whichever party he might belong, the same liberty to speak frankly and openly? The attitude of the allied countries made Hitlerism, because that attitude played into the hands of those young men in Germany who for years had been looking for an understanding or possible agreement with France, England and Italy. Seeing that their efforts were in vain, and that from day to day the Locarno treaty was becoming dilapidated, in despair they finally threw themselves into the hands of Hitler. That made the success of Hitlerism. But what has confirmed it and strengthened it in the last six months more than anything else is the admission of Russia into the League of Nations. It is that coquetting attitude of France, Great Britain and Italy towards the Soviets. I am surprised that Britain especially should have forgotten the sound advice of a man whose policy I have opposed very frequently in my public life but who was at times truly a man of long vision. I refer to Joe Chamberlain, who said once, speaking of Anglo-Russian relations, "When you sup with the devil take a long spoon." Now not only are they supping together, they are even drinking out of the same glass. For my part I am not prepared to put my lips on those soiled cups, nor do I believe that the vast majority of Canadians, to whatever creed or race or party they belong, are prepared to follow suit because, at the present time and for this year, it suits the British government and the French and the Italians to try once more to encircle Germany. And for what purpose? To enhance civilization? To preserve liberty? To save small nationalities? No. But to make Soviet Russia the arbiter of the whole world, to strengthen the hand of the Soviets in such a manner that Russia will be the dominating power of the east of Europe and of the west of Asia. I remind you of those somewhat obscure words of Mr.

Motta: Think of the far east. Read the despatches of to-day, and see what game is going on now between London and Moscow, Warsaw, Paris and Rome. Poor Poland is once more being dragged from right to left, from north to south, by the Teuton, by the Slav, by the Italian and by the French, with the English putting up a protecting hand, yes, a protecting hand for English interests. I do not blame them, but I pity the poor nations of Europe who are kept in that state of chronic fever; and for heaven's sake, I say, let us preserve our people, let us preserve our youth, let us preserve our nation from the consequences of such intrigues, such changes in policy and such threats of war!

But worst of all is what I call the apostacy of so-called Christendom. I deprecate the introduction of religion into the discussion of public affairs; but after all one should not hesitate at appealing to what is best in men's souls and hearts. You cannot rule the world, you cannot rule a country, any more than you can rule an individual, without appealing to religion, without appealing to faith. Last year I ventured to predict that we could never succeed in solving our social and economic problems until we had restored in our community and in the soul of each of us, in each family and in each class of people, respect for God and for God's laws. Likewise you cannot restore the law of nations; you cannot by law and by treaties, by force of arms on land, on sea, in the air or under the sea, you cannot by brute force or by deceitful diplomacy bring order and peace into the world. Here again I quote an authority who did not belong to my church or my creed. I have always been struck with these lines, ever since I read them for the first time in Morley's Life of Gladstone. Gladstone was a devout son of the Church of England, and his life was written by a nonconformist who had become an avowed rationalist. Referring to one of the first incidents in foreign affairs in which Gladstone was called upon to play a part, Morley says of him:

> Mr. Gladstone had not read history for nothing. He knew the evils that followed in Europe the breakdown of the great spiritual power—once, though with so many defects, a controlling force over violence, anarchy and brute wrong. He knew the necessity for some substitute, even a substitute so imperfect as the law of nations.

Eighty years ago Gladstone realized the necessity for a law of nations even though it was imperfect compared with the unity of christendom as it existed in the middle ages. He realized, although he did not say so expressly, that in spite of religious schisms, Christianity remained the one great basis of social order; and as another great Protestant statesman, Burke, had said a half a century previous: Whatever may be our creed and sectarian views we must acknowledge that the Pope remains the head of Christianity.—Now if that was the opinion of "a great Christian statesman," as Gladstone was described by Lord Salisbury after his death, can we not take cognizance of it and act somewhat accordingly? But what did we do? We tacitly acquiesced in the secret treaty concluded in London in April, 1915, by which England, France and Russia decided to exclude the Pope from all their deliberations on the affairs of this world. Why? Because in those days the Italian government was afraid that the Pope might raise the question of temporal power. Now that difficulty has disappeared, because the Holy See has made peace with the Italian government. Is there any reason which remains for the temporal rulers of the so-called Christian nations to go on excluding the Pope from their counsels? I do not say from their government, I do not say from their policies, because no sane Catholic to-day and no Pope would claim any such power similar to that which the papacy exercised in the middle ages; the situation, religious, political and social is entirely different. But surely there is no man, however sincere a Protestant he may be, no matter how much of an enemy he may be to what was the rule of the papacy five hundred years ago, or even what it was sixty-five years ago, when Gladstone denounced the Vatican and Vaticanism, who will not admit, if he has a mind big enough to overcome his prejudices, that the papacy and the Holy See remain the greatest moral force there is in the world to-day. The British government, in spite of all opposition, have reestablished relations with the Holy See. More governments have established relations with the Holy See since the war than for a century previous. Are we going to sit aloof? Are we going to refuse to learn anything from that great seat of learning?

Last year, referring to social and economic conditions, I pointed to these men in this corner of the house who are neither Catholics nor, some of them, very ardent Christians, I believe; nevertheless they were the only members I heard quoting the Pope's encyclicals and making use of them to foster what they considered to be social reforms. A moment ago I said that we cannot solve any problem in America without the cooperation of the government of the United States. Likewise do I assert that the world cannot solve its problems without the cooperation of the greatest and most permanent spiritual power which exists. I am an old man as compared with the newer generation. Why is the world in its present condition? It is because everyone has been looking to wealth, to industry, to trade, to power, to diplomacy, to brutal arms to solve their problems. It is because each nation has cultivated within itself self-admiration and self-pride; it is because these things have been set up as idols. The main occupation of the world prior to the war, during the war and since the war has been to paganize its morals, its habits and its standards; and we are to-day reaping the result. The more we worship at the altar of the golden calf, the more lack of respect we show for everything spiritual, the harder will be the solution of our problems. I sum up these rambling remarks by making the same appeal I made last year: If you want to reestablish the brotherhood of man, begin by proclaiming the fatherhood of God.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, while I cannot agree with all the statements made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), it seems to me that the house owes him a debt of gratitude for having presented so ably this very important question. In matters of peace and war I must confess that I find myself torn by various conflicting convictions and considerations. When I was attempting to prepare some notes on this matter on Saturday I set down some of the things which seemed to me to enter into my own point of view.

First, I believe that military force is stupid; that it settles nothing and that it creates serious trouble. This conviction may be the result of Christian idealism but it is confirmed by a study of psychology and a reading of history.

Second, I believe that among the many causes of war the economic are the most fundamental, especially in modern times. Capitalism, social injustice, imperialistic expansion and war are inseparable. In my judgment war will not end until we destroy capitalism, with its social injustice, and imperialism.

Third, as a born individualist and an inheritor of pioneer traditions I have an instinctive desire to keep myself and my country out of the troubles of other people. In this I think I am fairly typical Canadian.

Fourth, as a student of our complex industrial and social structure I realize that no individual can live to himself, or that no nation can live to itself. Self-sufficiency, independence, sovereignty and isolationism belong to the past. It is perhaps here that I begin to differ with the hon. member for Labelle. I would emphasize that the mere declaration of neutrality is not sufficient. As I tried to point out the other evening, military defence does not seem to me to be an adequate defence. However, I do not think that mere disarmament will settle our problems.

Fifth, in practice political power with its military force is still largely in the hands of the predatory classes, hence national and international policies are dominated by anything but idealistic motives.

Sixth, as an individual I refuse to participate or to assist in war, yet I am a citizen of a country which still relies upon force and as a public representative I must vote on alternative military policies.

Under these conditions, in the actual world of affairs, one must try to hold to his own convictions and keep the ultimate objectives in view, yet advocate measures which are recognized as merely ameliorative. One must accept the half loaf and even support procedures which though repugnant to his principles, represent a real advance in public welfare and public morality. For example, I am opposed to capital punishment, but rather than have a woman's head torn from her shoulders, as was done a few days ago at a hanging in Montreal, I would vote for the electric chair, the lethal chamber, or perhaps even the axe. In a decently organized society we would not need a police force, but in our present semi-barbarous civilization I prefer a police force to bandits and vigilantes. So in international relations, until war is actually and wholeheartedly repudiated as an instrument of national policy, an international police force under proper control, if that is possible, might be preferable to world anarchy. This statement more or less outlines the background from which I view the external policies of Canada.

It is a curious thing that we in Canada have been so indifferent to our external policies. Perhaps this is due to a number of causes. For years we have been practically isolated from the main current of world events. We have had friendly neighbours to our south. We have inherited from colonial days a sort of inferiority complex that leaves matters of high policy to the United Kingdom. However notwithstanding this as was pointed out by the hon. member for Labelle, we were drawn into the great war and sacrificed nearly 60,000 of our boys and piled up an unbearable burden of debt.

Before discussing any of the more general policies, I should like to offer a few practical suggestions. It would seem to me that we might create a separate ministry of external affairs, to be headed by a specialist in league affairs. Second, the committee on international industrial relations, or a new committee to be set up, could give its entire time to considering reports from embassies and legations, from the League of Nations and from imperial conferences, and then advise the house as to the most effective measures of promoting peace. Again, it seems to me that we should offer to cooperate with the League of Nations in controlling the export of war materials. This is in line with the motion I introduced last year with regard to nickel. Further, we should give increased support to the League of Nations Society. This was a suggestion I offered the other evening when we were discussing our national defence estimates. Still further, I think that we might very well reconsider the proposal made by my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), namely, the establishment of international scholarships. In this way we might do a very great deal to promote international friendship and understanding. And then again, I fancy that we shall not be blameless of causing international friction unless we insist on maintaining the minority rights of the racial and religious groups resident in Canada. That too I have advocated more than once in this house.

Now let us come to the factors that must be considered in determining a foreign policy for Canada. First of all, there is our relationship to the United States. I think that the hon. member for Labelle is correct when he emphasizes the fact that Canada exists on the North American continent; that must be a determining factor in our foreign policy. War with the United States is for most of us unthinkable. A year or two ago at a public dinner I was talking to my next door neighbour, a prominent Conservative and an imperialist of the old school, a man however who did not swallow slogans but had given a good deal of thought to public affairs. Someone asked what Canada would do if by any stretch of the imagination Great Britain and the United States became involved in war, and this Conservative and imperialist of the old school came back immediately with the reply that Canada must at once declare her independence. Well, if that reply is correct, it seems to me that the least we can do is now, during a time of peace, to serve notice to that effect upon Great Britain. It is not fair play to go on pretending that in all circumstances we will follow the lead of Great Britain. I would suggest that the work of the international joint commission might very well be extended to include the administration of an "all-in" arbitration treaty between Canada and the United States.

I think it was in my speech on the address that I called attention to the I'm Alone case as a most striking example of the way in which international friction may be avoided. A few years ago that incident might easily have become a casus belli. As it was, when the decision was finally given by the board of arbitration no one paid much attention to it—as I say, a splendid example of how we may avoid those frictions which in former years very readily led to war.

Now we come to our relationship with the United Kingdom and the other self-governing nations now forming the British commonwealth of nations. I would point out that Great Britain still rules a vast empire in which the greater proportion of the people do not enjoy self-government. That is an important fact and one that perhaps we do not sufficiently emphasize. As the hon. member for Labelle pointed out, under the treaty the United Kingdom made very important reservations. There were certain areas of the world over which Great Britain claimed special control, or where she felt she had special interests, and she was not willing that there should be any interference or any resort to arbitration with regard to those particular areas. Great Britain has interests in India, in Africa and in the far east, and it is very easy for certain British policies to cause difficulties and troubles that might easily drag Great Britain once again into war. We in Canada have no voice in these policies. It does seem to me—and I would call the attention of the official leader of the opposition to this point—that even now, before the Prime Minister of this country goes to the next empire conference, we should have from him some fairly clear statement as to his position with regard to the great problems which may face the empire within the next few years. Canada ought not a few years hence to be faced with a fait accompli and be expected to rush to the help of the motherland.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My understanding is that there is to be no conference at which any representative of any government is to speak with authority in reference to questions that will govern the future.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should be very glad if the statement of the leader of the opposition is correct. I had rather the impression that at some of these conferences whether there are formal negotiations or not, understandings are arrived at which are considered more or less binding. I hope that is not true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am of my hon. friend's point of view in the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: From my standpoint the relationship of the autonomous nations to the empire is by no means clear; and the mere fact that we belong to this commonwealth of self-governing nations should not lead us to assume obligations with regard to the policies of the empire. I suppose that technically if Great Britain is at war Canada is at war, at least unless there is some further declaration than we have yet had. I wish we could have such a declaration. Canada cannot consent to come to the assistance of the empire in some war brought about by policies in which she has no voice; and on the other hand, as we develop our independent policies, we cannot expect support from Great Britain—we must expect to be on our own. Actually we took pretty much this position in our signing independently the Versailles treaty. Although all the implications of that position have not been manifest, I think they are implicit in our signing of the treaty.

Then we come to Canada's relationship to the League of Nations. I confess that for a number of years I took very little interest in the work of the League of Nations. The League of Nations was essentially a league of victors.

An hon. MEMBER: And still is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Somebody says it still is. It is not altogether, though it has taken one or two steps backward through the withdrawal of some of the nations. Further, it has been essentially a league of capitalist nations; and as one who believes that capitalism must be done away with, I cannot be expected to take a very lively interest in policies that are essentially founded on capitalism. Again, the United States is still out. As long as that nation with which we are most nearly connected, is not a member of the league, it seems to me that we are placed in a rather peculiar position in being the only country in North America that has a place in the league. In fact, when several years ago I had an opportunity of being in Geneva during a session of the assembly, I could not get away from the impression that to a very considerable extent the league is still a European institution. I wish that were not so. It is not so in ideal, but in practice one felt it was largely dominated by European powers and was concerned mainly with European policies. I do not know that as a member of the league we have taken our obligations very seriously. We have sent as our representative to Geneva not always, I think it must be conceded, men who have been specially trained in foreign affairs; we have paid our dues to the league, and that is almost as far as we have gone.

Now we in Canada as every other nation must face one of three alternatives: first, attempted isolation; second, the discredited policy of military alliances, and, third, a collective security through a reformed and vitalized league. As to a policy of isolation, it is attractive on the face of it, and I must say that as long as the league is constituted as it is at present and as impotent as it has been in the past, possibly that is the only immediate practical policy for Canada. So I find myself in considerable sympathy with the hon. member for Labelle. We have to keep out of the affairs of Europe; we have to see to it that Canadian boys are not sacrificed on the battlefields of Europe or, I may add, of Asia. Yet I do not think a policy of isolation of that kind will keep us out of war.

I spoke a few moments ago of another alternative, that of military alliances. About the only alliances we have at present are those with the United States and the United Kingdom. Those are not military; they are very largely sentimental, but I suggest that they are of inestimable value and in my judgment are a great deal more effective in the maintenance of peace than military alliances.

I come then to the third alternative, and I can see no other—that of collective security. It would seem to be the world's only hope. Canada, as I said a few moments ago, is already a member of the league even though we have not taken our obligations very seriously; but if we are to have peace we must be prepared to pay the price and that may be a great deal higher than some of us have yet imagined. It may involve economic sanctions that will mean a very decided sacrifice to us in Canada, but when we consider the sacrifices involved in war, we ought not to hesitate to make great sacrifices in attempting to secure peace.

Now there are two immediate danger spots in the world to-day: Germany and Japan.

Mr. BROWN: Could the hon. member elaborate his idea about economic sacrifices?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Lisgar suggests that I elaborate the idea of economic sacrifices. For example, if it is held desirable by the League of Nations that we should not export the materials essential to the making of munitions, I think we ought to be prepared to sacrifice the profits that we are making through the sale of nickel and other similar materials. That is one illustration. Further, if several years ago Canada had decided to make an effective protest against Japan's policy in Manchuria, we might very well have imposed an embargo on Japanese goods. That might have involved considerable sacrifice on our part, but I think we ought not to have hesitated to make a sacrifice of that kind if thereby we could throw our weight against what seemed to be a perfectly indefensible act on the part of Japan.

I was about to proceed to speak for a few minutes of those two danger spots, Germany and Japan. I wonder if we might call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, may I say just a few words with regard to Russia's entry into the league. When the ban was placed upon Russian imports one recalls the statement that accompanied the order in council:

> The government is convinced that there is forced labour in the cutting and transport of timber, and the mining of coal, that political prisoners are exploited, that the standard of living is below any level conceived of in Canada, and that, broadly speaking, all employment is in control of the communist government which regulates all conditions of work and seeks to impose its will upon the whole world. This is communism, its creed and its fruits, which we as a country oppose and must refuse to support by interchange of trade.

I am glad that notwithstanding that declaration on the part of the Minister of National Revenue the government of Canada saw fit to sign the invitation to Russia to enter the league. It seems to me that the hon. member for Labelle, in trying to stress one particular point, took an altogether exaggerated position. I wonder if he would say that Europe was Christian in the fractricidal war of 1914 to 1918. I wonder if he would affirm that Hitler's Germany is Christian today. I wonder if he would venture to say that Japan is Christian. During the recent visit I paid to that country I remember seeing the tablets that commemorate the extirpation of Christianity in that country. It is true that after Commodore Perry bombarded Japan the missionaries were allowed to return, but still only a very small percentage of the people of Japan are Christian and I do not know that anyone can say that that empire is proceeding along Christian lines. I think the hon. member for Labelle was much nearer the mark when he made this statement on May 27, 1931:

> But, Mr. Speaker, I would not be a Christian, I would not be a British subject, and I would not be imbued with the principles of social liberty, if I would not assert at the same time that the economic system under which the United States and Canada have grown, progressed or retrograded, for the last twenty-five years, the capitalistic system upon which rests the whole policy of North America, is just as antagonistic to the principles of Christianity, of social justice and of British tradition as is the communistic and atheistic system which now prevails in Russia. And for my part I repeat, as a Christian and as a Canadian, I do not consider that we have received either from providence or from the conscience of the Canadian nation any mandate to teach lessons to other nations.

And again, in referring to the atheism which prevailed in France about forty or fifty years ago, the hon. member said:

> Did the Conservatives or Liberals of that day, in Canada, suggest that we should break off relations with France and stop trading with that country because that government was carrying on propaganda against creeds and against religion much more effectively than that carried on during the days of the French revolution, and more effective than that now being carried on by Russia?

And again:

> When the delegates from the nations arrived at Genoa, including Mr. Chicherin, one of the primary leaders of the bolshevik government, the venerable Cardinal Archbishop of Genoa received the delegates, including the representative of the government of Russia. The Archbishop shook hands with the delegates and appealed for the blessing of God on their deliberations for peace.

I think the government were wrong four years ago and are right to-day; I think the hon. member for Labelle was right four years ago and wrong this afternoon. I think perhaps the hon. member for Labelle ought to have a greater sense of proportion, perhaps a greater sense of humour. If he would seriously ask a nation that consists in part of Orangemen to drink a loving cup with the Pope perhaps he may permit Mr. Litvinoff to sit in council at a peace table. What did Mr. Litvinoff say on entering the League of Nations? I think possibly his spirit was all that we could very well desire. I should like to read a sentence in which he indicates that apparently he has given up the idea of world revolution and is willing to have Russia go her own way and the other nations their own ways. He said:

> The Soviet state has, however, never excluded the possibility of some form or other of association with states having a different political and social system, so long as there is no mutual hostility and if it is for the attainment of common aims. For such an association it considers that the essential conditions would be, firstly, the extension to every state belonging to such an association of the liberty to preserve what I might call its state personality and the social-economic system chosen by it—in other words, reciprocal non-interference in the domestic affairs of the states therein associated; and, secondly, the existence of common aims.

Then follows the passage which was quoted by the hon. member for Labelle:

The Soviet union is entering into the league to-day as representative of a new social-economic system, not renouncing any of its special features, and—like the other states here represented—preserving intact its personality.

And again:

Finally, we must realize once and for all that no war with political or economic aims is capable of restoring so-called historical justice, and that all it could do would be to substitute new and perhaps still more glaring injustices for old ones, and that every new peace treaty bears within it the seeds of fresh warfare.

And again:

I am convinced that in this, our common work, from now on the will to peace of the Soviet union with its 170 million inhabitants —peace for itself and for other states—will make itself felt as a powerful factor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pass on for a few moments to what I have already called the danger spots of Germany and Japan. With regard to Germany, I detest Hitlerism and Fascism I think as much as anyone, but I do submit that we, that is the allies, to a very large extent have been responsible for the development of that form of government and that policy in Germany. A few days ago I quoted a paragraph from Mr. Lloyd George, as written September 19, 1932. This so well summarized the position that I venture to give it again:

When the German delegates displayed natural hesitation about accepting these conditions, which reduced their fatherland to impotence in an armed world, Clemenceau wrote them a letter, on behalf and at the request of his colleagues, assuring the Germans that their disarmament would be treated as a prelude to steps for general reduction of armaments by the other nations.

This pledge is also expressed in the covenant of the League of Nations. It was accepted by all the signatories of the treaty and ratified by their senates.

Two of the four who drafted that solemn undertaking have passed away, Clemenceau and Wilson. Signor and I remain. As one of the two survivors, I have no hesitation in accepting the German view that the victorious nations have shamelessly broken faith on the question of armaments. I should be surprised to hear that my co-survivor, Orlando took a different view of the turpitude of the victors in this respect.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

The Germans revolt against unscrupulous agitators and designing militarists. Statesmen of the Fatherland have for thirteen years shown a degree of patience, forbearance and restraint which is worthy of the great people they represented. Throughout this period, the bond they entered into in an hour of crushing defeat was being enforced relentlessly against Germany and her allies, whilst other parties to the contract insolently refused even to discuss performances of their part of the agreement.

I am glad that we may look forward once more to Germany being regarded as a nation on an equality with other nations. I could have hoped that this might have been accomplished by the reduction of our armaments to the level allowed to Germany. However since Germany has taken strong action and decided she will rearm, I hope it will not be very long before other nations will urge Germany to reenter the League of Nations and that this may be in fact, as some British observers think, the preliminary step to a general disarmament.

May I now say a few words regarding Japan. Last year, on February 12, I outlined briefly the unsatisfactory action taken by Canada in connection with the Manchurian incident. While I have a very high personal regard for the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) I think he made a serious mistake in following as apparently he did, the lead of Sir John Simon. I recall asking a question of the government concerning this matter and being told by the Prime Minister that as the matter was sub judice it could not be discussed. In my opinion that was an absolutely absurd position for any government to take. At that time we had an opportunity to take a position that might have had far reaching and worth while results. With regard to Mr. Cahan's speech, the correspondent of Headway, the journal of the British League of Nations Union, wrote:

Twenty-three supported the thesis of the Lytton report, including France and Italy ... three, Japan, Britain and Canada, sympathized with Japan. Canada in a curious oration spoke strongly on both sides.

Professor Soward, writing in Interdependence—the journal of the League of Nations Society in Canada—for March, 1933, made this devastating criticism:

A speech which never once endorsed directly league principles, which departed from our position of last March, which singled out the injured party for most of the recrimination.... Mr. Cahan's attitude is not the sort which Mr. Meighen assumed at the imperial conference of 1921 when the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance came before the conference.

At that time hon. members will recall it was the stand taken by Canada which to a considerable extent was responsible for the refusal of Great Britain to renew the alliance. Professor Soward continues:

When soft words were spoken in Geneva in December the only effect produced was the advance of Japanese troops into Jehol in January. Let our delegate make it clear that we stand for the sanctity of treaties, the maintenance of the collective system and the principles of redress proposed in the Lytton report. As Lord Lytton has well said the league of nations is the life-line of western civilization. Let it not be said that Canada helped to fray its strands. Our government must declare where we stand.

The consequence of Great Britain's lack of resolute action has since been manifest in Japan's aggressive policy. It seems to me that before the close of this debate the government should give some report concerning the work of the advisory committee instructed to follow the developments of the Sino-Japanese situation. Canada is a member of that advisory committee. With regard to the present situation in the east may I quote a paragraph from the observations of the Most Hon. the Marquess of Lothian appearing in an article in International Affairs of March-April, 1935:

Let me now turn to the difficulties of the British position. I do not want to discuss the Manchukuo incident, but Great Britain was certainly not in the front rank in maintaining the collective system in the Pacific at that time. Mr. Stimson was much more forward in the matter than we were. I have always thought that the mistake of British policy at that time was not the view which it took of Japan's intentions in Manchuria—I think its diagnosis was closer to the realities than that of the United States—but in its rejection of Mr. Stimson's offer to reverse the isolationist decision of 1920 and act with us in support of the collective system in the Pacific.

There is no doubt at all that the entrance of Russia into the League of Nations has tremendously complicated the entire situation and opened vistas of trouble which Great Britain may confront and which we, as a member of the league, may not altogether avoid.

I should like to quote a paragraph or two from a summary of the situation as contained in a pamphlet Why the U.S.S.R. Joined the League, issued by the New Fabian Research Bureau, with an introduction by Hugh Dalton. The extract follows:

The report of the league assembly, by which Great Britain is bound, declares that (a) Manchuria is an integral part of China, under Chinese sovereignty, and that the nine-power treaty applies to Manchuria as to every other part of China; (b) "Manchukuo" is a creation of the Japanese army of occupation which is contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants, and to the interests of China, constitutes a violation of the covenant, nine-power treaty, and the Briand-Kellogg pact, and is incompatible with the maintenance of peace in the far east; (c) the Japanese military occupation is a result of external aggression for which China bears no responsibility, and is a standing violation of China's territorial integrity and political independence.

What obligations are thereby imposed under the covenant upon any state bound by the assembly report of February 24, 1933, becomes a question of very great importance. It is clear that such a state cannot regard Japan as acting defensively in any war in which she fights with China (or with states acting on behalf of the league) to maintain her occupation of China's four northeastern provinces, since that occupation was in breach of the covenant. Owing to the failure of the great powers to defend China, and the covenant, against Japanese aggression an extremely obscure and dangerous situation has been created. It is conceivable that China, and with China some other member of the league acting in the fulfilment of their duties under Articles 10 and 16, may become involved in war with Japan over her occupation of Manchuria.

May I point out that although Canada's obligations under articles 10 and 16 may not be as great as those of Great Britain, they cannot be disregarded.

In that case it would be the duty of the other member states to treat Japan as the aggresor and the council would have to act immediately under Articles 10 and 16 and advise upon the means by which the obligations of the articles should be fulfilled. It is improbable that the U.S.S.R. or any other state will attempt by independent action to terminate Japan's military occupation. What is more probable is that Japan, as the next step in her present policy, will use Manchuria as a base for invading eastern Siberia. In that case the U.S.S.R. will invoke Article 16. China will become involved on her side, and the other members of the league will be bound by the interpretation given to the covenant and nine-power treaty in the assembly report of February 24, 1933, to treat Japan as the aggressor. For that report has made of Japan in Manchuria an outlaw on Chinese territory, and if peace is restored again the league cannot a second time evade its duty of restoring a situation compatible with the covenant.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suggest this very brief outline of outstanding world problems is sufficient to force upon us the seriousness of the situation confronting the world and the necessity of Canada having some very definite and clear-cut policy.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in rising to offer a few observations on the motion before the house may I at the outset compliment the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) upon the lucid, forcible and comprehensive manner in which he discussed the motion now before the house. While I am in accord with the principle of the motion I must express entire dissent from many of the views and opinions expressed by the hon. member this afternoon during the course of his remarks. I think we realize that up to the present time we have been engaged largely in a discussion of world affairs and world diplomacy as carried on by the various nations in the world, and I am sure that I express the unanimous opinion of members in every part of the house when I say that it is very deeply regretted that at the present moment the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett) is unable to be in the house to take part in this important discussion. I think the whole house will agree that the Prime Minister's wonderful grasp and understanding of problems of this nature would be invaluable at the present time, that his marked ability in analysing, in portraying and discussing intricate and involved matters would be of the greatest benefit to the house; but perhaps most valuable of all would be the courageous manner in which he is able to consider a difficult question and speedily reach a correct and definite conclusion upon it.

This motion comes before the house to-day by way of an amendment to the motion to go into supply. Under ordinary circumstances such an amendment constitutes a vote of want of confidence in the government, but following precedents established in this house from time to time, in the view of the government, and I fancy in the view of all members of this house, a motion of this kind should not be rejected but should be accepted, if possible, with unanimous approval; and if that be done, as I hope it may be done with regard to this motion, then the house can subsequently go into supply following the practice established by the house upon former occasions.

I have expressed my personal regret at the absence of the Prime Minister at this moment. While I yield to no man in the strong convictions I hold in regard to world peace and the kindred subject of world disarmament, I realize my own limitations and I regret my inability to add very much by way of useful information or cogent argument in support of the motion which has been so elaborately presented to the house this afternoon. As I intimated at the outset I expressly dissent from many of the opinions and views of the mover of this resolution (Mr. Bourassa), but with the principle expressed in the motion I am in most hearty accord. It is a matter of congratulation and of gratification not only in this house but throughout Canada that upon this question, both in this chamber and I fancy also in the upper chamber, there is and will be but a single opinion, and that opinion favourable. My hon. friend from Labelle did not need to labour the matter so far as the parliament of Canada is concerned or so far as the people of Canada are concerned. He will find the same unanimity throughout Canada upon this question as he will find in the parliament of Canada. Many generations will come and go in this country before the memories of the last great war are obliterated. Our memories are too recent, our trials were too great, our wounds and our injuries too serious, and our burdens still too heavy upon us to allow that great war to pass into the realm of history for many, many years to come. So my hon. friend from Labelle will I think find but a single opinion in regard to future world wars, or in regard to the kindred subject of world disarmament.

So far as the national side of this question is concerned there will be little difficulty; there will be but a single opinion. But there is an international aspect to the subject which must not be forgotten. I doubt if it is possible for any nation in the world at this date to occupy a position of isolation or aloofness without having regard to what is going on in the rest of the world. Geographical remoteness no longer exists. Time and space have been almost annihilated by modern means of communication and transportation.

Mr. BOURASSA: May I suggest to my hon. friend, modified rather than annihilated?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg pardon?

Mr. BOURASSA: I suggest modified rather than annihilated.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not quite catch the meaning of my hon. friend's remark, but I have made my statement. In my opinion from now on we will have to assume an international view of many questions which a few years ago we considered as entirely foreign to the interests of Canada, and we shall have to continue to do so in future years, and all nations in the world will be compelled to do the same. We can no longer consider a question such as the subject matter of this motion as purely a national one upon which there is only a single opinion.

I suppose the starting point of our international relationships was in reality the great war. Certainly they arose when we became parties to the treaty of Versailles. We then definitely assumed international obligations. We entered upon international covenants and agreements, and from that day until the present we have continued so to do. The new position has now become a permanent one for the Dominion of Canada.

Let us start with the treaty of Versailles. I do not propose to discuss it but merely to mention some of the subsidiary agreements which have sprung from it and which I find in my discussions in the house and outside are not any too well understood by many people in the Dominion of Canada.

It will be within the memory of all, I think that under section 14 of the treaty of Versailles the establishment of a permanent court of international justice was contemplated, and such a court was actually established in the year 1920. Canada became a party to the establishment of that court; so did Great Britain, and so did all the self-governing dominions of the British empire, and all or nearly all of the nations which had signed the treaty of Versailles. That court was established at The Hague under the auspices of the League of Nations, and was established for the express purpose of settling international disputes of a legal nature, or as stated in the treaty, of a justiciable nature, as opposed to disputes of a political nature. The submission of such disputes was placed upon a purely voluntary basis; there was nothing of a compulsory nature in the original proposal.

This system did not prove entirely satisfactory and in 1928 another system generally referred to as the optional clause, was evolved under the auspices of the League of Nations. What was this optional clause? It merely removed the voluntary feature and made the submission compulsory as between those states which accepted or acceded to the optional clause. Canada, the other British dominions, Great Britain and forty-seven other states in the world acceded to the optional clause and permitted themselves to be bound by a treaty which provides that all disputes of a legal nature between states should be compulsorily referred to The Hague tribunal for final adjustment. There were certain limitations with regard to this submission. I have them here in concise form, and I shall put them on Hansard.

Briefly stated, jurisdiction was conferred upon the international court in respect to all or any classes of legal disputes concerning (a) the interpretation of a treaty; (b) any question of international law; (c) the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of an international obligation, and (d) the nature or extent of reparation to be made for a breach of an international obligation. There are some other special reservations, one dealing with disputes with regard to questions which by international law fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada. This refers to such matters as fishery questions and so on. I have outlined the matters which might be submitted compulsorily to The Hague tribunal for adjudication. Canada acceded to the optional clause and became bound by it along with forty-seven other nations.

Then followed what is known as the General Act, a most important enactment which, although referred to by this name, is really only a protocol or treaty arising out of the treaty of Versailles. The important provision of the General Act is that all disputes of every nature shall be submitted to the tribunal at The Hague for settlement by that tribunal. The General Act deals not only with legal disputes but with disputes of every nature. Canada acceded to the General Act and agreed to its provisions; so did Great Britain, so did the other self-governing dominions, with the exception of South Africa, and I believe eighteen or twenty of the other leading nations of the world.

The Permanent Court of International Justice was now clothed with these important powers and was accepted by a large proportion of the important nations of the world. In connection with the optional clause we find that it was acceded to by France, Great Britain, Germany, Spain, Belgium, Holland, Austria, Hungary, and the British dominions. If a dispute were to arise between Canada and any of these nations, such dispute would automatically go to the international court for settlement. How is a settlement arrived at? The first provision for settlement is by way of conciliation; if that fails, then by arbitration if the parties agree; if that fails, then finally by the judgment of the court itself which is reported to the League of Nations.

This court has proved of inestimable advantage during the ten or twelve years of its existence. There have been from 470 to 480 references made to the court in connection with treaties and agreements and differences between nations. Many notable disputes have been adjudicated upon and finally settled. In addition to this, the League of Nations has the power to refer to the court for an opinion any involved questions which may arise from time to time, and I believe the court has already rendered between thirty and forty opinions in this connection. We in Canada deliberately acceded to all these protocols to ensure the peace of Canada and the peace of the world, so did all the other nations which accepted these treaties and acceded to the court.

The only other treaty which I desire to mention at this time is the one which was discussed so ably this afternoon by the hon. member for Labelle, the treaty known as the pact of Paris, the treaty of Paris, or, perhaps more generally, the Briand-Kellogg pact. I believe this treaty was originally framed by the government of the United States. It was submitted to the government of France, the details were finally settled and it was placed before the nations of the world and their adherence to its provisions requested. This treaty was signed in Paris in 1928 and formally adopted by the parliament of Canada the following spring. It received the approval of and the adoption by no less than sixty nations of the world. The provisions of this treaty were outlined quite fully this afternoon and I need refer to it only very briefly.

The first clause of the treaty condemns recourse to war and declares that war shall be renounced as a means of settlement of international disputes. Surely that language is plain and distinct and any nation which signed the treaty should readily understand it. Clause two is just as plain and just as distinct; it provides that all international disputes shall be settled by pacific means. These brief provisions constitute the treaty of Paris. It is a plain and explicit enactment accepted by sixty nations of the world. I remember hearing the treaty of Paris criticized on one occasion by an American lawyer who stated that one of its weaknesses lay in the fact that no sanctions were provided, that there was no means of enforcing it. The only means of enforcing such a treaty is through the influence of world opinion, and I doubt if any signatory to the treaty would, except for very cogent reasons, deviate from its provisions having in mind the tremendous adverse world opinion which would immediately ensue. It is rather discouraging that notwithstanding the covenants, the protocols, the treaties and the agreements, during recent years two of the signatories to the treaty of Paris engaged in open warfare. I refer to China and Japan. It is discouraging also when we look at Europe to-day and consider the case of Italy and Abyssinia or the general situation which obtains throughout the continent of Europe. It is discouraging also that in spite of all these pacts and treaties and leagues and covenants, that there are more armed men in the world to-day than at the outbreak of the war in 1914, and also that there are greater armaments in the world to-day than there were in 1914. Such is the condition which confronts the world to-day.

The motion moved by my hon. friend from Labelle is exceedingly appropriate to the present situation, and I trust that I shall not give offence to the hon. gentleman if I make a few comments on the argument which he addressed to the House of Commons to-day.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have no objection.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have stated before in this house in his presence that notwithstanding his wonderful accomplishments one might well say to him, as our Lord said to the young man who came to him, "One thing thou lackest," and I think his greatest lack is what I should call the "practical touch." I think my hon. friend from Labelle rather enjoys the erection of straw men for the purpose of knocking them down; I think he takes great pleasure in tilting at windmills. To my mind, he is something of a dreamer. He dreams; he speculates; he theorizes, and after his dreams and speculations and theorizing he expresses in this house vague and curious opinions to which I for one cannot subscribe, and I feel that the great majority of the House of Commons cannot subscribe to them. To-day the hon. gentleman presented four distinct proposals for a Canadian peace policy and I venture to say that there was not a practical suggestion in one of them, not a suggestion that would advance the cause of world peace or the reduction of world armaments or would in the slightest degree improve the position of Canada in respect thereto.

What did the hon. gentleman say? His first proposal—I have it here as I took it down—was that Canada should take action at once and frame a policy of her own for peace. Well, what practical suggestion did he leave with the house in that respect? He made one, I will grant you; he said that Canada should proclaim to the world her neutrality, and he rested his case there. Would such a course prove of any avail? We boast that we are a nation but we are still part and parcel of the British empire—we are part of the British commonwealth of nations, let me put it that way. The British flag flies over this dominion; His Excellency the Governor General, the head of the state, is the representative of the King in this dominion; we are part and parcel of the British commonwealth. Now suppose we proclaimed to the world our neutrality; would it avail us anything if Great Britain should become involved in a foreign war? The moment war was declared, notwithstanding our neutrality, our commerce at sea would be liable to immediate destruction; our shores might be invaded and our seaports bombarded by enemy ships, notwithstanding our proclamation to the world that we were neutral. Is that a practical remedy or a useful suggestion, in any way you may look at it? But I take stronger objection to the language he used in setting forth his second proposal. His second proposal was that we should cooperate with Great Britain for peace. I am inclined to think that this proposal was not genuinely made.

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh, pardon me.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I gather that from the last clause of the motion, which I will read to the house:

> It invites the government to lend its support to all effective measures to ensure the world's peace either through the League of Nations or otherwise in cooperation with other governments pledged to the cause of peace.

No sooner had the hon. member mentioned his second proposal for cooperation with Great Britain than he at once indulged in a most severe and uncalled for diatribe against British statesmen, against British diplomacy and against the method of British participation of world affairs.

Mr. BOURASSA: Not all of them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I could not find, in his whole discussion of his second proposal, one single word favourable to the mother country, as the great majority in this country view Great Britain. We should all recognize that the chief agency in the world to-day for peace is Great Britain. I must say that I could not approve and do not approve the attitude assumed by my hon. friend from Labelle in discussing British statesmen and British policy in the house this afternoon. It left a bad impression on my mind and I think a bad impression on the house in general.

What was the hon. gentleman's third proposal? He developed nothing in regard to the second except adverse criticism of Great Britain. His third proposal was to the effect that we should cooperate with the United States in regard to peace, and on this branch of his subject he waxed eloquent and practically informed the house that we should look to Washington for our security rather than across the sea to the mother country.

Mr. BOURASSA: I had in mind what Lord Fisher said.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I noticed that in support of his argument this afternoon he indulged in a recollection of some conversation which he had with Lord Fisher about 1911. As Lord Fisher has been dead for a number of years he cannot give his recollection of this interview.

Mr. BOURASSA: No; that was between his first and second command of the fleet.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understood it was before the war. Lord Fisher has been in his grave a number of years.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, since then; but he was very much alive then.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was amused at the method employed by my hon. friend from Labelle when he attempted to persuade this house that in time of trouble we should rely upon the Monroe doctrine for our defence. He made a rather extraordinary statement in regard to this matter. He stated that we must admit that the predominant power in regard to both our internal and our external affairs in Canada was the United States. If anyone outside the house had made such a statement in my presence I would have told him that he should be ashamed of himself. May I ask if the United States was the dominant power in regard to our attitude in 1914 and our participation in the great war, which was certainly a matter of external affairs? Was the United States the dominant power in regard to our attitude at Paris when we signed the treaty of Versailles, and which we have carried out, while the United States has not ratified it? Was the United States the dominant power when we acceded to the treaty establishing the Hague tribunal, to which the United States has not yet acceded? Was the United States the dominant power when we negotiated the British trade treaties in Ottawa in 1932? The facts have only to be stated to show how utterly unfounded the hon. gentleman's statements are—utter rubbish, as I might describe them. But in order to make his proposal to some extent palatable, he sought to drag in what history has referred to many times—the fact that George Canning did have something to do with the framing of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. BOURASSA: A good deal.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not admitted by historians in the United States; it is denied by many public men in that country. I believe however there is some historical foundation for the statement that the late Mr. George Canning did have something to do with the establishment of the Monroe doctrine. However that may be, we in this country are not looking to Washington yet for our defence. Personally I have the greatest faith and confidence in the United States. I believe the second great influence in the world in support of peace and disarmament will be found in the United States. It is not only a great but a peace loving country. Great Britain perhaps has more at stake than has the United States in the matter of world peace. Great Britain to-day is the undoubted leader in the peace movement throughout the world; Great Britain has during the last ten years devoted her time, her money and her energy, to the question of world peace and disarmament. The statesmen of Great Britain have by no means given up hope of ultimate success; night and day they are working upon this paramount problem, and the best informed thought in the world to-day is confident they will eventually succeed. It is idle for my hon. friend to say that we should look to Washington for our security rather than to Great Britain. He made it quite plain to-day, that he does not approve either the diplomacy or the actions of some British statesmen in the great effort to assure the peace of the world.

Mr. BOURASSA: I would be sorry to interrupt my hon. friend in his magnificent speech, but I am sure he wants to be fair I did not say that we should look to Washington rather than to Great Britain; I said that we should look to Washington and to London at the same time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The "and" so far as London was concerned was in my judgment not stressed by my hon. friend.

His final suggestion, number four, is that we should seek the aid of the League of Nations in regard to our efforts to secure world peace. I agree with him on that point, but I do not agree with the statements which he uttered in the house this afternoon in regard to the League of Nations. He referred to a motion made in the upper chamber last year by Senator McRae proposing that Canada should withdraw from the League of Nations, and said: If that motion had been made in the house, I would have applauded it, but I would have voted against it.

Mr. BOURASSA: If my hon. friend will permit me, I said: I would have applauded the speech, but I would have opposed the motion, but this year I might have supported the motion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the hon. member's whole attitude in regard to the League of Nations and the statement he made this afternoon clearly shows, that he was running true to form in respect of this matter. The half-hearted praise with which he damned the League of Nations, the grudging support which he gave it—and everyone in this chamber realized that it was merely grudging support—made no appeal to me.

There is this to be said about the League of Nations and Canada's part in it: Canada has consistently supported the league since its inception; there has not been a meeting of the assembly of that august body at which Canadians have not been present to represent their country, and it is a matter of pride to Canadians; it is a matter of pride to me that in 1925 Senator Dandurand was elected president of the assembly of the league, and also that in 1927 he represented Canada on the council of the league, the council being, as the house knows, the power house of the league. Canada has won a high place in the council of the league. But we must not overestimate the influence of this country in a gathering such as meets annually at Geneva, consisting of some forty, fifty or sixty of the great nations of the world. I know and they know that Canada is a country of ten million people, a new nation. I have been there myself on one occasion, and we all realize when we go there that the influence of Canada is respected, but I would not say that it is great; certainly it is not predominant in any way. But consistently Canada has supported at the gathering of the league all measures for world peace and all measures for world disarmament.

There is this to be said, that during its career of some fourteen or fifteen years the league has been a very steadying influence in world affairs. It may not have succeeded in keeping down all armed conflict, but it has succeeded in settling many difficult problems which might otherwise have caused revolt throughout the world had the good auspices of the league not been employed in the settlement of them. One of the weaknesses of the league, one of the weaknesses of the permanent court at The Hague, lies in the fact that the United States has not become a party to either of them. Another weakness, when I was there, arose from the fact that Russia had not become a party to the league. I for one, expressing my own opinion, am gratified to know that Russia now belongs to the league. I may say that in 1931 when I attended as a representative from this country, Canada was the only nation in North America that was a member of the league. I was asked to say a word in support of the application of Mexico to join the league. It was the first occasion on which I made a speech in that body; I was very glad to endorse the application and Mexico became a member at that gathering. Not that I have any tremendous respect for Mexico; I know very little about it, but I think it is far better for the peace of the world that countries like Russia and Mexico should belong to the league and come under its influence than that they should remain outside it.

I do not know that I have anything further to add in regard to this matter. To my mind Canada's duty is clear; we should pursue the even tenor of our ways; we should seek to mould and control public opinion as far as possible in support of all peace proposals and international disarmament. Canada is recognized at Geneva as one of the few countries in the world where armaments are considered negligible. We are in no sense of the word an armed nation. I believe our expenditure on armaments upon a per capita basis is lower than that of any of the other civilized countries. That is one example which we have set at Geneva, but it is not an example which has prevailed upon the other nations to limit their armaments. Whether limitation can be accomplished, whether disarmament will become an accomplished fact in the near future, one cannot say. Our efforts, our hopes and our prayers are directed in support of disarmament. We hope our prayers may be answered; but let us continue to pursue the course we have followed for the last ten years, the active support of all peace proposals. I do not believe the time has yet come when men are prepared to beat their swords into ploughshares, their spears into pruning hooks. That day may be yet far distant, but Canada's course is plain.

There is nothing in the principle involved in this motion to which I could object; I accept it as it is drawn and so does the government. I cannot however accept the statements made in regard to it by the hon. member for Labelle. I approve in every way the League of Nations. I can only say that if it can succeed in keeping the peace of the world; if it can succeed in driving the fear of war from the minds of men and in removing the burdens of war from the backs of weary multitudes, it will accomplish much in the cause of civilization.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity of agreeing with the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) this afternoon and evening. I think the hon. member expressed, as well as another could, my views on a constructive national policy for Canada.

I do not intend to express again the numerous positive, emphatic statements the hon. member made in the stand that he felt, as a typical Canadian, he should take. As I followed almost all the speeches that have been made on this subject I felt that the outstanding causes of war boiled down to possibly two. In the first place I think there are unnatural boundaries which outrage the ideas of racial solidarity and ignore the cultural rights of minorities, and I believe these unnatural boundaries are very largely the result of the treaty of Versailles. For many years I have been out of sympathy with that treaty; I think it contains the causes of many wars. Whether or not we shall be able to change the treaty in time to save the world from those wars I do not know.

The other cause of war, which to me seems by far the chief cause, is the ever increasing, bitter fight for diminishing markets. I believe I have expressed my feeling in almost the same words previously during this session. Every country in the world is seeking to sell in the markets of the world those goods which their own people would like so much to have but which they cannot afford to buy. When you find every country seeking to sell surplus goods in the world markets, with no one wishing to buy, there is bound to be increasing competition. Not only do nations seek to sell; every country seems to believe that it must have a surplus of sales over purchases, or what we call a favourable trade balance. Any reasonable person knows that every country cannot have a favourable balance of trade; it is impossible. A few countries may have such a balance, but all countries cannot have it, and this frightful effort on the part of every nation to sell more than it buys—which of course is impossible—has helped bring the world to the state of tension in which it finds itself at the moment.

There are, of course, very many other factors. I do believe that when armaments multiply rapidly they are not only an indication of war but are a cause of war. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) spoke of the court of international settlement, and I think everyone is glad that so many causes of war have been referred to that court. But may I say that the chief causes of war are of such a nature that they cannot be referred to the permanent court of international settlement, or as the United States call it, the world court. That is true in regard to this ever-increasing struggle for markets. That is not a matter that can be referred to the court of international settlement, and in my opinion those matters which can be referred to the court are not the chief causes of war. I think they are minor matters and that the chief cause of war is this frightful struggle for markets which, as conditions are to-day, really do not exist. That matter will not and indeed cannot be referred to the court of international settlement, so while I am glad we have the court and I am glad of its success up to this time, I do not think we can look to it with any real confidence as a tribunal that will settle the most aggravated causes of war.

I feel more and more that we must learn to distribute goods and services in every country up to the needs of the people, and when we have satisfied the people's needs in each country, the terrific struggle for markets will be lessened by exactly the amount of goods consumed by the people who to-day are living below a decent standard.

This afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that when he was at a meeting of the league he formed the impression that Europe played too important a part in the work of that body. No one who has ever been there could have any other feeling. You feel that Europe takes itself much too seriously and that unfortunately the world takes Europe much too seriously. After all Europe is only one continent and there are many others, but the league is dominated by the European nations and European problems, and there has not been anything like sufficient recognition of other continents and their problems. To-day no thoughtful person can look at even the headlines in the daily papers without being deeply troubled or without seeing that in spite of all the talk of peace the nations are making frantic efforts to rearm. If ever there was a time when Canadians needed to take their place in the League of Nations seriously, that time is now. Much as I would like to think that Canada has taken her work in connection with the League of Nations seriously, I must disagree with the opinion of the Minister of Justice in that regard. I think we have taken a very nominal place there; I think we could have done very much better if we had taken our work in connection with the league more seriously. That is a subject in connection with which I have stated my position previously.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer, and that is in connection with the things we might do right here in Canada. I do feel that one way of improving Canada's work in connection with the league is to have the portfolio of external affairs held by a minister other than the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is too busy; he cannot leave Canada as often as is necessary to discharge most efficiently the duties in connection with that portfolio, and I think the change should be made without delay. Then we have in Canada an organization that is seeking to do a very fine piece of work in educating public opinion, and that is doing its work very well indeed when one considers the meagre funds at its disposal; I refer to the League of Nations Society. I do not believe the House of Commons of Canada can say conscientiously that it is working for peace when it votes to the League of Nations Society in Canada only $3,000. When certain subscriptions to League of Nations documents are paid the net amount is only about $2,000. The parliament of Canada votes only $2,000 to the League of Nations Society but votes millions for military equipment. We maintain a military college. In the present year we have heard of some fairly large contributions to the Boy Scouts Association. I have no fault to find with the Boy Scouts, but I believe there can be very little comparison, so far as the good which can be accomplished is concerned, between the Boy Scouts Association and the League of Nations Society in Canada. Before dissolution we ought to vote to the League of Nations Society in Canada a sum of money in keeping with its importance and with the very intelligent work it is doing.

There are many functions the society could perform but which on account of shortage of funds it finds impossible to perform. I do not wish it to become a creature of the government or of parliament, but I do say the moneys the society collects by way of subscriptions and donations ought to be liberally supplemented by a vote of this parliament. Had they the money I believe they could supervise intelligently an extensive peace program to extend throughout the dominion. They could do much towards linking up the work in Canada with that of international institutions outside the dominion which are working in the interests of the people. They could do much through existing organizations such as farm and labour groups, schools and churches, to inform the people on international matters. They could cooperate with the press and with women's organizations. They could have a panel of well informed and well trained speakers; they could have literature, posters, and so on.

Some years ago I suggested in this chamber that scholarships should be provided whereby it would be possible for Canadian students to go abroad on a more extensive scale than now obtains, and students of other countries to come to Canada to study. I still believe that might well be done. Last year and indeed for many years I attended the annual meeting of the League of Nations

Society in Canada. I wish every hon. member could have attended it, because the annual meeting held last May at the Chateau Laurier was an intellectual treat. The papers and discussions were of a nature which it would have profited us to go a long way to hear. The standard was so high that I believe it would be advisable to make arrangements whereby such a society might be in a position financially to arrange for a summer school in which certain subjects could be pursued and possibly certain definite conclusions arrived at. Such a school would be one not of propaganda but of education in the best sense of the term. The League of Nations Society could do a great deal towards encouraging creative thinking in the schools and colleges of Canada along lines of international relationships. My statement may sound ridiculous, but I believe I am correct when I say that if we can support a military college we ought not to claim to be completely devoted to the cause of peace until we are willing to support a peace college, if it could be so termed. At any rate, if we cannot have a separate college every assistance should be given to the departments in colleges already established which are seeking to enlarge the people's knowledge of international relations. The establishment of a peace college may offend some people who might believe that peace propaganda would be broadcast. However I should be inclined to think it would be a perfectly sound proposition to establish a peace college and would be no more in the way of propaganda than would a military college such as is already established.

I believe there is a great need in Canada of a library devoted to the subject of international relations and good will. The League of Nations Society need such a library. They have not the money to buy the volumes nor indeed have they sufficient to procure rooms for the bare physical framework of a library. And so I urge—and it is really for this reason I have risen—that we do this thing which lies at our hand. It is something we can do. I think in Professor MacDermot the League of Nations Society has a secretary with the intellectual capacity sufficient to do all the things I have mentioned and many I have not mentioned. I believe he is capable of giving intellectual leadership to a peace movement in Canada, and I do feel as members of the House of Commons we should do this very small thing, this one concrete thing.

I again urge that the portfolio of Secretary of State for External Affairs be separated from that of the Prime Minister, and that such official should head the delegations to the League of Nations Assembly year after year, so that his knowledge of these matters would be comparable with the knowledge of other delegation heads going there from year to year.

In closing I wish to repeat that in my opinion the chief causes of war are economic, and until there is a distribution of goods and services which will allow the people of the world to enjoy the goods which they themselves produce, we will not be eliminating the root causes of war.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was greatly impressed by one observation made at the beginning of his address by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He spoke of the gravity of the situation in Europe, saying that it was one which threatened the peace of the world. Having made that declaration the hon. member then proceeded to express the hope, one which I think was in the breasts of all hon. members, that any debate which might take place would not be in the nature of party controversy. I had hoped that upon this occasion such might prove to be the case. I can see however wherein it was unavoidable that exception should be taken to some of the observations of the hon. member. Indeed I would not be honest with him or with the house if I did not state that while I concur in very much of what he said there were some of his remarks with which I could not agree. May I say however that while hon. members in this chamber may debate these matters in a manner which is understood among themselves and in all parts of our country, in view of the conditions obtaining in Europe to-day, and in view of what is happening even in the present week, there is a danger that some observations made in this chamber, while understood by hon. members and by Canadians, may not be as well understood in other parts of the world. For that reason I believe upon this occasion we cannot be too guarded in our criticisms of events in the old world. There have been negotiations between Britain and Germany; there are negotiations going on between Britain and Russia, and in the course of a few days the negotiations will be enlarged to include other nations of Europe, all with the one great objective of effecting a collective security and maintaining the peace of the world. I submit that there is no question of the day comparable in importance or consequence with the situation as it is existing in Europe to-day. It would be most unfortunate indeed if any word from either side of this house should go out to the world, the purpose of which was capable of being in any way misconstrued.

May I say that I welcome very much the resolution which my hon. friend from Labelle has introduced. I am glad that the government has found it possible to accept the motion wholeheartedly, that they have not found it necessary to discover technical reasons why this motion which is being moved on going into supply cannot be accepted by the government and by the house, and I hope and believe and know that it will be accepted unanimously.

It is at this time quite appropriate that we should reaffirm, and reaffirm very strongly, the position of Canada with respect to the Paris peace pact, as it is termed, the Briand-Kellogg pact, and the position that we in Canada take in relation to the work of the League of Nations. The first clause of the motion, that "this house reiterates the adhesion of Canada to the general treaty for the renunciation of war signed at Paris on the 27th day of August, 1928, and approved by this house on the 22nd day of February, 1929," will I know be acceptable to every hon. member of the house without respect to the party to which he may belong. I am pleased to recall that in 1928 I had the honour of signing in Paris the Briand-Kellogg pact on behalf of Canada. We in this parliament have heretofore approved the peace pact, and at this moment it is I think wholly appropriate and perhaps helpful to the world situation that we should reaffirm our endorsation of it.

There is but one other clause in the motion, and it "invites the government to lend its support to all effective measures to ensure the world's peace either through the League of Nations or otherwise in cooperation with other governments pledged to the cause of peace." I hope that every living soul in this country will be prepared to support that clause. I believe they will be. I cannot imagine that in any part of Canada to-day there exists anyone who would desire the government to do other than all that is within its power at a time like this in the world's affairs to further any project that will make for peace and give the utmost support that it can to any institution that is working for the peace of the world.

It is easy to criticize institutions. The League of Nations, like all other institutions, has its limitations, but after all it is the one continuing consultative international body working for peace in the world to-day. It is the one recognized world agency for the purpose of furthering cooperation among those nations that are seeking to preserve peace. We can only begin to estimate its value when we ask ourselves what position the world might be in to-day had no such world agency been created, had no public opinion been aroused such as has been aroused and formulated within the last ten or fifteen years through the agency of the League of Nations, and which is making itself felt at the present time.

Only a few months ago the world was horrified by a crime perpetrated at Marseilles. It looked for the moment as if Europe might as a result of that crime be plunged again immediately into war. It recalled to the mind of everyone what happened at Sarajevo shortly before the beginning of the great war. But what has happened since is evidence that while there may be forces which are preparing for war, that are seeking to be in readiness for the moment of action, on the other hand there are other forces which are working very strongly for peace. The forces which are working for peace were able last year at least to prevent that crime being followed by an event so disastrous as that which followed the assassination at Sarajevo. There are many other evidences that the forces which are working for peace have found a means of coordination, have found a method of common expression and a promise of world support through the League of Nations, which would not be present to-day but for the existence of the league.

Certainly so far as Canada is concerned I think that what has been said to-night about our part in the league, modest as it has been, has been well said. The example of Canada, while a small country, has nevertheless been one which other nations as well as we ourselves could point to with pride. The fact that geographically we are situated as we are with a great and powerful nation to the south of us, and that our difficulties for a century and more have been settled by the appeal to reason rather than by the appeal to force affords an object lesson to the world the like of which can only be discovered on this continent. If the countries of Asia and Europe would follow the example of North America and appoint international joint commissions to which their disputes might be referred for consideration and investigation and report, bringing to bear the light of an informed public opinion upon the case in dispute, I venture to say that the need for much in the way of armament would soon disappear.

I repeat that I hardly think in the light of the European situation at the moment and what is being sought to be done to improve conditions there, it is wise to go too far in our discussion of policies that may or may not be best for the preservation of peace. I would like however, to say with regard to disarmament that I do not think it is sufficient for this country simply to say that it supports the League of Nations in its policy of disarmament. I think we ought to name a concrete policy in that regard. Having observed what has taken place in investigations in the United States, where beyond all question it has been shown that there are those who are prepared to traffic in the manufacture and sale of munitions and armaments for the sake of gain, that there are large interests that are even selling simultaneously to countries that are at enmity with each other, it behooves this country and I believe all nations to begin immediately to investigate the whole business of armament manufacture and sale. I should like to see a beginning made in this country of a thorough investigation into the whole business of the manufacture and sale and distribution of munitions of war and armaments, and that step put forward as part of a policy to govern British countries, a policy that we would hope might be followed in all parts of the British empire. I am glad that in Great Britain a commission has been appointed for the purpose, and I am sure that if the British empire as a whole made it a part of the policy of its several parts to investigate to the utmost limit the workings of these great armament production interests and those who are concerned on the commercial side with the sale of munitions, it would have an enormous effect upon other countries, and if the United States paralleled the example of the British empire in that regard, that example would soon be followed by other nations of the world with results of benefit to mankind.

I agree with what has been said this evening by the last speaker (Miss Macphail) in her references to the importance of our economic policies, our trade policies as well as those policies that are more immediately associated with the question of war. I believe the greatest curse with which the world has been faced in the last five years has been the curse of economic nationalism. As I have said repeatedly, if there is one curse that is greater it is that of economic imperialism. I believe that the sooner we find a nation which has the courage to set an example to other nations of a friendly attitude in the matter of trade, a friendliness carried to the point of presenting to other countries an opportunity to trade, the sooner we will find a breaking down of those walls behind which hatred between different nations has been fostered.

There is no doubt that the cause of much of the world's unrest which exists to-day is the consciousness that countries are being denied the opportunity of trading with other parts of the world. The idea that a selfish policy of the kind can be fought with retaliation is a serious mistake. Retaliation in kind has only served to make conditions which were bad infinitely worse. A great deal has been said to-day about a Christian attitude in human affairs and in international relations. If we are going to talk about the brotherhood of man, it is about time we began to treat those who belong to other nations as though they were brothers instead of enacting embargoes and prohibitive trade restrictions and other vexatious hindrances to trade. This is one thing which bears upon a condition which we all know to exist in this as well as in other countries of the world.

I am inclined to believe that much good could be done if this and other countries were to take a more definite stand on what they would or would not do in the matter of helping to preserve collective security. There should be more definite statements as to the attitude which would be adopted toward any nation which would threaten the security of other nations or which was proven by the facts to be guilty of having disturbed the peace of the world. I think this country ought to declare that any nation which could be shown to have threatened the peace of the world by violating a pact of collective security should be denied any assistance in the shape of men or munitions, should be denied any assistance in the nature of food, should be denied any assistance through credit. Our country, small as it is, might well lay down a definite policy in that regard as expressing Canada's attitude toward any country which upon the facts being disclosed was found to be guilty of attempting to destroy what otherwise might be collective security. If that example were followed by other parts of the British empire, as I believe it would be, it would soon be followed by other parts of the world.

What I am seeking to emphasize at the moment is the fact that as part of the British empire this country should make itself heard even more definitely than in the past with respect to some of these matters upon which we feel very deeply. I do not believe that a situation could develop in Europe which would engulf that country in war without the effects of that situation inevitably being felt in all quarters of the world. It is quite easy to say that we would stay out of the war, that we would not send men to fight in Europe, but after the experience I had of the pressure which was exerted at the time of the Chanak incident, referred to this afternoon, I have very grave doubts as to what might happen in Canada if war were to break out again in any part of the world. I think we can take it for granted that the next war will not be one which however colossal its death and destruction may be, will leave the world simply in depths of depression and distress such as it has experienced in recent years; it will be a war which will do much to obliterate human society itself. There cannot be any conceivable menace to mankind as great as that.

When I went to Europe last year I did so largely with the view of ascertaining at first hand the facts with respect to the situation which one was led to believe existed in the old country. The impression which I gathered from conversations with those who were well informed in Great Britain, France and Italy was that while the peoples of Europe undoubtedly did not wish war, while the governments themselves did not wish war, there was no one who would say that conditions were not such that war might not occur at almost any moment. What has taken place in Europe during the last few years? We all know that much of what there was of democratic institutions before and even since the war has been swept away. Instead of government under democratic methods such as we have under the British parliamentary system, there is in Europe to-day a network of dictatorships. There is a dictatorship in Russia, there is a dictatorship in Germany, in Italy and in Austria as well as in other countries. What happens under a dictatorship is that the will of one man may precipitate an entire country into a step which it becomes impossible to retrieve. So long as communities remain democratic, and so long as governments are subject to the will of members of parliament who are representatives of the people as a whole, I for one have not the least fear of war commencing in those countries. But where peoples have surrendered their freedom to autocratic governments, where autocratic governments have become more and more government by individuals whose will and whose wish become the expressions of the nations as a whole, then there is an increasingly grave menace to human society.

I believe that the British people will perhaps be able to render their greatest contribution to the world by maintaining their system of government as it has developed during the last century or two. I believe that to-day Great Britain is wielding a great influence for good in Europe, and is able to wield that influence because it is known throughout Europe that when Great Britain speaks she is speaking for the people of Great Britain as a whole. The trouble with some of the other countries is that when a word is spoken no one can say whether it is the word of the people or of an individual. What perhaps is most serious of all is the fact that contracts have lost their sanctity. The written word, the pledge, has ceased to have the value which it had in years gone by. In Great Britain the written contract is still accepted, and the pledge is still honoured; when the government of Great Britain gives an undertaking it is something which can be relied upon, and I believe the voice of Great Britain speaking in this authoritative way may yet prove to be the voice which will help most to preserve the peace of the world. So far as this parliament is concerned, every hon. member feels I am sure that the greatest service we can render to-day to the peace of the world is to let it be known that so far as the efforts which Great Britain is making are towards mediation, towards conciliation and towards eliminating the fears of nations, the members of all political parties in Canada are unitedly and strongly behind such efforts.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Amendment (Mr. Bourassa) agreed to.

Motion (Mr. Rhodes), as amended, agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: To restore the order paper, as a result of the motion just passed, I move that the house resolve itself immediately into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply. Mr. Morand in the chair.

Progress reported.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, March 29, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment of Mr. Ralston, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coote.

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): In view of the very generous reception with which the budget has met at the hands of the press of Canada, for me to devote any time to complimenting the minister on his presentation would certainly be like carrying coals to Newcastle. Suffice it to say that I feel both satisfied and gratified with the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) this year. I was struck with the change in the method of procedure of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). I have always listened with a good deal of interest to his annual onslaught on the budget and I listened again this year with equal interest. I noticed, however, this year for the first time that he spent practically half an hour in what I might term amusing witticisms. It is the first time he has blossomed forth as a humorist, and I do not think that the hon. gentleman is as happy in that role as he is in the role of a serious critic. I think we all felt that his humour was perhaps a little too premeditated; it never surprised us—we always anticipated it. The hon. gentleman might be pardoned for making that departure this year inasmuch as the Minister of Finance had left him a very difficult task, and it was quite natural that he should attempt to cover with levity his failure to find at least one vulnerable spot in the budget.

The hon. gentleman's first attack was upon the policies of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he went to the old country in connection with the economic conference. My hon. friend revived the old story, that the Prime Minister, by his "blasting" policies, had offended the British people and made it impossible for us to trade with other countries. I should have thought that this would be a very inopportune time for the hon. member to bring up that question. He must surely remember that his right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) went to the old country the latter part of last year and undoubtedly sounded the British people as to their attitude towards these agreements, and on his return to this country he precipitated a family quarrel in the Liberal party by ordering the mighty Vincent to destroy tons of literature he had prepared in denunciation of the agreements. I should think the charred remains of that pile of campaign ammunition would be a silent reminder that a false statement remains a false statement, no matter how often it is repeated.

The next charge he made against us was that we had led the way in economic nationalism and now we are recanting. Surely the hon. gentleman knows the difference between recognizing a fact and espousing a principle. All this government and the Prime Minister have done is to recognize the fact that economic nationalism is rampant in the world, but to say that this government or the Prime Minister has adopted that as a principle is far from the fact. On the contrary the very statement made by the right hon. leader of the opposition contradicts the idea, for he said that the Prime Minister's attitude was to blast his way into the markets of the world. Surely that is absolutely at variance with the idea of economic nationalism.

The next charge he has to make against us is that we have failed to keep the channels of trade open. I am not going to reiterate what has been stated so often in the house or to deal further with a matter so ably dealt with by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in his reply. Surely if there is anything in which the Liberal party has excelled, it is in repeating over and over again a statement hon. members opposite know is not true and doing so without batting an eye. It has been repeated in the house and throughout the country; it has been stated by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and nearly all speakers on this side, that almost every market in the world was closed to our products before this government came into power. One cannot help admiring the persistence and audacity of people who will, in the face of what has been said, continue to reiterate that this government has closed the markets of the world to Canada.

Then the hon. member attacked the basis of our trade balance; he said that we prided ourselves on our favourable trade balance but that it is not of the value we claim because, he said, it was not properly obtained; it was obtained by restricting imports instead of by increasing exports. Well, it changed from a favourable trade balance to an adverse one of some $140,000,000 or $150,000,000 during the regime of hon. members opposite. If that is so, did they keep the channels of trade open? Did they keep our exports up? Surely if we had an adverse trade balance of $140,000,000 and a favourable one is desirable, as they are prepared to admit it is provided it is obtained in the right way, the time was opportune for them to proceed to obtain that favourable trade balance by increasing exports, which he says is the proper way to do it. It therefore follows that the hon. gentleman's party has failed to do the very thing which he has charged us with failing to do. What happened? Canada, being a debtor nation, must have a favourable trade balance or must face bankruptcy. If she cannot obtain a favourable trade balance by increasing exports, then she must obtain it in some other way. What this government did was to obtain it in two ways: first, by decreasing imports and, second, by increasing exports. But this government recognized the fact, which apparently the previous government did not do, that this country, being a debtor nation, would face bankruptcy if it did not have a favourable trade balance.

I want to remind the house that in 1914 this world faced I suppose the most tragic crisis in its history. At that time it needed men of ability, of education, with trained minds and force of character, as leaders in the armies of the world. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth volunteered his services, and I am glad to say that he proved to be a very valuable, efficient and loyal soldier. A gratified nation wished to recognize the services he was performing, the sacrifice he was making in devoting himself to the service of his country. He went overseas as a major; he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel; he was given a substantial remuneration for his services while overseas, although perhaps not what everybody would think was sufficient, but all that the nation could afford under the circumstances. He was decorated; he was given marks of distinction, of honour; he was mentioned in dispatches. He was admitted into the best society of the land; he was wined, dined and feasted. He was given a batman to brush his clothes, polish his shoes and shine his buttons, saving him from all menial tasks. In fact everything that could be done for him was done in recognition of the valuable service he was rendering to his country. Moreover, he was given immunity from political aspersion. People were not allowed to say that the hon. member in his work as a soldier was fighting not for his country but for his own glory. He was immune from that because the people would not permit such things to be said of a man who was giving himself to his country. The war crisis ended.

Twelve years rolled by and another crisis arose. This however was a peace crisis, almost as bad, a tragedy perhaps as deep and dark as ony of those met with on the fields of Flanders. Again we required men of training and ability, men who were willing to sacrifice themselves for their country. In western Canada we had such a man in the person of John I. McFarland, who volunteered his services. He had a peculiarly trained mind. But what did the country do for him? It is true a private corporation offered him a salary, but he refused it. He was not given a uniform; he was not given any medals or badges or award. He was not given a batman; he was not given any rank of distinction, not even that of a corporal. He was not wined, dined or feasted.

Mr. POWER: He was given $100,000,000 to play with.

Mr. BEYNON: I am glad to hear the hon. member make that remark and I hope he will stand by it.

Mr. POWER: He certainly will stand by it. Comparing that gambler with one who went to war! What are the Tories who were the friends of the soldiers coming to?

Mr. BEYNON: That man went out without any honour, any pay, any rank or any distinction. He gave this country the benefit of his knowledge, his experience, and he gave just as loyal service and made just as great a sacrifice as did any man in battle. He did not ask for anything. But what was said of him? He found the people of western Canada struggling against the forces of nature and against an adverse world condition, and I am sorry to say that they also had to struggle against the greed and cupidity of certain individuals and groups trading in this world. One would have thought a man giving that service to his country, devoting himself without pay and without honour, asking nothing but the right to serve his country, would at least be entitled to the gratitude of his fellow men. But what does the hon. gentleman say about it in his speech in reply to the Minister of Finance? Here is what he has to say:

> I suppose that the idea originally was that either Mr. McFarland or the government for whom he was acting wanted to make a reputation as astute market operators and possibly to get some glory out of the distribution of the profits later.

Further on he says:

> —but what I have the strongest criticism to offer in respect of is the method and the motives which seem to have actuated Mr. McFarland in carrying out his mandate.

And he goes on to say:

> —taking the credit of the people of this dominion and putting it behind one man in order that he might deal with that credit, not for the benefit of the western wheat producer—and I shall show that in a moment —but for the possible eventual glorification of Mr. McFarland and this government.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what would be the attitude of hon. members opposite or of hon. members on this side of the house if I stood here and said that the hon. gentleman sacrificed the lives of his men overseas for the glorification of himself and his fellow-officers?

Mr. RALSTON: All you said was that he was wined and dined overseas.

Mr. BEYNON: Has it come to this, that the hero who serves his country in time of peace is not entitled to the same amenities as is the hero who serves his country in time of war? I want to know if the Canadian citizen who will give his time, his money and perhaps even his life in the service of his country in time of peace is not entitled to the same consideration as the man who fights in the army in time of war. If the statement of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was true it meant that Mr. McFarland was not only sacrificing the credit of this country but he was prepared to risk the happiness, the fortune and even the lives of something over two million people in western Canada. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that while nothing can absolve the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth from this unfair, ungenerous aspersion which he has cast upon the character and work of Mr. McFarland, after he has left public life he will suffer the pangs of remorse when he realizes that on this occasion in the House of Commons he was not sufficiently generous to pay tribute to a patriotic fellow Canadian who is giving his services in a time of peace, not in the glamorous theatre of war—

Mr. RALSTON: What kind of theatre?

Mr. BEYNON: —but in the quiet of a drab, dull depression in which there is absolutely nothing in the way of glory or glamour but only the opportunity to serve his fellow Canadians. Yet the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was not generous enough to refrain from casting such aspersions.

It is possible, of course, that the hon. member does not fully appreciate the tragedy that is being enacted on those western plains. He is living in the midst of a large city, in the more or less fortified recesses of St. James street, where matters of this kind cannot be fully understood or appreciated. At the same time I submit that before making a charge of this kind against a man like Mr. McFarland he should more thoroughly investigate these matters. It is true that on several occasions the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) has made similar statements, which have been passed by without a great deal of thought or without a great deal of attention being paid to them. Perhaps that is due to the fact that on this side of the house it is not generally thought that the hon. member for Willow Bunch is capable of anything better, but we did expect something better from the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. He is a soldier, a scholar and a gentleman, and we expected something better of him.

What are the criticisms that are levelled against Mr. McFarland? The first is that in 1933 he either did not sell the wheat, or if he did he went into the market and bought it back again. Let us just examine that for a moment, because it indicates very clearly that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth does not really understand very much about the wheat business. As a matter of fact every time Mr. McFarland sold a quantity of wheat he stepped right into the market and bought that quantity of wheat back again by way of options. That was necessary; it was impossible for Mr. McFarland to sell any wheat without doing that, for the simple reason that neither the millers nor the exporters will buy any wheat at all unless they can hedge their purchases, and Mr. McFarland was taking the hedges. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth seems to think that if Mr. McFarland goes in the market and sells one thousand, ten thousand, or one hundred thousand bushels of wheat, that amount immediately disappears from the world's surplus. It does not matter whether that wheat is in Winnipeg, on the boat or in England; until it is manufactured into flour and sold to the consumer it is still a part of the world's surplus. There is no such thing as stepping into the market and disposing of this carry-over or this surplus of ours overnight.

What is the next statement of the hon. gentleman? He says the government of this country is holding the price of wheat in western Canada far too high, and by reason of that fact we are losing the British market. I want it to be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that every Liberal member from western Canada applauded that statement when it was made in this house and they are all committed to that statement of fact and that principle, that the government is holding the price of wheat in western Canada too high. The people of the west must remember that if hon. gentlemen opposite are returned to power naturally they will immediately proceed to correct that which they believe to be wrong; the people of the west must remember that if hon. gentlemen opposite come into power the price of wheat will go down. How is that to be accomplished? It can be done only by throwing all the wheat on the market regardless of price, and that is the policy advocated by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. He said, "Why didn't he sell it; why not throw it on the market and let the price go down, as the Argentine and Australia did?" What would have been the result? If that policy had been followed there could have been only one result; you would have had practically the entire population of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta on relief. In addition you would have lost at least $25,000,000 of purchasing power in Canada; there would have been much more to be raised in the way of taxes in the east and there would have been much less goods purchased in the east and consequently less money with which to pay those taxes. So you would have had something like economic chaos in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite are sometimes wont to laugh when the Prime Minister speaks of having spent his days and nights trying to maintain the industrial and financial structure of this country. I want to say that one of the big aids in maintaining that industrial and financial structure was the support given by this government to the grain market.

The hon. member says we are losing our grain markets, that England is ceasing to trade with us and that if they come into power they will throw the grain on the market and depress the price to the point where the British millers will buy it. To show that this is actually the Liberal policy I have before me a quotation from the Winnipeg Free Press, which after all is the mouthpiece of the Liberal party in western Canada. In 1929 the Winnipeg Free Press had a certain policy with respect to wheat, and this is what it was:

> Since July enormous quantities of low priced wheat have been exported to Europe from the Argentine, Liverpool buyers were under no necessity to buy Canadian wheat at $1.59 per bushel or thereabouts, when they could buy from Argentine at $1.12.

On October 23, 1929, there appeared the following editorial:

> In such a situation with more wheat offering to buyers than they want, the argument that Canadian wheat should be freely offered at competitive prices seems curious. If it were thrown on the market at prices which made it highly attractive to speculators, it might be bought, but would it be used? The price might fall, and the wheat still remain in storage.

Further on they say:

> Whatever the economic effect has been this summer in the Argentine, the fact is that Argentine wheat is being sold at prices in Liverpool which would be disastrous to Canadian producers.

I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that at the time this editorial was written for the Winnipeg Free Press, Argentine wheat was selling at $1.12 a bushel. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite tell us to-day, at a time when Argentine wheat is selling from 50 cents to 60 cents per bushel, that we should dump our wheat on the market in competition with that wheat, and that the western farmer should take the consequences.

We see that a little later the Free Press, as usual, had a change of heart. In 1929 the Liberal party was responsible for the government, but in 1935 we have a Conservative government. Criticizing the speech made by Mr. McFarland in Moose Jaw they have this to say about the wheat situation:

> The next most significant feature of Mr. McFarland's address was his attempt to return to 1929 conditions and the mentality of that year.

Here is a very significant statement:

> Of course, everybody was wrong about wheat in 1929.

The Free Press admits it was wrong about wheat in 1929.

> We were all at that time warm with enthusiasm over our belief that the world had to come to us for wheat and that the price would be what we chose to demand. But people capable of learning were pretty thoroughly cured by the experiences of that year. As the season of 1929 advanced, it was revealed to our chagrin that the world's statistical position of wheat was not what we fondly thought it was; that the domestic crops in European countries were far larger than estimated; and that there was literally no end to the supplies of wheat from Argentine. The lesson that 1929 should have taught us was that if in competitive markets our wheat is held above the current price, we keep the wheat (which bulges forth as a carry-over) and the other nations do the business.

That sets forth the position of the Liberal party to-day. That is what the Free Press has been advocating for the last year and a half, namely, that we throw this wheat upon the market and let the price be depressed to whatever point it may, letting the western farmer take the loss. What have the western producers to do?

I was amused when the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth mentioned he was going to speak for a while on behalf of the western farmers. One of the first statements he made on their behalf was that we should not hold the wheat but that we should dispose of it at whatever price could be obtained. His next statement was that we were destroying cooperative effort. He said that Mr. McFarland was becoming a dictator in the west, that he had taken over the work of cooperative societies and that because of his activities cooperation was dying. I am sure the western farmers will be delighted indeed to have the hon. member from St. James street express their views in this chamber.

However, I have before me some expressions from heads of cooperative institutions in western Canada, and in this connection I quote the observations of Mr. H. W. Wood, Chairman of the Alberta wheat pool:

I think the conference and so on have been a step in the right direction.

He was referring to the conferences from which the Ottawa agreements arose.

No one can tell the value of the acts or what might have resulted if all had been allowed to drift.

Then, I would like hon. members opposite to listen to this:

The government's stand when wheat was tobogganing toward the forty-cent a bushel mark almost two years ago was courageous, necessary and had vindicated itself.

Mr. Wood is anything but a politician. He never has been an exponent of Conservative principles nor has he been a partisan. Let us see what is said by the head of the Saskatchewan pool:

"If the government goes out of the market, many farmers will go out of business" declared Mr. Brouillette. Referring to Prime Minister R. B. Bennett's statement that federal stabilization operations had meant $25,000,000 to grain growers, the pool president thought the figure mentioned was very conservative.

I do not think that those gentlemen will thank the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth for attempting to express their views. The hon. member has said the government is destroying cooperative effort in western Canada. May I quote the magnificent effort made by the hon. member to promote cooperative effort in that particular part of Canada. Hon. members will recall that at the last session the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) introduced the Natural Products Marketing Act. I believe it is agreed by all people in western Canada that there never was a better conceived or a more far reaching piece of legislation placed before parliament. Never has there been any legislation so calculated to promote, assist and develop cooperative effort as was the marketing legislation introduced by the Minister of Agriculture. But what did the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth say about it? He delivered a most important address from his side of the chamber just before the vote was taken, in which he made the following observations:

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that these three features, the autocratic and compulsory feature of the marketing act itself, the tariff feature which does not belong to the bill, and the price spread feature without proper definitions, are all inimical to the welfare not only of the producers but of the people of Canada generally. And when I look at the act and realize that the Prime Minister has completely failed to justify these vital and all-important features, which have been pointed out over and over again in this debate, I am reminded that whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. I say to my right hon. friend in all seriousness that if he passes this act and attempts to enforce it in the dominion he will find that his destruction will be certain and sure.

That was the magnificent attempt made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth to promote cooperation in western Canada and to back up cooperative effort. "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad"—I wonder if the hon. member was referring to the gods of St. James street? I think perhaps he was. Let us see what the people of western Canada think about this terrible marketing act. I quote from the Western Producer, the paper that has the largest circulation among the producers and cooperatives of western Canada, and the organ of the cooperative societies in western Canada. In its issue of December 27, 1934, it says:

There are some people who oppose the Natural Products Marketing Act for the reason (a good and sufficient one in their eyes) that it was enacted by the federal government. They find it difficult to imagine anything good coming from the federal administration and even if it may look attractive on the surface, they feel sure there must be a catch in it somewhere.

We do not propose to argue with opponents of this kind because in such cases, reason is rarely of much effect.

That is the view taken by the cooperative organizations of western Canada with regard to the Natural Products Marketing Act. Now where does the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth get his inspiration? All through his speech he was quoting from the Financial Post, and again I thought I recognized the voice of St. James street. But surely the Financial Post does not speak for the cooperative organizations of western Canada, nor does it speak for the grain growers who have been helped by the holding up of the price of their grain.

Another very notable thing in the speech of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was that attempt that we have noticed in all the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite this session to condemn in the one breath and praise in the next the reform measures which the government has brought down. It simply means that hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to evade responsibility outside the house for the criticisms which they level here at the legislation brought down by the government. In criticizing the work of Mr. John I. McFarland in supporting the wheat market the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was very careful to leave a screen behind which he could hide if he was charged with condemning the operations of Mr. McFarland; for at page 2116 of Hansard he said:

There has never been a word of criticism upon that score—

That is, about assisting the western farmer:

—because everybody recognizes the importance of the western farmer as a producer, as a consumer and also as a citizen. What is the criticism? It is first from the point of view of the western farmer that the government instead of marketing the grain has virtually become his competitor.

In several places in the course of his address the hon. member was very careful to ring in that old, old statement that he was not finding any fault with Mr. McFarland or with the system. He just charged Mr. McFarland with trying to bring glory upon himself and upon this government through his operations, and the hon. gentleman intimated that Mr. McFarland was prepared to risk the credit of this country and the failure of his venture simply in order to bring glory on himself and on the government which my hon. friend says Mr. McFarland serves. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the western Liberals are prepared to go before the people of western Canada and fight the next election on the issue of the operations of Mr. John I. McFarland, or on the issue of the Natural Products Marketing Act brought in by the Minister of Agriculture we gladly accept that challenge here and now; but I venture to say that they are not prepared to stake their political fortunes on either one of those issues or on both of them.

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, as I rise in my place this evening to make what perhaps will be my last address in the House of Commons I am full of conflicting emotions and thoughts. In all the welter of thought that was indulged in this afternoon about the great war I remembered, sir, that I was a humble private in the ranks, and since I have been in this parliament I have also been one of the humble privates sitting on the back benches supporting the present government led by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.

The thought that comes to my mind first of all is to thank my constituents for the great honour which they did me in electing me as their representative for the historic riding of Selkirk. It has been a great honour, Mr. Speaker, to serve that riding, and it has been a great honour to stand in the ranks of the Conservative party behind our Prime Minister. I have been heralded in the press during previous sessions as one of the radicals of the Conservative party. I am glad to-night that my party is the party of reform, and I am pleased to announce to my constituents and this country to-night that I am proud to be a Conservative. I remember, Mr. Speaker, that it was a Liberal-Conservative party that presided at the birth of confederation under Sir John A. Macdonald. I remember also that it was under a great leader of this party, Sir Robert Borden, that this country took its place among the nations of the world in the day of Armageddon when Canada became a nation in fact as well as in name. I would remind my constituents and the country this evening that in the midst of the greatest depression in the history of this dominion, in the midst of trials and difficulties the like of which this country has never known this great party to which I say again I am proud to belong is, under the leadership of Sir Richard Bedford Bennett, the party of reform.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sir?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I thank hon. members for that laugh. If any man ever deserved the title of "Sir," if ever a knighthood might justly be conferred upon a Canadian for the services he has rendered, no one deserves it better than Richard Bedford Bennett.

Under his leadership Canada has struck its tents in the valley of depression and is now marching forward on the highway of reform. Under his able leadership, assisted by his able associates, such as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), whose budget we are now debating, this country will yet reach a time and place when poverty will not work its awful havoc upon the Canadian people. Although perhaps it has been in the minds of many people in this country that it may have been hard for the hon. member for Selkirk to serve the Conservative party, I want to repeat that it is easy for him now because the Conservative party is the party of reform and progressive reconstruction.

I should like to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) in which he said that this was a policy of make believe and pretence. I admire the financial critic of the opposition, but as one soldier to another let me say to him that I think that statement was unworthy of a great soldier and a great Canadian. When one considers the difficulties which this country has been facing since 1930, when one realizes the efforts which this government has made to overcome the forces of depression which were world wide, I do not think anyone will agree with the hon. member when he says that our efforts at reform are make believe and pretence.

What is the position at the present time of the Liberal party? The Liberal party has now become the Tory party. I made this statement when I went home last year to my constituency. I said that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) had changed shoes; they had reversed their roles. We find the Liberal party now upholding the constitution while the Conservative party is leading the way to reform. Once again the Conservative party is the party of the people, as it always has been, in spite of the criticism and camouflage of our Liberal opponents.

Let us look at these questions of unemployment and relief. To-day the Prime Minister is lying ill in the Chateau Laurier. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the 1,250,000 Canadians who are on relief but I ask them: Who looked after those Canadians during the days of depression? Who warmed them against the winter's cold, who clothed them against the intemperate climate, who fed them in the face of starvation?

Mr. VALLANCE: Canada.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): The Conservative party under the leadership of Richard Bedford Bennett. I wonder if the time will ever come when this nation will render to the Prime Minister his due? I wonder if he will yet receive his just acclaim of praise instead of the dividends of abuse? I wonder if the credit of this country had been ruined what would have happened to the ten per cent of our population who have no employment or income?

What is the position to-day of the Liberal party? They laugh at the Conservative party when we try to improve our position in the markets of the world. They laugh at us when in fact we have improved our export trade by means of the Ottawa agreements. They ridicule our efforts at reform. I should like to quote to the house the words of the leader of the Liberal party in England, Sir Herbert Samuel. The condition which we as a nation are facing to-day is world wide. This condition was not born in Canada, it is the aftermath of the great war. It is unfair, it is untrue, it is not right for any Canadian public men to say that this situation is the result of Conservative policies. Who lost the markets of the world for Canada, and when were they lost? I ask hon. gentlemen opposite: Will the people of Canada trust you to find markets in adversity when you lost them in the days of prosperity?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Bring on the election.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Bring on the election; let us have power, not ideals or service. That is all hon. gentlemen opposite think about. I ask the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell): Who cares whether you are elected to this House of Commons? Who cares whether I am elected? Who cares whether any hon. member is elected? This country wants service, not contentious politics. This country does not want camouflage from the party which is supposed to be the party of reform.

What has happened to the Liberal party? We all know the position of that party. We all know that the markets of the world were closed to Canada during the regime of that party. We all know of Mr. Crerar, the gentleman who has been peddling his services all over Manitoba in search of nomination. What was his policy? He said that all the country needed was a crop of 500,000,000 bushels of wheat. Those are the economies of the Liberal party. What was the explanation given by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) as to what ought to be done in connection with the marketing of wheat? "Never mind the wheat market; the wheat will look after itself." That was his theory.

Mr. VALLANCE: It will if you leave it alone.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): That seems to be the policy of the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). I would not be surprised if he has not received considerable unearned wealth through the efforts of this government. I wonder if he is willing to stand up to-night and tell his constituents how much money went into his pockets because of the five cent bonus on wheat.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member is not blaming the government for the grasshoppers, is he?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): No, but the hon. member would if he could. That is about the only thing hon. members opposite have not tried to get away with.

Mr. VALLANCE: You have still that to your credit.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): When the Minister of Trade and Commerce stood in his place and asked the financial critic of the opposition the condition of world trade, what did he say? He said the answer was not ready. He knew the answer but he did not give it.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit, I said no such thing.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): You gave no answer.

Mr. RALSTON: I am raising a point of order. Will my hon. friend permit me to correct that statement? I did not say the answer was not ready. I made no such statement, and I know my hon. friend is a good enough sport and debater to retract that statement.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): You did not give any answer at all.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not what you said.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I am glad you have clarified the matter. You did not make any answer at all.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit a question now?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): No.

Mr. RALSTON: How does he expect me to clarify it?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Go ahead; ask me any question.

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of Trade and Commerce intimated that he did not want an interruption at that time. I was not supposed to make a speech in the middle of his.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): That answer is very much like the one you gave the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion).

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member should address the chair.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Yes, I will. Mr. Speaker, all my remarks are made through you. There is a pleading in law called confession and avoidance. My hon. friend has made no confession and he has avoided the answer. He has admitted to me that he made no answer.

I should like to quote from the Contemporary Review of March, 1935. This is what the leader of the Liberal party in England says about world conditions at the present time:

> The present generation takes no great satisfaction in the world as it finds it.

The Liberals of Canada should ponder this statement. The article continues:

> Gone is the complacency of the nineteenth century—the sense of stability, the solid faith in ordered projects. The great war shook like an earthquake the whole structure of our mental and material life. In the countries engaged in it ten millions of men were killed; many times that number wounded, blinded, gassed, infected with disease; twenty-six thousand million pounds were spent, blown into nothingness. Never were Shakespeare's lines more fully justified:
> Man, proud man .. like an angry ape,
> Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
> As make the angels weep.
> There followed an intense effort to build defences against another such catastrophe. But now the nations are beginning again the race of armaments, each against each; and that has ever proved the precursor of war. Already the countries of the world are spending at the rate of £2,500,000 a day upon their armaments; the figure is increasing steadily. In central Europe, in the far east, there is a widespread feeling of insecurity.
> Aftermath of the great war came the great depression—the commerce of the world halved in value:—

That is the statement I want the opposition to listen to and to remember. It is a statement which I would underline for the information of the people of this country. It is the answer to my honourable and learned friend who, had he not been so learned in the law and so acute in the pleas of confession and avoidance, would have realized the truth of it.

> —thirty million workers unemployed; vast numbers of people robbed of their life's savings by catastrophic monetary depreciation; foodstuffs burned or thrown into the sea in some places, people half starving in others; a drought, a plague of grasshoppers, the only relief to the agricultural markets; America and Asia glutted with raw materials, German industries stopped for the lack of them.
> In some countries which had been foremost in the ranks of civilization, absolutism usurps power.

"The commerce of the world halved in value"—that is the answer which the learned critic confessed that he did not make, because he made no answer. Looking at the problem of unemployment relief, I say, what a great work the Prime Minister and his government have done when we remember that 1,250,000 Canadians have been clothed, fed and sheltered during this depression. As I have said before, it is time that the government and the Prime Minister received something besides dividends of abuse. If you want to know what the magnitude of the problem is, let me relate a conversation I had with the Prime Minister three years ago, sitting beside him in this house, when there was agitation in the country about cutting off relief. I was worried about the situation in my own constituency, as many members were in regard to the constituency they represent, and I asked him whether what was reported was true. He put his hand on my shoulder and said, "James Stitt, we are going to feed the people." Has it been a little thing to feed, clothe and shelter 1,250,000 people during the world's greatest depression? I wonder whether you realize the magnitude of that task. Put these people in procession, coming up the hill in front of the Chateau Laurier, and how long do you think it would take them to pass by in files of four at the rate of three miles an hour, one yard apart? It would take them exactly twenty-seven days, walking eight hours a day, to pass by where the sleeper lies at the present time, the sleeper who led this house, and who gave the last measure of his devotion that these people might be looked after in this day of trial and poverty. The country does not realize what the problems have been. I stood up in my place and pleaded for public works and for the expenditure of money; we have all pleaded for it and wanted it. What did the Prime Minister say to me? He said, "If I destroy the credit of this country I shall not be able to borrow the money to feed the people." I think it is just about time the Canadian people began to ponder this question, to realize what a great service has been done during the last five years. You say that relief is not enough. I agree with you; relief is not enough. There is degradation and demoralization to every citizen who has to go on relief. But I ask every Canadian, every church member, every man in this country who professes Christianity, whether his charity has been equal to the effort that has been made by this government under its Christian Prime Minister. Let that truth sink into the minds and hearts of the Canadian people.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the hon. gentleman asking that question of me, in common with the rest of the members of this house?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I am willing to ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. POULIOT: If you ask me that question I will put one to you also.

Mr. ROWE: Answer his first.

Mr. POULIOT: I will answer his question, surely.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman asked a question of all hon. members of this house, and I want to ask him this question. Did the hon. member, for whom I have much personal regard, read or listen to the speech delivered in Montreal by his leader, in which he said—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a minute.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member may ask a question, but he may not interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the hon. gentleman this question—

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I think the hon. gentleman, according to calculations, has cost this country about $28,000 already this present session, and I do not think he has done very much to assist in the problems which we have been trying to solve.

Mr. POULIOT: Think of what the government has saved by not lending more money to Newfoundland, and the saving with regard to delay in nominations for the Senate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): This government has not been afraid of big business, and it has been absolutely fearless of political consequences. The dominating motive of the Prime Minister and the government has been to serve the people of Canada, to do what was right, to prevent disaster; and there has been little or no cooperation from the official opposition. Look at the price spreads commission. Was the Conservative government afraid to investigate big business? No; it was not afraid to investigate big business. Look at the reduction we made in interest rates. This party is called the henchman of the big interests. Why, we have saved in interest charges, in the refloating of loans maturing in Canada, nearly $15,000,000 a year. Look at the action of the government in relation to the banks. What a story can be told of bravery, of service, of absolute fearlessness of vested interests. But we receive no praise for this work. The other night the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) rose in his place and spoke about the transfer of the gold from the banks to the Bank of Canada. We have taken from the banks of Canada $39,000,000 worth of gold on the basis of $20.67 an ounce. We stand to make on that transaction somewhere in the neighbourhood of $25,000,000. Does that look like a government that is afraid of big business, that is afraid of the banks? Look at the agitation that was raised in parliament! The hon. member for St. James is smiling; I believe he rather opposed that.

An hon. MEMBER: He is not here.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I mean the chief whip of the opposition.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not smiling. I am listening to the hon. member and I am astounded.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I want to tell the country a conversation I had with the Prime Minister. I wondered whether the provisions were constitutional, whether we were going to get into a lawsuit or not. I wondered whether there would be delay and whether every embarrassment possible would be placed in the way of the government's obtaining that gold from the banks. The Prime Minister said to me: "It is just about time that this country found out who was running the country—the banks or the government." If the Liberal party or the Labour party or the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had passed legislation taking the gold from the banks and earmarking the profit on that gold for the Dominion of Canada, that fact would have been blazoned all over the country; it would have been looked upon as a most remarkable performance in the way of reform. One of the amazing points about the present situation is that the government has been almost afraid to advertise its virtues, almost reluctant to go out and tell the country just what these measures have meant in dollars and cents for the Canadian people.

Look at the work we have done for labour, and let the members of the Trades and Labour Congress pay attention to the remarks of their leader, Mr. Tom Moore, when he said: "This budget is a poor man's budget." We heard criticism the other day about the income tax rates. I wonder how many people in Canada know that if to-day a man has an income of $1,000,000, we take from him $527,000 in taxation. I wonder whether they realize that our rate of taxation on the higher incomes is greater than it is in Great Britain. Have we been given any praise for that?

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is no more money now.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): No more money! Well, we have found over $200,000,000 for unemployment relief; we have found money to guarantee the wheat pool operations, yes, and we have found money to guarantee the loans of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That matter is very easily explained to the people of Canada. I stated that this government was not afraid of public criticism; that it was not afraid of vested interests. Moreover it was not afraid to come to the assistance of a great corporation when it was necessary for the welfare of Canada that it should do so. What was the situation in connection with the $60,000,000 guarantee for the Canadian Pacific Railway? Its bonds were falling due in the United States, and under the laws of that country it was impossible for that company to refloat loans in order to pay back its obligations. What would have happened had the government not come to the assistance of the Canadian Pacific Railway and enabled it to borrow money from the banks?—for let it be remembered that the Canadian Pacific has passed its dividends and has been losing money. The Canadian Pacific would have gone into the hands of a receiver; it would have gone into the possession of foreign investors. What would have happened to labour on the Canadian Pacific; what would have happened to the rates of pay; what would have happened to the business fabric of this country, had the government not had the courage, in spite of the political criticism that could be raised against such an action, to come to the aid of that great corporation, one that means almost the very life of the country?

Taxation of higher incomes! This budget has been described as a brave budget. The Minister of Finance must be complimented upon the manner of its presentation and the comprehensive review he has made of Canadian affairs. We have the policy of reform and the eight hour day, minimum wage and unemployment insurance measures. I told my constituents when I was elected that I would support an unemployment insurance bill. Whoever supposed that a Conservative government would enact a measure of unemployment insurance? If the Liberal party had enacted such a measure, the press of the country would have hailed it as a great work of reform, a great law of social justice. Surely it is about time that the people of Canada realize the services which this government has rendered to the nation.

Before the eleven o'clock adjournment, I ought to thank the Conservative party for the liberty they have given me, the freedom I have had within the party. I wonder how many members of the Liberal opposition have ever had the freedom that the member for Selkirk has had. Last year from my place I asked for reduction of interest rates, for the issuance of $100,000,000 of new money, for $50,000,000 worth of public works. What is the answer? We have had the policy of reform; we have had reduction of interest rates; we have had the issuance of new money to the extent of $50,000,000, and we have had an unemployment relief works policy aggregating $40,000,000.

On motion of Mr. Stitt (Selkirk) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 2, 1935.

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PRESENTATION OF REPORTS AND STATEMENTS OF AUDITORS ON RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP OPERATIONS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house the annual report of the Canadian National Railways system; the annual reports of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Canadian National Steamships; report on the accounts of the Canadian National Railways system, in English and French, by the auditors, George A. Touche and Company; report on the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and on the Canadian National Steamships, subsidiary companies, in English and French, by George A. Touche and Company; also a report on the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways system by George A. Touche and Company.

May I add that the annual reports of the Canadian National Railways and of the steamships are in printed form, and are being placed in the post office boxes of all hon. members and senators. The reports supplied by Touche and Company are typewritten documents which are being circulated to the members of the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned and operated by the government. All of the foregoing reports will be referred to that committee for consideration.

PACIFIC COAST SHIPPING

EMPLOYMENT OF WHITE SEAMEN IN PREFERENCE TO ORIENTALS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, on January 28, of this year there was a discussion of a resolution offered by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) regarding the employment of white seamen on Pacific coast steamers. After a somewhat lengthy discussion in which hon. members from all quarters of the house took part there was unanimous agreement by the house and by the government that the resolution of the hon. member, with all its implications, should be referred to the committee on industrial relations. However, either through an omission on the part of an officer of the house or because of the wording of my motion the result was that the resolution was deleted and only the preamble presented to the committee.

Therefore with the unanimous consent of the house, which was given on the former occasion and which I have no doubt will now be given, I move:

That the amendment adopted by the house on January 28 last to the motion of Mr. Reid in respect to employment of white Canadian citizens on ships, as follows:

"That all the words after 'that' in the last paragraph be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

'the resolution be referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations'" be rescinded, and the following substituted therefor:

"the question of employment of greater numbers of white Canadian citizens on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registry, the owners of which receive grants of money from the public treasury of Canada, be referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations."

Motion agreed to.

THE KING'S SILVER JUBILEE

STATEMENT FROM LONDON CONVEYING WISH OF HIS MAJESTY AS TO CELEBRATION IN UNITED KINGDOM AND DOMINIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the general interest in the question as to what bodies might send representatives to the King's jubilee ceremonies in the United Kingdom I thought it best to send a cable in order to obtain the necessary information. I have received the following reply:

"It is the King's wish that the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of His Majesty's accession to the throne should be on a local basis, and that His Majesty's subjects should, wherever practicable, have the opportunity of observing the occasion near their homes. While any visitors from overseas, who may have occasion to be present in London at the time, would naturally have an opportunity of sharing with the people of the United Kingdom in celebrations here, invitations to participate in those celebrations as guests of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom have, so far as the dominions are concerned, been issued only to Prime Ministers and, in view of the character of the celebrations as described above, it is not proposed to invite further official guests."

CONFERENCE IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): While my right hon. friend the leader of the government is touching on the question of the jubilee ceremonies in London, may I ask him if I am right in understanding that there is not to be anything in the nature of an imperial conference while these celebrations take place? I have heard that at most it was expected that there might be something in the nature of informal conversations between representatives of the dominions who might gather together in London, but I assume that nothing will be said or done there which in any way will bind this parliament or country by those who may be representing it.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I think the right hon. gentleman is correct in suggesting that there will be only informal conversations but I will make certain of that and give the house the information.

OYSTER FISHERY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) asked a question about oyster fishing to which I promised an answer.

Oyster fishing in East, West and North rivers which flow into Charlottetown harbour, Hillsboro bay, Prince Edward Island, has not been closed.

The regulations that will govern oyster fishing therein are at the moment receiving particular consideration because of the questions of health involved.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION

COLLECTION OF DUES TO APPLY TOWARDS MAINTENANCE BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT OF SHIPPING SAFEGUARDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): I would like to ask the Minister of Marine if he intends to proceed with the resolution appearing under No. 22 on to-day's order paper, with respect to the collection of shipping dues by the Canadian government.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I did not know, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend was interested in the matter, but I may tell him that I am getting some further information in view of the discussion that took place when the resolution was before the house. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. RINFRET: Thank you.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday April 1, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment of Mr. Ralston, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coote.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, last evening in the course of my remarks in this debate I paid some attention to the criticisms which were made by the official critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). I desire now to direct the attention of the house and of all western grain growers particularly to a few words which that hon. gentleman spoke, and which will be found at page 2116 of Hansard. Among other things he said:

> We find that in the fall of 1934 the prices of Canadian wheat in the British market—were something like 22 cents above Argentina and something like 14 cents above Australia. What has been the result? In the first place the dominion as it wanted to do, shared with the western wheat producer in the responsibility for marketing the 1930 crop, and nobody finds any fault with that action; both parties joined in approval of it.

A little further on he says:

> What is the criticism? What do I mean by that? I mean that the government through Mr. John I. McFarland, who is its agent, becomes in effect the potential holder of 200,000,000 or 225,000,000 or 250,000,000 bushels of wheat that should be off the market in order to enable the western producer to dispose of his 1935 crop.

Here we have it in the words of the official critic of the opposition that the price of our wheat in the British market is 22 cents above the Argentina price and something like 14 cents above the Australian price. Was that to the advantage of the western producer? Was that something done in the interests of the grain grower? What is the hon. gentleman's solution? He says that this wheat ought to be off the market. In other words, his policy would have been to dispose of the wheat. What then would have happened to the western producer?

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this party and its supporters ought to proclaim throughout western Canada every such word of criticism against the activities of this government in upholding the price of wheat for the producer.

Mr. VALLANCE: What did Australia do with her wheat?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. VALLANCE: I won't sit down. What did Australia do with her wheat?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I believe that the western grain producer is not so much interested in what Australia did with her wheat as he is in what we are doing with ours.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are not doing much.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): We are not adopting a laissez-faire policy anyway. I notice that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth quotes as his authority for what ought to be done the Financial Post. I wonder how much the editor of the Financial Post or the barons of St. James street are interested in the welfare of the western producer.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Ask your government.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): There has been a great deal of discussion to the effect that the Conservative party is the servant of the vested interests.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): "Hear, hear," my opponents say. I answer "there, there." Who are they in this house who first raised their voices against the policy of this government of helping the farmers on the land? Who are they in this house who have come to the aid of the bank? Who are they in this house who have tried to prevent us from taking the gold from the banks and ear-marking for the benefit of Canada the profit on that gold? Were we the henchmen of the vested interests when we undertook and carried through that legislation? I say no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have we got the profit on that gold yet?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): We have the gold, every bit of it, and we can get the profit any time. I have paid some attention to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. Although I disagree with him, I want to pay my respects to him as a member of this house, as a lawyer, and as a soldier with a gallant military record overseas, but Mr. Speaker, if his policy were carried into effect I believe that bankruptcy would be suffered by every grain producer in western Canada. The last thing that the farmers of western Canada want us to adopt is a policy of laissez-faire, to leave them at the mercy of the manipulators of the market.

There is a resolution on the order paper for the establishment of a grain board. I stated last evening that this government was not afraid of big business, and the legislation which the government has brought down proves it. Were we the champions of the big interests when we reduced the interest rates by our conversion loans, when we brought down the average rate of interest from over five per cent to under three and a half per cent, saving the taxpayers of this country over $15,000,000 per year in interest? Were we the servants of the big interests when we enacted the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, when we gave to the debt-ridden farmers of western Canada some opportunity to get rid of the heavy and burdensome debts which were driving them into economic servitude? Were we the henchmen of the big interests when we enacted minimum wage legislation, when we enacted the eight hour day and when we enacted the Unemployment Insurance Act?

I do not know that I have time to give the complete record of this government but I should like to outline some of the legislation which has been passed for the benefit of the people. First, there was unemployment relief; second, there was the reduction of interest rates; there was the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the Canadian Farm Loan Act, the wheat bonus, the legislation in connection with the marketing of wheat, unemployment relief works, loans to the provinces and amendments to the Currency Act whereby $50,000,000 of new money was produced. Millions of dollars have been voted for public works; $20,000,000 the first session and $40,000,000 last year. Legislation was passed to bring into being the eight hour day and there is yet to be considered the minimum wage legislation. This government has passed the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Bank of Canada Act. It has increased imperial preference and has conducted an investigation in connection with price spreads. The marketing act was passed along with other reform legislation. This government brought into being the Ottawa agreements and is enacting pensions for the blind.

I think it is time that every hon. member who is supporting this administration should stand behind the government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). The Prime Minister has waited upon this country; during the present dilemma which has faced the country he has given the complete measure of his devotion. He has waited upon us and we should wait upon him. We are glad to know that he is recovering and will soon be back to lead the forces of reconstruction.

I believe my time is about up. With the permission of the house I should like to say just a few more words. I want to thank every hon. member for the manner in which he has listened to what I have had to say. I feel that I have friends on both sides of the house and among the independent group. I have considered it a great privilege to be here and I hope I have learned something and I trust I have contributed a little to the debate of this house. In conclusion I should like to pay a tribute to the Prime Minister although it is almost impossible to find the language with which to express my admiration for him. He is a man of giant intellect, he has been most unselfish in giving his health and strength to the welfare of his country. I believe in the words of Disraeli, that he has been a Conservative to preserve all that is good and a radical to remove all that was bad. I believe that I express the wish of every Canadian who loves his country when I say that I hope he will soon be restored to health and be again able to lead his party. In February, 1932, when I seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I quoted some lines which I should like to repeat. At this time they refer most appropriately to our beloved leader:

> I vow to thee, my country—all earthly things above—
> Entire and whole and perfect, the service of my love,
> The love that asks no question; the love that stands the test;
> That lays upon the altar the dearest and the best:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the eloquent tribute paid to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) by the previous speaker, (Mr. Stitt, Selkirk), and I am glad to concur in what he has said. I listened to the long list of government achievements which he gave and while I have no desire to take issue with him as to the achievements of the government, having supported most of the things he mentioned. I would point out that notwithstanding these achievements our problem is still with us. Our people are still unemployed, our people are still hungry in the midst of a great abundance of food. Our debts both private and public are growing at an alarming rate and the depression is just about where it was. I am not laying all the blame for this upon the government, I merely wish to show that notwithstanding the achievements of this government the main economic problem of Canada is still unsolved. I think we must concur in the declaration contained in the amendment moved by the opposition, that the policy of the government has been inadequate. I cannot see any reason why the government itself could not concur in that. It must be aware that its policies have proved inadequate, as have the policies of all other governments. So far as I know this government has never tried to prove that its policies were adequate; it has simply contended that its policies were as good as could be put forward in view of all the circumstances. There may be some room for argument in that but I do not think there is any room for argument when we claim that the policies of the government have been inadequate to meet the great economic problem which confronts Canada and all other countries. The budget may be regarded as just as good a budget as it is probably possible to bring forward as long as we adhere to capitalism and are tied to the orthodox system of financing.

Turning now to the proposal, or rather lack of proposals on the part of the opposition in the amendment they moved to the budget. I question very much whether the opposition is in position to do any better than the government. My doubt is based upon the fact that the opposition endorses the continuation of the capitalistic system. In season and out of season they have protested against any interference with laissez faire and they are the champions of the present-day orthodox monetary policy. As long as they hold these things, I suggest to this house that they are utterly incapable of bringing about improvements under the present system; and if you notice the amendment which was moved by the opposition I think you will find that it speaks eloquently in support of my contention. The amendment reminds me very much of an incident which took place in the dry belt some years ago. A farmer living in the dry belt in Alberta was visited by his mother in law in 1930 and it happened that all the time she was there it rained; it rained almost throughout her visit. In 1932 she returned and again it rained nearly all the time she was there. Therefore this farmer associated the visit of his mother in law with the rain, so that in 1934, when the dry spell came on, he wired to Ontario for his mother in law and she, anxious to be of assistance, returned to the west in all haste. She stayed twice as long as she did before and it did not rain, and it has not rained yet. The Liberal party is very much like that. They have associated what they call prosperity with their terms in office in previous years, and so they superstitiously conclude that all that is necessary is to return them to power and prosperity will come again. But I suggest that there is just as little hope of that as there was of the farmer getting rain by the return of his mother in law. Here is the Liberal amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house regrets that the proposals submitted by the Minister of Finance on March 22 are entirely inadequate to meet the serious and acute situation prevailing in Canada—

We all agree with that. I do not see how there can be any serious objection to that statement. But what is to be done about it? And here is where I think in all seriousness that we have a right to expect a little more from the party which expects to be in power in a very few months in this country. I continue from the amendment:

—and afford an additional reason why appeal to the people should not be longer delayed.

Apparently the sole remedy which the Liberal party has for these conditions to which it has alluded in the amendment, and for which it deplores the inadequacy of the government policy, is to have an election. Now there is surely no great remedy in an election. Does the Liberal party expect to find on the hustings a policy which will be adequate to meet these economic conditions? Is it not more in keeping with the practice in this country that the party that expects to be honoured by the vote of the nation shall go to that nation with a policy for which it seeks endorsement? Now what is the policy which the party that expects to be the government in a very short time intends to submit to the people of Canada? If it is merely a matter of having an election, we do not need the Liberal party for that because that has already been settled by constitutional practice. The election will come along in due course, without the Liberal party. But surely everyone will agree that it is not so much the election we want as what the election will settle; and if the election is going to put the Liberal party in the position of the present government, without a policy, and adhering as it does to every error which has marked the failure of the present administration, then what can we expect by a change of government?

I submit that it is scarcely honest to have the people of Canada assume that the inadequacy of the present budget will be made good merely by a change of government, when the party which expects to take office holds tenaciously to the same errors as the party relinquishing office holds. The subamendment on the other hand agrees with the Liberals that the budget is inadequate, and I think the government could very well afford to agree with that view without impairing any of its high claims for its activities and achievements. But we in this corner have proposed a remedy. Our subamendment reads:

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after the word "Canada" and adding thereto the following:

"and would appear to be based upon the assumption that poverty and debt are inevitable conditions within the country; and whereas the real and potential wealth of the nation, based upon our natural resources and our capacity to produce, is such as to make possible an abundant provision for all the requirements of our people;

Therefore, this house is of the opinion that the government should take immediate action to insure the fullest and most equitable distribution possible of our socially-created wealth and that, as a first step in this direction, the measures which may be necessary to meet the pressing needs of the farmers and the unemployed should be financed by the social credit of Canada, thus avoiding a further increase in the debt burden of the country."

I submit at the outset that that remedy is one which will very soon have to be accepted not only by this government but by all governments in the world. I make that prediction because in my opinion there is only one alternative to that, and that is to witness the complete collapse of civilization itself. We make this suggestion then to the government, and we solicit the support also of the opposition for a policy applied to the only problem in Canada, the problem of distributing the abundance which our natural resources, our skilled mechanics and our technical equipment make possible to our people. This proposal assumes that there is enough and to spare of every commodity essential to life, to supply every person indefinitely; but that there is too little money in the hands of the consumers to permit the proper distribution of these essential commodities to be made. Now if that assumption is not true, how do we explain the fact that there are thousands of idle people, who surely should be employed in producing more goods if there is a scarcity of anything that we need? Let me refer for a moment to the words of the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) spoken a very short time ago:

Canada is behind in its normal construction between $600,000,000 and $900,000,000. From the ten years from 1925 to 1934 its average annual construction bill was $326,000,000, but in 1933 projects were valued at only $90,000,000.

Continuing, he said:

Why in the name of heaven do we not go to work? I will tell you why—because the credit of the country is in the control of a very small number of men and is not actually available except at costs that are too high or on conditions that are too onerous.

Further, he says:

During the past fifteen years there has been an increased concentration of funds in the hands of such corporations as life insurance companies and trust and loan companies. From 1924 to 1933 the amount invested in these concerns has increased from $2,200,000,000 to $5,130,000,000, a percentage increase of 133.

The inadequacy of purchasing power and the concentration of credit in the hands of large corporations account for the failure of this and other governments to meet the needs of the people of the world at the present time. How otherwise would you explain, except on the basis of abundance, the destruction of such quantities of goods as were destroyed by the nations of the world in 1934, not to speak of the tremendous further amounts of goods which might have been added to production had our resources of man-power, machinery, plant equipment and raw material been used to capacity? I noticed that even the Ottawa Journal gave a brief, though inadequate, summary of some of the goods destroyed in 1934. It says:

> In 1934 nations destroyed millions of dollars worth of goods and foodstuffs while millions of people lacked clothing and food. Holland buried 15,000,000 flower bulbs and destroyed 2,000,000 sows and 4,000,000 little pigs; Denmark incinerated 25,000 cattle. In New Zealand 5,000 lambs were driven into the sea. In the United States every third row of cotton was "ploughed in." Brazil destroyed 26,000,000 bags of coffee—

And so the story goes. That is not by any means a complete list, but it does indicate the insanity of a world that does not know what to do with too much, that has no policy applicable to too much but only knows how to act when it has too little and thus seeks to restrict production and destroy goods in order to bring about an artificial condition of scarcity so that statesmen may know their way about. To my mind that is a fair statement of the policies of nearly all governments to-day.

So much, then, for the assumption that there is an abundance of supplies. As to the other assumption contained in our amendment, that there is too little money, I think the fact that there has been a shortage of money for purchasing power has been very adequately and emphatically demonstrated. I direct the attention of this house once more to the analyses and the mathematical demonstration of Major Hugh Douglas, of London, who I think has shown more completely and more thoroughly than any other economist of his time the scarcity of money and the causes of that scarcity. But he is by no means the only one who has demonstrated that fact. Foster and Catching have demonstrated it in the United States; Kitson, Keynes, Right Hon. Reginald McKenna and numerous others have proved beyond the shadow of a doubt to every intelligent student of the question that there is not sufficient money in circulation at a given time to buy the goods on the shelves at the prices at which those goods are marked, and that while that is so those goods cannot be distributed.

Time does not permit a recapitulation of the data to prove that point mathematically. I turn from the scientific statement of the case to the fact that must be staring every man in the face, a fact which I think the people of Canada know very well; it is that they have not the money in their pockets with which to supply their needs, while the goods they need are sitting on the shelves of the warehouses of the country and their stomachs are empty and their backs are bare. There is no argument or scientific demonstration that is more effective than the actual, practical fact that the people see the goods, that they are ready to produce more but have not the money with which to distribute them.

Then if we want a real, practical proof, we need only turn to the relief policies of the government. What do they amount to? They amount to this, that the government have undertaken to borrow money which otherwise would not be put into circulation and to apply that money to nonproductive pursuits, so that in their continuation of certain public policies and public services—which may be all to the good—they have been able to distribute money as wages to the people engaged in those projects. By doing such work the government have placed no goods upon the market to offset the money that has been distributed, and to that extent they have slightly increased purchasing power. But apart from the inadequacy of that policy so far as sufficient purchasing power is concerned, what is the inevitable result? The inevitable result of that policy is the utter crash of the system, for every penny that is so circulated among the unemployed on relief projects has been borrowed, and the borrowing of that money naturally increases our debts. Our debts now are terrific; they cannot be paid as they stand at the moment, and as we increase them and as they grow larger through interest charges compounded, we hasten towards the inevitable abyss. Let me just direct the attention of the house to the growth of debt during three centuries. In the seventeenth century the debt of the world increased 47 per cent. In the eighteenth century the debt increased 466 per cent; in the nineteenth century it increased 12,000 per cent and I venture to state that in the twentieth century it will increase 12,000 times 12,000 per cent. So, Mr. Speaker, the speed of our debt creation increases by every year of time, just as the velocity of an object falling through the air increases with every inch it travels towards the ground.

Let me turn now, sir, to a brief summary of the economic situation in relation to purchasing power. Goods manufactured and sold at a profit cannot be bought back with the wages paid those who have produced them. This is chiefly so because much of the money that was employed in the purchase of raw materials and in the payment of wages for production was borrowed money, or credits created by the banks, and as soon as the goods then produced were sold those debts were repaid. Being repaid they were cancelled and being cancelled they were not available to buy the goods which they were employed in producing. So there must remain on the shelves, unpurchasable through lack of money, goods which cannot be moved unless some auxiliary supply of money be found somewhere.

To make the situation worse machinery is becoming more and more automatic as the industrial process goes on, and the use of solar power, steam, oil, gas, electricity has not only made it possible to produce sufficient goods with a very much reduced number of workers, but has vastly increased production, in some instances far beyond the capacity of the people to consume even if they had the money to buy the goods, which they have not. Moreover the tendency is towards further mechanical progress, which will still further reduce the number of workers required and further increase output. The fact that those who are employed do not receive and never have received sufficient income under the profit system to buy even the necessities of life, much less the entire output, together with the additional fact that machinery is displacing thousands from every industry, thus depriving a large percentage of the population of any income at all, has resulted in vast amounts of goods going to waste unused while millions are in want. This condition of more goods than money intensifies competition among producers, and compels them further to reduce wages and further to supplant workers with every conceivable labour-saving device, which courses of action still further intensify the problem.

Being unable to find markets at home through lack of purchasing power as I have described, the producers of all nations enter into keener competition for whatever foreign market there may be; thus the economic basis of war. Those who look upon the situation in Europe to-day, as well as in the east, must come to the conclusion that there is grave danger that the events of 1914 may very soon be repeated. This situation has become so acute that something must be done, and if governments will not heed and take intelligent and constitutional action it is altogether likely that the masses of people, driven by desperation, sooner or later will take unconstitutional and unintelligent action. It is in order to prevent such unreasoned and dangerous action that from time to time during the last fourteen years I have urged with all the sincerity that I possess, upon whichever party was in power, that they take some definite action on this question. Both parties continue to drift, they hope that we may drift into something better. I noticed the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in his admirable budget speech indicated that we were drifting out of the depression in the same way we drifted into it, I think he suggested by natural causes. I cannot express my—I was going to say contempt for that view, I hope the minister will realize that the term has no application for him personally, but I have nothing but contempt for the view that we can drift into prosperity. I am as firmly convinced as that I am in this house at this moment that if we are to attain prosperity we must plan our way, that our plans must be based upon economic truths and facts of the present time, and that such plans must be worked out by the application of established scientific principles.

The attitude of bankers and industrialists and bondholders is one of economic fascism. That is to say they want to restrict production to the limits of an unsound money theory, the theory or doctrine which bases money on one commodity only, famed for its scarcity, rather than basing the medium of exchange on commodities generally. Thus they cheat the people of all the advantages of industrial progress, maintain the multitudes in a state of semi-starvation in order that they may continue to hold to an unjustifiable superstition about the relation of money to gold. They further carry their fascistic notions to the restriction of the use of machinery as far as possible so as to employ as many people as possible and to distribute wages as widely as possible for doing unnecessary work. Now that viewpoint is so absurd as to be unworthy of comment. A section of the community, some of the working class who have suffered more under this insane system than any other class, are becoming impatient and demand complete and immediate revolution. They are not prepared to wait for constitutional action, they want to smash all opposition by ruthless force. Now I do not hold with that, I would fight that with all the powers I have, but we have to face the fact that there is a considerable and growing number of Canadians who take that position. Another group, the group to which I belong, hold another view with respect to this question of purchasing power and the Canadian economic problem. We are a small group in this house, composed of representatives of organized farmers and labourers and other groups. We regard the problem chiefly as one of making available to the consumer enough purchasing power to equal the total prices of all commodities that are for sale, and we regard provision of the required amount of purchasing power as the most advisable next step, since it will bring about the immediate distribution of the goods required to satisfy the wants of the community and thus prevent revolution and give us time to think out succeeding steps in a fundamental economic and social reconstruction. We say that the major trouble in Canada to-day is faulty distribution, and money in the pockets of the consumer is the surest way to bring about distribution of goods. We claim that there is no difficulty in obtaining ample supplies of all the necessities of life, if people only had the money to buy them. We regard social credit as a source capable of providing money and at the same time an adequate method of distributing it wherever it is required.

What then is this social credit to which I refer? The real credit of the nation we regard as consisting of its power to produce and deliver goods as, when and where required. Secondly, the extent to which credit may be used for purchasing power equals the sum of the price of the goods available for distribution, and there can be no such thing as inflation so long as money can be redeemed in goods at the prevailing prices. Thirdly we believe that a metallic or gold basis should be abandoned completely, and that the basis of all money should be goods and services, and not any single commodity, metallic or otherwise. To provide all the goods required for consumption is the object of production, in the view of those who advocate a proper use of social credit, and to distribute goods, not create employment, is the problem of to-day. Proper distribution of goods through an adequate supply of money may be said to be the chief aim of this doctrine. We regard it as impossible under the profit system to distribute sufficient money in the form of wages to buy back the goods produced, therefore we must augment the purchasing power of the people by some other method. What we propose is that purchasing power shall be distributed as dividends freely to the consumer, so that it will operate as purchasing power and not as capital investment, as is customary under the present monetary system. To-day all credits appear first as investment, loans made to production, and being paid back thereby cancel the means available for the purchase of goods.

"Where is the national dividend to come from" is the question so often asked those who advocate this method of increasing the purchasing power of the nation. May I point out that we regard the great increases of production during the capitalistic period as accruing chiefly from three sources, first association in production, secondly through mechanical inventions and thirdly through the use of solar power. All of these are social. We have increased production tremendously by association. I must not take time to demonstrate that fact, but I think all hon. members will agree that by specialization and by organization of industry, and even by international trade we have vastly increased the capacity of the world to produce.

Then, second, all will agree that machines do not belong to any individual. Machines have histories, some of them centuries old. Contributions have been made to their development by a great many people of all nations. Those people have died and left their contributions as a heritage to mankind. They are the social heritage. Machine equipment, all inventions, all discoveries, all knowledge whatsoever are the heritage of people now living and since all these things contribute tremendously to our capacity for production they form a true basis of social credit from which every individual has a right to draw.

Finally, solar power belongs to no individual; it is nature's gift to all living creatures. All these combined account for increased production over the hand craftsmanship of pre-industrial periods. Together they form the source from which we have the moral, the economic and if you like, the divine right to draw purchasing power in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole. That is the source of the proposed national dividend.

"How are we to prevent inflation" is the next question. I shall have time to say only a word on this point. The social credit proposal prevents inflation which would naturally follow the issuance of such quantities of money under the present system. We propose to prevent inflation by the application of a mathematical formula known as the just price. The main point to be observed in this connection is that the ratio between production and consumption is held at a given level. The principle is that prices will not rise—cannot rise—if there are always goods on the market sufficient to redeem the money available for purchasing power.

There was money for war—any amount of it. There will be any amount of money for the next war. From where did we get it? If we quote the Macmillan report we will discover how it was issued.

> It is not unnatural to think of the deposits of a bank as being created by the public, through the deposit of cash representing either savings or amounts which are not for the time being required to meet expenditures. But the bulk of the deposits arise out of the action of the banks themselves, for by granting loans, allowing money to be drawn on an overdraft or purchasing securities a bank creates a credit in its books, which is the equivalent of a deposit.

That is the principle by which money was provided for the war, and the real basis of the provision was the power of the people of Canada to produce and to deliver two billion dollars worth of goods—which they did. But Sir Thomas White describes it more aptly when he states:

> During the war Canada surprised not only herself but the world when her people subscribed for war bonds twice as much money as there was in Canada, and then we had ample money left with which to carry on a growing business.

Now, sir, I wish Canada to subscribe now twice as much money as there is in Canada to keep the people of this country from starvation, and to save us from having to destroy the goods which we have produced in order to keep somebody else making more of those goods, in order that we may destroy them again. I demand of this parliament and government money for life; I demand money for peace; I demand money for construction. We had money for war, money for death and money for destruction. In the name of God why can't we have money for life, for construction and for peace? We can have it just as soon as the opposition says so, just as soon as the government says so, just as soon as this house comes to its senses this question can be solved. But so long as we play the political game which both the budget and the opposition amendment indicate we are not going to get very far.

I look to a crusade against hunger, against scarcity, and I ask every man in this house —and the lady member, too—who believes in this monetary reform policy, who regards it as a first step towards new economics made necessary and possible by abundance, to rise in their seats and to vote for the subamendment which proposes the only intelligent and constructive suggestion offered thus far in the present session towards meeting the needs of the Canadian people.

One sentence more. I would suggest that the government take note of what Alberta has done. The government of that province has invited the only man who knows how to handle this subject to deal with it. But the province of Alberta has no control over monetary policy; this government has. Give the Alberta government your right hand of support; give Alberta the power to deal with the question, if you will not deal with it yourselves, and let us all join together in working out a monetary policy. Let us not quibble over technical details, but get together on a great crusade for feeding the people of Canada out of the abundance which is ours.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I do not care to follow in detail the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Irvine) who has preceded me, because I believe time would not permit. I always listen to him with great interest, because upon all occasions he seems sincere and has the faculty of warming up to his subject. I can agree with the preliminary part of his speech in which he dealt with the amendment offered by the official opposition, and with his statement that the amendment is of a negative character. I do not believe however the people of Canada are prepared to go to the limits he has advocated, namely, that of accepting complete socialism. I would judge that if hon. members in his section of the house are sincere they would support the government in the measures of reform which have been offered.

Miss MACPHAIL: We have done that.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Furthermore they should do so because there is no possibility either at the present time or in the near future of the party composed of hon. members in the extreme left hand corner of the chamber having power.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Don't be so sure.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Therefore I say they should endeavour to get half a loaf which is better than no bread.

There have been some interesting speeches in the debate. Hon. members on this side of the chamber have expressed satisfaction with and confidence in the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and in the government of which he is a member. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) did not offer very much support, but of course we did not expect it. He criticized the budget—and meekly so, in my opinion.

I should like briefly to indicate my support and approval of the budget. May I first congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the very comprehensive and detailed statement he presented concerning dominion affairs. His presentation was one in which we may find satisfaction and reason for confidence in the future, and for the belief that we will soon have a return to normalcy both in financial and trade matters, and as regards prices, employment, production and distribution. If these factors can be brought back to normalcy we will have a return of that condition described as prosperity.

I listened with interest to the speech of the official critic of the opposition. I have used the term "interest" because if the hon. member had any constructive suggestion or any better policy to offer, that was his opportunity to do so. But what did he do? He offered nothing other than that concerning which the hon. member for Wetaskiwin has just spoken, namely negative suggestions. There is nothing in the political arena easier than to sit on opposition benches and criticize the government. The budget speech always offers that opportunity. The observations of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth were negative and offered nothing by way of leadership or policy in this, the most critical period of Canada's economic readjustment.

I claim there was no excuse on this occasion for the lack of constructive suggestions demonstrated in the observations of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. He made it clear that to-day the Liberal party is in a state of political barrenness and that it has nothing to offer. At times his criticisms were unfair and inconsistent, he blew hot and cold but of course in these respects they were running true to form. He made it clear that as of yore we may expect dissertations on the iniquities of the tariff. While listening to his quotations from the speeches made by the present Prime Minister in 1930 I was wondering what would have happened to the opposition if they had not been able to use those quotations in their speeches.

Time will not permit me to go into great detail respecting many of the important measures which have passed the house during the last four years, nor will I have time to review in detail the record of the government. I should like briefly however to discuss a few matters which particularly affect agriculture. My interest in such matters is greater because I represent one of the most outstanding and most important agricultural constituencies in Canada. What did this government find upon taking office on August 7, 1930. One of our greatest problems was brought about by the fact that we had lost our markets. I would not be so unfair as to charge any government with being wholly responsible for the loss of markets because I know there was a world condition which made marketing of primary products a difficult procedure. But if hon. members opposite are charging this government with the responsibility I say we must meet the argument with a counter charge. In the last year they were in office, particularly when the Hon. Charles Dunning was Minister of Finance, we can quote their own language to convict them.

But, Mr. Speaker, when this government took office it immediately gave attention to the problems that were of an emergency character and had to be dealt with, the railway problem, relief, unemployment, and the financial problem, and when the government had set about putting their house in order by dealing with these problems, they then undertook to find markets for our primary products. What steps did they take? They endeavoured to make agreements or trade treaties which were real treaties and meant something. As a result we have the United Kingdom agreement. If I had time to compare the results of some of the agreements and treaties that have been made by this government with those that were made by the former government, it would be seen that the comparison was very favourable to this government. Take the New Zealand treaty, for example, a treaty under which during the last three months it was in force 4,480,000 pounds of New Zealand butter was permitted to enter Canada, or half a pound for every man, woman and child in this country. That treaty was so unjust to Canadian trade that the late government gave notice of its cancellation as their last act before leaving office.

I would also call the attention of the house, as has often been done before, to the fact that during the last five years of Liberal rule in this dominion United States tariffs mounted against the importation of Canadian products into that country by leaps and bounds until in May, 1930, we had the Hawley-Smoot tariff which completely closed the door to Canadian primary products. Those were the words used by the right hon. leader of the opposition himself (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he was speaking on this subject in May, 1930. I am now going to give a list of some commodities and the rates of duty imposed upon them by the United States government when they entered that country from Canada. I have a list here of fifty articles but I shall quote only seven or eight and give the rate of duty prevailing as at the end of May in each of the following years, 1921, 1926 and 1930:

United States Rates of Duty on Imports from Canada at end of May in each of the following years

Commodities—	1921	1926	1930
Cattle	Free	Less than 1,050 lbs. 1½c.; 1,050 and over 2c.	2½ and 3c.
Sheep	Free	$2 per head	$3
Wheat	Free	30c. per bush.	42c.
Bacon	Free	2c. per lb.	3¼c.
Beef	Free	3c. per lb.	6c.
Poultry	2c.	6c. per lb.	10c.
Butter	2½c.	12c. per lb.	14c.
Cream	Free	20c. per gal.	56c.
Eggs	Free	8c. per doz.	10c.

That will show you how the United States tariff mounted against our primary products in the last few years previous to 1930, with not a word of protest from the government of the day. It is interesting also to note just what that meant to Canada, and in that connection I am going to quote the figures of our exports of these products to the United States in 1929:

Canadian Exports to the United States in 1929

Milk	Gallons 3,753,000
Milk powder	Pounds 1,000,000
Cream	Gallons 2,833,000
Cheese	Pounds 7,411,900
Bacon and pork, fresh or salted	Pounds 7,213,700
Butter	Pounds 231,400
Cattle	Head 217,436

It will readily be appreciated what it must have meant to the domestic market when this great quantity of milk and dairy products and these herds of cattle were turned back into the domestic market, particularly when I draw to the attention of the house that ninety-five per cent of our primary products are consumed in the domestic market and only the surplus of five per cent practically is exported, but when that surplus of five per cent is turned back into the domestic market it regulates the price of the other ninety-five per cent. When the United States put up their duties as I have shown, that surplus was turned back into the domestic market and the prices of these commodities fell drastically. But as I said before, this government in 1932 had negotiated the United Kingdom agreement to take care of part of that surplus, and in each of the years 1932 and 1933 we exported under the United Kingdom agreement in the neighbourhood of 50,000 head of cattle to Great Britain, thanks to the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture in getting space for them on the boats. In 1929 there was not a single animal shipped alive overseas, and none of the boats were fitted to take them over alive. We also shipped seventy million pounds of bacon to the United Kingdom, one-quarter of our quota, and this last item alone meant a sum of $26,000,000 in the pockets of the hog raisers of Canada. That statement was given before the price spreads committee by the president of the Canada Packers. We also shipped to the United Kingdom market eggs, fruit, fish, lumber and many other primary products. I have not time to give a list of them or the quantities. I will only say that these exports assisted our primary producers very materially.

The Finance minister has given figures to show the increase in our trade with the United Kingdom under the United Kingdom agreement. This shows an increase of 40 per cent for 1934 as compared with 1933. It is also interesting to note that our trade with all countries in 1934 showed an increase of 43 per cent as compared with 1933. What would have happened if we had not had these agreements? When you are looking for an answer I wish you would consider the statement made by Hon. Charles Dunning when delivering his budget speech in May, 1930. He stated that in the last fiscal year Canada's trade had depreciated by $244,000,000, that our trade with Great Britain in wheat alone had depreciated by $148,000,000. He mentioned many other items and closed by saying that the only market left for Canada's primary products was Great Britain. It is to the credit of this government that this market has been secured. While we have had a steady increase in our trade with the United Kingdom and other countries it is interesting to note that 43 per cent of the gross imports from the United Kingdom come in under the free list while 40 per cent of the gross imports from other countries during the last six months come in under the free list. There has been a larger percentage of imports coming in under the free list during the regime of this government than came in under any Liberal government that has ever been in power.

When this government took office it was faced with a difficult railway problem. I do not propose to deal with this matter as I think the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) completely nullified any criticism which has come from the opposition. I do not think it is necessary for a layman, so to speak, or a back-bencher to make any further reference to this matter. I was particularly pleased, however, to hear the minister make a clear-cut statement with respect to government policy and no amalgamation thus offsetting the criticism or political propaganda which has been spread throughout the country, to the effect that this government is in favour of amalgamation.

During the last two years this government has passed some very important legislation as far as agriculture is concerned. I should like to mention the marketing act. This legislation was a reform and advanced measure based largely on the British marketing act and I think it will prove of great benefit once it is understood and has had an opportunity to function. It will certainly prove of benefit to the producer in protecting him against the class of exploitation which was brought to light by the evidence given before the price spreads committee. We know who opposed this legislation when it was before the house. I am not going to review the opposition, but we know who organized the opposition against this legislation during recent months in western Canada. We know it was politically organized and is the work of the packers and other selfish interests in Canada. I do not think there is any question as to what the farmers of western Canada will do when this legislation is fully understood. Reference might be made to the opposition in the house which was led by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). There has never been any legislation so misunderstood or so misrepresented as this but once the farmers have an opportunity of knowing what it means, they will give credit where it belongs.

This government passed the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act as well as amendments to the farm loan act. These two pieces of legislation are complementary to one another. The one gives the debtor farmer an opportunity of settling his debts or arriving at a compromise with his creditors. When this is done he is able to take advantage of the provisions of the farm loan act. This year another amendment was passed increasing the capital for loaning purposes from $40,000,000 to $90,000,000. The scope of this act has been extended to all the provinces and the interest rates have been lowered to five per cent or less. I venture to say that the farmers of western Canada who have been paying eight, nine and ten per cent on their loans will receive the announcement of lower interest very favourably. There are many farmers in western Canada who have clear titles to their land. In the province of Saskatchewan from 43 to 45 per cent of the land is held under clear titles. Many of these farmers are unable to obtain loans from the loan companies or banks. A farmer may have a half or three-quarter section of land; he may have splendid buildings but he cannot get a loan. These men will be served by this legislation and I know they will appreciate it.

I come now to the question of wheat support. I was greatly surprised to hear the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth advocate the dumping on the market of wheat held by the government and the withdrawal of government support. I do not think it is necessary at this stage to review the events which led up to the government appearing in this picture. World markets had been gradually closed against Canadian wheat and those dealing in wheat in western Canada found themselves in difficulty. I think the house will agree that this state of affairs was not of our making; the government of the day had nothing to do with that condition. This government was asked to come into the picture and it did. This request was made by many different interests in western Canada such as boards of trade, municipal organizations, grain exchange officials, bankers, wheat pools and the farmers generally. The government had the backing of all interests in western Canada. I am a member of the banking and commerce committee and last year Mr. John I. McFarland appeared before that committee to make a statement on the government operations. He had nothing to conceal and was prepared to answer every question but we finally came to the question as to the amount of grain and the amount of money involved in these operations. Some hon. members contended that the answering of that question would serve no useful purpose and there was some discussion in the committee. Before we took a vote as to whether Mr. McFarland should answer that question, two questions were put to him. First, he was asked if it would serve any useful purpose to divulge that information. He answered that he did not think it would. Then he was asked if it might be possible that answering the question would do harm and he answered that it was quite possible that it would. A vote was then taken and the majority was about three to one that he should not answer; only nine voted in favour of his answering. The only hon. member from western Canada who voted that that information should be given was the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly). He is always to be found in such company, not fighting in the interests of the farmer but opposing the government on anything which might be in the interests of western Canada.

Before the budget was brought down we had the would-be Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) demanding that Mr. McFarland be brought before this house to give the information which it was decided last year by the committee should not be given. If it was right last year to withhold that information it is doubly so this year, for these reasons. First, this year the price is much higher than it was at this time last year; there would be chaos in the event of the government withdrawing support; we might have a very drastic break in the market, the price falling to as low a level as it has ever reached. Then there is the question of our getting back to a normal carry-over. Judging by the reports on world conditions and with respect to the Argentine and the Russian market, there is every evidence that Canada's wheat will be in demand, and it is highly probable that the whole situation will right itself, so that the government will be able to get out. It will have served a very useful purpose, when we consider what it has meant to the farmers of the west, according to the statement made by Mr. McFarland last year before the committee, when he said that the minimum saving was at least $100,000,000 and that it was more likely to be $150,000,000. Then on top of that we must take into account this year's operations, so that it will have meant about $200,000,000 in the pockets of the farmers of western Canada. Consider the effect of that on purchasing power in the west.

It seems to me that the official critic of the opposition and the hon. member for South Battleford have revealed their hand. They have not had the interests of the farmers of western Canada at heart but some other interests, either the members of the grain exchange or St. James Street, Montreal. I believe the environment has had its effect. They do not quote a single authority in the west to the effect that the government has not been doing the right thing; rather, they have quoted from the Financial Post and a leading banker to prove their case, though they have made it appear as if they had stood for the farmer. There is no doubt as to what would have happened last fall had Mr. McFarland withdrawn the support which he was giving the market. It was evident that the grain exchange could no longer stand the pressure imposed upon it, not by local interests but by outside interests—such concerns as Dreyfus, Bungie, the Continental Grain Company and others who had membership on the Winnipeg exchange as well as on the Minneapolis, Chicago, New York and continental markets. They make a raid on the market by selling or buying options. It is not legitimate hedging. Sometimes it is used for spreading purposes. If power had not been given to Mr. McFarland last fall to control the situation, chaos would have been the result.

There is on the order paper, standing in the name of the Prime Minister, a resolution which may mean the setting up of a grain board, and I will reserve until the proper time anything I have to say on that particular question. When that time comes, however, I may have a few suggestions to offer which I think will be beneficial to the marketing of Canada's wheat and will tend to stabilize prices. And when that time comes I have no doubt that we shall have the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) with us as we had on one occasion last year; for I remember one election he ran in the west on the slogan that carried him to victory, "Vote for Motherwell and the wheat board." We shall therefore have him with us again.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Bunkum.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I will show you presently whether it is bunkum so far as the western farmer is concerned. I readily understand how the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth falls for this idea of dumping wheat, and his endeavour to ride wheat, so to speak. His associates from western Canada have been talking to him and telling him about how the Gardiner government last summer rode into power on the slogan, "Dollar wheat." I have two little pamphlets which were circulated all through Saskatchewan last June in hundreds of thousands. They were put into cream cans in every express office and every freight shed, and they were thrown into automobiles on Saturday night. In my opinion this was the worst kind of political skullduggery ever put over, but it had its effect. Let me quote from the pamphlets:

Dollar wheat will give you a job and enable you to own your own home.
Dollar wheat will pay for your light and water and give you a telephone.
Dollar wheat will pay your grocery bill and buy boots, shoes and clothing for the whole family.
Dollar wheat will provide a surplus for a "rainy day."
Vote Liberal.

There was no suggestion as to how they were going to get it or who would give it to them, or whether Mr. Gardiner had the power to give it. Here is another one addressed to the merchants:

Dollar wheat will run your store and pay your taxes.
Dollar wheat will bring you business and collect your accounts.
Dollar wheat will pay the wholesaler and give you a bank account.
Vote Liberal.

It had its effect, but I am sure that this sort of thing will not be put over again in western Canada. By the way, this is published, it states, by the Saskatchewan Liberal Association, headquarters, Regina, but there were many decent Liberals in that province who hung their heads in shame at it. We have decent Liberals up there, lots of them, and they were not a party to this; but it was put over in the last days of the election and, as I say, it had its effect, though they knew that Mr. Gardiner would not have any more to do with getting dollar wheat than the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot).

There are other matters to which I should like to refer if I had time. I might mention the relief legislation. This government has been very generous in its treatment of the provinces, particularly the province of Saskatchewan, where we have received $17,000,000 by way of direct relief, $38,000,000 by way of loans, or in all $55,000,000 out of a total of $176,000,000 spent by this government throughout Canada—a very generous share. Moreover, the government has made possible the writing off of $10,000,000 of direct relief notes to the province. I regret however that the government out there is trying to make political capital of it, but when it is explained away the people will see that it is only a bubble, like the wheat business which I have discussed.

In all these measures we have been consistently opposed by the Liberal party in this house and recently, running true to form, they voted against the relief bill brought down by the Minister of Labour. New measures have been passed this session, and I regret that I have not time to discuss them because they are very important. The unemployment insurance measure was an important one, and here I would point out the inconsistency of the opposition; they opposed the bill in debate but they voted for it when it came to a vote. There were only three members who had the courage to stand up and vote against it. There was the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who voted against it because he said it was giving too much for not working; there was the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who voted against it, and who said that it was not giving enough for not working; and there was the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who said he did not know what it was all about. These three musketeers were the only ones who had the courage to vote against it.

The economic council is another important measure. This council will have power to study and report upon such matters as the freight rate structure of Canada, and I trust that when they report it will mean a lowering of the domestic rate. At all times, since coming to this house, I have stood for a reduction of freight rates. In 1931 I took a definite stand. It was my resolution last year that resulted in a reduction of 11 cents per hundred in the domestic rate on low grade wheat and coarse grains going west to Vancouver. We have passed many reform measures and there are a few more which will follow the report of the price spreads commission. When we have that further legislation before us I venture to say that this government will have passed more reform and advanced legislation than has been passed by any government we have had since confederation.

There are many important features of the budget with which I should like to deal if I had time, but as my time is almost up I should like to refer only to the fact that there are many reductions in tariff items. Seventy-six changes have been made in the tariff, with forty-eight reductions, including many items on the free list from Great Britain. There are also some increased taxes, but those increases put the burden of taxation where it belongs. There is a favourable trade balance; an adverse balance of $120,000,000 has been converted into a favourable balance of $134,000,000. Business is increasing, and the public press of this dominion, including the Liberal press, has been making favourable comments on the budget, which I think augurs well for it.

There are two principal questions which will have to be decided by the people of this dominion in the next few months. The first question is whom they want to sit in when the United Kingdom agreements come up for revision, renewal or repeal, as they will in 1937. The second question is whom they want to carry out these great reform measures that have been put, not in a little book but on the statute books of this country. I believe when the people come to decide those questions they will say that the party responsible for the agreements and the party responsible for these reform measures is the party to which they will entrust the task of putting them into operation rather than the party opposite, whose leader has said that he certainly does not consider himself bound by the terms of those agreements and who opposed the reform measures introduced last year and this year, though he has voted for the measures introduced so far this year.

What do the three parties to-day offer the young men and women who this year will vote for the first time? Will they be impressed with the record of the Liberal party, which has been termed the party of laissez-faire, or as I would say bluntly, the do-nothing party? I will go further than that; hon. gentlemen opposite did allow certain things to happen during their regime. Reviewing their record from 1921 to 1930 it will be seen that they allowed certain mergers to take place in this dominion, by which some 800 companies merged into about 130 or 140 companies. This meant that jobs were eliminated; accountants, clerks, salesmen and other employees were let out, while if these businesses had been carried on properly these positions would have been available to the young men and women graduating from our universities and business colleges. By means of these mergers the working men and working women were exploited. I always have been proud of the name Canada or Canadian, and I regret to see that name used in prefixing it to these mergers. We have Canada Dairies, which control the milk for the babies; we have Canada Bread and Canadian Packers, which control food for the adults. We have Canada Cement, Canada Paper, Canadian Industries and so on. I regret that the name of our country has ever been used by these companies which were merged only in order to exploit the primary producer and the labourer. When it was suggested in this house last year that there should be a price spreads committee set up to investigate some of these matters the leader of the opposition said that it was not necessary, that he knew all about it, that he knew exactly what they would find, and that we had the machinery already established to investigate these questions. The machinery to which he referred was the Combines Investigation Act, of his own creation, under which these mergers took place.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have a definite policy, but that policy will lead us to complete socialism. Since my time is limited I am not going to dwell on that point, but the Conservative party have a program of reform which was initiated last year and which has been advanced a very great deal during this session. This program is being carried on in order to correct many of the injustices to which I have referred and in order to prevent the exploitation of agriculture, which I claim to be the chief industry of Canada and which must be placed on a sound basis, stabilized so to speak, in order to stop the exodus from the farms to the cities and towns. That movement should be in the other direction, and if agriculture could be made secure and attractive people would go from the cities to the farms.

In all the reforms we have initiated, Mr. Speaker, we have endeavoured to preserve individual effort and initiative. That is the true Conservative policy; we have been endeavouring to lop the moldering branch away and preserve the good. I claim that to-day our young men and women have just as much initiative, courage and ability as the young men and women of twenty or thirty years ago. They are looking forward, not backward; they want leadership, and at this time the Conservative party offers that leadership. When our young people review the policies of the present Prime Minister, as expressed by him when he first came into this house in 1911, again in 1928 when he warned the Canadian people, and again last year and this year, I say they will not hesitate long in making their choice. The Conservative party is the only party to lead the people of this dominion.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that never in the history of the country has destiny led a man into the path of duty more definitely than it has led the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. He is equipped for the task; he has wealth beyond financial influence, together with a great brain, business experience and great courage. I trust that he may be restored to health and strength in order that he may carry on and take full advantage of his opportunities, and that he may lead this great reform party to victory in the coming election. And just in closing, Mr. Speaker, what does it matter to the right hon. Prime Minister or to any member on this side or the other side of this house if defeated when fighting the cause of the Canadian people?

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of the house listened with great interest and satisfaction to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). It was a clear-cut business statement, without political bias, made for the evident purpose of showing the people the true state of our finances at this time.

I am sure people of this country will be glad to learn that we have had a steady improvement in almost every line of business since the beginning of 1933. Our public finances have improved; there has been a steady improvement in both export and import trade; we have more men at work in our factories and there are fewer people on relief.

Our Liberal friends have been strangely dumb during this debate. They had of course their chief financial critic, and one or two others, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) and that usually very silent man so seldom heard in debate, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I presume these hon. members were set up by the Liberal party as the chief exponents of the prevalent opinion on that side. But in fact our Liberal friends were silent for a very different reason. For the last couple of years or more they have depended entirely not on any policy which they have enunciated but upon old man depression. They believed, and perhaps believe yet, that this depression and unrest, which did prevail in the past in Canada, was about to lead their party into power. Consequently they cannot speak enthusiastically about a budget which announces to the people of Canada better conditions and better times, for they know that every further step in improvement means fewer votes for the Liberal party in the coming election, every additional man employed means further loss of votes for that party, and every effort put forth by this government to make times better makes the prospects worse for that party under present conditions.

I have said that the depression is passing, that conditions are better. In support of that I wish to quote a few figures. These are taken from Business of September, 1934, and give a comparison showing Canada's progress towards prosperity. Compared with the low period our exports have increased 50·5 per cent; our exports to empire countries have increased 53·2 per cent; our imports generally have increased 36·8 per cent; and our imports from empire countries 53·2 per cent. The physical volume of business in Canada has increased 64 per cent. Here let me point out that in making comparisons our hon. friends opposite are always anxious to compare trade in recent years and at the present time with the peak prices of 1928 or 1929, the fact being that prices on the average are very much lower, so that the resulting picture is not a true one. Our manufacturing production has increased 75·6 per cent, iron and steel production 53 per cent, and textile production 141 per cent, being at the present time very much above the average of 1926 to 1929. The same is true of the production of electrical power and of our mineral production, which has increased 184·8 per cent, and is now very much above the average of 1926 to 1929. Employment has increased 62·6 per cent. I could give many more figures but do not think it necessary to take the time. I have in my hand a comparison made I think by the Canadian Bank of Commerce as to the real purchasing power of the farmers of Canada. It shows that the low period was in 1931 immediately after the change of government, and that since then it has steadily risen. I have the figures for 1931 to 1934. In 1931 it was 58·36 per cent of normal, in 1932 it rose to 62·77, in 1933 it was down slightly to 61·03, and in 1934 had increased to 67·51. That is the latest available.

There is no question that the principal problem in this country, as in every civilized land to-day, is that of unemployment, and perhaps that of relief. This situation is common to all civilized countries. In this country the depression commenced in the early part of 1929, trade was paralyzed by the great slump in stocks of the autumn of that year. Things went from bad to worse not only in this country but in almost every other. Naturally with the collapse in stocks the purchasing power of our people was greatly reduced. This resulted in unemployment and the closing of factories. Conditions were further aggravated by the fact that farming was in a very deplorable condition owing to the action not only of the United States, as instanced by a previous speaker, but of other countries, which all closed their markets to the agricultural products of Canada. For many years the United States had been our nearest and best market, and while hon. members opposite have always preached, as they do even yet, that we should buy where we sell and that unless we buy we cannot sell, our American friends were not of that opinion at that time. In spite of the fact that we were then and probably are yet their best customers, they proceeded to shut the door absolutely on our agricultural products.

The result was that the buying power of our farmers fell to almost nothing, and our factories were closed.

That was the situation which confronted this government when they came into power in 1930. There is no doubt that the Prime Minister found the situation much worse than he had anticipated. But he immediately took steps to do what he could to remedy the condition, and parliament was called in September of that year for the purpose of voting such moneys as were necessary and passing such legislation as was deemed advisable. It is true that when parliament was called in 1930, manufactured goods from almost every country of the world were being poured into Canada practically regardless of cost of production. Consequently our factories had to close. At that time we took steps, which I believe and have always believed were right, to protect this country against that condition. We raised tariffs, there is no doubt about it. I remember hon. gentlemen opposite getting up one by one and protesting that when we increased the duty on silk for instance by practically 100 per cent that increase would be passed on to the consumer. They said the same thing about textiles, upon which the duty was also materially increased. But what are the facts? Continuously since that time prices of silks and textiles have gone steadily down, and people are able to buy them at lower prices to-day than before the duty was changed. But it had another result. Millions of dollars were spent in this country for the building and enlargement of textile factories. In one town that I have in mind one company I think spent $2,000,000 on new buildings. Many of them are working twenty-four hours a day, and are doing a great deal to strengthen the Canadian situation. These mills not only provide work for our people but in doing so furnish a market for the farmers of the vicinity. Hon. members have stated that the greater part of our agricultural production outside of wheat is consumed in Canada. I may later have time to read a few figures in this connection. May I point out that this government took the proper action in 1930. I believe it is better to build a fence at the top of a precipice than to maintain an ambulance at the bottom. I believe, further, that if the Liberal government between the years 1921 and 1930 had taken the proper steps or made proper protests to the various countries concerned Canada would be in better circumstances to-day. It is better to have a lighthouse on the shore than to maintain life boats to save the mariners after the vessel has been wrecked.

During the last four or five years this government has been doing everything within its power to utilize the ambulance for the purpose of saving those wrecked by the disaster of 1929. They have built a fence at the top, too, to prevent a similar disaster occurring in the future. They have put up their lighthouses along the shore so that there may be no more wrecks. Meantime they have had to use their life boats to save those already suffering.

In the short time at my disposal I do not believe it is necessary to refer to the extent of the expenditures made by the government for relief but I should like to make one or two observations in connection therewith. In all the provinces relief is in the hands of the provinces or the municipalities. For many years however, and especially in centres where the people are not well acquainted with the facts, a whispering campaign has been in progress, and the assertion has been made that only the federal government is to blame. As a matter of fact in the province of Ontario, from which I come, the relief is in the hands of the municipal authorities, and grants are made according to their wishes or whims. I have in my hand an interesting statement produced at the meeting of the mayors held only a few days ago in this city. This statement is prepared by the department of social research of McGill university for the use of the organization committee of the mayors. Although I do not intend to read it in detail I should like to indicate the vast difference in methods obtaining in the different provinces. Whether this difference is brought about because of local circumstances, or whether some provinces are more generous than others in their treatment of the unemployed and those requiring relief I do not know. This statement indicates however that in the year 1934 the amount of money distributed in the maritime provinces cost each elector in each city $2.20. That is to say each inhabitant of a city was charged $2.20. Then we find that each person on relief in the maritimes received $17.25 in the year. Of course I am speaking only of the grant given by the cities, and would point out that the amount should be multiplied by three, so as to allow for provincial and dominion contributions. Therefore instead of $17.25 the figure should be about $51.75. The amount I have given is that paid by the city according to population and the number of people on relief.

In the city of Saint John relief cost $1 per head of population, while in Amherst the cost was more than $5. In other words, that was the assessment on each inhabitant of those cities. The highest rate in the province of Quebec was found in the city of Lachine, where an amount of $10 was levied against each inhabitant. The net return for the province of Quebec indicates that each person in a city had to produce $4 in the year 1934 for relief expenditure, and the men on relief received an average of $26.25. In the province of Ontario the highest point was reached in the city of Brantford where, due to lack of operations in industries connected with agriculture, thousands of men were out of work. In that province the per capita levy varied to a great extent. In one town we find a charge of only 33 cents per head while in others the amounts ranged as high as $11 per head. The average receipt by each recipient amounted to $26.

In Manitoba each person on relief received $43.20 from the cities; in Saskatchewan $30.80 was received and in Alberta $40.80, or $10 more than the amount paid in Saskatchewan. In British Columbia something over $40 was paid, giving an average for ninety cities of Canada $40.80. That amount, multiplied by three would indicate that the average for all Canada would amount to about $120.

I submit these figures prove one fact, namely that we have not as many men on continuous relief as figures would indicate. I hold under my hand a statement made by the city planner of Ottawa who has made a study of the situation and who gave evidence before the housing committee to the effect that in the city of Ottawa the average contribution to a family of six, the average family in this city, was as follows: $40 per month for food and fuel, or $480 per year, of which two-thirds is paid by the government; $60 per year for clothing, paid entirely by the city; $156 per year for rent, two-thirds of which is paid by the various governments. That is an average for each family, provided of course that they are on continuous relief, of $696 per year, not including medical service or hospitalization. So we can clearly see from the statement given by Mr. Cauchon that we have not as many men on actual relief as is generally supposed.

While on this subject I would also like to point out that the poor we have always with us. In the best times this country has ever seen we always have a certain number of people in Canada, as in every other country, who need relief—those for instance who may be incapacitated from various causes, and those who are sick. We have these with us at all times, and it is computed by authorities in Great Britain that this class averages over five or five and a half per cent in the very best of times. If we take that same average for Canada, it would account for a great proportion of those who are on relief to-day. We have in addition those who are suffering through an act of providence in the driedout areas. We have no desire, I do not think anybody in Canada has any desire, to cut them off from relief; on the contrary we are most anxious that these men shall be enabled to carry on. But the fact remains that they are all counted in the number on relief when our friends opposite get up to show, as they claim, that this government has not taken proper means to bring about better times. They quote a figure varying from one to two and a half million, and in their figures all these various classes that I have mentioned are included. According to the best figures I have there are less than one million on relief at the present time, including all these classes I have mentioned. In other words there has been a reduction of over 600,000 in the number of those on relief within the last eighteen months, which is a very favourable showing.

To revert for a moment to a subject that was brought up by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) I hold under my hand a statement by the Live Stock Journal, and I would like to put on Hansard these figures of our trade in the live stock with the United States both before and after the Fordney-McCumber tariff came into force. In 1928 we exported to the United States 278,293 cattle; in 1929, 234,451; in 1930, for the fiscal year, all under Liberal rule, 232,271, and the last figure I have is for 1933, when we exported 5,886 head of cattle to the United States, largely stock for the improvement of cattle. I have given these figures to show the effect of the United States tariff in connection with what I have already stated.

In addition to the improvement that has been made in conditions in Canada through the action of this government in 1930, beginning in 1932 there has also been a very decided improvement owing to the treaties that were entered into between this country and the other dominions of the British empire, commonly known as the empire trade agreements. The result of those agreements has been very satisfactory to Canada. There has been an increase in our trade between that time and this of over $300,000,000. I have here some very interesting figures as to the general effect of these empire trade agreements, supplied by the British authorities. I have the figures here for 1932, 1933 and 1934, but I will take only 1932 and 1934. The trade of Canada with the British empire in 1932 was in round figures £60,000,000 and in 1934, £71,500,000. The trade of British India with the empire was £66,980,000 in 1932, and £79,-310,000 in 1934. The trade of Australia with the British empire was £66,604,000 in 1932 and £77,000,000 in 1934; the trade of New Zealand with the British empire was £47,660,000 in 1932 and £52,000,000 in 1934; and so on all down the line.

The only exception to these trade increases was in our trade with the Irish Free State, which fell off. On the other hand, while Great Britain's trade in imports and exports with Brititsh empire countries has increased, her trade with foreign countries has not increased in the same proportion or anything like it. Britain's trade with the United States, for example, was $104,456,000 in 1932 and $105,200,-000 in 1934, a very small increase. Her trade with France fell off more than three million pounds sterling and her trade with Germany fell off in about the same degree, two and a half million pounds sterling. Her trade with Italy fell off two million pounds sterling; her trade with Belgium fell off one million pounds sterling; her trade with the Netherlands fell off by one million pounds sterling; her trade with Denmark fell off by four million pounds sterling, and so on right down the line, clearly proving that the empire agreements have been of great value not only to Canada, having given us an outlet especially for our agricultural products, but also to Great Britain and the empire itself as is shown by the official figures I have just given.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to another subject. We have a committee of this house at the present time looking into the question of housing. I am very much interested in the work of that committee because I believe housing is the one way by which we can more cheaply than in any other way bring about an improvement in labour conditions. In the building trade or in housing projects practically ninety-five per cent of the cost represents labour. If we start from the bottom and work up we find that almost every trade is interested in housing—carpenters, bricklayers, lathers, plasterers, painters and labourers, and not only the labourer who works on the actual building but the labourer who works in the foundry, the man who works in the clay pits making the cement, the man who works in the brick yards, as well as those who are processing the materials afterwards All these trades are interested in housing. Take the lumber trade. You have the men in the woods, in the saw mill, in the various planing factories; the men making sash and doors, and others who are equally interested in the building trades. Our manufacturers of heating apparatus are, of course, equally interested in housing. I am sure that anybody who makes a study of the matter will come to the conclusion that there is no way by which money could be spread more evenly and fairly throughout the country than by encouragement given to the building trades.

We have had some experience with housing in Canada. In 1919 the federal government under Sir Robert Borden voted the sum of $20,000,000 to be used for housing schemes. This was divided among the provinces according to population, and on the whole the scheme was eminently successful. There were some odd places where, through poor judgment or something of the kind, as in Ottawa, there was some little delay in the success of the scheme, but the position at the present time is this: many years ago the province of Ontario had returned with interest every dollar lent by the dominion to the province under that scheme. I understand that most of these loans to the different provinces have been returned, having done exceedingly good work in giving employment at the time they were used. I trust that the housing committee now sitting will be able to bring in a favourable report, and I also trust and believe that, a favourable report being brought in, this government will take steps to implement it in order to increase employment in Canada.

I would like for a few minutes to list some of the legislative acts of this government. I have already spoken of the British Empire trade agreements. The first on my list is the revision of the Bank Act. This time it was a little different from the ordinary revision. The government took steps to see that there should be some reduction in the interest rates, and also that the government should have more control over ordinary banking.

Then we had the establishment of the Bank of Canada. We do not all see exactly eye to eye as to the conditions under which this bank should have been established. Some believe it should be purely a government concern, others that it should be privately owned, and others that it should be government owned and privately controlled. However, we have the bank established and we trust and believe that it will materially improve financial conditions in Canada.

Then last year we had the marketing act. A good deal of opposition to this act, I understand, has developed in certain parts of the west. So far as Ontario and the other provinces are concerned I believe a strong movement has developed in favour of it. The people of Ontario believe that it is rendering a good service. I believe it will be more appreciated when it is better known. This legislation was based upon the British act, and cooperative purchasing and selling has been a success in Great Britain for many years. If this scheme is not complete in every detail there is no reason why it cannot be changed so as to be applicable to the conditions in Canada.

The next legislation to which I wish to refer is the farm loan act. I have very little knowledge of this legislation so far as Ontario is concerned, as it has not been in operation in that province. The loans which had been made in that province by the former government were cut off when the present government came into power, and many farmers suffered considerably. This reacted against the application of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which was passed at the last session. I believe this act is one of the most beneficial pieces of social legislation which has ever been passed by this parliament. I know that many settlements have been made in my county and throughout the adjoining counties. In most cases the matter has never reached the crown official and in all cases there has been a marked anxiety on the part of both the creditor and the debtor to get together. After the farm loan act has been put into effect in Ontario I am certain that great benefits will result from the operation of this act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

This government has also passed the Unemployment Insurance Act. This legislation is more or less of an experiment in Canada. It will have no immediate effect upon unemployment. If similar legislation had been passed in 1928 or 1929 when things were booming and the workmen could have easily made their payments, it would have obviated much of the unemployment relief being granted at the present time. We are following the example set by Great Britain where a similar act has been in force for about twenty-five years. About thirty-seven amendments have been made to the British act during that time, and undoubtedly it will be found necessary to amend ours.

The legislation to provide for an eight hour day has passed so far as this house is concerned. This legislation should have a very beneficial effect upon the country as undoubtedly it will give employment to more men. I am not sure but that it would have been better to provide for even shorter hours, but I am quite satisfied that this legislation will provide more employment. The weekly day of rest is observed practically all over Canada and there was no opposition to the passing of the legislation in that regard.

I believe the provision for the establishment of an economic council will have splendid results. I am glad to know that the government has decided to vote an additional $200,000 for the encouragement of the tourist trade. Other legislation is to be introduced; we are all looking forward to the presentation of the report of the price spreads commission. There is no doubt that legislation will be required in that connection. I hope some kind of works program will be presented to take the place of unemployment relief. Personally I have never been in favour of direct relief. I think the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion, either separately or in combination, should supply employment and then the municipalities could take care of any cases of illness.

Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have entered into a conspiracy of silence so far as the budget is concerned. I should like to ask them what they have done during the last few years in the way of social legislation. As I have pointed out, they were in power from 1921 to 1930 and during that period conditions were favourable to the introduction of social legislation. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), then Prime Minister, said that he had these things thoroughly in mind. He had even placed them in a book which had been published a year or two before.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It is a good book.

Mr. ARTHURS: Probably it is. Books last longer when you do not read them; they do not get worn or torn. At any rate he did not put these things into practice. In the Liberal platform of 1919 we had a reiteration of many of these things but no legislation was presented.

It was contended that we should have had a conference with the provinces before introducing this legislation. I should like to know how many conferences the leader of the opposition had with the provinces when he was Prime Minister. No legislation resulted from those conferences, but when we bring in legislation we are met with the cry that it is ultra vires. The people of this country do not care whether this legislation is ultra vires or intra vires; they want the legislation and they are willing to adopt any means possible to secure it. It may be necessary to make some changes in the British North America Act, but I am quite sure that the people of Canada will not stand for any talk about ultra vires or intra vires. They are not going to vote for those who write books which are kept in the library; they are going to vote for those who write the necessary legislation into the statute books of the country.

Mr. V. C. PORTEOUS (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I will be censored by hon. members opposite for raising my voice at this time because I believe that if the records of this parliament are searched they will show that I have taken up as little time as any hon. member opposite.

First, I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon the clear and concise form in which he presented his budget. If individuals and the municipalities followed this method in the presenting of budgets I believe they would not find themselves in the embarrassing circumstances which they sometimes do. The other day the mayors of the different cities came to Ottawa to insist that this government take over responsibilities which the cities have neglected to some extent because they have not followed economic and business principles in the budgeting of their expenditures. I should like to commend to these gentlemen the methods which are followed in rural municipalities where exactly the same obstacles have to be overcome as have to be overcome by the cities. These municipalities handle the budgeting of their expenditures in a most economical way, and the mayors could very well go to the rural municipalities for a lesson in economics.

I want to add my congratulations to the official critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). I remember reading some years ago the rules of a debating society in which it was stated that the object of the affirmative side was to build up their argument and the object of the negative was to tear down. I must say that exactly the same practice is followed in this chamber, and from that standpoint the hon. member who moved the amendment should receive commendation, for he did excellent work in trying to break down a platform which had been set up. This budget is the culmination of five years of legislative progress. I suppose there are those on the opposite side who will say that is not so, but I say that this government has passed more progressive legislation than any government that has ever been in power for a like period in the dominion, and it cannot be accused of inaction.

Another name for the budget could be tariff and taxation, and I want to deal for a moment or two with tariffs, because I feel that the enunciation of policy by members of the opposition who say that they are free traders is not sincere. I have always noticed, as the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) said a few years ago, that they are free traders in opposition, but when they are in power they are protectionists just as much as this party, and to almost the same extent.

For years and years we have been confronted with the problem of the tariff and I presume that we shall always be faced with that problem. But I hope that the time will come when the tariff will cease to be the political football it has been in the past and that elections will not be won and lost on tariff policies. I hope that the time will come when an international body will be set up to give counsel to the different countries in the world with respect to tariffs. I think that time will come; I think it is fast approaching, and the fact that we are dealing with the tariff to quite an extent, and that all governments in the world are dealing with it, by means of trade treaties, is a sign that that time is fast approaching.

We have the problem of taxation. There are those members in this house who raise their voices in support of social legislation because, as I believe, in many instances they feel that they can get some support from their constituents by voicing such opinions. The fact remains however that no money can be expended without some form of taxation whereby sufficient will be collected to meet that expenditure. The government after all is only the people, and expenditure necessitates taxation; and I believe that this budget presents a fair and equitable form of taxation to meet the necessary expenditures which are ever increasing. I believe that this budget does this better than any other budget that has been presented to this house.

In the past we have been faced with the problem of trade balances. I listened once, as most members of this house listened, to one of the greatest economists, Sir Josiah Stamp, when he spoke to us in the parliamentary restaurant. He dwelt on the importance of trade balances, and as a result of having listened to his wonderful lecture on that subject I searched the records for a decade with respect to trade balances between Canada and the United States. That decade was between 1920 and 1930, and I found that we bought from the United States almost $2,500,000,000 worth of products more than we sold them, or that we had an unfavourable trade balance during those ten years of almost that amount. As a result also of listening to that lecture, when that learned gentleman told us that an unfavourable trade balance must be absorbed in some way, I searched statistics to find out how that unfavourable trade balance was being met, and I found that in the same period, federally, provincially and municipally in this dominion, we had borrowed almost that identical figure. That tells one story and one story only, and that is that we bought from the United States during that period almost $2,500,000,000 more than we sold and then borrowed the money to pay for it. But that is not the worst. The major portion of that money was borrowed from the United States.

In view of these facts, which are presented to us fairly and concisely, what could we do but use the only instrument at the disposal of any government in order to correct these unfavourable trade balances? It is true that there are some invisible balances such as the tourist trade, and we have reaped some benefit from that invisible trade balance with the United States. But the United States also receives some benefit from the tourist trade going from Canada. Moreover, we are a debtor country and we must budget in order to meet the difference in interest rate which is going out of the country all the time.

I wish to commend the Minister of Finance for having taken a step in connection with the taxing of unearned income. I discussed with the Minister of Finance a few years ago the question of taxing non-taxable investments. At that time I advocated some method whereby investments not otherwise taxable should be made taxable, and I presented the example of a farmer who went out and bought a farm for $10,000, of which he had to borrow $6,000 from a private individual or a mortgage corporation. Just as soon as he took possession of that property he became liable for the taxes on it, whereas the person or company from whom he borrowed the $6,000 paid no tax except perhaps some income tax on the interest. This plan of taxing unearned income is one of the finest steps to be taken by any government during a period such as this.

From time to time we have heard urged, particularly from the far corner of the house, the question of monetary reform. I do not say that we should not have such reform to some extent in order to cope with other countries; I believe we should keep pace with other countries in that regard, but I want to say that you cannot make money by reforming it. Our paper money in this country represents only what is behind that money, and merely printing money is not going to make it valuable. Moreover, by printing money you cannot meet your obligations more economically than by borrowing money. The moment you issue currency without adequate coverage you decrease the value of your currency to exactly the same extent as you would by borrowing in a foreign market and paying interest; exactly the same thing happens. While I feel that we should keep abreast of the times with respect to our money policy I believe we should use every precaution to see that we do not get off solid ground or away from stable currency.

I have said that the life of this parliament has covered a period of progress and accomplishment. A special session was called as soon as we came into power, and the first step we took was to build up our tariffs. That was necessary in order to correct the adverse trade balance, and it was necessary because other countries felt the depression before it reached Canada, and they were dumping goods into this country, more or less at bankruptcy prices, which we should have been producing in Canada. As a member of the Conservative party I must say that I have no apologies to offer in respect to the building up of the tariffs at that time; I think it was the only proper thing to do. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said the other day, to a large extent we had lost our markets; our customers had become our competitors and it was necessary that our home markets should be retained for our own products. Then we entered into trade treaties, and I have special reference to the Ottawa agreements, which surpass any endeavours in that regard on the part of any previous government. As a farmer I sometimes wonder what might be done to raise the prices of farm products, but I shudder to think what might have happened with respect to our cattle and hog industries, for instance, if we had not found that outlet which was presented by the Ottawa agreements. Where would the prices of hogs and cattle have fallen? They are low enough now, dear knows, but they would have been much lower if we had not had the Ottawa agreements—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. PORTEOUS: —which my hon. friend, who just gave voice to his disagreement, voted against. Without those Ottawa agreements the prices of our cattle and hogs would have been much lower, and now we are in a position to reap the full benefit of those agreements.

To a large extent, Mr. Speaker, we have regained trade with the old country which was lost under the Liberal regime. I must say that the British market is the surest and most stable market we have; it will take our hogs when other countries refuse to do so.

While it is not for me to say anything in regard to trade with the United States, since an agreement is pending with that country, I will say that we should be very careful not to destroy our market in the United Kingdom in anticipation of any other market, because the day will come when there will be a reaction in these other countries and we will be glad to avail ourselves of the United Kingdom market. So I think we should retain our position in that market which has been assured to us under the Ottawa agreements.

We undertook and carried out a census in this country which throws perhaps more light on the situation than any census previously taken. I have always maintained, especially with regard to farmers, that we have not been in possession of sufficient knowledge with respect to the possible consumption of our agricultural products. I hope that as a result of the census which has been taken, and following some further legislation which will be brought down, we may be able to control our output and take advantage of the knowledge which is presented to us. We are tackling the unemployment problem. When we first did so there were those who condemned the government for its unemployment policy, but I notice those same people are now trying to steal the government's thunder by saying more money should be appropriated for that purpose. There may have been some irregularities with respect to the administration of unemployment relief moneys; undoubtedly there were. But I would like to ask hon. members what set-up they could have made in such a short space of time that would have been more economical and efficient than the set-up which was made, by which unemployment relief was administered through the municipalities. For this or any federal government to undertake to administer unemployment relief would have been much more extravagant than doing it through the municipalities. The municipalities were in a better position to administer relief than any other governmental body, because they were in closer touch with the requirements of the situation. Some hon. members are ready to tell in this chamber of conditions in which they find those who are recipients of unemployment relief. I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) say yesterday that there was only one bathroom in an apartment house in the city of Montreal to serve forty-nine people. But I wonder if that hon. gentleman realizes that there are thousands of people in this country who have no bathroom at all, yet they are contributing to unemployment relief. I wonder if he and other hon. members realize that there are many people contributing to unemployment relief at this time to provide water from the tap for other people when they themselves are carrying water from wells; who are contributing towards electric light for others and reading the reports concerning it by the light of coal oil lamps. Is it not time that someone took it on himself to voice the position of some of the farmers in this country? I have no fault to find with unemployment relief justly administered; it is a problem which confronts us and I think one which we shall eventually solve economically. But I do say that some who are receiving unemployment benefit have a higher standard of living than some who are contributing to it.

This government tackled unemployment relief, and we have nothing to apologize for in that regard. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said the other day that we should have more equality of sacrifice, and he referred to some cartoon which he had seen in a newspaper, under the caption Everybody One Step Down. I remember seeing a cartoon myself some years ago in the early days of bolshevism; it showed a lean, lanky man sitting in front of a grocery store with a banner across his breast bearing the word "bolshevik." A passer-by asked him: "What does that word 'bolshevik' means?" "Well," he said, "it means absolute equality; nobody has anything to eat." That is about as good an explanation of bolshevism as could be given, because if those people had their way who advocate policies such as those of which we have heard, they would destroy the credit of the country and the result would be that everybody would be equal but everyone would be starving.

Then we assumed greater responsibility respecting old age pensions. May I say in passing that the Old Age Pensions Act was the only part of an extensive program presented by the Liberal party to the labour people of this country in 1919 that was carried out. We assumed ninety-five per cent responsibility in connection with that act. Then we introduced legislation setting up the central bank, and I believe that as the years go by the central bank will prove to be one of the most beneficial financial institutions in this or any country, because it will exercise a controlling influence on the alternations of prosperity and depression that have characterized the past under the banking system as we have had it. Then we introduced the Natural Products Marketing Act, which gave the farmers the only opportunity that ever had been given them to control to some extent the selling price of their products. I was astounded to hear my hon. friends opposite vote against that bill. Surely they realized that in this world in which trade is coming to be regulated largely by codes, farmers should have some organization by which they can to some extent control the marketing of their products. Through the facilities afforded by that legislation I believe that as the years go by the agricultural community will reap splendid results.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PORTEOUS: When the house rose at six o'clock I was reviewing as briefly as possible some of the progressive and reform legislation this government had sponsored in the past. In addition to the items I have already mentioned there are the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and amendments to the farm loan act. We have maintained our credit and the value of our currency. Through the price spreads commission we have set out to investigate some of the irregularities in connection with trade and commerce. In passing may I state that this is the only government which has had nerve enough to investigate matters of that kind. We are about to set up a wheat board, and still the Liberal opposition continues to present motions of want of confidence in the government.

In the few brief moments at my disposal I should like to review what is known as the capitalistic system. I do not believe that the expression "capitalistic system" is in most instances properly applied. In my opinion we are living under a free and competitive system. Capitalism is a product of democracy and not a system in itself. We live in a free country, a country where any individual is privileged to engage in any occupation he may see fit to follow, and we hope that in years to come every Canadian will have that same opportunity. Under our system each individual is rewarded according to merit, and other than by way of reform I do not believe the system can be improved upon.

The great country to the south of us makes the boast that it has made more money in a short term of years than has any other country in the world, and under the system prevailing in that country they have produced more profits than has any other country. For years I have watched industrial workers, and in passing may I state that I have a high regard for the honest industrial worker and the honest employee. I regard highly that man who is willing to give of his skill, for which he may be remunerated in dollars and cents. I have watched the industrial workers in action, and may I observe that in years gone by there was very little difference between the status of the employee and that of the employer. In bygone days the employer served an apprenticeship and understood the conditions under which the employee worked. Then the employer worked as many hours per day as did the man working under him. What is the condition to-day? By manipulation of the Companies Act, by monopoly in industry and by other methods, the employer has become immensely rich while the employee may be found among the list of unemployed.

Faced with these conditions is it not time for us to embark upon some program of reform so far as possible to correct this free and competitive system? That is the program upon which this government is embarking to-day. As I have stated previously, I was surprised to note that the opposition chose to oppose some of the reform measures which passed last year. I believe they would still oppose the reform legislation were it not for the fact that they realize public opinion is behind it. They understand that the public is behind the reform policy enunciated by the Prime Minister in his radio speeches, and were it not for that fact they would be opposing the reform program now before parliament. However they have learned that public opinion favours reform and for that reason have made a right about face and declare themselves ready to vote for reform legislation.

The reform program was initiated by none other than the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who had a reform program in mind a few years ago when we were embarking upon the census, which I mentioned earlier. Since that time he has steadily advanced and made reasonable his reform program. Not only do I hope and believe that he will be back to lead the Conservative party to victory in the next election, but I believe that in years to come he will embark upon a reform policy which will give the world leadership and further jurisdiction for the existence of a free and competitive system.

In 1928 my right hon. leader warned the then government of conditions obtaining at that time, when they were embarking on a mad orgy of expenditure and extravagance.

The foresight which led him to warn the government of that day will lead him in the reform measures under which the people of Canada will prosper in years to come.

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon the manner in which he presented his budget speech. Seldom has this house been treated to such a full and clear picture of our assets and liabilities. Upon his creditable performance of this huge task the minister deserves congratulation.

During the present session I have remained quiet in my seat; in fact at no time have I been noted for kicking up a disturbance. I have been pleased with the legislation brought down in the last five years. It is to my liking; and the reform measures which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) forecast in his radio speeches furnish another reason why I am perfectly content. I am very sympathetic towards them, and I trust that as a result of the findings of the price spreads commission much useful and necessary legislation will follow.

It is strange, Mr. Speaker, the change that has taken place in the mentality of this house in the last five years from the point of view of agriculture, and that is the topic in which I am particularly interested. Many measures have been enacted for the benefit of the farmer, and I trust that many more will be brought forward as a result of the findings of the price spreads commission. I am convinced, sir, that this parliament has enacted more useful agricultural legislation than has been passed in any previous quarter century. As the Prime Minister told us in his radio addresses, times have changed and we must change with them. That is very true. The policy of the Prime Minister is to uplift the little fellow. The capitalist and the industrialist has had his own way for a long time uncurbed, and as in the case of the individual, it has proved his undoing. He has gone too far, and reform must take place in a quiet and evolutionary manner or we shall have something serious on our hands. The standard of living has been raised so high in this country, and in fact all over the world, that it is only the capitalist and the industrialist and their executives who are permitted to enjoy that standard of living. As I said, the Prime Minister's policy is to uplift the little fellow so that he too may enjoy a better standard of living and take in the show. Years ago the best and most solid citizen in Canada was the agriculturist, but to-day he is the puniest, the tiniest, the lowest graded class in the whole dominion; yet he constitutes fifty per cent of our population. That is a strange thing, Mr. Speaker. We have gone on in this country building up industries. We have had an industrial mania not only here but all over the world, and the little fellow has been left too much to float along alone. Like the products of no other class in the community, the products of the farmer—his butter, his cheese and everything else that he produces—are shipped to the cities, there to be distributed by middlemen who fix the price and reap millions out of the farmer's labour.

I have heard some hon. members speak about the importance of our coal mines and other minerals. But compare them with agriculture and they do not make a very good showing. The minute you take an ounce of gold out of the ground the mine has depreciated by that much, but agricultural wealth is a perpetual asset and should be continuously increasing in value and making new wealth. But at the present time the farmer is beaten out.

I want to refer for a moment to the standards of living and the high cost of living, and I do not think I can do it in any better way than simply to mention the golf links and golf courses that abound around our cities and towns. Millions of dollars are invested in these courses, and who enjoys them? Only the capitalist. The farmer never plays golf. The nearest the farmer ever gets to playing golf is when he knocks the dried-up tufts of fertilizer around his fields with a mallet. That is all the golf he gets. Take a train leaving any of our cities at noon in the summer and you will find it filled with men going out to the golf courses, all togged out in their knee-high pyjamas and other accoutrements. Why, Mr. Speaker, the cost of a pair of golf hose would buy two suits for a farmer. The farmer is wondering where he is going to get his next pair of overalls. That is the position in which he finds himself.

The farmer in normal times is by long odds the heaviest consumer, the heaviest buyer in the Dominion of Canada. Let him get his just share of what he produces and he will be able to absorb one-half or three-quarters of the present day unemployment. But to-day the farmer is unable to buy, and what work is done on the farm he has to do himself.

As I said a few minutes ago, we have gone industrially crazy, and we have done so at the expense of the primary producer. The capitalist has been misled. He has suffered from a sort of greed for gain. That is his hobby, and that has been the trouble—how much he can make. He has been given all power; he has been unbridled, unchecked, and it has simply been the means for self-destruction. We cannot go on in the way we are going. The capitalist will have to be curbed. The Prime Minister states distinctly that he does not intend to do away with capitalism, but he intends to reform it, to eliminate its bad features and retain the good ones. It seems to me that that would be a perfect solution. Along in 1927, 1928 and 1929 we saw an example of what a standard of living could be. We saw men with money and men without money but with facilities to borrow falling over each other in brokers' offices to buy stocks. Many of these stocks were all right but they were paying only two and two and a half per cent in dividends. I can give another example. In the small town in which I live we are paying more to-day to light our streets than we paid twenty-five or thirty years ago for all our taxes. Under these circumstances I submit that we must do one of two things. We must either reduce the standard of living or lift up the little fellow so that he can bear his share of the load. I am for lifting up the little fellow, because the country in which the standard of living is the highest is the better place in which to live.

As a general rule I do not indulge in political discussions in the house; we have far too much of this. But I cannot allow the remarks made by the genial and popular member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), on January 31 to go unchallenged. The hon. gentleman gets so enthusiastic about his political views that he is often led astray and makes many misstatements of fact. His speeches are not usually full of moderation but I think in this instance he outdid himself. He was outlining certain things which this government had done, and on page 367 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> The duty on butter, under the King administration, was four cents per pound.

I submit that the hon. member must have known differently; he must have known that the duty was one cent per pound and that we brought in over 41,000,000 pounds of butter during the last years of the King administration. He then goes on to make a mountain out of a molehill.

Mr. HOWARD: Would the hon. member mind telling us the price at that time?

Mr. PICKEL: That has nothing whatever to do with the case.

Mr. GOBEIL: The question is: Was your statement correct? You know it was not.

Mr. PICKEL: He tries to make a mountain out of a molehill. He gave the importations of butter, but they are nothing as far as our market is concerned. It must be remembered that a great deal of this butter came in from England and paid a duty of eight cents per pound. Statements of this kind are the result of political bias and an attempt to make capital out of nothing. There is nothing in what the hon. member says.

He then goes on to talk about the Quebec milk commission and what they have done for the farmer. This commission was in existence before 1932, when an investigation was held by this government. The members of this commission had been riding over the province for two or three years doing nothing. They were drawing salaries for visiting the farmers and inflicting restrictions and regulations upon them but never increasing the price of their products. This state of affairs was allowed to continue until the session of 1933 when this government gave permission to the agriculture committee to hold an investigation into the whole matter. The investigation was held and a report was drawn up highly derogatory to the distributors. A copy of this report was sent to each of the provinces along with a copy of the evidence taken before the committee. The provinces were requested to take the necessary action. In 1934 the Quebec legislature empowered the Quebec milk commission to set prices. This action is greatly to the credit of the legislature but the fact remains that had it not been for the action of this government the members of the milk commission would still be joy riding around the province.

Let us look into the manner in which this milk commission is working at the present time. In the autumn of 1934 the farmer in Quebec was getting $1.50 per 100 pounds for his milk. The time had come to set a winter price and the distributors and producers had agreed upon a price of $2.05 per 100 pounds. The milk commission entered the picture and reduced this price to $1.85.

Mr. POWER: What about the surplus milk?

Mr. PICKEL: I give the milk commission credit for doing away with the surplus milk, but they did reduce the price agreed upon by the distributors and producers. They also gave the distributor the privilege of increasing the price to the consumer by forty cents per hundred pounds. The farmer was given thirty-five cents more but the distributors received an additional five cents. It was not the object of the investigation held by this government to increase the price of milk to the consumer; the object was to have a more equal division of the proceeds of the labour of the producer, which he does not get at present.

I communicated with the commission last fall in an effort to have them fix the price of cream, and they told me that they would look into the matter. Up to date they have not done so. The farmer is supposed to have expensive equipment; he must have his premises fixed up in just such a way and he has to wear just such clothing when he goes to milk—they will be wanting him to wear a dress suit pretty soon. He must do all these things but the price of cream has not been fixed. On May 28, 1933, when this investigation was being made, the price of butter was 28 cents per pound. On that day a Toronto dairy paid $1.28 for a gallon of 40 per cent cream. This gallon of cream was reduced down to 30 per cent with surplus or separated milk. The whole process cost the dairy between $1.37 and $1.38. That product was sold to the consumer for $5.68—three times as great a return as in the milk business; and the farmer gets no benefit. I would not take up so much time, but I do not like to have such a bombastic outburst from the hon. member, denouncing the government and making a lot of misstatements as he did.

Often we hear that the government should not be in business. I contend that the government has been in business a long time. The government has even gone into the business of fixing time, which is a bad thing for the farmer; I know of no legislation that hurts the farmer more than daylight saving. Nothing does more damage in the country. The price of labour is indicated in the Labour Gazette, showing that printers receive from $5 a day up, bricklayers, plumbers, gas fitters, carpenters and others from $8 to $10 a day, for an eight hour day. Is that business? I contend that a good deal of the hardship which the farmer is suffering to-day is the result of governmental interference—and when I speak of the government I mean federal, provincial and municipal governments. There have been a good many restrictive, regulating and grading acts which the farmer has to put up with. I am not opposed to grading; I want that distinctly understood. I am not opposed to grading so far as our export trade is concerned, because we must have it if we are to compete; but I do not think it is right to pass a grading act and then fail to see that it is properly administered.

To-day they are buying eggs, and they will continue to buy eggs during the summer at 7 to 10 cents per dozen, especially in the west; they will put them in cold storage, and six or seven months hence they will receive from 40 to 50 cents a dozen for these eggs, for which they are paying from 7 to 10 cents a dozen. Is that business? If the government is in business it should prevent that sort of thing. In 1932 the distributors in this country paid 16½ and 17 cents a pound for butter. They bought butter all summer, during the time the farmer was producing, and in the winter it went up to 32 cents a pound. What consolation is it to the farmer to have butter selling at 32 cents a pound when he has none to sell? There is no satisfaction in that kind of business. In 1933 the distributors paid 17½ and 18 cents a pound during the producing season and in the winter butter went up to 30 cents. This last summer they paid 18½ and 19 cents and this winter the price went up to 26 cents, and it would have gone up to 30 or 32 cents had it not been for the surplus in storage. There was some 14 million pounds in cold storage and this had a tendency to keep the price down. Why should such things be allowed to go on? We consume practically one hundred per cent of the butter produced in this country. We consume ninety-eight per cent of all our farm produce, except wheat and cheese. In this connection, we hear the opposition crying for markets. Not only this year but throughout the past five years that has been their cry—let us have markets. I say to them, use your common sense and tell us where you can find a market with as high a price as you can find right in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: In the United States.

Mr. PICKEL: During the past five months, as the result of artificial stimulation, the American people have boosted their prices to our level and a little higher in some instances; but a year ago we got three times as much for our pork, ten cents more for our butter and ten cents a dozen more for our eggs. Is the artificial stimulation going to continue there? I fear for that country. I hope they will come out all right, but if they do not the result will be reflected in this country. They are spending billions over there to stimulate prices and there is a good deal of grumbling all over the country.

In my opinion our cold storage plants, on which thousands upon thousands of dollars have been spent, do not help the farmers at all. Who gets the advantage of cold storage? The commission man. It does not help the farmer, because it enables the commission man to buy the farmer's produce in the summer at a low price and leave it in cold storage; and when the farmer stops producing in the fall of the year the cold storage operators boost prices, making millions. These plants were built presumably for the benefit of the farmer, but the farmer has been neglected and he gets no advantage from them. As they are operated to-day they are a curse to him.

Before I close there are one or two facts I want to present to the house. Perhaps I shall be told that my age accounts for what I am going to say—they tell me I am getting old and childish, and perhaps I am—but to me the two gravest menaces that we are facing in this country to-day, and the same is true of the world at large, are, first, automobiles, and second, the lack of discipline among the youth. The automania is a perfect curse; and what is to become of the youth of the country? There is no discipline among the children. I was surprised and amused the other night when the estimates of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling) were being considered and he was being questioned about the relief camps. It seems that there has been some trouble in regard to discipline. I should like to know how you can have an aggregation of young people without discipline; it is absolutely impossible. Discipline is the first requisite, but where is there any discipline among the young people? There is no more home life, absolutely none. There may be individual exceptions, but as a general rule there is no more home life. The children come and go as they please. If you tell them to gee they will haw, and if you tell them to go east they will go west. They think of nothing but sport, dancing and social gatherings. Take the schools, sir, the colleges and universities; they are just athletic recruiting grounds. The athletic instructors draw down salaries twice as large as those of the professors. Look at the newspapers; they are half filled with sporting news. You see young fellows rush for the latest editions of the papers, and all they look at is the sporting page; that is all that interests them. How are we going to get at these people, these future rulers of this country? I do not know how we are going to discipline them; to my mind that is certainly a serious question. This might be a big field for the churches. As I said a moment ago, when the Minister of National Defence was putting through his estimates two or three members were questioning him quite closely; evidently they did not think the inmates of the relief camps were being treated very well, but I noticed that most of those who spoke on that subject were bachelors, who did not know much about it.

I am not going to keep the house in suspense any longer, Mr. Speaker; I am just going to stop. To my mind our most important problem is our young people, girls as well as boys; one is as bad as the other. Where are they going? You can do nothing with them. I hope someone will evolve some scheme by which they may be brought to their senses.

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): Mr. Speaker, a number of those who have taken part in this debate have congratulated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the budget he brought down this year. I think, sir, the highest commendation he can receive is the commendation of the general public. I think no budget brought down in recent years has received the support and inspired the confidence of the Canadian people to such an extent as the budget that was brought down just a few days ago. I am sure, sir, that the support that has been extended by the Canadian people proves that they realize that in the very difficult and trying situation we have had to face this government have been doing their very best by the country. It was a moderate, well ordered, well reasoned budget, which gave detailed information as to our financial standing and very full information as to trade generally. I think it offers ample proof that we are making progress out of the difficulties which arose following the close of the war.

There has been some improvement; it is true that there is room for much more, but I think when we compare our condition with that of other countries we should be grateful that we are getting on so well. It is true also that we still have the problem of unemployment, though it is getting less serious as time goes. Hon. gentlemen opposite will recall that while they were sitting to the right of the speaker they also had their problems in connection with unemployment. They will recall that in 1924 and 1925, when the full effects of the war had not been felt in the United States, when business was booming in that country and when we were importing large quantities of manufactured goods, 500,000 Canadians went to the United States in search of work, relieving to that extent the unemployment problem which faced the government of that day. At that time the government had at their disposal the key to the situation. They could have applied tariffs similar to those applied by this government, in order to save manufacturing in this country, but did not see fit to do so.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are free with their criticisms of the government in regard to unemployment, but it is rather strange that while during the five or six days of this debate sixteen speakers on this side of the house have taken part, only three members of the official opposition have expressed their views, and of the three only one was an ex-cabinet minister. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite must have opinions of their own. I do not know whether they are going to follow the course they have adopted thus far in the session and support the budget, but if they are not going to do so they should express their views and tell us why they do not intend to vote for it. At any rate I suppose we will see a little later, perhaps they yet may be induced to take part in this debate before it closes.

We on this side of the house protest against the campaign and propaganda of the opposition. Apparently they are unwilling to recognize that unemployment is a world condition, and they have also been carrying on a campaign in an effort to get the Canadian people to believe that there is some danger of the government amalgamating or unifying the railways. That propaganda has been carried on quite vigorously among the railway employees. No member of the Conservative party, much less a member of the government, is on record as favouring such a course; it remains for the opposition to look within their own ranks where there are two members, one an ex-cabinet minister, who have advocated amalgamation or unification. As a matter of fact I believe the ex-cabinet minister was responsible for the word "unification" in the first instance. Surely the speech of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), delivered last Wednesday, will settle that point so far as the government are concerned.

The opposition also try to convince the people that when customs duties are increased the manufacturers take full advantage of such increases and raise their prices as much as the increases permit. In some cases it may be necessary to raise prices; I can understand how in certain lines of business a firm may be losing money. Perhaps a small increase in the tariff will give the firm enough lee-way to carry on, and in such cases they must raise prices. For a while I should like to discuss one point in particular. I hold in my hand a leaflet entitled Strangling Canada, issued by the National Liberal Federation of Canada; it is leaflet number one. If any further proof is needed that this is official literature of the opposition it can be found by referring to the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on January 31, 1935, which will be found at page 385 of Hansard. In reference to farm implements they have this to say:

> A comparison of the charges against farm implements during the previous Liberal and Conservative regimes with that of the present Bennett administration is also striking. As these are imports mainly from the United States, the comparative tariffs here given are for imports from that country. A glance will show how far, in this question, the present government has departed from the Liberal policy, and how remote also it stands from the policies of Messrs. Borden and Meighen.

Then follow a list of charges, as they are called, on mowers and binders, as follows:

Mowers and Binders

	Per cent
Conservative
Borden	12½
Meighen	12½
Liberal
King	6
Conservative
Bennett	25
Preference	28¾

Then follow similar quotations in regard to cultivators, harvesters, ploughs and other agricultural implements.

The matter to which I wish to pay special attention is farm implements. The literature which has been sent out, part of which I have just read, gives, I think, a wrong impression; therefore I wish to discuss briefly the general effect of the imposition of certain customs duties.

On February 13 last, in this house, a motion was made by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) to the effect that farm implements and machinery should be free from customs duty. Inasmuch as farm implements are duty free under the British preference, and any that are imported come mostly from the United States, it follows that the mover of that motion was in favour of free entry from the United States. The hon. member who proposed the motion became rather famous in 1924 as the author of the phrase "ringing the death-knell of protection." I suppose this is another effort to ring the death-knell of protection. He began with the statement that gradually through the application of the policy of protection manufacture has become concentrated, and combines, trusts and mergers have sprung into being. In order to correct that condition he proposes to go for relief to a country of higher tariffs and immeasurably greater mergers than ever existed in Canada. Does he expect corporations to be all that is pernicious and wicked in Canada but all that is benign and friendly when they happen to be located in the United States? I am afraid his trustfulness must be even greater than his fine open countenance would indicate. I think he should give some consideration to the Combines Investigation Act which was passed in 1923 when the present opposition was in power. By that act men engaged in a certain line of business who meet together and come to the conclusion that it is in their interest to charge certain prices for their goods and then all quote the same prices become liable to prosecution. But if they meet together and discuss the same problem and decide to pool their resources and form a combine and all go into one company and charge what price they like, then they are within the law. So it seems to me that piece of legislation might be called an incentive to combine rather than Combines Investigation Act.

Another argument used, and very properly, was that we must buy in order to sell. That argument has been often heard in this house. But I would remind the hon. gentleman that in respect to the United States the balance of trade has been against us for many years, and at no time was it more heavily against us than between 1921 and 1930 when the present opposition was in power. During all that time the United States market was gradually lost to us by progressive increases in their tariff. We have already bought and bought heavily, but we are looking in vain for the opportunity to sell. That situation has been brought forcibly before hon. gentlemen opposite very many times in this house, but they seem to forget it, and are willing and anxious to buy and buy and buy without any trade in return.

We all know that the Canadian customs duties were raised in September, 1930, particularly on agricultural implements. The tariff was raised from six per cent in some cases to twenty-five per cent, in other cases from seven and a half per cent under the general tariff to twenty-five per cent. However, there are many people who do not know that despite the increase in duties farm implements have been cheaper to the Canadian consumer during the past three seasons than they were at the time of the 1930 tariff increases. The prices for 1935 are not yet announced, so it is not possible to give comparisons for this year. I have been especially interested in this feature as at one time I was engaged in the manufacture of these goods, and later in the manufacture of the steel that enters into their construction. The changes in tariff were given in a return to a question asked by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) on November 19, 1932, and answered on January 30, 1933. Taking for example binders and mowers, which come under item 445 of the customs tariff, prior to 1917 the duties were: British preference, 12½ per cent; intermediate, 12½ per cent, and general, 12½ per cent. It remained so until May 24, 1922, when they were reduced to: British preference, 7½; intermediate, 10; general, 10. That held until April, 1924, when the British preference was made free, and the intermediate and general six per cent. Then on Septmeber 17, 1930, the present government made the British preference free; intermediate, 15, and general tariff, 25. The same thing applies roughly to many other types of implements. I have here three different numbers of the customs tariff 445, binders and mowers; 446, hay rakes, cultivators, etc., and 448, hay loaders and hay tedders. This I ask to have put on Hansard; I have read enough of the document, I think, to permit it to go on the record:

I made the statement that prices have been lowered. I have here an advertisement of the Massey-Harris Company which appeared in the Toronto Star of July 9, 1931. Among other things it says:

> The price to the farmer has not been increased on any implement manufactured and sold in Canada by this company since the tariff on agricultural machinery was raised in September (1930) or since the recent budget of June first.
> Substantial reductions in price have been made since September last on an important number of implements.

The question of prices has come in for a great deal of attention on the part of hon. members during last session. I have here a collection of prices which I have gathered from time to time. These prices are on different types of agricultural implements, and are taken from price lists in my possession dating from 1905 until the present year. From 1905 until 1916 there was very little change. Take for example a 7-foot binder with no attachments; in 1905 it sold for $134, in 1908 for $115, in 1911 to 1913 for $138, in 1916 for $133, in 1917 for $149. The year 1918 was the first year in which there was much advance—that was the last year of the war—and in that year the price was $210. It continued to rise until in 1921 it reached the highest, $281. Generally speaking it ran about $237 until 1930, when it rested at $232. That was the year in which the tariff was changed. In 1932 the same binder sold for $183.24 despite the fact that the tariff was then 25 per cent instead of six per cent. In 1933 there was some difference in the price; the International Harvester Company had what they called a wheat plan discount. On the day of the announcement of that discount in the newspapers—the price being affected by the price of wheat—the price of wheat was 49⅞ cents, which allowed a discount of 12½ per cent off the list price. That brought the price of the International Harvester Company binder down to $190.30. In that year the Massey-Harris Company pursued a different policy, namely that of having a fixed discount of ten per cent off the list price. Their binder during the whole of the season was sold for $195.75. That of course was a seven-foot binder with no attachments. The price I have given is the Ontario price and the price f.o.b. branch houses in various parts of the province. I am informed that about the same ratio existed, so far as the western provinces are concerned. I have before me the figures for eleven different kinds of implements, showing retail prices from 1905 to 1933. I do not purpose reading those figures into the record unless there is objection to their being placed on Hansard; but if there is, I shall read them.

This is a concise table of what has happened in connection with the price of implements, and one well worthy of the perusal of hon. members. This information was taken from the official price records of the companies in question. Although duties were increased in 1930, as I have said they reached their lowest point in 1932. Since that time there have been some fluctuations and some increases. This list of eleven implements indicates that the prices are all lower than they were in 1930. Perhaps an outline of these differences might be of interest to hon. members. The price in 1934 for a 7-foot binder with no attachments was $14.50 less than it was in 1930; the price of a 5-foot heavy mower was $1 lower; of a 10-foot dumping hay rake, $3 lower; of a 6-foot cultivator with nine stiff teeth, $5.50 lower; of a 14-disc disc harrow, three horse, out-throw $3.50 lower; of a 13-disc disc drill, two horse, $11 lower; of a 13-hoe drill, $9 lower; of a western single disc drill, twenty inch marker, $12 lower; of a hay loader, steel windrow with forecarriage, $5 lower; of farm wagon wears, skein 3½, tires ½ by 2½, $10 lower; of an 8-fork hay tedder, $2.50 lower.

These are comparisons with the prices that obtained in 1930 when the duty stood at six per cent. The hon. member for West Edmonton has stated: "It is true that during and after the war the prices of farm machinery went up tremendously, almost as high as they are to-day." The hon. member claims to have been a salesman of agricultural implements during the years he mentioned, but so far as prices are concerned it seems to me he should have been better posted before making his statement. I suppose we must say to him that he is wrong again.

May I go a step farther and consider the effect of the increase in duties on the amount of implement manufacturing done in Canada. I have before me figures which have been compiled by and secured from the bureau of statistics. These tables show the value of production per year up to and including 1933. By adding the imports to production and subtracting the exports I have arrived at the requirements of Canada. I suppose I need not go into details in connection with these figures, but may I observe some interesting points in connection with them.

Between the years 1920 and 1924, when as I stated previously duties were fairly steady, and not below ten per cent, these figures would indicate that Canada manufactured 65 per cent of her needs and imported 35 per cent. As soon as the duties were lowered, namely in the year 1924, the position was adversely affected. During the years 1925 and 1930 inclusive, Canada manufactured only 47·2 per cent of her needs as compared with 65 per cent in the preceding period, and imported 52·8 per cent as compared with 35 per cent in the preceding period. Then, as soon as the duties were raised in 1930 we find another change. In the years 1931, 1932 and 1933 Canada manufactured 66·3 per cent of her requirements and imported 33·7 per cent.

These figures indicate, sir, what can be done, so far as increasing manufactures in Canada is concerned, when the market is reserved for Canadian manufacturers. As prices have not been advanced, but on the other hand have been lowered, that of course constitutes a step in the right direction. In his observations the hon. member for West Edmonton asked, "Why does the government persist in leaving those companies behind a twenty-five per cent tariff, which results in placing extremely heavy burdens upon the purchaser? Do not be misled by the statement that on every occasion they do not add the protection." I believe I have proved to the satisfaction of hon. members who are listening that so far as agricultural implements are concerned the protection has not been added to the prices charged the user. The hon. member sponsoring the resolution makes an attempt to prove that manufacturers always take advantage of protection. He has given a table quoting certain statistics concerning employees' salaries and wages, gross value of production and so on.

The hon. gentleman has given the answer to the question many people have asked, namely, as to why prices rise when production goes down. If hon. members interested will turn to page 784 of Hansard, February 13 of this year, they will find that salaries and wages in the agricultural implement industry are given at a certain figure and that gross value of production is given at another figure. In comparing the statistics it will be found that the salaries and wages in the year 1930 constituted 35·5 per cent of the gross value of production. Then, in 1933, business having fallen off owing to poor crops, other figures are presented. In this instance, however, the amount of salaries and wages has risen to 57·2 per cent of the gross value of production.

That I think is the very cogent answer to the question. We note that the figure is 35·5 per cent when production is high and 57·2 per cent when production is low. Manufacturing in Canada extends benefits to other lines of business. All hon. members know about the railway problem. We know that the railways are starved for business and believe that if business were to revive to the point it had reached a few years ago the railway problem would be a thing of the past. So far as importation of implements is concerned the Canadian railways get, as their part of the freight rates, a proportion based on the mileage that the Canadian line hauls the goods, as compared with the total haulage from the point of shipment in the United States. In most cases it runs about half the rate, which would mean roughly speaking that on a car of freight shipped in from the United States the Canadian railways would get revenue from half the car. It is a well known fact among those who are accustomed to manufacturing that it takes from two to six carloads of raw products of various kinds brought into a manufacturing establishment to manufacture one car for shipment out. In that case if we take four carloads, the Canadian railroads will get the freight on four carloads going in and on one carload going out, whereas in the case of imported goods they would get the freight on half a carload only. It seems to me that that is a very important point, and it is something we should not overlook when we are trying to foster manufacturing in Canada. The benefit of manufacturing these agricultural implements in Canada extends to other industries. If they are made in Canada, from 40 to 45 per cent of the value of the finished implement is materials from other factories, from steel mills, malleable iron and steel foundries, cotton mills, pipe mills, bolt and nut factories. Leather, timber, paint and varnish and a hundred other items are involved, and all these factories are subject to the same conditions I have mentioned as to freight in and out of their works. The labour employed in all these activities and their needs in food, clothing and shelter, all give a cumulative advantage to the country which it is hard to estimate.

Finally if this idea of free trade or free entry in agricultural implements became the order of the day, what would happen to prices in Canada after free entry had been in vogue for perhaps a few years? Our manufacturing establishments now making implements would not be able to compete with the United States factories any more than they can compete in the manufacture of farm tractors which are now allowed free entry. Practically no tractors are made in Canada; they are all imported. It is true that the tractor is not as much in vogue now as it was a few years ago, but many millions of dollars' worth of tractors have been imported into Canada, all free of duty. Does anyone suppose, after these implement factories in Canada had closed down one after the other, that the makers in the United States, or anywhere else for that matter, would leave their prices at a low level? It is a vain hope, an assumption which is not well founded. I am sure that as soon as the opportunity arose, prices would advance and we would be at the mercy of manufacturers outside our own country.

The price statement I have made is not hearsay, nor is it opinion. It is a statement of fact, published in the different retail price lists which have been sent out from year to year by the manufacturers in Canada, and as I said before I have all these price lists from 1905 down to the present year.

Now what does the hon. gentleman who proposes this resolution hope to get in exchange for the business he would send to the United States? I have shown from the records of the bureau of statistics that when duties were lowered to six per cent the Canadian production was reduced from 65 per cent to 47 per cent of our needs, and if free entry were adopted no doubt a very much larger percentage would come in, probably 95 per cent. I have cited the example of tractors, and I have not the slightest doubt but that our experience with them would be repeated so far as other agricultural implements are concerned.

In regard to taking advantage of the duty, the hon. gentleman who proposed the resolution to which I have referred stated that the price of parts went up when a certain duty was raised. Now the question of parts is rather a debatable one. I understand that some of the western provinces have legislation which provides that any company selling in the province must keep a supply of parts in stock for a period of ten years in at least one centre in the province. That is very nice and very necessary, and no doubt it is needed, but it costs money and it adds to the price of the parts. Then after the ten year period has expired, or perhaps later, there is no doubt in my mind that a large percentage of the stock of parts goes into the scrap pile and becomes of no value at all, so that for these reasons the prices of parts will not be satisfactory to a great many people.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his good business judgment in not disturbing the duties which are now on the statute book in so far as agricultural implements are concerned. Beyond question the advance in duties in 1930 was of benefit to all concerned, and I believe that a fair and dispassionate review of the whole situation will confirm what I have said. Hon. gentlemen opposite, perhaps with a wave of the hand, may try to dismiss these things as being of no account, but I have given the facts and the figures, and I feel sure that I am right in regard to them.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon a discussion of the budget proper there are one or two things not connected directly with the budget which I wish to mention. I want to refer in the first place to some remarks that were made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) with the assistance of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) on March 29, as found at page 2254 of Hansard. The hon. member for Vancouver South said:

> Who organized the unemployed in Regina?
> Mr. Garland (Bow River): Who referred to him as Judas?
> Mr. MacInnis: The present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he was an agitator.

I very much regret, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Vancouver South should refer to the Prime Minister of this country as an agitator during his absence from the house and especially under the condition of his present absence, and I think the hon. member for Vancouver South will regret it himself just as much when he has had the chance to think it over. He went on:

> Who organized the unemployed at Regina and gave them buttons to wear in the lapels of their coats?
> Mr. Donnelly: The Tories.
> Mr. MacInnis: Chickens will come home to roost.

It is wonderful, Mr. Speaker, how much these gentlemen who live so far from Regina know about these things, and it is wonderful how careless they are of the facts. That matter was brought up somewhere during the campaign in 1930, and if hon. gentlemen will consult the columns of the Regina Leader-Post, a Liberal paper, they will find there a letter from one of the officials of the association of the unemployed in which he says that the Conservative party did not organize the unemployed to attend Mr. Bennett's meeting on the tenth day of June, the day in question, but that the unemployed asked the party to give them a reserved portion of the auditorium so that they might attend the meeting and listen to what Mr. Bennett had to say with regard to unemployment. I assume that in order to identify themselves they wore a little bit of ribbon a quarter of an inch square on the lapels of their coats, but those badges were not placed there by the Conservative party nor were the unemployed organized by the Conservative party. I had occasion once before to deny that statement in the house, but apparently it needs denial over and over again. As the hon. member for Vancouver South says, "Chickens will come home to roost." But the kind of chickens he talks about are fouler birds than chickens are themselves.

I wish to make a passing reference to the national gallery. In my view the pictures in the national gallery are the property of the people of Canada, and as long as they are stored either in the museum at Ottawa or in the vaults of some building in Ottawa, as I believe many of them are, they are not of very much value to the people of Canada as art, whatever they may be as treasure trove. I firmly believe it is easier to take these pictures to the people than to take the people to Ottawa to see the pictures. While it is true that travelling exhibits visit various portions of Canada for a short space of time each year, I am of the opinion that the national gallery should be decentralized; that instead of collecting a huge gallery in Ottawa we should have smaller exhibits in various parts of the country, in the capitals of the provinces. With the pictures circulating through the capitals in that way those who live at a distance from Ottawa may have a chance to appreciate art as well as those who come to Ottawa.

There is another matter to which I wish to direct attention, and that is the growing custom of governing by commissions. It did not start with this government, but I am sorry to say that it has been continued to some extent by this government. I am of the opinion that the sooner we get back to the position where we are governed by bodies who have to do with the administration of the law of this country and where responsibility is placed in departments that are made responsible to the government of the country, instead of to parliament, which means no responsibility at all, the sooner we will get a better class of administration and one that the people can examine and control.

Returning to the budget; it is a very admirable presentation by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). We have had criticism which at least does not err on the side of brevity from the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). The hon. member, representing the Liberal party, has moved an amendment, and a subamendment has been moved by those who represent a body of opinion outside of the two old parties. The amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth reads:

> This house regrets that the proposals submitted by the Minister of Finance on March 22 are entirely inadequate to meet the serious and acute situation prevailing in Canada and afford an additional reason why appeal to the people should not be longer delayed.

One would have thought that if the hon. gentleman, who has held high office in this dominion for so long found any serious fault with the proposals submitted, or deemed them inadequate to meet the situation which prevails, and had in his possession other proposals which would have met it more adequately, he would have done his duty as a member of the opposition by putting forward those proposals. My criticism of the hon. gentleman is, that at no stage in his amendment and at no stage in his address did he depart from the practice which the Liberal party has followed since 1930. Since that time hon. gentlemen opposite have played the game of the frog who sat beside the pond with his mouth open hoping that providence would send him a fly. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not offered a policy of any kind or made any suggestions as to how this country could be aided. They have opposed with all their might every suggestion which has been brought forward to assist the people of this country. They have fought year after year and time after time, even to the extent of requiring closure before we could possibly get any relief bills passed to take care of the people. I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite and their followers throughout the country make the statement that the men in the relief camps are being paid Chinamen's wages of twenty cents a day, but I would point out to the country through you, Mr. Speaker, that had the wishes of the opposition been carried out there would not have been a one cent piece voted, let alone a five cent piece, with which to pay these men the so-called Chinaman's wages along with providing clothing, shelter and food. This is what these men have received from this government in spite of the opposition of those who sit opposite. How hon. gentlemen opposite under the circumstances came to consider themselves the custodians of the interests of those in distress is beyond my comprehension. They have opposed every attempt by the people of Canada to assist those in need.

The second part of the amendment asks for an appeal to the people and suggests that this appeal should be no longer delayed. What has happened to the desire previously expressed by hon. members to have social legislation put upon the statute books of this country at this session? This is the third time this session that they have moved motions which if successful would have dissolved parliament and sent hon. members tc the country for reelection without any social reform measures having been passed. In view of these facts what can we say to their statement that they are anxious to proceed with the program of reform?

The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) rejects the idea of an immediate election as it asks that all that part of the amendment after the word "Canada" be struck out. The subamendment recommends the use of social credit to relieve the conditions faced by the people of this country. I am sorry the hon. member was not more definite in his proposal with regard to social credit. He did tell us that probably 300,000 people would take advantage of his proposition and receive $50 per month for twelve months. It would take $180,000,000 per year to carry out the provisions of the subamendment of the hon. member. The hon. member did not tell us how the social credit was to be distributed or in what form it was to be distributed, whether it was to be printed currency or something else. If it was to be printed currency, he did not tell us what effect it was going to have upon the exchange situation or upon the possibilities of our carrying on the international trade about which the hon. member at times waxes so enthusiastic. He did not tell us how the issuing of social credit was going to prove of any benefit beyond the giving to some person of a piece of paper which might be of some value for a month or so. There is one thing to be said in favour of the subamendment; it rejects the idea of having an election until after we have had the opportunity of completing the program of social legislation now before the house.

There are certain reasons why I desire to express my approval of the budget. My first reason is because of the increase in income taxes. Hon. members opposite often say that the Conservative party is a little tender with the incomes of those in the higher brackets, in fact the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth rather pooh-poohed and belittled these increases. It might be interesting to have the record of the Liberal party with respect to income taxes and to find out just who was tender with those in the higher brackets. I think it will be found that the Liberal party is the sinner in this regard. I have before me a statement furnished by the Department of National Revenue, income tax division, which gives a comparison of taxes paid on different incomes in 1921, when the Meighen government was in office; in 1930, when the King government was in office, and in 1933, when the Bennett government was in office. The latter figures are given without including the increases provided for in the budget this year. These are as follows:

All through the schedule we find that the taxes imposed by the Conservative governments upon those receiving higher incomes were practically double the taxes imposed by the Liberal party.

I am glad to know that further exemptions in sales tax have been provided. This is a step in the right direction and will benefit many people. Another item is the removal of the excise tax of three per cent on goods imported into Canada from Great Britain and the empire. It is an additional move to help empire trade. Then the customs tariff was reduced on forty-eight items and increased on four, and there was a small change in the empire content of certain articles purchased in the empire. Because of these proposals; because of the history of this country, described by the budget, the history of returning prosperity, of continued economy in administration, of reduced interest rates, of expanding trade, of new trade agreements, of increased employment, of rising prices for primary products, of adjustments of farm debts, of expanding revenues, of balanced budgets, of favourable trade balances, of assistance to the provinces and the extension of farm loans—because of that history, I am very much in favour of the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance and wish to congratulate him and the government on the showing they have made during the return to prosperity from the depths of the depression in 1931, 1932 and 1933.

I wish now to deal with the second part of the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth—that is, that there should be an immediate appeal to the country. In my judgment there are many reasons why there should not be an immediate appeal to the country. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) gave one of them the other day, namely, that an immediate appeal would disfranchise two or three hundred thousand voters who have come of age since the lists were established. An hon. member says that they will not vote Liberal anyway, and that is why my hon. friends opposite wish to disfranchise them. But there are several important problems facing this country and it is necessary that they should receive proper consideration before any appeal is made to the electorate.

There is first of all the question of treaties, and in particular the question of empire treaties and the attitude of my hon. friends opposite with respect to imperial trade. During the election of 1930 the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) posed in Ontario as a great imperialist—Look what we did for imperial trade through the Dunning budget. That was his proclamation all through the country, and the then leader of the opposition, now Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), was represented by him as an anti-imperialist who was opposed to the imperial connection. The leader of the opposition has declared that he is not in favour of protection, but I have before me a report that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of October 20, 1925, from Kingston, Ontario, in which the then Prime Minister, now leader of the opposition, was reported:

We realize that our industries have to have safeguards—

Not protection, but safeguards, whatever the difference is.

—with respect to competition from other parts of the world, competition from the country to the south of us, competition from conditions as they are in England, and we think that is all the more reason why in these days of depreciated currency and the like we should have the benefit of expert advice and information on all these great questions of the tariff.

Where then was free trade, where was the fifty per cent preference which he was going to give England, instead of safeguarding this country against conditions as they existed in England, especially in those days of depreciated currency? And what about the criticism we have received from the other side day in and day out because, in view of the depreciated currency in other countries, we have imposed dumping exchange duties so as to protect the structure of this country from exchange on goods coming in under depreciated currencies? In connection with these treaties, and in connection also with the difference between a preference for a preference and a preference for a hope, I wish to quote some remarks of the Prime Minister of England, the Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 14, 1931. According to that report Mr. MacDonald said:

> But we got orders for British industry made possible by preferences, and when the orders came the British manufacturer could not execute them because he had made an arrangement with the United States manufacturer not to put his goods into the Canadian market. "The very people who made these arrangements," concluded the head of the Labour government, "are now attacking the government because they did not pull off economic arrangements with the dominions the other day."

After twenty-eight years of "preference for a hope," of giving the British people preferred entry into our markets, we have the leader of the government there stating that instead of trying to get their goods into our markets under these arrangements, so that they could tie up with us, they tied up with United States firms, so that the Canadian market should belong to United States firms and not to the British—doubtless in return for something else somewhere. And that is why our imports from Great Britain are not as great as they otherwise would be, because British trade had entangled itself with agencies and representatives in New York, who were given agencies for the whole of the North American continent, and who saw either that British goods did not come to Canada or that they should come through New York, and were consequently credited to imports from the United States rather than from Great Britain.

In connection with these same treaties, we had the attitude of the Liberal party as expressed in the debate on the treaties. We have the declaration of the leader of the opposition that when he is elected to office he will restore the tariff to the point where it was when he left office, which means that these treaties cannot exist, because 167 items put on the free list by these treaties would have tariffs reimposed on them if the right hon. gentleman were elected and carried out that threat. Then he fought the historic battle of Liberalism to prevent these treaties from coming into effect; he declared that they violated all Liberal principles and destroyed Canadian autonomy. I wonder if hon. members have read the speech he made at Quebec when he said that Canada had been reduced to colonial status because we passed these treaties, and that our nationality had gone. They were going to involve us in questions of imperial defence and, according to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), they would destroy our lumber trade completely. But in spite of that they voted for it all; they swallowed the destruction of the lumber trade, swallowed our destroyed autonomy, swallowed the danger of our entering into imperial defence, swallowed the violation of Liberal principles, on condition that we inflate the dollar and put it on the same level as the pound.

The leader of the opposition came back from a visit to England and reported that there was no support for the treaties there. A few days later the English House of Commons nailed the story; they saw it for what it was worth. They approved the treaties by one of the largest majorities recorded in the British House of Commons. This impressed the right hon. gentleman so much that at the great meeting of the national council which was held in Ottawa in January, in the midst of a discussion of peace, he said that we should not be able to repeal these treaties but that it would be necessary to modify them in favour of international trade if they interfered with such trade. If they interfered with international trade they would have to be modified; in other words, where we had to choose between Great Britain and the United States, we would choose the United States rather than Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is your authority?

Mr. TURNBULL: The press. Although the press reports were to the effect I have indicated, there has been no denial from any member of the Liberal party since then, and there was no repudiation of the press reports during the debates on the treaties. For these reasons it is necessary for us to consider whether it is safe to trust the renewal of these treaties to a party that has expressed itself so violently in opposition to them and in favour of international trade rather than of imperial trade—a party that has expressed itself as opposed to these treaties because they involved this country in complications.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And you are afraid to bring in a motion to void them. You deliberately shirked your motion; you shelved it.

Mr. TURNBULL: I suppose my hon. friend across the way will give us a vote of thanks because he was not compelled to put himself on record again in regard to the lumber trade of British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will discuss that when the time comes. I know far more about it than you do.

Mr. TURNBULL: Another question that will arise during the lifetime of the next parliament is that of converting a large amount of our tax free debt. The present government has successfully converted over a billion dollars of debt with an annual interest saving of approximately $15,000,000; it has reduced interest rates in this country from five per cent to the vicinity of two and a half per cent, and bonds which were free of income tax have been replaced by bonds which are taxable. Another conversion of that kind must occur in 1937. The people of this country must consider whether they would rather trust that conversion to a philosopher who writes books which are forgotten by everyone, including himself, or to a business administration that has made a success of that sort of conversion in days gone by.

A third problem that must receive the consideration of the people of this country is the railway problem. Hon. members opposite shake their heads and laugh over the railway problem. Nero fiddled while Rome was burning, and while the railway problem was being created during the term of office of hon. gentlemen opposite they were still laughing and telling the country everything was all right.

Mr. HOWARD: No one is laughing now; everyone is crying.

Mr. TURNBULL: I hope they are tears of regret that my hon. friend is shedding over the record of his party in connection with these railways. This year we have a deficit on the national system of some $40,000,000, for which the Minister of Finance has had to provide. The capital indebtedness of these railways was increased by $922,000,000 during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, according to the Duff report at page 27. The interest on that sum is approximately what it will cost this country this year to take care of the national railways, so if that $922,000,000 had not been added to the capital indebtedness we would have saved approximately $45,000,000 in interest. I wonder if my hon. friends are going to say that the purchase of six branch lines in 1929 for $35,000,000 was a proper expenditure of the public money; I wonder if they are not shedding tears of regret over it now. I know that Professor Norman McL. Rogers, who is a Liberal candidate in Kingston, is authority for the statement that the purchase of these railways by the dominion government, relieving the provinces concerned of their obligations in regard to the bonds of those railways, which were not paid, might have been an act of philanthropy on the part of the dominion government but certainly it did not lighten the burden on the Canadian National system. Let hon. gentlemen opposite figure up the interest burden, to say nothing of the capital expenditure, imposed on the country during their maladministration while they were in office. Let them remember also that they knew so little of what was going on that when the salaries that were being paid in Montreal were exposed in the select committee of the House of Commons—after this government came into office—the right hon. leader of the opposition said that he was astounded at these things, that he did not know such salaries were being paid. And the reason he gave for not knowing that such salaries were being paid was that he had always made the time-honoured answer in the House of Commons when questions were asked in regard to salaries, that it was not in the interests of the railway that the public should know what was being paid these men. I notice that my hon. friends across the way are not laughing now; they are getting back to tears of regret. This country must decide whether it is going to place the administration of these railways back in the hands of the Liberal party to be used for political preferment, for the purchase of branch lines which add to the burden of the railways, for the purpose of putting the railways even further into debt, or whether they are going to leave it in the hands of the trustees to be administered as a business institution instead of as a fifth wheel on the Liberal machine.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Keep on attacking the national railways; we understand why.

Mr. TURNBULL: I want to suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that no person is attacking the Canadian National. We are attacking the Liberal party for the abuse to which they subjected the Canadian National. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre is very voluble now, but for the last week he has been glued to his seat under the directions of his leader, afraid to get up and express his own opinions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Listening to a comedy.

Mr. TURNBULL: That has been the trouble with hon. gentlemen opposite. When they mismanage the affairs of the country they consider it a comedy or a joke, but we want an opportunity to let the people know about these things.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear; bring on the election.

Mr. TURNBULL: That is why my hon. friends are anxious to have the election brought on, so that we will not have that opportunity.

Then there is the question of the social reform legislation. What is the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite on that question? They have always approved of it in principle but never in practice. The unemployment insurance policy was in the 1919 platform, where it remained buried and forgotten. The right hon. leader of the opposition included it in the platform he enunciated in this house on February 27, 1933. He went through western Canada in the fall of that year proclaiming his unbounded faith in unemployment insurance, sickness, invalidity and old age insurance, crop insurance and everything else he thought the people of the west would be likely to vote for. Then, having done all that, he came down to the House of Commons and told the people that he had not brought in these measures because he did not know he had the power to do so. Could there be a more glaring deception practised on the people of Canada? We had the leader of a great party going out and telling the public for fifteen years that he was in favour of certain measures and that, if returned to office, he would fulfil his promises, at the same time thinking in his heart of hearts, according to his own statement, that he did not have power to do the things he promised or to provide those things which he was holding himself out to the people as being able to provide. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre laughs that laugh of his again. That is Liberalism a la the present Liberal members of this House of Commons, but it is not Liberalism as the people of this country want to see Liberalism expounded and exposed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Give them a chance.

Mr. TURNBULL: The Liberalism of hon. gentlemen opposite is just about as dead as unemployment insurance was in their hands; it was simply a name. During this session, as I have said, there have been three attempts to force dissolution of the house in order to prevent any major social reforms being passed. When social reform has been introduced hon. members opposite have received it with sneers and jeers. They proclaimed it—at least their leader did—as futile, useless and unconstitutional; then he twirled his thumb and they all got up and voted for this futile, useless and unconstitutional legislation, lest perchance the people might think they were opposed to it. What is going to happen to this social reform legislation, in the event of our immediately dissolving the house as requested by the financial critic of the opposition, and the people deciding, as my hon. friends seem to think they will, to put the Liberal party in office?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Where could they find one?

Mr. TURNBULL: They are going to be faced with a hostile senate, and with a hostile senate they cannot pass any social reform legislation at all. The only kind of legislation that they say they can send to the senate when it is hostile is legislation to repeal section 98 of the criminal code. They send it there because they are listening to their master's voice from the immediate left—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about the Old Age Pensions Act?

Mr. TURNBULL: —and because they know their friends in the senate will defeat it there. The excuse was given, not by me but by members of the opposition themselves and by their leader, that the reason they could not bring in social reform legislation was that they were faced with a hostile senate. The Old Age Pensions Act was an exception to the general rule. In other words they can bring in those things that they want to bring, but the senate is a very fine excuse for anything they do not want to do. It is like a lie, an abomination to the Lord but a very present help in time of trouble.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To the Tory party.

Mr. TURNBULL: The other day when one of the social reform measures was being considered by the house the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) said it was glorifying the bill to oppose it. "There is nothing in it," he said; "let us pass it and get rid of it"—the same old sneer. Now I ask you, Mr. Speaker, would it be safe for the people of this country to entrust the operation of this reform legislation to those who sneer and jeer at it? Would it be safe, in view of their attitude, to leave its administration in their hands?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The people will answer that.

Mr. TURNBULL: Let me remind my hon. friend from Northumberland, who seems to have found his voice, although he has not yet stood up to speak, that the party of which he is a member failed in their duty as a government from 1922 to 1930 and were dismissed from office and the Conservative party put in their place. Let me point out that they are now failing in their duty as an opposition, and the next thing will be that they will be dismissed as the official opposition and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation put in their place.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You will be down there after the next election.

Mr. TURNBULL: There is yet an important item of legislation to come before the house in connection with the mass buying investigation. Can we safely trust this to the opposition? Had we better not put it on the statute books while those who are in favour of it are in office? What was the attitude of the leader of the opposition when the resolution to set up the price spreads and mass buying committee was brought in? At page 190 of Hansard for 1934 he is reported as saying:

> The motion is in large part one of postponing action. What the country is interested in is not so much further inquiry with respect to matters about which nearly everyone knows a great deal, but legislation, if more is required, to meet a situation that is already understood.

If my right hon. friend knew that these conditions existed, he did not pass legislation to stop them, but referred to a book long since on the shelf, entitled Industry and Humanity. Having said that there was no necessity for investigation, he then says: "There is no necessity for any legislation in connection with it; so there was no necessity for either investigation or legislation. While the investigation was still going on the leader of the opposition spoke during a by-election in Ontario and described the whole investigation as humbug. His words were reported in the press as follows:

> Once again, but briefly, Mr. King referred to the Stevens pamphlet. He believed that there was "collusion" between Prime Minister R. B. Bennett and Hon. H. H. Stevens, in this matter —"more in the nature of humbug to serve the political ends of Mr. Bennett and the personal ends of Mr. Stevens."

With that attitude towards the mass buying commission and the legislation to be brought forward would it be safe for the people of this country to entrust such legislation and the administration of it to those who say it was all unnecessary?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Would it be safe to entrust them with anything?

Mr. TURNBULL: Take their general attitude towards these questions. Let me quote from Hansard of June 6, 1934, page 3727, where the leader of the opposition is reported as saying:

> Yesterday the house was told by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that my colleague the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and myself belonged to the school mid-Victorian constitutionalists; and that was held out as a reproach. To those who so assert, may I say that I for one am very proud of being classed of the school of mid-Victorian constitutionalists.

Then there is the question of wheat marketing. During the war we used to hear arm chair generals telling how to defeat the enemy. Many of us were very glad that the arm chair generals were not in command of the forces. The other day we had an arm chair wheat merchant telling us how to sell our wheat. We heard him telling how Mr. McFarland was trying to glorify himself instead of taking care of the farmers' troubles. Picture the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth sitting in his gilded office in St. James street with one of his imported fifty-cent cigars in his mouth and his feet on his mahogany table, advising the farmers of western Canada how to sell their wheat, and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) who never bought or sold a bushel of wheat in his life except on the stock exchange, telling us how the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth could make a better job of it than Mr. McFarland.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): He could not make a worse one.

Mr. TURNBULL: If they keep up that sort of thing they are going to turn every farmer in western Canada against them. Anyone who suggested, when the British market was rising four times as fast as Winnipeg, that the plug should be taken out and wheat allowed to drop to the Argentine level.

thereby further destroying the purchasing power of the farmers of western Canada, has very little knowledge of the trend of thought of the people of the west, and very little knowledge of the effect that the buying power of western Canada has upon employment in eastern Canada. My hon. friends are laughing and jeering still, as they sneer and jeer and laugh at anything. There is no doubt the farmer will get over his troubles even if they do laugh. The job of official opposition should be taken from them and given to the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation if they carry on in this way. In 1928 we had approximately 550,000,000 bushels of wheat in western Canada that sold for approximately $1.25 a bushel, which meant about $675,000,000 of new money. That money came into Ontario and Quebec to buy boots and shoes, clothing, machinery, automobiles and practically everything the farmer requires. When he paid the interest on his mortgage the money came to eastern Canada and was distributed among the bond and stock holders of mortgage companies, who used it largely for the purpose of purchasing the necessaries of life for themselves, and these purchases kept the wheels of industry turning in the central provinces and kept men and women at work. But in the last four or five years when providence did not see fit to send us a crop and when in the absence of an imperial treaty Soviet Russia broke the price of our grain in England, we had about 260,000,000 bushels of wheat, which was selling at 40 cents a bushel, and instead of having $675,000,000 in new money we had about $100,000,000, or a little more, which was not sufficient to keep the people of the central provinces employed. As a consequence unemployment became rife in all parts of the country.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that because of these facts there is no reason why there should be an election at the present time; there is no reason why the party now in office should not continue to carry out its program, and no reason why that program should not be placed before the electors in the proper way and at the proper time. We have had the statement by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), a former Minister of Trade and Commerce, that wheat would find its own market if it were left alone. That view is confirmed by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) who states, "Just leave wheat alone, and it will do what it likes." That is what the opposition has done with everything else. When they were in office they let everything do as it liked, and as a result the country got in a mess. Now in opposition they suggest that wheat should do as it likes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Get up and answer; you can't do it.

Mr. J. B. SWANSTON (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to represent in this chamber a very extensive and important constituency in southwestern Saskatchewan. Comparatively speaking it is one of the newest sections of this great country. To the southwestern portion of Saskatchewan there flocked many new settlers, men and women who were born and raised in many different sections of the globe. Canadians from every part of Canada are to be found there; people from every corner of the British Isles, from France, Belgium, Germany and the United States. Then, a very substantial part of our population is of Scandinavian origin, and the country is fortunate indeed to have as citizens men and women as honest, as progressive and as law-abiding as they are.

These new settlers from all lands have entered upon their duties of making homes for themselves and breaking the virgin soil. In a very short period of time they have accomplished by way of individual development and community effort that which I say is the greatest possible tribute which could be paid to their progressive character. In the short space of a quarter of a century an area which had been untouched by the plough was suddenly changed into an active and well ordered community with beautiful churches, schools, power houses, public buildings, highways, railways, telephones, first class farm homes, and an extensive elevator system.

You will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that this development could be brought about only by mortgaging the future to some extent. Money was borrowed, goods were purchased on credit, lumber was purchased and farm machinery was acquired to improve the land. Just at a time when we thought the difficulties of the district were almost surmounted there came upon us the depression with its low commodity prices. Then followed adverse climatic conditions seriously affecting the area. The people in that section of the country met their difficulties with courage and fortitude. They maintained their school and church services, they maintained their community services—and this all in the face of sacrifices which had to be borne individually and collectively.

At the last session of parliament the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed. It was not until some months after its passage that the preliminary organization could be established. We know now what its effect will be, what it will do in the future for the people on the land. In my section of the country there is only one official receiver, and he is very busy. It is impossible for him to do all the work devolving upon him, but I have urged upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) the necessity for arrangements whereby help may be given and the facilities of the legislation made more readily available to the farmers. I am pleased to say the minister has received my representations and is going to appoint agents to assist the receiver in that section of the country.

The purpose of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is to create an understanding between debtor and creditor. Unfortunately in the past such understanding had disappeared or was fast disappearing, due to the fact that the farmer through no fault of his own was unable to pay and the creditor was unable to collect. There was a tendency on the part of each to magnify his own difficulties, without regard to the other party. However, with this legislation they can get together around a common table; they will appreciate the fact that each has his own difficulties, each has his problems, and that the problems of both can be met only by the farmer being retained on the land as an efficient producer.

When I learned from the Minister of Finance that up to the end of February over two thousand settlements had been effected throughout Canada by the official receiver and by the boards of review, I realized how successful this great experiment had been. When I read the principles announced by the boards of review in the prairie provinces I am convinced that the legislation is going to function as was intended when it passed this parliament a year ago.

For instance, I learn from the joint pronouncement of the three prairie boards of review that they consider the farmer who is reasonably endeavouring to farm his land efficiently and who has been fair and honourable with his creditors is entitled to consideration. I find, further, that the boards of review are interested in seeing that the carrying charges to the farmer are reduced. In the classification of debts they believe special consideration is due in connection with those debts incurred for the necessities of life. This is as it should be. In my opinion a retail merchant who has carried a farmer through difficult times and has furnished him with food and clothing is entitled to further consideration. I would urge upon the minister consideration of an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act which would extend to retailers the informal procedure of arrangement and adjustment of debts as is available to farmers under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. This legislation is new, but it constitutes a real reform, and if carried out by receivers and boards of review—and apparently that is being done—it will mean much for the happiness and the contentment of farmers throughout Canada.

Then, at the last session of parliament amendments to the farm loan act were passed, and further amendments have been passed at the present session. The people in Saskatchewan cannot benefit by the amendments of last year because there was no immediate session of the legislature in Saskatchewan adopting the legislation, and while in fact the legislation was passed, it did not become law until December, 1934. Then came the amendments made to the farm loan act during the present session. The $90,000,000 available through the farm loan board will be of great assistance to the farmer. The farm debt of Canada exceeds one and a half billion dollars. A comparison of these figures would indicate that every farmer could not expect a loan. However, either under one act or the other, so far as his indebtedness is concerned the farmer should be in a position to face the future without fear. Carrying and fixed charges must be reduced, and if we can obtain reasonable commodity prices the farmer will experience no difficulty in meeting his obligations as they become due.

I was glad to hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that he intends that there shall be the closest cooperation between the official receivers appointed under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the farm loan board, once it is established in the province of Saskatchewan. The official receivers will have an intimate knowledge of the condition of the farmer and can be of very real assistance to the farm loan board and to the farmers as well. As a result of the operation of both of these acts the farm debt load in Canada is going to be very materially decreased. I have learned with the greatest interest of the success which the receivers are having in my own part of the country in reducing and rearranging indebtedness which has been all past due and in default.

During a period of high prices for commodities, the price of land naturally rose. Farmers, anxious to extend their own holdings, either for their own use or for the use of their growing sons, found themselves hopelessly involved because of agreements they had entered into. Likewise, they found themselves involved in debts for heavy machinery purchased for the purpose of farming the land, which, with poor crops and low commodity prices, they could not liquidate.

I am glad to note that in dealing with these large obligations of the farmers, the official receivers are making special efforts, that the boards of review are making very real adjustments, and that the net result is that the farmer, with his new set of contracts, can proceed to farm his land with the satisfaction and the knowledge that he can reasonably perform the new obligations he has assumed.

The last census figures indicated that there were in Canada 728,000 farmers. Of this number, almost 90 per cent could be termed by the census authorities as home owning farmers. We are all proud of this fact. As Canadians we believe that our people will be better satisfied, better contented, if they can carry on their agricultural endeavours as owners of their own land. It will be apparent, however, that with the tremendous farm debt load to which I referred there is a very real danger of that very high percentage of home owning farmers being reduced either by being forced off the land by their creditors, or by losing hope and giving up their land.

The legislation which was passed at the last session of parliament and the legislation to which I have referred which was passed at this session was definitely for the purpose of retaining a high percentage of home owning farmers in this country. That is what the farmers want themselves; it is what this government wishes as well. There is a traditional desire on the part of every British subject to own his own land or his own home. This comes to us through the generations that have passed. The same is true of many farmers in my own constituency who have come from other lands. They have come with a traditional desire to own their own land. Then to the great province of Saskatchewan many thousands came from countries where they could not own their own land, and they came to this land of hope knowing that here there was not only the possibility of owning their own land but that they would live in communities where the same desire existed, and furthermore, that they would live in a country where by legislation this desire would be encouraged.

At the last session of parliament there was passed after very considerable controversy what is known as the Natural Products Marketing Act. This legislation was designed to secure for farmers in Canada a more orderly marketing system than the system which obtains at the present time and one which would result in financial advantage to the farmer without being unfair either to the distributor or to the consumer of these products. It was felt that in handling the product of the farmer there was manipulation and exploitation, and that it was necessary that there should be a regulation of the movement of products so that prices might be fairer and that they might be stabilized at a fair level.

I know that in the urban centres particularly it was urged that should the measure be a success in so far as the farmer was concerned, it would mean higher prices to the consumer. Fortunately, we have some experience to go by in this country in the matter of orderly marketing. In the province of British Columbia for some years the marketing of their fruit was controlled. Following a decision of the courts that control was lost, and in comparing the return to the producer during the years of control with the cost to the consumer, it was definitely found that with control and regulation the producer was getting more, with no increase in cost to the consumer, whereas the consumer was getting a better product in that the effect or control was to raise the standard of the product which the consumer could obtain.

The Natural Products Marketing Act has now been in force for almost a year. A number of schemes have been suggested and have been approved. More than a score of others are before the marketing board at the present time for consideration. The experience of the fruit farmer, of the tobacco farmer, and of the fisherman has fully justified the passing of the legislation and fully justified the confidence which the government had in the legislation as a method and a means of curbing abuses and preventing the exploiting of the primary producer. Experience will no doubt indicate that certain improvements will still have to be adopted and the act and the regulations in due course amended, but what I want most emphatically to say is that the law has justified itself as a means of obtaining for the producer the greatest possible reward for his labour, and at the same time the consumer will be obtaining a better product without any substantial increase in cost to him.

In my own province many men who at first were definitely opposed to the principle of the marketing bill are now as strongly in favour of the act, and in the cattle industry almost without exception the rancher and farmer who produces cattle for market looks to the marketing act as the agency not only to improve his condition, but once it is improved, to continue the improvement and give some degree of confidence for the future.

If there is one commodity in which the people of the province of Saskatchewan are interested it is wheat. In 1930 not only the national situation but the international situation was such in the matter of wheat that a very direct interest had to be taken in the handling of wheat by the government of Canada, or, poor as the returns were to the wheat grower, they would have undoubtedly been much lower. The government in backing John I. McFarland in the stabilization policy which he was supporting undoubtedly was successful in putting into the pockets of the western wheat farmers millions of dollars which otherwise they could not have had. It is even difficult to imagine how the work could have been carried on at all, or how the companies could have operated, had not this stabilization policy been adopted. Those who are critical of that policy and who would change it completely say that the result of it has been that the farmer has been receiving a fictitious price for his grain. In plain English, they say that the price the farmer received is higher than he should have been receiving. They are going to change all that. They are going to eliminate the fictitious prices so if those who criticize the policy of the government in wheat are put in the position where they can determine the policy, there is nothing surer than that the price which the farmer will receive for his wheat will be very substantially lower than the present levels. The wheat farmer should keep this clearly in mind. If he wants a lower price for his product there is one sure way of getting it—change the policy of supporting John. I. McFarland which has been followed by this government.

Another feature of the policy of this government in connection with grain which I support wholeheartedly is the providing of a better distribution of grain acreage. A market can be found for more barley in Canada and in Europe, and we also need more oats in Canada. The sensible policy is the one advocated by the Department of Agriculture for the better distribution of grain acreage and the putting of some of the acreage now in wheat into coarse grains. The district in which I live is interested not only in wheat farming but in the raising of cattle and sheep. We have had a drought in the last few years but in view of the snowfall of the present winter we hope that this is broken. However, we must consider what can be done in order to prevent a recurrence of drought conditions. We must give consideration to those policies which will prevent if possible a recurrence of the extreme drought conditions of the past few years.

It must be borne in mind that the range or grazing areas from the Rocky mountains to the dirt hills in Saskatchewan are seriously overgrazed. Another serious drought this year will spell disaster to many of those in the business. They will be forced to market unfinished grass cattle, and herds which have taken years to build up will have to be sold. What will be true of the rancher will be true also of the farmer. The drought has been a costly proposition to everyone concerned—to the farmer, to the municipality, to the province and to the dominion. It has been suggested that there be free freight on feed, but there is no such thing as free freight. Someone must pay, and the state has been paying. In the last analysis the taxpayer is called upon to bear the expense of millions of dollars which has been incurred in taking care of the relief feed requirements caused by the drought. Remedial measures must be taken to correct this situation and improve the stability of farming and ranching in these districts.

There are three essential factors in the production of live stock—grass, water and winter feed. A sound water development policy will go a long way to stabilize the industry and bring about security against feed shortage and serious death losses of live stock. I am glad to support the policy of the government as announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to provide for experiments in the so-called drought areas. This will include the building of dams and the impounding of water in reservoirs. It will take care of spring flood conditions and conserve spring run-off water. I suggest that particular consideration be given to simple community irrigation projects. I urge the government to consider a scheme which has been suggested on the Whitemud river in southern Saskatchewan, and I hope a favourable report can be made in this connection.

The dominion experimental farm at Manyberries, Alberta, has done some splendid research work in connection with water development. During the past eight years the station's only source of water has been the reservoirs. There has been a little snow but the summers have been dry. However, because of the water policy which was followed it was not found necessary to move the stock to water, as water was always available within a distance of two miles. The United States government is keenly interested in what has been done in Canada, and I am informed, I believe authentically, that the government of the United States is constructing 700 dams in Montana and North Dakota. If the drought period is broken, as conditions this winter would indicate it is, I contend that this would be the time to construct the necessary dams. The time to prepare for another drought period is during the time of ample rainfall so that there may be that conservation of water so necessary in a dry period.

I would point out that the construction of dams is not expensive. Most of the labour can be obtained locally and the expert engineering expense can be kept low. The station at Manyberries has harvested eighty tons of hay per year from forty acres of land. If water had not been available at the critical dry periods, no crop would have been obtained. I have obtained some figures of the cost of the type of reservoir constructed at Manyberries. The figures, which are for two dams known as C.23 and A.29, are as follows:

	C. 23	A. 29
Date of construction	Oct., 1927	Oct., 1927
Capacity of reservoir, acre feet	18.5	5
Type of soil	Loam	Clay

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), the chief financial critic of the official opposition, was particularly critical of the wheat selling policy of the government and especially of John I. McFarland. His argument is that the prices paid during the past year for wheat have been out of line with world prices. He infers that the price of wheat is too high. The official opposition say: Put us in office and we will change all that; we will see that prices are more in accord with world prices. In short, that they will be lowered. This is a hopeful promise from the Liberal party to the western voter. It would appear that the official critic is making a bid for the support of the big interests in St. James street, Montreal, where he is now located. When it comes to choosing between the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) I think the western farmer and everyone dependent upon him will know how to vote, especially when the wheat question is considered.

Let us consider for a moment the record of the Liberal government from 1922 to August, 1930, in connection with wheat and markets for wheat. In 1922 the Liberals took office under their present leader, following a Conservative prime minister, Mr. Meighen. They were given the legacy of free markets for our wheat in France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Greece and all other European countries. After nine years of Liberal rule, a rule which boasted of freer and wider markets—they offer the same thing if they are again returned—what did we find? We found that the free markets left by the Conservatives had disappeared, to be replaced by the highest tariff wall ever placed against Canada. When the Conservatives took office in August, 1930, there was a duty of 85 cents per bushel against our wheat entering France; the duty on our wheat entering Germany was 92 cents per bushel; it was 90 cents per bushel against it entering Italy, and so on down the line. That is the record of achievement by the Liberal party. Because of a fear of provoking someone, they permitted the United States to build up a prohibitive tariff wall against our butter, our eggs, our cattle and everything else we produced and had to sell. The western farmer knows that this depression took place twelve months before the Conservative party came into office, and the prices of farm products were rapidly tumbling. He knows that during the last year of Liberal rule the price of wheat dropped from $1.55 to 80 cents a bushel before this government came into office. Everything was in chaos, and the personal effort of that greatest of Canadians of whom we are all so proud, the Prime Minister of Canada, was necessary to prevent even more serious consequences of world conditions affecting this country.

Mr. FRANK BOYES (East Middlesex): I take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the excellent budget which he has presented to this house, a budget which will be favourably received throughout the dominion. I have the honour of representing a riding located in the western part of Ontario and known as East Middlesex. The population of the riding is partly rural and partly urban, and I consider it my duty to speak on behalf of all classes of people in that community. This duty has been comparatively easy in view of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the government have been thoughtful of both classes. I want to take this opportunity to thank the government for the erection of a new federal building in the city of London, something that has been needed for a great many years. It will assist materially in the relief of unemployment. I thank the government and the Canadian National Railways for the erection of a new station at London. This also was very much needed and it will assist in relieving unemployment in that city. I thank the government also for having complied with the request I made for extensive repairs to Westminster hospital. The work has been done and has relieved the unemployment situation to some extent. I am of opinion however that further repairs should be made to this hospital, and if this were done it would also tend to relieve unemployment.

I have great sympathy for the man who goes to work carrying his dinner pail but I have greater sympathy for the man who is unemployed, and I wish to thank this government for the legislation it has enacted for the relief of unemployment. In 1930, shortly after this government came into power, a session of parliament was called and the sum of $20,000,000 was granted to take care of the unemployment situation. Under the relief legislation of 1930 the sum of $18,140,998 was spent. Under the relief act of 1931 the expenditure was $42,709,418; under the relief act of 1932 it was $25,887,992; under the relief act of 1933 it was $30,678,381; under the relief act of 1934 it was $42,519,758. This made a total of $159,936,548.74. This is a very admirable record when you consider that the former government had intimated through its Prime Minister that not even five cents would be spent for the relief of unemployment. I am sure that the man who goes to work in the morning carrying his dinner pail or the fellow who is unemployed will be thankful indeed for the assistance which this government has granted to enable him to keep himself.

As regards the dominion contributions to the province of Ontario for relief, I wish to place on Hansard the amounts which have been granted for that purpose. The statement has been made by a good many people and has been broadcast throughout the country that the dominion is not granting relief to Ontario. The figures which I am going to give will disprove this statement. Under the relief legislation of 1930 the amount spent in Ontario was $5,292,180; under the relief act of 1931 it was $12,537,932; under the relief act of 1932 it was $8,117,562; under the relief act of 1933 it was $12,192,429; under the relief act of 1934 it was $15,990,950, or a total of $54,131,055.78. This is the sum which has been spent in Ontario since this government came into power, and I have no hesitation in saying, judging from the remarks made by the former prime minister, that had his party been returned to power not one dollar would have been spent for the purpose.

Coming nearer home, I want to show the amounts granted in the municipalities included in the riding I represent and also London. In the year 1930 the amount spent in the city of London was $124,772, and in the township of London, $1,000, while in the township of Westminster the expenditure was $611. In 1931 the expenditure in London was $242,596, in the township of London, $1,329, and in the township of Westminster, $1,150. In 1932 the expenditure in London was $168,861, in the township of London, $2,951, and in the township of Westminster, $3,533. In 1933 the expenditure in London was $232,976, in the township of London, $2,043, and in the township of Westminster, $1,977.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if my hon. friend would give the amounts spent in the other townships in the county of Middlesex during the same period.

Mr. BOYES: I have not those records, but I am speaking of the places where the larger amounts of money were spent. In 1934 the sum of $168,025 was spent in the city of London, $2,511 in the township of London, and $2,158 in the township of Westminster. There are other townships located in the riding which I have the honour to represent. Smaller amounts were spent in those townships as smaller amounts were requested. In reply to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) I may say that my view is that any township that made application for a grant for that purpose had its request met reasonably well, and I think the same situation exists in the riding represented by the hon. gentleman.

There are large numbers of men as yet unemployed. However, there is improvement shown in this connection also. In 1933 there were 610,763 men in Canada without jobs, while in 1934 the number fell to 502,819. So that we are moving in the right direction, and I believe that in the near future, with conditions continuing to improve, we will be relieved of this problem of unemployment.

Now for a few moments I should like to deal with the legislation brought in by this government in the interests and for the protection of the farmers. As all hon. members know, during the election campaign hon. gentlemen on this side told the farmers that protection should be extended not only to those interested in industry but to the products of the farm as well. I am very glad to state that this protection has been afforded. I should like to place on Hansard a table showing the duty imposed by the previous government, as contrasted with the duty imposed by this government on a number of agricultural commodities:

	Previous duty	Present duty
Live hogs	1½ cents per lb.	3 cents per lb.
Cattle	25 per cent	3 cents per lb.
Sheep and lambs	25 per cent	$3 each
Fresh meats	3½ cents per lb.	8 cents per lb.
Bacon, hams, shoulders and other pork	2 cents per lb.	5 cents per lb.
Eggs in the shell	3 cents per doz.	10 cents per doz.
Cheese	3 cents per lb.	7 cents per lb.
Butter	7 cents per lb.	14 cents per lb.
Peas	15 cents per bush.	1 cent per lb.
Oats	10 cents per bush.	16 cents per bush.
Rye	10 cents per bush.	15 cents per bush.
Wheat	12 cents per bush.	30 cents per bush.
Hay	$2 per ton	$5 per ton
Potatoes	Free	75 cents per 100 lbs.
Milk and cream	17½ per cent of value	25 per cent of value

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers needed this protection, and I believe they have derived considerable benefit from it.

Then I should like to say just a word in regard to grain. It is true that prices have not been as high as we would like, but through the stabilization of the price of wheat in Winnipeg I feel that the farmers of Ontario have obtained better prices for their wheat than they would have received otherwise. I should like to direct attention to the fact that since these duties have been imposed on farm products entering this country, our imports have decreased, as follows:

	Bushels	Bushels
Wheat	1,146,310	16,703
Oats	3,725,948	34,286
Barley	14,255	1,007
Rye	256,957	107

This speaks well for the action taken by this government; I feel confident that the farmers of this country have benefited very materially thereby, and I am sure they are thankful. Further benefits were conferred on the farmers through the imperial conference agreements, under which preferences were granted on dairy products. On cheese this preference amounted to 15 per cent ad valorem, on butter to 15 shillings per 112 pounds; on condensed milk, whole, sweetened, in addition to sugar duty, 5 shillings per 112 pounds; on evaporated milk not sweetened, 6 shillings per 112 pounds, and on milk powder and other preserved milk not sweetened, 6 shillings per 112 pounds.

I should like now to say a word in connection with the whole milk situation in the province of Ontario. The board appointed by the former provincial government saw to it that those producing milk for city consumption received a fair price, and I believe they were in a fairly good situation. In regard to butter, when this government came into power the situation was very bad indeed; butter was being imported and as a result the price was very low. In 1930 our imports of butter amounted to 41,919,372 pounds, while in 1934 that importation dropped to 2,602,744 pounds. At present the producers of butter in Canada are almost able to take care of our requirements, and they are receiving the benefit of the whole Canadian market.

I should like to say a word in regard to the production of cheese in Canada. We have the very finest cheese in the world with the exception of a cheddar cheese which is manufactured in England. Practically all the cheese used in local trade and all that is exported is grated by the official government grader. In 1933 the percentage of No. 1 cheese in all Canada was 94·87, while in 1934 the percentage of No. 1 cheese increased to 95·53. Ontario is divided into four sections, the main ones being eastern, central and western Ontario. The average percentage of No. 1 cheese in eastern Ontario was 95·45 in 1933 and 95·61 in 1934, which is a very creditable showing. In central Ontario the average percentage of No. 1 was 97·76 in 1933 and 98·06 in 1934, which is a better record than eastern Ontario. In western Ontario, in which is located the riding I have the honour to represent, the average percentage of No. 1 cheese was 99·02 in 1933 and 98·99 in 1934. So you can see that the cheese manufactured in the western part of the province is some of the very finest manufactured in any part of Canada. But while these figures show that we are manufacturing the very finest quality of cheese in the dominion, yet the price is not as high as we should like. The price for export has been down to some extent. During the fall of 1934 the national dairy council conceived the idea of specially advertising cheese during a cheese week in Canada. During this week a considerable amount of advertising was done in order to increase home consumption. I assisted in the campaign by speaking at a number of meetings, and I believe some good was done, as the market for cheese in Canada to-day is higher than it was a year ago. Another plan has been devised by the national dairy council, that of seeking through the marketing board to stabilize the market for cheese in Canada. The secretary of the council attended a number of dairymen's conventions, and a resolution was passed by a number of conventions to this effect:

[Mr. Boyes.]

This meeting approves of the establishment of a scheme under the Natural Products Marketing Act for the election of a board with power to levy on butter fat to all markets for the formation of a fund to support the marketing of those dairy commodities which may be best adapted as a means of exporting our surplus dairy products.

This was promoted to quite an extent, but I believe it was not started early enough in the season. I think that when it is thoroughly understood by the dairymen of Canada they will take up the proposition and all dairy products will benefit.

Then those who are producing beef have been enabled by this government to secure a sale of their cattle in the old country. I regret that more have not been shipped; at the same time some benefit has been derived. I regret very much that producers of cattle in the riding which I have the honour to represent were so unfortunate as to sell their cattle to the Richelieu Corporation of Montreal and a number of them received no payment for their cattle. I believe that the Richelieu Corporation did not intend at the time to pay for those cattle, but I am hopeful that some remuneration may be obtained from some of those who were connected with the company. I understand certain of the officials have been arrested and will have to stand trial.

Another advantage that this government is endeavouring to secure for the farmers is under the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. I regret very much that during the last half of 1934 and up to the present the farmers in the riding I represent have not been able to secure loans from the province of Ontario. I do not know whether loans were procurable in some other parts of the province, but I know of none being obtained in that part. Very many have been inconvenienced by this situation and some have been embarrassed to the extent that they may be put off their farms. Therefore I am very glad that the federal government is making provision that loans may be available. I would ask the government to make the rate of interest on such loans as low as possible. I feel sure that they will do so, as the farmers are not making sufficient income to pay a high rate of interest.

On motion of Mr. Boyes the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 3

The house met at three o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE'S REPORT RESPECTING PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina) moved concurrence in the second report of the standing committee on industrial and international relations presented to the house on Monday, April 1, 1935, as follows:

Your committee have held two sessions and have heard statements from eleven persons, with respect to the subject matter of the resolution referred to it for consideration under an order of the House of Commons, dated January 31, 1935, which resolution reads as follows:—

"Resolved that in the opinion of this house the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act should apply to blind people over forty years of age."

As persons seventy years of age and over, whether blind or not, fall within the application of the Old Age Pensions Act in its present form, your committee considered the position of blind persons between the ages of forty and seventy.

Evidence submitted to the committee indicated that the Old Age Pensions Act is in force in only seven provinces out of nine and its provisions, therefore, when amended will not affect blind persons living in the remaining two provinces unless these provinces subsequently adopt the Old Age Pensions Act or the proposed amendments thereto.

It also indicated that records of organizations interested in the blind placed the number of the blind between forty and seventy years of age at 3,016. After making fair deductions it was stated that 2,178 persons would be affected by legislation requested by the said resolution. These figures are sufficiently in harmony with census returns to be considered reasonably accurate.

The estimated expenditure occasioned by the proposed legislation, if the above figures are accurate and allowing the maximum of $240 per person per annum, would be under $550,000 apart from administration expenses.

The committee regrets that the terms of the resolution, if acceded to, will be of no assistance to blind persons residing in the two provinces of Canada in which the Old Age Pensions Act is not in effect, nevertheless in order that the blind people shall be assisted as far as reasonably possible, desires to express its approval of the resolution in question.

Mr. I. D. COTNAM (North Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, as I moved the original resolution with respect to pensions for the blind over forty years of age, after following the evidence adduced before the committee on industrial and international relations I have come to the conclusion that the original resolution fails to meet entirely the situation which it was intended to meet. The Old Age Pensions Act has never been adopted by the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. I find that there are some 166 blind persons over forty years of age in the province of New Brunswick and some 720 blind persons over forty years of age in the province of Quebec. This makes a total of 886 individuals who would not receive any benefit from the resolution as submitted to the house. In view of that fact, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney):

That the words "concurred in" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"Referred back to the said committee with instructions that they have power to amend same by recommending that the house pass a special blind act, applicable to the nine provinces of the dominion and providing pensions for the blind over forty years of age, on the same basis as the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Cotnam) has anticipated a motion which I had drawn up to submit to the house. My motion was of a similar character but I believe it was a little more definite. The report of the committee which will be found in votes and proceedings of the day before yesterday recites the resolution introduced by the hon. member. This resolution reads:

Resolved that in the opinion of this house the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act should apply to blind people over forty years of age.

The report then goes on to comment upon the fact that the Old Age Pensions Act does not apply throughout Canada. The report estimates that the cost of these pensions would be $550,000 per year. What might be called the enacting part of the report reads as follows:

The committee regret that the terms of the resolution, if acceded to, will be of no assistance to blind persons residing in the two provinces of Canada in which the Old Age Pensions Act is not in effect, nevertheless in order that the blind people shall be assisted as far as reasonably possible, desires to express its approval of the resolution in question

I had intended to combat that statement on the ground that we were not following the instructions given to us by the house and were taking a too superficial notice of the question. The report says that we express approval in order that the blind people may be assisted as far as reasonably possible. I submit that this report does not go "as far as reasonably possible." The most obvious objection is the fact that the report does not cover thirty-six per cent of the blind population of Canada. It will be found that the blind population of New Brunswick and Quebec amount to thirty-six per cent of the total blind population of Canada. No report could be fair or reasonable or equitable which overlooked thirty-six per cent of the people it was intended to help.

The committee had three meetings, two of which were taken up in the hearing of witnesses, mostly blind people or representatives of the blind. A subcommittee was appointed to prepare the report and the report was presented at the third meeting. I took it upon myself to criticize the report and two arguments were presented in its favour. The first was that the terms of the reference bound us merely to say yes or no, that we had to say that we were prepared to put the blind under the Old Age Pensions Act, or we had to say that we were not prepared to do that. I believe the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) took the opposite view, but that idea prevailed. I submit that such a contention is absolutely contrary to the practice which has prevailed for many years. If such a contention is to be accepted it will mean that most of the references to committees will be merely jokes. We would be confined to such a narrow compass that it would be impossible to consider any subject as it should be considered. If this report is to be only an expression of sympathy, that has been given already by means of the original resolution. I should like to refer to Hansard to show the feeling of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) who will have the handling of this matter. During the discussion on the resolution he said:

Personally I do not think an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act would be the most satisfactory method of dealing with a question of this character. The Old Age Pensions Act is legislation of which some provinces avail themselves, others do not. If this resolution results in legislation it might well take the form of a special act, dissociated from old age pensions.

He concludes by saying:

—and I would ask the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution to move that it be referred to that committee in order that they may take it into consideration from the angles I have suggested and others, because it is an important matter.

It was quite evident that the feeling of the minister and the house was that we should consider this matter from all angles. We did not consider it from all angles.

The second argument offered for the putting through of the report was that the report was recommending what the blind people themselves had asked for. It was argued that we could best protect their interests by giving them that for which they asked. I submit that that is not the correct position. These people did not understand the Old Age Pensions Act; they did not realize its limitations. They were not legislators, they were not even lawyers and they could not grasp the restrictions of this legislation. If our children ask for something which we know is unsuitable and improper we do not give it to them no matter how great our affection may be. The blind themselves speak differently. In their submission they do not ask specifically to come under the Old Age Pensions Act; they ask for a pension for the "necessitous and unemployable blind." The inference is that if they were employable they would not be so keen to ask for a pension. They asked that special consideration be given to the unemployable blind of any age. We never considered that aspect at all. They asked that they be taken care of by a bill, separate from the Old Age Pensions Act if possible, but we never embodied that consideration in the report.

Mr. ARTHURS: That was suggested by the minister.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, and it is suggested by the blind people themselves. We have full authority for this both from the minister and from the blind themselves.

There is another reason why I believe the report is not complete. I think we should consider whether or not it is best to pension a man of forty years of age who happens to be blind. Such a man may be in full possession of all his faculties other than that of sight. A blind man cannot take much exercise, he can read only Braille and yet we are going to give him a miserable little pension and make him sit down at forty years of age to brood over his troubles and misfortunes. Is that the best way to handle the situation? That aspect, I submit, should have been explored but it was not. Would it not be better to spend some of the money which we are here proposing to give, in training a man so that he could be self-respecting and independent thereafter? These blind people in their evidence stated that they maintain a number of institutions throughout Canada at their own expense, aided by public contributions, but they are now running in low water because times are hard, and it would have been appreciated if we made some grants to these institutes. I do not suggest that we should control them; I do not say that the government should take them over, but it would be appreciated if some grant were given them along the lines of the grants made to the Red Cross and other semi-public bodies.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the buzz of conversation it is very difficult to hear, and I would ask hon. members to keep better order.

Mr. NEILL: I will not detain the house long, but this is a very important subject. These blind people have institutions in which they train the blind to make brooms, baskets and other things, and to take up piano tuning and so on. In England—not by law, but by that powerful influence, public opinion —they have allocated to the blind the making of baskets and so on, and I find that in their evidence the blind alluded to this. Talking about employment they said, "That is a good thing for the blind; they really love to be employed." They also pointed out that in Japan the profession of masseur is reserved exclusively to the blind; hundreds of sightless people in that country earn their livelihood in that way. They say further that it is a great pity that the government of Canada does not reserve to the blind the manufacture of brooms and mops, and I think that is a suggestion which we might well take into consideration. My suggestion is that it would be better to help these people by training them to be independent instead of giving them a sop and then allowing them to sit down and brood over their troubles.

There is another phase of the subject which we might consider. The report proposes to confine our action to those over forty. But what about those under forty? The blind people have expressed the hope that all unemployed and necessitous blind will be taken into consideration. A man over forty might be quite capable physically except for his sight, but a blind sick man under forty gets no consideration here. They refer to this in their submission. I will not read it, but they say that there are a good many young people of thirty and under who are sightless owing to the encroachment of some disease, and these people deserve attention, undoubtedly more than a man who is otherwise able, except for his sight, and over forty. They themselves ask that consideration be given to this phase of the subject.

The suggestion put forward by the minister at the outset is one which I would support, and that is, that there should be a special act for the blind. That would do away with the injustice of excluding from the operation of the act those blind living in New Brunswick and Quebec, and it would deal with those even under forty. Perhaps the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) is adequate to refer the matter back to the committee, but I am not quite clear as to exactly what it implies, because I did not hear every word of it. However, I will read an amendment which I myself was going to propose and in which perhaps the house might acquiesce inasmuch as, in my opinion, it affords greater scope for the committee to consider those points which I have suggested. I was going to move that the report be not adopted but be referred back to the committee in the usual way, and that they have power to consider the subject matter further and more particularly as to:

(a) Whether the interest of the blind would not be better served by bringing them under a special act for the blind rather than by putting them under the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act which, at the present time, is only applicable to a portion of Canada; and

(b) Whether their interests may not be forwarded by granting support to some of the existing institutions for training the blind to earn their own living.

I will not move that amendment because the feeling of the house no doubt is that the spirit of it is embodied in the amendment already proposed by the hon. member for North Renfrew. I hope the amendment will be adopted and the committee empowered to consider the whole matter, not in the narrow terms of the report but in all aspects of the subject.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I had not heard about this before, and it is a matter that requires a good deal of consideration. Offhand, my feeling would be to support the committee. When we refer a matter of this kind to a committee it is very carefully considered there, and as a rule that would be my attitude, though I have not looked into this particular matter. However, inasmuch as this has come on without notice I think it should stand in order to give us an opportunity to consider the questions raised.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Before the motion is allowed to stand, may I say that I heartily support the amendment moved by my hon. friend from North Renfrew. Indeed, I was going to oppose the approval of the committee's report, as it stands, because it would certainly be unfair to a number of blind people in Canada. I agree with my hon. friend that there should be a special act with regard to the blind, irrespective of the position taken by some of the provinces with respect to the provisions of the present Old Age Pensions Act. On the whole, I am not sure that the amendment of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) would not be more regular than the amendment that has been moved, seeing that it does not call for the expenditure of money but merely suggests that the committee consider the matter. However, I am willing to support the proposed amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Some disposition should be made of the motion; I think the debate should be adjourned.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 50, to amend the Post Office Act (newspaper ownership).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

[Mr. Neill.]

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—CONTRIBUTIONS TO ONTARIO

Mr. MULOCK:

What contributions, if any, did the dominion government give to the province of Ontario for relief expenditures in each of the months of July to December inclusive, 1933, the month of January, 1934; the months of July to December inclusive, 1934; the month of January, 1935?

Mr. GORDON: On Monday last I informed the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that the form of his question had caused some delay in view of the difficulty in allocating to any month the amount of money which had been contributed in respect of expenditures during any particular month.

The fact is, the contributions of the dominion government consist not only of the payments made but also of the commitments to the province by the dominion government, that is to say, the dominion government agrees to contribute a certain sum of money to the province for a specified purpose or work and at a certain period may have received accounts for only part of the amount and, therefore, have only paid or contributed a portion of the amount, although still liable and ready to pay the balance on receipt of accounts.

A considerable time frequently elapses between the date of the actual expenditure and the date that accounts are received by the department from the province, and when an account is received it may cover a longer period than one month and it may not be possible for bills for materials and things of that character to be divided up to show actual disbursements applicable to any particular month.

A statement of the accounts paid by the dominion is not necessarily a complete picture regarding dominion contributions, as many of the payments made are in respect to accounts for which claims have yet to be rendered. With these reservations, which I trust the hon. member for North York will appreciate, I am making a return showing the payments made to the province of Ontario.

The following are the payments made to the province of Ontario by the dominion during the months indicated:

July, 1933	$ 613,516 65
August, 1933	1,321,617 96

August, 1934..	911,624 63
September, 1934..	656,229 15

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Has the gold formerly in possesion of the chartered banks been transfered to the Bank of Canada?
2. If so, how much has been transferred?
3. At what valuation?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Yes, as to gold held in Canada.
2. $37,480,404.46.

PERCENTAGE DEPOSITS TRANSFERRED TO BANK OF CANADA

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. What was the total amount transferred to Bank of Canada by way of percentage deposits of the chartered banks?
2. When was such transfer made?

Mr. RHODES: 1 and 2.

Section 27 of the Bank of Canada Act requires that on and after the day of commencement of business by the Bank of Canada (e.g., March 11, 1935), every chartered bank shall maintain a reserve of not less than 5 per cent of its deposit liabilities within Canada, such reserve to consist of a deposit with the bank and of notes of the bank held by the chartered bank. The act requires that the return to be made by each bank in this connection shall be made to the Bank of Canada and the time for filing the first return has not yet arrived.

Total deposits of the chartered banks with the Bank of Canada were $151,927,627 on March 13th, the date of the first weekly statement of the bank. At February 28th, the date of the last return from the chartered banks, their deposit liabilities within Canada amounted to $1,944,561,287.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. SEGUIN:

Will the $90,000,000 proposed in connection with the Canadian Farm Loan Act be allotted to each province on a basis of population?

Mr. RHODES: Allotment on a per capita basis is not contemplated by the statute. As in the past, it will be the responsibility of the board to develop its loaning policy, having regard to the demand for loans and the public interest generally.

SENATE VACANCIES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Were there any vacancies in the Senate on February 7, 1933?
2. If so, how many, what were they and on what date did each of those seats become vacant?
3. Since then, were there any other vacancies in the Senate?
4. If so, how many, what were they and on what date did each of those seats become vacant?
5. Was each of the above mentioned vacancies filled?
6. If so, when?
7. If not, what are the seats which are still vacant?
8. Did the government save any money by delaying the appointments to any such vacancies?
9. If so, how much?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is a qestion that should be asked in the Senate. If we are going to try to get the information here, I think there is a procedure by which a message may be sent to the Senate asking for the information. I suggest that the hon. member get somebody to ask the question in the Senate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not a fact that vacancies are filled by the government and not by the Senate, in which case this would be a proper question?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly vacancies are filled by the government, but the information asked for should be obtained through the Senate.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not ask my question of the Senate; I ask it of the government, because senators are appointed by the government. I would not wish to try to teach the acting Prime Minister anything, because he is an old gentleman, but he must know the answer; he must have concurred in the nominations.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am quite willing that a message should be sent to the Senate asking for the information.

Mr. POULIOT: No, I want it from the government; I am entitled to that.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall give the matter further consideration. My mind is not quite made up at the moment.

5. If, from lack of information, a veteran entitled to treatment through the department and requiring an immediate operation is rushed to a near hospital and is operated upon by a surgeon not on the official list of the department, will he have to bear all expenses incident to his hospitalization, or will the department accept the responsibility of such expenses at the pro rata of what would have been paid, had the patient been treated through the department?

6. What is the hospital in Ottawa exclusively recognized by the department?

7. What are the names of the surgeons in Ottawa exclusively recognized by the department for treatment of veterans?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda and documents referring to proposals for settlements effected in the province of Nova Scotia under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; also a statement showing the names and addresses of the official receivers in Nova Scotia for the purposes of said act, and the salaries and other compensation payable to each in the years 1934 and 1935, and the respective amounts for salary, compensation and expenses actually paid to each during such years.

Mr. RHODES: There are two objections to the first portion of this motion. One is that if we are to adopt any procedure with respect to all cases, the voluminous character of the return would involve the services of a large number of persons for many months, because at the moment the number of proposals before official receivers runs into the tens of thousands.

The second objection is that it is not in the public interest to disclose the names of individuals together with statements covering their private affairs, particularly in view of the character of the proposals and the fact that settlements may not arise out of them. I have spoken to the hon. member and I think he concurs in the objections that I have just made. His suggestion is that the understanding should be that the return will comprise only the number of cases, the amounts of assets and liabilities in each case, and a summary of settlements in cases where settlement was effected. I assume by that my hon. friend means a succinct statement—

Mr. RALSTON: A précis.

Mr. RHODES: —of case, number one or number two, whatever it may be. With that understanding there is no objection to the motion passing.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend spoke to me about this matter before the house met. I should like it understood that in assenting to the motion carrying in the amended form. I would not want to be taken as waiving the right of production of papers as called for in the resolution, but I assure my hon. friend and the house that for my purposes in connection with this motion there is no desire to have the identity of the debtors in any way disclosed. With that understanding the motion amended as suggested is satisfactory.

Mr. RHODES: I must say a word with regard to the latter portion of my hon. friend's remarks. It must not be understood that his exception should indicate that we accede to his position, that a member of right should have the full information.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE STATISTICS

Mr. AHEARN:

For return showing:

1. The names and ages of all civil servants who have been retired with annuities at ages less than forty years since the present government assumed office, together with the amount of the annuities in each case.

2. The names of those included in such a list who have been reemployed in the federal civil service.

3. The number of persons who have been appointed to the federal civil service since the present administration assumed office, excluding part-time employees, labourers, and mechanics.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no objection to the resolution passing as to clause 1 and clause 2. My impression is that a return asked for by another hon. member is being prepared which will cover clause 3, but it involves a considerable amount of work and it will be some time yet before it can be completed. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he allow the motion to pass as to clauses 1 and 2, and reserve the question as to whether clause 3 is covered by the return which is now in course of being completed.

Motion as amended agreed to.

SALARY DEDUCTION ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize a deduction of five per cent from the amount of certain salaries or other compensations or indemnities payable by the government of Canada during the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1936, and to provide for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of such amounts as are necessary under the proposed legislation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that the members of the judiciary, and the members of the military, naval and air forces of Canada, and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, other than enlisted men, shall be liable to pay a special income tax of five per cent upon their salaries received during the fiscal year 1935-36, in addition to any other tax payable under the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WATERLOO, QUE., POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): A few days ago there was laid upon the table the report of the royal commission in connection with the building of a post office in Waterloo, Shefford county, province of Quebec. I would ask the government whether they propose to follow the recommendations of the commission with regard to action against those guilty of fraud, and to recover moneys unlawfully obtained.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): The report has been forwarded to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who is considering the same with a view to what action shall be taken in the light of the recommendation from the royal commissioner.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I ask the minister to refer this question to the Minister of Justice, with the idea that we might have a definite answer in regard to what action might be taken.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That has been done.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): At page 2332 of Hansard the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), referring to the unemployment insurance measure is reported as saying:

—and there was the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who said he did not know what it was all about.

May I refer the hon. gentleman to page 1513 of Hansard of March 7 of this year, where I declared in regard to this legislation—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. member to order. This is not a point of order. The hon. member can seize an opportunity in the house at the appropriate time to contradict any statement made by any hon. member, but not on the orders of the day.

THE KING'S SILVER JUBILEE

PROCLAMATION ISSUED DECLARING MONDAY, MAY 6 A PUBLIC HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): I wish to direct a question to the government concerning the nature of the proclamation of May 6 next as a day of general thanksgiving. I have received a telegram from J. W. Somers, O.B.E. City Clerk, Toronto, asking:

Has Monday, May 6, been proclaimed a public holiday? Gazette states that it is to be a day of general thanksgiving and rejoicing. Will it only be a bank holiday? Please advise me as soon as possible.

I would ask the government what is the nature of a day of rejoicing and thanksgiving? May 6 is not a statutory holiday. Will the banks close, will it be a public holiday all over Canada?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): May 6, which is the twenty-fifth anniversary of the king's accession to the throne, will be a public holiday throughout Canada. It has been so declared by a proclamation which was issued on February 27 and published in the Canada Gazette of February 28 and posted in every post office in Canada on the succeeding days. That proclamation makes Monday, May 6, a public holiday in so far as the federal parliament has jurisdiction. It is also what in common parlance is known as a bank holiday. In the Bank Act there is no special provision with respect to holidays, as the banks observe all statutory holidays. The Bills of Exchange Act, chapter 16 of the revised statutes of 1927, provides in section 43 that in all matters relating to bills of exchange:

> Any day appointed by proclamation for a public holiday, or for a general fast, or a general thanksgiving throughout Canada, shall be observed as a legal holiday.

Therefore May 6 is a legal holiday with respect to usual banking transactions.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In that connection, I was reading this morning in the British press that an appeal is being made to all employers of labour in England that they should pay the salary or wages of their employees on that day even though it is a holiday, so that no workers would lose any part of their wages because of participation in the festivities accompanying that jubilee. Could not the same appeal be made in Canada to all employers of labour?

Mr. CAHAN: By whom was the request made? By the Home Office or some department of the government of the United Kingdom?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I think it is rather in the press. I am not sure whether the government itself has taken any part.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman and I might make an appeal to all the people of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We may both make the appeal.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton): If I am not forestalled by the answer given by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) to the hon. junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Ahearn) I desire to ask the Secretary of State when I may receive a return to the question asked by myself on March 6 last:

> 1. How many civil servants have been removed from their positions since the present government came into office by: (a) dismissal; (b) superannuation; (c) death; (d) other causes?
> 2. What are the names of the deputy ministers removed from their positions since the present government came into office by: (a) dismissal; (b) superannuation; (c) death; (d) other causes, showing the department of which each was deputy?

May I ask when I may expect an answer to the question?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Every effort is being made to secure from the various departments of government a complete answer to the hon. gentleman's question but I cannot now state on what date it will be ready for submission to the house. It is a very voluminous return.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 2, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes, (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment of Mr. Ralston, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coote.

Mr. FRANK BOYES (East Middlesex): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. BOYES: In continuing the debate on the budget may I say that in the riding which I have the honour to represent we have a considerable number of market gardeners, many of whom produce vegetables in greenhouses. During the campaign many Conservatives, including myself, promised that protection would be given not only to industry but also to farmers and market gardeners, which would include those engaged in the production of vegetables. I am glad to be able to say that this legislation has been provided, and under it our imports of certain vegetables have decreased more than fifty per cent. These include potatoes, lettuce, cucumbers and tomatoes, and I am sure those who are engaged in this business have received considerable benefit through this legislation.

I wish to thank the government also for having introduced legislation providing seasonal protection for market gardeners and fruit growers. There is, of course, a certain season during which vegetables should be allowed to come into the country, but there is another season when our producers are able to supply the demand, and during that season I say these foreign vegetables should be shut out. May I say, however, to the minister who has charge of this seasonal protection that I believe there have been times when the protection has not been applied sufficiently early to protect those engaged in the growing of vegetables, and I should like to ask him to see to it that this protection is made effective in sufficient time to enable our producers to secure that business. If there is any doubt as to the time at which these tariffs should be put into operation, I submit that the producers of vegetables should be given the benefit of the doubt.

Then there is another act which I am sure is receiving a great deal of attention at the present time; I refer to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. In the county of Middlesex I believe more than 120 applications have been received for information in regard to this measure. A great many applications for adjustment have been made; meetings have been held and adjustments have been arrived at which have been satisfactory not only to the farmers but also to their creditors, sometimes involving thousands of dollars. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the most important pieces of legislation enacted by this government.

Another matter to which I have devoted some attention is the agitation which has been carried on by some of the members in the far corner, the independents and those belonging to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in regard to the capitalistic system. I am convinced that the capitalistic system is the right system for the Dominion of Canada. I do not believe that it is one hundred per cent perfect, but why destroy the system because it is not perfect? This government have gone ahead and brought about changes in that system; some of the acts passed for that purpose are already in force, and further enactments will be made which I am sure will be very beneficial. I am strongly in favour of the capitalistic system, with certain reforms which can be brought about.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am convinced that this budget will be received with great favour by the people of Canada. When the government appeal to the country for reelection I am convinced that the electors will show their approval of this budget and of the legislation which has been enacted by this government, and will return to power the Conservative party, with Right Hon. R. B. Bennett as Prime Minister of Canada for another term of five years.

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPOTTON: I see I have the consent of His Majesty's loyal opposition to address a few words to you, sir, in connection with the budget, and I wish to thank hon. gentlemen opposite for the courtesy they have extended to me. While I was in the house for a few moments last night I noticed that hon. gentlemen opposite were much more anxious to conclude this debate than they are to-day, and, I am vain enough to believe that that is out of courtesy to me, so I will not impose upon them at any great length.

Last night when one of the members on this side rose to address the chamber I heard one of the younger members opposite, who perhaps was christened by his mother "colon" instead of "period," call out, "Bring on the election." There is one reason, Mr. Speaker, why I am glad the election is not going to be brought on with undue haste. In the Dominion of Canada there are about 650 persons born every day, and, in a year that amounts to something like 225,000 or 230,000 persons. If 200,000 of those attain their majority it means that almost that number of boys and girls, who are impatiently waiting for the day when they will be twenty-one years of age, would have been disfranchised if the leader of the opposition and his followers had been given their way in this matter. I believe I can trust the young people of Canada. About 750 or 800 of these young people, who would have been disfranchised if this government had been stampeded into going to the country, will be able to vote in my riding, and I am going to trust those young people. They are the people who will have to carry on when you old fellows, who are going down the western slope facing the setting sun, pass out; then it will be up to us younger people to carry on.

There is one other reason. I have listened to Liberal orators and spellbinders stating that the Liberal party was the party of the masses and the Conservative party the party of the classes.

Mr. BOUCHARD: You should be over here then.

Mr. SPOTTON: I hear the professor again, but don't blame him, Mr. Speaker; it is his profession. We have always been told by these Liberal spellbinders that the Conservative party was owned body and soul by the big interests. Yet we have it from the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, speaking in Kingston, that he thanked God and took courage that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was the first leader of either of the major parties that had ever attacked capitalism. And I am glad too, as a humble member who was elected by a farming constituency, and by the way at a by-election. We have heard so much about by-elections this session that I suppose it will not be out of order for me to refer back to the last administration. They lost a by-election once when they had eleven cabinet ministers in the riding, also Hon. Duncan Marshall, Hon. Nelson Parliament and every Liberal member, I think, of the Ontario house and of the legislature in Quebec. They brought in the whole circus, the calliope and the whole troupe. They brought in the Minister of Finance to hold up the treasury of Canada in the one hand and the credit of Canada in the other, and told them just to ask for what they wanted. But they lost that by-election. I am not twitting them over it or boasting about it, because I have often lost myself; and I think I have been a good loser just as I have striven to be a modest winner. But when the Liberals lost that by-election they did not say that the Liberal government was discredited and should immediately go before the people. I was twitted by the then Prime Minister that I was a minority candidate. I wish to say to him to-day that he has never been other than a minority prime minister in this country. I listened to him in the 1925 election when he made great promises, and in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, he is the record promise-breaker in Canadian history. He promised that if after that election he did not have a clear majority in the House of Commons he would refuse to carry on because he had in the back of his head, and in a book, beneficent legislation which the Progressive group had not permitted him to put upon the statute books. Well, he went to the country 116 strong and came back 101 strong, and yet his lust of office was so great that he broke that pledged word, and by the way gave me several votes from Liberals who had heard him make that promise.

He also said that he was going to reform or abolish the senate, and I remember that he brought with him to my county a concrete example, as it were, the late Senator McCoig, who stood up after the right hon. gentleman had made that declaration of reforming or abolishing the senate and said, "Yes, it was upon that understanding I was made a senator." He was to do the bidding of Bunty when Bunty pulled the strings. But we heard nothing more about the reform or abolition of the senate.

We listened the other day to the Labour member from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) putting on Hansard planks from the Liberal platform of 1919, sixteen years ago, and it has remained for this government to put most of those planks into operation. That platform declared for limiting the hours of work to eight per day and forty-eight per week, along with a weekly day of rest of at least twenty-four hours. That promise was not fulfilled, but that legislation has been placed upon the statute books of Canada by this government. The Liberal platform of 1919 also called for:

> Abolition of child labour and the imposition of limitation of the labour of young persons to assure their proper education and physical development;
> Abolition of sweatshops by setting legal standards for conditions of labour which should have due regard for the equitable economic treatment of all workers;
> Industrial control to safeguard workers' interests and shape industrial policies;
> An adequate insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age and other disabilities;
> Steps to overcome questions of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces on these matters;

And the right hon. leader of the opposition is still harping on that subject to-day, and saying that we should not pass the unemployment insurance measure until that question of jurisdiction has been determined. The Liberal platform also declared for government action to deal with the high cost of living, and so on, and so on. I just wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that no prime minister ever attained office by so many promises and fulfilled so few as the right hon. gentleman opposite. I am glad that this government has the stability and the gumption and the courage to place on the statute books in an orderly manner this legislation for which the people have been asking.

In a small measure I pledged myself when I was first elected that I would go out and do battle against the combines which had been formed under the King administration, 120 in number, and embracing 550 firms. My own town was ruined through them. It was during the Liberal administration, when the Liberals were saying that they were the friends of the masses, that trusts and combines flourished as they never had done before. In my first speech in this house I attacked the packing houses and the stock yards, the department stores and chain stores. In season and out of season I have done my little part to create an atmosphere so that some day this whole matter should be fully investigated. As we talked over the line fence or the garden gate we thought we knew what was going on, but as it says in the good book, we know now in part, and some day we shall know in full. And now, Mr. Speaker, we do know in full from the accountants and the auditors and the bookkeepers, from the presidents and general managers of these firms testifying under oath, as to the iniquitous work that has been going on, and unless that price spreads investigation has been a joke and nothing more, than sounding brass and tinkling cymbal, it is our duty to stay here long enough to put legislation upon the statute books that will curb some of these evils. But I assume that in this case as in all others the leader of the opposition will be afraid to take his stand. He is afraid to take a stand on this great question before the general election. I hear him calling loudly: "Bring on your election." Hon. gentlemen opposite have been boasting about that in this house and outside. Indeed the day after the opening of this present session one of the very close friends of the late government was boasting upon a railway train how well they were set; the money was coming in fast for campaign purposes; they had $50,000 for Alberta, $50,000 for Saskatchewan, and that was merely a starter. They expected a similar amount for Manitoba and British Columbia, and they wanted $150,000 as a starter for Ontario, and more than that for Quebec. He did not say anything about the maritimes because before he got that far he got a poke in the ribs and it was intimated to him that there was an enemy sitting in the smoker. Now they are all set, but they do not wish to take a stand on anything. They never have done so. I would bring to witness Mr. Graham Spry. When he was in the inner circles of the party and was campaigning in Toronto he said that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) had said that all the Liberals had to do was to criticize the present government and wait and they would get into office at the next elections. Of course, that has always been the attitude of that party. I am reminded of the republican campaigner who said that he would not go so far as to say that every Democrat was a horse thief but he would say that every horse thief he had ever known was a Democrat. I know that you, sir, would call me to order if I said that hon. members opposite had taken their salaries for five years under false pretences. The leader of the opposition receives a salary and perquisites equal to those of a cabinet minister. Why? Is it because he is pleasant? Is it because he had a grandfather? Is it because he is supposed to render services to his country for the money received? I know what would happen to a man employed in any other institution who refused to work or to cooperate in any particular.

What would happen to a farmer's hired man who would not go and plough a field to be planted with oats because he thought it was better suited for barley; who would not hoe turnips because the field should have contained mangles; who would not help to build a house because it should have been made of cement instead of brick, and who would not get up in the morning because he felt he should work at night? What would happen to a man who did nothing to promote the interests of his employer? I claim that such a man would be receiving money under false pretences when he accepted his wages. I submit that any man who takes a dollar for his labour and who does not endeavour to give a dollar's worth of work in return is taking money under false pretences.

We have been told by the minister that the price spreads commission is bringing down its report next Monday. This report will be first submitted to council and then to the house. This is something for which this country has been waiting. The people have been kidded long enough. They are no longer willing to be fed on froth; they want real Hepburn beer. Our people are no longer satisfied with promises. I must go to my people and show them that we have made an honest effort to correct the evils which were exposed by this commission. Attacks have been made upon the members of this commission, it being said that they are not sincere. I think the unkindest cut of all is the statement that my leader is not sincere. He is a man who has spent and been spent. He now lies upon a bed of sickness, having given his health. This man has made tremendous sacrifices and yet it is said to this country that he is not sincere. One of the members of that commission said to an audience down in my district that "that man is a humbug." I think the people of Canada will think otherwise, and we had that the other night on the word of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I do not intend to pass by this subject lightly.

All the way through the Liberal party seem to have had a peculiar notion. One of the members of the commission said that he doubted very much if the Conservative members would go as far as the Liberal members wished to go. We will know how true this is when the report is presented. The fact is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) told them to go as far as they liked. It matters not who comes in the way of these gentlemen who seem so hungry for power. I was almost going to say that they had been Hepburnized and become a little bloodthirsty. We find the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) speaking in Ottawa and boldly stating that when he became Postmaster General—there was no question about it, he was to be the Postmaster General—he would dismiss every postmaster who had been appointed since he went out. Then the other day he made another statement to the effect that within five minutes of the time he came into office he would cut off the head of the new deputy postmaster general. Then we find the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) wanting to know what member of a department had sent out certain regulations, and another member stated that that man should be fired on the spot. It would seem that they have been Hepburnized, that they are hungering and thirsting to get back into office so that the hordes may be satisfied.

I played some little part in the milk investigation, although I was not particularly interested in this matter as whole sweet milk is not an important item in my county. However, I felt that such an investigation would lead to better things, and it did. I was delighted when that Christian gentleman, Hon. H. H. Stevens, was filled with a desire to assist his fellow men by taking part in this investigation.

Hon. members opposite contend that my leader is a Mussolini—he is not. They say that he is an autocrat—he is not. They say that he is the boss—he is. Heaven help any government or any institution where the leader is not the boss. The leader of hon. gentlemen opposite is so much the boss that the other night when some of his followers got up to ask for a vote, they voted directly opposite to their leader when the vote did come. Mr. Stevens was attacked in the late by-elections by the leader of the opposition. The Globe reports a meeting held in Massey Hall, Toronto, as follows:

> Speaking at Massey Hall, on September 20, he lashed out on the subject of the investigation.
> He accused Mr. Stevens of committing a parliamentary "foul" in his public speeches. He believed that the Premier and Mr. Stevens were in collusion to "humbug" the people.

That is how the leader of the opposition has assisted this country to get rid of the sweating and financial skullduggery which has been going on. The Globe contains the following report of a meeting at St. Thomas, the day before:

> "One would almost think that Mr. Stevens in a sinister way was seeking to defeat the work of the price spreads committee," warmly asserted Mr. King after reviewing the history of the pamphlet. Its issue constituted a "betrayal" by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and its substance suggested the propaganda for a dictator prevalent in some European countries.

The leader of the opposition devoted the major portion of his speech at St. Thomas to attacking the then Minister of Trade and Commerce. Mr. Hepburn then followed at that meeting and—oh, well, I will not bother about Hepburn.

There has been a sinister movement ever since Mr. Bennett became the leader of this party. This movement has emanated from the great rumour factory in Ottawa. There has been an insidious campaign against the Prime Minister personally. They said he was a wealthy man and as a wealthy man he could not properly enter into the spirit of the oppressed. Well, I know many wealthy men on the other side and I would not say that of them; but I do say that if you search through history you will find that no one ever carried out great reforms in the history of Britain except the man who had wealth behind him. The leader of a great political party once said to me, "George, if I had two million dollars I would run this party to suit myself," and I think it is a wonderful thing that we have had as leader of this great party a man who did not have to look over his shoulder at any financial club. Who will say that the leader of the great republic to the south of us is not sincere? And yet he could not carry on as he has if he had not been a man of wealth. So that it ill becomes the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) to make a stinging speech in which he calls my leader a welcher. They have gone out and said, "Talk Bennett, talk Bennett;" and one or two members have been unkind enough to say that they hope he will be restored to health to lead the party because if a new man were selected they would have to go through the same work again and they would not have time. But it has ever been thus. There was an old woman in Kingston, a Mrs. McGarrity, who went to a Methodist revival meeting. The evangelist saw her drying a tear in this eye and a tear in the other, and he said to the pastor, "Go down and get that woman's name and address so that I may call on her to-morrow." Well, he called on her the next day and said to her, "I noticed that when you were at my meeting last night you were visibly affected. What part of my address appealed to you? I have just come around to talk over matters eternal and to clinch the thing." She replied, "Oh, you are all wrong; when you were talking about how those early Christians were persecuted I could not help thinking how those blooming Grits persecute John A." And just in that way was John A. Macdonald persecuted in my youth; for I remember being told that he was a very wicked man, so that I almost came to believe it. They used to talk about a Pacific scandal, and they said that he took $30,000 from the Canadian Pacific Railway contractor to run an election, and the sons of those old pioneers now lick their lips and smile to think how smart their party was, when by a secret order in council, when this house was in session, they enabled the Liberal party to get $720,000 for campaign purposes. Yet they go about the land as Simon Pure apostles.

But let us take the evidence that we get from the independent corner. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), speaking in Toronto, made certain statements which I am going to quote. There they were carrying slogans on the trucks: "Beat Bennett; vote against Tommy Church"—because Bennett was a millionaire. But they did not use that language in North York where there was a millionaire behind every bush. However, this is what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin said:

"Beat Bennett" not C.C.F. plan.

William Irvine, M.P., warned that the C.C.F. was not interested in any plan to "beat Bennett."

"Mr. Bennett has been a far better Prime Minister than Mr. King. Voting only to 'beat Bennett' would make fools of us."

"Bennett has been turned out by St. James street because last year he gave us the best legislation in fifty years," asserted the speaker. "I'm not supporting him; don't mistake me. The only thing we have in common is that we both eat. But the new measures he introduced challenge the power of St. James street. That's why they're through with Bennett. And that's why you should vote to 'beat King,' as he's on the job for them now."

These are not my words but the words of an independent member of this house. Then I would quote the opinion of the talented lady member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), who said that Mr. King could do nothing in grander style than any person she had ever known.

I am not going to attempt to preserve any continuity in this speech but I am going to discuss a few things which we notice in the press. None of the members here would say some of these things, and I know that no United Farmer in Ontario would say them, but there are Liberal candidates and some Liberal speakers, mostly from the west, who do not know the temperament of the people of Ontario, and they have said that the Prime Minister refused to see the farmers who came to Ottawa. Well, there are many members here who accompanied that delegation. I was asked to introduce a deputation to the Prime Minister, and as we went into that meeting we were handed pamphlets, one of which I have in my possession, that set out the different orders of business. This deputation, at a particular hour, was to wait on the Prime Minister. We were an hour late, but the Prime Minister—and some Liberal gentlemen were with us—gave us a hearing. It is true he refused to go down and address the meeting; that was not a part of the arrangement. The arrangement was that he should meet a deputation, a committee from that meeting. I know whereof I speak because I introduced the deputation, and I shall be glad to have my statement backed up by the United Farmers of Ontario. He refused to go to the coliseum, but he did not refuse, as arranged, to meet the deputation, and he did see the committee that was appointed. The United Farmers of Ontario are not kicking about this, but there are Liberals who are striving to make political capital by falsifying the premier.

A former minister of trade and commerce used to say that the Liberal government kept the dollar at par. I wonder what he would say now that this government, during this period of stress and strain, has brought the dollar above par. Is not this government to get some credit for the fact that, whereas in 1930 the superstatesmen left us the sixth trading nation in the world, we are now fifth? Is it not to the credit of the government and of the country that we had such a financial genius to steady the financial structure of Canada? What does it matter if you gain the whole world and lose your own soul? What does it matter if you own the city of Ottawa and the Dominion of Canada is bankrupt, as we are told many western provinces are? The credit of Canada has been preserved, and it is sounder to-day than it has ever been since confederation. If it were not so the Prime Minister would be blamed for it; and when it is so should he not get some little credit for it?

There is another matter I must refer to. Campaigners have been going through Ontario saying that this government has clogged the channels of trade. Let me quote what Mr. Dunning wrote in a Liberal campaign paper. He said:

All major European markets are now closed to us as a result of prohibitive tariffs following the war.

There is Charlie's picture and there is Charlie's signature.

An hon. MEMBER: When was that?

Mr. SPOTTON: That was July 14, 1930. I do not think I will take up the time of the house discussing the Fordney-McCumber tariff, the Hawley-Smoot tariff, or other tariffs. I am just going to leave it to the country that the greatest finance minister Canada ever had, according to the Liberals, made this statement in the midst of the last election:

All major European markets are now closed to us as a result of prohibitive tariffs following the war. Only one market remains—the British market. If we lose it, there is no other market. Losing it, Saskatchewan farmers would be ruined. Are we in danger of losing it? Yes, 1929 proved unless we act now. How can we secure and hold the British market? There is only one answer.

And I will not read any further. But he states clearly and definitely from period to period that one observation which I wish to read to the house. I am going to make my own speech, such as it is, but for the benefit of the member for all Vancouver I shall read that first paragraph again:

All major European markets are now closed to us as a result of prohibitive tariffs following the war.

And then the next:

Only one market remains—the British market.

I shall be glad to show my hon. friend the paper. In fact I am going to have it photographed so that all may be able to see it.

I can well remember some years ago in the house when the leader of the opposition used always to speak about "us like-minded people." That is the time he was courting the Progressives. I can well remember that he twitted me as being a minority member in the house because "us like-minded people" had divided.

To come back to my leader, I would like to leave this one thought with the younger people of Canada. In 1911, the present Prime Minister, in seconding the address, placed before the house practically every piece of forward and upward looking legislation that we have had during the last two sessions. I do not know that I shall take the time to read his remarks in full.

Mr. DONNELLY: Did he support reciprocity with the United States?

Mr. SPOTTON: Well "reciprocity" is only a word. We might as well say "man," but there are different types of men. We might say "Do you like apples?" "Well, some kinds of apples." The word "reciprocity" does not mean anything unless there is some equitable trading arrangement behind it.

Speaking of the Liberal party—and when I say "the Liberal party" I want it to be understood that I am speaking not of the Liberal party at large in the country or of all hon. members on the other side of the house, but of the men who are temporarily in control—I wish to say this to the country: The same old crowd that was cast aside in 1930 are in control of the Liberal party to-day. If this government is defeated the people know just exactly whom they are getting back.

Mr. DONNELLY: We will come back at the next election.

Mr. SPOTTON: At school I always noticed that the fellow who walked around with a chip on his shoulder wouldn't fight. I never saw the fellow around the barroom who took off his coat and rolled up his sleeves, fighting. I never boasted that I would be back; I do not know whether I will or not. That rests with my people, but I do know this, that from headquarters here they have sent up their chief—well one of the fellows in my riding calls him the chief statis-ishun; he got the word "statistician" mixed up—in the last ten days saying that Barkis was willing if they would give him the nomination. But I have nothing to say as to who will have it; that is not my job.

In 1911 twenty four years ago the present Prime Minister said in this house:

Too often it has been found that child labour and the work which has been undertaken, especially by married women, in the older countries has involved a loss of vital force in the succeeding generation, and we Canadians—we in this young country—must, it seems to me, if we are true to our best traditions, realize that at best we hold this great land with its brilliant opportunities and its splendid resources as trustees for that posterity which will one day weigh us up in judgment for the manner in which we have discharged the trust reposed in us.

I do not think there has been a time in the history of the Canadian people when it was more apparent that we should have a band of trained experts capable of gathering at first hand full and accurate information for the benefit of the Canadian farmer, manufacturer and workman than in the election that has just passed.

In my judgment, in this complex civilization of ours, the great struggle of the future will be between human rights and the property interests; and it is the duty and the function of government to provide that there shall be no undue regard for the latter that limits or lessens the other.

It is of transcendent importance that this house and this parliament should be seized of the fact that the people demand that some tribunal shall be created that will have control over the extent of the issue of securities by public utility companies, and that the capitalization of industrial concerns should bear some just proportion to the outlay, and to the physical value of the enterprise which it represents.

It is essential that we in Canada, as the greatest partner, should extend our trade so far as possible among the British dominions and with the motherland.

If any hon. member has any doubt, I will give him a report of that speech. I would also refer him to a speech for which I thank the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). We in Ontario thought him a very fiery politician in days of old, but I am glad to know he was fair enough from his place in the house to pay a tribute to the sincerity of our leader, the Prime Minister of Canada.

I would like to have said a word or two about the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, but I will give just one incident that happened in a neighbouring county the other day. A young farmer was bowed down with a first mortgage of $5,000 with $800 accumulated interest, and was paying six and a half per cent to some money Shylock. He had a second mortgage of $1,000 with $400 accumulated interest and was paying six per cent on it. Each year his back was bowed down by a burden of $461 of interest. The $5,800 mortgage was reduced to $5,000 and he gets that for five years at three per cent. The $1,400 mortgage was reduced to $1,200 and he gets that for ten years at two per cent, so that instead of having an interest burden of $461, which no farmer could bear, he went home happy making a new start in life with an interest charge of $174. I wish to thank the Minister of Finance on behalf of the farmers of Ontario, who have been turned down coldly on the word of the deputy minister of agriculture for Ontario, for increasing the amount to $90,000,000.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, the question now before the house is a subamendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). At the beginning of my remarks it is not my intention to deal with that question, but I will deal with it later on. It is my purpose in rising this afternoon to discuss the very serious situation that we find in certain parts of western Canada, more particularly in the district where I live, in regard to drought conditions. I wish to take some of the time at my disposal to discuss that matter. Some little time ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) stated in the house that it was the intention of the federal government—at least that was as far as they had gone—to deal with that important question. But the statement of the minister was so indefinite that I feel it my duty as representing one of those dried-out areas to discuss the matter a little more fully and more particularly with the intention of laying before the government and the house some proposals that may be of value in that regard.

One of the first things that I wish to discuss with regard to that matter is the question of responsibility. Last session I suggested to one of the ministers of the crown certain things that might be done in order to alleviate the distress, but I was very soon informed that this matter came under the jurisdiction of the provincial government and consequently the federal government, having no jurisdiction, did not think it advisable even to consider the suggestions I made.

Now I want to take the house back to the time when this area was thrown open for settlement. At that time the government of Canada controlled all the unalienated crown lands. In 1909 it was decided by the then Minister of the Interior that this particular area should be thrown open to settlement, because many new settlers were then coming into the country and it was thought advisable to direct them to this area rather than send them farther north where frost conditions were bad at that time. The then Minister of the Interior was from Alberta, no doubt he believed that it was advisable to increase the population of that province as quickly as possible. He finally decided that this area should be opened up for settlement. Before it was opened up, according to information which I have received from officers of the department, not only did the officers of the department advise him against opening this territory for settlement, but people who had been resident in the area for many years also sent in protests advising against opening it for settlement because severe drought conditions prevailed periodically over a large part of it. Notwithstanding all these protests the Minister of the Interior proceeded to invite not only the people of Canada but of the United States or indeed any person who cared to go into that area to follow agricultural pursuits. In so doing he practically intimated to those people that this was a fair agricultural district.

Inasmuch as the federal government then controlled the land in this area, and opened it up and invited the people to go in and follow agricultural pursuits there, I hold that the responsibility for what has occurred rests wholly and solely with the federal government and not the provincial government. That being so it is very important as far as the people in that area are concerned to know as quickly as possible just what the federal government intend to do. I understand that a committee of government officials has been appointed and is studying this matter. I suggest that as soon as possible information as to what is likely to be done should be made public. Last year certain works were constructed in that area which may be of some advantage, namely, the building of dams to impound the spring water. But that is not sufficient. Furthermore it will be remembered by hon. members that there was some discussion in government circles last year as to the possibility of the federal government declaring this area a federal district, and that they would take full responsibility for that district for some time until their plans were completely carried out. Recently we have had no intimation from the government as to whether they are going to follow that proposal or not. In fact the proposals coming from the government are so indefinite as to leave us quite in the air.

One thing to which I wish to call the attention of the house is the tremendous loss occasioned to the people who went into that area. Those of us who have had the experience of homesteading, recognize that some of the new settlers did not fit in with that way of life. But in this particular area, after a few years, the people of that class had been practically eliminated, had left the district, and there remained a very fine type of settler, people who knew how to farm, who followed the most intensive farming practices according to the recommendations of our agricultural department and more particularly of the officers of the experimental farms. But notwithstanding that the people in there have suffered severe loss, so much so that many of them have left the district. The district is now becoming depopulated. To the credit of those who went in there early, they left with practically nothing, notwithstanding that many of them went in with considerable sums of money. In most cases the farmers of the area of which I speak followed the recommendations of those who knew something about intensive agriculture in western Canada, but notwithstanding that, we learned from experience that some of those practices were very detrimental in the final analysis. Take for instance the recommendation of the officials of the Department of Agriculture that in an area subject to drought the land should be summer fallowed every other year. That practice we have found to be very detrimental, but we did not know it at first, and so we have to meet its consequences. The result has been that through intensive summer fallowing and intensive cultivation the fibre in that part of the country has been lost, most of it has been blown away by the high winds. The settlers cannot be blamed for having followed practices recommended to them by men supposed to know. I do not blame the officials of the department for making those recommendations, I know that as far as western Canada generally is concerned those recommendations proved very satisfactory.

The situation then is that one of the first things that we must try to accomplish in that dry area is to restore the fibre to the soil, and the only way that can be done efficiently is to seed it down to grass. But as far as the settlers now there are concerned they have no funds to provide grass seed nor are they in a position to secure any. I submit to the government, having in mind particularly the fact that some study has been given by the officers of the Department of Agriculture to the most suitable types of grass seed that should be sown in that area, that the government must make provision whereby most of the settlers at any rate can get a small supply of grass seed for the purpose of seeding without cost to themselves. Unless some such policy is followed and until such time as we have restored the fibre to the land in that area, I submit that any of the other proposals, no matter how important they may be, will prove of much less value than they otherwise might be. We have to keep that land from blowing, and there is no doubt in my mind that we cannot do so unless we get fibre back into it. That being so I submit that one of the first things the government must do is try to secure a supply of grass seed. I do not ask that large quantities be given each farmer, but I do suggest that a reasonable quantity be given the farmer so that he can have a plot and develop his own seed until he has sufficient for the future.

The next suggestion I wish to make is that strip farming be encouraged. I must admit, of course, that this practice has been followed in some parts of the drought areas in the west for some years. In travelling over those dry areas, however, I have found that many farmers have not as yet realized the possible benefits that may be derived from strip farming. By means of strip farming, and having stubble a certain distance apart, to some extent you do break up the surface winds which move the soil, and that helps a little. In my judgment it is not as good a method as restoring the fibre but it will help until such time as that fibre can be restored.

The next proposal I wish to make is one which I made in 1922, when the drought area was comparatively small in relation to the drought area of to-day; that is, the planting of trees. I do not mean the planting of trees in large blocks; I mean the planting of shelter belts at least on the west side of every farm, and those shelter belts should be at least four rods wide. In 1922 I suggested that in order to encourage the farmers of the dry areas to plant trees the government should give those farmers some financial assistance. Some may object to that, but I see greater possibilities in the planting of trees than in almost any proposal other than the sowing of grass seed. If we had a policy under which it would be possible for the government to make a small contribution to the farmers to enable them properly to cultivate their land before planting the trees; to see to it that they get the proper kind of trees for that area, and that after planting the trees they cultivate them for a few years, until no further cultivation can be carried on because of the growth of the trees, I think a great deal of good would result. If we had the shelter belts on one side of the road allowance running north and south, which would mean every mile, I am sure that when the hot winds come along from the southwest and blow through those trees, soon it would be cooled down and the atmosphere would be much cooler than it is at the present time. It is plain that when a hot wind passes through plants or trees, evaporation from the leaves takes place and the wind is cooled; consequently this would be beneficial to agriculture. But there is no use in individual persons trying to accomplish this result; it must be of government policy. The farmers must be assisted to some extent by the government in order that they may be induced to see to it that their land is properly prepared in the first place and that they get the trees recommended by the officers of the department for planting in that particular area. In some areas the land is a little on the light side; that land might properly be planted with large tree plantations, which would be very beneficial also. I do submit, however, that we need tree belts or shelter belts at least every mile, running north and south, and when this is properly carried out I am sure we will not have the severity of drought in that area that we have experienced in the past.

I remember that last winter I had a conversation with a friend of mine living at Claresholm, during which we discussed by and large the whole question of this drought area and what was likely to happen in the future. This gentleman told me of an experience he had on his own farm. He said, "You know, we had some hot winds in our area this year, such as we never had before. I have a shelter belt on the west side of my farm, and I sowed oats right alongside that belt. For the first forty or fifty rods in I had a crop of 60 or 70 bushels of the finest oats I ever grew, but as I got further away from the shelter belt the crop began to dwindle until at the far end there was no crop at all." That is a practical experience which substantiates what I stated in this house in 1922, that it is very essential that we extend assistance to the farmers in planting trees and in directing them as to the best manner in which to take care of those trees, which should be a part of the government policy in regard to this drought area. It may take a good deal of time to accomplish this end, but in view of the fact that that country is really worth while and that when we get reasonable moisture conditions there is no part of western Canada that can produce more efficiently or more heavily than that territory, I submit that it is certainly worth while. We have wonderful soil there, and I submit that it will be to the future advantage of Canada to give really serious consideration to this matter.

I have already referred to the construction of a few dams last year to impound the spring floods, but the amount of work done last year in comparison with the territory to be covered was so small that it appears to me that if this phase of our activity in trying to reclaim our drought area is worth while it will have to be taken up on a very much larger scale than it was last year. We made a beginning then, but the point that has been exercising my mind is this: Are the federal government making any contribution to that work, or is it being left wholly and solely on the shoulders of the provincial government? At this late date, after the federal government who controlled the natural resources of our province until very recently have disposed of the greater portion of those resources, it is hardly fair that the provincial government should be left with this burden, unaided by the federal government. I still take the stand, and I wish to reiterate what I have already stated, that in my judgment the responsibility rests very largely with the federal government inasmuch as the federal government was responsible for inviting people to settle in that area.

Mr. RHODES: Will the hon. gentleman permit one question for the purpose of information? Was there any objection on the part of the province at the time to that land being opened up by the dominion government?

Mr. GARDINER: The province had no jurisdiction over it and so far as I know the province was not consulted. As a matter of fact I do not suppose the provincial government of that day had any information as to the nature of that country. I believe this land was opened for settlement in 1908 or early in 1909, consequently the provincial government would not have much information.

The next suggestion I wish to make unfortunately would not apply to the entire drought area, but in 1922 or 1923 the Department of the Interior surveyed the section of the country in which I live in order to determine whether or not it could be irrigated. I know that when I mention irrigation the minds of some hon. members of this house who know something about the subject will revert immediately to the problems we have had in connection with the irrigation districts of southern Alberta. However, this is not simply an irrigation proposal. In 1922 and 1923, as I have already stated, the Department of the Interior surveyed this territory to determine the possibilities of irrigation from the Red Deer river, and they found that it was quite feasible. They found that if they could impound enough water in the Red Deer river from the spring floods and the melting of the snow in the mountains in June and July, they could run the main ditch so as to take in all the territory I represent and right up almost to Saskatoon.

There has been a proposal made in the last two years, and this proposal I submitted to the government last year, that this Pierce stock watering scheme, as it is termed, be undertaken by the federal government. The proposal is simply this: to dam up the waters of the Red Deer river, to impound all the surplus water that comes down that river and goes eventually out to Hudson bay, and to make use of it for the settlers within that area. As I have already stated, it is not proposed to make simply an irrigation scheme of it. What the settlers in that part of the country suggest is that the dam be built and the main ditch dug, and that in so far as any other development is concerned it be left to the municipalities, with engineering advice to guide them. The idea of the proposal is simply this: We have many lakes which in the last few years have gone dry. When these lakes and the large sloughs were full of water, we had generally speaking a reasonable amount of moisture and splendid atmospheric conditions. The people of that area believe that with the development of this Pierce stock watering scheme, and the bringing of the water into the low places, some of the humidity will be restored that has been lost on account of the lakes having dried up. I do not know what the cost is likely to be, but I submit that if the cost is reasonable it is a project which the government might well consider, because it would serve two important purposes. First it would assist in restoring the humidity in that part of the country, and second, it would provide ample water for the watering of stock, which can be raised fairly well in that part of the country, but into which people are now afraid to go very deeply because of the shortage of water. The scheme I believe is well worth considering. I am satisfied that it would be of great advantage, and taken in conjunction with some of the other suggestions I have made I am sure that in time it would help us to overcome the worst effects which the drought situation has created in that part of the country.

I do not propose to say any more in this regard, other than to remind the government that the people in these dried out areas are looking very anxiously for the government's program, and if the government is in a position to announce that program at an early day such an announcement will have a very beneficial effect on the minds of the people living in those areas. We realize the immensity of the job that lies before us. We do not expect to overcome the situation in a year or two years; it will take time, but, may I repeat, in my judgment it is worth while in the interests of Canada as a whole that the best brains available should tackle this big problem and let the people know the results as soon as possible.

I wish to devote a few minutes of my remaining time to a discussion of the question that is now before the house, namely the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). It is not necessary for me to read the amendment. Suffice it to say that the amendment calls the attention of the house to the fact that we have in Canada immense potentialities for the production of the food, clothing and shelter which the people of this country require. It also invites the attention of the house to the fact that there is an apparent shortage of purchasing power, which means that the people cannot buy the goods that are available or the goods that can be produced. There may be some difference of opinion as to whether there is a deficiency of the purchasing power necessary to purchase all the goods that are available, or whether it is that the purchasing power which is available is not properly distributed and that through this maldistribution many people are not in a position to satisfy their requirements. But we do know that there is a maldistribution of purchasing power, and we do know that there are people who have too much purchasing power, or at least more than they can use. We know also that there are many people who have no purchasing power at all, and in consequence many families to-day, as has been so often stated in this house, have to depend either upon the dole or upon charity.

The question of purchasing power is a very important one, and I regret to say that with one slight exception, the surtax which the finance minister proposes to place on unearned incomes over $14,000, the budget does not even begin to deal with the most important question that is facing the Canadian people to-day. I appreciate what the minister has done in respect to the surtax on unearned incomes, but it is so small in comparison with what is required that I am amazed that governments refrain from doing that which they have the power to do, the things which are necessary in the interests of the people.

I realize of course, Mr. Speaker, that the present situation is a product of the capitalist system, and is bound to continue just so long as we permit profit to be exacted. There can be no question about that. Just so long as we permit profit to be exacted, just so long will this condition continue, and no legislation that does not touch the real problem, namely profit, can ever do more than touch the fringe of the problem we have to meet. Profit has been described as monetary or financial gain for which no goods or services are given in return; that is to say, those who make a profit get something for nothing. By virtue of the fact that they get something for nothing they are in a position to pile up wealth, and through that accumulation of wealth they have a control of purchasing power equal to their accumulation of wealth. That being so, the house must recognize the fact that all these measures so called for the benefit of the people, while they may be of some value, will soon have their value dissipated because under the profit system people eventually will make a profit out of them.

The question then arises, are we going to continue the profit system? Just so long as profit is permitted, and people who make profits get something for nothing, as I have already said they do, the concentration of wealth will continue. In addition the concentration of purchasing power will continue, so much so that people will say, whether it is correct or not, that there is a definite shortage of purchasing power, and that therefore the necessary purchasing power should be made up from some other source than the present available sources. I am satisfied that the worst factor at the present time is the concentration of wealth with its consequent concentration of purchasing power. I think it was two years ago that I suggested to the Minister of Finance that during the depression he might take all incomes over $25,000 and use them for the state. This was not done. I think this was a logical suggestion, having in mind the purchasing power which is concentrated in the hands of the few. I put figures on record last year which showed conclusively that three and a half per cent of the people of this country own sixty-seven per cent of the wealth. If that is so, it naturally follows that three and a half per cent of the people possess sixty-seven per cent of the purchasing power.

The situation to-day is different from what it was ten years ago. At that time there were still opportunities for safe and profitable investment, not only in Canada but in other countries. Because of the development of industrial plant and equipment in all the countries of the world, with the exception of Russia and parts of Asia, the opportunity for the investment of surplus purchasing power is no longer available. This surplus purchasing power is in the hands of people who already have more than they can spend on their own personal needs. The goods which this surplus purchasing power might buy remains on the shelf and there is unemployment. Until this purchasing power is forced into circulation, through legislation, some form of taxation or by other means, these goods will remain on the shelves and many of the people of Canada will be without profitable work. In the face of conditions such as these I cannot get wildly enthusiastic over the budget.

Hon. members opposite have referred to this budget as a poor man's budget. I do not think they ever made a truer statement in their lives. It is a poor man's budget because it will keep the poor man poor. Under these circumstances I feel it my duty to support the subamendment moved by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Macleod. I believe that this subamendment deals with the crux of the situation, the distribution of the purchasing power of this country to permit the people to buy what they require. I do not believe it is advisable to distribute this purchasing power to the people without their giving some service in return, provided they are physically able to do so. With all the machinery of government and with all the power that parliament enjoys, I think we could devise ways and means whereby this purchasing power could be distributed to the people in return for their labour.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I desire to assure hon. members that I am not going to make a speech. I should be finished in five or ten minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Miss MACPHAIL: I do not think hon. members should be so enthusiastic over that statement.

I did not want to interrupt the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) while he was speaking but I do feel that I should make a statement in connection with the delegation appointed by the mass meeting of farmers of Ontario and Quebec who came to Ottawa two years ago to interview the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I always enjoy listening to the hon. member for North Huron. I remember seeing him at this meeting and I know he was interested in its success. I understood him to say that he believed that the farmers who attended this mass meeting did not expect either the Prime Minister or any other minister to come to address them. I know that the hon. member believes that his understanding of the case is the right one, but he is mistaken.

This matter has been discussed before but I should like to give the facts again so that they will appear in the same Hansard as the remarks of the hon. member. Many meetings were held throughout Ontario and I believe I addressed at least twenty. I might mention that the audiences were quite large. At all times I adopted a nonpartisan attitude as I was interested only in the monetary question. I wanted the British pound sterling to be worth at least parity in Canadian funds, or even more than par. It must be remembered that we are competing with Australia, the Argentine and Denmark and the British pound is now and was then worth more in the currencies of those countries than it is here. I do not think anyone listening to me could have told what were my politics. I tried to be absolutely fair to the government and in many instances the people who presided over the meetings I addressed were members of the Conservative party. Four thousand farmers came to Ottawa at their own expense and in some cases this expense was considerable. I do not believe anyone would expect 4,000 people to come to Ottawa to discuss matters of exchange without being able to see any member of the government. The arrangements with the Prime Minister were made by Mr. R. J. Scott, who comes from North Huron. I know Mr. Scott quite well and I suggested to him that as the Prime Minister was very busy any delegation which might go to invite him to the large assembly should be exactly on time. I had nothing further to do with the matter nor did I have any further conversation with Mr. Scott. It was not until afterwards that I learned that the delegation had been one hour late for their appointment. This should not have happened.

They went up to ask the Prime Minister to come to the large assembly. He did not come. The astonishing thing is that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) was with the Prime Minister when he was interviewed by this small group and he did not come down to the large assembly either. This group asked the Prime Minister to address them or to send someone in his stead. Up to this point this large audience of 4,000 had been remarkably friendly to the Prime Minister but they were anything but friendly when their representatives came back and told them that no member of the government would be down to address them. I have talked over this matter with the Prime Minister who tells me—I accept his explanation—that he did not understand that he or any other member of the government was expected to go to address this large assembly. Apparently he and Mr. Scott had misunderstood each other and the Prime Minister did not know otherwise until the small group interviewed him. I accept this explanation but I say to the hon. member for North Huron and to the government that they must accept full responsibility for not addressing the assembled farmers. These 4,000 people had come to Ottawa from two different provinces to see the government in connection with a matter which vitally concerned their industry. I was surprised that anyone should make such a political blunder. I felt that day and I still feel that the government has caused a loss to the farmers of millions of dollars through keeping the value of the British pound so low in Canadian funds. Had the Prime Minister interviewed this gathering he would have found an audience anxious to put before him a matter which was vital to them, and in all probability this might have had some effect upon the Prime Minister's subsequent action in connection with exchange. I felt I must say this in order that the hon. member for North Huron and I would understand each other.

I think we should have an immediate election. I see no reason why the house should adjourn for five weeks. We have carried on now for some time during the Prime Minister's illness, which the whole house regrets; the whole house wishes him restored to his usual buoyant health, and we will welcome him back. But since the house has carried on for a considerable time now without him, I see no reason why we should not continue to do so until the end of the session. We owe this to the people, because after all we are all representatives of the people, from the Prime Minister down or from the private member up, whichever way you like to look at it. We have been elected by the people to attend to their business and there is no doubt that the people of Canada want an election. That being so, I cannot see any reason why an election should be delayed until the autumn, because by that time we shall be well into the harvest, and an election then is difficult in country districts, certainly for the west. June is the time for an election, because it is the month in all the year when the farmers are freest. The general opinion is that June is the best month. July, which the last government found a favourable month, is certainly a hot one —I mean the weather—and there are all sorts of difficulties, in connection with teachers, and vacationists generally; they are inconvenienced. No one is less certain of what the Liberal party intend to do if they are elected than I am; in fact, my greatest concern is what that party will do if they are elected. If they become the government it will be a serious thing for Canada, should they not know their own minds any better then, than apparently they do now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: She knows we are going to be returned, though.

Miss MACPHAIL: It almost looks that way, and for that reason I think the Liberals ought to make up their minds on policy now. At any rate, I submit that we ought to have an election as soon as possible, and for that reason I will support the Liberal amendment—not for any meat there is in the amendment, I assure you.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) said some interesting things in his speech last night. I read it over carefully to-day and I wish to make one or two comments on what the hon. gentleman said. He is worried about the young people. I quote:

> If you tell them to gee they will haw, and if you tell them to go east they will go west.... I do not know how we are going to discipline them; to my mind that is certainly a serious question.... To my mind our most important problem is our young people, girls as well as boys; one is as bad as the other. Where are they going?

I was wondering whether youth has any real reason to revere and trust age at this particular time. This generation has seen youth tricked and betrayed in the world war and in the peace which has followed it. The young people went to the war and the old people stayed comfortably at home and died in bed, though not soon enough, unfortunately. And then the young people have had to go through a period of five or six years, the blackest years we have known. No one has suffered more than youth. We want them to be diligent at school and to study, but when they get through what have we to offer them? We know that some of the older people are directors in twenty-five or thirty companies, drawing a remuneration for every directorship. There are people in high places in Ontario who are certainly very old, while the young people can find no place at all. I must say I cannot see why at this moment youth should be very enthusiastic about following the vision of age. I have respect for age, but I have respect for youth also, and I do think that the outlook of youth is more likely to be one that will help us in the present and in the future than the outlook of age. I do think too that young people are losing faith as they never did before, because they see all around them an abundance of everything and want at the same time. They realize that we have enough but that we have not learned how to distribute it. The best way any of us can keep youth is by precept and example, and this age has been a peculiarly hypocritical one. One likes to hunt for words that sound mild enough to be spoken, but it is difficult always to find the right ones. At any rate, no one can deny that our whole educational system, our religious system, our business, politics, finance and commerce have all been to a degree hypocritical. We know that we have worshipped one set of ideals while our practice has been quite another thing.

The young people are not fooled. They know that if teachers in universities to-day discuss the things they really do believe they may not be teachers much longer. This is not true universally but it is all too true in high places, whether in journalism, politics or commerce, and sometimes even in religion. The youth know that these people are not always doing the things they profess when they are talking to them about high ideals; they know that when they are talking high ideals they are doing so with their tongue in their cheek. This is one of the things that one does not have to prove. There are of course individual exceptions. There are exceptions in all the fields I have mentioned, and that makes one happy.

Youth was never finer or more courageous than to-day; it is adventurous. The young people are ready to do and suffer for a better day. But there have been illusions about reaching the top. In the last twenty years we have heard a good deal about ambition and striving for great wealth and getting to the top. I never know where it is, however —the top of this profession, the top of this, that and the other—but probably one thing that has disillusioned youth is some of the stuffed shirts at the top. Perhaps looking at the top in all our Canadian life has not been very edifying to youth, and the young people are wondering whether it is worth the effort to get to the top. I hear many of them say that. What they want to do is to live harmonious, happy lives wherever they are among their fellow men, whether at the top or halfway down, or wherever they may be.

I was thinking too, if youth can undergo the stuffing which we call education and the advice and domineering which we call discipline, and still retain its personality and spirit, that speaks well for it, and we have nothing to fear from the future because after all youth can serve only if it moulds institutions, ideals and customs to its uses and needs. Youth never serves by following age. Age always thought youth was, well heading off in some very dangerous direction, but always youth is leading out and on. So I felt, since there might not be anyone else to say it, I would say what I feel is in the hearts of a great many young people throughout Canada.

I am not going to discuss the budget at all. I thought Gerry McGeer, Mayor of Vancouver, really struck the secret of budget making the other night when he as one of the mayors addressed some of the members in the railway committee room. He said: "If you cannot make a budget balance, take out of it the items that cause it not to balance and put them into extraordinary account." That is the secret of budget making these days.

I have only one thing to say on the whole subject of finance and that is that it is very clear to me—in fact it is so clear I cannot interest myself in many other aspects of our national problem, because after all it is one great problem—that we must from now on begin to finance consumption and not only production of goods. We have so far thought all we needed to do was to finance the production of goods, and consumption of goods would take care of itself. I do not think that is true and we are all begininng to realize it is not. We are now just about ready to contemplate the short-circuiting of money from the source of supply to consumptive channels without passing through production. I believe in that general statement lies the progress which we will make in the future. It seems at the moment too odd to be seriously contemplated and classical economists still are pooh-poohing it and saying we must not think of anything that is quite so simple. Yet I suppose that if, when Watt first discovered that steam would lift the lid of a tea-kettle, he had told anybody he thought that power would some day revolutionize industry, people would have looked upon him as a madman. It is no more unusual than that to believe there is a bad gap in our financial system. If it is true that dividends, salaries and wages paid out in any industry are never sufficient to buy back at the ticketed price all the goods produced by that industry, there certainly is a gap and it will have to be bridged by methods which we have not used before. I believe the solution of the agricultural and unemployment problems lies in this new theory of money. I expect to see it growing in favour as time goes on until finally it will be accepted as orthodox and will then become quite the thing.

THE KING'S JUBILEE CANCER FUND

ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS MAJESTY'S WISH THAT COMPREHENSIVE GIFT BE DEVOTED TO FUND—PERSONAL GIFTS NOT DESIRED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I have a telegram from His Excellency the Governor General, informing me that the king has authorized the announcement that His Majesty wishes that the jubilee cancer fund be regarded as a comprehensive jubilee gift from all his Canadian subjects including dominion and provincial governments and official bodies, and that it is not expected or desired that any other jubilee gift, whether collective or individual, be sent to His Majesty.

I am making this public in this way at this time because there appears to be some idea that personal gifts will be sent to His Majesty by governments and official bodies at the time of the silver jubilee, as has been done on other occasions of a similar character. As the king has graciously decided that, instead of any such personal gifts, support should be given to the King George V silver jubilee cancer fund for Canada, which His Majesty would regard as a comprehensive jubilee gift from all his Canadian subjects, I may be permitted to express the hope that the people of Canada will support this jubilee cancer fund, not only on account of our great loyalty to and admiration for His Majesty, but also because the money so raised will be used in our fight against cancer, which is the worst disease from which we are now suffering.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I am very pleased to have this opportunity to support the right hon. the acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley) in the hope he has expressed that contributions to the silver jubilee cancer fund will be both widespread and generous. It is, I think, appropriate that the matter should have been brought up in this house, because the gift will constitute a national thanksgiving offering, and there has apparently been some misunderstanding as to the feature of it which has just been mentioned by my right hon. friend, namely, that individual gifts from the governments of the different provinces or from the municipalities, and possibly from the federal government as well might be expected, whereas, as I understand my right hon. friend now, the intention is that all parties in the country, both public bodies and individuals, should join together to make this one collective gift—a gift that will be worthy of the historic occasion which it is intended to commemorate, worthy of the admiration and affection which the people of Canada have for His Majesty, and worthy of the great cause to which the proceeds of the gift will be applied. I do hope that the national aspect of the matter will be appreciated throughout Canada and that contributions will be made generously from all sides. In that connection I might point out that the impression does exist, since there has been mention of small amounts of one dollar as contributions to be sent to Her Excellency at Government House, that the intention is to have the gift made up solely of such small contributions. I imagine that the purpose is rather that contributions in any amount will be most welcome. Certainly where they can be made generously and on a large scale they will be most acceptable.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words in support of this very laudable object, namely, the cancer fund. I am sure that every member of this house trusts that the support will be generous. But may I go a little further than either the acting Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition has gone. Cancer is recognized to-day as the most insidious disease which the human race has to deal with, and while we all appreciate the fact that this fund is being started for the purpose of investigating not only the cause but the cure of cancer, may I suggest to the house that the time has come when we should have a government policy in regard to this matter. We have been allowing this very important question to remain solely in the hands of private individuals, but the disease is so insidious that, while some progress has been made, what has been done through private initiative is absolutely insignificant in relation to the devastation which the disease causes in human life. I submit that this is a good time to impress on the government of Canada the fact that responsibility rests on the governments in this country to prosecute this matter not only with financial support but by every other means within their power. I trust that this cancer fund will be the beginning of such a new policy.

CLASSIFICATION OF UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Yesterday every member received a translated copy of the correspondence between Mr. Léon Trépanier, joint secretary, congress of the mayors of Canada and myself, and between Mr. G. A. Wenige, mayor of London, and myself with regard to the classification of unemployed. In his letter Mr. Trépanier says:

(Translation) Professor Marsh of McGill is at the disposal of the government to complete that tabulation by adding to it the information which you asked for.

May I ask the government whether the questionnaire also mentioned in Mr. Trépanier's letter was submitted to them before being sent to the municipality and whether Professor Marsh has been employed by the government to do any work in that regard. If so, may I suggest to the government that they should rather have this classification work done by the bureau of statistics.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Professor Marsh has not been employed by the government to carry on the work suggested. As long ago as 1931 the provinces were asked to try to compile as well as they could figures with respect to unemployment. Now, anyone who has paid attention to the experiences of other countries with respect to the assembling of figures of this character knows that it is probably one of the most difficult tasks that can be undertaken. It has been stated repeatedly at the League of Nations and repeatedly in the House of Commons that from the very nature of the thing no figures in any country are even fairly accurate. The mobility of the individual is one of the great difficulties. A census taken to-day with respect to unemployed and their classification, while fairly accurate as of to-day, would be wholly undependable thirty days from now. The government in 1931 did ask the provinces to endeavour to determine the number of unemployed who were employable and I must confess—I do not blame the provinces—that the report we received was not very enlightening. In January this year I had the director of unemployment relief communicate with the various provinces to see whether they could not give us a classification which would reflect a more accurate picture. Since that time useful information has been received from all the provinces except Quebec, though Quebec has advised me that the information asked for might be supplied by the tenth of this month. I am not calling attention to the fact that Quebec has delayed, because they may have very good reasons there; it is a very difficult thing to compile these figures. The information compiled by Professor Marsh for the municipal conference which was held in Montreal recently, covered in the main municipal figures with respect to revenue and matters of that character. In Professor Marsh's résumé reference was made to relief expenditures, and if the rest of the information contained therein was no more accurate than that with respect to relief expenditures by the dominion, I am afraid it is just fifty per cent out. However I caused some inquiry to be made and Professor Marsh explains that his figures were taken from a newspaper report which was obviously inaccurate. It would be highly desirable if there were some method we could employ that would keep us informed from day to day of the number of unemployed people capable of being employed and their classification. When we get the complete information from the provinces, I of course intend to go into it with care in order to see whether, on the basis of the information given, some further steps should be taken in order to classify the unemployed, because it is obvious, if a method can be adopted to give us a complete picture as has been suggested by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), that would be most helpful.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

QUESTION AS TO INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 50 BEARING UPON DURATION OF PRESENT PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): A day or two ago I asked a question of the ministry as to the construction to be placed upon the section in the British North America Act relating to the duration of the present House of Commons and the possible bearing of the government's interpretation upon the date of a general election. The Minister of Justice was going to reply, perhaps to-day. I would ask him if he is in a position to do so now.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The replies to the questions submitted by my right hon. friend a day or two ago in regard to the duration of the present parliament are as follows:

1. Which was the day of the return of the writs for choosing the present House of Commons?

The government is not prepared to answer this question, as it involves a matter of opinion on a point of law, namely: What is the true construction of section 50 of the British North America Act? However, the invariable practice since confederation has been to adopt the date named in the proclamation of the election for the return of the writs, which for the present House of Commons was the 18th day of August, 1930.

2. When does the present House of Commons cease to continue?

Answered by number one.

3. Is it necessary that the writs for a general election be issued during the duration of the House of Commons?

The government is not aware of any provision requiring the writs for a general election to be issued during the duration of the House of Commons, but the invariable practice since confederation has been to issue the writs during such period.

4. Is there a limit to the period of time which may elapse between the date of the issue of the writs for a general election and the day of polling?

No—subject to the provision of section 20 of the British North America Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend a further question? Is it the intention of the present government to follow the invariable practice in the particulars referred to?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If I were to express my own opinion on the matter, I would say yes; but I am not in a position on such a question to express the opinion of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could the opinion of the government not be ascertained?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In due time, I fancy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could it be ascertained in the near future?

Mr. MANION: We will give the right hon. gentleman plenty of notice.

ANYOX SMELTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour or the government a question: Have any representations been made to the federal government by the provincial authorities of British Columbia or any other source in regard to the closing of the Anyox smelter, throwing approximately a thousand men out of employment? If such representations have been made, what action does the government propose to take in this matter?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): About a year ago the copper refinery or smelter at Anyox was closed down by reason of a strike that took place at the plant. At that time I took steps to remove from Canada and to return to their native country a number of agitators who fomented that strike. I was well aware that the Anyox operation was in a most difficult position by reason not only of the nature of the ore on which they were working and the cost of winning and refining it, but also the market situation for copper. At that time I was criticized by a number of my hon. friends opposite for taking the action I did, although it did result in a cessation of the strike. But I am informed that as a result of the closing down on that occasion, in addition to the other reasons which I have just indicated, the Anyox smelter has now been or is about to be permanently closed down. Representations have been made to me by a number of people—I do not think there were any from the government of British Columbia, although I shall have to look into that question and make sure—with respect to what help might be given to the operation at Anyox. A number of suggestions have been made, but the real situation is that with the present world price and market for copper, that operation in my judgment at least cannot be successfully carried on.

With respect to those who will unfortunately be thrown out of work if the plant closes down, that is essentially a problem for British Columbia. The assets of mines are of a wasting character; they do not last forever. You cannot take the same ounce of gold or pound of copper out of the ground twice, and since the beginning of time mines have come into being and gone out of the picture by reason of the exhaustion of their ore bodies. I have lived in mining camps when they started, when they reached the top of their output and when they faded out of the picture. This is purely a local problem and must be handled by the individual himself, the locality and the province if it is beyond the capacity of the individual to take care of it.

CONFERENCE IN LONDON

INFORMAL DISCUSSION OF IMPORTANT QUESTIONS BY PRIME MINISTERS WITH MEMBERS OF BRITISH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The day before yesterday the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked me whether it was suggested that anything in the nature of an imperial conference would be held at London while the jubilee celebrations were taking place. I told the right hon. gentleman at that time that I thought only informal conversations would take place then. Now I find that Mr. Stanley Baldwin announced in the British parliament on July 30 of last year that the United Kingdom government have invited the prime ministers of the dominions to take part in the jubilee ceremonies to be held in London in May, and that it was hoped to take advantage of their presence in London to discuss personally and informally any questions of particular importance outstanding. I may say that on inquiry I understand that is the position.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Is my right hon. friend aware of any questions of particular importance outstanding that are likely to be discussed? Has he any knowledge of any such question?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No, I have not heard anything of any such questions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that if the Prime Minister is well enough to do so, it is the intention that he will be present in London at the time of the jubilee ceremonies. May I ask if it is the intention of the government to have him accompanied by any other members of the government or any official personages?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No one except the Prime Minister has been invited. Whether he will be attended by others has not yet been considered.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): My right hon. friend the acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley) promised me that he would have something to say about the probable date and length of the adjournment of parliament at the Easter season. I do not wish to press him unduly in the matter, but every day we are getting nearer to the Easter recess, and if he could give some information very soon it would be much appreciated.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): As to the date of the adjournment of the house, that will depend on how the business progresses, and we shall endeavour to meet the convenience of members in that respect. It is intended to ask the house to agree to an adjournment of some time, but I am unable to-day to fix any date. I will endeavour to be a little more definite to-morrow.

BUTTER IMPORTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): On March 21 I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to be kind enough to give me an explanation regarding importations of butter from Great Britain. He then told me that my question would be taken as notice of a question. The hon. minister was kind enough to give me his answer by letter. As there are many people inquiring about the answer, and the newspapers are making guesses about it, I think it proper to ask the minister to allow me to read this letter, so that it shall be on the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no rule that permits of the hon. member doing as he proposes.

Mr. DUPUIS: Then I ask the minister to read the letter, so that it shall be on record because it is very interesting.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I was not aware at the time the hon. member asked the question that he wished the reply put on Hansard. I gave a partial answer and said that if there was any further information required I would be glad to supply it. I have no objection to putting the information on Hansard at some future time, perhaps to-morrow.

WATERLOO, QUE., POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Yesterday I asked the government whether it was proposed to carry out the recommendations of the royal commission with regard to prosecuting those who were guilty of fraud in connection with the building of the post office at Waterloo, Quebec. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) said the matter had been handed over to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether his department proposes to seek to recover the moneys unlawfully obtained.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The report is now being examined by the law officers of the Department of Justice, but the evidence has not been received yet. It is necessary to have the evidence in order to form any opinion.

UNIVERSITY OF MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not appear to have much luck in obtaining answers to my questions. On the 22nd of March last I asked the honourable ministers from the province of Quebec if they were in favour of the Barrette plan for a contribution of three million dollars towards the completion of the University of Montreal, jointly with the government of the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal. The right honourable the acting prime minister (Sir George Perley) asked me to have my question inscribed on the order paper. As the hon. Minister of Marine knows full well that a private member cannot present any measure involving the expenditure of public funds—such measures being the exclusive prerogative of ministers of the Crown—would he kindly inform us whether he is in favour of submitting such a plan to the house, as the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec are interested to know.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the house did suggest to my hon. friend that he have his question put on the order paper; we have not seen it there as yet. We were waiting for it to consider my hon. friend's request and to give him an answer. The answer must come from the government itself and not from the Minister of Marine alone.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): What about cabinet solidarity? Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Marine has no doubt heard of the matter from the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette), as I am informed that the hon. member mentioned it to all the ministers from the province of Quebec, to the right hon. the Prime Minister and to other members of the government. Since that time —that is more than three months ago—have the hon. Minister of Marine and the other members of the government not had time to consider the matter? I should like to have an immediate answer.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I do not intend to engage in debate with my hon. friend on this question, which is an extremely delicate one. My hon. friend may laugh, but—

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): No.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —but he is not doing it in the interest of the institution.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): No, I am not laughing about that.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The citizens of the province of Quebec and the authorities of the university of Montreal know perfectly well how the ministers representing that province feel towards the institution in question, but I have some doubt as to the efficacy of the means used by hon. members opposite—

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): The plan originated on the government side.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —to help the university.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): The plan originated on the government side.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I will say to my hon. friend that when he will have put his question in the proper form the government will be in a position to answer it.

Mr. BARRETT (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): If the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé is satisfied with that, he is easily pleased.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Supreme Court of Canada—

Contingencies and disbursements, including books, magazines, etc., for judges, not exceeding, $350, $4,100.

Law books and books of reference for library, and binding of same, $7,000.

Printing, binding and distributing supreme court reports, $8,000.

Mr. POULIOT: On this item may I ask the Minister of Justice if the government contemplate the construction of a new building for the Supreme Court of Canada. This matter was brought up in the house previously and the answer of the minister was very satisfactory, but every member would be delighted to have a more complete answer. I mention this again because the supreme court library is most valuable, containing books which could not be replaced, and I wonder if that library could not be made fireproof in order to protect that important collection of books.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member's suggestion, I think, is well worthy of consideration, but this is a matter upon which I could not commit the government. It would have to be discussed in the first instance with the Department of Public Works, but I agree that it is high time something should be done in that regard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, it is absolutely impossible for us in this end of the chamber to hear anything that is going on.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I usually speak quite loudly, but there is a good deal of noise in the chamber. I agree that the time has come when some consideration should be given the question of a new building for the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada, and I think some consideration should be given the question of library accommodation both in connection with the House of Commons and in connection with the libraries of those courts, which represent a great deal of money and which are now in buildings that are not looked upon as fireproof. However, this is a matter which concerns very largely the Department of Finance and very intimately the Department of Public Works. I can only express my own views on the subject and my sympathy with the views expressed by my hon. friend who asked the question.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I really wanted to speak on item No. 13, but since the subject I wish to discuss to-day pertains to the administration of justice I think I am justified in saying what I have to say even under this item. On March 11, 1935, a news item, headlined in large capital letters, appeared in the Montreal Star which might have destroyed forever more the high regard I have for the judiciary of Canada were it not for the fact that the unfortunate and indiscreet conduct of only one of its members cannot be regarded as the attitude of the whole body. One black sheep in the judicial family does not necessarily mean that they are all of the same colour. The item in question reads as follows:

> Judge Delivers Scathing Rebuke
> Ukrainians who attacked woman denounced in court
> A scathing indictment of Slav morals and standards of life, as compared with those of Canada, was read from the bench of the Court of King's Bench, this morning, by Mr. Justice Wilson in passing sentence of two years imprisonment with hard labour, the maximum under section 280 of the criminal code, on Stanley Kardach and Steve Kavelec, convicted of assault on a female.
> After summarizing the case against the two Ukrainians and telling them that "the court has no hesitation in saying that in this case a verdict of rape would have been justified and applicable under the evidence," His Lordship said:

Mr. GUTHRIE: At this point I am going to raise the question of order. It is against the rules of order in this house to comment in any way upon judges in respect of cases tried by them. If complaints are to be made against judges they must be definite, and our only relief in regard to such complaints is to take up the matter in the Senate and House of Commons by way of an address. Otherwise our rules do not permit us to comment upon the decisions of judges in any cases that come before them.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: This does not happen to be a decision of the judge in question; it is a reported statement made on passing sentence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is part of the judgment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should like to know what this has to do with the library of the supreme court.

The CHAIRMAN: I will have to rule this discussion out of order.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: On a point of order, surely when the judge of one of our courts indicts a whole race because of the action of two individuals there should be some recourse.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has recourse if he wishes to bring it up by means of a substantive motion, but he cannot bring it up in supply. I would refer him to paragraph 293 (j) of Beauchesne:

> (j) cast reflections upon the conduct of judges of superior courts unless such conduct is based upon a substantive motion.

I am sorry, but I must rule this discussion out of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In a Canadian Press dispatch dated November 13, appearing in the Montreal Star, I read the following:

> With the assurance of the bench that sentence would not be such as to ruin their trade should they be convicted, representatives of five Montreal coal companies facing charges of forming a combine in restraint of trade prepared to-day to present their side of the case. Pleas for counsel of the crown were concluded yesterday and the case for the defence begun.
> Mr. Justice Wilfrid Laliberte—

According to this dispatch—

> —who was on the bench when five other companies were convicted on similar charges and sentenced to fines totalling $30,000 early this year, yesterday said that the sentences would not hurt the companies' trade should they be found guilty. He had given the same assurance to the five other companies in the first trial.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will have to raise the same point of order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The question I want to ask the minister is whether it is proper for a judge to anticipate his decision in a court and to make the statement that the defendants in the case will not be injured by his decision.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no comment whatever to make in regard to the conduct of judges. It must be remembered also that the federal government has nothing to do with the administration of justice in the provincial courts.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries.—Amount required for cost of administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies and equipment, maintenance and discharge of inmates at Kingston, St. Vincent de Paul, Dorchester, Manitoba, British Columbia, Piers Island, Saskatchewan and Collin's Bay penitentiaries, $2,830,947.75.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he cares to make a statement with regard to the recent fire in Kingston.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have a more detailed report than the one I gave the house recently. It does not vary very much from my original statement, and it is pretty lengthy. However, if I may be permitted to summarize it I would say in the first place that the loss in damage is not as great as was originally expected. The loss in the shoe shop including material and machinery is estimated at $3,484.33. The structural damage to the building by fire is comparatively slight, chiefly from smoke and water and broken glass, and will amount to $400. The damage to machinery in the tailor shop is estimated at $1,443 so that the total damage caused by the destruction will be in the neighbourhood of $5,000.

The occurrence arose almost as I described on a former occasion. Since my former statement information has come to hand through the evidence of prisoners. The only complaint or excuse which has so far been made by any prisoner is that the prisoners are not allowed to play baseball. There is a period of exercise allowed in the penitentiary, various specific exercises being provided. It may be remembered that last spring without lawful authority and contrary to the rules and regulations baseball was permitted by the warden for a limited period, until he was instructed to stop it. After it was stopped there was another outbreak.

Mr. JACOBS: Why not allow them to play golf?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Now the demand is again for baseball, and that is the only complaint which so far has been made by any prisoner. However, I am satisfied from information which has come to me that the matter has been under consideration for some time by a certain element in the penitentiary which had definitely resolved, for some purposes of their own, to stage a revolt. One of the documents circulated among the prisoners in the penitentiary and handed by one of the prisoners to the warden is a document of a little more than a page in length prepared in block letter printing and received by the warden on March 21. For the information of hon. members I shall read parts of the document to the house, omitting the names of prisoners.

The movement that is now on foot is similar to the one that was talked of a few weeks ago. It is to take place in the Protestant chapel, if they cannot get out into the dome. They will endeavour to hold the chapel and cause militia to be brought here. The view in doing this is to get publicity and cause trouble before the elections. There is only to be one or two men in each shop that are to be acquainted with all the details, and they are to talk it up and ascertain how many could be counted on, but not to tell when or where it is going to happen. The plans are that its to take place this Sunday or the following Sunday at the latest. The feeling among the men is against it, but the agitators insist on a "blow-off" before the elections.

Then follows a list of names of prisoners to be depended upon to assist in the outbreak.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who has written this?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is assumed it is written by a prisoner and was passed around among the prisoners prior to March 21.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Was there any investigation made regarding this document?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the actual revolt occurred on March 21, did it not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But I am speaking with regard to this particular document.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was an investigation, as soon as the document was received. Do not interrupt me; let me finish and then ask the questions. As soon as the document was received an investigation was immediately started in order that the necessary—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will not accuse me of interrupting, but I must point out he is reading a document, and I should like to know how that document is authenticated.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is authenticated by a prisoner who handed it to the warden, and I have a number of—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On a point of order I submit there is grave doubt as to whether or not the minister is privileged to read to the house any letter unless he gives the signature to the letter, or accepts personal responsibility for it. I can recall many occasions when that point has been raised by hon. members on the government side of the house. It has been a form of coercion exercised by the government against other people, compelling them under the rules to give signatures. In this instance the signature either should be given, the letter tabled or in some other way the document should be authenticated.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The letter is not addressed to anybody and is not signed by anybody. It is a part of the evidence—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What standing has it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is part of the evidence which developed at the investigation which was held. I was asked for a report on the investigation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But that is not evidence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not submitting it as evidence; I am submitting it as a document which warned officials that something was under way.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a paper.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I shall not read the part which gives the names. The document continues:

> In giving names I have not spared or protected anyone. This is a despicable thing for me to do, but the consequences are too grave for me to stand by. There is talk of trouble of some kind to happen on Friday. Of this I have heard very little.

I read this only to show that evidently there had been some preparation for the outbreak, and that the matter did reach the knowledge of prison officials on March 21. No definite conclusion has yet been arrived at by the warden, who is conducting the investigation, as to the names of the prisoners who were the ringleaders in the outbreak. Certainly it is true that a large number of the prisoners in that particular shop were not implicated, but rather through fear joined in, whatever took place in those shops. As I have said the fire was not of a very serious nature, although when the men were barricaded in the building—they had barricaded it themselves—and the smoke was pouring out, the officers in charge did not know how far the fire might go, and for that reason asked assistance of a detachment of the city fire brigade, which assistance was given. The fire was under control about 6.30 at night.

Miss MACPHAIL: I think a fire which caused $5,000 damage is after all not a slight affair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The fire did not cause that; the prisoners broke machinery to the extent of $4,000 or $4,500.

Miss MACPHAIL: According to the minister's figures the whole cost ran about $5,000. On the night of the fire I recall that the local newspapers carried a heading stating that 50 men had barricaded themselves in the burning building; is that correct?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot give the exact number. I believe 71 men were in the building. They had barricaded the doors,—closed them and locked them from the inside. The doors had to be opened by means of an acetylene torch, and I suppose the hinges were melted off so as to gain access to the inside.

Miss MACPHAIL: Were there any guards in the burning building with the prisoners?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Three guards were overpowered and tied; I think their hands and feet were tied, although I am not certain on that point. Originally they were taken down to the basement, but subsequently were marched up into one of the tailor or shoe shops above, where the men were gathered. As soon as the outside guards forced their way in they were all taken out of the building.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the minister contemplate having a thorough investigation made into the penitentiaries, gaols and reformatories of Canada; an investigation into crime and its punishment?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before answering that question perhaps I might deal with another matter. There is another investigation under contemplation at the present time. On March 19 a charge was made in this house that one of the inspectors of the penitentiary had made some very derogatory statements about a prisoner by the name of Hall, since liberated. I made a pretty full inquiry in connection with that charge and upon being given the word of honour by Inspector Dawson, I informed the house that there was no foundation for the charge, that the statements had never been made. The next day the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) produced a document in the house which was purported to be an affidavit.

Miss MACPHAIL: Which was an affidavit.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is my hon. friend's view.

Mr. JACOBS: When is an affidavit not an affidavit?

Miss MACPHAIL: What is an affidavit? Perhaps we had better have a definition.

Mr. GUTHRIE: An affidavit is a document used in a judicial proceeding or of a form prescribed by some statute which authorizes it. A statutory declaration can be taken under the provisions of the Canada Evidence Act.

Miss MACPHAIL: If a document is signed before one of the law officers of the crown and sworn to, is that not an affidavit?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is not an affidavit. An affidavit must be made in a judicial proceeding or in compliance with the requirements of some statute.

Mr. GARDINER: What is it then?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A nullity; it has no effect any more than any signed statement.

I should like to refer to the affidavit which was read here. I am aware the hon. member for Southeast Grey perhaps is actuated by some animosity against me. I hope she is not as I feel none against her.

Miss MACPHAIL: I would not trouble myself to feel any animosity. When I came into the house last year about as well as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon)—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Miss MACPHAIL: No, I will not take it back. When I came into this house last year about as well as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was yesterday, the Minister of Justice came over to my desk and shook hands with me in the guise of friendship. I assumed that his feelings were genuine. He suggested the holding over of a resolution which I had been discussing through a special arrangement. I told him that I was not used to asking for special privileges in the house but I assumed that his offer was made in all kindness. The matter was held over and because of that I did something which afterwards turned out to be indefensible. The Minister of Justice deliberately made it possible for me to do this. This was a very miserable case, in fact so miserable that only one newspaper reported it. The minister thought he was doing something which would injure me, and this matter was spread on Hansard in the greatest detail. I do not know whether the minister realizes what he did last year. I had just recovered from one shock two months previously and it took me weeks and months to recover from the other shock. People told me that this would not affect me in my constituency but I replied that oddly enough I had not thought of that. That was not what concerned me, it was the fact that a minister in the guise of apparent friendship led me on to making a statement which he knew I would not have made had I known the facts. I followed up this matter and found that all the files in connection therewith had been in the possession of the minister from January 25. I did not arrive in the house until about February 18 or 19. I feel no animosity to the Minister of Justice but he is the only person in public life in Canada for whom I have not the respect I would like to have.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Apparently I was not very far wrong in my original statement. I am afraid the hon. member for Southeast Grey has not a very warm and friendly feeling toward me.

Miss MACPHAIL: You are quite right.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Notwithstanding that, I bear her no ill feeling whatever. I have forgotten the incident of last year to which she referred. She brought up the other matter in connection with another prisoner during the course of a rather vindictive speech against the penitentiary management.

Miss MACPHAIL: That is true, I admit that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When I referred to this matter she replied that this prisoner had had a good social outlook, I think they were the words used. It is true that I had the record of this man before me, as I have the records of all prisoners. In a very polite and inoffensive way I gave my hon. friend the information. I believe she has been misled by certain people who have been furnishing her with information. I said that in connection with the case last year and I am sorry to have to say it again in connection with the case she brought up this year. My hon. friend is of a very sympathetic disposition and I fear that she has been imposed upon. We are all liable to imposition from time to time, and I believe that is what has happened in connection with the charges she makes against Inspector Dawson. Her informant was a prisoner until some time in February when he was released. She based a rather serious charge against a high officer of the penitentiaries' staff on information supplied by this man Hall.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am very sorry to interrupt but I think we should have this thing straight as we go along. I visited the penitentiary on February 16, at which time I knew nothing whatever of this case. I was being shown around by Warden Allen. I asked to see in his presence the convict who had caused me so much suffering last year, I believe his number was 3242. In the presence of the warden this convict asked me if I knew that Inspector Dawson had attempted to induce him, first by cajolery and then by threats, to sign a certain statement. This statement was to the effect that he had given me information in connection with the Lloyd case at Stony Mountain penitentiary, away back in 1927 or 1928. This convict stated that he did not sign this statement because he had not given me any information in connection with the Lloyd case. The fact is that that information was given to me by Mrs. Lloyd, the widow or the mother of the man who died because of defective scaffolding used in the penitentiary. I could not believe that an inspector of the penitentiaries in Ottawa would go to Kingston and attempt, first by cajolery and then by threats, to have a prisoner make a statement saying that he had supplied me with information in connection with any case I had brought up. I said to him that it surely could not be true and he said he would give me the name of the guard, who was there at the time. That guard has since then been promoted. At the time this man said to me, "If I live to come out of the penitentiary I want to do what I can to stop a practice that should not be carried on." I was as astonished at the statement as any member of this house would have been. The man was obviously not only worried but almost obsessed and I said, "Forget it. You are in here now and there is nothing you can do about it; if there is anything to be done it must be done from outside." And as Warden Allen and I walked up to the administration building I remarked to him, "I cannot think that even a penitentiary branch would do a thing of that sort." I said what I felt at the time; I said they had their nerve. I have forgotten the details of the conversation because, not being in the position of the penitentiary branch, I did not have a stenographer to take it all down in detail, but Inspector Dawson was able to tell convict 3242 how many times he had called at my office in the House of Commons and on what dates. Well, I can save the department all that trouble, because I should be glad to give them a detailed account of where I go and who calls at my office. I ask the men at the main door to keep as many people as possible from coming to my office, but we can get all the details without putting Inspector Dawson to so much trouble. In that conversation convict 3242 said that Hall would be out in a day or two and would see me in regard to the matter. I asked who Hall was and he told me that he was a man in the penitentiary, and he too was interviewed by Inspector Dawson regarding this matter. If so, I said, I should be glad to see him. The day I addressed the Canadian Club in Toronto, a guest—I did not know him—handed me a letter. When I opened the letter I saw it was from Hall and he said he would call at my office in the afternoon. I told the man at the desk—I was going to have my dinner—that a man named Hall would call to see me and that I was going to be in the dining room, and I asked that he be sent down. When he came down I asked him whether it was true that Inspector Dawson had interviewed him in regard to the matter and he said that he was willing to make an affidavit to the effect that Inspector Dawson had questioned him, not exactly in the same way but in a manner similar to his questioning of the other convict No. 3242, except that Inspector Dawson did not ask him whether he had furnished me with information but, instead, expressed to him his opinion of me and of the information which he had received. He may believe it for all I know, but it is not true.

Do hon. members wonder that in those circumstances I did want to know whether or not Inspector Dawson had gone to Kingston penitentiary and talked with a convict there—and a convict with such a record—and had tried to get him to sign a statement indicating that he had furnished me with information regarding the Lloyd case, which had occurred when the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was Minister of Justice. That case had to do with a man who was killed on some defective scaffolding in Stony Mountain penitentiary. I had a good many letters from the Lloyd connection with regard to that case, and I never heard from anyone but the Lloyds so far as that matter was concerned. I do not want the Minister of Justice to tie me up a second time with somebody with a long record—I do not know whether Hall was in gaol ten times or sixteen times; I do not know whether it is a case of sex perversion or embezzlement or both. I simply know that a man—a human being at any rate—came and offered to take an affidavit as to the truth of the statement he had made. So that you have two convicts and a guard whose name I have, and who has since that time been promoted, who all seem to know of these circumstances.

It does not matter that the incident reflected on me but it does matter whether any member of this house can be put in the position in which I was placed by this sort of thing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I heartily agree with the last statement of my hon. friend and, as I intimated at the beginning, if any member of the penitentiaries staff or of any other staff under my control is guilty of making derogatory remarks against members of this house, that person is taking his position in his own hands and will not be continued in the service. I am satisfied that my hon. friend from Southeast Grey has been imposed upon. I am not going to discuss the other convict at all—convict 3242. I am leaving him out of it. I am discussing the man who made the affidavit and the charge submitted by my hon. friend. That is one which I will see is cleared up. My hon. friend would not accept my statement when I made it that the inspector, on his word of honour, had denied the charge, but on the following day she brought in the affidavit. I propose to let the house, and particularly my hon. friend, know something of this man Hall, because he is imposing on her. She must listen to this. I want to warn her against the man. He has a criminal record which starts, so far as our records go, on September 13, 1923, at Vancouver. Before giving his record I will say that he is a confidence man out and out. At Vancouver he was convicted on September 13, 1923 of obtaining credit by false pretences, and sentenced as A. E. Hall. On July 2, 1924 he was convicted at Vancouver of false pretences with intent to defraud and was sentenced to six months in Oakalla prison. On January 14, 1925 he was convicted at Vancouver of obtaining money by false pretences and was sentenced to twelve days. Again, in May 1925, he was convicted at Vancouver of obtaining money by false pretences and sentenced to a term in gaol from the first of May. In 1926, May 12, he was convicted in Chicago, Illinois of obtaining money by false pretences and was sentenced to six months in the house of correction, Chicago, to pay a fine of $25 in addition to costs, and ordered to be held to await the action of Cook county grand jury on two charges of issuing bogus cheques. He was placed under bond of $2,000. I have no record to show what ultimately came of that charge. In 1930 in Toronto, on May 9, he was convicted of false pretences and sentenced to a term of from six to twelve months in Burwash prison. In 1931, in Toronto, he was convicted of fraud,—$5 by a worthless cheque; fraud, $20 by a worthless cheque; fraud, $15 by a worthless cheque; fraud, $16 in goods by a worthless cheque. He was remanded for sentence and was put on probation for a year. On January 3, 1933, there was a breach of probation. He was brought up again and remanded again and put on probation for two years further. The last offence was on April 6, 1933, in Toronto when he was sentenced to two years in Kingston penitentiary on a charge of theft.

That is the sentence which he recently served and following which he has been released. I stated that this person was an adept confidence man and I think I fairly well described him. But his operations have not been confined on all occasions to little, petty cheques. For the information of the committee I am going to relate almost a national question, because in the month of April, 1930, the gentleman who styles himself as the Reverend Mr. Hall, psychologist, undertook to form the Canadian National Society and approached the Royal York hotel management about giving a tremendous banquet. The proposal was to have two thousand guests, and it was represented to the management that the chief speaker would be Sir George Foster, a senator. Invitations were conveyed to the then Prime Minister of Canada and to the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister. It was to be a grand affair. The Royal York hotel was imposed upon. They went to an expense of something like $1,400 for this banquet and they received under $200. The total attendance at the banquet was one hundred and eighty people, their tickets, it was said, not being paid for, but the Royal York hotel immediately took action in the criminal courts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who were the star speakers at the banquet?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not been able to get from the newspapers the names of those who attended. I am taking from the Toronto Globe the report of the affair as given in the issue of May 9, 1930, after the prosecution had been instituted:

Debonair "Doctor" Hall complains in court of "persecution."

He was tried before Judge O'Connell of the county court of the county of York.

Judgment reserved on Royal York's fraud charge.

"National order" data.

As dramatic in his role of prisoner at the bar as he had been in his speaking appearances on Toronto platform, "Doctor" Alfred Ernest George Hall, yesterday appeared before Judge O'Connell in the county criminal court charged with fraud. Judgment was reserved until to-day.

The accused, self-styled psychologist, clergyman and officer of the "National Order of Canada," was alleged to have obtained food by fraud from the Royal York hotel, and to have fraudulently obtained credit from the assistant manager of the hotel, George R. Street, and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In November last, the hotel official testified, he met Hall, who arranged with him to give a banquet for two thousand people on the occasion of the initiation of new members of the National Order of Canada. When the banquet was held, witness said, only one hundred and eighty guests turned up. The bill came to $1,149. Hall had previously received credit from witness, it was said.

Albert Wetherley testified that he was once treasurer of the National Order of Canada. He had never received any salary, and at December 9 there was less than $200 to the order's credit. Witness was to have the title of right honourable. There were seventy-five members, but only twenty had paid their fees. A bank manager testified that the order at present had $1.31 in the bank.

"Doctor" Hall, attired in a braided black cutaway coat, double-breasted waistcoat, wing collar and gray trousers, then took the stand. Questioned by Crown Attorney Gordon, he swore that he was ordained in 1908 into the Church of Divine Metaphysics, in Indiana. He at present preached to a "group" in Kitchener.

"During your preaching you spent considerable time in jail," remarked the crown.

"You are trying to persecute me," complained accused. He then proceeded to tell how he had joined the "order" in 1929. He told of planning the banquet, and of trying unsuccessfully to secure the Prime Minister as a speaker.

That would be the former Prime Minister.

They also invited Sir George Foster to speak.

After legal argument, judgment was postponed until to-day.

The following day the so-called reverend gentleman was convicted and sentenced to a term of imprisonment at Burwash, an Ontario prison.

His next venture is also worth describing. After being released from Burwash, he started some magazine subscription company with headquarters in Toronto, not using his own name at all, and he induced people throughout Canada to send him subscriptions to various magazines for which he claimed to be an authorized agent. People who sent their money got no reply, and after waiting a while they placed the matter in the hands of the attorney general at Toronto and also of the crown attorney in that city. Some two hundred and forty-one unfortunates made complaints. The amounts involved in their subscriptions were I think around $2,000. Those others who subscribed and did not complain, we have no record of, but the reverend gentleman was again arrested and tried in the criminal courts of Toronto. On this occasion he was sentenced to two years in Kingston penitentiary.

That is the man who made the affidavit or the alleged affidavit. That is the man by whom this charge against Inspector Dawson has been launched. I have inquired fully into the charge as far as I can, not on oath I will say, but I have the word of Inspector Dawson, who is a gentleman, that there is no foundation for the charge.

I shall not refer to prisoner 3242 except to say that I think he must be mentally wrong because he is looked upon as the greatest liar we have ever had in the institution. I will give the committee one sample. We have in the department a letter from his brother who is a prominent man, a British government official in the West Indies. He writes to our department saying that prisoner 3242 was born in Antigua, was brought up in the Church of England and came to Canada in 1903. Prisoner 3242 says: "I was born in Toronto; I was brought up in the Roman Catholic Church and I have lived in Canada all my life." The brother is a highly distinguished man. I wish the hon. member for South-east Grey would not be led away with stories of this kind and by men of this character. These men are trying to excite her sympathy and probably her animosity against the penitentiary staff. They have laid clever plans for that purpose, and I sincerely hope she will place no dependence upon those stories that were circulated. We all want to protect the honour of everyone in the House of Commons. I am sorry that the matter has been brought to the attention of the house at all, but I am bringing it now and giving the man's record in order that the house may judge. This I am going to say: Having made my statement, if the hon. member for South-east Grey desires an investigation into this question, the truth or falsity of these statements between Hall and Inspector Dawson, I will appoint a county court or high court judge of Ontario to undertake such an investigation at once. Personally I do not think an investigation of the kind is necessary, but I do think, as the honour of a member of parliament is to some extent involved, that the matter ought to be cleared up, so I make that offer now to the hon. member for Southeast Grey. If she desires the investigation after the statement of fact I have given I am quite content to order it.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The minister said that if anyone in the service were guilty of any derogatory remarks he would be discontinued in the service. May I therefore ask whether, if a judge made a derogatory statement indicting a whole race because of the isolated crime of an individual he should not also be discontinued in the service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is another question. There are certain privileges, honours and responsibilities attaching to members of this House of Commons that should be protected.

Miss MACPHAIL: I shall be very glad to have an investigation into this matter. But this particular question is not what interests me most, although I am most anxious that it should be cleared up, and I shall be very happy to accept the suggestion of the minister. But what I want is an investigation by a royal commission into the whole penal system in Canada, which is a very much greater thing than anything said about me. One must say this at any rate for Hall, he was not asking me for sympathy. He said, "I have a bad record." I did not even ask what it was. He said, "The record will be spread on Hansard, so do not defend me." He said, "I am making an affidavit and the affidavit I make is true, and if it is not true let them put me back in penitentiary." There you are. The department headed by the minister will not have an investigation into the penal system in Canada. It is all very well to put these two cases on Hansard and make it look very bad for me, but what about a penal system marked by demonstrations and riots and fires from one end of the dominion to the other. Let me specify some of the recent ones:

April 5, 1932—
Demonstration at Stony Mountain penitentiary where several guards were injured and one killed.

September 9, 1932—
Further disturbances at Stony Mountain.

October 17, 1932—
Riot, Stony Mountain.

October 20, 1932—
Riots, Kingston.

November 4, 1932—
Riots and fire at St. Vincent de Paul.

Again in 1932—
Unrest in British Columbia penitentiary.

Again in 1932—
Some difficulty not particularly described in Saskatchewan penitentiary.

January 17, 1933—
Riots, Dorchester.

December 6, 1933—
Stone shed strike, Kingston.

May 5, 1934—
Demonstration, Kingston.

May 15, 1934—
Fire and $35,000 damage, Kingston.

March 21, 1935—
Fire at Kingston which the minister says cost something about $5,000.

We have a penal system in Canada in which seventy-three per cent of the total prison population are recidivists—I am using the figures of the hierarchy so they ought to be correct. Twenty-eight per cent have been in penitentiary before and forty-five per cent in gaols and reformatories; in other words three out of four return again. Irrespective of any other evidence, there is something radically wrong with a system that produces such a condition. Imprisonment is necessary, but in my opinion it should be made to serve a constructive purpose, and the moment it does not do so it is failing in its object. I am interested in penal conditions. I used to feel that I could work with the former superintendent of penitentiaries, Brigadier General Hughes. He issued reports that were reports; he always had recommendations at the end. I have talked with him many a time about penology and the things he would like to see done and that I would like to see done. I have read through many of his reports, I happen to have two in my hand; they were certainly very different documents from those of General Ormond. In one of his reports, covering several years starting with 1923, General Hughes said:

> The more punishment inflicted on inmates in a prison the stronger the probability that the place is badly managed.

And again on page 13 of his report for 1923 he says:

> Most of those educated in the treatment of the criminal agree that strict discipline is essential in a properly conducted institution, but all disciplinary efforts are wasted unless tempered with loving and merciful treatment. I have looked in vain for one example of true conversion to virtue through punishment.

I read through again last night the report of Superintendent Ormond for 1934. It certainly is not the kind of report I would think a superintendent of a penitentiary would make. I question whether Lieutenant Colonel Megloughlin ever wrote the report attributed to him on page 11. It is the most curious sort of report I ever read that anyone would make about his own work. He criticizes himself about the matter of the baseball which the minister mentioned a little while ago, and although baseball may have been carried on in Kingston without the consent of the Ottawa office at any rate it did get this commendation from Reverend Father Kingsley. On page 12 I see he reports that:

A marked improvement has taken place in the ranks of the convicts in Kingston penitentiary since the inception of softball more than a year ago. The physical improvement is so evident that it needs here no labouring by me. But an improvement exists which, not so apparent to the casual onlooker, is none the less very real and even more important.

I suppose one can accept Father Kingsley as a disinterested person, concerned only in the welfare of the people incarcerated in Kingston. Then on the opposite page you have this report, apparently made by Warden Megloughlin:

The warden neglected to comply with the instructions and regulations requiring that every physically fit convict employed in a shop or at indoor work should be given systematic physical exercises during one-half of the period allotted for exercise. He contented himself with permitting the convicts to play at softball or the tossing of quoits.

I do not think Warden Megloughlin wrote that. It was written possibly after he was asked for his resignation. Then it goes on:

The softball eventually developed into competitive scheduled games between different convict gangs and was subversive of prison discipline.

Although across on the other page we have Father Kingsley praising it very highly.

The warden was instructed to discontinue this type of exercise in October, 1933, and gave assurance that "softball will be replaced by free movement exercise just as soon as conditions warrant." Up to the end of the fiscal year no systematic exercise of convicts had been carried out, the result being that a large proportion of the convicts did not carry out any physical exercise but were permitted to sit around in groups and watch other convicts taking part in games of softball and the tossing of quoits. This is the only penitentiary in which the warden and the physician have not reported very satisfactory results following the introduction of systematic and controlled free movement exercises.

At this point I am very much interested to know who wrote that report?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The report itself states that it is written by the inspectors. These are not wardens' reports, these are the results of inspections carried on in those penitentiaries.

The figures and details are all in the wardens' reports, but these are the comments, favourable or adverse, that are made in respect of each penitentiary, Warden Megloughlin did not write that or any part of it; neither did Colonel Piuze, in regard to St. Vincent de Paul.

In regard to the question of a commission to investigate penitentiary matters I want to say that notwithstanding the criticism that has been heard from some quarters of this house and notwithstanding the attitude taken by some newspapers in Canada I am proud to say that Canadian penitentiaries to-day stand higher than or as high as those of any other country in the world. I claim no credit at all for that condition. On August 1, 1932, General Ormond was made superintendent of penitentiaries. That was not my selection. I had never met General Ormond before; I had never seen him. He was selected by the civil service commission. I do not know his politics; if he had any certainly he was not a Conservative. I took him as he was sent to me, and he entered upon his job early in August as a man new to penitentiary management, though he had had much experience in the management of men in our militia and also during the great war. I gave him pretty much of a free hand, but before he had made his preliminary visits to the penitentiaries the great riot broke out in Kingston, in October, 1932. At that time he had been superintendent for only three months and I think had been at Kingston for only two days, on two different occasions. He had nothing to do with that situation, though I know sometimes newspapers and individuals blame him. There is documentary evidence on file that the riot was planned in the spring of that year; the former acting warden had evidence on his file—to which he paid no attention—that there was going to be an outbreak in that institution.

As I have said, I gave the superintendent pretty much of a free hand. Before the first riot he made a number of recommendations which I thought it my duty to submit to the various wardens, the superintendent being a new man. Between the time of submitting them and the end of October the outbreak took place.

We have introduced so many changes in the penitentiary system of Canada in the last three years that you would hardly know it as the same system, and all these changes have been the direct result, from beginning to end, of the recommendations of superintendent Ormond. I claim no credit for them. There have been some thirty or forty changes, which have vastly improved the penitentiary system throughout Canada. Conditions have been very greatly ameliorated. Exercise has been very greatly improved. Privileges are now granted the prisoners—some people say we grant too many privileges—which in former days they never dreamed of. We allowed what they demanded in the riot of 1932, cigarette papers, and now we give them an allowance of two ounces of tobacco a week, which seems to satisfy them. We now give them pay.

Miss MACPHAIL: Do they pay for that tobacco out of their five cents a day?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They pay for that out of their wages. We pay them now; we did not do so previously.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How much?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to discuss that now. I know there is some criticism of that, because all people do not approve of paying convicts. In England they pay very, very modest amounts in a very few prisons. I believe the highest pay in any place is a shilling a week, but it is only in two or three institutions that anything is paid. In the United States they pay from two cents up to five cents in some prisons, but in ninety per cent of the prisons of that country they pay nothing. There are one or two prisons in which they pay as much as thirty-five cents a day; those are prisons in which prison labour is recognized, where the convicts work on contract work and the goods are sold in competition with the ordinary goods of the country. In those two institutions the contractors are bound to pay wages of thirty-five cents a day.

We allow wages of five cents a day, and they are computed in this way. For the first week nothing is paid. After that they are entitled to five cents a day or thirty cents a week for their work; that applies to the first six months. After they have been six months in the institution they are entitled to six days per month remission. Therefore for the twelve months after the first six months, if their conduct has been good, they receive a remission of seventy-two days on their sentence. After they have seventy-two days to their credit we start paying them ten cents a day and after eighteen months their remission counts up more rapidly because after that period they get ten days a month off for good conduct.

From the amounts paid the convicts is deducted the actual cost of the tobacco used. Formerly they received a free issue of one-eleventh of a pound. Now they receive an issue of one-eighth of a pound, the cost of which is deducted from their wages. The tobacco and papers for a week cost them 13½ cents. They have a balance to their credit in the penitentiary books, accumulating from month to month or year to year until their sentence is served, and on discharge the accumulation is handed to them. For many years back no convict has been sent out with an empty pocket; in recent years he has always received $10 in cash and a ticket to his home or the point where he was convicted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Regardless of the length of sentence?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Regardless of the length of sentence. Any man who has not earned anything in the penitentiary or who has not $10 to his credit when he is released still will be given his ticket and $10, but men who have accumulated $30, $40 or $50 will be given that accumulation but will not get the $10. It is estimated that this payment to prisoners will cost the government of Canada about $27,000 a year. We will save what we formerly spent for tobacco, but that is taken into account when it is estimated that the sum will amount to $27,000 a year. This payment of wages, which was only instituted last January, is working well and is appreciated by the men, according to the reports of the wardens.

That is one new move. Another change that will be instituted in the near future, I hope, is what is known as the Borstal system, as operated in England. In that country they have a system for the training of youthful offenders which has not been adopted in the federal prisons of Canada to any extent. The Borstal system in England only applies to prisoners between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one. Youthful offenders in that country between these ages are sent first to a detention prison, where they are examined, their fitness for future life is considered, including their adaptability, and a general examination takes place in regard to their history, as well as their present and their future. If they are approved as hopeful or suitable cases they are then put in a Borstal institution and if not so approved they are sent to the ordinary prison. They are kept in Borstal institutions for two or three years. Three years is the limit, and I have read reports indicating that a three-year term is necessary in order to obtain good results. As hon. members are aware these are not what one would call people of the convict class, they are minor or juvenile offenders. In England three classes are made to the first of which belong individuals below the age of sixteen years who come under what is known as the Children's Act. With a similar act this federal government does not deal. We do not take them into our institutions under the age of sixteen years. Between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one they are regarded as juvenile offenders. We have no person in our Canadian penitentiaries below the age of sixteen,—not a single person. We have however 314 persons between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one. It is considered that a large proportion of these youthful prisoners might be treated under the Borstal system as it exists in England.

No change would be necessary in our Penitentiaries Act to bring that system into effect. We could utilize the present act, in its present form, and if we so desired introduce the system now under discussion. Of course some extra expenditures would be entailed when the system was brought into force. At the present time it is estimated that about 250 of the 314 prisoners under the age of twenty-one might be improved and given a brighter future than otherwise they could have. A great proportion—probably I should say a fair proportion of the offenders between these ages are not first offenders; some of them are third offenders. Forty-four of them are incarcerated under two-year sentences for escapes from provincial institutions where they have been treated more or less along the lines of those followed under the Borstal system. The institution at Guelph could be so described. However these prisoners have escaped and for that reason have come into our hands.

The adaptation of the buildings is a point which will have to be considered. If we adopt this system we will have to have further prison construction. At St. Vincent de Paul there will not be a great deal more required because at the present time we have in course of erection at that point an institution which would suit very well application to the Borstal system. The work, if not performed by convict labour, could be very speedily completed by contract labour. As a rule, nearly all penitentiary construction is by convict labour. This I will grant is not the most satisfactory kind of construction, because in a great many instances the labour is not what could be described as skilled labour. However the institution at St. Vincent de Paul could readily, if we adopted the contract system, be completed and made into a first-class Borstal institution. At Kingston some further building would be required. I believe the facilities in Manitoba could be adapted to the Borstal system without any great expense, and the same would apply to Prince Albert. I am told however that at New Westminster there would have to be some additional expenditures.

As the total population at the present time between these ages is only 314, and as it is divided among six or seven penitentiaries, I believe some system whereby we could reduce the number to two or three would be most satisfactory, having regard to the geographical situation in Canada. Distances in this dominion are very great. So far as possible it is proposed to adopt that system in dominion prisons. However the great bulk of youthful or juvenile offenders in this country are not those to be found in our penitentiaries. They are to be found in provincial institutions, and whether or not we will be able to induce the provinces of Canada to adopt the system I cannot say. The ordinary gaol and reformatory are under provincial, not federal jurisdiction. However I propose at an early date to send the superintendent to England to make additional inquiries concerning the Borstal system, so that we may have a report upon it at the earliest possible moment. I am satisfied that at least to some extent it can be adopted without enormous expense to the penitentiaries of Canada.

I am pleased to say the penitentiaries population is slightly decreasing and that our staff is being gradually reduced. According to information I have the actual penitentiaries population on February 28 of the present year was 3,603 prisoners.

Miss MACPHAIL: Would the minister repeat that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: 3,603 prisoners of all grades.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A decrease from what year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I shall come to that in a moment. In addition to this number we have 76 people in asylums, and 20 in hospitals or on temporary ticket-of-leave making a grand total of 3,699. For the information of hon. members I shall give the figures for each year. In the year 1933 the prison population was 4,587; last year it was 4,220 and the figure for this year, as I have just given it, is 3,699. This decrease has enabled us to reduce the staff of guards in British Columbia by five and to reduce by another five the staff between Collin's Bay and Portsmouth. If the present population decreases we will be very pleased to make any further decreases in staff which may be possible.

Hon. members will note that the vote is for almost the same amount as was asked last year. The reason is that on account of demands made upon us by labour organizations and the like we have had to adopt three eight-hour shifts, so far as guards are concerned, involving an increase in the number required. When three or four years ago the matter was discussed in parliament a report from the then superintendent indicated that the new system could not be introduced without an increased expenditure of $250,000. However at an increased cost of $70,000 we have the three-shift system operating in all penitentiaries. This practice does not work out in exact compliance with the terms of the eight hour day legislation introduced this session. Under the system in operation more than 48 hours are worked. Some further adjustments will be required because the two remaining shifts do not work quite as long as the day shift. The day shift begins operation at the opening of the prison in the morning and remains at work until the count in the afternoon, after the shops are closed.

I make particular mention about the penitentiary guards because I have received many letters respecting them. May I observe that their working hours, when one year is compared with another, are not too strenuous. As is the case with every other person, they have one rest day each week. They have eighteen days of holidays in each year, something which very few workmen enjoy. They are allowed three of our national or legal holidays, in addition to the eighteen days I have mentioned. If they become sick they are given leave of absence during their sickness. If you compute the days they are allowed off, fifty-one rest days, eighteen days of holidays, three days of national holidays and sick leave I do not think anyone can argue that they are exceptionally hard worked. In some instances they do work a little more than eight hours per day. It is hoped that the staff will be further reduced due to a reduction in prison population.

There is another matter I should like to clear up, one which has been brought to my attention by some hon. gentlemen. I am sorry one of the hon. members interested is not in the chamber. I refer to the alleged decrease in crime and prison population in England. It is currently supposed that there has been a tremendous decrease in crime in Great Britain but I am sorry to say that that is not the fact. The reason there is a supposed decrease is the fact that in the British prison reports they do not include any convictions under the Children's Act, which covers those up to sixteen years of age, or under the juvenile offenders act, which covers those between sixteen and twenty-one years of age. The result is that the number of felons or convicts is shown to be decreasing when in fact the opposite is the case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Have they not closed some of their gaols?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will deal with that; they are opening some too. The following is from the official report of the commissioners of prisons:

> The year 1932 saw an increase in the convict population. The daily average of men rose from 1,450 in 1931 to 1,512 in 1932. This increase has continued into 1933, and the total population rose in the last week of September, 1933, to 1,646.

After the war and in order to reduce staff, as was stated, a number of old, antiquated and worn out prisons were closed. There were many such prisons in Great Britain, some of them being centuries old. These buildings were in such a state that they could no longer be used as human habitations and they were torn down. The number of prisons, gaols and lock-ups was reduced from 92 to 30. They are now opening new prisons. I state this not to show that they are worse there than we are here but to rid the house of the impression that serious crime is decreasing in the United Kingdom.

Our penitentiary system as it is to-day is to some extent a model for other countries. This system has been commended by high authorities in prison work in the United States. The superintendent of penitentiaries has been made a member of the American Prison Association, being also a member of the board of directors. He has been made a member of the prison educational committee and in the United States as well as in Canada is looked upon as an authority on such institutions. He has visited innumerable institutions of every kind in the United States in order to see the latest development in prison methods and prison reform.

Miss MACPHAIL: How long has he been superintendent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Since August, 1932. He has been invited to attend the great world prison congress to be held next summer in Berlin, Germany, but I do not know whether we will be able to spare him. His work is reflected in the condition which exists to-day in Canadian penitentiaries. The accommodation we provide is better than that provided by almost every prison on the continent of America.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Penitentiaries—amount required for cost of administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies and equipment, maintenance and discharge of inmates at Kingston, St. Vincent de Paul, Dorchester, Manitoba, British Columbia, Piers Island, Saskatchewan and Collin's Bay penitentiaries, $2,830,947.75.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before I conclude this part of my statement there is one other matter I should mention which I omitted. We have also established something in the nature of a star class among the prisoners in the penitentiaries, generally on the lines established in England. There they call it the star class, but here we have not adopted that term. We have taken over the old prison for women in Kingston for those prisoners who we think are entitled to perhaps more lenient treatment or a little more liberty than the others. There are now in that women's prison forty-three such prisoners; they have been selected chiefly on account of their conduct and their adaptability for reform. Some of them are serving life terms. Really the only privileges which they enjoy over other convicts is that they are kept by themselves although they work at the ordinary tasks, mixing with other convicts. They are allowed to assemble in a common hall after working hours and to talk or to smoke or to play games as they see fit. They are also allowed to take one meal a day together, while the others are fed separately in their own cells. I do not know that there are any other privileges attached to this class at the present time, but it corresponds very largely to a class of prisoners they have established in England which they call a star class, and I believe it is the only one in English prisons which is permitted to use tobacco. That is in line with the policy of segregation which has been instituted in all Canadian penitentiaries. We are trying as far as possible to carry out a scheme of segregation so that the prisoner who shows any inclination for reform may have every advantage possible in a penal institution. The inspector's report sets out what has been done in that respect, but there is a good deal to be done yet. When a prisoner is admitted, he is examined as carefully as possible by the warden, the deputy warden, the chaplain, the schoolmaster and other officials to see what it is best to do with that man. You cannot altogether segregate them by ages, although ages have a good deal to do in regard to such a question. That work was instituted about a year and a half ago and is being carried on. It will be carried on and continued, and as our buildings afford us an opportunity it will be carried on to a larger extent than it is now.

I do not know if I need go into the various matters which I discussed in this committee a year ago as to cell accommodation and the like, but I refer to it only for this reason, that the hon. member for Southeast Grey, as is also every other member, is a statutory visitor of all penitentiaries whenever she has a desire to go there, and nothing would please me and the staff more than that a deputation should go through these penitentiaries—the nearest one is Kingston or St. Vincent de Paul—from top to bottom and spend all the time they like there, because I am convinced there would be only one report. The hon. member for Southeast Grey paid a visit as she says, I think it was in February last, and went pretty fully through the male institution. Why she did not go through the female prison, I do not know. Perhaps she had been through it before, or time did not permit. But I would be inclined to think her judgment would be better in regard to the female prison than in regard to the male one. As regards a prison for male convicts I would rather have the judgment of men of the world, but that is neither here nor there. However when she went through this last prison I have spoken of, in one section of which we put the preferred or star class, I do not think this was drawn to her attention or at least she did not go through it. Had she done so, she would have been impressed by the great improvement that has taken place there.

After her visit there were a good many newspaper accounts, I suppose as a result of interviews, and she very stoutly condemned those nine cells which we call punishment cells, commonly called in the penitentiary the "hole." She also condemned all the cells; it was as reported in the newspapers, a general condemnation of the cells. Now we have had an examination of those cells and they measure up for capacity, light and cleanliness with any that are known in the world; they are larger than any on the North American continent. There were a few that were built I think about a hundred years ago that may be six inches shorter than some built in the newest United States prisons last year, but cell for cell ours are larger than those of any other such institution.

Miss MACPHAIL: As regards the cell block in St. Vincent de Paul, you could not have much smaller than three and one-half feet by six.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am talking of Kingston penitentiary at the present time. It was concerning that penitentiary the interview was given.

Miss MACPHAIL: I visited both institutions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are nine punishment cells and they are used only for purposes of punishment. They will be found in all penal institutions, because we get prisoners that we cannot control otherwise than by putting them in a place by themselves. Those cells are supplied with a stout oak door on the outside, so that if the prisoner becomes noisy, as they very often do, the door may be closed. It is stated in the interview as reported in the newspapers, that there is no air in those places; that there are only two or three holes in the oak door. Well, the attention of my hon. friend was not called to the fact that in every one of those cells there is a ventilator above.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am very sorry but they were called to my attention by the warden who said that they did not work.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, they worked when I was there and I was enclosed in one of those cells, as was also the Prime Minister. Under the door there is a duct especially to provide air, and in the door there are three or four holes, an inch or an inch and a half in diameter, not very large, I admit. Those doors are closed only when we have noisy, obstreperous prisoners that cannot be controlled otherwise. I know in some places they advocate the gag for such prisoners. We do not, but we do what they do in Ontario reformatories —have strong doors to shut out the noise. Those doors are very seldom closed. The last time any one of them was closed on a prisoner was on May 6 of last year, and only for a few hours one night. We have to have some place where we can restrain men and keep them from disturbing the whole institution. I do not approve of the gag. I know it is adopted in prisons throughout the world, but the strong door as they have it in reformatories in Ontario is the only means I know of which we can utilize to maintain order and keep night from becoming hideous.

The whole buildings are open to the inspection of anyone who wants to come and see them. I only wish a large deputation would go through them. I am sure the staff of the penitentiary would welcome this also, but of this I am confident: these prisons in Canada today are of a very high order. No prisons are like boarding houses or hotels or homes; they are not supposed to be. But the prisoners are well looked after; their privileges have been tremendously extended under the new superintendent, who deluges me with new suggestions every week. There has been a gradual general improvement throughout them all; there may be others in the future, but I am satisfied that to-day they compare favourably with any prisons in the world.

Mr. CHURCH: Before this vote passes I wish to bring before the committee a matter in regard to administration which I brought up on many occasions when I sat in opposition. I hope the minister will not take exception to my remarks, because there is nothing personal about them. In these discussions I doubt whether we appreciate the task that the Minister of Justice has to-day, with the distress prevailing in this country. I think the minister of that department has one of the heaviest burdens that is laid upon any minister. He must not think anything said by his supporters in the house is in the nature of criticism of him personally.

As chairman of the police commission of Toronto I was head of a police force for some seven years, and a member of the city council for seventeen years. A few years ago when my good friend the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was Minister of Justice I brought to the attention of the house the matter of inspection of these institutions. There is something bigger involved in the cause and effect than the details that have been described by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I believe however that in visiting these institutions she has done a great public duty. By the act the board of visitors consists of members of parliament and of the Senate and a few others, but as with the members of the board of the Canadian National Exhibition or any other large institution, only a few do the work. When is a visitor not a visitor in these institutions? When he is a member of parliament or of the Senate.

May I refer to a bill I had before the house a few years ago relating to the right of the grand jury to visit these institutions. The late Colonel Denison, one of the greatest magistrates of the empire, was constantly complaining of having to send youths of sixteen, seventeen and eighteen to these institutions. So was the police commission and one of our greatest police chiefs, the late Colonel Grasett, whose father succeeded John Strachan in the administration of the diocese of Toronto. That diocese has been taking up this work of social and prison reform. These officers were all of the opinion that some other institutions should be provided by this country for juvenile offenders and others of whom the hon. member for Southeast Grey has spoken. Just the other day a woman was hanged in the city of Montreal, in regard to which there was public protest, and as to the blame we had to pass the buck to the province, under this famous relic we have, known as the British North America Act. The time has come in this country—had we had a longer session I should have brought in a bill to that effect—to do away with the hanging of women. We have had only two or three in our recent history.

[Mr. Church.]

What we need is some different form of inspection. In the bill I presented to the house in 1928 and 1930 I proposed that it be done by the grand jury, but the government of the day did not see fit to adopt it. A late chief justice of Ontario, Hon. R. M. Meredith, presiding at the Toronto assizes supported this bill in 1930. In my opinion the inspection is not satisfactory. He did not believe they knew what was going on in these institutions. I do not believe the inspectors know half what is going on; it is largely hearsay to them. This is what the late Chief Justice Meredith said regarding my bill, quoted by me at page 2760 of Hansard for 1930:

> Such inspection is in accord with that great principle in the administration of justice which for centuries has been applied and confirmed by Magna Charta, namely, that the people shall have a large share in the administration of justice in criminal cases.
> Whether penitentiaries are well or ill managed they are managed altogether by crown officers; and the management of them is a thing of much importance in the administration of the criminal laws, so much that assuredly the people should be entitled to some means of learning for themselves what the crown officials are doing and how it is being done.
> The grand jury, representing the people of the judicial district, can most conveniently and at no cost perform for the people the duty of visitation.

Right after these views were expressed by the chief justice at the Toronto assizes he said that in Hamilton two sane men for several years were in the asylum, and in one case in York county girls were found without food and shelter in a dungeon below ground, this being punishment for some minor offence. These were the views of one of the ablest jurists in the province after forty years on the bench. In some counties there are five sittings of the grand jury a year, and the chief justice suggested that inspection by the grand jury be made twice a year.

The leader of this party, who we are so glad to hear is recovering, supported this bill. He wanted to know what harm it would do. He believed that what the bill proposed was the practice in England. But the government of that day declined to accept it. I do not say it is the only method of inspection, but I would request the Minister of Justice to consider inspection by another board. Inspection by these visitors under the act to-day is a solemn farce. They do not inspect at all; they never visit; they do not know what is going on. I admit that the hon. member for Marquette, (Mr. Mullins), visited Kingston penitentiary; he is always to the fore in trying to see for himself conditions as they are.

My suggestion is that the chief justice and the court of appeal of each of the provinces should appoint a board of visitors for these various institutions in every province of Canada. Then we would have some independent body and report in each province and know whether we are getting value for the money. I do not believe the Conservative party should be put in the position of defending and justifying and apologizing for conditions as they are to-day, because I believe that in respect to not only these social questions but others the day of laissez-faire is gone forever in this country. The people are sick of talk; they want action. As I said the other day, the two old parties must open their ranks to men of new ideas and bring such men in. Law reform to-day in England in the civil and criminal courts of that great land is a most important question, and they have accomplished a great deal. We are talking about sending a deputation or officials to England to look into the Borstal system. Law reform and parliamentary and constitutional reform is the most important problem involved in the administration of this vote, amounting to $2,800,000.

A matter in connection with one of these institutions was brought up by an hon. gentleman when I was in the house before. He brought in a resolution condemning these institutions on the ground of their being contrary to all known laws of hygiene, and I believe they are subject to condemnation on that ground. A former health officer in Toronto, Doctor Hastings, condemned these places. Up to a few years ago, before this government took office, in connection with one of these institutions there was a farm of about six hundred acres which was hardly worked at all, while the men were kept indoors without recreation. I commend the Minister of Justice because he and his officials have made a great many improvements. The late government turned a deaf ear to all these proposals, but the present Minister of Justice has effected many improvements all along the line in the conduct of his department, and adopted many humane methods. But I wish to take this opportunity of protesting against sending young offenders to these institutions. Just last Thursday in Halifax Mr. Justice W. L. Hall, I think it was, had to send a boy to a federal institution in Nova Scotia. Why? Because, he said, no provision is made by the province to take care of such cases.

I have a return here of June 24, 1925, brought down by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in response to my question as to—

1. Number of juveniles under eighteen now detained in the penitentiaries of Canada, where, and how many sixteen or under, seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years of age?

2. Whether it is the intention of the government to give effect to the recommendations for years of grand juries and public bodies to provide separate institutions for these cases; if not, why?

3. Whether it is the intention of the government to so readjust the rules of these institutions so that juveniles and first offenders will have preferential rules and also a better classification consideration to those of repeaters?

4. Whether it is the intention of the government in the recess of parliament to appoint a royal commission or committe of the house to go into the whole question of prison reform in Canada as suggested in the debates in Hansard, 1922; if not, why not?

Following that return, however, no action was taken by the preceding government. It was found that there were sixty-four offenders of this type in all Canada's federal institutions. I believe provision should be made for the families of these inmates. What is being done in that regard? I admit that the financial situation is not what we would like it to be, but why should the women and children suffer? In my own riding I have an institution of this description; it is a relic of the oxcart days, and I am sorry something has not been done not only in regard to these federal institutions but also in regard to those maintained by the municipalities and provinces, many of which have been condemned by grand juries.

I should like to refer also to wardens' courts, which are in my opinion absolutely illegal. The assault and battery which takes place during those courts is absolutely unlawful. I am supported in that opinion by the eminent authority who wrote The New Despotism, Lord Hewart of Bury. At page 107 of his book he refers to the powers of judges and to the independence of the judiciary of England being interfered with by acts of parliament which give the executive the right and power to make rules and regulations with the authority of statutes and which are even beyond the scope of parliament itself to pass. I hope the day is not far distant when this matter may be referred for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada. I say it is absolutely illegal to impose the penalties that are imposed by these star chambers called wardens' courts, with no authority at all except a telephone call to Ottawa. I should like to read what Lord

Hewart has to say of these rules and regulations having the effect of statutes and removing the liberty of the subject from the protection of the law courts:

> But, vital as the independence of judges has always been, there never was a time when it was more manifestly important than in these latter days, when the effect of so much that the executive does or permits is to render it difficult for the courts to maintain the rights of the individual.

Then he goes on to condemn these acts which give the governor in council power to make these regulations.

Another matter which ought to be considered is the choice of officials. There is not a trained man in the whole department; they just train themselves by experience. I remember that when the late chief of police of Toronto Colonel Grasett was retired it was suggested that we should bring in an outsider, a military man as head of the department. In my opinion a military man is the last man who should be chosen to administer a police department; it is not the proper place for a man with military training. The present head, General Ormond was a good soldier; he is a perfect gentleman and I have the utmost confidence in him. I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance, but I know the high regard in which he is held by all those who know anything about him. I would point out, however, that when we considered filling the position of chief of police of Toronto Sir John Eaton and representatives of the board of trade appeared before the commission. I suggested to Sir John Eaton that a man could not learn Eaton's business in a day, and I said that a man could not learn the police business or be superintendent of penitentiaries in a day. Still men are brought into this department without having received any training at all.

They are trained by their experience from day to day; they start off knowing nothing about it, and as days go by they try to learn about their duties. I believe something should be done to create some system such as they have in England by which proper types of officers of all ranks are trained for this work, which is most important. I sympathize with the minister sometimes in the criticisms that are made against his department, as he has effected many important reforms. The Conservative party are the authors of all prison reform in Ontario at Guelph reformatory and the Mimico farm, which reform was one of the chief glories of Conservative policy under Sir James Whitney and Hon. W. J. Hanna, Provincial Secretary. I do not know anything about the details, but I do plead with the committee to give some consideration to these youthful offenders. I have before me an article written by Magistrate Jones of Toronto with regard to the Borstal system which is endorsed by the following, among others:

The Primate, Church of England in Canada.
The Moderator of the United Church of Canada.
The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.
The Salvation Army in Canada.
The Church Army in Canada (Anglican).
The Director of Catholic Charities.
The Catholic Big Brothers.
The Protestant Big Brothers.
The Jewish Big Brothers.
The Catholic Big Sisters.
The Protestant Big Sisters.
The Jewish Big Sisters.
Judge H. S. Mott, juvenile court, Toronto.
Four judges of the county of York.
The magistrates of the city of Toronto.
The crown attorneys of the city of Toronto.

These are all asking this parliament to do something with regard to the Borstal system. The senior magistrate of Toronto, Mr. Jones, has written me many letters in this connection, and I promised to bring the matter to the attention of the house. I should like to read one paragraph from the article:

> This expression "Borstal system" has no statutory origin. It is a colloquial expression, adopted because the first "school" established under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1908, was built at a place called Borstal.

What is this system which has been in operation in England for many years? It has four features, first, education and lectures; second, trade instruction; third, regular gymnastics and drill; fourth, a scheme of rewards. This scheme in its entirety is supported by the various public men and public organizations I have indicated. In the speech from the throne I find this statement:

> My government has under consideration the adoption, throughout the penitentiaries of Canada, of a system similar to that which is known in England as the Borstal system and is making investigations as to its operations.

Under that system I believe it is possible to reclaim seventy-five to eighty per cent of our youthful offenders. We all know what the Red Cross did in rescue work during the war in prevention work, and I believe the same thing can be done in peace time to-day in connection with this problem which is one of the most important problems with which this parliament has to deal.

Another matter to which I should like to refer is the way Magna Charta has been violated, in that we have imprisonment for debt in this country. I should like to refer also to the way these young offenders who escape are treated. Can you blame them for escaping from these institutions? In their youthful enthusiasm they get free for an hour or two, and when they are recaptured they are sent to these other institutions which are not prepared to receive them. Where do these young men come from? They come from some of the finest homes in this country, because they cannot get jobs. I agree with some of the things said the other night by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel), though I disagree with three-quarters of what he said. You cannot blame the younger generation for this problem, just as you cannot blame them for the railway problem, the Beauharnois deal or the British North America Act. Most of the juvenile crime in this country results from the fact that these young men are living in a jobless age, and instead of staying around home and sponging on their fathers they strike out for themselves. They ride the rods to the coast, perhaps; they are locked up in some gaol, and when they escape for a day they are sent to these federal institutions. I am surprised at the judges and magistrates who send these young men to prison for escaping while serving a ten days' sentence to two years in circumstances such as these. I think there should be a very liberal policy of clemency followed in all these cases. I believe that about forty per cent of the juvenile inmates of penitentiaries could be sent home without doing any harm to anyone or any public interest especially the first offender.

I should like to refer for a moment also to the indeterminate sentences so often imposed. I think those sentences should not be permitted. Chief Justice Meredith attacked these sentences of two years determinate plus two years indeterminate; he said he believed the act was ultra vires and should be repealed as two years was the limit they had, and I do not think that act is in the best interests of the people of this country. We must expect some criticism. It is often said that those who criticize the system at all are uttering sob stuff, but that is not so. As Tennyson said:

> Our little systems have their day;
> They have their day and cease to be:
> They are but broken lights of thee,
> And thou, O Lord, art more than they.

I believe the time has come for prison reform, all along the line. As I said a few days ago, low wages in Canada have been the cause of many crimes. These people have been reduced through poor living and as a result crime has been forced upon society. Child labour has had the same result. Many children who should be at school are working in factories, and records indicate that most of the young offenders have been underprivileged children who have come from poverty-stricken homes. These young people have never had a chance, and from birth have been under-nourished and handicapped.

Social workers, police and railroad men assert their belief that the overwhelming majority of these young men and boys are "on the road" because there is nothing else to do. Sometimes they are there because pride will not permit them to sit idle at home, sometimes because support for the whole family has come from a relief agency and has been wholly inadequate properly to feed the younger children. Evidence has been conclusive that these people are not of the hobo or criminal type. What is happening to these unfortunate youths is most distressing. Accustomed to decent standards of living these people go for days without taking off their clothes to sleep at nights. Through this manner of living they become dirty and unkempt. In winter they suffer from exposure and hardship. The number of wandering families, unattached men and women and boys and girls vastly exceeds those of former years, and the make-up of these groups has changed radically.

The traditional single transient in earlier years was the seasonal labourer, the knight of the road, and the occasional run-away boy or adventurous youth. To-day young men and boys who would normally be at work or in school predominate in this migratory army. Men and boys swarm on every freight train in such numbers that the railway police are helpless to keep them off.

I know the minister to be a warm-hearted man, one who is most sympathetic, and would urge that he consider this matter. Without sending a deputation to England to study the Borstal system we should include a vote in the supplementary estimates for the purpose of beginning this particular work. These ladies and gentlemen of church and state who signed the recommendation I read before are not asking for any sentimental or soft treatment, but are only asking that we follow the motherland, where all great social reforms originate.

I am not familiar with the details to which the hon. lady member for Southeast Grey has referred, but I will say that a few years ago, in company with two celebrated men, I visited one of these institutions, and after viewing it I came to the conclusion I must be living in the stone age. I saw what was going on. I am of the opinion, as are many other people, that something should be done. The city of Toronto pioneered in this work. One superintendent, Rev. Mr. Findlay, a most estimable gentlemen, did admirable work at our jail farm. We know that the Conservative party originated these prison reforms, and tried to do something for the rising generation. To understand the situation thoroughly we must understand causes and effects, and in my view the time is not far distant when something will have to be done.

To my mind the condition is most unsatisfactory when we find it possible to spend millions and millions of dollars to operate our railways and do not see our way clear to spend a small sum to make more bearable the lives of some of our unfortunate citizens, many of whom are in misfortune because of economic conditions and because of the fact that they could not get work. We have a vote of about $2,000,000 for the health of animals, but when it comes to voting a small sum in the present instance to take care of people under twenty years of age we think it necessary to send a deputation. When the deputation goes to England I hope it will take time to extend its trip and visit the mythical League of Nations. In that event upon their return we might have some support for the Borstal system. I believe it would be too bad to have to wait another year before doing anything in a practical way towards adopting what these gentlemen of state and church have suggested.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I say to the hon. member that grand juries are entitled to visit penitentiaries, and as a matter of fact do visit them. The regulation to which reference has been made was passed on the recommendation of the present superintendent. For a number of years wardens' courts were thoroughly objectionable. The prisoner could be asked for a statement without the complainant being produced before him. The present warden however has made a regulation whereby the complainant must be in the presence of the prisoner, and the evidence of both persons must be taken in connection with a breach of prison rules or discipline. That plan has been in force at least for two or three years.

In connection with the Borstal system may I state it is not proposed to send a commission to England. I have had many requests from estimable people asking me to send them on a commission to England. The document read by the hon. member contains the names of some of them. These people are deeply interested in prison work. It is proposed however to send only one man to look into the matter and that man will furnish a report in three or four weeks.

Then, reference has been made to Lord Hewart's book. I do not know that I need go into the reference. It would appear however that the hon. member condemns military appointments in prisons. Our act provides they shall have preference and must be considered first. In all large prisons in England military men are selected to hold positions as wardens.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Chairman, whatever opinions may be entertained by hon. members regarding the value of the arguments which have been put forward in support of varying points of view, I feel that there are at least two things in connection with which all hon. members are entirely in accord. The first and perhaps more obvious is that those who have spoken on this item are entirely right when they refer to it as a matter of the very utmost importance to all the people of Canada. There is no hon. gentleman sitting in this chamber or entitled to sit in this chamber who has not resting upon him the responsibility of representing as fairly and as intelligently as he can the views of his own constituency in regard to this matter of very grave importance. It is but a truism to recall the words of one of the greatest reformers that the British empire has ever known, the immortal Dickens, who said that there was no activity which could be carried on in commercial or family life that was not affected by the way in which the community as a whole elected to treat the criminal class. One must realize that this matter in respect to which the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) is so wholeheartedly in earnest is of consequence to every hon. member and to all the constituents of those members.

Another thing which seems to me to be entirely clear is the fact that the hon. member herself is so sincere and so anxious to do that which may be of real good. We would be less than fair if we failed to recognize these facts and applaud her for her stand. During the course of this discussion it has been suggested that perhaps her very wholeheartedness and her great womanly sympathy for some of those whom she has seen incarcerated in Kingston penitentiary, and perhaps in St. Vincent de Paul, has affected her to the extent of leaving her with not quite the fullest capacity to judge the situation. I can well believe that when it comes from the lips of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie); I can well believe it when I recall something which came to my own notice during a visit to Kingston penitentiary in order to acquaint myself with conditions there. It was said of the hon. member for Southeast Grey that she climbed the long stairs which led to the Protestant and Roman Catholic chapels at a time when the prison choir in the Protestant chapel was engaged in practising the hymns for the next Sunday's service. As she entered, the hymn being practised was, "The day thou gavest Lord is ended." It is said that the members of the choir took one look at the hon. member for Southeast Grey and immediately abandoned the practising of that hymn and burst into the strains of "Abide with me." We can therefore realize the universal appeal which the hon. lady has for those in whom she takes an interest.

She told this committee this afternoon that there was something essentially wrong with our penitentiary system because, to use her own words, there had been demonstrations, riots and, I believe, fires in the various penal institutions. I take it that she has had to rely for her information, as all of us would under similar circumstances, upon three things. First, she had to rely upon her personal inspection of the premises. Second, she had to rely upon what she could learn from conversation with those who were or had been incarcerated in the penitentiary. Third, she had to rely upon those things which might come to her notice by way of correspondence or, as we have heard, in the case of one man whose case she has espoused, by way of an alleged affidavit. Let us consider briefly the effect of those things and the value or weight which can be attached to them.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am sorry to correct the hon. member. The list I gave of fires, demonstrations and riots was not obtained from the sources of information he has mentioned; it came from the reports of the penitentiary officials. He might read them for himself.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am certainly obliged for the gracious permission. It occurred to me that the hon. member had relied to a certain extent upon her inspection of the premises and upon what had been said by those incarcerated there, as well as what had been committed to writing by some one or more of them. If indeed she now informs this committee that she relied upon none of these sources of information, then our task of dealing with what she now proposes is infinitely easier. Perhaps she would like to reply to that. I pass on.

Miss MACPHAIL: Maybe I had better reply now.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am grateful.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to relieve the hon. member's mind about the hymn singing. There was no one singing hymns of any sort when I visited the penitentiary on two occasions.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Perhaps they only said "Abide with me," without singing it.

Miss MACPHAIL: There was no one there to say it.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Coming to the various sources of information, I am sure the lady member will pardon me for thinking that there were at least reasonable sources of which she might have availed herself. Coming to the possible sources of information which I have alluded to, the reason why I specified them just now was that her statement this afternoon, if I took it down correctly, and I hope I did, was that there must be something wrong with a system that produces such things. There is a gap. When hon. gentlemen are now considering whether or not the request for the appointment of a commission of inquiry shall depend on the determination of whether the alleged conditions have produced these results, how is that gap to be filled? It can be filled only in the event of there being available human knowledge in regard to conditions in other institutions which eliminates the possibility of any other explanation, and that is all.

My hon. friend from Southeast Grey has said—and I shall be glad to be corrected if I am in error—that there was a very serious charge laid by a man named Hall, regarding whose alleged statement under oath we heard from the Minister of Justice this afternoon. I take it that that did not come out of a report of any prison commissioner. I take it that when the hon. lady relied on that statement—and I am sure she must have, because undoubtedly she acted in good faith—that was something which came to her either as a matter of correspondence or as an alleged affidavit; and when we are considering what value or importance is to be attached to that, we cannot fail to remember that with all these good, splendid intentions that she has for prison reform and for the amelioration of the lot of those who are unhappily confined, she has not been, to put it a little roughly, a very good picker; because the Minister of Justice reminded us this afternoon that one on whom she had placed reliance before, had proved to be almost the least entitled to reliance of those unhappy prisoners incarcerated behind the walls in Kingston. Then again we find what happened in connection with the man Hall. The trouble, I think, is that, in spite of an earnest, sincere, sympathetic—

Miss MACPHAIL: Cut out the cant.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): —trusting nature such as hers, and, in view of her interruption, I may add her sweet femininity, one of her difficulties seems to be a lack of appreciation of the bona fides of those with whom she may come in contact under these conditions. She is not original in that regard; we have all known many learned judges who failed to size up at a glance, or more than one glance, those who testified before them. But there is one thing which apparently eludes many people, amongst them the hon. member for Southeast Grey, and that is the sincerity or want of sincerity with which information imparted to them is given. In other words, when she gets this information she takes it at its face value; but the convict who imparts it may have, and very often does have, an entirely different idea in his mind. It reminds one of the story of the chaplain who some years ago visited Dannemora, the tough prison of New York state. This chaplain felt that he had it within himself to reform even the hardest and toughest of prisoners. He was willing to meet them half way and expected, regardless of what the conditions might be, that they would respond; and when he was told that there was one man who had been sent there from another penitentiary because he was, in the vernacular, so tough that no one could reach him, this chaplain said—and he was not the only chaplain—"Let me have a try." And so he inquired as to the antecedents of this particularly hard prisoner. He was told that the man was what is popularly known as a firebug, a man who lives on the proceeds of incendiarism. The prisoner was brought to him and he looked his part, but the chaplain was not discouraged. He made his way to the prisoner's cell and there sat down. The prisoner sat on a stool and turned his back to the chaplain. The chaplain opened his bible and read the wonderful story of the occasion when Elijah ascended to heaven in a fiery chariot and dropped his mantle, which Elisha picked up. At first the prisoner was disrespectful, but after a few moments of the recital he displayed an entirely different attitude and immediately the chaplain was impressed. The man had turned his back on him at first, but now he looked over his shoulder, and as the story went on he turned his face and listened intently, and finally, when the chaplain got through, the man said, "Boss, that is great; could I hear that again?" The chaplain said to himself, "There, you see, it is just a question of knowing how to reach them." And so he read the story again, and if possible got more rapt attention than before; in fact, before he had concluded, the prisoner had drawn his stool a little closer. When he got through, he said: "Boss, I do not want to impose upon you. Could I hear that just once again?" The chaplain said: "My poor fellow, I understand now; you have never been approached in the proper way before, but it is a wonderful story, isn't it?" The prisoner replied: "Ah, yes, sir. The story is good enough as far as she goes, but," he said, "I have been in stir now for years and years, and I ain't had a whiff of such good old Scotch for at least seven years." So the spirit in which the response came was perhaps just a little different from that upon which the narrator had depended, and we may reasonably conclude that in those stories told to the hon. member for Southeast Grey the prisoner did not have in mind exactly what she thought he was trying to convey. Therefore I do not think this committee need worry very long about the extent to which the stories, the would-be affidavits, or things of that kind have established anything of which this committee must take serious notice.

I said that it was my experience to do as was done by the hon. member. I visited the Kingston penitentiary and went through that institution from cellar to garret as she did. I must confess that I found something that I think is a very serious deficiency there, and that I intend to speak of frankly in this chamber. But before I pass on, let me deal first of all very briefly with the suggestion that conditions create riots. It has been said in the first place that there have been serious riots induced in regard to the food supply. That has not been the situation in Kingston. When I say that to the committee, I am dealing not with reports of prison superintendents, not with reports of what I learned by an unannounced visit to that institution, but with what I have learned from prisoners who have been discharged and who, having been discharged, have come to me for help because they knew they would be received in a kindly spirit and their confidences would not be abused. One point that has been emphatically stated by every man that I have ever come across who has been in that unfortunate position, has been that those people have not suffered through any deficiency in the food supplied to them. Hon. members may think that is not a very important matter, but I have under my hand the report of the commissioner who investigated the Dartmouth prison riot in 1932, and without taking up in dealing with that matter more time than I can spare, and referring only to pages 18 and 19 of that report, I notice that the terrible disturbances and the fire which caused the loss of many lives were due entirely to complaints about the food supply. Therefore those matters may very well of themselves be a cause for riotings, demonstrations and fires of which the hon. member for Southeast Grey has spoken. But at least they did not exist in Kingston penitentiary.

One need not waste time on the question of cleanliness. One visit to the institution and an observation of conditions there as invited by the Minister of Justice not once but twice this afternoon, would convince anyone interested as to what the situation was in that respect.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey has said that the riots in I think it was the fall of 1932—and they were serious; they came almost on top of the appointment of General Ormond—were occasioned by the prohibition of softball playing. I want to assure hon. members that to my knowledge that is true. When I visited Kingston penitentiary last October, I observed that the inmates were playing ball of various kinds, but for some reason or other they were prohibited from playing softball. The men who, having been discharged from Kingston penitentiary, have come to me from time to time after their experience there, have told me in a way there is not any reason to doubt, that was what provoked the riot which occurred. In that connection we might very well adopt the system that has been inaugurated by Warden Lawes of Sing Sing penitentiary. With twenty-five hundred men in that institution he has established this system and he never deviates from it: men are in prison because of serious offences committed against the law; they are not in prison as inmates of a club, but they may have their condition much ameliorated providing they show themselves worthy. In Sing Sing they have a football team, a band, a baseball team; they have even flower gardens that the men tend, with the idea that it is much better to have a man out digging in a garden than to have him thinking black thoughts while locked up in a cell. Personally I believe that is right. Those are the conditions there and they might well be adopted in this country; that is, that as long as the conduct of the various individuals who comprise the inmates is beyond reproach or complaint, they are to be accorded all those privileges, and just as soon as they show themselves unworthy of them, those privileges will be withdrawn. The great trouble about that Kingston outbreak in 1932 was the fact that the inmates of Kingston penitentiary came to regard what had been accorded to them as a privilege, as an inalienable right, and when it was taken away from them, they sought by violence to assert that right again. That is not conjecture; that is not anybody's affidavit; that is what I have from the mouth of man after man who was there and who knows conditions in a way that cannot be disputed.

As regards punishment, I have never heard that any punishment, corporal or otherwise, has ever induced revolt. I am one of those who do not believe in the efficacy of flogging; I do not believe in it because I think it has an extremely brutalizing effect. I do not think you will ever improve the lot of men incarcerated in prison by flogging them on slight provocation like a lot of beasts. I do not believe in lashes that are ordered to be inflicted on men convicted of crimes of violence; I think there are other and better ways of dealing with them. But I do believe that you should not do away entirely with the possibility of corporal punishment, because there are certain men who can be reached in no other way. It is a matter of internal administration, not something that you can make a matter of general policy.

There has been a great deal written in the public press, perhaps not quite correctly, about what has been called "the hole." The Minister of Justice described it this afternoon. I went through it. Do you know what it is? There is a small corridor, lighted by an electric light opposite each cell. The place is like quarters that a janitor would occupy in a good apartment building. But it has those cells on one side. It is true that if a man is put inside one of those cells and yells and howls and makes an infernal nuisance of himself, the door is shut on him. Well, if he wants to act like a baby why not treat him like a baby? Little Willie goes to work and raises cain around the house, his mother spanks him and puts him in the cupboard and says, "You will come out when you are a good boy." It is nothing more than that as far as the hole is concerned. It is clean, sanitary and properly looked after, and unless the warden was guilty of untruth to me, and I do not believe he was, here is what happens: If a man is recalcitrant and refuses to conform to any rules or any discipline, he is first put into a ward, clean, sanitary, well lighted, upstairs. If he persists and will not heed what is said to him after he has been confined there for a certain time, he is taken downstairs. The only thing I would quarrel with after that is that he might be paddled, and perhaps paddled too heavily. My hon. friend from Kingston City showed me not so very long ago in a room of this house what he said was a paddle that had been used at Kingston penitentiary, or rather a duplicate of it which had been obtained, I understand, at the time of the trials for rioting. I would say without hesitation that if that instrument was ever used it was a relic of barbarism that would shame our modern civilization. But I am told by the warden, upon whom I descended without warning, that that is not what is used nowadays in Kingston, whatever may have been used in times gone by. If his statement was true, and I see no reason to disbelieve it, the punishment that is administered, however we may shrink from the necessity for corporal punishment at all, is perhaps not unreasonable under all the conditions.

After all, the greatest punishment that can be inflicted on a human being is loss of liberty. The greatest punishment that can be inflicted even on a bird or animal is close confinement. I do feel with all the sincerity of which I am capable, that further consideration should be given to the plight of those who are deprived of liberty under those conditions, because that is what is calculated to make them suffer most of all. The Minister of Justice pointed out this afternoon that there is already under way a movement, to which he proposes to give effect, to establish in the penitentiaries of this country what is known as the Borstal system. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) I think did not get it quite correctly when something was said about sending someone abroad, to study this system. The purpose of that, I understand, is merely in regard to the details which might be effectively followed in carrying out the plan. Hon. members should understand that the Borstal system is not the be-all and end-all in dealing with the criminal class; it is a step in the right direction, but only a step. The ideal to be sought is to find a means of dealing with the criminal, young or old, as an individual. Just so far as we fall short of that, so far we fail of attaining what should be our ultimate aim.

My time is short and I must not encroach, but let me quote once again from an official report, that of the commissioners of prisons in England for the year 1932. Lest it be suggested that I am quoting from one that is out of date, let me say that this was brought before the House of Commons in England only in 1934. At page 42 of that report the case is dealt with of an unfortunate young girl who was sentenced to a period of detention in a Borstal institution for breaking her recognizances. She had been twice convicted of theft and once for wandering. She left school at the age of fourteen and had reached the sixth standard, went into domestic service, but left many situations and was never employed for more than a few weeks at a time. She was totally unreliable and untruthful, and the despair of all who tried to assist her. The first theft, of a purse and gold ring, occurred when she was fourteen years old. She again stole a purse when fifteen years old and was sent to a reformatory, and at twenty attempted suicide. I will not take time to pursue the details further, but the point I desire to lay before the committee is that while the setting up of the Borstal system is desirable, we must not then sit down and pat ourselves on the back and think we have solved the problem. No, because it is an individual problem and is going to need all the careful consideration we can devote to it.

In the few remaining moments available to me, let me make one suggestion that I hope is really constructive and that may be of assistance in solving the problem that faces us every time we look at one of our penal institutions. When I visited Kingston penitentiary in October last, I went over the place from cellar to garret. After the most careful investigation it was in my power to make of the premises and of the condition of those incarcerated there, I was told by the warden, "Now you have seen it all." I said, "Oh, no; you cannot be right. I have been in the workshop of the oculist; I have been in the chemical laboratory; I have been in the operating room; I have been in the hospital; but what do you do for the sick mind?" He said, "What do you mean?" I said, "Where is your psychiatric ward?" He said, "We have none." Mr. Chairman, if there is one thing more than another that is needed for Kingston penitentiary and every penitentiary in this country, it is a psychiatric ward.

Mr. ROSS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): There is no question about it; experience has shown it. I was shocked when I was told that any time it was suspected that a man required psychiatric treatment, they had to get a psychiatrist from down town to examine him.

For what length of time? For half an hour, and then never see him again. What good can that do? In Sing Sing prison, where they have 2,500 convicts, they have three qualified psychiatrists and three well qualified assistants, but in Kingston with 1,000 convicts we have not one. Surely that condition ought to be remedied; surely it should not be allowed to continue much longer. Is it a fact that there is no real necessity for it? Well, I hope hon. members will listen to the reference I am about to give. In The Lawbreaker, by the Calverts, those people who have devoted their lives to the study of this very problem in England, I find this, and I hope the committee will listen to it:

> During the ten years 1921-1931 no less than 2,625 persons after being sent to prison on committal were found by the medical officers to be certifiable—

That means certified lunatics.

> —under the lunacy or mental deficiency acts, and during the same period 698 persons received into prison on conviction were subsequently certified in prison under the mental deficiency acts.

Why, it ought to be a matter of common sense to us, even without the statistics, that the vast majority of those unfortunates who go back to the penitentiary time and again, who on being let out have but a short time until they are recommitted to those penal institutions in which they have served many dreary hours and many dreary years, go back for one reason only. They do not go back of their own volition; they do not go back because they are anxious again to commit crime and to return to those miseries of which we have heard; they go back because they are unable to avoid it.

Will anyone say, after listening to those experiences in penal institutions to which I have referred, that something might not be done for those men and women that would give them a chance? Just because my hon. friend from Southeast Grey has been unfortunate enough to have been imposed upon by two people is she going to give up her faith in the criminal class? Is any person who wants to observe the real decencies and obligations of modern society going to say that any man or any woman is hopelessly lost before we have exerted the last possible effort that can be exerted on his or her behalf? That does not rest upon incarceration for years; it does not rest upon anything except the character, the brains and the disposition of the individual, which may be reached no matter how long the time of bitter disappointment or how long the time of lawbreaking they have endured. So I say as my parting word, Mr. Chairman, that regardless of what other necessities may present themselves to the government; regardless of what difficulties there may be in the way of financing the needs of our prisons, we should not deprive ourselves of psychiatric aid in redeeming some of those people while they still have a chance.

There is one other matter on which I want to say a word before I sit down. It has become our custom in this house, a custom to which I have yielded together with almost everyone else, to say, "Well, this might be for the better, but why did you not do it in the past five years?" Then someone else says, "Why did you not do it in the previous nine years?" And so it goes on. Can we not eliminate that just for once? Can we not say that the question now under consideration is a question of right or wrong, regardless of whether it has escaped the notice of hon. gentlemen in this house or out of it until the present day and hour? Can we not say that we recognize that the lack of that mental help for these mentally sick people should be remedied in order to give them a chance to go forward to something better, even if they are only convicts in a penal institution?

Miss MACPHAIL: I appreciate more than I can say the very earnest plea just made by the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell). I am going to make just one reference to my visit to the Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiaries. One situation which I do feel should not be allowed to continue is that the sick and insane are in the same hospital separated only by the wall against which the heads of the beds stand. There seemed to be quite a number of really sick persons. As we went along at St. Vincent de Paul the warden indicated one man who had been operated on just the day before, and anyone who has gone through the sufferings of the day following a serious operation knows how difficult it is. Right near that man, out of his sight but just beyond the wall, was an insane man who was calling out loudly. The insane man could not help it, of course, but it seemed to me very difficult for the sick. In both institutions there were quite a number of insane persons. I asked Warden Piuze about it, and he said it always seemed difficult to get them moved off rapidly. First there was a period during which the officials were not sure whether or not the inmates were insane, and then it seemed quite a while from the time they became sure until the inmates were removed. So I do feel that if out of all this some good may result, any suffering I have endured is as nothing at all.

I am going to argue for the appointment of a royal commission to investigate the whole penal system, to study and report on the cause and cure of crime. Before going on with that, however, I must say that I feel that if we are to discuss modern penology intelligently we must know something of the work of Thomas Mott Osborne, the founder of the new penology. Anything that Lawes has been able to do as warden of Sing Sing, or anything that Doctor Leo Palmer, who made such a marvellous address before the Kiwanis club of Kingston on August 7, 1934, and who is the superintendent of Walkill state prison at Wallkill, New York, and other men who are carrying out the ideas of new penology, have been able to do has come as a result of the tremendous service rendered by Thomas Mott Osborne, who died feeling that his life had been wasted and who was not only prosecuted but who was also persecuted because of his attitude towards criminals. I should like to give a brief outline of what Osborne stood for. He was the first to propound the idea that there is no such thing as a criminal type. He argued that since most prisoners are to return to society the chief objective of prisons should be to prepare them for that return. He contended that only by treating convicts as men, insted of as beasts, can an attitude of cooperation on the part of the prisoners be cultivated, and he demonstrated in actual practice at Auburn penitentiary, at Sing Sing penitentiary and at Portsmouth naval prison that the granting of responsibility to inmates after they had shown their capacity to appreciate it was the best insurance for maintaining a sense of responsibility after their release. His philosophy could be summed up in these words: No man can reform another. What we can do is give him a chance to reform himself. After Osborne's death, tribute was paid to him, all over the United States of America for the tremendous service he rendered in the field of penology.

I feel that we ought to have a royal commission in order that we may be better able to protect the innocent members of society against embittered and revengeful men when they come out of prison. I could not help but wonder how the superintendent of penitentiaries in Canada could have become a noted penologist in such a short time. After the riots and fires and continual disturbances—I gave a list this afternoon, a most imposing array—three men in key positions who had no knowledge of penology, no knowledge of psychology, or so far as I know of the social sciences, were appointed. These men were the superintendent, one of the chief inspectors, and the warden at Kingston penitentiary. I was glad to hear the minister state this afternoon that the number of people in penitentiaries is lower. Certainly however it is very much greater than it was ten years ago. I believe the figures indicate that on March 31, 1934, we had within our Canadian penitentiaries 2,373 inmates, while in April, 1933, we had 4,591. Our penitentiaries cost about $2,699,000.

I believe there is no one in this house who would question the integrity and social standing of a man like the Hon. W. F. Nickle. Speaking at Montreal on October 16, 1933, Mr. Nickle made a very strenuous speech in favour of radical changes in our penal system. His observations are reported in the Globe of October 17, 1933, from which I am quoting. The headings are:

> Prison cruelty shames Canada. Stripped of rights, convict's fate left to whims of guards. Grim tales of suffering within Portsmouth's walls recounted by Ontario's former Attorney General in heartfelt protest at Montreal.

Then, one or two sentences from his observations:

> Branding the penal system of Canada under present administration as a disgrace to the nation, and a regime that should be swept out of existence, Hon. W. F. Nickle, K.C., former Attorney General for Ontario, and parliamentarian of long experience, unfolded before the Young Men's Canadian Club of Montreal to-night some of the facts in connection with penitentiary life that have come within his personal knowledge. He made it clear that the convict is deprived of even the few and minimum rights that society has conceded to the man behind the bars.

This is a long article, and I shall not take time to quote the whole of it. May I, however, read the following:

> Mr. Nickle scouted the idea that any political motives were behind the movement to reform penitentiary conditions. He deprecated as unworthy of notice the fallacious jibes, "sob-sisters" and "sentimentalists," which were levelled against those seeking prison reform, by those who did not see eye-to-eye with Mr. Nickle and other Canadians who saw the need for improvement.

Then, quoting his words:

> Knowing Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and Hon. Hugh Guthrie as I do, I know that if they saw the situation as I do, they would see their duty, as humanitarians, not merely to accept my word for it, or the word of the convicts, but to accept the spirit of the nation that cries out for an improvement in this regard, and appoint a commission to investigate. I haven't much faith in parliamentary commissions—they consist of busy men who have inadequate opportunities to go into the thing thoroughly.

He made one other statement in his speech which to me was of particular interest, because I had tried to check up on the point during my last visit. Last year in this chamber I asked a question in the same connection. I quote:

Sometimes convicts were strapped—

That is not what I want, but undoubtedly they were.

The hospital cells were the occasion for considerable complaint, too. The dishes the men ate from were washed in the baths in which hospitalized convicts washed, and, although it was stated that no cases of disease had been communicated, the situation was, nevertheless, abhorrent to the majority of them.

I did take particular notice of the hospital at Kingston penitentiary, and I felt that the good offices of the hon. member for Kingston City were clearly discernible in the excellence of the hospital in many regards. It is certainly a very much better hospital than is to be found at St. Vincent de Paul, and I attribute the difference to the work of the hon. member I have just mentioned. I must say however that I could not find anywhere the place where they washed dishes, other than in the bathtub in which patients suffering from all sorts of diseases, including those suffering from syphilis, bathed. I would like to know if this heinous method of dish washing has been discontinued. Up until the very last reports I received—I believe they were authentic, and they were not from prisoners—it was still in practice.

In the editorial column on the front page of the Toronto Saturday Night for March 30, 1935, there is an editorial dealing with this subject. This is a very excellent paper, one of high standard and considered to be more or less conservative, from a political standpoint. Its views, which I should like to bring before the house are as follows:

As we have never entertained the view that the indiscipline in the Portsmouth penitentiary was due to the presence of some half-score of members of the communist party within its walls, we are perhaps less surprised than some of our contemporaries that that indiscipline is continuing although the communists have departed.

As I said this afternoon I read through again last night the report of General Ormond, and I find that upon this occasion he does not mention communists. Last year the report reeked with communists; communists, according to him, were the cause of everything. There are no communists in it now. He makes the statement which I shall now quote:

As stated elsewhere the conduct of the convicts during the year has been fairly good and can be looked upon as satisfactory in view of the unrest created by the publicity given to penitentiary affairs.

It is going to be tough on the department if in this coming year there are no communists, and no publicity to blame. Then, to go on with the editorial in the Toronto Saturday Night:

As a matter of fact we are not surprised at all. The conditions which provoked the outbreaks of the last two years, namely gross overcrowding in the penitentiaries and an attitude of smug satisfaction—

I am glad somebody has said it just as I feel it.

—and immovable conservatism throughout the entire organization, are continuing exactly as they were; and the official attitude has become more irritating than ever because there was for a few weeks a hope—due to an announcement by the government that the Borstal system would be examined and reported on with a view to its adoption—that some steps towards prison reform would be taken immediately.

Then, the last sentence:

It is time the Canadian penitentiary system was thoroughly overhauled with the aid of expert advice and criticism from countries where penology has been studied with greater exactitude than here.

That will be difficult, since the minister told us that Canada has the best penal system in the world. A few days ago the following appeared as an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen:

One thing is certain, it is that Kingston penitentiary needs to be investigated to see if it is conducted in accordance with modern standards. There are at present grave doubts that it is.

I need not, I think, quote the Toronto Globe because for a long time it has conducted a campaign for penal reform. No matter what other people may think of it I am convinced that the Globe is sincerely anxious to bring about real changes in our penal system. From the issue of March 20, 1935, I will read only one sentence:

The rights of parliament to full information about penitentiary happenings have been accorded scant respect by the responsible minister in the past. Even in the last weeks before dissolution there can be no excuse for relaxing of effort to clear up the prison situation so far as it is possible to wrench the facts from quibbling administrators.

Last year Major W. M. Nickle, in an interview with the Toronto Globe on Wednesday June 27, said:

What is needed at Kingston penitentiary is reform, not repression. An inmate should be taught a trade or calling, so that on discharge he can make an honest living with his fellow men and not be, as is now the case, on discharge, as many years backward as the length of his term.

I have noticed in two or three papers and letters received from prominent people who are interested in this subject that they have compared it with the practice of medicine, indicating how far behind medical science is the study of penology. I now look again at the speech of Doctor Leo J. Palmer, superintendent of the state prison at Wallkill, New York, who speaking in Kingston last year, said:

Our modern medicine is the product of scientific investigation without which we would still be attempting to cure our sick and insane by trying to drive out evil spirits. We know to-day that there are as many causes of crime as there are criminals and are forced to the conclusion that as there is no single cause of crime, there can be no single cure for the criminal.

He is clearer in another sentence:

Whereas the old method sought to make the punishment fit the crime, the new strives to make the treatment suit the individual.

I received a very interesting letter from a prominent medical man in Hamilton, the city of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. This doctor compares our treatment of criminals with our treatment of the insane and sick, and goes on to show that the two treatments are not alike. In criminal cases the man who hands out the treatment, or the sentence, does not follow it through to see what effect it will have. The criminal is simply turned over to people who are not trained to carry out the orders given. In his opinion our present system is in need of a complete overhauling.

I should like to make some suggestions which I think are constructive. Since so much controversy has taken place on this subject I submit that an investigation should be held with the idea of finding methods to improve the treatment of crime. I have talked this matter over with many people who have had a good deal to do with prisoners, and they are all of the opinion that the place where the psychiatrist should begin his work is the court room. There should be a psychiatrist attached to every court in order that the sentence given, particularly to youthful offenders, should be one likely to be of benefit while at the same time protecting society. A case sheet, upon which is entered full information as to the environment and hereditary influences affecting the prisoner, should accompany the man to the penitentiary so that the warden may have some idea of the type of prisoner with which he was dealing. I agree with the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell), who has spoken so well on this subject, that there should be a trained psychiatrist attached to every penitentiary. If that cannot be afforded at the moment, there should be two appointed, one for the western penitentiaries and one for the eastern.

There should be a classification of prisoners. I realize that this is not an easy thing to do and I do not know enough about penology to say just how they should be classified. However, with all due deference to some of the high officers in the penitentiary, I think I know about as much on the subject as they do.

The prisoners should be trained to do some work, such as carpentry, blacksmithing and so on, so that when they come out of penitentiary they will be able to find a job. I should like to quote from page 24 of General Ormond's report as follows:

Penitentiaries treat the convicts as individuals who will eventually be returned to society. The training in the penitentiary will be such that the convict should, without difficulty, upon his release adjust himself to the conventions accepted by the citizens of Canada.

The fact is that these men have great difficulty in adjusting themselves to conditions and in finding anything to do. While in the penitentiary these men work only seven hours per day, leaving seventeen hours to be spent in their cells. I believe the cells measure something like four by six feet or four by eight feet, although there is a whole tier of cells in St. Vincent de Paul which measure only three and a half by six feet. Seventeen hours is a long time to be shut in a cell and nothing is to be gained by leaving a man's mind vacant so that it can be filled with all that is bad. It would be much better to have some kind of cell activities in which the man could interest himself. I visited a small village some distance from Kingston and some of the people had friends who were convicts in Kingston. One of these convicts had made a watch chain out of horsehair taken from the team he was driving on the farm. This was a remarkable piece of work, but it was the opinion of these people that if the man who made it had been found out he would have been put in the punishment cell. I do not know for certain that that is true, but I judge it is. Everybody does not enjoy reading, and in fact many of the convicts are poorly educated and never will be readers. Would it not be possible under the regulations to have a lecture or an evening of music once a month which would be calculated to elevate the minds of the convicts? I do not think this is being done in most of the penitentiaries, although I understand it is at St. Vincent de Paul and is permissible under the regulations.

This whole subject should be approached scientifically. It is true that there should be punishment, but the main object in view should be the reformation of the man. I think it is most important that the person in charge of a penitentiary should be trained in penology and know something about psychology and the related social sciences. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for East Toronto who said he was rather against the appointment of military men to these positions. A military man might be just the person for the position of superintendent, but on the other hand the qualities which make him an excellent military man are likely to militate against his effective work with prisoners. Wardens should be men of education and culture, the sort of men whom all the convicts in their secret hearts would like to be. A warden should also possess the love of humanity and be anxious to help those placed in his charge. Reading the life of Thomas Mott Osborne and the book written by Warden Lawes of Sing Sing convinces one that men of the right type affect tremendously the lives of the convicts.

I think there should be training schools for the guards. Wardens are rather to be pitied by having a number of green men appointed as guards. All that a warden can do is to put a new man on with a trained guard, the new man picking things up as he goes along. I think there should be training schools for the guards of our Canadian penitentiaries. It is not necessary that the courses should be continuous but these schools might meet at certain definite times, and surely it is not asking anyone too much to expect that he shall put in six months to qualify himself to be a guard. I believe that the higher the standard set for guards and petty officials the sooner we shall have better results. Again—and this is going a good deal further than we have yet gone—I think we ought to begin an experiment in self-government. What the minister said to-day indicates possibly a beginning in that direction—a segregation of better behaved prisoners who are allowed to meet in a room and have their meals together. It is only as the prisoners begin to show a sense of responsibility that they will be fit to enter society again. Certainly the insane should not be allowed to mingle with the sane.

I would remind the minister that many years ago I asked also that prisoners should be given payment. It must be about eight years since I made this suggestion and the first year the house thought it was a peculiar idea, but the second year the resolution carried. I think it was in 1926 it carried, the year when all sorts of peculiar ideas seemed to be quite all right. It took considerable time before it was carried into practice however, and I certainly did not think that it would be the complicated business it has turned out to be. I tried to follow the minister this afternoon but I lost the connection between the five cent day and the ten cent day and paying and not paying for tobacco. I am not so sure that the prisoners would not have been better off if they had not been given the five cents and had not been asked to pay for their tobacco.

The last point, which I suggest is a very important one, is the necessity for simplifying the rules. I do not want to amuse the house unduly, but after a good deal of trouble I obtained the book of rules from which I wish to quote a few examples. There are 724 rules.

An hon. MEMBER: Who issued it?

Miss MACPHAIL: This was issued by Superintendent Ormond. I understand that he sent out the next year 230 circulars. Some of them confirmed and some contradicted the rules, and if he has been as prolific in 1934 there must be 1,000 rules by now—1,000 rules which someone is supposed to have read and to know.

Mr. LAPOINTE: One would have to have a good memory for that.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes. I will read two or three of the rules. For instance, it takes fifteen and a half pages to tell the medical officer how to examine a guard when he is applying for the position, and this is supposed to be addressed to a doctor by a layman. Section 7, page 118, reads:

7. Position of applicant.—When not required to approach the applicant for special objects, the medical officer should always take his place at a distance of about six feet from him. The applicant should be placed so that the light will fall upon him.

Then we come to the examination of the head and neck—I like that one.

14. The head and neck—The examination of the head and neck will be made from above downwards. The medical officer will note the intelligence, character of voice and power of hearing of the applicant by his replies to the questions put to him. The following are the directions:

Have you had any blows or cuts on the head?
Are you subject to fits of any kind?
He examines the scalp.

He examines the ears.
He examines the nostrils.
He examines the mouth, teeth, palate and fauces and then tells the applicant to say loudly, "Who comes there?"
He examines the neck.

It is as minute as that for all parts of the body and, as I say, it takes fifteen and a half pages to tell all about it. It seems to me that there is one officer who does not need any qualifications, and that is the medical officer; all he needs is the book of rules. Let me quote now a few other rules:

632. When typewriters or adding machines are in need of repair, the warden shall obtain from the local agent a detailed estimate of the cost of repair, and shall submit such estimate to the superintendent on a stationery requisition.
633. In the case of repairs costing not more than one dollar, the warden may instruct the local agent to proceed with the same, and shall procure an invoice from him and forward the same to the superintendent, covered by a stationery requisition.
634. Typewriter and adding machine repairs shall not be attempted in the machine shops of the penitentiary.
650. The chimneys of residences are to be swept once a year, or oftener, if required. This shall include chimneys from bake ovens.
651. Wherever possible, chimneys are to be swept from the outside of the building, by convict labour. After the chimney has been swept, the soot is to be removed from the basement or clean-out by the tenant:

Mr. JACOBS: Is it stated that the convict must return to his cell after that is done?

Miss MACPHAIL: I do not see anything about that. Let me read something in regard to horses:

576. If a horse becomes a casualty, and requires to be laid up or receive veterinary treatment, the necessary entries shall be made on form P.B. 17 and the form shall be forwarded to the office of the superitendent, in order that such entries may be made in the duplicate form held there.
577. When it becomes necessary or desirable to cast or sell a horse, a full report shall be forwarded to the superintendent, with recommendations.
578. If it becomes necessary to destroy a horse in an emergency, a full report shall be forwarded, accompanied by the report and certificate of a veterinary officer.

Then it leaves two blanks, 579 and 580. Were these left so that a full report might be made in regard to a team of Percheron horses bought from an M.P.? The price is very good, I am told, around $700. Anyone who goes through these rules, of which there must be 1,000 altogether, will understand how impossible it is for the guards to grasp them. When Brigadier General Hughes was superintendent the warden was in command of the institution but that is no longer true; he has scarcely any command at all.

Dr. Leo Palmer, addressing the Kiwanis club with regard to the rules in his institution, said:

It might be of interest to note at this point that the institution functions with the fewest possible rules. It is true that we have provided certain daily routines. Insistence on punctuality is maintained but only those regulations are enforced that make for a decently well-organized community.

So long as we have such a multiplicity of rules there must be trouble, because no one can become acquainted with them.

Let me now discuss for a moment the important question of parole. This whole subject should be investigated by competent people, and I should like to see a man like Mr. Nickle, who was on the investigation before, and others equally well qualified, carry out a careful inquiry into this subject. There is one parole officer for the whole dominion, and he is in the department. I am sure he does his best, but the people who know most about the prisoners in the different penitentiaries can only make recommendations to the parole officer—he is called remission officer, I think. But any authorities on penology that I have ever read and any of the commissions ever held in Canada—and we have had two excellent ones, one in 1914 and the other in 1921—in both cases urged that there be a parole board for each penitentiary and that parole board consist not of one person but of several.

There is another subject I wish to discuss, although I do not know how the committee will feel about it, and that is the chaplains in the penitentiary. I understand they are really civil servants; they are paid by the dominion government. I am not sure what the salary is; some use the figure $2,500 I am not sure as to the amount. I was just wondering whether the church, whether Catholic or Protestant, should not be responsible for the chaplains, because then they would be free in a way they cannot be if they are paid directly by the government. If we send missionaries all over the world to tell people how to live, I do not see why on the same principle the churches themselves should not be responsible for the chaplains in the penitentiaries.

I should like to refer for a moment to the change there has been in regard to crime and its punishment. When you go back in English history—and you do not have to go back very far—you find hundreds of crimes for which the death penalty was the punishment. People were boiled in oil, hanged, drawn and quartered, and many other forms of punishment were inflicted to try to deter criminals, but these punishments did not have the intended effect. Under modern civilization we have got away from that sort of thing. Now we know cruelty does not bring reform. I give the committee the words of Thomas Mott Osborne, who is better qualified to judge than anyone else who has lived on this continent. He says:

> When a man, treated like a beast, snarls and bites, you say, "This is the conduct of an abnormal creature—a criminal." When a prisoner, treated like a man, nobly responds, you cry, "A miracle!"
> What folly! Both these things are as natural as two and two making four.

I think that is true and should be the basis of the new penology in Canada; I think it should be instituted without delay.

Mr. REID: I want to change the discussion somewhat in order to direct the attention of the minister to some cases which I believe should be brought to his attention. These have occurred in the city of New Westminster. They affect three, if not four returned men, and to my mind at least three of them are serious enough I think to merit further investigation on the part of the minister. Before I finish I am going to ask him, if he appoints a royal commission, that these cases be also considered by it. The three of them, while they affect three different parties, involve more or less the same complaint in regard to dismissal. These men had been engaged as guards or clerks, and had been changed from clerks to prison guards, then changed back again to clerks and later discharged from the penitentiary. The minister will I know take the attitude that the warden is in complete control of the penitentiary, as he should be, and that all men in that institution should be under his direct orders and do exactly as they are told. Some men in certain positions in life are a little more conscientious perhaps than are others, and the men about whom I am speaking have in my opinion been conscientious in regard to carrying out their duties. In carrying on clerical work it was their duty to censor letters going out from the convicts to their friends, and I believe that it was due to complaints which they made regarding the disobeying of rules which brought them under the displeasure of the warden who was in the penitentiary at that time and who lately has been transferred from New Westminster to Prince Albert penitentiary.

These men have a wonderful war record. After I sit down I would like the minister, when he answers my appeals, to tell the committee how many returned men have been employed since the civil service regulations have been done away with and since the hiring of officials or guards has been placed under the jurisdiction of the warden. I ask that because much complaint has been heard since one of the annual reports appeared in which it was stated that ex-service men who had been privates were not as satisfactory as other classes might be on account of the fact, so the report stated, that those men had perhaps reached the height of their efficiency. That slur has travelled from one end of the country to the other, and I have met it particularly in my constituency where it is stated on fairly good authority that since that time preference has been given to those who have not seen active service. I have under my hand a list of many of the men who have been engaged, but perhaps the minister has fuller information regarding that and will be able to answer me when I resume my seat.

The first man I want to deal with is one Pattinson, whose complaint is that because he took the part of a guard named Drage who was dismissed, he came under the displeasure of the warden, fault was found with him and he was fired from the penitentiary. This man was thirty-eight years of age. Here is his army record. He held a regular commission as a captain in His Majesty's army in India. He was temporary major while employed as section administrative commandant at Kalabagh, India. He was also staff captain, administrative staff, and camp commandant with two camps under his command. For these services he was awarded the Order of the British Empire, Military. While serving in France with the Imperials, Notts and Derby regiment, as intelligence officer he gained the Military Cross. He received the following medals apart from decorations: General Service Victory, Northwest Frontier, India, with two clasps. I am putting all these on the record and drawing this to the attention of the minister to show the type of this man Pattinson, who has been let out.

He states that he joined the penitentiary staff on February 9, 1933; that he worked in various posts; that he had control of convicts and that for one day he acted steward. On April 9, 1934, at Colonel Cooper's request, he says that he went to the censor's office. He states that of conditions in the administrative building, re staff, he would not speak at present. He says further that while there he refused to be a party to irregular correspondence passing in and out of the prison and to obey a verbal order delivered to him by then temporary second grade clerk Cummings, since made senior clerk by Warden Cooper, purporting to come from Warden Cooper, to obey which he would have had to disobey a written order by the superintendent. He says that he had a letter written requesting the order in writing, but was removed from the office during that week. During his last week there, Cooper had placed in charge of this office a man named Staughton, who, Pattinson understood, had failed to measure up to medical requirements. From this time on he states that he was penalized by Cooper, being permitted to do only tower and stand duty. I need not take up the time of the committee with further details with regard to this man, and also as I want to deal with the other two men; but that which I have now read is enough to show the type of man who was holding that position and also to show that it was on account of the fact that he refused to disobey a written order issued by the superintendent that he fell under the displeasure of the warden at the penitentiary.

The other cases are in connection with two men named Drage and Neild. Those men make exactly the same complaint. In the case of Drage, it will be said that he used a billy on one of the convicts. Two other guards were in charge of that convict, and Drage came to their assistance. He states that investigation proved that the convict was not hurt. He claims that he was acting under the rules of the penitentiary in what he did, but as he had been complaining about the evasion of rules by the warden, he feels that he was discriminated against and let out on that account.

The other case is that of Neild, who was in the penitentiary quite a number of years. He was in the same department, and endeavouring to carry on as provided by the rules. When he found that letters were not being censored he thought it his duty to censor them, but when he endeavoured to do so, he fell foul of the warden. That is his statement to me. It would take too long to go into the whole history of these cases, but here are three men who have fine records of war service, who it would seem were conscientious in doing their duty and endeavouring to obey the rules, especially the rules as to correspondence going out from the convicts and in regard to visitors coming to see the convicts. In the course of their duties, believing they should carry out these rules, they complained, I understand, either to the superintendent or to the warden, and very soon they found themselves under the displeasure of the warden and in course of time were let out. Not only that, but they are discriminated against because, in endeavouring to find employment elsewhere, they cannot obtain from the warden the references they are asked for.

In the circumstances they are prevented from obtaining any position of trust at any rate by reason of the fact that no recommendation will be given. Drage says that during his time friends were allowed to visit prisoners before they were properly investigated; he claimed that they were violating section 107 of the regulations. He drew the attention of the warden to the fact that letters were coming in which should not come, and he would not allow certain letters to leave which were being sent by the convicts. He also claims that fights had occurred there and no report was made of them and no entry made in the books. One of the most serious charges he makes is in connection with shortages of convicts' money and the loss of stamps. He declares that an investigation into the loss of stamps would show that the books have been altered to cover the shortages. Drage, who has a splendid war record, claims also that he was entitled to twenty-seven days' pay because when he was suspended he was told not to seek work, that he was still under the jurisdiction of the warden, and so was kept in suspense for almost a month before being told that he was discharged. One man who was brought there from the city of Vancouver and given a position was named Matthews. Drage claims that Matthews has now been discharged because it was found he was implicated to some extent in certain telephone calls. In my opinion, these statements are very serious. The serious part is the dismissal of three men who, in endeavouring to carry out the rules, incurred the displeasure of the warden and so lost their positions, and now find themselves unable to procure employment and of course, have a black mark against them. The man Pattinson has a very fine record. I appeal to the minister that in connection with those three men an impartial investigation be held. The whole case I understand has been laid before the minister and before the superintendent, who is well aware of all the circumstances. I ask the minister if he has any report regarding these cases; also how many returned men have been engaged since the civil service commission have discontinued hiring men for the penitentiaries?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot give my hon. friend the figures; I have not them before me, as I did not anticipate being asked the question. But I can let him have the exact number to-morrow I think. My information is that none but returned men have been engaged when returned men were available. I shall get an exact statement and give it to my hon. friend.

In regard to Pattinson, from reading the report I am satisfied that he had an excellent military record in India. He joined the penitentiary staff in February, 1933, as a temporary guard. He knew when he came on that he was there temporarily. In the course of the last few months it became necessary to reduce the staff in that institution, and five temporary guards were let out. The warden was asked to report as to which men he would let out. He let out those who were least useful or necessary, and in his report Pattinson's name was among those of the temporary officers to be let out. He was not looked upon as a very good penitentiary official, but there is nothing against the man that I know of. The warden reports nothing against him, but says: My orders are to let out five men, and I shall have to include this man because I do not think he will qualify as a good penitentiary man. There is nothing in the record against the man's character. In fact the warden was friendly to him, befriended him on more than one occasion. I think I let my hon. friend see the report in my office a few days ago.

The second case mentioned is that of the guard Drage. Drage had been on the staff for a considerable time. The reason for letting him out was brutality to a convict. A convict, mentally deficient, had created some disturbance, and three men were conducting him to a cell. Two men had hold of him, and for some reason which is not explained in the evidence or the report Drage drew a loaded billy or club of some kind and crashed this prisoner over the head. Subsequently the man was found insane. It was for that conduct, using that bludgeon or billy, that Drage was let out of the service. It so happened that Drage and Neild and a man named Trappitt were all employed in the censor's department of the penitentiary, and they seem to have connived among themselves against the warden. The warden is the responsible officer of the penitentiary, and complaints against the warden, passed here, there and everywhere, that he was breaking regulations, came to headquarters. As soon as the attention of the headquarters staff was drawn to the irregularities with which the warden was charged, which had to do with admitting improper letters or allowing improper letters to go out, the warden was severely reprimanded, his attention was directed to the regulations, and he was informed definitely what his duties were.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When was that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was prior to this incident to which I have referred. To meet the case and make it more definite the regulations were changed and they were then drawn directly to the attention of Warden Cooper. Time went on and there was conflict between the warden and these men who were practically spying on him, undermining him while he was the man in control of the institution. One man was let out on a definite charge of unnecessary cruelty. When the reduction took place another temporary employee named Neild was let out on the recommendation of the warden, as was another member of the staff. It would be impossible to carry on an institution of this kind if the warden was not allowed to be in charge, and if his position was to be undermined in the institution of which he was the head. It was for these reasons that Trappitt and Nield were let out. I am inclined to think these people were working pretty well together. They all complained in long letters to His Excellency the Governor General, to me and to others. All the letters were written on the same typewriter and almost in the same language; probably they were all written at the same time. I am sorry their services could not be retained under the circumstances, but on the report of the warden approved by the superintendent they were released from the service.

Mr. REID: The minister states that Neild was just a temporary employee. He had been employed there since May, 1929.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, we have temporary employees who have been working longer than that.

Mr. REID: That may be, but this man can produce wonderful testimonials in regard to the work he did prior to that time, and it seems strange that after he complained about the letters he should be let out as unfit and unsuited to the penitentiary. Human nature being what it is I suppose it was only natural that once complaints had been made about the warden and he had been reprimanded by headquarters, he would not have that good feeling towards the guards that otherwise he might have had. I am not going to discuss whether or not these men should have complained, but they evidently felt it their duty to carry out the rules and regulations, and they felt that the letters going out from certain convicts and the visits these convicts were receiving were in violation of the rules. That was admitted by the superintendent, who censured the warden. Then later these men were found to be unsatisfactory, and for that reason I ask that an impartial investigation should take place. If they had been let out previously the minister might very well say that they were not suitable for the work. A man may be a temporary employee for quite a long time, but from 1929 to 1934 is a long time for a man like Neild to be working as a temporary employee without giving satisfaction. It was strange that only in 1934 was he found unsatisfactory for the job. I maintain, and I think the minister will agree, that he might have been found unfit because he made the complaint. In the case of Drage, he was employed for two and a half years. It may, as the minister says, look like collusion, but surely that would not apply in the case of Pattinson. It seems very strange that Neild, who was appointed in 1929, Drage who was appointed in 1932 and Pattinson should all get together and conspire against the administration of the penitentiary. That does not seem very reasonable to me, and I am going to ask the minister to again consider the advisability of making some further investigation. These men have not only lost their positions; they have also lost their means of livelihood, because they cannot obtain recommendations. I have letters here from Neild, who was offered a position which he could not obtain due to the fact that he could not secure a recommendation from the warden of the penitentiary. I think some further consideration should be given this matter.

I should like to know in addition how many returned men have been engaged. I do not want to put it on record in case my information is not correct, but I have a long list of non ex-service men who have been engaged. It looks as though the ex-service men have been discriminated against, and if that has happened I must take very grave objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to say just a word or two. I have personal knowledge of the three cases mentioned by my hon. friend from New Westminster. I have been interviewed by these men; I have heard their stories; I have seen their evidence, some of it sworn, and after what I think was an impartial analysis of all the evidence on both sides I am absolutely convinced that there was deliberate discrimination against these men. I think the request made by my hon. friend is very reasonable indeed, as I think the minister would be the first to admit. I have a very high personal regard for the warden, but I think there should be an outside investigation into the merits or demerits of the claims made by these three men, Drage, Neild and Pattinson, and by another man whose case was not mentioned by my hon. friend, a man named Dickson, whose case I referred to the minister the other day by correspondence. I strongly urge upon the minister that he should have either the superintendent or some other outside person make an exhaustive and impartial investigation into these cases in order that absolute justice may be done these men.

Speaking in all fairness, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if the minister refuses the very reasonable request of the hon. member for New Westminster in connection with these cases, to my mind that creates an immediate justification for the demands that have been made by the hon. member for Southeast Grey for the appointment of a commission to conduct an investigation throughout the Dominion of Canada. Through these particular instances, of which we have some knowledge, I think there is created at least a presumption that something is radically wrong. So far as I am concerned, in connection with the cases mentioned by my hon. friend I would be quite satisfied with the promise that even the superintendent himself would go out personally and investigate the grievances of these men in order to see that justice may be done in each individual case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would not have any objection to showing my hon. friend the file and letting him go through it, as I have gone through it, including the fifteen-page letter they addressed to me, containing complaints against the warden. I think my hon. friend will agree that you cannot have two or three men conspiring, if I may use the word, against their superior officer and still hope for any kind of reasonable management of the institution. My hon. friend from New Westminster said Warden Cooper had been moved. The reason for his move had nothing to do with these cases. There has been a rearrangement of wardens.

Mr. REID: I did not make that inference.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I made a mistake. But I should like my hon. friend who last spoke to go through this file. I have gone through it and I have come to the conclusion that I should follow the recommendations made to me. I have read the evidence and the complaints also. I will go further; I assume that some time within the next few months the superintendent himself will go to that point, and I will ask him to hold an investigation.

Mr. ROSS: This has been a rather interesting afternoon and evening so far as I am concerned. For some time I have been the sole voice asking for certain things which to-day I hear granted. I am very much interested in the dismissals; certainly I have had my good share of trouble so far as dismissals are concerned. I do not feel that I would accept even the superintendent as investigator. I believe some person outside the institution and the department should look into these dismissals, especially when hon. members who have to bear the criticism ask for action.

I am not interested in the management of the penitentiaries. I quite agree that if he has any experience the warden should run it. Our experience has been that some wardens who did not know anything about them have run penitentiaries. To-day in Kingston we have a very good man in charge, and I have plenty of confidence in him. Although he is not a military man he has given service, has had training and is now giving satisfaction.

I speak to-night with some trepidation because I have seen so many of these things hurled across at hon. members who dare open their mouths in connection with penal matters. The record of the individual prisoner is thrown at you, as though it was something of which one should be ashamed. I know of no person either in the army or out of it who at some time or another has not been deceived. I can remember when only a few months ago a man was up for trial defended by a very celebrated member of this chamber. He forsook the case, and the witnesses ran away from him because that particular counsel was disappointed in and misled as to the character of the man. So it would seem that at times we all go amiss in these matters.

For a great many years I have been interested in two matters. To-night the celebrated gentleman about whom I have been speaking, the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) has backed us up, and has spoken strongly and reasonably in favour of the appointment of psychiatrists. May I point out that the department is spending as much money upon temporary mental examinations as would be sufficient to pay for the maintenance of a permanent psychiatric department. I have in my locker in this building many references indicating that many examinations costing $10 each have been made. What has been the result? The result has been that we have proved many cases of lowered mentality in our institutions. What has been the disposition? Surely hon. members will not say that the removal of these mental cases from penitentiaries to provincial mental institutions, places from which they can run away, is a proper disposition. We know, however, that that has been the custom.

We have contended right along that these subnormal people should be treated specially and should be segregated. They are not ordinary mental cases, because we know they are mental criminals. Only to-day a woman came to this building to see me. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I state that I believe I am approached more often than any other member so far as penitentiary matters are concerned. This particular woman wished to speak to me about her boy, a young lad sixteen years of age, who had been sent to penitentiary for life, despite the fact that an expert alienist had expressed the opinion at the trial that the boy had the mentality of a child of eight years. Despite the evidence of the expert this boy is in gaol for life. We do not say he should not be confined, but we do urge that such cases can be treated only scientifically, and that under our present system no scientific treatment is available.

Surely after listening to the presentation of facts offered by the hon. member for West Hamilton, hon. members will be convinced that the time has arrived when this country can afford to treat scientifically these mental cases. I have spoken about this matter for a number of years. I have spoken in this chamber, and I have heard the statement made not only in this building but in my own constituency that I am a thorn in the flesh so far as the government is concerned. Let me say that I shall remain a thorn in the flesh to this or any other government until some action is taken in this matter. I believe a great deal of the difficulty could be corrected and a great deal of discontent in the institutions eliminated.

There is another point about which I should like to speak, and in connection with which in the year 1928 I presented statistics to the house. Upon that occasion the then Minister of Justice promised action. At that time I believed I had accomplished something in life. I thought that the boys, the juveniles, were going to be taken out of large institutions and placed in separate buildings. Money was granted, and if hon. members consult Hansard for 1929 they will find that the then Minister of Justice, speaking from his seat in this chamber, stated that the vote was in answer to a promise given the hon. member for Kingston that something would be done before the end of the year. The money was then granted to buy the site and to begin building an institution for the juveniles. What happened?

Mr. POWER: It was given to the boys.

Mr. ROSS: One class of boys got it; it went to the preferred class institution. I trust the ex-Minister of Justice will not take these observations as being in the nature of a criticism. I received the promise that the juveniles would be treated in a separate institution. Eight or nine of the best farms in the county of Frontenac were purchased, and those boys might have been cared for. But the ex-Minister of Justice called it a preferred class institution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was removed from office before construction was completed.

Mr. ROSS: It is not completed yet. Seven years have passed since the building was begun, and I do not know that it is much above the ground even yet. That building was to be for the treatment of juveniles. However, I am satisfied that I have done something, because again and again I have stood in this chamber and pleaded the unfairness and the injustice of putting boys in penitentiaries. The Minister of Justice has said that boys are not placed in penitentiaries. Well, I would ask him to be sure on that point, because I know that up to July, 1934, under the criminal code those boys could be sent to no other place. Up to July, 1934, the magistrates of this country had no alternative but to send to the penitentiaries boys under sixteen years of age who were found guilty of certain crimes, but a boy over sixteen could be sent to another institution. Can hon. members imagine legislation such as that? I have before me a letter from a magistrate saying, "Why do you not change that provision?" Last year the magistrates met in the city of Sarnia and received the instruction that they need no longer send these boys to the penitentiaries.

I am satisfied I have done some good. This whole matter is now given to us in a new light. We are told that this mental condition can be cured by glandular treatment. No doubt there are inmates in our penitentiaries who could be cured by this treatment. A great field is opened up in connection with this treatment which is being practised in England.

I was told that I was wrong in my statement in connection with the Borstal system. It was said that I knew nothing about penology and was absolutely wrong in my presentation of the case. In view of this I could hardly believe my senses when I found that the speech from the throne contained the statement that some action was to be taken in this regard. If the minister does nothing else, if he carries out this one thing, he will be worthy of a crown of glory.

I cannot say that I agree with the minister with regard to the superintendent; I believe he is the wrong man to send there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would I do?

Mr. ROSS: You would be better if you would do it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will do it.

Mr. ROSS: Then I say: Good luck to you. I cannot accept the word of this superintendent. When the trouble was on in Kingston I did not go near him but he came to my house and made me a definite promise in connection with dismissals. He failed to carry out that promise. We are hearing so much to-day about how you can depend upon government officials, but I want to state openly that the promise made to me was not kept. I have not as much confidence in this gentleman as I had before.

Much has been said about the thirty new improvements. As far as I know, most of these were made long ago. One of the improvements mentioned was the privilege granted to the Jews, but to my knowledge that was given twenty years ago. Another was the ten dollars given to a man when he leaves, but that has been in effect for years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Those are not among the thirty improvements mentioned.

Mr. ROSS: The one connection with the Jews was. That is nothing new. Reform is in the air, and I am glad. I am not pleading for any individual case; I am not pleading for milder treatment; what I am pleading for is the scientific treatment of this question.

Another matter to which I should like to refer is the dismissal of five guards which occurred in February. It was stated that this was a necessary reduction in staff, but I think these men should have been kept on until at least the month of April. Five men were thrown out into the cold when we should expect more charity from a government institution. These men should have been kept on until the spring.

This whole question needs most serious consideration, and I think the government should consider the appointment of a psychiatrist to act in these institutions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two on the question of psychiatrists and psychologists. This matter has been given close study by the department. The following will be found on page 46 of the report of last year:

It is recommended that a full-time psychologist should be employed in each penitentiary. Funds are not available in the appropriation for 1933-34. If this recommendation is approved, the appointments should take place early in the year 1934-35.

The estimates now before us provide for a psychiatrist and psychologist for each penitentiary, although no appointments have yet been made.

Last October a report was made to me by the superintendent and at the same time I received other requests from other quarters to consider the use of the Borstal system in Canada. Early in December a strong appeal was made in the form of a petition, and this was referred to by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church). At that time it was decided that the Borstal system would be started if at all possible, and for that reason there is included in this vote an amount sufficient to supply a psychiatrist and a psychologist for each penitentiary. The superintendent placed before me a report of His Majesty's commissioner of prisons for England. This gentleman made an examination of prisons in the United States and he devotes a chapter of his report to classification and examination by psychiatrists and psychologists. This report is the foundation for the suggestion that these men be appointed as soon as the Borstal system is established. The writer of this report, a man of great experience, says:

The distinction between the psychiatrist and the psychologist is at first confusing to the English layman. The former is usually a qualified medical man who concerns himself with the problems of mental disease. The latter is commonly not a medical man, but one who has taken a university degree in psychology and concerns himself with the character of a man, the play of his emotions, the strength of his instincts and inhibitions, and the relation of all these things to his conduct.

This eminent authority on prisons points out that both a psychiatrist and a psychologist should be on the staff of a penal institution, and they are on the staff of the Borstal institution in Great Britain.

There seems to be a misapprehension in connection with the treatment given to those who become insane in our penitentiaries. If a patient shows any sign of mental deficiency or insanity of any kind he is kept under close daily observation by the physician in charge of the institution. This officer is not a qualified psychiatrist but is a qualified physician, and particularly one who has mixed with his patients and, has a general knowledge and idea as to the mental condition of humanity. In any case which excites suspicion the best available experts are called in. At Kingston, members of the staff of Queen's university and other practitioners in the city are called in. It requires a certificate of two physicians to commit a man to an asylum in Ontario. A prisoner who comes in and remains in the institution for three months and subsequently becomes insane becomes a charge on the dominion under the statute. A prisoner who becomes insane within three months after entering the institution becomes a charge on the province whence he came, under the Penitentiary Act, the assumption being that the man was mentally defective at the time he came in and was a proper charge against the province. But an insane prisoner is not kept within the penitentiary; he is immediately sent to the provincial institution for the treatment of the insane.

I grant you that there has been some delay in the removal of some men who have been pronounced insane, but the reason has not been any neglect on the part of the penitentiary officials. All that is necessary is the certificate that the man is insane, then I sign the warrant for his immediate removal, and the same day a letter is dispatched to the provincial authorities requesting them to take the patient. If he has been more than three months a prisoner the dominion has to pay for him; if he has been less than three months a prisoner, the province. But the provinces are not as well equipped in some instances in regard to insane patients as they should be, and many times we have had the reply that we must wait because there is no vacancy. Under those circumstances we have had to maintain the prisoner, sometimes a week, sometimes two weeks and sometimes three weeks before we have been able to get him placed in the provincial institution. The best care possible is taken of him, the best we can afford at all events, and as soon as there is a place in the provincial institution he is removed.

Mr. HOWDEN: Do most of these cases occur within or after the three months?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is hard to say. I have known of instances that have occurred within a few days. I commuted the sentence of a woman in the west. She was removed to the women's prison as a life prisoner and she had been there ten days when she was pronounced hopelessly insane. I know of another case in the west, where a man's sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. He was less than a month in the Prince Albert penitentiary and was pronounced insane and removed to an institution called Ponoka in Alberta. The majority of cases are those of over three months, though there are a good many who become insane within the three month period. We have altogether seventy-six criminal insane in the various asylums.

Mr. ROSS: I am afraid the minister misunderstood me. The complaint is not as to detention or length of detention but it is this, that in the classification you have the mental case—that is, the criminal—and you have the other case, the man who is not a criminal but goes to the provincial institution.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Ours are all criminal.

Mr. ROSS: Exactly. Those cases admitted to the penitentiary are of the criminal class and therefore they should not be sent to the provincial institution. They should be treated as mental criminals. It is not a question of detaining the man; I think the whole situation should be cleared up. Take the situation with regard to the youth of the country. You have the dominion government treating them in a certain way and the provinces treating them differently. I hold that the two authorities should get together and decide upon one way of treating the youth. If the Borstal system is good for the dominion it should be good for the province also. I understand that the Borstal system takes in the class from sixteen to twenty-one only.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is in England, though we might extend it here.

Mr. ROSS: I do not see the necessity for sending anyone to England; we could take the system and use it in our own way, because the English system will not answer. You have the provincial institutions and the dominion institutions in this country. I think that everyone who goes to a penitentiary is a mental criminal and should not be treated in a provincial institution where people are treated for recovery. That is an important point. I am not saying that the department does wrong but I say that the system is wrong, and perhaps the best way would be to have every case examined previously. We did that at the front. I do not like to refer to this, but one or two boys were shot for desertion and the thing struck a few of us then as being wrong. We felt that an examination of these boys would show that they had a mental, nervous condition that could not resist the strain, and it was wrong to execute them. What happened? I recommended to headquarters that an alienist be sent us and every one of our cases in the Canadian corps was examined by that alienist before it went to court martial. The result was that we saved some boys from an unreasonable and an unjust death, and we were the only corps on the whole front that adopted that method. I throw that out as a suggestion which might well be adopted in the courts. You would not have three doctors testifying one way and three testifying the other, with the result that the boy goes to penitentiary for life. It would not do any harm if we had the whole matter threshed out. Perhaps I am a little obsessed; someone may tell me I am cracked on the subject. But I have had my heart touched when I have seen boys coming as they do to Kingston, knowing that they are mentally wrong. There is something wrong with the system, and surely we are big enough to correct it without party politics or criticism of the minister or the ex-minister. I am not saying that these boys who are sent to the penitentiary are not criminals; but remember this—the boy you see is some father's boy, some mother's boy, and they have suffered through an unjust system which I think we should correct.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before the vote is taken on this item I should like the minister to answer the plea of my hon. friend from Southeast Grey for the appointment of a royal commission to investigate all conditions in the penitentiaries. I hesitate to say anything about the matter because I do not want to add any material to the flames; I know the difficulties which the minister has to face in the administration of this branch of the department. I agree with much of what he said this afternoon, but there is no doubt that there is a strong current of public opinion in favour of an investigation, if only to prove to those who have wrong ideas regarding the conditions that they are mistaken. There are many well disposed people who are sincere in the matter. I remember an interview I had a few months ago with Archdeacon Scott, of my city, whose public spirit on a question of this kind is second to none, and he besought me to try to convince my hon. friend that an investigation was necessary to satisfy public opinion with regard to this question. I would simply ask my hon. friend at least to consider the demand of the hon. member for Southeast Grey in that respect.

We are talking about reforms everywhere, even in the penitentiary branch. The minister said the other day, in connection with a ghastly incident relating to the hanging of a woman in Montreal, that this was under provincial jurisdiction. He is quite right as to that, but I wonder whether we should not, if we retain capital punishment—and I am not prepared to say that we should do away with it—have a change, because this is the criminal code of the country, in the method of execution, so that it should be carried out only in a penitentiary and not in any district. I believe the electric chair or some other device might be preferable to this remnant of old days when such things as we have read about in the papers recently are likely to happen. I just suggest to my hon. friend that the question ought to be studied, and I think it is a reform that should be brought about in this country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have a very strong opinion that in each province a central place might be established where these unfortunate cases would be dealt with. There is nothing I loathe more than to have to deal with such matters, because I have to devote so much time to them and have so much worry about them before the final word goes forth. But I am inclined to think there would be less comment, less objection and perhaps no miscarriages if a central place were established. I do not know that I am in favour of the electric chair. I have heard opinions expressed both for and against, and whether it is more or less humane than our system it is pretty hard to say. But the suggestion is well worth considering, and I assure my hon. friend that I will consider the plea he has now made and see whether anything can be done in the way he suggests in regard to a commission.

Mr. HEAPS: It is not often I intervene in a debate of this kind, although perhaps I have good reason to do so. I have the unique distinction of knowing what the inside of a penitentiary is like, and also what the inside of a gaol is like.

Mr. JACOBS: Why is the hon. member always boasting about that?

Mr. HEAPS: I am not boasting about it, but it gives me a reason or excuse for saying a few words with a little more authority than those who have spoken previously on the question. Some of them say that they were voluntary visitors for a few minutes; I happened to be an involuntary visitor to both institutions for a few months. I had an opportunity some years ago of seeing what the reactions of some of the inmates were to the treatment they were receiving. One of the first points that struck me was the fact that one met so many people there who had committed probably the same offence for which many different sentences had been given by magistrates or judges. When these people meet together and have an opportunity of discussing the various offences for which they have beeen sentenced, there is nothing that causes more dissatisfaction than for one man who received from a magistrate a sentence of, say, eighteen months for a certain offence to find that another man had been sentenced by another magistrate six months for the same offence. In connection with the administration of justice in this country there ought to be some board that would review sentences so that there might be something in the way of uniformity of punishment of those who have committed a similar class of crime. I have heard these prisoners discuss these questions and they often feel aggrieved at the sentences that have been imposed upon them. Instead of coming out of the institution better men than they were when they entered it, they come out with a grievance and possibly with the intention of committing another crime, and in many cases it is not long before those who come out with a grievance fall again into the meshes of the law.

Another point that struck me is that many of those who are in these institutions are really mental or medical cases rather than criminals who should be incarcerated in penitentiaries. My impression is that a very large percentage of the prisoners would probably respond much quicker to medical or mental treatment than they do at the present time to that which they receive in those institutions. I believe fully fifty per cent of the prisoners are mentally far below normal, and there ought to be some new method of dealing with that type of case with a view to providing that they shall not mix continuously with the hardened criminals whom we find in our penitentiaries and gaols.

I do not know whether the minister has made any statement to-day with regard to the segregation of prisoners. One of the most pitiful sights inside our gaols and penitentiaries is that of the young boy who goes in for the first time in his life, probably for a minor offence, perhaps because he has been unable to pay a fine that has been inflicted upon him, and is compelled to associate with hardened criminals. For example, a boy of quite respectable family who was unable to meet a fine of twenty dollars for speeding had to go into gaol and there mix with hardened criminals. I just wondered whether there was not some way by which such an offender, compelled to go into a penal institution, might receive treatment of a type that at least would make him a better citizen when he came out than he was when he went in.

May I add a word to the plea that has been made by the former Minister of Justice? In view of the widespread dissatisfaction that is at present manifest in our penal institutions, would it not at this time be right and proper for the Minister of Justice to appoint a commission to investigate all the penal institutions in this country and to bring in recommendations that would improve the administration of the law? There is at the present time and has been for a year or so past a good deal of dissatisfaction inside the penitentiaries; it has not been confined to one of them. Had the outbreak occurred at Kingston only, we could say that it was just an outbreak in one institution where probably there might have been a few bad inmates, but we find the same thing taking place in these institutions in different parts of the country at one and the same time. Consequently I feel there must be some cause for the dissatisfaction that is manifesting itself in these penitentiaries, and I hope the Minister of Justice will accede to the various requests that have been made to him both to-day and in the past few months to appoint a strong commission that will make a thorough investigation into our penal institutions.

Mr. EULER: I should like to support the suggestion made by the ex-Minister of Justice with reference to two phases of the subject under discussion. Complaints have been presented from time to time for several years with regard to the administration of the penitentiaries. These ought to be investigated and cleared up. This is not said with any idea of criticism of the present Minister of Justice, but I think it would be in the public interest to appoint an unbiased commission to make such investigation.

The other matter I wish to discuss for a moment is that of capital punishment, or the method of execution practised in this country. Some seven or eight years ago there was a debate in the house as to whether capital punishment should be discontinued entirely. My own thought was and still is that we should abolish capital punishment. I question very much whether the fear of capital punishment is a deterrent to the crime of murder. But the point I desire to make now is that if we are to continue capital punishment, as a civilized people we certainly ought to discard the barbarous method of hanging. It seems to me it is a degradation of the human body which is repulsive and against all the instincts of decent and civilized people. Whether we should adopt the method of electrocution, and I suppose that is really the only alternative, I am not prepared to say. Further, whether a new method is adopted, or whether we continue the present practice of hanging, it certainly should not be carried out in the community in which the convicted person lives, because as everyone knows,—I have experienced it a number of times—when the execution is imminent and is carried out, there is a pall of horror over the community for at least a day. I do not think the people of the community should be subjected to that horror. The minister has already said he will take this matter into consideration. I commend that decision and urge serious consideration of the advisability and necessity of instituting a different method than hanging, and of having executions carried out in some central place and not in the community in which the offence was committed.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It is not often that the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) and myself can agree on any subject discussed here, but we do when it comes to the well being of the people of Kingston and Frontenac-Addington. To-night we have the chance to agree on matters affecting the well being of the unfortunate people who find themselves confined in our penal institutions. It falls to us to witness either fortunately or unfortunately some of these young lads who are sent to the penitentiary as they appear on entering the city of Kingston. It is a sorry sight to see them, manacled to a strong and upstanding man, going off to spend part of their life or perhaps their entire life in confinement. It has been my privilege in my professional and business experience to handle a lot of men and to hire a good number, and I feel I can say from my observation that the majority of these lads entering the penitentiary appear at first sight to be mentally deranged in some way. I heartily agree with the suggestion that a psychiatrist and psychologist should be appointed to every such institution. I also agree with the request of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and others that a royal commission or some such body be appointed to investigate the entire subject of prisons throughout the dominion. I agree with the hon. member for Kingston City that we in that section cannot take the work or the judgment of the superintendent of penitentiaries. I say that in all seriousness, because I know the feeling of the residents of that district on account of the actions of the superintendent and his staff since he has taken the position he now holds. I could refer to many dismissals from Kingston and Collins Bay penitentiaries on which I think the hon. member for Kingston City and myself would agree. I have before me a return concerning one dismissal which certainly is not political, because I am looking at a letter signed by the hon. member for Kingston City, in 1933 backing up this individual. He was appointed by the former Conservative government in 1920. The reasons advanced in this return cannot be accepted either by the hon. member for Kingston or by myself, because I happen to know of the ability, the reliability and honesty of this man; for at one time he did some work for me and for different concerns with which I was connected. I point out also that although this gentleman passed his civil service examination and was going to be employed by another department of the government, in some way, one of the officials of the Department of Justice prevented his receiving the position. That is the way some of the boys have been treated under the autocratic, military regime of the present superintendent.

We in the county of Frontenac and the city of Kingston felt, as did the hon. member for Kingston City, that when the Collin's Bay penitentiary was started it was to be a place of detention for unfortunate youth. I do not know why that plan was not carried out. That penitentiary at the present time is a sorry spectacle. It was started about seven years ago, and everyone who travels between Toronto and Montreal in the train sees the state it is in, the main building with steel work up and the stone scarcely above the ground, as the hon. member for Kingston City has said. I noted this afternoon that the minister stated in connection with the setting up of the Borstal system that there might need to be some construction carried on in some penitentiaries, especially St. Vincent de Paul, and probably that would mean that a contract would have to be let. I am wondering why it was that construction of the Collin's Bay penitentiary was held up, although there is plenty of convict labour there. Was it held up to award a contract to some other political friends? I happen to know that the city of Kingston almost a year ago, as a chance to find a way to use some of their unemployed labour, offered to build a part of a needed water main to the Collin's Bay penitentiary. The department did not see fit to accept that offer, but have since done it, not by convict labour but by other labour employed by the department, naturally at an advanced cost to the department.

I do not want to take up any more time, but only to say, coming from a constituency which is quite familiar with all the happenings in the Kingston and Collin's Bay penitentiaries, that we in that section of the country feel that a royal commission should be appointed to investigate the actions both of the department and of the wardens and staffs, and so forth, in the different penitentiaries.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think my hon. friend should have given to the committee the full facts of the Van Alstyne case.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have them here.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think they should have been given. This man was relieved of his position because of his own actions. During his employment as a guard, or whatever his capacity was—

Mr. CAMPBELL: He was not a guard; he was confidential clerk to the warden.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I am afraid that will not help the matter at all. He was convicted of the offence of driving a car while intoxicated, and conviction of a criminal offence is one of the things we do not tolerate in the staffs of our penitentiaries. It is alleged by this man, this clerk or guard or whatever he was, that this was not the reason; he said that I overlooked that offence, or that I forgave him. The facts are that he did not turn up for duty one day. It was learned that he was in the hospital, and the warden went to see him. The man said, "I have had a motor accident; I will be all right in a day or two." That was all that was reported to me. Any man may have a motor accident, but subsequently it turned out that there was something more. This man was summoned and convicted of driving a car while intoxicated, and that was why he was released from the penitentiary staff. I am sorry to say that in other penitentiaries we have had to do the same thing.

Mr. CAMPBELL: But may I say to the minister that there are several reasons given here, of which that happens to be one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the reason, and I forgot to mention another matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Then I am glad to know that this was the reason. It is true that this gentleman was convicted of driving a car while drunk, but at the time he was under the jurisdiction of the militia as one of the officers in charge of A Company of the fourth battalion. He was on leave of absence from the department, and if anyone had jurisdiction over him at that time it must have been the Department of National Defence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: All I can say is that even if he were on his holidays and it came to my knowledge that he had been guilty of an offence against the criminal code, I would act in the same way. A man who has a record of that kind should not be in an institution where he is looking after criminals who have broken the law; they do not like to see a man over them who has done the very same thing.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Then that is all the more reason why we in that section of the country ask for a royal commission to investigate the penitentiaries. There happened to be another gentleman with this man at the time; that second man is still on the penitentiary staff—

Mr. GUTHRIE: He was not convicted of driving a car while drunk.

Mr. CAMPBELL: But I could give other cases which have been held up—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Unfortunately I have had to act in the same way in regard to friends, if I may use that word, of my own.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the minister if he would be good enough to inform the committee as to whether he is prepared to appoint a commission of investigation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I will not inform the committee. I have only been asked to consider the matter, and I promised that I would do so.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—
Salaries, $16,200; contingencies, $12,500.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask the minister if he has any information with regard to the possibility of police being stationed at Myrnam, Alberta?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am expecting a definite report on that matter. I am afraid it is going to be a difficult matter to put a detachment there, but I think I can let my hon. friend know by the end of the week.

Mr. REID: May I ask the minister if this is the item under which we are to discuss the cases mentioned when the mounted police bill was under consideration?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We can take up those matters under any item; we will let item 186 stand in order that any matter concerning the police may be discussed.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Campbell.]

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Friday, April 5, 1935.

The house met at three o'clock.

REVENUE POSTMASTERSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): In answer to the question asked by the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I table a document showing the permanent appointments to revenue postmasterships made between August 7, 1930, and February 28, 1935, by provinces and electoral districts; also a document showing the temporary appointments to revenue postmasterships during the same period. Owing to certain comments made by a member, I must give to the house the reason for the delay in answering the question. The compilation of the list of these appointments required the perusal of more than 4,300 records and more than 1,000 supplementary hours of work, 360 of which were outside the regular hours, at night, on Saturday afternoon and Sunday. To answer as quickly as possible we had to suspend in part the regular work and to get it up to date, will require extra hours of work.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister and I am delighted to see that at last he has waked up.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) inquired regarding the proposal of the government in respect of the adjournment of the house over Easter. The Prime Minister is making steady progress towards recovery. Yesterday he sat up for a time and I saw him afterwards and he looked exceedingly well. We all expect that he will be well enough to attend the ceremonies of the King's Jubilee in London on May 6. I am sure that everyone in this house and in the country would like to see Canada represented by the Prime Minister on that historic occasion. It is our intention to ask this house to consent to an adjournment until Monday, the 20th day of May, by which time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I quite realize that some hon. gentlemen would prefer to have the adjournment not so long, but under the circumstances I hope they will acquiesce, because by that time we expect the Prime Minister to be back in Canada and able to take up his duties again in this house. We certainly think it is very desirable that the Prime Minister should be here when parliament is prorogued. In the meantime it is our intention to get legislation prepared, based on the mass buying commission's report, which the chairman tells me is expected to be ready for presentation to the Minister of Trade and Commerce next Tuesday, and which we hope to be able to lay on the table of the house some day next week. There is also legislation which will be based on the report which it is hoped the housing committee will make next week too. Our purpose is to have that legislation prepared during the recess, so that when we come back we will be able to complete the session as quickly as possible, and I am sure every hon. member will like to see that done.

Mr. DUFF: By the middle of July.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No; I am sure the legislation that will be introduced will be so satisfactory to the hon. gentleman that he will find himself unable to oppose it, in exactly the same way as he has found himself unable to oppose the legislation which has been brought in this session already.

Mr. DUFF: There was nothing to oppose.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We propose to submit to the house an estimate for the payment of the actual moving or transportation expenses and reasonable living expenses of the members in the same way as was done during the recess at the end of 1932. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) proposes to include that in his supplementary estimates.

Mr. DUFF: Will it include the payment of rents for apartments?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry to say that we cannot cover every case, and we propose to deal with the matter as has been done in other similar years.

With regard to the time when parliament will be able to adjourn for the Easter recess, I am unable to give my hon. friends opposite any better information than they have themselves in what was said yesterday. If we are to have this adjournment until May 20, we can adjourn at the convenience of hon. members on any day when business warrants.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): It is unnecessary to say that we are greatly pleased to learn that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is making such a good recovery. I also think the house will be pleased to know the Prime Minister hopes to find it possible to be present at the silver jubilee ceremonies in London. The country will wish to be represented there at that time by him. But I am sorry to hear my right hon. friend say that he thinks it will be necessary to have such a long adjournment at the Easter season. May I say to the acting leader of the government that I think he has got along splendidly; we all seem to be managing very well with his colleagues and himself and we have got through a great deal of business. I see no reason why that happy condition of affairs should not continue with the acting leader in charge and without any loss to the Prime Minister or to the country. While it is of course most important that we should have the report of the price spreads commission and the legislation that is to be based thereon, and in addition the report of the housing committee, still I believe a recess of something like a week or ten days at Easter would be ample, and we might get under way with that legislation before the return of the Prime Minister from the conference in time to permit him to close the session as he will no doubt very much wish to do. But I feel a very strong protest ought to be made against adjourning for so long a time as until May 20, and that notwithstanding the compensation which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) is going to give us all for expenses in going to and from our residences at that time.

The really serious part of the whole matter is that this unnecessary prolongation of the work of the session means a still further postponement of the date of the general election. There is no doubt in the world that until after there has been a general election, business will not begin to become normal, or a general revival take place. For that reason I wish to protest again at so long a delay at the Easter season.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I thought my right hon. friend might to some extent criticise the length of the adjournment; but might I say, when he suggests it would further postpone the date of the general election, he is entirely in error. The revision of the lists is now under way, and as soon as those lists are completed, we shall be able to have an election. Whether we sit in May or June will make no difference in the date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the right hon. gentleman say when we may expect to have the lists completed?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) will reply to that.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): That will depend upon the number of alterations which are made in the lists as now printed and published. I cannot express an opinion as to the time it will take to make those corrections in the presently existing lists.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my hon. friend any idea as to how many changes will have to be made, and would it be possible for him to make an estimate in the next few days?

Mr. CAHAN: I have no knowledge of constituencies other than my own, but I am informed, whether reliably or not, that in the lists of 25,000 or 26,000 voters in that district, there may be at least 2,500 or 3,000 changes. In some years I have known of more than that number to take place on or about May 1.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): While we might well feel it regrettable that there must be such a long adjournment, under the circumstances I presume it will be necessary for us to acquiesce in the government's request; but if during that long adjournment the government is able to prepare some worthwhile legislation, probably the adjournment may also be worth while.

There is however one point that I would like to impress upon the present leader of the house (Sir George Perley), and that is that seeing the adjournment must be of some considerable length, it would be advisable to let hon. members know as early as possible on what date the adjournment will take place in order that we may make our plans.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the acting leader of the government whether any new legislation will be introduced between now and the time of the adjournment, and also whether when the house reassembles after adjournment, the legislation that will then be introduced will be limited to what is based on the report of the price spreads commission and the report of the housing committee in addition to what we already have on the order paper?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As regards legislation that may be introduced between now and the date of adjournment, there may be one or two other bills; we will let the right hon. gentleman know as early as possible. As to legislation that may be brought in after the adjournment, all I can promise is that we shall try to have it all ready within a day or two after we meet.

GARNET WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): When the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce were before the house some days ago, the minister intimated that some consideration was being given by himself and his officials to the matter of the segregation of garnet wheat, but that no definite decision had at that time been reached. May I inquire of the minister whether such a decision has now been arrived at?

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, it has been decided to let the law take its course.

BUTTER IMPORTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). He is not in his seat at present, but he will be able to read the question in Hansard. I am interested in the question which was asked by the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) of the Minister of Agriculture a few days ago and which he referred to again yesterday. I understood the minister to say that he would place on Hansard the information he gave the hon. member by letter. Personally I am very much interested in this; I have received several inquiries as to why Canada imports butter from the United Kingdom. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture if he would take this as notice of question and state why these importations have been made, and what amount of butter has been imported from the United Kingdom and other countries during the past year, also for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1930; and what the exports were during the same periods.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if it will be possible for him to bring down soon the return in answer to some questions I addressed to him on February 13? At page 780 of Hansard, the hon. minister stated:

Mr. Duranleau: I think this question should stand as an order for return and I shall table the information received from the harbour commission.

The questions asked referred to the Quebec Harbour Commission. To my knowledge, those papers have not been brought down.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire from the officials of my department; I hope to be able to bring down the return in a few days.

RECIPROCITY NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): In view of the proposed adjournment could the leader of the government give any information as to the progress of the negotiations for reciprocity either with the United States or Japan?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I am sorry I did not quite hear the hon. gentleman's question. I will give a reply on Monday.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

To compensate members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for injuries received whilst in the performance of duty, $12,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to have the indulgence of the house to make a few remarks on the administration of the mounted police. The other day when certain estimates were up hon. members complained of the manner in which some of the officials were carrying on their work. About a month ago there was brought to my knowledge by one of the most prominent barristers and solicitors of our city the fact that one evening he was in his office a little after 6.30—

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Would the hon. member speak up, and some of the conversation stop?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CASGRAIN: His wife called him and advised him that some officers of the mounted police were at their house saying that they were to carry out an investigation. Of course he said to his wife that there was no objection, to let them go on. They proceeded to go over the house from top to bottom to find out whether there was liquor concealed anywhere on the premises. I do not wish to give in this house the name of the barrister who told me of this incident because I did not tell him I would bring the case to the attention of the house. This gentleman and his wife and his family were put to serious annoyance and disturbance, and I repeat that this man is one of the leading members of the bar in the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal. Of course the mounted police did not find anything, and they went out saying they were sorry. A few days afterwards I had occasion to meet one of the solicitors of the government who were handling some of those cases in Montreal, and I reported the facts to him. He said, Well, we have no control over those things. It might happen that certain residences on given streets would be assigned to certain officers of the mounted police to investigate. I asked that friend of mine, Did they show any document or warrant or authority for going there? He said, No, they just presented themselves in the evening and said they were men of the mounted police and had the right to look through the house. As I could not get any satisfactory answer from the lawyers representing the government I thought it my duty to bring this case to the attention of the committee in order that the Minister of Justice and officials of the mounted police might find out whether it is the practice to give blanket instructions and certain street numbers to their officers to which they can go at random, and maybe one day go to some high official or persons higher in society than this prominent lawyer, who might be disturbed at any hour of the evening or night. I strongly protest against this practice and hope such an incident will not be repeated.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): If my hon. friend will write me a letter and give me some particulars I shall have inquiry made. If it is only a general charge without particulars I do not know that I can assist him. He need not disclose names, but if he will give me date and place probably I can get reports. I may tell him that no blanket instructions are given as to certain streets or blocks; such blanket instructions do not exist. When information comes that illicit traffic in liquor is being carried on, then under what is known as a writ of assistance issued under the Customs and Excise Acts, the mounted police under the provisions of that act are entitled to make search. But the instructions are very specific, no general instructions are issued. If my hon. friend will tell me in confidence the place and date I will have a report made and presented to him.

Mr. BRASSET: Some time ago I had occasion to write to the minister asking him a question, and I am obliged to say that I have received no answer. Here is the case. Some time ago a man was accused of having liquor in his possession, contrary to the Excise Act. He was tried and acquitted. A couple of days afterwards the mounted police went to his place, his wife and children being there, and asked him for his finger prints. The man refused. The mounted police forced him to give his finger prints. He had been acquitted of the charge. I do not see how the mounted police could have authority to go there and force him to give his finger prints. This man wrote a letter to me enclosing a letter for the Minister of Justice, and I wrote the minister myself asking what authority the police officers had to take finger prints under such circumstances. I have received no answer and would ask the minister to give me an answer now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I may tell my hon. friend that a report was received by me at five minutes to three this afternoon on the case he mentions. He will be notified by letter to-morrow as to the contents of the report. I only glanced over it before coming into the house, not knowing this question was coming up. But I may tell him that when any indictable offence is charged it is permissible under the law to take finger prints.

Mr. BRASSET: Is it permissible after he is acquitted?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot speak as to that. My information at the moment is that they can take finger prints at any time when a man is charged with an indictable offence. I shall have to look into it and make a more detailed report to my hon. friend. But after glancing at the report my recollection is that his acquittal was appealed.

Mr. BRASSET: The case is in appeal now. I understand that he was acquitted and then the government appealed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then he may still be convicted; I thought I gathered that from the report, but I will write my hon. friend to-morrow. I do not think there has been any delay in this matter; I think I have the reputation of answering my correspondence pretty promptly. I know some criticism is levelled against some of the departments, but I do not think that applies to my department.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I quite endorse what has been said by the minister, that there is no delay on his part in dealing with cases that come before him, and also, perhaps inferentially, that any case with which he may have to deal is considered fairly and with every consideration shown the accused. But I say to this committee that regardless of what may happen in any case, large or small, that may come before any of the courts of this country, to take the finger prints of any man accused simply because he has been accused, before the final disposition of his case has been made, is an outrage and ought to be condemned by every member of this house. I have no hesitation in saying that so far as I am concerned it will receive all the opposition that is within my power.

Mr. POULIOT: I offer my congratulations to my hon. friend from West Hamilton for the statement he has just made, which is worthy of his experience before the courts, especially in criminal matters. May I ask the minister what have been the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in fighting communism in this country? I should like to know something about the stand taken by officer Zaneth in the prosecution of communists in Toronto some time ago.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Officer Zaneth had nothing to do with the matter; he was never connected in any way with prosecutions in Toronto.

Mr. POULIOT: But were there any prosecutions of communists after the report was secured by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The attorney general of Ontario took action and he asked for reports from the mounted police. The action was entirely in the hands of the attorney general's department in Toronto.

Mr. POULIOT: I remember that at the time I received a communication about it from Mr. Price, then attorney general, which I believe was sent to all hon. members. Then may I ask the minister this very direct question: Are the Royal Canadian Mounted Police doing anything to secure information about the communists or to check communist propaganda in this country?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, no special effort is being made in regard to communism, but they do take general cognizance of what is going on throughout Canada, and if anything unusual happens they report it. I do not know of any action ever having been taken by the mounted police in regard to that matter.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the hon. gentleman if some booklets containing communistic propaganda were seized by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police during the past year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: My instructions are in the negative.

Mr. POULIOT: Is there not someone in the mounted police who checks the papers published in foreign languages in order to bring to the attention of the commissioner anything by way of communistic propaganda?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh yes, I think probably the foreign newspapers as well as newspapers that are not in foreign languages, are checked up.

Mr. POULIOT: And may I ask the minister if there is not a translator in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police branch whose business it is to read publications in foreign languages with regard to the communistic propaganda in this country?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, not particularly in regard to communists, but in regard to all foreign newspapers and particularly those that are under suspicion of publishing matter detrimental to Canada or to the government of Canada or anything of the kind. We have had intimations from foreign powers in regard to some foreign language publications in Canada reflecting on Jugoslavia and other countries, threatening the destruction of the king and the like, and we have translators or we get translations done by some department of the government; I think probably the mounted police are able to make the translations themselves. I have had protests from representatives of foreign states, consuls and the like, and we are in a position to translate and scrutinize the contents of foreign language newspapers.

Mr. POULIOT: Then would the minister be kind enough to tell the committee in what sense they are scrutinized and for what purpose?

Mr. GUTHRIE: For general purposes. This work is very confidential; it is part of the secret service work of the mounted police.

Mr. POULIOT: I am very glad indeed to hear the statement of the minister; it is in accord with a speech delivered by the Prime Minister in Toronto as reported in the Ottawa Evening Citizen of Thursday, November 10, 1932. The title is:

Asks Canadians Put Iron Heel on Communism

Premier Bennett also vigorously denounces socialism in address to Ontario Conservative Association. Says Liberals seem to capitalize on unrest. Declares cooperative commonwealth movement means sovietism.

The article continues:

Toronto, November 9.—In a vigorous speech which carried applause from every corner of the convention hall, Prime Minister, R. B. Bennett, to-day roundly denounced socialism and communism. Premier Bennett was addressing the 11th annual convention of the Ontario Conservative Association.

What do these so-called groups of socialists and communists offer you? the Prime Minister asked. "Some are commending to you the history of Russia," Mr. Bennett declared. "If any of you have read the small volume by the Duchess of Atholl, I do not think you will give it much support."

Then he continues as follows:

"They are sowing their seeds everywhere. Right in this city of Toronto such propaganda is being carried on, and in the little out of the way places the same injurious work is being done. We know that throughout Canada this propaganda is being put forward by organizations from foreign lands that seek to destroy our institutions. Now, ladies and gentlemen, we ask every true Canadian to put the iron heel of ruthlessness against a thing of that kind."

This was the address by the Prime Minister, and I understand that the only time a heel is used as a rudder is when the toboggan is going down the hill. He continued:

Well, if there are any Liberals within sound of my voice you will get away from that party because it is no longer a party but a jumble led by a cooperative commonwealth. Why? Because they seek to capitalize on all the unrest that exists.

The Prime Minister closed with a cheerful note of optimism. Canadians would go through the economic situation successfully, and was maintaining its stand as the fifth trading nation of the world.

Then if we glance at the New York Times of February 17, 1935, we see this heading:

Bolshevism Marches Toward Its Goal

An examination reveals that Russia has carried out the major Marxist principles.

Therefore as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is securing information about the dangers of communist propaganda it is safeguarding the old order of things. Old order or no order, this is a most important thing, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is a bulwark of the old order. But unfortunately, as the Prime Minister has said, the old order has gone. Therefore the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is fighting for an aim which is in contradiction of the aim held by the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman has said the old order has gone, but we find the Royal Canadian Mounted Police fighting for it. This is a most serious thing. It is so serious that I shall ask that police body to safeguard the country and the order of things against those who preach communistic propaganda in Canada. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police must be very careful, and would render a very great service by protecting the old order against the dangerous innovations of some so-called statesmen.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Prime Minister.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore I suggest they should have a guard around the Chateau Laurier so that in the event of the Prime Minister recuperating—and I sincerely hope he will—he will not make any more statements such as the one I shall now read. This statement would have been confiscated by the police had it been uttered by any other Canadian citizen. Mark you, sir, the Times, the greatest paper published on this continent, states:

Examination reveals that Russia has carried out the major Marxist principles.

That is a very serious thing. What was said in Montreal on January 28 last? A press dispatch appearing in the Montreal Gazette of that date reports a speech delivered by the Prime Minister, one which was broadcast over the radio, as follows:

The Prime Minister suggested that his talks with Soviet Foreign Minister Litvinoff at Geneva and his study of the views of Sir Stafford Cripps and John Strachey, British radicals, had influenced him to a great extent, while he also pointed out the lessons that could be learned from the French and Russian revolutions.

The first time the Prime Minister spoke about the iron heel of ruthlessness he was influenced by a book published by the Duchess of Athol. This time he is influenced by Strachey, by Cripps and by Litvinoff.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police must be asleep at the switch.

Mr. POULIOT: Most interesting. Who is Strachey? What are his books. According to the New York Times of March 24—

I am not advertising these books, but I have had to read the advertisement in order to show what impressed the Prime Minister when he said he was inspired by the scripts of Cripps, by the scripts of that crank Strachey, and by Litvinoff. I would not have made this reference if the Prime Minister had been unwell, but we are told by the acting Prime Minister that from day to day he is getting better. If he is better let him support the criticism and if he is unwell let him resign. I do not wish to carry on a discussion with a moribund. Here is what the Prime Minister said as reported at page 229 of Canada, a weekly publication, on September 15, 1934:

Soviet Admission To The League
"No reason for refusing," says Mr. Bennett Paris, September 6.

A hint of Canada's probable attitude on the question of the admission of Soviet Russia to the League of Nations was given by Mr. Bennett, the Canadian Prime Minister, who arrived in Paris this evening on his way to Geneva.

"There is no reason for refusing" said Mr. Bennett, when questioned on the subject at Cherbourg.

"So you will vote in favour of the Soviet?" asked the Temps correspondent.

"I did not say that" replied Mr. Bennett.

"It is possible that Mr. Bennett is maintaining an open mind in regard to the election of the Soviet union to the league," Reuter was told this evening.

"Things look different on the spot at Geneva, and Mr. Bennett may only make up his mind after a careful weighing of the international situation as seen from Geneva.

"It is certain that the election"—

And this is most important.

—"of the Soviet would not meet with unanimous Canadian approval."

That was the statement of the Prime Minister at Cherbourg on September 6 of last year. Why was it certain? Because at the time the iron heel of ruthlessness had still to be used as a weapon against communism. But times have changed. There was a telegram signed by some distinguished gentlemen, and containing the signature of the Prime Minister. This telegram is an invitation to Russia to join the League of Nations and was signed by Teclé-Hawariate, Lec Kurti, S. M. Bruce, E. Berger, Anthony Eden, C. Batoloff,

R. B. Bennett, Manuel Rivas-Vicuna, Quo tai-Chi, Eduard Benes, J. Seljamaa, Louis Barthou, D. Maximos, C. Mayard, G. Tanczos, Denys Bray, Noury Said, Aloisi, W. Munters, S. Lozoraitis, F. Castillo Najera, C. J. Parr, B. Kazemi, Beck, N. Titulesco, Eric H. Louw, S. de Madariaga, Tewfik Rustu, A. Guani, Bogoliub Yevtitch.

Those distinguished gentlemen decided to invite Russia to join. That is not all. I asked the right hon. gentleman the following question about Russia; reported at page 316 of Hansard:

Did the Canadian delegation officially meet in Geneva in September, 1934, Mr. Maxim Litvinoff, people's commissary for foreign affairs of the U.S.S.R.?

The Prime Minister answered, No. He answered an emphatic No, and I must say his answer was very strange because that question concerned an official meeting. There were Russian delegates who went to Geneva and there were also Canadian delegates who went there, they were at the same meeting, and yet they did not meet officially. Is it not absurd, Mr. Chairman? In the House of Commons is it necessary for a member to speak to every other member before it can be said we have met officially when we are all sitting together here in the house? Of course not. Yet the delegates of Russia and those of Canada were sitting together at the League of Nations and were not meeting officially. But certainly, Mr. Chairman, they were meeting socially and meeting personally because the Prime Minister suggested that his talks with the Soviet foreign minister, Litvinoff, had influenced him so much that Strachey was deported from the United States—

Mr. HEAPS: Pardon me, he was not deported.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, Mr. Chairman, but surely he has received enough indulgence in regard to the question under discussion here. This item has nothing to do with the entrance of Russia to the League of Nations. I generally find it is shorter not to interrupt than to interrupt, but I am going to raise the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I explain to you why I am proceeding in this manner, and I shall try to make it as short as possible. The hon. Minister of Justice, for whom I have a high regard, submits to you, sir, that my remarks are irrelevant to the matter under consideration, but they were based on the minister's own remarks on this very item. I asked him before I proceeded if the communist propaganda had been checked to a certain extent by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for whom we are being asked to vote a certain amount of money. That is a matter under discussion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I ask you to rule, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a moment, please, Mr. Chairman. I would ask the minister to be courteous enough to let me make my point to the chair before a decision on the point of order is given. I know the minister is too fair to prevent me submitting my argument on the point of order. I wish to stand by the rules of the house and to submit to you sir, my argument on the point of order in order that you may decide with all the facts before you.

The CHAIRMAN: Surely if we permit the hon. member to discuss the activities of the mounted police in Canada, that should be latitude enough without going outside this country. It is allowing a lot of leeway on this item to permit the hon. member to deal with the whole activities of the mounted police in Canada, and surely the hon. gentleman will not ask me to permit him to go outside of Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir, but may I humbly submit my point of view? We know now that one of the most important duties of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is to check communist propaganda in this country, as I am sure you will agree with me, Mr. Chairman, and the questions I have asked the minister were only with regard to the past activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in checking communist propaganda in this country. Was I not in order in asking those questions, sir?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: A great deal of leeway has been permitted the hon. gentleman, but so long as he remains in Canada and discusses the activities of the mounted police within the country he may go on, but surely he must not go outside of Canada.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): If he got out and stayed out it would be a help.

Mr. POULIOT: Pardon me, I thought I heard a sound.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You heard it and you understood it.

Mr. POULIOT: What I wished to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice and of the commissioner has been accomplished so far as the activities of the police within this country are concerned. I have already cited quotations as to what has happened outside of Canada, and I shall not mention that again because I wish to abide by your ruling, sir. But what I wish now to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice and of his commissioner, who is a very efficient gentleman, is a speech that was delivered by the Prime Minister in Montreal.

The CHAIRMAN: That again surely has nothing to do with the activities of the mounted police.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, just a minute, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Just a minute. That has nothing to do with the activities of the mounted police. This item deals with the mounted police, and let us keep to it. The hon. member will have ample opportunity on other items or in other circumstances to discuss what the Prime Minister has said.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Témiscouata is dealing with the inactivities of the mounted police.

Mr. POULIOT: I want the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to do their duty, to be a useful body in this country, and not simply to sit in their offices without performing the duties for which they were appointed, and for which we vote money. That is why I want to give them a very good tip as to a most useful work they can do by indicating to them most dangerous and most pernicious communist propaganda which came out of the lips of the Prime Minister, and I ask the commissioner to stop that communist propaganda in this country. Now I am through, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Chairman, may I just say a very brief word in regard to what has been advanced to the committee by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat? If I have followed, and I hope I have, the questions that he addressed to the hon. Minister of Justice, they were designed to crystallize, so to speak, the activities of the mounted police in various parts of this country, and particularly in those realms with which the hon. member for Témiscouata is best acquainted. I have followed with great interest the balance of his address based on what my hon. friend was able, I will not say to elicit from the minister, but to suggest to the minister, and that brings me to one thought of very grave necessity. In this house last night when the penitentiary estimates were under consideration I felt constrained to offer to the Department of Justice the suggestion that there should be in every penitentiary in this country a competent psychiatric clinic. Having listened to the hon. member for Témiscouata this afternoon I am constrained to suggest that that might be extended to certain members of parliament, and particularly to the hon. gentleman from Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I do not attach much importance to what the hon. member from Hamilton (Mr. Bell) has said. I will leave with him this one thought, that people who live in glass houses should be very careful not to throw stones. I was generous enough to offer my congratulations to him at the beginning of this sitting, but now I gladly withdraw them because he is not worthy of them.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am flattered, highly flattered.

Mr. REID: When the bill regarding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was under discussion some time ago I mentioned at that time some matters affecting the force and its operations in the province of British Columbia. The minister, in reply at that time, said that perhaps these matters could be better discussed when the estimates were under consideration. On that occasion I did not go as fully into the matter as I should have liked, nor did I mention the names of those connected who had been engaged by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. However, I am taking the opportunity this afternoon to bring these matters to the minister's attention, and I take it that he has under his hand all the information regarding these cases.

The first case is that of a man named Handley who was engaged as an under cover man for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He operated from Vancouver throughout the lower Fraser valley, but particularly in the municipality of Richmond, and I may say that he was operating there without the knowledge of the municipal police. Whether any information had been given to the provincial police I do not know, but I do know that he was operating in the various municipalities without any knowledge on the part of the municipal police, either regarding his operations or regarding the workings of the other under cover men. From information I have, and I have been in very close touch with the reeves of the various municipalities, there has been no necessity to call in the help of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, especially in the cases which I am going to discuss. I have every word of praise both for the provincial and for the municipal police, nor have I anything particularly derogatory to say of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; it is the operations of the under cover men which I wish to discuss particularly this afternoon, while the chief officer of the mounted police is before him.

The first case occurred on March 20, 1934. It was then that this man Handley went into a store operated by a Chinaman and asked him if he would like to make money by selling liquor. After some negotiations the Chinaman consented, and Handley offered to supply him with bottles, colouring mater and labels. I take strong objection, as I did the last time the matter was under discussion, to any man being allowed to go through the municipalities and tempt men to commit crime. I do not think it is the duty or the business of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to butt in in these municipalities in this class of work. On April 6 the place was searched by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and this man came before the court. The municipal police were not aware that Handley was operating under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but they did have information that he was handling liquor and had liquor in his charge for sale. Not knowing that he was operating under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police they arrested him. It was when they arrested him that the information then came out that he was an under cover man in the employ of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Charges were laid—and I have copies of the court record under my hand. He came before the court and both he and a confederate named Kemp, who sometimes operated under the name of Tufts, were fined $500 or six months. During the time the case was pending the municipal police endeavoured to obtain information regarding this man Handley, and on being tipped off from the Vancouver police department that he had a criminal record and was wanted for a certain crime in Australia they went to the immigration authorities and there endeavoured to get his record. I call the minister's attention to this aspect of the matter, though it does not come directly under his department, because it is very serious. The immigration authorities refused to give any information; they said they had instructions from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police not to divulge information to the municipal or any other police force regarding this man. The municipal police then wired Australia and information came from that country regarding the man's record. It appears he had come to Canada as a stowaway, landing in Montreal, and had travelled across the country to Vancouver, entering the country through the port of Vancouver even though he had declared that he was a stowaway. The following day his wife and family arrived from Australia and they also were admitted into the country. That question does not come directly under the jurisdiction of the minister, but I shall probably have more to say regarding it when the immigration estimates are under discussion, because I believe it to be a very serious state of affairs. I corroborated the information regarding the stand taken by the immigration authorities, as when I was asked to come into this matter, an appeal being made to me by the reeve of the municipality and the chief of police, I discussed the case with the immigration authorities, who told me that they knew better than to do anything against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I made the statement at the time, and I make it now, that it seemed to me, so far as that department was concerned, that all you had to do was to be employed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and you were immune from arrest or deportation no matter what your crime was and that any information regarding your record would also be withheld.

I do not know whether the minister has before him the full record of this man, but Handley was at one time in partnership with a man named Springer, running a gas station and a car repair establishment. The police found alcohol on the premises and a charge was laid against Springer, though not against Handley, who was, as I have stated, working for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There was another case where a man named Walker purchased liquor through Handley and this man Walker was convicted. In this connection, I should like to know who received the moieties in these cases, and what amounts were paid. Handley also sold smuggled cigarettes. I mention this in order to show the minister that a man without character, about whom the Royal Canadian Mounted Police presumably knew nothing at first, though they certainly did afterwards, a fugitive from justice from some other country where he was wanted for crime, was let loose throughout the lower Fraser valley where he deliberately went about offering either cigarettes or liquor to anyone he came in contact with, and if people were weak or foolish enough to fall for it, a report was then made to the police and they were picked up. This man offered cigarettes to one Kemp of the Pacific Bottle Company. The cigarettes were seized by the police and the man was convicted. Again, I would ask, who got the moiety in that case? Handley purchased his liquor from a man in Seattle, and it would be interesting to know how he and others were able to cross the line back and forth with bottles, labels, colouring matter and liquor. I can give the names and addresses to show where the supplies were procured across the line. I want to know whether the immigration and customs authorities were aware of this man's identity when he was travelling back and forth. I am told, but I am not sure of it, that they were not. However, he purchased this liquor from a man named Anderson of Seattle, Washington, and he bought the colouring and flavouring from Lyons' drug store there. He even offered to sell narcotics. He was dealing in contraband cigarettes, liquor and dope. He left a tin of alcohol with a man named La Pierre, who lives on the border near Bellingham, and he was asked whether Eddie Tufts had asked him to smuggle cigarettes into British Columbia for him. During the adjournment of the first hearing of the charge under the liquor act, which was in May, 1934, Handley and Kemp went across the line and on their return endeavoured to sell moonshine to a man named J. Ross, who operates a hotel in the town of Mission, British Columbia, but were unsuccessful. At the time of his arrest on May 2, 1934, he had a bottle of moonshine in his possession which he had placed in an oil pit at a gas service station before his arrest. These two men, Handley and Kemp, worked together. I think I am correct in stating that Kemp was not exactly in the pay of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but Handley was: Handley was, I understand, receiving $150 but Tufts or Kemp was receiving moieties for the information laid before the police and they split on the moieties. Kemp's operations were along the same lines as those of Mr. Handley.

Another case not exactly of the same character is that of a man named Sawley. Sawley lived in the city of Vancouver. He was accosted one day and asked if he would like to make some money. Being idle and having been idle for a year and a half he naturally answered, yes. I am not going into all the details of how the contact was made, but to state the matter briefly, Sawley went out to a place a little beyond Abbotsford and there picked up several gallon tins of alcohol. He was successful the first time in reaching Vancouver with it, but on his second trip a week or so later he fell asleep at the wheel during the night for just a minute and his car went into the ditch and overturned. After he regained consciousness and got up, the first thing he did was to lift the tins of alcohol and put them up on the bank. His story to the chief of police, to me and to the neighbouring chief of police, repeated on three occasions, was that after he waited there a while, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police came along and seeing him on the roadside in the car, stopped. But the remarks which were made to him, according to his statement, are worthy of note. They said that they had been waiting for Sawley and as he was an hour and a half or more overdue, they thought they would set out and look for him. What I want to draw to the attention of the minister is this. If they had information regarding this man Sawley and were lying in wait for him coming from near the boundary line to the city of Vancouver, why did they not make a circle around that ring of men who brought the liquor across the line and transferred it from one car to the other which Sawley was driving rather than simply wait until the one man came along and pick him up? That aspect of the matter should be looked into, because they seemed to know all about this man Sawley and his operations.

I have many other cases, but I am not going to deal with all of them unless I have to; I have sworn affidavits and information in connection with a whole raft of cases. Somebody suggests that I use the word "declarations." I will call them declarations so that we may not split hairs between a man's affidavit and his declaration.

The next is a radio case which I think is fairly serious; it is to me rather an outstanding case. This man was afterwards interviewed by one of the provincial police force who went to see him. It appears that some time in February or March, 1934, Herbert Handley came into the store and looked at a small pocket radio which this Mr. Nemetz wanted to get rid of as there was no sale for such a thing. He offered it for $10 to Mr. Handley. Handley mentioned some names as references, took the radio and was to bring his own back in exchange. He came back in a few days with a small radio which he said he would give in exchange for the one he took away and he told the storekeeper Nemetz to try it out. A short time after Mr. Handley, the under cover man, had left the store, two men walked in, looked at the same radio pretending they wanted to purchase it, and made some inquiries regarding its qualities. They had no sooner left than Constable McDuffie and another man walked in and seized the radio as a smuggled one, as the duty had not been paid. Nemetz saw Handley the same afternoon at the corner of Twelfth street and Victoria drive and told him what had happened, but Handley said to Nemetz to pay the duty and just forget all about it. I am going to ask a question at this point in connection with this case, because I hold in my hand the receipt which was given by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to this man Nemetz. It reads:

Received from Leo Nemetz at New Westminster, B.C., this 23rd day of February, 1934, pending decision, the sum of $44.96, on account of charges against Leo Nemetz, for contravention of the Customs Act.

My question in regard to that would be: Is it the regular procedure of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to seize goods that come in illegally, take the party before them, hold a little court, impose a fine and let him go? That aspect of the matter should be looked into. The serious part of the whole affair however is that this man was permitted to go around freely offering these goods, either cigarettes or moonshine or alcohol or radios, all brought from across the line, and no sooner would he find a victim, shall I say, than information would be sent on to the mounted police who would come along and pick the man up, after which I understand moieties were paid to the informers. I stated the last time I was speaking in regard to this matter and I say again that it looks as if some kind of plot was in progress to build up cases in order to show what wonderful work the mounted police were doing. In speaking about these cases I do not want to be misunderstood or regarded as one who is ready to besmirch the good name of the mounted police. I think the cases I have mentioned besmirch their name without my doing it, and I might say in British Columbia the word of these men is not now being accepted by the judiciary. In fact this man Handley was called "a blatant liar" by the judge in the court, which is very strong language for a judge to use against any man.

I have before me another case with which I am not going to deal. Kemp and another man had guns taken away from them at the border where they had some alcohol in their car. Working for the mounted police they had two other men covered and were going to arrest them when a farmer opened the door of his house, pointed a shotgun at the two of them and took the gun off each. That matter was the subject of a little bit of ridicule and it did not enhance the reputation of the mounted police in any way.

Mr. GARDINER: Did they get their guns back?

Mr. REID: I am not sure whether they did. I think the cases I have mentioned are serious enough to warrant some investigation or inquiry being made. I am one of those who believe the duty of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is not to go around looking for bottles of whisky or offering liquor to people in order to sell it to them and afterwards report them. We have municipal and provincial police handling liquor cases, and fairly efficiently, I believe. I say from experience that never yet have the mounted police cooperated in any way with the municipal police. As a matter of fact when I was reeve of a municipality and we endeavoured to get their cooperation, we were told that their work was secret and no tips or information could be given out to the municipal police, but they would be glad to get all the tips and information possible from the municipal police. I say that in all seriousness because as I mentioned a few moments ago I have had personal experience of their operations. I think the method of all this secret work and all these under cover men should be looked into, and the whole system readjusted and put on a better footing. We had a case not long ago of one member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who joined the ranks of the communists and obtained information. If they have regular men on the force who can do that they shoud have regular men who can look after contraband or excise in a proper way. But when they hire men with no reputation at all, whose word no one would believe on a stack of bibles, men who are wanted for crime in other countries and have come to this country under questionable conditions, and knowledge of these facts is given to the mounted police and little done about it, I think the committee will agree that the situation is serious indeed. My view is that if the Royal Canadian Mounted Police paid more attention to dope running, especially on ships coming from the orient to Vancouver or New Westminster, instead of all this activity in regard to liquor, it would be more to the general advantage.

I would like to know whether this man Handley is now in gaol or whether he has been deported. Also the total moieties paid to these men. I do not think that should be considered secret. Also, did the mounted police pay the court expenses of these men Handley and Kemp? Handley could not raise the fine anyway, and I understand he was put in gaol, but whether he is there at present I do not know. In view of the fact that these under cover men are in touch with United States interests, are able to obtain gallons of liquor or moonshine or gin, bring it back into British Columbia, offer it to others so that they may go into the business, and then immediately report them to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I cannot find words strong enough to condemn such a system. In my opinion these practices should be absolutely stopped, and until the municipal or provincial police call on the mounted police for assistance to carry on what is the ordinary police work I think they should stay outside the municipalities and not be carrying on this work and without the knowledge of the authorities.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statement by my hon. friend, and I regret to say that I cannot defend the actions of the two men that he has been discussing here this afternoon. Some weeks ago my hon. friend gave me an intimation that he was going to discuss the cases of Handley and Tufts alias Kemp, and I had inquiry made and a report prepared in regard to them. I have to admit that in these instances, out of our force of some 2,500 or 2,600 men, we did unfortunately get two black sheep. Handley was taken on as an agent, I think for about three months. The other man never was on the strength in any way, shape or form, but was evidently what they call a spotter, and he received some portion of the fines which were imposed in the cases with which he dealt, which we call a moiety of the fine. I am sorry I have no record of the amount that he received in that respect. We have to write to British Columbia to get that. I shall endeavour to get the figures for my hon. friend.

The mounted police in British Columbia have but a limited jurisdiction, similar to what they have in Ontario and Quebec. In the other provinces they are the police force of the province under agreement with the province, but not so in British Columbia. In that province the duty of the mounted police simply is to see to the enforcement of the Excise Act, the Customs Act, the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, and any other dominion act that they may specially be required to enforce. But they have nothing to do with the enforcement of the ordinary criminal law of the country or of the provincial liquor law. This man Handley was employed as a secret agent without knowledge of his past history. It is true that after three months' experience with this man he was arrested with his running mate, Tufts, on charges laid against them by the local police, and was condemned to a fine of $500 with alternative of six months in gaol. Both of these men I understand are now serving their term of imprisonment. My information is that the department took no part in their defence whatever, paid no money for it, and was not in any way connected with it. I think for the information of the committee I had better read the report. It is largely in corroboration of the statements I have already made, but it is not very long:

With regard to Handley, before he became a paid agent of the force, he apparently had sold to or purchased liquor from Wong Sam.

After becoming a paid agent in this force, he caused a seizure of illicit liquor to be made under the Excise Act from Wong Sam.

Whilst the excise case above referred to was before the courts, the provincial police of British Columbia took action against Handley with respect to the first transaction referred to in this memorandum in the dealings between Handley and Wong Sam.

Immediately Handley's action with Wong Sam was brought to light through the charge by the provincial police, Handley was dismissed from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In so far as Handley is concerned, before he was engaged by the mounted police, enquiries were made respecting his record in Canada and United States, but no enquiries were made in England or Australia, although Handley was questioned respecting his record in those countries. He not only lied to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but also to his own counsel, Mr. L. H. Jackson, and therefore his criminal record in those countries was unknown to the force, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police admit that in these particulars, his record was not fully investigated, and that he should not have been employed.

Emphasis is placed upon the fact that Handley had committed his wrong-doing before he actually became a paid agent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and he was immediately dismissed as a result of the charge by the British Columbia provincial police.

With regard to Tufts, alias Kemp, this man was not a paid agent of the force, but was simply an informer who had been giving independent information and for which he was paid separately in each instance.

For the past seven years, he had supplied information to the preventive service on a moiety basis.

The charges against Handley and Tufts under the British Columbia Liquor Control Act was disposed of and both accused were convicted by Police Magistrate Darling at Brighouse, B.C., on April 28, 1934, the maximum penalty of $500 fine or, in default, six months' imprisonment being imposed in each instance. The sentences were appealed but the convictions were upheld.

My information is that both men are still in custody. Now the greatest care is taken in the selection of men for the mounted police force. All possible precautions are taken in regard to the history and conduct of men who are taken on, but occasionally we have one put over on us, just as in other businesses. In this case I am satisfied that we had two highly undesirable men, one taken on the force and the other used on the moiety basis as set out in that report. I think their conduct was infamous; as soon as it was discovered they were both cast adrift, and are now in prison after prosecution by the local police.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police do not interfere with the local police; their sole duty is to look after the revenues of the crown in regard to customs and excise, but as my hon. friend knows there are occasions when the city police call upon them for assistance. Many times in Vancouver, sometimes in Toronto and sometimes in Montreal they have been called upon by the civic authorities, and they are always very ready to give their assistance when so called upon, but they do not interfere with the operations of the municipal or provincial police in these provinces.

The question of the employment of under cover men in connection with liquor cases is one upon which there are evidently two opinions. For instance, in the province of Manitoba where the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have authority as provincial police, the provincial liquor board maintains from twelve to fifteen under cover men, plainclothesmen, simply for the purpose of seeing to the enforcement of the liquor act of that province; that is their business. The mounted police operate in the same way, but they not only seek to enforce the liquor act of the province of Manitoba; they look after the dominion customs and excise laws also. We look after the work altogether in Saskatchewan and in Alberta; in the maritime provinces also the enforcement of the provincial laws is in the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. For the purpose of enforcing provincial acts it always has been the custom, I believe, to employ plainclothesmen, inspectors, spotters or whatever you may call them. They do it in Ontario, where they have a host of them; I think they use them in Quebec also, but in the maritimes and in two of the western provinces that work is left to the mounted police. That is looking after the retail end of the business, if it may be so called; it is not in connection with the revenues of the dominion but in connection with the revenues of the liquor board of the province. It is a custom that has prevailed throughout Canada, I believe, and in the United States and England for many years. Special means have to be adopted to prevent the illicit sale of liquor and to prevent breaches of provincial or dominion liquor laws. Occasionally a case of hardship arises; occasionally a case of wrongdoing arises, as in the cases cited this afternoon, but on the whole the system has not worked badly; on the whole smuggling has been pretty well checked up, though not stopped by any means. Excise has been pretty well collected, though breaches of the laws still continue. I think it is the desire of everyone that the laws of the land, whether provincial or dominion, should be enforced to the limit, and for the purpose of enforcement, particularly in regard to liquor laws, plainclothesmen, stool pigeons, spotters or whatever you wish to call them have been employed, I think, for generations. They are still employed. Whether or not the practice should be continued I am not going to say, but I regret that I have to state that in the cases of the men mentioned in British Columbia, their records were bad. They put it over the police badly when they were taken on, but their services were dispensed with as soon as their records were known, and I am glad to say they are both in gaol now paying the penalty.

Mr. REID: The minister said it was unfortunate these two men had been engaged, but I would direct his attention to the fact that this kind of thing is not yet finished. There are other men under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police operating now through the valley, doing exactly the same thing, men with reputations just as bad as Handley's.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can my hon. friend furnish me with their names?

Mr. REID: Yes, I will.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend need not do it openly; he might be good enough to do it by letter.

Mr. REID: I certainly will; I will give the names and the cases, where men are doing exactly the same thing. From the statement of the minister one would almost infer that after these cases were drawn to the attention of the police this practice had ceased, but that has not been the case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I did not say that.

Mr. REID: The practice of engaging men of no character, to carry on the business that was carried on by Handley and Kemp—

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is these men of no character and no principles, who adopt unfair methods, that we want to know about, and if my hon. friend will give me the names I will look into the matter.

Mr. REID: I will take the first opportunity to give the minister the names, cases and full particulars. These men are inciting people to purchase moonshine, bottle and label and sell it, and later the Royal Canadian Mounted Police come along and pick them up. I have a case under my hand which occurred this year, which I will pass on to the minister. The hon. gentleman spoke of the necessity of stool pigeons, and I should like to make this suggestion. There are municipal, provincial and mounted police in the province of British Columbia, though the mounted police have not the same responsibility they have in other provinces. Could not many of these men be used? Their work is police work they are men of some character, and only a few of them are known outside Vancouver. Of the two or three hundred men you have in Vancouver could you not occasionally send out different men through the valley? Why take men whose word is no good at all? One of the serious objections we make is that it is not the Excise Act they are endeavouring to enforce. According to my understanding the Excise Act would apply if a man brought kegs or barrels or tins of liquor across the line in contravention of the customs act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, the Excise Act has to do with illegal manufacture.

Mr. REID: There is some distinction between keeping unsealed liquor, which is under a provincial act, and keeping contraband.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a good deal of distilling going on that is illegal, and that is an excise matter. Bringing liquor illegally into the country is a customs matter, perhaps an excise matter also. Primarily, however, excise has to do with manufacturing in Canada, distributing in Canada or having in possession illicit liquor.

Mr. REID: I know in regard to stool pigeons it has been the common practice—for one municipality—to ask a neighbouring municipality for the loan of a policeman who would not be known to the person suspected, and in most cases they have been able to obtain the necessary evidence and conviction. I suggest to the minister that the regular men in the police force should be used. If things were very bad you could bring a man from Calgary or you could use provincial or municipal police. But at present I maintain there is no cooperation between the mounted police and the municipal police. They work independently of each other; that was why these men were picked up. The municipal police were not aware that these men were in the pay of the mounted police. I would plead with the minister that instructions be sent out to see that there is more cooperation with the municipal police.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: We extend all the cooperation we can, but we have to receive a request before we can do anything. The instances which I cited were all instances in which we had direct requests either from the heads of the municipal police or from the attorney general.

Mr. REID: I will be glad to send the information to the minister.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The hon. member for New Westminster has opened up a question which is so wide in its ramifications that it extends far beyond his province, and perhaps it is something that he does not altogether appreciate or understand. It applies to every province in the Dominion of Canada; it applies to every place in the United Kingdom or in the British dominions where the question of detection by police officers is considered in respect of any breach of the law.

The hon. member for New Westminster has addressed to the Minister of Justice a number of questions in connection with the behaviour of certain men who have been members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the minister in that frank and straightforward way which is one of his outstanding characteristics—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Is there anyone who challenges that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; we say "Hear, hear."

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): It was challenged yesterday, but to-day we are having a stag party. The minister has stated that no encouragement has been given to the men who in the name of the law are misconducting themselves in that province. That is an important point, but it is by no means the most important.

The most important question which may come before this parliament or before any other body charged with the duty of enforcing laws is as to whether or not we may get into that system, that very discredited system, of having men employed by government officials or by government organizations acting in the capacity of what the French call agents provocateurs, men who feel that there are weak persons in a community who, although having no intention of committing a criminal breach of a law, if approached and subjected to the suggestion that it might be to their advantage to become criminals, to that extent would lend themselves to such a suggestion in the hope that they might profit by it.

A number at least of those persons to whom the hon. member for New Westminster has referred are apparently persons who have been approached in that manner. Quite a number of years ago this particular question was discussed in a number of leading cases in England. The late Mr. Justice Armour, son of the great Chief Justice Armour, who unhappily died just about a year ago, made a collection of cases which in the last few moments I have tried to obtain from the library, but upon which so far I have not been able to place my hands. The sum total of what was investigated and considered in the highest courts of the British empire was this, that if you know a man is planning to commit a breach of a criminal law there is nothing wrong in, shall I say, leading him on to commit that offence which in any event he intends to commit. You may put him legitimately in such a position whereby whilst in the commission of the offence he may be taken in flagrante delicto and made to pay the full penalty for what he has done.

How different that is from going to a man who is known to have poor resistance, perhaps almost of weak mentality, but for whatever reason at all events is exposed to a maximum of temptation with a minimum of resistance, and inducing him to commit a crime he never contemplated, one which found its being in the mind of a police officer who has found this man an easy subject and who has said to himself, "If I can induce that man to commit the crime I will profit by promotion, or otherwise, and thereby increase my personal advantage."

It seems to me the great point to be considered whether it be in connection with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the provincial police, the municipal police or any other police body is that this parliament shall not only not tolerate but shall look with abhorrence upon the act of any person who conducts himself in that way, with an idea of inducing a man to commit a crime in order that a certain police officer may profit by so inducing the man, and then arresting him and making him pay the penalty. If I follow correctly the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster at least three or four of the incidents he related to the committee were as I have indicated. If they were, no condemnation could be too strong for them. If they were, no steps that this parliament could take would be too drastic to put an end to that sort of thing. If the hon. member has suggested to the committee that that has been the animating motive behind the mounted police who have operated in British Columbia, then I suggest that all other possibilities of investigation into police activities which have been mentioned pale beside the necessity for an investigation of this evil.

It has been stated over an over again, and unhappily I am forced to believe it, that the mounted police in Canada have at times been employed in approaching unfortunate drug addicts who, with their craving for morphia or heroin have been unable to resist the suggestion that they should obtain it by any means in their power. The police have egged them on to take the drug and then have made arrests, sending those people to prison. I would like to think this is not so, but the suggestions that such things have happened are very strong, very positive and have been repeated many times. I am glad to note that the government has seen fit to allow an investigation into the activities of that body, and I hope when that investigation takes place this particular branch will not be neglected. I hope that the canker worm that has apparently crept into the activities of that body in British Columbia will be found on investigation not to have extended to other provinces. But may I suggest to the hon. Minister of Justice, who is ever alert to stop abuses and to protect the rights of those who are affected by them that he can serve no more useful purpose than in determining in any investigation that may be undertaken in the near future whether or not those abuses of which my hon. friend from New Westminster has spoken have travelled, so to speak, under the surface of the ground into other provinces as well. I think the hon. member for New Westminster is to be commended for bringing a matter of this kind to the notice of the house, and I only hope that the department of which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is the honoured head will see that any investigation to be undertaken shall be thorough and comprehensive, that these abuses shall exist nowhere else.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) is ready to act as investigator with the same solemnity as he spoke just now, may I urge his appointment upon the minister?

Mr. BOUCHARD: Mr. Chairman, fortunately I represent a constituency where the police force have very little to do. We settle our cases among ourselves, and I have no complaint against the mounted police. On the contrary, every time I have come in contact with them I have been very pleased with the courtesy they have shown me. I would be the last one in this house to raise any prejudice or any cry of race or language or anything of that kind, but I should like to refer to the celebration that took place in Gaspé last year of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of Canada. I heard quite a number of remarks about the inability of the mounted police who were there to answer in French questions that were put to them for information. I suppose that in this able body there are a number of French-speaking officers. I have no objection whatever to the high officials of the mounted police, who of course have not very much to do with the French-speaking population, being English-speaking, but on an occasion such as that at Gaspé last year it seems to me that it should have been foreseen that we would have a very distinguished gathering from France, and in fact, Mr. Chairman, it was perhaps one of the most distinguished delegations that has ever visited this continent from France. These people came to that celebration with the idea of meeting on the spot French-speaking people and French-speaking officers, but the impression that was created upon them was the contrary of what one might have expected. I say that not in any spirit of complaint because I know that the festivities were organized in somewhat of a hurry, and I do appreciate very much the good order that was established within a few days in the nice little city of Gaspé, but I think that when a celebration like that takes place in the future a little consideration should be given to the aspect of the question that I have mentioned. As I said at the outset, it is with a little reluctance that I bring this matter up here at all, but it is from a sincere desire to avoid in the future remarks such as I heard on that occasion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am very glad that the matter has been called to my attention because the occasion to which my hon. friend refers was a rather special one. At the request of the committee in charge of the celebration, and also at the request of the department of the attorney general of the province of Quebec, a special detachment was sent to the province for that particular occasion. The only detachment that was available was in Ottawa, and of the number sent from here there were five French-speaking out of the twenty-five, and that was all they could afford to send. There are about seventy-five French members of the force in Quebec, some of whom were engaged on their regular duties, but as many of them as possible were stationed where the celebrations took place. The additional force sent comprised about twenty-five officers and men, and they came from the reserve at Ottawa.

Mr. BRADETTE: May I ask the minister if the so-called communist schools are authorized in Canada. There have been several newspaper articles which I do not intend to read to the house, in both the English and the French press, stating definitely that there are communist schools in different sections of the country. I believe I am right in saying that there is one in Montreal and another in the Porcupine section, and one outside the city of Toronto, which has often been mentioned in newspapers. These schools so far as their literature is concerned are absolutely for the abolition of the established order of things in this country. They are trying their utmost to destroy labour unions, industry, and the present system of government. Has the minister received any information from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as to the activities of these schools, and are these schools authorized by the government?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would have to refer my hon. friend to the minister of education in Toronto to find out whether they are authorized or not because education, of course, in the schools comes exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. Personally I do not think they are authorized but I would not like to make a definite statement on the question because the matter would be entirely under the authority of the province.

Mr. HOWDEN: Just for information I would ask the minister if this item is by way of insurance or if it is a fund from which indemnities are paid to members of the force who are injured.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is a fund in the nature of an insurance fund from which a man who becomes injured is entitled to compensation.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does a man have to contribute to this fund?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, there is no contribution by the men.

Mr. POULIOT: If on looking over the newspapers and other publications in this country I find some communist propaganda, does the minister think it would be the right thing for me to send it to the commissioner or to himself?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I know the commissioner receives a great deal of questionable literature published in magazines and newspapers. A great deal of it is sent direct to me, and I at once refer it to the commissioner. There is a great deal of it published in Canada, I must admit.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I shall find it my duty to send to the hon. gentleman a complete edition of all the speeches made by the Prime Minister in January and February last.

Item agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Welland ship canal—To provide for settlement of claims, totalling $126,696.09, of Collingwood Shipyards Limited, in connection with contract No. 27896, entered into December 23, 1929, for the construction of a pontoon gate lifter, $16,426.06.

Mr. POULIOT: Do foreign ships going through that canal pay any toll?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): No; there are no charges on any ships going through the canal.

Mr. POULIOT: There should be a tax on these ships, and I make that suggestion to the government; it has already been made. There is no reason why foreign ships passing through Canadian canals should not pay a tax. This is a humble suggestion I offer the government. The hon. gentleman complains that he gets no suggestions from this side. This is one. We have to bear the whole burden of taxation, and I think that ships of foreign registration, enjoying the same facilities as ships registered in Canada, should be taxed.

Mr. MANION: There is no doubt that the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman has been considered from time to time. Last year we had a lengthy debate in the house on this very question; in fact, the whole question of tolls on canals was debated on the motion, if I remember rightly, of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon). Unfortunately it was found—and I looked into the question thoroughly at that time—that the practice of levying tolls, up to about 1904, had not been a paying proposition. As regards charging a toll on foreign vessels alone, the question has been looked into from the standpoint of treaty rights, international obligations and so on, and it has been found that we cannot charge tolls on foreign vessels without also levying them on Canadian ships, owing to international agreements which Canada has with other countries. I cannot give the details at the moment, but that is the fact. Even when tolls were charged, about thirty years ago, the income was so small that it was not of sufficient importance to warrant charging them, and it had the effect at that time, as it would have again, of diverting a great deal of traffic down through the Erie canal and New York instead of through Montreal and Canadian ports. I am sure the hon. gentleman makes the suggestion in good faith, but we have looked into the matter thoroughly, as have past governments, and it was considered by past governments as well as by this administration that the proposal is not feasible.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are five or six items to provide for settlement of claims in connection with contracts dating back some years ago. How were these settlements reached? Were these contracts the subject of litigation, or were there arbitrations?

Mr. MANION: There are altogether seven or eight claims and we are now dealing with the last one. These companies received construction contracts during the past twenty years in connection with the Welland ship canal, and I believe that most of them were given by the late government or the one that preceded it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Most of them by the last government.

Mr. MANION: Yes; I merely mention that as a matter of fact. These contracts were for huge amounts. The first item, No. 84, concerns a contract with the J. P. Porter Company. That contract was for $11,376,000, and I think it goes back to about 1924 or 1925. It was for a substantial amount of work on the Welland ship canal in accordance with unit prices, and when we came in we simply carried on the contracts. I do not think there were any changes of importance. When the Porter company had completed their work—and this applies to all these settlements—they put in claims for extras amounting to a little over $571,000. These claims were later revised, being reduced to $384,000; and after a discussion with the engineers, going into each case very completely, I came to the decisions which are indicated here. The original claim of $571,000 in the case of the Porter company was cut down to a final settlement of $110,000, though the amount shown here is not $110,000 but $89,000 odd, the difference consisting in settlements which could be made in connection with unit work or something of that sort. It was considered that in this, as in the other instances, the company had an equitable claim to the amount decided upon, representing the difference between the legal claim and the other. Without naming the other companies, it might be interesting to give the amounts of the original claim in each instance together with the final settlement. There is a claim for $250,000, settled for $9,800; a claim for $828,000 settled for $40,000; a claim for $63,000, settled for $18,000; a claim for $393,000, settled for $50,000; a claim for $126,000—not quite $127,000—settled for $20,000; a claim for $1,288, settled for $939. The last one, with which I had nothing to do, was settled by the officers themselves. It was for $3,000 and was settled for $1,500. So that the settlements were exceedingly satisfactory; in fact, I do not mind saying that most of the companies made strong complaints.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does this complete the construction cost of the Welland canal or are there still some items outstanding?

Mr. MANION: We have a small amount for the Robertson company—No. 87—and they have not settled. The Robertson company have put in a claim for $393,000 altogether and our item is $37,000 odd. When we were making the settlements, being anxious to dispose of all of them, we found that the manager or president, or whoever the responsible official of the company was, was not in the country. The official who the company felt should deal with the matter for them was in Europe and therefore did not discuss it with the engineers. Therefore that is not a settlement, but we have put in a figure that covers what we consider is their legal claim. Most of them are settled except in the case of a couple of companies, one being the Peter Lyall Company about which my hon. friends opposite know something and the ex-Minister of Railways would know a good deal. They make a rather heavy claim in regard to some alterations in labour prices. The contracts stated that they were awarded on the basis of certain labour prices and the Labour department of the former government raised the wages. The Peter Lyall people have put in a claim amounting to something like half a million dollars; I am speaking again from memory. This was submitted to Mr. Justice Maclean, not as a regular case but for his opinion. He gave a sort of umpire's decision rather favourable to the Lyall people, but the matter has not yet been settled, and it has not been included in any of the settlements here. Outside the Lyall claim and some others that might be contingent upon a settlement of the Lyall claim on the same grounds, I believe most of the claims have been settled. By the way the total cost of the Welland ship canal is in round figures $130,000,000; I thought somebody might ask for it.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is up to date?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. REID: For how long are the international agreements? Those are the agreements signed whereby ships from the United States and other foreign countries can go through the canal free.

Mr. MANION: I should have said international trade treaties; they are full treaties. Perhaps I used the word "agreement" wrongly. They are treaties between Canada and such countries as for instance Holland. I remember that the ships of Holland were drawn to my attention as those upon which tolls should be paid. In looking into the matter I found that the number of vessels coming from foreign countries apart from the United States were so few that the tolls would not amount to anything substantial. Our canals to-day will permit vessels only 250 feet in length to traverse them, except the Welland ship canal which is built midway between the others so that it was rather an unwise piece of building without extending the depth and length of all the other canals in unison with it. But it was begun some twenty-two years ago and it has been carried on by every government since that time, with the exception of a short period during the war, so that it was practically a continuous affair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was a continuing sin.

Item agreed to.

Railways and Canals—Chargeable to income—canals—improvements, $518,820.

Mr. REID: Representations are now being made by many railway employees and the question they are asking is: Will all railway employees come under the eight hour day? Will that be in force so far as the railways are concerned? I have had quite a few communications within the past few days and I thought I would draw the matter to the attention of the minister.

Mr. MANION: That does not come under the estimates of my department, but I have no objection to answering my hon. friend's question so far as I can. Perhaps he will remember that when the eight hour day bill was before the House of Commons, it was piloted through the house by the Minister of Labour. At that time the railway managements and the railway unions waited upon the Minister of Labour and some of the other ministers concerned; I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce was present with the Minister of Labour. They submitted to the ministers concerned, the Minister of Labour in particular, that they had come to some sort of understanding whereby the eight hour day would not apply to railway employees until a year had elapsed. If I remember aright—and I am speaking subject to correction—when the bill was before the house an amendment to that effect was adopted. The bill is now before the other chamber, and I have heard complaints from unemployed railroad men—and my hon. friend no doubt has also heard them—arguing that the eight hour day should come into force forthwith on all railroads. However that matter is subject to the decision of the other chamber and also to what is done with the bill when it returns to this house. That is the situation to-day so far as I remember and understand.

Mr. CAMPBELL: There is a large increase in this item. Would the minister explain it?

Mr. MANION: There are a number of large items. For example, I will give a couple of them. On the Rideau canal close to the city of Ottawa there is at Hog's Back a dam and a lock which are exceedingly old. I believe the old lock and dam were built a hundred years ago when the Rideau canal was constructed. These have now got into such a condition that they must be rebuilt, and $143,000 of the increase is for that.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Let it be "damned" again!

Mr. MANION: Yes; there are many who think the whole Rideau canal might be damned. But there are a great many people who use it for pleasure craft and since it has been in use for a hundred years, I hope we will be able to continue it as we have. My engineer reminds me that I have now the tourist travel bureau under my jurisdiction, and therefore being an advocate of the tourist business, I hope to see the canal continue.

Mr. COOTE: As regards the canal at Hog's Back, is it the duty of the government to maintain those bridges? If so, would they not consider putting in a wider bridge?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They might straighten them too.

Mr. COOTE: At the present time there are one or two of those bridges over which only one car can pass at a time; it is one-way traffic; the traffic has to go one way for a while and then the cars going the other way have a chance to cross. This causes great congestion at certain times. Surely the government could afford to put a little wider bridge there.

Mr. MANION: The bridge is being widened to twenty feet. A hundred years ago when it was built, there was not quite so much automobile traffic as there is to-day. A foot bridge is also being constructed and the bridge is being straightened so that my hon. friend's suggestion is being carried out.

Mr. MUNN: How are they getting along with the Trent canal? Are there any capital expenditures on that?

Mr. MANION: There are no capital expenditures, but there is some expenditure. For example there are repairs such as dredging, drilling, blasting at Bobcaygeon. There is replacement of the swing bridge opposite lock 19 at Peterborough. That is being done in association with the provincial government. It is costing $40,000 and we are contributing $25,000. There are a number of other items. There is no capital expenditure in a sense, although there is expenditure amounting altogether to $142,800 on the Trent canal.

Mr. MUNN: Could the minister without too much trouble tell the committee what the yearly expenditures and receipts are?

Mr. MANION: The receipts outside electrical contract receipts are nil. I mean we have no toll charges on the Trent canal any more than we have on the other ones. But we get about $90,000 from electrical contracts in connection with water powers on the Trent canal.

Mr. MUNN: What are the annual expenditures?

Mr. MANION: They run at the present time less than they used to because there was more money spent upon it in various buildings of one kind or another, but for the last few years the annual expenditure has averaged, including operation and maintenance, about $200,000.

Mr. MULOCK: Is that contract for $90,000 still in effect and, if so, how long has it to run?

Mr. MANION: Which contract?

Mr. MULOCK: The one under which the government gets $90,000 a year.

Mr. MANION: That is not an individual contract; there are a number of electrical leases that bring in a total of $90,000. There are very many of them and some are with the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission.

Mr. DONNELLY: How many tons of freight go through the Trent canal?

Mr. MANION: Very few. It is practically altogether used for tourist and pleasure boats. There is a slight quantity of freight, but it is very little.

Item agreed to.

Board of railway commissioners: maintenance and operation, $228,648.

Mr. BRADETTE: Under this item perhaps I may bring to the attention of the committee a grievance of our section of the country that has existed for some years, namely the disuse of the national transcontinental from Quebec to Winnipeg. I listened very attentively some days ago to an hon. member from British Columbia urging preferential freight rates to the Pacific coast. But the same arguments apply more forcibly to that section of the Canadian National line from Quebec to Winnipeg. I brought this matter before the house when I was sitting on the government side and on several occasions since. So far not only have we not had these complaints remedied by the present government or the board of railway commissioners, but services have been further curtailed. Through passenger service is nil. In the spring of 1931, after this present government took office, there was curtailment of the passenger service so well given by trains Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4, and to-day the Canadian National has entirely lost all that traffic in that section. And since 1929 we have not had any through freight service. This line is really the missing link as far as the national railways are concerned. I make this appeal to the committee for the very good reason that it is useless to make it to the railway commission; we have tried that in the past, so the last court to which we can appeal is this committee and the Minister of Railways. I appreciate the statement made by the minister a few days ago that he is not in favour of amalgamation, but so far as the national transcontinental in our section is concerned there has been a thorough process of elimination. Within a few years the rails will be rusted and the line useless on account of absence of traffic which that road is absolutely entitled to have.

I do not think this is the time or place to review the past history of that part of our railway system, but every hon. member is familiar with the fact that there are no better grades on any railway in this country. More than that, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced the legislation to provide for the national transcontinental on July 30, 1903, speaking of the link covering the northern section of Ontario and Quebec he used these words:

> This new railway will be another link in that chain of union. It will not only open territory hitherto idle and unprofitable, it will not only force Canadian trade into Canadian channels, it will not only promote citizenship between old Canada and new Canada, but it will secure us our commercial independence, and will forever make us free from the bondage of the bonding privilege.

I well remember only a few years ago commending the present minister when he severely criticized the condition under which our grain was finding its way to American seaports for export. Although this is not the case in such large volume now, because we do not export so much grain, nevertheless the fact remains that a large quantity of all grains is still finding its way to the ports of the United States, while at the same time we have one of the finest sections of the Canadian National system absolutely idle. More than that, I believe that the present government is responsible for a certain amount of prejudice against our section. Only a few weeks ago I was reading an editorial in an Ottawa paper in which the question was asked, Why use that section of railway, passing through a country that produces only Christmas trees? Let me remind the committee that the northern sections of Ontario and Quebec are among the very richest in our country. I should like to see some of those writers try to cut down some of these small "Christmas trees." We have in my riding alone three great newsprint mills, at Iroquois Falls, Smooth Rock Falls and Kapuskasing.

It takes more than Christmas trees to keep them going. When by the national transcontinental that section of the country was opened up we made a great capital investment. I am sure that no section of our population begrudged the building of that railway. But a certain amount of prejudice has been fastened on our section on account of the attitude of the present government. We fervently hope and expect that the passenger service on the national transcontinental will be reestablished. I am not a railway man but I am told by people well versed in the matter that as far as that line is concerned, through the discontinuance of the service since 1931 by the national trains from Quebec to Winnipeg, they have practically lost all the through passenger traffic that they had. Furthermore I am positive that they have lost all the through passenger traffic going west from our own section of the country, because the people resent the fact that that service has been cut off, and when people from Cochrane and Kapuskasing and neighbouring towns want to go west they have to go a roundabout way. I believe the statement cannot be contradicted that as far as our section of the country is concerned all the passenger traffic has been lost to the Canadian Pacific. If that is cooperation it is not the kind we believe in. We fully realize that there is a railway problem, and that problem is too great to be dealt with on party lines. We fully realize that every hon. member must give that question his most careful and intelligent consideration. But I maintain that as far as the national transcontinental is concerned it never came into its own, it never got a chance. From the time it was built to the present day the rates have been discriminatory. For instance when the road was completed in 1916 it was able to quote a rate of six cents per bushel on wheat from Armstrong, a station in the Thunder Bay district almost due north of Fort William and Port Arthur, to Quebec city, a distance of 959 miles. Then something very mysterious happened. After it was shown by actual test that grain or cattle could be hauled more economically on that section of the road than on any other section, discriminatory rates were instituted against us; as a matter of fact the rates proved to be not only discriminatory but practically prohibitive, and as a result the expected volume of traffic did not develop and has not developed since. In 1931 the Quebec harbour commission made representations to the board of railway commissioners complaining about the rate of 20·7 cents per bushel from Armstrong to Quebec. An investigation was held by the board in Quebec city, with the late Hon. Frank Carvell presiding, and during that hearing there were certainly some very extraordinary arguments advanced. Here is the verbatim comment of Mr. Carvell:

> If my conception of the national transcontinental was right, when it was started and when it was being built, I think freight can be transported over that line at a figure which would mean the absolute ruination of other railways in Canada. If not, we were all wrong and we were not justified in building it.

So it seems a very strange anomaly indeed, in these times of the new deal, that we do not take the line of least resistance and that the railway commission do not find it possible to have all our grain routed over that section of the road, at least during the winter months, since at the present time that line is being used only for local traffic.

It is not my intention to take up very much of the time of the house; I believe the people throughout the country are fully seized of the problem. This also hurts the maritimes. There are many members on both sides of the house coming from the maritime provinces who have deplored the fact that the harbours of Saint John and Halifax have not received their proper quota of through traffic. That is due to the fact that millions of bushels of wheat have been shipped through United States ports each year. This year I asked a question of the Department of Trade and Commerce with regard to these exportations, and I should like to give the committee the figures I obtained. The amount of grain of all kinds exported through the United States ports of Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore was as follows:

	Bushels
1928-29	111,840,365
1929-30	58,171,852
1930-31	75,793,150
1932-33	30,346,839

Those are the latest statistics I have been able to obtain. No doubt the decrease in the amount of grain exported through those ports is due to the fact that our exports of grain in general have not been as great for some years past. I maintain that every bushel of that grain should have been carried over our Canadian railways, because if my information is correct this grain was all shipped during the winter months, when our railways and our water transportation systems on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence have not been carrying on that business. In this way our section of the country, together with the maritime provinces, have been cheated out of a great deal of revenue. If the eleven cent rate to Quebec were effective, immediately it would create a maximum rate on the great lakes. I do not know why these discriminatory rates in our section have been maintained during the winter months; I could understand it more easily if they were even seasonal rates. We in the north are fair enough to realize that railway transportation from the west to the maritimes could not compete with water transportation, but we maintain that at least during the winter months all grain hauled should go over that section of the railway.

Grain is not the only commodity that can be moved more expeditiously over that line. A few years ago a trial shipment of 600 steers was sent over that railway, and the running time of the train between Winnipeg and Quebec was eighteen hours less than the running time from Winnipeg to Montreal. Two feedings were sufficient where three were required in the other case, and this, together with a smaller shrinkage in the shipment, represented a saving of not less than $5 per head or of roughly $3,000 on the consignment. But that experiment was conducted only once; we have never had any other through traffic in cattle, though I do not know why.

It has been stated in my section of the country, as well as in northern Quebec, the city of Quebec and the maritime provinces, that the Canadian National have not been given a fair chance. I do not believe there is proper cooperation between the two railways. I absolutely agree with the minister when he says we cannot have amalgamation, but it is a good thing to have this question before the public at the present time. I would remind the government that there has been almost a united effort on the part of some hon. members opposite to suggest that the Canadian National system is not an asset to the country, but that it is such a load that it would be a wonderful thing if it could be given away or sold for five dollars. This is not good for the country or for the railway system. A few moments ago we passed estimates amounting to several millions of dollars in connection with the Welland canal, and the minister mentioned a large sum that was to be spent on the Rideau canal. In the last few years we have also made other capital investments such as the railway to Churchill and the terminal there. These are not paying propositions, but I am sure no hon. member would suggest that they should not have been built. So I am sure no member of parliament, no matter on what side of the house he sits, would suggest that the transcontinental line should not have been built. If he knows the development that has taken place in that section of the country, which has proved so beneficial to the whole of Canada, he would realize that these expenditures were fully warranted. In my own section of the country through the gold tax alone the federal government have collected something over $4,000,000. That is only one item, and it shows the potential assets, some of which have been developed, in that section of the country.

The house should be fully seized of the necessity of maintaining the integrity of the road. I realize that it would be impossible for the minister to say that the Canadian Northern system should be destroyed. Everyone knows that with the scattered population strung along that section of the road such a declaration would arouse horror in every section of the country. But if there is a section of the system which should be abolished it is that section instead of the transcontinental, for the very good reason that the transcontinental travels through the famous clay belt of northern Quebec and northern Ontario, while the Canadian Northern is in between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. In our section we maintain that because of the policy that has been followed in connection with the transcontinental we have lost the traffic to which we were entitled.

I have mentioned these facts because I wish to make a very sincere appeal to the minister that he use his influence with the railway commission to have the situation remedied. The commission is not a political body; in our section of the country when we deal with these matters, particularly railway matters, we always keep out of the realm of politics. I hope I may receive the support of hon. members from northern Quebec and northern Ontario, because I think we all realize that instead of being an asset to that section of the country the transcontinental has become a liability because it has not received the consideration it deserves. I am not going to give any further statistics at the present time; I need only say that the rates on grain and cattle are nearly double the rates on other sections of the line. Is that fair to the Canadian National railways as a whole? Is that fair to northern Ontario and northern Quebec? Is it fair to the maritime provinces? I will say it is not. It is not giving a chance to that system in connection with the building of which the founders were looking to the future. This traffic has been taken from our section of the country and we are not receiving the just treatment we might expect. We have no direct communication; we are nearly 300 miles northwest of North Bay and have no direct communication with Winnipeg or the western provinces. While we have the very best roadbed on the North American continent, no use is made of it. The province of Quebec, the city of Quebec and the maritime provinces have not ready access, so far as railway facilities are concerned, because they have to go in a roundabout way.

Before concluding my remarks may I make a last appeal to the Minister of Railways. He has resided in northern Ontario and I believe he knows as well as I do the conditions obtaining in that section of the country. He knows that the Canadian National railways have not been treated fairly so far as passenger service to that part of the country is concerned. He knows, too, that ninety-five per cent of the passenger service in northern Ontario is lost to the Canadian National Railways, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway has benefited. The people in my section of the country have no quarrel with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

We know it is a national institution and has rendered service to the country, but surely the railway commission and the Minister of Railways should see to it that our railway service is linked up.

Mr. MANION: I know the hon. member has made what he considers to be a sincere appeal. Usually he is eminently fair, but on this occasion, particularly in regard to the last few sentences, of his observations, I do not think he has been quite fair. For instance, he indicated that the cutting off of passenger traffic on the northern lines of the Canadian National railways was quite unfair to those railways, and stated in so many words that such action favoured the Canadian Pacific Railway. If any unfairness exists so far as the Canadian National railways are concerned, the hon. member must know, as I do, that it has been brought about by their own management, because neither the Minister of Railways of this government nor that of the late government, no matter what the faults of that government may have been, have had anything to do with the actual operation of the railways. I have no control over the train schedules, because ministers of railways are not consulted on those matters. The railway managements, whether they be of the Canadian National or of the Canadian Pacific, handle their own train arrangements. Therefore I submit if any unfairness has been the result it is the fault of the management. I would not agree that the management would be so foolish as to permit themselves to be unfair to themselves—because that is what the hon. member has suggested in his declaration that the conditions obtaining are unfair to the national system. It is an old cry, and I do not think the hon. member is quite fair to himself when he repeats it because the management of the national railways have been handling the road exceedingly well. Were I to show the hon. member a statement of the earnings for the first six weeks of this year or for the whole of last year he would see that the Canadian National Railways is earning in the present year and in the past year did earn considerably greater revenue than the Canadian Pacific Railway did.

I think the Canadian National Railways management are eminently fair to themselves, and no doubt their only reason for taking trains off the northern route was that they do not feel such trains were justified by the earnings. Naturally the management must eliminate services which do not give a reasonable return of revenue. Only last week I visited my own constituency, and as the Canadian National Railways have no direct train running from Ottawa to Fort William as a matter of convenience I travelled via the Canadian Pacific; I really had no choice in the matter. I went up on train No. 1 and came back on No. 2, trains which used to carry through Pullmans and dining cars but which because of scarcity of traffic through northwestern Ontario do not now provide those facilities on the trains in question. The Canadian Pacific Railway have eliminated many of their trains for the same reason as have the Canadian National Railways.

I do not wish to enter into any lengthy discussion of the railway situation, and for that reason will deal with only one or two further points raised by the hon. member. He has stated that the national railways have not been fair to the northern country, and in an effort to substantiate his arguments he quoted some journals or newspapers which had made certain statements. Surely the hon. member would not suggest that the Department of Railways and Canals must be responsible for everything appearing in a newspaper. Those journals are not our mouthpiece; so far as possible we endeavour to speak for ourselves. He must not forget that traffic on the Canadian National railways in 1933 was less than half of the amount in 1928, the peak year. My memory indicates that in 1928 the gross revenues of the Canadian National railways were about $300,000,000, while in 1933 they were only about $148,000,000, or a little less than half. Naturally the same service cannot be given when earnings have been cut in half.

The hon. member made reference to wheat and other traffic which he thought should come down via the northern route. A few moments ago he was kind enough to state that I am from northern Ontario. May I say I am very proud of it, and in my heart I have a strong affection for that particular section of Canada. In area it is huge; in fact without consulting a map one hardly realizes that the northern portion of Ontario is more than five times the area of the more thickly populated southern section of the province. Unfortunately, however, the population in the greater area is small, and for that reason the passenger revenues from that part of Ontario cannot be heavy. Therefore the hon. member must understand that from the standpoint of passenger traffic there is no justification for heavy or regular passenger services. When the hon. member indicates that wheat and other commodities are not shipped via the northern route may I point out that practically no wheat comes east by rail from Winnipeg. An odd car may be sent by rail because of some emergency, but practically all the grain which comes east from Winnipeg goes first to the head of the lakes and then comes down by water to the Georgian bay ports and Port Colborne, or through to Montreal. When it is shipped from the port of New York it goes via Buffalo. I would say however that the vast majority, probably 99$\frac{9}{10}$ per cent of all the grain coming east, comes by water simply because the rail rates are about ten times as high as the water rates. I have given the round figure, but I believe I am approximately correct. Obviously there would be no justification for any person shipping by rail when he can ship at one-tenth the cost by water.

There is no hope in the world of my hon. friend's section of the transcontinental line carrying grain to any large extent when in fact that same grain could be shipped at a much lower rate by water. Probably I should modify my general statement to the effect that the rate is ten times as high by rail as by water, because I remember that at one time a special rate became effective from the head of the lakes or from Winnipeg to the city of Quebec. I believe the rate of eleven cents was given, a very low rate, from the city of Fort William to the city of Quebec. However, even that exceedingly low rate did not attract grain traffic to the railways, because the rate by lake and rail, if I remember correctly the figures I gave the other night, from the head of the lakes to Montreal averaged 3·79 during the 1933 season of navigation. Obviously no person would pay eleven cents from Fort William to Quebec if he could ship it from Fort William to Montreal for 3·79 cents. To attempt to carry on a grain traffic by the Canadian National railways or any other railways when that grain could be shipped more cheaply by water would be as hopeless as trying to push water up hill with a sieve.

Mr. BRADETTE: How would the minister handle the millions of bushels which in every year find their way to the American seaports for exportation?

Mr. MANION: Practically every bushel of the grain which goes via the American seaports comes from the head of the lakes to Buffalo by water. From Buffalo it goes on via the Erie canal. Sometimes it leaves Buffalo by rail, but never reaches that city by rail, because it could not be handled profitably by rail. The fact is that it goes from the head of the lakes to Buffalo by water, and possibly for the short haul from Buffalo to New York some of it may go by rail, just as our grain coming east in the summer comes by water from Fort William to Georgian bay ports, and then by rail east, and occasionally it goes as far as Saint John and Halifax by rail, which is a fairly long haul. But practically no grain ever goes from the west to Montreal or Quebec or to New York by rail. It goes principally by water, except perhaps an occasional car for some emergent need. Members who understand the grain trade, my hon. friend, for instance, from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) I am sure will not find any fault with my general statement that practically every bushel goes by lake and rail.

Mr. MYERS: I do not like to be complaining, and I know this is a very hard time to ask for railway improvements, but I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that our people in Prince Edward Island and those who come to our province complain very much about the service between Sackville and cape Tormentine. We are not complaining at all about the service to Sackville or in fact about the services on the island, because they are fairly good, but there is a short line from Sackville to Tormentine that is not up to the standard of the rest of the railway. That is the gateway of our province, yet the roadbed is not as good as on other sections of the road, and the passenger cars that are used on this section of the line are not in keeping with the traffic that is carried. Just a few days ago the maritime boards of trade met in Saint John, New Brunswick. A representative from our province attended the meeting and he had no trouble at all in getting a resolution passed drawing the attention of the railway authorities to the fact that the equipment and service was inadequate and needs improvement. I am taking this opportunity of bringing the matter to the minister's attention and I hope that he will take it up with the management.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend now draws my attention to this matter publicly, but I may say that he has taken it up a number of times privately with me before. But again I must make the same reply that I did to my hon. friend opposite, and that is the reply which the railway management give me. My hon. friend complained that the passenger service was not sufficient for the people in Prince Edward Island and I did take that matter up, at my hon. friend's request, with the management. From what I hear the passenger service could be very much improved, but the railway give the same reply that I had to give to my hon.

friend from northern Ontario, that there is not sufficient traffic to justify a better service than is now being given. However, I shall very gladly draw to the attention of the management the statements which my hon. friend from Queens (Mr. Myers) and my hon. friend opposite have made in regard to these services, and submit to the management that they give further consideration to the whole question. But I cannot guarantee anything for either one of them. I may say frankly that with an election coming on in the near future, if I had the power I would gladly give them both everything they ask, until after the election anyway—I am quite honest—but I have not the power. But I will submit the matter to the management.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do you call that honest?

Item agreed to.

Railways and Canals—Miscellaneous services, $46,000.

Mr. HOWDEN: There is a matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. I doubt very much if I can finish before the dinner recess but I will begin. It concerns a number of engine men in the constituency of St. Boniface and in some of the Winnipegs, and it is really a very important matter. The minister is quite familiar with it, I am sure, as he has received a good many communications from one person or another, but still there seems to be no means of remedying this festering sore, and the present situation is certainly very unfair to a considerable number of engine men in that terminus.

The facts are these. When the roads that form the Canadian National Railways were amalgamated, so far as Winnipeg is concerned, there were three roads that entered into the amalgamation. There was the old Canadian Northern railway, the terminus of which was in Fort Rouge, a portion of the city of Winnipeg. There was the Canadian government railway running east from Transcona, and there was the Grand Trunk Pacific running west from Transcona. The old Canadian Northern railway engines that were being used at that time were the old fashioned smaller type, hauling only about one-third of the tonnage that the large engines could haul that were being used on the two roads running east and west out of the town of Transcona.

It was found after the roads were amalgamated that a great deal of the traffic was routed east over the former Canadian government lines and that the engineers of the Canadian Northern were getting very little to do. This condition was aggravated by the fact that that road was in very, very bad condition, and in order to bring it into running shape after the amalgamation of the roads, some fifty crews were put to work on the Canadian Northern railway, which already had very many more engine men working than either the Canadian government road or the Grand Trunk Pacific. There was an agitation set on foot by the engine men of the Canadian Northern portion of the road for equalization or for priority rights with regard to running. I believe it was in 1926 that the matter was taken up through their grand lodge in Cleveland. I have grown a little rusty on the matter but my memory is that committees were appointed by both the engineers and the firemen and that the committees included the presidents and six vice presidents of the labour organizations.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto) moved the second reading of Bill No. 50, to amend the Post Office Act (newspaper ownership).

He said: I would not make any remarks on the motion for the second reading of this bill, the passage of which would mean so much to good government in this country, were it not that forty-two per cent of the members of parliament were not in the house when it was brought up. This is the same bill that was passed several years ago by this parliament, agreed to unanimously in the interests of the real freedom of the press. At that time the bill went over to the senate but was rejected. It has been the law of England and of the United States as well for many years.

The war wrought a great change in the democratic conception of education, and we find that the press has been the leader in every phase of life; in fact, I do not know how we should have got along without the press during the last few years of depression. Now what I want to point out is that in every other department of our activities, whether it be personal estate or real estate, bills of sale, chattel mortgages, wills, municipal assessment for real estate, anyone can go to the assessment office or to the municipality and ascertain the facts. Why therefore should we throw a cloak of secrecy around the identity of any newspaper? Everyone knows who the members of the House of Commons are, who the senators are and who the governor general is. Everyone can find out who the directors of all incorporated companies are, whether federal or provincial, because all this information has to be registered. There have to be elaborate statements with affidavits regarding the financial affairs of every corporation. But the income tax dodgers and the newspapers whose identity is not disclosed operate under cover.

There never was a time in the history of the country when it was so imperative as it is to-day that we should know the identity of every newspaper, when we consider the agitation that is going on throughout the country, among certain people, for the amalgamation of the railways and union government; when we consider the fact that the natural resources of the country have been given away to favourites; and when we consider the new deal which has been introduced into this parliament and which, since the opening of this session, the three parties have supported.

Take the investigation by the mass buying commission; that most important subject is related to the proposal put forward in this bill. At the basis of all corruption in this country, since confederation, we find a section of the press which has set itself above this parliament and above the law of the land, large mergers and combines in restraint of trade having operated to control that section of the press. Mr. Stanley Baldwin stated the other day that reform, legal, constitutional and parliamentary, transcended any other problem in importance. We admire the British press and we admire the Canadian press to-day; on the whole it is a splendid institution, and I have no criticism to make of it. I submit however that we shall have to do something to secure for the workers and the people of the country generally what Theodore Roosevelt tried to do years ago for the American people, namely, to give them a square deal, and the "new freedom" which Woodrow Wilson proposed to give them. So that in the interests of improved social, political and economic conditions it is desirable that we should know who they are that control the press. In some of the cities of this country we find two rival newspapers published in the same building and by the same publisher, one Liberal and one Conservative, and no one knows the identity of either paper or whether some of the editorials are paid for or not. In Canada to-day, as in Britain, all questions of public concern, whether political, economic, constitutional, social, religious or personal are discussed in the press quite freely, without fear or favour or any danger of criminal prosecution—a condition far different from that which existed in England in the eighteenth century when Wilkes was prosecuted. Except for abnormal circumstances, the press can publish anything, good, bad or indifferent, affecting any government or individual. The press is so much a part of the British constitution that we are apt to forget the part it played in securing the benefits we enjoy to-day in connection with our free schools, factory legislation and other important measures of social reform. It has been the standard bearer of freedom. Canada cannot get along without an unfettered press, and a free press is of inestimable advantage to the people of this country. It is a joy to the individual; it illumines the home and exalts the nation, and the saying that "worth makes the man," is applicable to all our great newspaper editors.

Section 1 of the bill provides that there shall be a sworn statement of names and addresses of editors, owners, stockholders, and so forth, to be made semi-annually. Now I submit that inasmuch as they use the post office they should register; the identity of every newspaper should be known. The post office of this country carries second class mail for the newspapers at a net loss of $8,000,000. The department cannot afford to pay its employees a decent rate of wages because of the franchises handed to the press. Section 1 does not propose that the names of small stockholders shall be given. It is provided that a copy of the sworn statement made by the newspaper shall be published in the second issue printed next after the filing of the statement with the Postmaster General, and if that provision is not carried out then the newspaper may not use the mails. Further, it is provided that paid editorials shall be marked "advertisement." Why not? Why should any large corporation attack a man like Harry Stevens, after all he has done for the country?—a man who, more than any Lord Shaftesbury, deserves the gratitude of this country, first, for what he did in 1926 when he saved the people $55,000,000 in connection with the customs inquiry, and, secondly, in connection with the price spreads commission. Why should such a man be attacked in the manner in which he was in the past few weeks by some few sections of the press?

It is time the people woke up to the fact that we are living in a fool's paradise. When I was chief magistrate of Toronto, an effort was made to sell the city an antiquated street railway plant and light plant largely antiquated junk, for $32,000,000. What would have been the result if that had gone through? The city would have been bankrupt and there would have been no hydro-electric project such as we have it to-day and we would have had higher carfares and rates for power. The toilers and workers in the cities and the farmers on the farms of Ontario would have been affected. There are a few people in this country who tried to put over that deal on the municipalities of this province; they fought Adam Beck to an early grave, and it is due to the Canadian people, who have had various legislatures since confederation down that have given away our natural resources, that we should have some statement of newspaper ownership. I have before me a letter from the Postmaster General of the United States where a similar bill was introduced on August 24, 1912. After all is said and done, the United States has been the great laboratory since the depression came on; it has tried all kinds of schemes to solve the economic troubles of that country and to pull its people out of the mire. Those schemes have been good, bad and indifferent, but in the result, as any economist can tell, most of the legislation passed there has been for the public benefit and has done something for the workers in that country. This is what the Postmaster General of the United States says:

The present law, embodied in section 537, Postal Laws and Regulations, is printed on the back of the accompanying copy of Form 3526 used by publishers in furnishing the required information. It specifies that publishers must submit not later than the first day of October of each year a statement setting forth the names and addresses of the officers of the publication, the owners and stockholders, etc., and also in the case of daily newspapers the average number of copies sold or distributed to paid subscribers during the preceding twelve months.

The purpose and intent of the law is to discover the real owners of publications entered as second-class matter and to let the public know who controls the editorial policies of the publication. It has been helpful in many instances where it was necessary to ascertain the actual ownership of publications and has also been beneficial in the case of daily publications which are required to show the average daily paid circulation in correcting the practices of some publishers in representing to advertisers a greater circulation for their publication than actually obtained. The law on the whole has been beneficial in its effect.

The law embodied in paragraph 2 of the above mentioned section, requiring editorial or other reading matter for the publication of which money or other valuable consideration is paid, accepted, or promised to be marked with the word "advertisement," enables readers to determine what is advertising and what is reading matter, and since the advertising portion of publications entered as second-class matter, with certain exceptions, is subject to postage at graduated zone rates, according to distance—

And these rates in the United States which I am going to quote are twice what they are in this country where we had a deficit of $8,000,000.

—the rates ranging from one and one-half cents a pound for the first and second zones to seven cents a pound for the eighth zone, while the reading portion is subject to postage at the flat rate of one and one-half cents a pound, regardless of zone, it also facilitates the collection of the proper postage.

That is from the Postmaster General of the United States in regard to newspaper regulations. He encloses a schedule which, with the consent of the house, in view of the many demands I have had for schedules, I would like to place on Hansard so that the members may see the regulations and affidavits in effect across the line. It is only a short schedule on the back of the act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall consent be granted to put the schedule on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: The schedule is as follows:

The publisher must publish a copy of this statement in the second issue printed after its filing.

I will not quote the number of papers whose editors have advocated this legislation. They are mostly Conservative, but there have also been many Liberal newspapers. Let me pay tribute to the Liberal party because in 1919 they introduced this very bill in the house. Hon. Mr. Lemieux, then member for Gaspé, introduced this bill in the house on several occasions, in fact this particular bill formed part of the Liberal platform of 1919. I have to pay tribute to Mr. Lemieux because he copied it from the law of England.

But I will say in conclusion that in the United States we have seen the control of Wall Street which the senate inquiry revealed. In that country Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan is a striking example. He and his partners did not pay a penny of income tax for years, and no one outside the precincts of the house of Morgan was any the wiser. It required a United States senate inquiry to expose this evil practice and a senate inquiry to show how tied and non-identity newspapers had been bought to kill public men who opposed in that country the giving away of their last natural resources. This exposure shocked all America and in fact the whole civilized world.

There was a committee formed of thirteen in my city to put over a union government a few weeks ago, the last thing this government wants, and the people would like to know who is behind that particular move.

I have many papers that I could quote from. This is what I said in the by-election in East Toronto, and I do not take a word back of what I said in that riding:

> The Conservative party, the real founders and authors of protection in Canada, should not allow itself to become just an adjunct to great mergers and monopolies and restraints of trade and security company racketeering, and who, as well as great departmental stores, are a law to themselves, and snap their fingers at the government and parliament and any regulations from the law of the land as they crush out the small dealer and starve their employees, and by rural mail delivery and the misuse of mail orders ruin the small towns and villages of the province. We had a milk and gasoline inquiry end in no prosecutions as not within the legislative competence of Canada.
> The time has come to stop "pussyfooting" with these cankers in the body politic and reassert the supremacy of parliament, as the first duty of a government is to look after the health and happiness, welfare and prosperity of its people. The Conservative party has done itself credit in the spread prices and mass buying committee.... But the big interests who have so much weight in all parties are out to kill it as they did the milk and gasoline inquiry and the Beauharnois inquiry, and to put the lid on—and also to kill and destroy any private member who opposes them and drive him out of parliament.

I still stand by those words. I believe the Conservative party and this government have done themselves proud in what they have done in the way of protecting the workers, the consumers and especially the farming industry, because the farmers and the industrial workers of this country are traditionally Conservative; they have been the two branches of this party from 1878 down. They have never faltered in the principle of protection. So when I see some of our leaders attacked as they are by some of the tied press for having brought about these reforms for the benefit of the workers, I believe the time has come to know who owns some of the newspapers. The object of this bill is well known to the press. For many years the newspapers have been coming to parliament and securing privileges. Prior to 1882 newspapers were carried free by the post office. This bill provides for what is already required by law in England, Australia and the United States, that is: a sworn statement of the names and addresses of editors, owners and principal stockholders of every newspaper, magazine, periodical or other publication, to be filed with the postmaster general semi-annually. There have been quite a number of newspaper references to this bill. Various farmers' magazines have openly approved the proposed legislation as being in the best interests of a free press and a free parliament. The Farmer's Advocate, the St. Catharines Standard, the Globe and the Port Hope Guide, The Winchester Press, are a few cases in point. I want it understood that I am not for a moment attacking the press of this country; I do not believe you could find anywhere a press to excel it. The contribution which Canadian newspapers made to the community, the country, education, social benefit, the satisfactory outcome of the war and during the depression; what it did to promote the cause of the poor and needy and of charity and philanthropy and to further every worthy movement on behalf of the soldiers and of the nation at large was invaluable and finds its place on the proudest pages of Canada's history. It was the press that helped very largely to restore Canada to her normal position. Nor can one say too much for the honour and integrity of the press of Canada. The tendency of our Canadian newspapers is decidedly forward, and not backward, and notwithstanding the high cost of material and labour and the depression and the social situation their prospects are bright. I have no doubt that the genius of our newspapers will help to make this country great industrially and socially and in every way, so that Canada will march triumphantly on from strength to strength.

The object of the bill is to require disclosure of ownership so that we know who the owners are. No fair minded man in the country, can oppose this proposal; if he has at heart the interests not only of the country, but of the press itself he will support this bill. For these reasons I move the second reading. Having done that, the onus is on the house. This bill is not a party measure; on a former occasion it was supported unanimously by all parties as being in the public interest and in the interest of the peace, order and good government of this country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Sworn statement of names and addresses of editors, owners, stockholders, etcetera, to be made semi-annually.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the introducer of this bill has considered the question of jurisdiction. The first subsection might possibly be in order because it deals with the right to use the mails; that may be under dominion jurisdiction. But subsection 2, provides that all paid editorial or other reading matter must be so described, and there is a penalty, a fine of not less than $50 and not more than $500; that has nothing to do with the Post Office Act or the use of the mails. I am no lawyer, and the Solicitor General and the ex-Solicitor General are not in their places, but I have a recollection that some seven or eight years ago I got through this house a somewhat similar bill which prescribed that no one should print or publish any document without his name and address on it, and there was a provision that printers had to keep a record for a certain number of months of the names of those who had employed them to do that particular work. The idea was to check the practice, common then and even more common now, of publishing seditious matter anonymously so that there was no way of finding out its source of origin. It met with unanimous support in this house, but in the other chamber it was thrown out on the ground that it was interfering with provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights. I wonder whether subsection 2 is not open to the same objection. Personally I heartily support the bill in every phase.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think the hon. member has forgotten that we pay no attention to provincial rights now.

Mr. NEILL: But we did not make a treaty about this in Versailles.

Mr. MANION: They do not pay much attention to our rights either, I notice.

Mr. POULIOT: In principle I favour this bill, but I have some objection to subclause 4—

The CHAIRMAN: Wait until we get to it.

Mr. POULIOT: But subclause 4 is part of clause 1.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No, I ask my hon. friend to keep quiet. I understand he is sore at not having been in the seat of the Minister of Justice for the last four or five years. But if he has some complaint let him make it to the Prime Minister; we are not at all interested in his sour grapes.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that what I have just said is carried, and I know my hon. friend may suffer from neurasthenia because he has not got what he wanted.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: We know he has had a sore mouth for a long time and we are sorry for him; nevertheless we hope he will recuperate somewhere and keep quiet now, because if he wishes to get into the shoes of the Minister of Justice he must behave differently in the House of Commons. If he continues to behave in this way—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —his electors will not vote for him, because if any elector of the city of Hamilton should see his performance in the house he would surely tell the others, and the hon. member would not get a single vote.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I am glad my hon. friend admits that what I am saying is right; it is carried unanimously—everyone is of the same opinion. We are all sorry he gives such a sad performance.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Carried.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. POULIOT: This again shows how sad it is to see a gentleman of the intelligence of the hon. member—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Let us discuss the bill, clause 1.

Mr. POULIOT: I am discussing the bill, but in the meantime I have just described the hon. member's bilious attacks.

The CHAIRMAN: Is clause 1 carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I wonder, sir, why we should carry it so early. Very serious objections have been made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I wonder if the hon. member from Hamilton cannot give us some illumination concerning the letter and spirit of this section.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. HEAPS: Is there only one section?

Mr. NEILL: There are subsections, not sections.

Mr. HEAPS: I thought we were taking it up clause by clause. I find in the clause we are discussing that there is no penalty for evasion.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not find it. It does state that if there is any evasion the paper shall be denied the right to use the mails. Then we come to subclause 2; there is a form of penalty there, but applicable only to newspapers with paid circulation. I am thinking of newspapers such as are often circulated for which no payment is made. If those papers have no identification as to ownership they evade the provisions entirely. I have in mind newspapers that are circulated by the thousands, particularly at election time. No one knows where they come from or who publishes them; they may contain all kinds of scurrilous matter, and there is nothing in this bill to provide for them. I think if we are going to attempt to find out who publishes newspapers and is responsible for the disseminating of certain kinds of information, the bill should cover all classes of newspapers. As it is now the bill is not wide enough to take care of a situation which is the cause of a great deal of annoyance and worse. I have seen in the publications I refer to untruthful and lying statements, with no indication of the source or the name of the printer of the paper or of who was responsible for its publication. If it is at all possible, with the consent of the mover of the bill I should like this clause to stand so that the point I have raised might be looked into. Perhaps the clause could be made wider so that it would include all classes of newspapers having circulation in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CHURCH: This bill is in exactly the same form as the bill I have introduced four or five times previously; there has not been a word changed. Previously this bill passed the house unanimously and it had the support of farmers' newspapers as well as most other newspapers throughout this country.

Mr. HEAPS: What the hon. member says may be perfectly true, but it does not answer the question I have just raised or the definite statement I made as to incidents which have occurred in this country during the past five or six years. If the hon. member who has introduced this bill would be good enough to let the matter stand I should be glad to take up with him the clause about which I am complaining now and to give him information which perhaps will convince him of the desirability of making the scope of the bill a little wider, because from what I can see of it I believe it could be evaded very easily, so that it might not bring the benefit the hon. member hopes. In all seriousness I would suggest that the hon. member allow the matter to stand over; I will see him at the first opportunity and discuss the wider application of the bill.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Surely the whole thing depends on whether or not the post office department decides to recognize any alleged publication as a newspaper within the meaning of the act. If that is so the objection of the hon. member for North Winnipeg is gone. On the other hand if it does not, then no person can say that the importance of a recognized newspaper attaches to it. That is all that it amounts to.

Mr. POULIOT: As I have already said, I agree with the principle of the bill, but I strongly object to paragraph 4, which reads:

> The Postmaster General may make such regulations as are required to carry out the provisions of this act.

I do not believe that power should be vested in one minister. If the hon. member for East Toronto is willing to dispense with that paragraph I will support the bill.

Mr. CHURCH: May I say to the hon. gentleman and to the hon. member for North Winnipeg that this bill was before this house in 1919, and the point raised to-night was raised at that time. The question was asked then whether a bill of this kind did not interfere with the property and civil rights of the provinces, and we obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice, which was that it does not in any way infringe on the jurisdiction of the provinces in regard to property and civil rights. Under section 91 of the British North America Act the regulation of post offices is exclusively a matter for the federal government. This bill deals only with regulation of postal matters in regard to certain publications that have obtained franchises from this parliament in the way of second class rates; it provides that they must conform to this bill. I have no objection to a penalty, but a penalty is included in the bill, if hon. gentlemen will note it. These publications which do not comply with the terms of the bill are to be denied the use of the mails, and I think that penalty is sufficient.

Mr. NEILL: What connection has subclause 2 with the Post Office Act? It has no connection at all; this is a separate matter.

Mr. CHURCH: I read the letter from the Postmaster General of the United States with regard to penalties. This is simply a regulation of the Post Office Department.

Mr. NEILL: But subclause 2 has no reference whatever to the post office; it simply says that if you do not indicate the material for the publication of which money has been paid you are liable to a fine of not less than $50 and not more than $500. That does not come under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department; it comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces in connection with property and civil rights.

Mr. CHURCH: I think this bill contains all the regulations and penalties necessary to meet the situation.

SUPPLY

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Miscellaneous services, $46,000.

Mr. HOWDEN: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to discuss the so-called Montreal agreement. I have little doubt that the Minister of Railways and Canals knows a great deal more about the Montreal agreement than I do, but that agreement has been the cause of a great deal of dissatisfaction and heartache to a great many men engaged in the running trades by the Canadian National Railways. In many districts of the road these differences have been adjusted, but that is not by any means the case over the whole road. Now, sir, in order that members of the committee may have some little knowledge of this affair perhaps I might take a moment or two to explain it. This may necessitate a little reiteration but I shall endeavour to be as speedy as possible.

When the lines that now form the Canadian National system were consolidated and combined the management set about rehabilitating the road. It was found that the Canadian Northern, being considerably older than either the Grand Trunk Pacific or the National Transcontinental, was in much worse repair, and in order to put the roadbed in shape it was found necessary to start a great number of extra hauling crews. Some fifty engine crews were started on the Canadian Northern portion of the system at that time. Subsequently, when the various portions were consolidated and combined, and the road was put on a running basis, it was discovered that there was a ratio of four crews on the Canadian Northern portion of the road to one crew on any other portion of the road. Since a good deal of the freight and other business was routed over the newer portions, namely the Canadian government parts of the road, this led to considerable dissatisfaction on the part of the engineers and firemen of the old Canadian Northern railway system. An agitation was set on foot which resulted in the matter being taken up by the grand lodges of engineers and firemen assembled at Cleveland, Ohio, and in committees being appointed, such committees to consist of the presidents and the eight vice-presidents of the respective brotherhoods. These men conferred and decided upon an equitable arrangement whereby they gave the Canadian Northern engine men a ratio of seven, as compared with two for the Grand Trunk Pacific and one for the Canadian government railways running east out of Transcona. The agreement was made, but apparently it was not very satisfactory, because, while it was to become effective in 1926, an injunction placed upon it prevented its becoming effective until 1928.

Mr. MANION: On the western lines. It came into force on the eastern lines in 1926, and on the western in 1928.

Mr. HOWDEN: I am interested in the western lines, and I am speaking with regard to them. Even after it came into effect the agreement was not satisfactory; in fact so far as the western lines are concerned it had never been satisfactory. May I explain at this point that the part of the system with which I am concerned and about which I complain consists of the old Canadian Northern terminus at Fort Rouge in the city of Winnipeg, and the Canadian government terminus at the town of Transcona, six miles east of Winnipeg. The arrangement was that the crews which had run out of Transcona should go to Fort Rouge and take out trains, and on the other hand that the crews of the Canadian Northern lines running out of Fort Rouge should likewise be in a position to go to Transcona and take out trains. As I stated previously the ratio was to stand at seven crews for the Canadian Northern portion, two crews for the Grand Trunk Pacific and one for the National Transcontinental. Singular as it may seem, the first men to complain, so far as this portion of the road is concerned, were the old Canadian Northern men, because after the arrangement was put into effect crews went from Transcona to Fort Rouge to take out passenger trains, and a very active protest was set on foot by the engineers of the Canadian Northern portion of the lines which was the cause of bringing into force an agreement known as the Montreal agreement, and which was engineered by a former Minister of Labour, the Hon. Peter Heenan. By this subsequent arrangement it was decided that engineers and firemen might not leave their own terminals to take out first and second class trains, namely passenger and mixed trains, so that the small ratio of men on the Canadian government railways were robbed of about the only consolation they had. The result of it all is that at the present time in Transcona there are about thirty engineers and about twice as many firemen who practically never get a run, and who see men who began working many years later running regularly from day to day. Obviously this is an unfair and prejudicial state of affairs.

In complaining about the matter to me these men set forth several points. They claim that the agreement was entirely unfair in every sense for the reasons—

First, that the test was made in the month of September, 1920, when the road was abnormally busy carrying grain.

Second, owing to the comparatively small size of engines on the Canadian Northern portion and the fact that one engine of standard size such as was then operating on the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian government line was hauling three times the tonnage of the former, there were therefore three times the number of engine crews engaged on the Canadian Northern as would be required to haul the same tonnage on the other lines.

Third, at the time the test was made some fifty extra crews had been taken on the Canadian Northern portion for the purpose of improving and balancing the road bed.

Fourth, owing to a trestle bridge at Brereton, eighty miles east of Winnipeg on the Canadian government line, being washed out, all freight east had to be routed by the Canadian Northern railway out of Winnipeg, thus greatly augmenting business on that portion of the system and leaving traffic practically at a standstill on the Canadian government lines.

Fifth, the most important point is that owing to the fact that the small number of Canadian government men in the order formed a minority they were overwhelmingly outvoted when the matter was brought up in the grand lodge at Cleveland.

Sixth, all efforts to obtain redress either through labour organizations, through the management or by any means whatsoever have failed, and left them helpless.

Seventh, —and this is rather important—

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. member permit a question? I ask only for information. Does he know what percentage of the men claim they have been unjustly treated? I must confess I have no information on the point.

Mr. HOWDEN: I do not know the percentage, but I know the number in the town of Transcona, which is in my constituency. It involves thirty engineers and about twice as many firemen.

Mr. MANION: Out of a total of how many?

Mr. HOWDEN: Well, they represent practically all of the old Canadian government lines engineers, on the lines running east from Transcona. These men are out of work They have been thrown off their lines, and outsiders have come in and taken their work with the result that they have nothing to do.

The seventh point, and one worthy of consideration, is that the Canadian Northern men were given seniority or priority from the time they started wiping in the shops, and the men on the Grand Trunk Pacific and on the Canadian government lines were given seniority only from the date of their first run on an engine on the road. Sometimes this made a very considerable difference. Then, there is a minor consideration which, however, means a good deal to the men on the road. Former Canadian Northern men living in Winnipeg and either leaving or arriving at Transcona during the night have a big, comfortable bunkhouse at their disposal, in which they may spend that portion of the night remaining to them either before departure or after arrival. On the other hand the Transcona men, former employees of the Canadian government railways, must travel six miles through to Fort Rouge in order to take their trains, or go in to Winnipeg the evening before and engage a room in the hotel or a boarding house in order to avoid the trip into the city during the night. Likewise the men who arrive over the Canadian Northern system at night are exposed to the necessity of taking a taxicab and driving home through the night or spending the night at a hotel, either of which means considerable expense. Someone may ask: Why don't they move? Well the difficulty is that they originally belonged to Transcona, and they still belong to Transcona. Many of them have their homes there, and that is where their living should be. They are exposed to the necessity of making a trip during the night into the city of Winnipeg in order to get a run on the road at all. It seems to me like a very unfair piece of business, and the men have without doubt I imagine indicated that in their complaint to the Minister of Railways, who probably has told them that it is no affair of his, that it is a matter for the management and the men. But when the men appeal to the management of the road the management tell them: We have nothing to do with it because we made an arrangement with your organization and we are quite helpless in the matter. Finally, when the men complain to their organization they are in a minority there, and are outvoted. Obviously it is unfair to these men at Transcona, and I presume that others on other parts of the road, have seen men who started ten or fifteen years later than themselves supplanting on their runs and taking their living out of their mouths.

What possibly can be done for them? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the minister might with reason indicate to the management of the road that he considers this a decided unfairness, and he might ask the management to confer with the representatives of the labour organizations. The minister could point out to the management this obvious unfairness that was obtaining on the road and ask them to try to correct this situation and give these men a proper show. The fair thing would be to give all the men on the road piority rights from the time they took their first trip on the road, and if these men had priority rights from the date of their first trip on the road I think that they would be satisfied.

The Fort Rouge men going to Transcona have a comfortable bunkhouse in which to spend the night. This may seem a small matter to bring up in the House of Commons, but let me say that it means a good deal to the men who have to make a trip through the night to get from Transcona to Winnipeg. If the management could provide a similar bunkhouse in Fort Rouge for the men who have to go into the city I think their grievances would be fairly well met and that they would be fairly satisfied. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this matter ought to receive the consideration of the minister.

Mr. MANION: I have listened attentively and with a good deal of interest to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Howden) has said, and I have no doubt he has made a perfectly fair and sincere statement of the whole situation. He is quite right in saying that the matter has been brought to my attention by other groups. I doubt, however, if the group to which he refers has brought it to my attention, although they may have done so in the five years I have been minister, but if they did I do not remember it. Undoubtedly it has been brought to my attention by certain of the groups. I remember particularly that some groups on the eastern lines in the extreme Atlantic region brought to my attention injustices which they claimed had been imposed on them through the Montreal agreement.

Perhaps a very brief review of the Montreal agreement might be useful to the members of the committee, particularly those who were not here when the hon. gentleman started speaking before the dinner recess. According to my information, the Montreal agreement was not put into effect until December 1, 1926, on the eastern lines—the Atlantic region Central region and the Grand Trunk Western, and it was put into effect on the western lines just two years later.

Mr. HOWDEN: It was held up by an injunction on behalf of the men in the west.

Mr. MANION: After the injunction, or rather after a board of conciliation had sat, the agreement came into effect on the western lines on May 1, 1928. The need for an agreement arose out of the consolidation of the various lines, as the hon. gentleman has stated, into the Canadian National group. The old Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the National Transcontinental, the Intercolonial and so forth were taken over between 1918 and 1920 and consolidated into the national system, and, just as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, various groups representing men on the old roads, which were independently operated in the first place, demanded their seniority rights. As traffic was shifted from one portion of the railway to another, where it could be more economically handled, certain groups of men were thrown out of their positions. For example, it might have been found that traffic coming from Winnipeg to Fort William over one route before the amalgamation could be handled more economically after the amalgamation by bringing it over another route, and consequently the group from which the traffic was taken found themselves without their accustomed runs. There was so much trouble raised by the men themselves with the management, and rightly so, that the management in a sense said to them: For heaven's sake get together and settle your seniority rights. After a period of years the men got together, and finally on the dates I mentioned, in 1926 for the Atlantic, Central, and Grand Trunk Western lines, and in 1928 for the western region they came to these agreements so far as the firemen and engineers are concerned. After a conciliation board under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act had sat, the western region finally came under the agreement on May 1, 1928. It was the men themselves and their organizations which arranged the Montreal agreement. Undoubtedly some injustices have been done, and I have no doubt that the case as cited by my hon. friend has been stated correctly. I know from complaints that I have received from other sections that other injustices have also been done. But as the hon. gentleman pointed out in his closing remarks, I have no power in the matter. It was arranged first of all by the men themselves through their various organizations, and then they submitted it to the management, and the management accepted it as the best arrangement which could be come to.

The management now takes the attitude when I bring these cases before them—I have done so before, and I shall gladly draw their attention to the statements and suggestions of my hon. friend—that while undoubtedly some injustices have been done this is an arrangement which is for the greatest good of the greatest number, and that if they attempt to interfere with it, it would bring about such a chaotic condition that there would be no satisfaction whatever; in other words, while there are a few dissatisfied now, if they changed the arrangement all would be dissatisfied and chaos would result.

Under these circumstances I really do not know what can be done. My hon. friend's final suggestion might be a very simple solution or a part solution of the situation locally, and I think it is well worthy of consideration. I refer to the proposal he made as to a bunkhouse. But that would solve the difficulty only as far as his section is concerned, and then perhaps only partly, because I assume the men who feel dissatisfied over losing their positions will still be dissatisfied to a certain extent. The only thing I can do, and I shall do it gladly, is to bring my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the management and ask them to give them whatever consideration they can. It is entirely a matter in the control of the men themselves and their organizations, and the management. I shall gladly bring the remarks of my hon. friend to the attention of the management for whatever consideration they can give them.

Mr. HOWDEN: I want to thank the minister for his kind reception of my statement of the situation and for his consideration. I understand that their differences have been adjusted somehow or other and that Transcona is about the only sore spot left, and obviously the simple thing to do would be to give every man his seniority from the time he made his first run on the road. As it is now, only some men are given seniority from the time they made their first run, other men being given seniority from the time they went into the shops to wipe. They get the advantage of the time they spent wiping, and they are benefited to this extent in comparison with the other men.

Mr. MANION: The statement of the hon. gentleman is a repetition of what he said before and it does sound unjust, but the question of seniority among the men is not for the management; it rests entirely with the men themselves.

Mr. HOWDEN: I quite agree with the minister in that regard.

Mr. MANION: It is a matter which is entirely in the hands of the men's organizations and the only people who can interfere with it are the men themselves. However, I shall be glad to bring the matter to the attention of the management—the only body with whom I have communication—and ask them to give it every consideration, to see whether they can put it to the men's organizations in such a way as to be of assistance.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the minister is absolutely sound. I hold no brief for the railway organizations; they are capable of speaking for themselves. But I think it is fair to say that whatever conditions are enjoyed by them, and they compare favourably with the conditions enjoyed by railway men in any other country, have been brought about by the organizations themselves through the instrumentality of the men to whom the hon. member has referred. What is the position of the government in this matter? There already exists in the country the proper machinery whereby the majority vote of these organizations prevails. If my hon. friend's contention is sound, then we on this side of the house should be the government and those on the government side should be sitting to the left of the Speaker. I think it would be a dangerous precedent for the government of the country to interfere unnecessarily while the proper machinery exists—the conciliation boards and so on—to rectify the grievances from which the men suffer or think they suffer. It places the government in the position of the boss, telling the men's organizations what they should do after they have decided on a certain policy according to sound democratic principles. I think the best thing these men can do is to get back into their organization and try to influence its policy; otherwise it would be a case of the tail wagging the dog. There may be some injustices—and I have had some experience with conciliation boards; I know something about seniority, and I know that men fight harder for seniority than for working conditions and wages. That exists in every line where the strict policy of seniority prevails. But to ask even the employers to dictate to the organizations what they shall do, when one considers the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, is to propose something which in my opinion is beyond the ken of the government, of the management and of the members of this House of Commons.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): In other words, the hon. member for East Hamilton declares that the policy of the government has been right from start to finish.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Absence of policy.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was not suggesting that the government should interfere; I was suggesting to the minister that the government might indicate to the management of the road the desirability of having this matter reviewed and adjusted if possible. The hon. member for Hamilton spoke of some men thinking that they were unfairly used.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): The hon. gentleman means East Hamilton; I am the member for Hamilton.

Mr. HOWDEN: Hamilton anyway. Well, I have here a slip indicating that one R. D. Bailey hired with the Canadian Government Railways in 1915, and he is now behind a man hired after 1920. Obviously he is unfairly treated. Another man, Huston by name, hired originally in 1911. He went overseas and came back and is now firing for a man who must have been fifteen years of age when he commenced railroading in order to be this other man's senior. There can be little doubt that in these two instances these men are discriminated against. As regards having the order adjust these matters, every time the question has been brought to a vote in the order the men in the majority outvote the men in the minority, and the men in the minority take what they can get, which is nothing. That is the way it works out in the order.

Mr. McKINNON: The organizations have the sole right to handle the seniority problems of their particular railways; the management have never interfered and do not pretend to interfere. The Minister of Railways, I think, gave about as clear an explanation as it is possible for anyone to give, with this exception. They have had what are known as general seniority promotions, over quite a large territory, and when the amalgamation took place a large number of men voluntarily moved from one part of the district to another. The hon. member for St. Boniface is no doubt absolutely correct in stating that a number of men in Transcona have been done an injustice; but while these particular men on that particular railway may have been done an injustice, nevertheless, taking it as a whole, it was the very best program that the representatives of the men could work out to suit the country as a whole. And as the minister has pointed out, it would upset conditions terribly if an attempt were made to adjust the matter at this late date. The man representing the Canadian Northern at that time has received promotion from his organization; so evidently, as a whole, they must have been satisfied with the work he did for the men.

Mr. POULIOT: In 1926 and 1928 I sent a strong protest to Sir Henry Thornton with regard to the universal promotion scheme. It comes from the Montreal agreement. Now, it works in a very strange way. At a division point some employees who have been working for twenty years are set back and other men who have been working only ten years have still an opportunity to work. There is discrimination there, and I bring it to the attention of the minister. No one intends to interfere with the high policy of the management, but on the other hand it is only fair to bring these instances to the attention of the government in order that they may be transmitted to the management, and the management can see whether there is some way of reaching a compromise with the men. I agree with my hon. friend from East Hamilton; the matter should be settled by mutual agreement between the management and the men. The Montreal agreement should be amended by mutual consent, just in the same way as it was made, but in order to bring that about, it must be discussed and the matter should be brought to the attention of the management. I shall be glad if the minister will see that that is done.

Mr. MANION: I will bring the whole discussion to the attention of the management.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister.

Mr. SPENCER: This may not be the proper item, but may I once again draw the attention of the minister to what is known as the Bulwark Easterly line in Alberta on which some twenty-five miles of grading has been done for some years. The people in that vicinity had great hopes that the line would be completed. Needless to say, being quite a long way from the railway, they have been greatly handicapped in getting their grain and other produce to market, and they have been waiting very patiently in the hope that something will be done. Is there any prospect that the rails may be put on this grade as part of the relief work that it is anticipated the government will bring before the house this session?

Mr. MANION: The line to which the hon. member refers is in exactly the same position as most of the other branch lines which have been spoken of and drawn to my attention at various times in the last three or four years. The question is one of the management recommending the continuation of some of these lines, and because of the financial condition of the railways, the management has not seen fit to recommend the continuation of any of them so far as I know. I may suggest to the hon. member as I did to the hon. member for North Battleford, that we did have yesterday and we shall probably have again on Tuesday.

Wednesday and Thursday of next week the managing officers of the Canadian National Railways before the select standing committee on railways and shipping, and since the hon. gentleman is very much interested in the matter, he might have a chat with Mr. Fullerton and Mr. Hungerford in regard to this line and just see if he can influence them, because the suggestion and recommendation have in the final result to come from them. If they take the attitude that this line rather than some others requires attention, he may rest assured that the government will do everything it can to carry out the recommendation of the railways. Their recommendations are generally speaking carried out. When those officials are here again for two or three days next week, the hon. member might interview them in regard to the matter. I will repeat to him what I said to the hon. member for North Battleford: I would have no objection and I am sure the other members of the committee would have none to his coming into the committee and asking the question directly, because the officials are in a better position than I am to decide the matter.

Mr. SPENCER: I had intended to go to the railway committee and ask permission, but I happen to be a member of the banking and commerce committee and it has been sitting at the same time. If I have an opportunity next week, I shall take advantage of the offer made by the minister. I am quite sure the people for whom I am speaking do not wish any favours, but they do want not to be overlooked. If these lines which are half finished are going to be completed, they think they should be given the same treatment as the others.

Mr. MANION: May I say a word further without seeking in any way to delay my own estimates? I have every sympathy for all those different groups that have branch lines partly constructed or that have been promised branch lines, but as the hon. member knows, the question has been one of the finances of the railways. I hope in the very near future the railways will feel able to recommend and the government will feel able to support the recommendation for the further construction of these branch lines. I hope my hon. friend will come before the committee and submit his case to the management of the railways.

Mr. SPENCER: I will.

Item agreed to.

Railway Employees' Provident Fund—

To supplement pension allowances payable under provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1935, to March 31, 1936, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 per month as fixed by the said act, $27,500.

Mr. SPENCER: There is an increase here. Might we have the reason for it?

Mr. MANION: This is to provide money to supplement the pension allowances on the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways under the provisions of the provident fund. I shall read the item, because it is a little clearer than anything I can give off-hand. It is to supplement pension allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1935, to March 31, 1936, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act. The increase is merely because a few more men are drawing pensions at the present time, but the peak will be reached after which the amount will decrease. We simply supplement the money as supplied by the Canadian National Railways for this pension fund.

Mr. HEAPS: How many pensioners are there on the roll?

Mr. MANION: They are as follows:

Number of pensioners in receipt of maximum allowance of $10, bring the minimum pension of $30 instead of $20 per month—128.

Number in receipt of allowance to bring pension which ranged between $20 and $30 up to $30 per month—186.

Total number receiving extra allowances—314.

Number of retired employees in receipt of pension during the month of February, 1935—1,722.

Number of employees contributing to the provident fund during the month of December, 1934—8,853.

Mr. HEAPS: Does that refer to the whole system?

Mr. MANION: This is just the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways.

Item agreed to.

Railways and Canals—

Chargeable to collection of revenue—canals, elevators and harbours operation and maintenance, $2,500,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister give us the reason for the increase?

Mr. MANION: This item is to provide for the local administration, operation and maintenance of the whole canal system of the country consisting of about 500 miles of canals. The increase of $100,000 is explained as follows:

Staff

1. Quebec canals dredging fleet.—The work of this plant in 1934-35 was charged to Ontario-St. Lawrence canals repairs to the amount of $15,500.

2. Welland canals.—Provision for the operation of certain Canadian National Railway bridges by the department under agreement, $16,000.

3. Minor increases or decreases on various canals for contingent accounts and miscellaneous services representing a net increase of $19,700—$51,200.

Repairs

1. Provision for various delayed repair works which, under normal conditions, would have been carried out during the past two years and which can no longer be held up if the canal system is to be maintained in proper condition.

2. As the canals become older, maintenance costs increase from year to year until the structures are beyond further repair and replacements have to be made—$48,800.

That makes up the increase of $100,000. It is a round figure, not an absolute one.

Mr. HEAPS: This $2,500,000 refers almost entirely to maintenance charges?

Mr. MANION: Operation, maintenance and repairs.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give us the other side of the picture as to what are the interest charges on the canal system of the country?

Mr. MANION: That is just as difficult as the question the hon. member asked in the railways committee the other day. Over a period of years, well over one hundred, we built the various canals in this country. We have spent on them something like $250,000,000, including $130,000,000 on the Welland. How much of that was from consolidated revenue the Lord may know, but I am sure I do not nor anyone else. So the trouble is I cannot tell how much of it is in the debt. I suppose some is, but I doubt very much if anyone could figure out how much, and only by knowing that could we figure the interest.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister has said $250,000,000 has been spent on the canal system. At five per cent it would mean $12,500,000.

Mr. MANION: That would be correct if it were all in the debt, but over the years no doubt some of it was paid out of the consolidated revenue, just as I explained yesterday about the railway debt.

Mr. HEAPS: And I did not understand it then.

Mr. MANION: Well I can give the explanation but I cannot give my hon. friend understanding. I say that without meaning any offence. I thought I understood it yesterday when I explained it but I may not have made my hon. friend understand it. However, while I do not know how much of this has been paid from consolidated revenue, without doubt some of it has.

Mr. HEAPS: It would be fair to say that a capital charge of $250,000,000 at four per cent would represent an interest charge of $10,000,000.

Mr. MANION: Yes, if it is in our debt.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, no matter where it is, I suppose if it is owing, interest is payable on it.

Mr. MANION: But it would not be owing if it had been paid out of revenue.

Mr. HEAPS: In view of the fact that $130,000,000 for the Welland canal is just one item in the $250,000,000, no doubt the major part—

Mr. MANION: I think that is in the debt all right.

Mr. HEAPS: So it would seem that we have probably $10,000,000 a year interest to meet on these canals, and another $2,500,000 for maintenance, or roughly speaking $12,500,000 a year. How much revenue is derived from the canals?

Mr. MANION: In round figures about $1,000,000 or a little less, nearly altogether from water powers that we lease. I explained before dinner that there are no tolls charged on the canals. Even when tolls were charged the revenue did not amount to much. The only income that we get that amounts to anything is from the water powers that we lease. We get some other little returns on operation, such as the handling of boats in the locks of the Welland and from the Prescott elevator, but the latter costs more than we get. The Port Colborne elevator more than pays its way.

Mr. HEAPS: Worse than the railways.

Mr. MANION: That is probably right.

Mr. REID: I think the department should look to the time when the agreements and treaties of which the minister speaks come up again. Hundreds of millions have been spent on our canals which are used without charge by other shipping than our own, while ships leaving our shores have to pay some $9,000 toll to go through the Panama canal. We in British Columbia feel that when these treaties come up again some consideration should be given to Canadian ships carrying Canadian produce through the Panama canal in view of United States ships using our canal system without charge.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the Welland canal entirely finished now, or will there be any further expense?

Mr. MANION: It is practically finished. There are a few little levelling jobs, a piece of bank may settle here and there, and altogether another $1,000,000 may have to be spent. But the whole canal is finished and operating—and my engineer adds, the claims will be paid. But most of them are provided for in these present estimates. There may be a few little fag ends, including claims, that may amount to $1,000,000 or perhaps more.

Mr. SPENCER: Was all the work done by contract, or was it government work?

Mr. MANION: Practically everything was done by contract. There was an odd small job done by the government but all the larger jobs were let by contract.

Mr. SPENCER: Then nothing will be realized on equipment when the job is finished?

Mr. MANION: Most of the equipment was provided by the contractor and figured in his contract, or it is equipment which he can move to other jobs. The contractors have to look after that; we had not much equipment to worry about.

Mr. SPENCER: There are no tolls at all on the Welland canal?

Mr. MANION: No tolls whatever. But there are some charges, not for the tonnage of the ships but for the handling of them in the locks. There are also certain wharfage charges.

Mr. HEAPS: Are these canals open to the vessels of all countries?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Do we receive reciprocal privileges from other countries?

Mr. MANION: There are charges on the Panama canal, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) pointed out. As to the Manchester canal my engineer is not sure; as to the Kiel canal, I imagine they have tolls. But we are in this rather difficult position, that there are treaty arrangements with many different countries, and aside from them the big difficulty is the United States. For example at Sault Ste. Marie the United States has the better canal and our ships largely use the American canal in preference to our own. It is true that down here the Welland is the big canal; in fact the United States have none at that point. But it was found prior to 1903 or 1904, when tolls were abandoned that tolls diverted the traffic from the Canadian canals to Buffalo and down through the Erie canal to New York. In other words if we put tolls on in the east the Americans who have the best canal in the upper lakes can retaliate, as they did once, by putting on tolls in respect of shipping using their Sault Ste. Marie canal. Those might balance and not matter much, but when we come to the St. Lawrence canals, grain, which in the absence of tolls goes down the St. Lawrence and out by Canadian ports would be diverted at Buffalo and exported through American ports. For these reasons it was decided a third of a century ago that it was better not to charge canal tolls, in order to hold the grain and other traffic. I remember looking into the matter before the war and finding that at least one-third of our Canadian grain went to New York. I have not the figures now; I think a less proportion goes that way now. Of course in the meantime the port of Vancouver has taken a great deal of traffic that used to go east, much to the surprise of some people—

Mr. REID: They used to laugh at the idea.

Mr. MANION: They did not so much laugh, but they were afraid that the wheat could not go south through Panama without heating. I remember reading many articles to that effect. But as a matter of fact about half goes that way now. My engineer shows me that for 1933 the amount of Canadian wheat going down the St. Lawrence and out by Canadian ports was 88,000,000 bushels and via Buffalo and New York 35,000,000. That is about the same proportion as before the war; a little more than one-third went via Buffalo in 1933. I have no later figures. In 1932 the figures were almost exactly the same. In 1931 it was about fifty fifty; half went each way. That is Canadian wheat, of course, and it must be remembered that a certain amount of United States wheat goes out by Montreal, which offsets some of our wheat that goes the other way.

Mr. HEAPS: I am trying to get at the economics of the whole thing at the moment. The Welland canal costs the country from $6,000,000 to $7,000,000 a year, and I am just wondering whether from an economic standpoint and from the standpoint of the amount of benefit we receive from it the Welland canal is worth it.

Mr. MANION: I can answer quite frankly that in my opinion it never should have been built, except as part of a through system. It is like many of the other things we did in our more or less insane optimism. As it is we have merely permitted the boats to go down one more lake at a cost of $130,000,000. Without any hesitation whatever I frankly say that I cannot imagine what those who originated the idea were thinking of to build the Welland ship canal. It is just like the building of the Prescott elevator, for example—and I hope the hon. member for Prescott is not in the house. There is no doubt that the Welland ship canal was not a project that should have been gone on with at that time, unless as part of the St. Lawrence canal scheme. If at that time we had intended to build the St. Lawrence canals in association with the Welland ship canal there would have been some real reason for it, but other than that I do not know what could have been the reason except that when it was begun twenty-two years ago apparently we thought we had too much money. My hon. friend suggests that we had too much water; at any rate they mistook it for money and spent it on the canal.

Mr. SPENCER: If the St. Lawrence canals are ever completed the Welland canal will fit in with that scheme, will it not?

Mr. MANION: Without doubt, if the St. Lawrence canals are ever completed, but I should not say we should feel very optimistic at the moment in regard to their completion.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay railway—
Amount to provide for difference between expenditures for operation and maintenance and the revenues accruing from operation during the year ending March 31, 1936, not exceeding, $226,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give us any particulars with regard to the business at Churchill and the ships that came to and went out from that port?

Mr. MANION: Yes, gladly. This item, of course, deals with the port of Churchill and the Hudson Bay railway. There are two items that perhaps should be considered together, the one now before the committee which has to do with the operation and item number 82, which has to do with construction. Probably the same information will do for both items. Last year fifteen ships went out of Churchill as compared with ten the year before. I will just give these figures from memory because at the moment I do not have them before me. I think about 4,500,000 bushels of grain, several cargoes of cattle, considerable lumber and I think a small quantity of flour, though nothing of any importance, were shipped from Churchill. Coming in there were a couple of cargoes of general merchandise. That was really the whole traffic. Operations were carried on very successfully as far as they went, and the other day the acting Prime Minister stated in the house that through the high commissioner in London we have succeeded in getting the insurance rates lowered, so that for the coming season the rates will be a little lower than they were for the past season. Of course the insurance rates depend to a great extent on the amount of traffic safely carried on. Of the boats that have gone to Churchill, as every hon. member knows, there has been only one accident, and my hon. friend from Nelson thinks that was one of those accidents that might easily have been avoided. I will let him explain that if he cares to do so, but he has explained it very fully on other occasions. I admit that it certainly had a peculiar appearance. I do not think there is any other information I can give at the moment.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister tell the committee the capital cost of the Churchill improvements to date?

Mr. MANION: The total cost of the Hudson Bay railway and Churchill is in the neighbourhood of $52,000,000 or $53,000,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister the separate figures?

Mr. MANION: Yes. The railway alone cost $32,886,000. The estimated expenditure at the Churchill terminals is $13,202,000, and then at Port Nelson some $6,250,000 was expended before they decided to go to Churchill. These three figures give the total I mentioned a few moments ago, of $53,000,000 in round figures.

Mr. HEAPS: That is for the railway and the terminal site at Churchill?

Mr. MANION: That is for all the construction work, the whole terminal as it has been built, including a big elevator, a freight shed, a great deal of dredging, the laying of tracks and so on. It also includes the expenditure of over $6,000,000 at Nelson.

Mr. HEAPS: Apart from the railway could we have the figure in regard to the maintenance charges at Churchill, together with the interest charges?

Mr. GEARY: If the minister is going to give that information I think there is a great deal more information we should have as to the operation of the road. I was going to suggest to the minister that it would be well if the special committee on railways, perhaps not this year but in future years, made a definite and exhaustive report on the operations of the road for the year, dealing with all the items that are shown in the ordinary railway account. At the present time we do not have this amount broken down in any way; we are simply given the difference between two sides of the ledger, just as we have a sort of capital account under another item. We know nothing at all of how the road is kept up, where the money goes or where it comes from.

Mr. HEAPS: I quite agree with what the hon. member has said, but I do not think we had these figure before the railway committee in previous years. I should be quite content to have them go there, but I think while the minister is here we should have the information.

Mr. MANION: With regard to the remarks of my hon. friend from South Toronto it is true the house has never been given a complete statement, but answers have been given to any questions hon. members have cared to ask. Up to this year the construction and operation of the Hudson Bay railway has been looked upon as one item. This year we have separated it, because the road is practically completed. Up to this year the road was in the process of construction, but now it is looked upon as a complete road and therefore we separate the two items. One has to do with capital expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway and terminals and the other has to do with operation. In regard to the operation of the road may I tell the hon. member for South Toronto that the cost of operation and maintenance in the year 1934-35 for the railway only was $593,000, the port only, $100,000, and the elevator only, $85,000, making a total of $778,000 in round figures. The revenues from the railroad were $456,000, from the port $12,000 and from the elevator $102,000, making a total of $570,000. In other words there was a deficit on railway, port and elevator of about $208,000.

Mr. HEAPS: On operation only?

Mr. MANION: Operation and maintenance. Of course that does not include construction cost, because that is capital outlay. On construction alone the railways spent a further sum of $180,000 and the port $131,000, making a total expenditure of $311,000. Of course that is capital expenditure which will not have to be repeated. The above deficit is, roughly, what might be expected in the coming year, although on account of increased traffic the amount may be cut down to some extent—if we have such increased traffic.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister has said he does not expect there will be any repetition of capital expenditure, and I am wondering if there will be any interest to pay as a capital expenditure?

Mr. MANION: I am quite sure there is. We are not paying anything out of revenues these days.

Mr. HANBURY: Has the minister before him the reference to the special committee on railways and shipping, and if so will he say whether this item is included in the reference?

Mr. MANION: This is in a different position, because the Hudson Bay railway is being operated, it is true, by the Canadian National Railways, but as our agents. However I have no objection to having the Hudson Bay Railway item submitted.

Mr. HANBURY: I think it is covered.

Mr. MANION: No, it is not, because as I have already stated the Hudson Bay railway is being operated by the Canadian National as our agents, and we ourselves that is the Department of Railways and Canals, are operating the port.

Mr. HANBURY: Has the minister before him the reference to the special committee?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. GEARY: The committee is to deal with government owned railways, no matter in what category they may be. This is a government owned railway.

Mr. HANBURY: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give the committee some idea of the prospects both for the Hudson Bay railway and the terminal at Churchill? What are the prospects of increased traffic and increased earnings?

Mr. MANION: At the moment the elevator is full, but we know that it was practically full at this time last year. As to the prospects, may I say this, that the hon. member who has asked the question is from Winnipeg, the city where there are great journals such as the Winnipeg Free Press, which tell not only all about what has happened in the past but which attempt to blast the reputation of those who live in the present, and without reference to truth or anything of the kind. I am sure the Winnipeg Free Press could tell my hon. friend much more about the matter than I can. He is in just as good a position to estimate the future of that port as I am. I hope for the sake of our judgment—and when I say our judgment I mean the judgment of past governments, because we know this government has had nothing to do but carry on what other governments have begun—I hope for the sake of the judgment shown by past governments which built this road and opened this port that the project will at least reach the stage where it will pay its way. I believe that as business increases throughout the world and as the west comes back into its own, as all hon. members sincerely hope it will, the Hudson Bay railway will do a reasonable business. I would not like to be too specific in regard to the justification for building the railway at the time it was built. However, we know there was a demand for it on the part of the western provinces, and even if for no other reason than that I would say there was some justification for the construction. Certainly it has not yet justified its existence from the standpoint of traffic, but in making that statement we are saying of the Hudson Bay railway only that which we could say of the rest of the railways and canals in Canada.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I have been waiting for the item to be called which deals with the Hudson Bay railway and terminals, construction and betterments, and was under the impression that would probably be the best time to make my observations. However if the minister has no objection I shall proceed under the present item. Of course I wish to discuss the railway and the port.

Mr. MANION: Go as far as you like.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I heard something said by an hon. member from Winnipeg concerning the prospects for business on the Hudson Bay railway. I thought possibly the hon. member who asked the question would be in a better position than most of us to answer it, in view of the fact that people in Winnipeg made the most noise about getting the railway and now they neglect to make use of it. Last year no Manitoba grain, cattle or other produce went out through that port, yet the premier, his deputies and ministers go about the province boasting about Manitoba's own seaport. So far we have not been able to get any business from Manitoba, and the port would have been absolutely idle had it not been for the sister province of Saskatchewan.

The minister mentioned that the acting Prime Minister had read a communication from the old country in regard to a reduction on marine insurance out of Churchill. I am sure that is pleasing to some of us who have been fighting for a reduction for a good many years. While I welcome that slight reduction the best I can say is that it is a short step in the right direction. Some hon. members may smile at that statement, but I shall develop the point so that they will know what I mean. I shall give an illustration by giving the facts and figures concerning two cargoes leaving the ports of Churchill and Montreal respectively. These cargoes were shipped on the same class of vessel and the same number of bushels were carried in each case.

Taking the hull and cargo insurance together on a ship of 5,000 tons gross register valued at £50,000 carrying 300,000 bushels of wheat worth 75 cents a bushel—that is about the average cargo on the type of ship sailing out of Churchill—the insurance out of Churchill in 1934 was $7,500 for hull insurance and $2,812 for cargo insurance, making a total of $10,312. Then, out of Montreal the hull insurance on the same boat was $1,250 and the cargo insurance $562, making a total of $1,812. In other words there is a difference of $8,500.

Mr. MANION: Did the hon. member prepare these figures himself, or where did he get them?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I got them out of the shipping report for the 1934 shipping season. These figures are with respect to the port of Churchill, Manitoba, and are prepared by the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. MANION: I just wondered, because my figures agree with those given by the hon. member.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): This is important, in view of the statement made by the imperial shipping committee, in their shipping report for 1934, in which in no uncertain terms they state in connection with the Hudson bay marine insurance rate that so far as well found vessels are concerned the dangers are no greater out of Churchill than they are out of Montreal. In spite of that statement however we have to pay five or six times more insurance. When I asked this government what they intended to do about the rates I was informed that the matter had been taken up with the imperial shipping committee and that a reply was expected shortly. That reply has been received, and it states that there will be a reduction of twenty-five per cent on the general rate, with an additional twenty-five per cent off the new rate for boats equipped with gyro compasses. I say that is a short step in the right direction, and I have given the figures to qualify my statement.

I have a few observations to make in regard to stevedoring. A question was asked in this house about stevedoring charges, and the minister I think quite properly replied that the government had very little to do with it, that the shipping companies contracted with certain stevedoring contractors who carried on the work. That is quite true, but I am not going to go quite as far as the minister and say that the government have no responsibility in the matter because I think it is a responsibility upon this government to see that the people using that route get a square deal and get the lowest possible rates for stevedoring, dock and harbour charges that it is possible to give them. I am going to give a comparative statement of the stevedoring charges in Churchill and Montreal in support of my statement that we are not getting a square deal at Churchill from the stevedores.

At Churchill, for 270,000 bushels shipped, the stevedoring charge is $4 a thousand bushels, or $1,080; bagging grain, 5,000 at 9 cents, $450, or a total of $1,530, less ten per cent. I believe the discount of ten per cent is universal. The charges at Montreal are 270,000 bushels at one dollar per thousand bushels, $270; bagging, 5,000 bags at 7 cents, $350, a total of $620—that is, a charge of $620 at Montreal as compared with $1,530 out of Churchill.

Mr. HEAPS: Why the difference?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I cannot tell you that. All I know is that the difference exists. The stevedoring contractor makes his deal with the shipping company, and the government have nothing to do with it. I am simply bringing these figures to the attention of the committee.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there any competition for the business among the stevedores?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I have not heard of any; there may be. There is only one stevedoring contractor up there, but whether he has to bid in competition with other stevedoring contractors I don't know. At all events I contend it is not worth four times as much to trim grain in Churchill as it is in Montreal. I will agree that the stevedoring contractor—I had some argument with him last fall—cannot possibly get the same type of men at Churchill that he can in Montreal because he has to go up to Churchill in the fall and pick up just what men he can get and he does not get the best type of man, whereas there are hundreds of experienced men in Montreal. It might be reasonable to charge twice as much at Churchill as at Montreal, but certainly not four times as much.

Mr. HEAPS: Was not the difference just about twice as much, $600 as compared with $1,500?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Four dollars per thousand bushels at Churchill, and one dollar per thousand at Montreal for trimming the grain.

Mr. QUINN: Do the stevedores get the difference?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): No. They pay higher wages at Montreal than at Churchill. I am bringing this matter to the attention of the government and the committee because I think there is an obligation on the government to see that shippers out of Churchill get the best rates they can. We are already paying higher shipping rates out of Churchill than out of Montreal and we expect to for some years to come. We also expect to pay higher insurance rates. Nobody realizes better than I do that the only way we can get the insurance rates down to where they should be is by greater volume of shipping and a low rate of loss. It may take some years to establish that. But in the meantime we have no right to be subjected to four or five times the stevedoring rates charged in Montreal, and as long as I am able to stand up in this house and fight, you are going to hear from me till we get the rates down to where they should be.

Mr. MANION: Before my hon. friend passes from stevedoring, would he allow me to say a few words for the information of the committee? The government has nothing to do with the stevedoring. Mr. Louis Wolfe, who is head of a stevedoring company in Montreal and does a great deal of stevedoring in that port, has been very active and energetic in the matter, and has gone across to Europe on a number of occasions and made his arrangements with the shipping companies that ship out of Churchill. Any other stevedoring company can do the same, but no other company has had the energy and ambition and desire apparently for the work that Mr. Louis Wolfe has had. Mr. Louis Wolfe charges more at Churchill than he does at Montreal, but we must not forget that he took care of fifteen ships out of Churchill while there are hundreds going out of Montreal. In addition the port of Montreal is open seven or eight months, perhaps a little longer, whereas Churchill is open at the most three months. In addition,

Mr. Wolfe has to come to Churchill and get his own crew, and if it had not been for the Department of Railways and Canals it would have cost twice as much as the present charges, because we supply him with men and we supply the men with quarters. With only fifteen ships going out he could not afford to take up a whole crew, and so we supplied the men out of those we had with us. Whenever he is short of men we have, up to the present time at any rate, been able to supply him with help. So I know my hon. friend was not meaning to criticize as if we were not taking any care of this matter, because we were, and I know he knows we were doing exceptionally well. We made arrangements to facilitate Mr. Louis Wolfe with his work in every possible way, and I think Mr. Wolfe and his organization have been doing the work at a reasonable charge considering the small number of boats going out of the port, and the great difficulties and the short season at Churchill as compared with Montreal. I merely say that before my hon. friend passes to another subject, because it should be known by the committee. I am quite sure of the facts I state, and I know that my hon. friend knows that they are quite correct.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): It is just a matter of opinion. I still maintain that the rate is abnormally high. I think it should be cut in two.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member think any other concern would go into Churchill and do it for that money?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I would not go that far, but I say that the organization that is now at Churchill could do the stevedoring. They have an organization there at Churchill and foremen who need take second place to none in knowing how to handle men. If it is necessary for the department to take over the stevedoring I am quite sure that they could do it.

Mr. MANION: I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. We have no one at Churchill who could take it on. True, if the department cared to take over the work we could do it perhaps for nothing, just as we might handle the insurance for nothing. I am pointing out that Louis Wolfe has been the only one who has shown any desire to do the work, but if anybody else wishes to undertake it we shall be glad to help him and facilitate his work the same as we have done in the case of Mr. Wolfe. In fact another company some weeks ago did apply to me for some of this work, I told them how Mr. Wolfe handled it, and we are ready to give them or anyone else the same opportunities and assistance that we have given to Mr. Wolfe. The department has no more right to take over the stevedoring than the government has a right to take over the insurance.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I do not say that the department has a right to take it over, but I say that if the worst comes to the worst they could take it over, because they have men there who know just as much about it as Mr. Wolfe or any other man. I do not think it does any harm, Mr. Chairman, to air these things and to give these figures to the committee. The longer I live the more I love the truth.

Now in regard to port charges, there is a little discrepancy, but not a very serious one. At present at Churchill wharfage costs $100 per day for a vessel that remains at the wharf more than three days. Of course that hits the general cargo boat that may come in there, boats that may come in for lumber or mixed cargo and have to stay longer than three days, because they have to pay $100 a day for each day over three days, whereas a boat that comes in for grain and gets out in twenty-four hours, which they can do if they are ready, does not have to pay any wharfage. Would it not be possible to arrange for a charge of five cents per N.R.T. or something of that kind? That would be satisfactory to all the shipping companies and fairer to the boat that lays over more than three days.

Hon. members have heard that we have received a reduction from the shipping committee and the season now opens on August 10. I was very much disappointed that they did not see fit to extend the season a little; I had hoped that they would extend it to the first of the month. As a matter of fact, it could be moved up to the 15th of July with safety. I have been doing a good deal of reading of reports with respect to ice conditions in Hudson bay and I have read the reports from the special committee appointed by the senate some time ago to investigate this project. They went into the matter at great length and with great care. In 1920 the senate appointed a committee to investigate the whole subject, navigation, length of season and ice conditions, and the committee heard some very prominent witnesses. I want to place these names on the record because I think they should be there in connection with the discussion of the season. These were the witnesses who were called:

Anderson, Captain Frederick, Hydrographic Branch, Naval Service.
Anderson, Colonel W. P., Marine Department.
Bell, Major G. A., Deputy Minister, Railways and Canals.
Bernier, Captain J. E., Arctic Explorer.
Bowden, Mr. W. A., Chief Engineer, Railways and Canals.
Clawson, Mr. E. E., Department of Marine.
Cochrane, Hon. Frank, P.C., M.P.
Desbarats, Mr. J. G., Deputy Minister, Naval Service.
Freakley, Captain Norman E., Hudson's Bay Company Navigator.
McLachlan, Mr. D. W., Engineer-in-charge of Hudson Bay Terminals.
O'Hara, Mr. F. C. T., Deputy Minister, Trade and Commerce.
Payne, Mr. John Lambert, Statistician, Railways and Canals.
Prince, Prof. Edward E., Dominion Commissioner of Fisheries.
Stefansson, Mr. V., Arctic Explorer.
Thompson, Sergeant E. H. L., R.N.W.M.P.
Tyrell, Mr. J. B., Mining Engineer.
Tyrell, Mr. J. W., Civil Engineer.
Walton, Rev. W. G., Missionary.
White, Lance-Cpl. Richard, Nain, Labrador.

Surely these men must have known what they were talking about. The witnesses included a man like Captain Bernier, who had sailed the Arctic for twenty-five or thirty years and knew these waters as well as he knew his own back yard. What were the findings of the committee? Let me quote from section 2 of their report:

(2) That the season of navigation under present conditions is at least four months in length and may by reason of improvements in aids to navigation be considerably increased.

That is the view they expressed after hearing all the evidence of these experts—not the experts who sit behind mahogany desks in the old country, but men who had sailed in these northern waters and who knew what they were talking about. But we have also the department's own reports in regard to navigation conditions in Hudson bay and straits, in 1934 as well as in 1932. Go back, in the month of July, as far as you like and you will find that throughout that month in those two years, according to the reports, while there was the odd growler there all the time, there was no ice of any consequence, and many days there was no ice at all. So that we are not unreasonable in asking that the season be moved up. I do not say that the season should be advanced a month or six weeks at a time, but this year it might have been moved up to the first of August and, in my opinion, it could with safety be moved to the 15th of July. A boat cannot get into trouble either in the straits or in the bay even if it sights an iceberg, because at that time of the year there is daylight twenty-four hours of the day, and there are no shoals or reefs. It cannot hit bottom, nor will it pile up on an uncharted reef; and even if it did meet ice it could lie on the edge of the ice until the wind blew it away the next day. Take the Ocean Eagle, the government's boat, which goes into the straits every year in the month of July, reporting on ice conditions. What do they find? It is not unreasonable, from the reports that come from that boat, to ask that the season be extended a little. I know that we cannot expect to have the whole thing done in one year; we must move gradually, building up the port accordingly. I must say that I was disappointed that the season had not been moved ahead this year.

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. member explain what he means by the season being moved ahead? We do not control the season.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): The season of navigation.

Mr. MANION: We do not fix any dates for the season.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I am not asking that that be done by you; I was referring to the imperial shipping committee and I said that I was disappointed that they had not moved the season ahead—the first part of the season. I was not referring to the department at all but to the concessions granted with respect to insurance rates, and I said that I was very much disappointed that they had not moved the season ahead, opening up earlier.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I think that the facts as they are should go out. I want Churchill to be a success—not as much as my hon. friend wishes it, because it is in his constituency, but as much as the ordinary Canadian does. I am informed by my engineer that the first four boats going in last year were stuck in the ice. These boats are the Dalworth, the Rio Claro, the Brandon and the Grelhead. One went in on the 13th of August and the other three on the 14th of August and they were stuck in the ice. They could not have got in any sooner, so that the imperial shipping committee could not have advanced the season. I make this statement in justice to the government, because there is enough criticism from enemies of the government without any misunderstanding on the part of friends like the hon. gentleman. Last year the government spent, on investigating navigation conditions, the sum of $97,469.22, practically $100,000, and my department spent probably another $15,000 for our vessel, which continues the investigation after the marine boat goes out. I evidently misunderstood my hon. friend, who was referring to the shipping committee; but listening to him one might conclude that in his opinion an injustice was being done. No injustice is being done by the government, and neither the shipping committee nor the government can change ice conditions and allow ships to come in. As I have said, the first boat came in last year on August 13 and three others on August 14 and the last boat left on October 4, a period of less than two months. Certainly, so far as we are concerned, we have no control over boats. They come in when they wish and we are glad to receive them, and the port is ready to handle them when they come in. As a matter of fact, the elevator is full now. The harbour itself is free of ice in plenty of time, but the ice coming from Fox channel blocks the strait and bay. I submit that, in association with the statements which my hon. friend has made, the facts as given by the officers of the department should be put on the record.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I did not suggest that the department had control over ice conditions or the opening of the season. I repeat, I was referring to the imperial shipping committee. But it does not matter if a boat does get into the ice; nothing can happen to her, because she has only to lie there until the wind blows the ice away. I do not doubt that they do see ice there in July; I have seen ice around the fifteenth. But the Ocean Eagle goes out in July and, according to the reports from that boat, there is nothing to fear. I know that every captain that goes into the port is delighted with the route, and with all due respect to Montreal we do not hesitate to say that the captains would much prefer to go to Churchill any time rather than to Montreal. There are considerably fewer dangers on that route. But either the witnesses that appeared before the committee, who are well known to everybody, who are experts and men who have navigated the northern waters for years, do not know what they are talking about, or some of the officials of the department may know more than those men do about the matter, and even the imperial shipping committee may know more—but I have my doubts about the latter. I appreciate what the department have done and are doing, and I thank them for it. I feel at Churchill they have one of the finest staffs of men that I have come into contact with in my life so far as administration work is concerned. They cheerfully do everything they can for everybody who goes in there and are very highly spoken of by all the captains and others who enter that port. I appreciate the fact that the department have spent a great deal of money there, but if we wish to magnify that, we might also check up how much money they spent getting the last two or three boats out of Montreal at the end of the shipping season and the first two or three boats into that port in the spring. That might cost three or perhaps four times as much and there is not very much said about it. We might put that statement on Hansard while we are discussing the question.

I want to thank the officials for what they are doing at Churchill and for the interest they are showing in the route; I refer especially to the officials at the port. I think the time has arrived, now that construction work has been completed, that the government should interest themselves in trying to get some more business for that route. The Department of Railways and Canals, whether it operates directly or through the Canadian National Railways who are acting as its agents, is selling transportation; it is also selling port facilities and elevator storage and facilities. If you want to sell goods these days, you must advertise. I stated before in the house that there was one handicap in securing business for that route, although the Saskatchewan wheat pool I believe made good use of it last year and saved themselves something like two and one-half cents a bushel by doing so, even at the high insurance rates and excessive cost of shipping. I believe they intend to make greater use of that route this year. There were also shipped out of Churchill five hundred head of cattle, and the man who shipped them informed me that they netted the producer $35 a head, whereas he could not have got more than $12 a head had he shipped them to Winnipeg or Prince Albert stockyard. This would mean something to the sections of western Canada that this road can economically serve.

An hon. member asked the minister whether he could give him any idea of the prospects for next year. All I can say is that I am satisfied the Saskatchewan wheat pool will ship a good deal more grain out of Churchill next season than they did last. As I said, they made a saving of about two and one-half cents a bushel, which will be increased by almost a cent by the reduction in insurance rates in the coming season. But there is another angle and a very important one to this situation. The government have announced on the order paper that they are going into the grain business. I am not going to discuss the grain act now because I know this is not the proper time to do so, but there is an aspect of it I intend to discuss. If the government are going into the grain business, it is only natural they will seek those routes which have been proven by experience to be the most economical by which to ship their grain. This is where Churchill will come in to its own. The government have built the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill; they own these; all the facilities and equipment are there. There will be no excuse for their not using that route when that legislation goes through, as I hope it will. This new grain board we are going to create will I believe prove a fairy godfather to that route, and I am not afraid of competition from any source if the route is given a square deal and if some effort is made to increase business.

One handicap we are up against—and I think I mentioned this before in the house—is this: while the Canadian National Railways have been acting as contractors in the construction of the Hudson Bay road and have been operating it, they are not interested in securing business for it. If I were to go to any Canadian National station agent in Saskatchewan or Manitoba and discuss the question of shipping from one to ten carloads of grain through Churchill, naturally that gentleman, working for the Canadian National Railways, would present all the arguments he could possibly think of to prevent me from so doing; he would naturally want me to ship my grain via Port Arthur or Fort William. That is only natural because he receives honour marks for any new business he secures for the Canadian National. He would get no credit for any business he secured for the Hudson Bay Railway. The time has now arrived for some cooperation between the Hudson Bay Railway and the port of Churchill, and the Canadian National Railway officials and employees.

Mr. MANION: Before my hon. friend gets away from that subject, I should be glad if he would draw to my attention the name of any agent who does any such thing as that, because I shall certainly report the matter to the management at Montreal. The hon. member's statement is the first I have ever heard of such a case.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I mentioned it in the house about two years ago.

Mr. MANION: I do not remember, but if my hon. friend will give me any instance where that has happened, I shall be glad to draw it to the attention of the management.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): That has been brought to my attention in different parts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and it is only natural that would be the attitude the agent would take. He is not interested in the Hudson Bay Railway; he is interested in the Canadian National Railway.

Some steps should be taken to create a colonization department in connection with that route. There are thousands of acres of first class agricultural land along that road. Many people have had to leave the dry belts in the south and to go north looking for some new spots in which to start over again. I do not know of any better place that men with that pioneering spirit could go to than up along the Hudson Bay railway. You can grow there almost anything you can grow anywhere else in Canada except fruits, and there are wild fruits there. You can grow grain and roots equal in quality and yield to that raised in any other part of the country; that is amply demonstrated at any point where the train stops. The settlers going in there would have an opportunity which they would not have in some of the other northern sections and into which they are going now, due to the fact that the lakes along that road are teeming with fish. There are also plenty of game and fur bearing animals and they could pick up a little bit of fur in the winter which would help them at the time they needed money most. There are many other opportunities that do not present themselves in other parts of the country to which they are trekking now. Such new settlements along the line would create increased business which the railways need and it naturally should be looked for. I hope at the earliest possible moment the department will give consideration to this matter and that steps will be taken to try to get some idea of what can be done along that line. Some years ago the dominion government surveyed the land from I think The Pas to about mile 214 on both sides of the railway. The surveyors were then dominion government surveyors; since then the land has been turned over to the provincial government and naturally the field notes made by the dominion government surveyors were turned over with the land. I am quite sure the information could be secured as to where those blocks of land are, the type of soil and what it is best suited to grow. This is very important, and I again say that I hope the government will give some consideration to the matter.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to delay my own estimates, but I think the hon. member for North Winnipeg asked about the exports from Churchill. I gave them from memory and I was not very far out. The actual figures are: 4,000,000 bushels of wheat —I said four and a half—4,000 bushels of oats, 4,000 tons of flour and mill stuff, 8 tons of honey, 580 head of cattle and not quite 2,500,000 feet of lumber. These are the total shipments from Churchill last year.

Mr. HEAPS: And the imports?

Mr. MANION: General cargo, 382 net tons; window glass, 459 net tons; bagged coal, 733 net tons, and 890 tons of bunker coal: total imports of 2,500 net tons in round figures—not quite a cargo.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When this item was up for discussion last year, and the question of marine insurance came up, the minister admitted that, notwithstanding the reductions given, the rates on the Hudson Bay route were still four or five times as high as on the St. Lawrence route. The acting Prime Minister a week or so ago, when announcing a twenty-five per cent reduction, did not say exactly how it was to be figured, but I understand it still leaves the rate three or four times as high by the Hudson Bay route as by the St. Lawrence. It seeems to me that the greatest handicap to this port is not icebergs or shoals or anything of that kind, but the abnormally high marine insurance rate. I have never blamed the minister for it very much; I suppose it is one of the handicaps that all new routes have to contend with. It has been the story of navigation all the world over from time immemorial, any new ocean, rail or caravan route has that great handicap to fight. But it seems to me that if we really mean to get the fullest use from this investment something else will have to be done to get over the uncertainty regarding the alleged dangers of the route. The insurance men in London are not going to worry about it. It is a small matter to them; they are not going to take any chances but will let time demonstrate what the risks are. Meantime some of us are getting past middle life and would like to see more benefit being obtained and more use made of this port, after having spent part of a lifetime getting it. Did it ever occur to the minister that something more might be done? This is a day of talk about state ownership and reforms of one kind and another; would it not constitute a great reform for the government to step in and shorten this period of uncertainty by assuming some share of the obligation of experimentation? Other ports might object, you may say. Well, I recall quite well that the Vancouver outlet for grain was assisted by the building of a second railway with very low grades, also by very low rates, the Crowsnest rates by the Yellowhead pass route, with the result that trade began to flow via the Pacific route, but not until those advantages were given it. Now we have this other route by Hudson bay, and the Crowsnest rates have been applied there. But it occurs to me that the government might do worse than establish a marine insurance branch in the Department of Marine and Fisheries to provide marine insurance for all Canadian ports, at cost plus whatever reserve is necessary to take care of contingencies. That would be a great advantage to the St. Lawrence route also, as it would not then have the disadvantage of a higher rate than shipments via American Atlantic ports. That seems to me worth considering, and it would be fair to all ports. We speak about restrictions and handicaps on our ports, and there are grave restrictions on the use of our ports, without going into it in detail. Anything that would facilitate the greater use of our ports would be of advantage to our railways and to everyone concerned, particularly as there is little or no marine insurance written in this country. I commend the idea to the minister. In spite of the fact that he represents a rival port I think he has not done too badly—I will give him that commendation; but he is not galloping in the direction of helping Hudson bay. For not being as bad as he might have been I give him the credit that is coming to him. I would not be making this suggestion now if I did not think he would give it at least fair consideration. It would be in the interests of Canada to establish marine insurance for all our ports, put them all on an equal footing and see what can be done in regard to attracting a greater volume of trade to our shores, to all our ports and especially Hudson bay. The Atlantic ports, Saint John and Halifax, have the advantage of proximity, the short haul across the Atlantic, and being open all the year—I understand in some years Saint John is not open the whole year, but Halifax is.

Mr. QUINN: If I may be permitted to correct my hon. friend, Saint John is open all the year round.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I am glad to be corrected. I was merely pointing out that they are not in need of as much sympathy as either Hudson bay or the St. Lawrence route, and neither is Vancouver nor other Pacific ports. Anything that tends to drive away traffic is a handicap to a port. A government that professes to be introducing reforms would accomplish a real reform by taking such an advanced step. I am of the opinion that we are in the grip of a huge insurance combine. Perhaps that is not the way to put it, but we are in the hands of one company, and it is situated overseas. It is under those circumstances, when there is a real cinch obtained on any business, that governments are justified in intervening. I am not usually an advocate of governments rushing into business, except when there is some abuse to correct, but it looks to me as if we are in the hands of practically one marine insurance company on the other side of the Atlantic. Here is the finest chance in the world for a real reform with the least disturbance of established business that you could conceive of; and anyway, why not give our ports the advantage of the cheapest insurance rates consistent with meeting the cost? I would like the minister to express his views on this.

Mr. MANION: No doubt the hon. gentleman is quite sincere in his suggestion, even though he did rather damn me with faint praise—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I was pretty fair.

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes, the hon. gentleman and I have been very fair to each other for a long time now. But I doubt if the government of Canada would be justified, whether this government or any other, in going into the insurance business in any port. As I pointed out a few moments ago, according to last year's returns we were down $208,000 in round figures in operation alone, and that of course allows nothing for interest on the rather huge investment. As my hon. friend says, the matter of insurance is under the control of the imperial shipping committee, but I doubt if they would be particularly interested in interfering in any way with the port of Churchill. Undoubtedly the rates at Churchill will gradually improve as the route proves itself, so to speak. The unfortunate accident that happened two or three years ago, the sinking of the Bright Fan, no doubt threw back some considerable distance the lowering of the insurance rates at that port. It was one of those unfortunate accidents that I do not think should be blamed on the port, but as I understand it the insurance companies figure out their rates on an actuarial basis, and the loss that had to be paid in connection with the Bright Fan no doubt wiped out whatever profits might accrue in connection with Churchill for quite a time. Consequently as time goes on the insurance rates will go down, and I believe they will go down fairly rapidly because I agree with much that was said by my hon. friend from Nelson in regard to Churchill. I have heard the captains of some steamships make very complimentary remarks about the route and the ease with which they can navigate it; I heard those remarks on two occasions when I was there, and I think in the near future, as traffic increases, there will be no difficulty about the rates coming down. The government are acting very energetically on that question, just as I am sure my hon. friends would continue to act if by any misfortune they should be returned to power after the next election. I doubt very much, however, if any government would be justified in going into the insurance business; I rather feel that the government of Canada is in a sufficient number of businesses already. My hon. friend mentioned the chief objection himself when he pointed out that you could hardly pick out one port and more or less root for it, if I may use a street expression. My hon. friend from Nelson, who deserves a great deal of credit for the energetic way in which he has boosted that route and that section of the country, brought up another question. He thought the government should go out and, in a sense, solicit traffic for the Hudson Bay route. I did not wish to interrupt him because I had done so two or three times, but the fact struck me just as it does in regard to insurance, that the government of a country, being a national government, cannot—

Mr. HANBURY: Play favourites.

Mr. MANION: Exactly; it cannot play favourites; it cannot pick one port and endeavour to ship traffic that way. The moment we tried to do that, whether we did it for Vancouver, Montreal, Quebec, Saint John, Halifax or Churchill, we would be criticized by the other ports for favouring one. It is a very complicated question; I do not think it is as easy as my hon. friend seemed to think, and I know he thinks it is a great deal easier when he is in opposition than he would if he were supporting a government again. The matter has been considered, but I believe the port is doing very well, considering the depressed condition of world shipping and world trade at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not recommending any discriminatory treatment of Churchill; rather I was recommending a government policy that would apply equally to all ports. Surely there is nothing inconsistent in that. I do not know what my hon. friend from Nelson recommended; I heard only part of his remarks. Speaking of the Bright Fan, however, I think the government were rather indifferent on that occasion. They should have sent in the strongest possible recommendation that that captain should never sail those waters again.

Mr. MANION: I do not think he ever has.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then it is not because the government vetoed it, so far as I can make out.

Mr. MANION: We could not veto it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You could have reported to the overseas authorities that the captain was avowedly unfit to take care of a ship. That ship was off its course; it did not have a gyro compass, and ordinary precautions were not taken on the bridge. In the gray dawn, just before morning, an eighteen year old youth was at the wheel; one officer was snoring and dreaming, another man was having a cup of tea and the boy was there alone. It was almost a criminal state of affairs. I never heard of any recommendation from this government to the British government with regard to that conduct on the part of one of their certified mariners or masters or whatever he was called. It seems to me a good deal more could have been done in order to protect that port from such a degenerate captain again. Why, if I had wanted to get some old hulk sunk all I had to do was get hold of that vessel master and send him into those isolated waters. From what I can make out Lloyd's never inquired whether or not they were justified in paying the full insurance; they just paid it.

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will permit me, the marine department did investigate so far as its powers went, but the matter was not within our jurisdiction; we had no way of interfering with this ship. The facts, as my hon. friend states them, are roughly correct, but the government had no power to intervene. The captain ran the ship in and he ran it out. My hon. friend from Nelson rather thinks they hunted around for an iceberg, as he expressed it once, and he may be right; I do not know, but the government had no power to interfere. So far as the captain is concerned, so far as I know that captain has not been back with another vessel. I understand that he could not get a vessel, so I really do not think the government, to do justice to it, was in any position to do more than it did.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the minister think it would be inconsistent on his part to try to get traffic for the road that was built by his department at a cost of $50,000,000?

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will permit me to answer, I will say yes, I do think it would be inconsistent. We also built the Canadian National down to Halifax and Saint John and west to Vancouver and Prince Rupert. If we picked out Churchill and endeavoured to get traffic for it, we would have to pick out all the others also; then we would be on an even keel again and we would not get anywhere. The Canadian National is going after traffic and having very good success. I do not think we can be expected to devote special efforts to the Hudson Bay railway in preference to the other lines, because they all belong to the government and they are all doing a fair share of business.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not referring to the Canadian National; I think the records go to show that it is doing pretty well and is getting its share of the traffic. I had reference to the Hudson Bay railway only. It is a link there between the Canadian National and Churchill, if they care to use it; we have a new port and if someone does not boost it the traffic will just about stay where it is indefinitely, with these strangulating insurance rates. This generation will pass on without knowing much of the benefits of that short route. Some day, by some fortune, if we have a great amount of traffic such as we have had in other years, when the peak load will require every conceivable outlet in the fall of the year, probably Churchill will be used more, but I do not think we should wait for that accident to happen. I think it should be used as a new route, as an enterprise taken in hand by the government of Canada, by both parties, for the last fifty years. Now that we have it there is a hindrance to its use in the form of marine insurance that practically damns the whole undertaking. Are we just going to let it drift along and survive or not just as it likes or are we going to do something to give it a chance to get on its feet and earn the right to a lower insurance rate through a greater volume of traffic? That would be my suggestion. If the government do not see it that way we will just have to let it go. I suppose most of us will live to see what the new government will do with regard to it. Maybe they will do just the same as my hon. friend did, but maybe they won't. My recollection of the former government is that they found Nelson the most impossible place on this green earth to build a port. At least we should be credited with diverting the railway to a national harbour like Churchill, where there is some possibility of making a useful port and one which will eventually become a great exit and inlet for traffic to and from Canada.

Mr. REID: I should like for one moment to endeavour to contradict the statement made by the hon. member for Melville. He pointed out to the minister that if the rates which operated to New Westminster and Vancouver were in operation on the Hudson Bay Railway, the railway would be developed. We on the Pacific coast say this: Give us the same rates as the Hudson Bay railway and east, and let the flow of traffic go where it will. I am confident that if the same rates applied to the ports of New Westminster and Vancouver, and if traffic were allowed to take its choice, the rates being equal by far the greater quantity of grain would pass out through the Pacific coast ports. If that practice were followed I believe the railways would get greater revenues than they are now getting. Going to eastern ports the grain passes through Fort William and after that time the railways lose it. If it passed through the ports of New Westminster or Vancouver the railway would receive a greater revenue. We have not the Crowsnest Pass rate going east; that is one kick we have. However I could not allow the hon. member for Melville to get away with the statement that we had an advantage over the Hudson Bay railway. I say to him and to the minister that they have the Crowsnest pass rate, while we have not. However, I argued these points not very long ago.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My understanding is that on the Canadian National the Crowsnest rates operate to the Pacific, while on the Canadian Pacific they do not. Whether or not that is correct I cannot say. I do know, however, that because of the very heavy grades which in the beginning the Canadian Pacific railway had to operate—and I believe they still have to though now lessened—some consideration had to be given, especially when that railway had to compete with the lower grades of the Canadian National railways. My understanding is that the Canadian National railway to the Pacific has the Crowsnest rate on grain.

Mr. HANBURY: The same structure.

Mr. MANION: Well, let us argue it out next year.

Mr. REID: I am afraid the hon. member for Melville was not in his seat when I spoke about freight rates.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know the national railway get much lower rates than it had before the Liberal government came into power anyway.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Where does the minister establish the revenue of $456,000? Is that the actual freight collections on goods and merchandise?

Mr. MANION: That is the traffic which passed over the line. Roughly speaking there were about 4,500,000 bushels of wheat, together with other traffic which went up and cargoes which came down.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—
Canada's contribution to the expenses of the International Commission for Air Navigation for 1935, $1,720.

Mr. POULIOT: What has the government to say with regard to the eastern Locarno pact?

The CHAIRMAN: This item is for air navigation.

Mr. POULIOT: The acting Prime Minister laughs when I ask a question like that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not laughing at all. The hon. member has raised a serious question, but may I call his attention to the fact that we are discussing air navigation?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. What does the government say? What are the government's views with regard to the air pact between European nations, a condition which comes very close to the eastern Locarno pact and a matter which is of momentous importance? I would gladly listen to the observations which could be made by the acting Prime Minister.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should be pleased to answer the hon. member if he raised the question at some other time. It could be answered if it were placed on the order paper. However, the present item really has nothing to do with the matter he is discussing.

Mr. POULIOT: : I submit my observations are pertinent. Every time a vote is called the government should be ready to give an explanation. This is a matter of tremendous importance and one which concerns not only Canada but the whole world. My question relates to a pact to which European powers agreed, and as we are members of the League of Nations I say such a question is of the utmost importance. I am sure the acting Prime Minister is ready to answer; otherwise he would not have called the item.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. POULIOT: No. I am entitled to an answer from the right hon. gentleman, who lived in London for a long time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This item has to do with civil air navigation and has no connection with military matters.

Mr. POULIOT: Very often I have read in the press that in any future warfare Germany would use commercial planes. A commercial plane could be used in warfare for purposes of carrying bombs, and could bring destruction upon an opposing territory. Therefore I say this is a matter of great concern. Does the acting Prime Minister contend that commercial planes would not be used in warfare? He knows better than that. He knows very well that these planes would be used for purposes of carrying bombs and creating destruction and disturbances.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. I ask for the views held by the government. Canada is a member of the League of Nations, and both before and since 1930 we have sent delegates to the meetings held at Geneva. As the right hon. gentleman acted as high commissioner for some time he is in a better position than any other member of the government to answer my question. I respectfully ask him to answer me on the point; I insist upon an answer because I say I have spoken about a matter of great concern.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No. Will the acting Prime Minister leave the impression that he refuses to express the views held by the government on a question so important as the one I have raised? Everywhere this is a matter of great concern, and yet it would seem we are indifferent to it. If we are indifferent let us drop all these votes for the League of Nations and such other lines of endeavour. I have asked a straight question and I do not understand why I should not receive a straight answer.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No. If it is passed it will be passed on division.

Item agreed to on division.

Amount required to meet loss on exchange, subject to approval of the treasury board, $200,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the explanation of this item?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It was found that in many countries where we have representatives the exchange was such that they suffered a great deal of loss in turning their Canadian cheques into the money of the country—in Switzerland, France, and I think one other country. We thought it only fair that an allowance should be made to these servants of the state to make up this loss occasioned by the rate of exchange which existed between the currency of the country in which they live and our dollar.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do we get any money back from them when the exchange is in their favour?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does this apply to trade commissioners as well as members of legations?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, to all our servants of the state in such countries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is only fair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The amount is less this year than last.

Mr. POULIOT: Why do we have to vote this huge sum of $200,000? It is because the world economic conference of 1933 was a fiasco. One of the most important questions under discussion at the conference was the stabilization of currencies in order that there should be no such losses as the minister mentions. We heard the Prime Minister before that conference say that that question was of the utmost importance, yet nothing was agreed to at the conference. Although the Prime Minister saved the conference it died two or three days afterwards, and here we are voting $200,000 because that world conference of 1933 was a fiasco. Enough of that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How long has this system been in vogue?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: For two or three years I think, since the exchange was so difficult.

Mr. POULIOT: It shows another thing. It shows that when people pretend our dollar is above par that is a falsehood; for otherwise we would not have to vote this amount. The Canadian dollar is under par in several countries.

Item agreed to.

Canada's portion of expenditure of the imperial economic committee and imperial shipping committee and the executive council of the imperial agricultural bureau for 1935, $18,690.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is for the purpose of paying our share of the expenditures of the two committees and the bureau named, in which all the dominions are interested with the mother country. For instance, I read in the house the other day the arrangement that had been made by the imperial shipping committee for lowering the rates in connection with the Hudson Bay route.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has this vote any relationship to vote No. 50 under agriculture for contributions to empire bureaux? The Minister of Agriculture explained that item when it was before the committee, and this seems to be almost the same service in connection with the imperial agricultural bureau.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I can assure the hon. gentleman we will not pay the accounts twice.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is the basis on which this amount is fixed?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry I have not the percentages here, but I shall be glad to get them for my hon. friend. Would he like me to send them to him?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was wondering if it was on population, or what was the basis.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I shall be very glad to obtain the information.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My own guess would be that this vote, or part of it, is to pay our share of the administration expenditure of the executive council of the imperial agricultural bureaux in the same way as we pay our share in connection with the council of the agricultural institute at Rome.

Mr. POULIOT: With regard to the work of the agricultural bureaux, I remember distinctly last year when the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Parent) was speaking he mentioned something about Canadian dairy exports to Great Britain. He said that the Minister of Agriculture had said, to use his own words, that the United Kingdom market was the best market for Canadian dairy products. Then the Minister of Agriculture rose and said, "I did not say that." I wonder what the Minister of Agriculture meant when he said that in reply to the hon. member for Terrebonne.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think I should be asked to give an answer to that question. I endeavoured to follow the first "this" and "that" and then the next "that" and "this," but I would rather have the direct statement in front of me before giving an answer.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister should not be fresh with me. I will tell him exactly what happened. The hon. member for Terrebonne said to the minister—I have this distinctly in mind and I have it upstairs in print and could get it in a moment or two—that the minister had declared that the United Kingdom was our best market for Canadian dairy products, and the Minister of Agriculture replied to the hon. member for Terrebonne, "I did not say that." Now, without using anew the word "that," may I ask what the minister meant by such a reply. I have stated the case to him very clearly.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Before I give any answer, Mr. Chairman, I feel that I should read the statement for myself, because what I said might have depended on certain conditions. The value of the market might have been under consideration, or the volume of goods it was possible to absorb, or the price in one particular market for certain dairy products as compared with another market.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LAPOINTE

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I rise to a question of privilege. I see in a report in the Montreal Gazette of this morning the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), speaking in that city, is reported as having said:

There was no difference between Liberal and Conservative in any case, he explained. Both Liberals and Conservatives for instance, have joined forces and voted solidly against letting the dominion mayors present their case in parliament, and that was typical of any important question aired in the house. An amendment to the budget asking for a public works program had been ganged up on in the same manner.

First, I never voted against hearing the mayors of the dominion; I voted to sustain the ruling of the chair that the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was not in order and could not come under standing order 31 of the rules of the house. Second, I never voted against an amendment asking for a public works program. Third, if the records of the house are looked into for the last three or four sessions, it will be found that the hon. gentleman voted with the government a good deal oftener than I did. Apart from that, the statement may be correct.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

DEFAMATION OF PERSONS, OR GROUPS ON ACCOUNT OF RACE, COLOUR OR RELIGION

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 51, to amend the criminal code (Libel).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The purpose of this bill is to prevent the uncalled for defamation of persons or groups on account of race, colour or religion. I would not have brought this matter up, sir, if it had not touched on a very vital and fundamental principle of national life because such defamation cannot have any other effect than to set up race against race, religious groups against religious groups, and cause unnecessary dissension among the people of this country. This amendment to the criminal code is intended to stop and prevent offences of this nature. My plea is on behalf of all aliens, or citizens of foreign origin, no matter from what country they may have come, and generally speaking all citizens who happen to be victims of this kind of defamation, to the end that the unity of the country may be preserved and the disruption thereof prevented.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNITED STATES MINISTER

EXPRESSIONS OF REGRET AT THE DEATH OF HON. WARREN DELANO ROBBINS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this house will consider it fitting that reference should be made to-day to a very unfortunate occurrence, the sudden and untimely death in New York yesterday of the Hon. Warren D. Robbins who was United States Minister to Canada. Mr. Robbins was appointed to this office about two years ago. He had then been a member of the diplomatic service of the United States for some twenty years or more, and had held posts in many places as representative of his country, among others Portugal, France, Berlin and Rome, also Argentina, Chile and Central America. Besides that he had at intervals served the State Department as advisor and delegate at various international conferences. Mr. Robbins therefore brought to Canada an unusually wide experience of world affairs. He established very friendly relations here, officially and socially, with the people of Ottawa, and he and his wife made for themselves a distinctive place in the life of this country. During these two short years we have reason to appreciate not only his skill and fairness but also the able way in which he put forward the views of his own government, and helped to interpret his country to Canada and also our Canadian views to his own country. He was ill in New York for about a week; this was not supposed to be very serious until Friday or Saturday, and on Saturday night he passed away. He was only in his fiftieth year and therefore might have looked forward to many more years in the service of his country in the career in which he had so distinguished himself.

This government has already sent messages of sympathy to Mrs. Robbins and also to the government of the United States, but as I have said, it seems to me only fitting that we should make reference in this house to-day to this very sad occurrence, and should express our regrets at Mr. Robbins' most untimely and sudden death, and our sympathy with Mrs. Robbins and family. I would therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house to convey to Mrs. Robbins our feelings in that regard.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I say that I wholeheartedly agree with the right hon. acting leader of the government in regarding it as most fitting that this house should express its feeling with respect to the untimely and sudden death of Mr. Warren Robbins, the late Minister for the United States at Ottawa. Mr. Robbins' passing constitutes the first break which has been occasioned by death in the diplomatic corps in Ottawa during the eight years of its existence. Although Mr. Robbins had been resident in Ottawa only for two years, his kindly personality was such that he had come to be known by most of the citizens of the capital, and certainly by all of us who have to do with public affairs, and I am sure his death will be deeply felt very much beyond official circles. I had expected that my right hon. friend would make the felicitous reference he did to the appreciation which the government felt of the manner in which the late minister's official duties were performed. Personally, I, naturally, did not have any official relations with Mr. Robbins, but I was privileged to enjoy a rather intimate friendship with him, and he always impressed me as a man who had uppermost in his mind the thought of furthering the best of friendly relations between the country which he represented and the country to which he came. He was by no means exclusive in his friendships and sought to have men, to whatever political party they might belong, feel that he was concerned above all else with what might best serve the common interest. As the acting leader of the government has just said, Mr. Robbins might well have looked forward to many years of useful public service. His death will be the more keenly felt not only in that it was so unexpected but because his own country as well as other countries have been robbed of his large experience and helpful spirit in matters pertaining to international affairs.

Personally and on behalf of all hon. members on this side of the house may I say that we would wish to join with hon. gentlemen opposite in having an expression of sympathy of the entire house conveyed to Mrs. Robbins and to the members of the family of the late minister, as well as to his mother, all of whom have been so greatly bereaved. Might I add that I think it would be equally appropriate to extend our expression of sympathy to the President of the United States in the loss he has sustained not only through the death of his representative in this country but in being bereaved of one who was also a relative.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I may say, Mr. Speaker, that a message of sympathy is being sent the President of the United States by the King, through the Governor General and the minister at Washington.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, it was with deep regret that we learned of the untimely death of the Hon. Warren Delano Robbins, diplomatic representative of the United States to Canada. His death was wholly unexpected. The acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley) and the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) have already paid fitting tribute to his memory. May we in this corner of the house be associated with that tribute, and may we join with other members in expressing to Mrs. Robbins and her family our deep sympathy.

SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton): I should like to ask if it is the intention of the government to retain and pay the sessional employees now employed, during the Easter adjournment.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The Speaker of the house consulted with the internal economy commission, and it was considered that although this Easter recess is longer than usual, the staff should be treated in the same way they always have been treated at the Easter recess.

DISTURBANCE AT PROJECT NO. 42

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. A. CAMPBELL (Frontenac-Addington): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling). I am sorry I was not able to do so before the house opened, but I have only just returned to Ottawa after spending the week end at my home. I understand that at project No. 42, which is under the Department of National Defence, there has been some considerable disturbance during the past week. It has not amounted to a riot or anything like that, but considerable amounts of goods were missing. I understand that the mounted police have discovered these goods but that no arrests have been made. Rumours are flying around—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. CAMPBELL: My question is whether the government have been advised of this matter and, if so, whether they are taking any action. I mention it because the men in charge of the project—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has asked his question.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): I did not clearly catch the remarks of my hon. friend, but I shall be glad to read them in Hansard and give him an answer to-morrow.

RECIPROCITY NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): The leader of the government was kind enough to promise me an answer to-day to a question I asked on Friday in connection with the progress of the reciprocity arrangements.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): In reply I would say that it is too early to make any definite statement as to the progress of trade negotiations with the United States. The authorities of that country have only now completed the public hearings required under their trade agreements act. No reciprocity negotiations are under way with Japan.

WAYS AND MEANS

OBJECTION TO PROLONGED ADJOURNMENT EXPRESSED IN AMENDMENT TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I desire to make a few remarks concerning a matter which I believe to be of great importance to this house and to the country, and I intend to conclude with an amendment to the motion. I desire to speak—and I hope it is not too late—on the intimated intention of the government to ask this house to adjourn for the protracted period of five weeks. I believe this suspension is not in the public interest or in the interests of the country, and I wish to give a few reasons for my conviction in that regard.

Everyone will agree, Mr. Speaker, that when parliament is summoned for the dispatch of business it must be kept in session from day to day in a continuous way. I remember having heard the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) quote Sir Wilfrid Laurier to that effect. A few years ago, the last time a motion of this character was before the house, this question was discussed and I well remember what was then stated by leading members of the house, some of whom are now members of the government and others of whom are still members of the house. I should like to take the liberty of quoting some of the expressions of view then given. There are many members of this house who were also members in 1926, when conditions were of an unusual character. The general election of 1925 had been inconclusive, due to the fact that the verdict had not been decisive. Neither of the two great parties in Canada had received a majority of the votes, and the balance of power was obviously in the hands of a certain group of independent gentlemen who had been elected either as Progressives, as United Farmers or as Labour members. The government took the only course which was logical and constitutional under the circumstances, and summoned parliament to meet at the earliest possible date after the last writs of the elections had been received.

The house met on January 7, 1926. Upon that occasion I had the honour to lead the government, due to the fact that my right hon. leader who had been very active everywhere in Canada except in his own constituency had suffered defeat in North York. No humiliation attaches to that fact because the same had happened to Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden —indeed, to all the great statesmen of Canada.

However, the fact was that he was not in the house. The first business was to decide which party was to form the government of Canada for the period of that parliament. Immediately upon the opening of parliament the question of confidence was put before the House of Commons, the then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, mentioning the fact that nine ministers including the Prime Minister had been defeated. A debate on the subject ensued in an endeavour to ascertain who had the confidence of the majority in the house, and the final division which took place on January 14 revealed by a vote of 123 to 120 that the then government should continue until the end of that parliament.

The following Monday, namely on January 18, the first business which must always be considered, namely the address in reply to the speech from the throne, was moved. The debate on this motion continued until February 1, at which time a division was taken on an amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition. The address was not voted. I notice some hon. members smiling; undoubtedly they will remember the circumstances. On February 2, I moved:

> That when this house adjourns immediately after the conclusion of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, it stand adjourned until March 15, 1926.

I must remind the house that at that time the Prime Minister was in the midst of an election campaign in the constituency of Prince Albert, that there was no minister elected for the province of Ontario, that other ministers had been defeated and that there was a very urgent need and necessity for a reorganization of the government, something which could not be done in the absence of the Prime Minister, or at a time when he was fighting an election in the constituency of Prince Albert. As hon. members will recall, the motion was strenuously opposed. I am not complaining; I am simply relating the facts, and laying before this chamber the doctrine expounded by hon. members then sitting in the house. I have many quotations, but shall refer to only a few of them.

At page 633 of Hansard for 1926, Sir Henry Drayton is reported as follows:

> But there are other considerations, Mr. Speaker. The whole machinery of parliament, such as it is, is running. I wonder if hon. gentlemen ever stop to think what that means. It means that we have upwards of three hundred employees, if not more—I do not pretend to give a definite figure, but I know my figure is approximately correct—at work in connection with this machine. Parliament was called. and they are all here. Commitments have been made, and everything is now to stop simply because a moribund government is to try to resuscitate itself.

I shall not quote the observations of the late member for East Algoma, Mr. Nicholson. At page 639 of Hansard the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) is reported as follows:

Now I say again that this government has not the slightest right to ask parliament for an adjournment for even one hour. The business of this country must be looked after. We have a great army of unemployed workingmen who hardly know where they are going to get their daily bread, and if this government remains in power much longer the people will be coming here and praying, not to heaven but to the government: Give us this day our daily bread. I say that the business of the country must go on; this government or some government must function. This government has proved itself absolutely incapable of carrying on, and some other government must be put in its place.

Then, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) the present Prime Minister is reported:

Now, look at another part of the speech from the throne. I observe, for instance, that they say certain of the departments of the public service will be consolidated with others, and government services more effectively coordinated.

Just as in this year.

There is a statement of a fact, or of an intention, at least, to implement a promise by legislation. I submit that this legislation must be known to this government; they must know now, they must have known when they asked His Excellency to meet this house; they must have known at that moment what departments were to be wiped out, and what departments were to be coordinated. Therefore that legislation must be ready for this house to consider. Is it right, or just or fair; is it consonant with sound and decent principles of integrity that they should ask this house to adjourn now in the face of that direct promise with respect to legislation? I ask my hon. friend then what departments of the public service will be consolidated, and if the legislation is ready. If he cannot answer that question he should not have put those words in the mouth of His Excellency when he met this parliament. They either know or they do not know. If they do konw we should be told; if they do not know they have deceived parliament and the people of this country.

Then at page 640 the same hon. member is again reported:

I name these things for this reason, because they indicate clearly that if this government was sincere—and I use that word not offensively—if it meant what it said by the language put in the mouth of His Excellency when it met this parliament, then they have a legislative program ready for this house to consider. If they have no legislative program ready, they should have said so; but if in saying they have a legislative program ready they have deceived us, then I submit they are not entitled to an adjournment under any conditions.

And again at page 642:

That is a matter which doubtless they can settle with their constituents, but I know mine did not send me here to sit, then to adjourn for six weeks, and come back when the spring is here and the summer months coming on, when men grow listless in the discharge of their duties; but rather they sent me here at the season and time parliament is called upon to function to discharge my duties to the best of my ability.

At page 642 Mr. Bennett says:

If a program is ready—you cannot deny it, because if you do, you have put something in the mouth of His Excellency that was not true and have deceived the people—if you have the program ready, proceed with it. There is business enough to engage the time of this parliament till the Prime Minister comes back. There are trade treaties to consider, the reorganization of departments, and surely we do not require his massive eloquence for the purpose of enabling us to pass this legislation.

At page 643 he said:

I ask them (the government) to consider this: In all seriousness do they for a moment think that to ask this house to adjourn for six weeks for the reasons given, under the circumstances stated, is to do other than to bring into still greater contempt than they are now held, the institutions under which democracy flourishes in Canada.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) made quite a number of remarks, but I shall give only a few quotations. At page 644 he said:

It raises a very practical issue with each hon. member in this house. We have come from various parts of Canada, and some of us from very distant parts. We have made our arrangements to remain here during the session of parliament to continue our residence in Ottawa until our parliamentary duties have been performed. Now the government proposes to put us in such a position that we shall have to disrupt these arrangements, make new arrangements at great personal inconvenience, and in many cases at great personal loss.

Then at page 645 of Hansard he said:

Have we not an interest in the matter? I submit we have. The whole country is watching us to-day; the whole country expects us to continue to perform our duties, to advance and to pass the legislation which the government says it has ready and which it has promised to bring down to the house.

I have so many quotations here, Mr. Speaker. I have one from my friend from Mount Royal (Mr. White), a very witty one, but I will pass it over. There are many from the new member from East Toronto (Mr. Church), then the member for Toronto North-west Centre, and he spoke with great eloquence. Others who spoke against the adjournment were Mr. Ladner, who is no longer here, Mr. Hocken, Mr. Bristol, Hon. J. W. Edwards, and I must say that some of them were rather vituperative in their language. Here is one from my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins) at page 673 of Hansard. He was rather mild. He said:

I know my constituency and western Canada very well, and I know that those who sent us here to carry on the business of this country, and legislate, and legislate quickly, will resent any adjournment of this house.

Then the leader of the opposition of that day, Mr. Meighen, said at page 676 of Hansard:

What is the situation of hon. members here? They have come here and some of them have taken up their abodes for the session. Some have given up their homes. Their families are here. They are to be asked to sit for six weeks in idleness, or to spend it in practically worthless visits to their constituencies. They are asked to do so for no good reason, and for no reason imaginable, except to meet the inconveniences of the members of the administration brought upon themselves by their own folly. But what are the other reasons? What are the reasons against the adjournment which go deeper than the convenience of hon. members of this house? Is this session a necessary session? Is this country in need of a lead from the government? Is this dominion in need of a solution of imperative and pressing problems? Hon. members of the administration themselves have never tired of thundering this in our ears.

The then hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said at page 680 of Hansard:

But the government ask for a blank cheque.

That was a crime then. He went on:

They ask for blind authority from this parliament, without reason, without excuse, to agree to a lengthy adjournment.

Then my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), who is always very nice in his expression, said at page 728, quoting the English Liberals:

Mr. Gladstone said something along the same lines in an article which he wrote in 1887. He said: "Individuals may recover from even serious sickness. It does not appear to be the way with governments." It is the opinion of all those whose writings I have had the pleasure of reading that once a government is ill it rarely recovers. This government is seriously ill. It has no more chance of recovery than if it were already dead and buried. In fact, I believe burying is about the only thing that has not been done to it so far.

Mr. MANION: Better than I thought.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am going to give a still better one. My hon. friend (Mr. Manion) went on to say:

I have another quotation which I ran across, also by a politician and a Liberal—Mr. Spender was a Liberal; Mr. Gladstone was a Liberal and Lord Rosebery was a Liberal. Lord Rosebery said: "Inevitable political catastrophe only becomes more overwhelming by delay."

And my hon. friend added, at page 731:

And if the members of this house are to go home for six weeks and ministers of the crown wander about the country to the four points of the compass, there will be less chance still of anything being done to stabilize matters in Canada. What we ought to do is to put out, bag and baggage, this government so-called which is in power to-day.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Past history.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What does my hon. friend say? Is he sick? The present Prime Minister at page 734 of Hansard said:

The truth is that the government of this country say, "We want an adjournment of this parliament because we want it." That is all—"because we want it." Not because there is any reason; not because there is any reason of economy that you can name. Here are a large number of civil servants brought together for the purpose of maintaining this House of Commons in session. They are to go back to their respective homes and a quarter of a million dollars is to be lost—because it means that at least so far as service is concerned.

The Right Hon. Mr. Meighen said at page 676 of Hansard:

We are asked to go home for six weeks and do nothing more, and all this when the occasion is so critical, as described by members of the government themselves...

All these solutions which demanded attention at the hands of parliament can wait, in order that the government may take a varying and nebulous attitude before the constituencies in Canada and help repair their own fortunes.

I come to the last quotation, which to me is a very important one. It is one from my very good and right hon. friend, the acting leader of the house (Sir George Perley), who at page 785 of Hansard said:

Then I come to some other reasons why we object to this adjournment. The least important consideration is the convenience to members of this house, and I mention this fact as one of those to whom it would be least inconvenient, inasmuch as I live in the city of Ottawa. But it appeals to me strongly as most unfair and unreasonable to bring members from all parts of Canada to this city and send them away after a session of two or three weeks. . . . Then there are public reasons. There are many urgent problems to be discussed and settled, problems which I need not recount here. Other members who have spoken in the debate have referred to these matters, some of which are to be found in the speech from the throne while others have been discussed by members on both sides of the house both in parliament and on the platform in the last election. The people of the country feel that these questions ought to be dealt with with a firm hand as soon as possible and I do not believe that they will be satisfied to have this government force an adjournment of six weeks.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Was the adjournment for six weeks at that time?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am going to give all the details to my right hon. friend, and they are of a certain interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It's a great sham fight, isn't it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend may talk about sham fights but if he is inviting me, I shall talk about him.

Those were the views expressed at a time when the Prime Minister was unavoidably absent and when many of the ministers could not be present before the reorganization of the cabinet. I call the attention of the house to the fact that at that time there was no legislation which exempted a newly appointed cabinet minister from appearing before his electors for reelection. An appointment of a minister meant a vacancy in the house and I must confess that the majority at that time was not sufficient to permit of many additional vacancies. These reasons were given day in and day out before the vote was taken. An amendment was moved by the then member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), seconded by the present acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) and reading as follows:

> This house having been called in session at the instance of the present government, and a number of legislative and other proposals submitted for its consideration by said government in the form of a speech from the throne, it is the duty of the house, should the address in reply to the speech from the throne be adopted, to proceed with the public business until same is disposed of—

The vote was taken on February 5 and the motion to adjourn was carried by a vote of 120 to 112, a majority of eight. Immediately afterwards, on February 8, the debate on the address resumed. Other amendments were moved because the adjournment was to take place only after the address had been debated. The debate continued until February 16, when the then hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) moved the previous question in order to preclude more amendments being moved to the address. The address continued until March 1 when I was compelled to give notice that on the following date the debate would not be further adjourned. On March 2 the motion of the then hon. member for Nelson was voted upon and the address in reply was also voted upon. This meant that the house would adjourn until March 15 but this vote took place exactly one month after the motion for adjournment had carried. The adjournment was only for thirteen days because of these tactics. During all this time the house was not transacting necessary business, all that occurred was a discussion of futile political matters to prevent the adjournment of the house. The will of the majority of this house was thwarted because there had been a majority vote on March 2 for adjournment. On March 15 the house resumed its work and my right hon. friend took his seat. That was one of the best times in my life because I was only too glad to hand over to him the work I had had to do during those hectic times. He then began the reorganization of the cabinet.

How can those hon. gentlemen who took such a firm stand at that time against adjournment ask us to vote at the present time for an adjournment of five weeks? This is the sixth session of this parliament and ordinarly it should have ended last year. Only twice has a Canadian parliament gone the full limit of its time. We were told the other day that the life of this parliament will end on August 18 but as a matter of fact it has already gone beyond the time normally given to parliaments.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It would be useless to discuss this with my hon. friend.

Not only have we reached the limit of the life of this parliament but the people of the country have expressed in an emphatic way a lack of confidence in the present government. It is a well known maxim of representative government under British rules that the government must possess the confidence of the country as well as of parliament. I quoted authorities to that effect. I should like to refer to the expressions of opinion which have been given by the people of Canada during the last two years. There was a by-election in South Huron on September 26, 1932, and the Liberal majority was increased from 349 to 1989. There was a by-election in Yamaska, on October 23, 1933, when the old Liberal majority of one was increased to 84. This is not a large increase but the present majority is 84 times that of the old majority. At the by-election held in Mackenzie, on October 23, 1933, the previous Independent majority of 3,076 was changed to a Liberal majority of, 1,614. In the by-election held in Restigouche-Madawaska on the same date, the previous Conservative majority of 548 was changed to a Liberal majority of 6,472. In the by-election held in South Oxford on April 16, 1934, the previous Liberal majority of 55 was increased to 1,493. In the by-election held on September 24, 1934 in West Elgin the previous Liberal majority of 1,437 was increased to 2,493. In the by-election held in Frontenac-Addington on the same date the previous Conservative majority of 3,371 was changed to a Liberal majority of 2,651. In Kenora-Rainy River on the same day the Liberal majority was increased from 502 to 6,165. In North York a Conservative majority of 298 was changed into a Liberal majority of 3,687. In East Toronto the Conservative majority at the last election was 7,075. The present member won a personal victory, but he had 2,143 fewer votes than the Liberal and Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidates combined.

In every provincial election which has taken place during those two years the Liberal party has been returned to power, winning a decisive victory, and in every one of those provincial campaigns federal issues were generously discussed. Indeed I heard at eleven or twelve o'clock in the evening on the eve of the general election in Ontario the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in a slumber hour address to the electors of that province asking them to elect Mr. Henry. It is impossible to deny the fact that the Conservative party—and I am sorry for many of my hon. friends opposite—has been shattered and has suffered the most humiliating defeat in its history. Popular discontent has started to grow into a blizzard. They have decided—and of course that was their business—to remain in office in the hope of some miracle happening before the end of their term to prevent their complete destruction. That is a policy of fear and distrust of the people. It looks as if my hon. friends opposite were shivering on the brink.

In this parliament vacancies have occurred which have not been filled. This session is supposed to be a most important one when a whole new program of social reform is to be put into effect and the necessary legislation enacted. Have the electors in those constituencies not a right to be represented in this house while this program is being discussed? In Halifax and Long Lake notice of the vacancies were signed on October 9, 1934; if I mistake not, that will be six months tomorrow. In St. Denis the notice was signed on October 30, 1934, and in East Algoma notice was signed on January 4 of this year.

I shall not refer to the vacancy which occurred recently in Montmagny. There is a vacancy also in Saint John, but it happened during this session, but the first three vacancies I mentioned occurred in the course of last autumn. Surely in an ordinary parliament, a government administering the affairs of the country in normal circumstances and not afraid of going before its judges, could have issued the writs and permitted those constituencies to be represented. Under such conditions I claim that this parliament has no moral jurisdiction for legislating.

This so-called social reform program has been propounded in the shadow of an impending election. The old order has gone, as we were told over the air and in the house. I admit the old order has gone as far as parliamentary government and constitutional practice are concerned. We had the speech from the throne on January 17, and I shall now refer to the program placed before the house in that speech and ask hon. members how that program has been fulfilled, and whether we have a right to go home for five weeks when the greater part of this program has not even been considered. I read this in the speech from the throne:

> Reform measures will therefore be submitted to you as part of a comprehensive plan designed to remedy the social and economic injustices now prevailing, and to ensure to all classes and to all parts of the country a greater degree of equality in the distribution of the benefits of the capitalist system.

How this has been done, I fail to see. Second:

> Better provision will be made for the security of the worker during unemployment, in sickness, and in old age.

What has been done under this plan? We have had a bill to provide for unemployment insurance. This bill is still before the Senate and important witnesses are being heard before its committee on banking and commerce. We do not know whether the bill will be changed there and whether we shall not have to work on it again when it comes back from the other house. That is for unemployment insurance, but has anything been done for the security of the worker in sickness, as was stated in the speech from the throne would be done? Nothing at all, except the commissioners for unemployment insurance will have a right to inquire into the conditions of public health in Canada. As regards old age, nothing at all has come before us. Surely if the government is going to proceed with legislation affecting these various subjects, we should have such measures before us and consider them instead of going home for five weeks.

Again I quote from the speech from the throne:

> Action will be taken to ameliorate the conditions of labour, to provide a better and more assured standard of living for the worker, to secure minimum wages and a maximum working week, and to alter the incidence of taxation so that it will more directly conform to capacity to pay.

With regard to ameliorating the conditions of labour, what has been done? The eight hour day bill is I understand also before the Senate and they are hearing witnesses before one of their committees. Even this eight hour day bill is not I think very satisfactory to labour in Canada. The bill to secure minimum wages and a maximum working hour is still on the order paper for second reading. Why should it not be moved in the house so as to let us deal with this matter instead of adjourning for five weeks?

As regards the phrase:

> To alter the incidence of taxation so that it will more directly conform to the capacity to pay.

What does that mean? The changes in the budget? I fail to see that they are altering the incidence of taxation in order to help those who cannot pay. However those changes are before the house and they have not yet been touched. We have not so far considered them and before we are asked to study the various changes of taxation, we are asked to go home for five weeks.

Again the speech from the throne states:

> You will be invited to enact measures designed to safeguard the consumer and primary producer against unfair trading practices and to regulate, in the public interest, concentrations in production and distribution.

That no doubt refers to the price spreads committee, and I do not see why the house should adjourn in order that legislation may be prepared resulting from the work of that committee. Every session we have important committees sitting on important matters, and legislation is prepared during the session while other business is before the house and while members of parliament are proceeding with their work.

The speech from the throne continues:

> You will be invited also to enact measures to provide the investing public with means to protect itself against exploitation.

Well, we have been told that there would be a bill to make unlawful the issue of no par shares, but this has not been done so far. If the government is going to do it why not do it? Why not introduce legislation to that effect and let the members of parliament work on that legislation instead of going home for five weeks?

The speech from the throne proceeds:

> My government has under consideration the adoption, throughout the penitentiaries of Canada, of a system similar to that which is known in England as the Borstal system, and is making investigations as to its operation.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said when his estimates were before the committee last Thursday that he has that in mind, that it is his intention to establish this system, but that there are technical matters to consider and that he is going to send the superintendent of penitentiaries to the old country for the purpose of making inquiry as to how the system works there, which means further delay. Why not proceed with this thing, or why not have proceeded earlier? The chances are that even with the adjournment of five weeks it will not be ready until the next session.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no legislation required for this.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then why not establish it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Because we do not know enough about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But the minister stated that in the speech from the throne.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But not as a matter for legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Parliament has nothing to do with it then?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, the Penitentiaries Act would provide the authority to establish that system in the penitentiaries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then it was hardly worth while putting it in the speech from the throne.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thought it was an important announcement.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The speech from the throne continues:

> My ministers have under consideration a plan for the reorganization of the government services so that they may be better equipped to discharge the onerous duties which devolve upon them. You will be invited to consider measures, the purpose of which will be to authorize the first stage in this plan of reorganization.

Well, nothing has been done so far as this new coordination of departments is concerned. If it is to be done, surely in the language of the Prime Minister when he was member for Calgary in 1926, why put it in the mouth of His Excellency if it is not to be done, and if it is to be done, why not do it instead of sending us home for five weeks?

As to the economic council, there was legislation as far as that goes.

Then we have other legislation on the order paper. There is one very important piece of legislation:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to establish a board to be known as the Canadian grain board with power to purchase, receive and take delivery of wheat, oats, barley, rye and flax-seed, or any one or more of such grains for marketing and to sell, store, transport and market such grains, and to provide for the appointment of such clerks, employees and assistants as may be necessary, and to provide for their remuneration and for the expenses of, and arising out of, the operations of the board.

This notice was given a long time ago, why has nothing been done in that respect? The grain producers and the grain trade are all anxious to know what is going to happen. The taxpayers of Canada, not only in the west but in the east also, are anxious to know the results of the operations of this mystery man, Mr. McFarland. I find it rather queer that while this thing is not discussed in parliament, when you open the morning papers, as we did this morning, we read an interview with this Mr. McFarland saying what he is doing and what he is going to do with the wheat of the west. I think that should be said in the parliament of Canada; it should be discussed here instead of in the newspapers. There is also the Canadian farm loan bill which is still in the Senate, where they hear witnesses in regard to it, and we do not know in what shape or form it will come back when it does come back.

I have related the work that has been done, or rather the work that has not been done. I claim, sir, that it is an extraordinary presumption on the part of the government to ask for an adjournment of this house under those conditions, and it would be extreme simplicity on our part to agree to an adjournment under these conditions. In the country there is anger and impatience; unemployment is raging. Is it fair to ask us to suspend the work of parliament for five weeks while there is such distress in Canada, and without any definite program of public works or of unemployment relief proposed for the consideration of parliament? If the government has a plan let them give it to this house. We are not living in an age in which mystery men can long hide their trick boxes. All we have had is a patchwork quilt of paternalistic proposals and a conglomeration of half-baked measures. Our attitude the government surely cannot complain of, we on this side have exercised great restaint even under provocation. Nothing has stood in the way of the government's measures except the uncertain and doubtful validity of their methods.

Take the budget debate; my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has delivered his budget. There has been a discussion on it in which twenty-two Conservative speakers were heard besides the Minister of Finance, and they used fourteen hours and forty minutes of the time of parliament. The hon. gentlemen to my left had five speakers who used three hours and ten minutes. The Liberals had two speakers besides my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and they were heard for an hour and twenty minutes—

An hon. MEMBER: What about the hon. member for Témiscouata?

Mr. LAPOINTE:—and while this was going on every one knows the lack of interest there was in the proceedings of the house. Hon. gentlemen opposite were not even staying to listen to their own friends. So much so that the leading newspaper in this city had an editorial entitled "Parliament is Through." Well, I agree with it. This parliament is suffering from senility, and the government which is in control seems to be afflicted with paralysis. An adjournment of five weeks would be only soporific, it would be only a sleeping dose given to a dying subject.

An hon. MEMBER: You are supplying the dose.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I am very much alive, I shall prove it when the time comes. I am pleased that the acting leader of the house did not give as a justification for this adjournment the trip of the Prime Minister. We all regret his illness, and we hope that this trip will help him to recover fully. But that is no reason why the house could not and should not proceed. I am pleased also that the presence of the Prime Minister in London is to be rather a social function and that there will be no formal conference as in 1911 and 1917, when the Prime Minister had to go as an ex-officio member of the imperial conference, which has become a permanent institution. We were told by the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) that nothing would take place except informal conversations. I was glad to hear that statement, because there have been rather alarming reports to the contrary. The Round Table, which as everyone knows is a leading, well informed periodical in connection with imperial matters, in its issue of March, 1935, at page 217 in an article headed The Commonwealth and the World, had this to say:

> The gathering of empire prime ministers which is to take place this spring in connection with the jubilee of the Kings accession to the throne will be the most important imperial conference since 1926. That conference laid down the principles upon which the British commonwealth itself was to rest. The forthcoming meeting, though not technically an imperial conference, will be called upon to lay down the basis for the future foreign policy of the commonwealth in the very changed conditions that have come into being in the last nine years.

Further it says:

> It is quite clear that decisions of the utmost gravity, affecting the policy to which both Great Britain and the dominions are to commit themselves in Europe, in the Pacific, and towards the collective system generally, will have to be taken in the near future. More than ever the British commonwealth is the chief unifying and stabilizing factor in the world. But it will only maintain that position if its members are agreed among themselves both about the facts with which they have to deal and the policy which they will jointly pursue.

Obviously those gentlemen were wrong, and I am very glad to accept the statement of my right hon. friend that nothing of the kind will happen. It would not be fair, especially to Canada under the present circumstances, because we on this side of the house and many people throughout the country believe the present government have not the right to speak for Canada on matters of such importance.

I have another question on which I should like to say a word, in connection with this celebration. There has been a report which has come to my ears, at all events, to the effect that advantage will be taken of this celebration to distribute many new titles of honour to Canadian citizens. I hope that will not be the case. Last year the house divided on this question and the Liberal party unanimously, the independents and even some of the Conservative members voted against this institution of titles in Canada. I claim that under the circumstances a title is only a Conservative badge, because the Liberals and other parties are opposed to them. It is not fair to the crown to advise the continuation of an institution which is obnoxious and abhorrent to a large majority of the Canadian people, especially when it is supported by a government which no longer has the right to speak for the Canadian people. Only last week we saw the effect of titles on the mentality of a man. After the name of the new governor general was announced, a gentleman who was on the last list of honours gave an interview to the Toronto newspapers in which he said he had never heard of the man, and apart from that he was in favour of members of the nobility being appointed governors general of Canada. I am sure this gentleman was born an ordinary Canadian citizen with a sound mind, but I am afraid the fact that he has been given a title has brought chaos to his brain and mentality. We do not want that sort of thing, and the sooner it is done away with the better.

In that connection I should like to make a suggestion. It is sometimes said that we who take this stand on this question perhaps do not represent the majority of the people, and that we have not the right to say that the people think as we do. There is a very easy way to consult the people and find out for all time what Canadians want in that regard. We are going to have a general election this summer. Why not take a referendum at the same time and ask every voter in Canada whether or not he is in favour of titles? That will not cost anything and it will decide the matter.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I claim that this parliament should be sitting during the jubilee festivities, as the imperial parliament will be sitting. His Majesty will even go to the imperial parliament to receive the address which will be voted by the House of Commons and the House of Lords. Could we not have the same celebration here, with an address to the crown, with parliament sitting? The place of members of parliament during this celebration is in Ottawa. Every member of parliament should take part in the official functions which will take place in Ottawa on May 6, and parliament should be sitting here at that time. Last week a leading newspaper, and a Conservative newspaper at that, discussing this proposed adjournment said that public interest must be the only consideration for parliament in the decision of this matter. It is this consideration of public interest that actuates me in moving, seconded by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff).

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be omitted, and the following substituted therefor:
> Whereas this seventeenth parliament has held five sessions and is now concluding a sixth session;
> And whereas the limit of five years fixed by the constitution as that beyond which a parliament cannot legally continue in existence will very shortly be reached, and parliament itself will be legally dissolved by constitutional limitation of time;
> And whereas certain measures suggested in the speech from the throne at the opening of parliament on January 17 have not yet been considered or introduced;

And whereas it is obviously desirable that the time of the general elections should not be delayed beyond that which will permit of parliament duly concluding its sessional program;

Therefore be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that a period of adjournment at the Easter season beyond one week is not desirable, and that save for such brief and customary adjournment the public interest will be best served by parliament continuing in session until it has completed:

(1) the consideration of those measures mentioned in the speech from the throne and not yet introduced;

(2) the completion of the discussion of the measures already before the house and not yet passed;

(3) the consideration of such legislative proposals as may be rendered necessary or advisable by the report of the price spreads commission and the report of the special committee on housing.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened with pleasure to a very long and interesting discussion of a great variety of matters by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). Many of the matters upon which he touched were entirely apart from the motion he has seen fit to move. Certainly the hon. member has given us an historical résumé of political events in this chamber during the rather hectic session of 1926.

Many will remember that nine years ago a rather odd situation developed in our parliamentary history, but I assert that that situation affords a very slight parallel, if any, to the situation now existing in this chamber. The session of 1926 opened under a government which had been practically slaughtered at the polls, and but for a crooked count and also some ballot box manipulations in the northwestern part of Canada the government would have come to parliament in an actual minority. The Prime Minister had been defeated by the constituents in his own riding, nine of his ministers had gone down to defeat, and the great province of Ontario was not represented in the House of Commons by a single minister. Under those circumstances any self-respecting government would have taken the course the people of Canada desired it to take, but the then government did not see fit to follow that course. They realized after the first vote in this house which indicated a majority of only two—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Three.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —a majority of three, that they were practically defeated. They could not elect new ministers, they had only the tag end of a government in the chamber and had no Prime Minister entitled to take his seat. Still they persisted in holding on and continuing in office. What did they suggest? Under conditions such as I have just pictured they solemnly moved in this chamber that the house stand adjourned for six weeks merely for their own convenience. Now hon. members opposite strenuously object to a proposal to adjourn the House of Commons four or five weeks, despite the fact that the government can give good and substantial reasons for its request.

All the quotations made by my hon. friend this afternoon from speeches made in parliament nine years ago, while perhaps interesting as political history, have no application whatsoever to the situation with which we are confronted to-day. Let us take a practical view of what the situation really is at the present time. My hon. friend suggests, and correctly so, that in the speech from the throne certain legislation was forecast for the present session. The most important legislation forecast was of a remedial or reform order, and largely dependent upon the report of a single commission known as the price spreads commission, previously a committee of this house. Hon. members opposite state that in former years committees of the house have sat for long periods, have reported and that during the same session legislation has been framed following their reports. I say to hon. members opposite that never in the history of the parliament of Canada have we had a commission which sat practically throughout the whole of the last session and which has continued as a royal commission to sit from the end of last session to the present moment and as yet has not reported. The commission has heard thousands and thousands of pages of evidence and, according to the newspapers, has produced a report about 250 pages in length, which report discusses some of the most important problems before the people of Canada to-day, and makes some of the most important suggestions for the most difficult and involved legislation which has in the past been or will in the future be placed before the parliament of Canada.

This is the eighth day of April. Ordinarily when Easter has intervened there has been a parliamentary recess varying from one week to two weeks; that has been my experience throughout many sessions. So that under ordinary circumstances, with no abnormal conditions, on the 18th or 19th of April next we might expect an adjournment of a week, ten days or two weeks. That would have been the case, even if there had been no report from the price spreads commission.

Having regard to the situation actually confronting us the government proposes an adjournment two or two and one-half weeks longer than the usual Easter recess. As a ground for our request we ask the house seriously to consider the legislation we have yet to prepare and pass through the house. I submit that legislation could not fairly be drafted and considered under two or three weeks. I know something whereof I speak, so far as the preparation of involved and intricate bills is concerned, because I am sorry to say many difficult bills have to be prepared in the Department of Justice. Two or three weeks time would be required to prepare the necessary legislation, and the work of drafting cannot be begun until the report, which up to the present time is not before us, has been thoroughly considered. If that alone were the reason for asking the adjournment I submit our grounds would be sufficient to warrant an adjournment to May 20.

But there are additional reasons, as every person knows, for asking a longer adjournment at this time. One reason is that the head of this government, the Prime Minister of Canada, the minister who has taken the most active interest in the whole sessional program thus far presented and who will be mainly responsible for the program afterwards to be presented, will be absent from Canada until May 18 or 20. He is the head of the government; he is the first minister of the crown; he is the leader of the House of Commons, and I submit it is not only essential but absolutely necessary that he be present in this chamber to guide our deliberations when these important measures are introduced and carried through the house. Would any person suggest for one moment that the Prime Minister should continue his duties here rather than attend the silver jubilee in England? I submit any proposal of that kind would receive absolutely no support either in this chamber or throughout the country. He is bound to go to England; it is his duty to go; it is his privilege to go, and it would be a tremendous disappointment to the Canadian people were he not present on that wonderful occasion. If I am correctly informed—and I believe I am —the hon. member for Quebec East need not worry about imperial conferences which are going to take place in London or which would bind Canada in the future. My hon. friend need not pay much attention to the Round Table article which he read to the house. It has been stated in this chamber by the acting Prime Minister that there will only be informal conversations between the Prime Ministers of the self-governing dominions and the members of the British government. It is very fitting and proper that these conversations should take place, and it would be better in my judgment if they took place more frequently than they do.

In our parliamentary history there is an exact parallel for the present situation, an excellent parallel but one that my hon. friend hardly mentioned in his remarks this afternoon. He was a member in this chamber in the year 1911, so was I. There was a coronation ceremony to take place in London in 1911. The coronation was to take place in Great Britain in the month of June, and his present Majesty was to be crowned. There was also preliminary and concurrent with that event an imperial conference. The Prime Minister of Canada was not only invited to the conference but invited also to the coronation. I had the honour of being present at the coronation as one of the delegates from Canada. I think that Senator Béland and Senator Casgrain of the upper house and myself are probably the only ones of that delegation still remaining in public life, although I am not quite sure. I remember the pride we felt as the Prime Minister of Canada walked down the aisle of Westminster Abbey, the great representative of this country on that important occasion, and I rejoice to know that our present Prime Minister will be present on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the reign of that same monarch. When the question was raised in parliament in the session of 1911, Sir Robert Borden, then Mr. Robert Borden, was the leader of the opposition, and what was his attitude in regard to the matter? What did Sir Wilfred Laurier request? An adjournment of four or five weeks? No, an adjournment of two months in the middle of the session. The adjournment was granted on the nineteenth of May, and extended to the eighteenth of July. Was there any question of not granting one or two month's supply on that occasion? No, supply was readily voted. The way was cleared, and the Prime Minister of Canada attended the conference and attended the coronation, and parliament stood adjourned for two straight months save one day. Such was the attitude of the leader of the opposition in the then House of Commons. Mr. Robert Borden on that occasion expressed his pleasure and delight to concur in the proposal to grant Sir Wilfred Laurier the adjournment of two months which he requested. I have his language on that occasion before me now. Mr. Robert Borden, on the motion to adjourn, said at page 8712 of the Hansard of 1911:

> In conclusion I can only say that I am very happy indeed that the Prime Minister will be able to attend, both the imperial conference and the coronation.

And he did not divide the house upon the motion to grant a two months' adjournment. My hon. friend has endeavoured to cite precedents. This parliament by law certainly continues until the eighteenth of August. I know that there is a rather nice legal question whether it does not perhaps continue for a longer period until the date the last of the election writs was returned, but I can only repeat what I answered to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition a day or two ago in reply to his question, that it has been the invariable practice to treat the date mentioned in the proclamation of the election for the return of the writs as the actual expiring date of that parliament. Parliament can legally exist certainly until the eighteenth of August. Oh but, my hon. friend from Quebec says, that such has not been the custom in the past. Well, it has been merely a question of the whim of the then government or of the then Prime Minister. I remember a very prominent Liberal chieftain in this country who said to me one day, "Guthrie, the time to go to the country is when you can win." That I think has been the guiding principle at every dissolution, and it is because we think we can win, that we are going in due time to the electors.

Mr. HANBURY: You will never have an election in that case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh yes, we will have an election and we will be on this side of the house when the election is over.

What I submit, Mr. Speaker, is that we have made a reasonable and a proper request for an adjournment. I am not going to deal with many of the questions mentioned by my hon. friend from Quebec East. He mentioned the budget and the time it occupied in this house. We are all glad that the budget did not occupy much time but the budget did not lend itself to adverse criticism.

I notice that my hon. friend also touched upon the Borstal system and some other matters mentioned in the speech from the throne. But the real ground for this adjournment, Mr. Speaker, is the preparation of necessary legislation as a consequence of the report of the price spreads commission, expected this week. Any man that says he can deal within two or three weeks with the price spreads report, and the important questions which the commission has considered and developed, does not know the task he has ahead of him. We expect when we come back in May that all such legislation will be ready, and what is more, we feel confident that the Prime Minister will be in his place to direct the proceedings of the house.

I am very glad to conclude these remarks by quoting the support of the Toronto Globe for this proposal as it appears in an editorial in the issue of to-day. The Globe says:

> Liberals and independent members have protested against the long suspension of the sittings, and in some of their contentions there is much logic. Nevertheless, the unusual length of the recess will not be without its all-round advantages. Most Canadians will feel that it is eminently desirable that the dominion shall be represented by its Prime Minister at the King's jubilee ceremonies in London on May 6. There will be general rejoicing at the news conveyed by Sir George Perley that the improvement in Mr. Bennett's condition justifies every hope that he will be well enough to make the overseas journey and take his part in the festivities.
> True, it might have been possible, as the opposition leader suggested, to proceed with business in the Prime Minister's absence under arrangements which would permit Mr. Bennett to be present before prorogation. But, as the acting Prime Minister intimated, there is much to be done in the preparation of legislation, especially that proceeding from the price spreads and housing reports.
> Time and thought will be required in the framing of legislation which seeks to set right the many economic and social injustices revealed in the voluminous reports. It will be in the public interest that action shall not be hasty and ill considered, but rather that it shall represent judgments reached after earnest study and proper correlation of details.

These are very sound reasons for granting this adjournment, supported by the leading Liberal organ in the province of Ontario and probably in the whole dominion. Such is the case which I have been endeavouring to make, made probably far better by the Globe than any language of mine could make it. I appeal to hon. members in every part of the house that the proposal to adjourn is reasonable, it is practical, it is businesslike. It is what any government, I care not what government might be in power, would offer under similar circumstances.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, to my mind the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is the most important which has been moved in this house during the twenty sessions I have had the honour of attending this parliament. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) was able to accept the present position which he occupies without appealing to his constituents. He has referred to this amendment as a sham but let me say to him that there are hon. members in this house and people in this country who have just as good an idea of the conditions in this country as he has. I do not think it becomes one of His Majesty's privy councillors to make such a remark. If we are going to talk about shams we do not need to look to this side of the house or to hon. members on this side who feel that they should either move such an amendment or do as I have done, second it. Let me say to my hon. friend that when the people of this country read of this amendment in tomorrow's papers they will not consider it a sham. Many of these people have already come to the conclusion that this is a government of sham and camouflage and they will consider a motion to adjourn this house for six weeks as nothing more than a sham. I intend to try to show that there is no necessity for such an adjournment.

Because the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) wants to attend the jubilee celebration is no reason why this house should be adjourned. We all sincerely regret that because of hard work the Prime Minister has been laid up on a sick bed for a number of weeks, but we have not been going around the country, as was done last year, to tell of the terrible physical condition of certain public men. I believe I voice the sentiment of all hon. members when I say I regret exceedingly that the Prime Minister has been ill. We on this side of the house want him to get well; the people of the country want him to get well. We want the Prime Minister to be able to lead his party whether it appeals to the country tomorrow or at the eleventh hour of the last day they can hold on to office. That is our position with regard to the Prime Minister.

I believe I have some idea of what the business people of this country are thinking. They want this government to go on with the business of parliament so that the session can be concluded as quickly as possible. My hon. friend read an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe. That newspaper is generally considered as being a Liberal newspaper but my opinion gained from a reading of it for a number of years is that it is independent. I should like to quote from an interview given by the gentleman who owns the Truro News, a Conservative paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: I do not know why my hon. friends should laugh because there is no question but that the proprietor of this newspaper is a Conservative. The article reads:

A. R. Coffin returned to Truro Friday from a two weeks' business trip to Montreal, New York and Philadelphia.

It concludes:

Speaking with the editor Mr. Coffin expressed the opinion that business in Canada shows an indication to slow up until after the general election and until the question of governmental policy is definitely settled so that industrialists in particular can feel safe to take the road forward.

The business people of this country want us to stay here until the business is completed, no matter how long or short a period it may take. Let me tell the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) that we are not acting as the opposition did in 1926 and at other sessions. We realize that the quicker this legislation is passed the better it will be. The legislation suggested by the bedtime stories the Prime Minister told in January should be brought down and passed so that this government may have the full responsibility of such legislation. They can then appeal to the country and let the people decide whether or not they are in favour of returning this government to power.

The proposal for this adjournment has given us an opportunity to judge just what kind of a government we have on the treasury benches. They came to us a few days ago and suggested an adjournment but they did not know the exact date on which the adjournment was to commence. The acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) has said that he is willing to leave it to us to decide when we shall go home before Easter. He has not named the exact date for the adjournment as has always been done. This shows that the government does not know what they should do. As I said a moment ago, we all regret the illness of the Prime Minister but is it fair that 244 members of this House of Commons and 86 members of the Senate should have to leave here with our business incomplete to go home for six weeks and then return on the 20th May because of that illness? We will all be put to great expense and inconvenience. The public affairs of the country should not be treated in that way. Apparently there has been considerable criticism of this proposed long adjournment and the other day my right hon. friend threw out a sop to the members of parliament when he said that they would receive their travelling expenses to and from their homes. I say to him that that should not be necessary. After all, the taxpayers of this country will have to pay this money. Because one man is not able to attend to his parliamentary duties, the taxpayers of the country must pay the travelling expenses of 244 members of the House of Commons and 86 senators

The announcement is made to-day by the acting Prime Minister that the employees attached to the House of Commons and the Senate will be paid their salaries during this six weeks adjournment. I am in favour of paying good wages as I believe the labourer is worthy of his hire but I say to the acting Prime Minister and the ministers who sit behind him that they have no right to take the people's money to pay these employees for six weeks. These employees will not be doing anything and it is not necessary. The fact that this statement has been made is not going to settle this matter in the minds of the electors of the country.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: It is the fair thing to do.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, it is the fair thing to do; but if anybody is going to pay those sessional employees, it is the members in the house who will vote against the amendment and the members of the government which is asking for this adjournment, who should pay, and not the taxpayers, 700,000 of whom are out of employment while the rest are struggling along the best way they can. If my hon. friend and his colleagues want to pay those employees, well and good; I have no objection to that, but the government has no right to take the taxpayers' money in order to pay the stenographers, sessional clerks and everybody else for the next six weeks while this adjournment is in progress.

We had a very interesting discussion of this matter by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). He rather laughingly suggested that we should not go back to the days of 1926 and read in the house statements made by him and others during that period. However history has a way of repeating itself, and sometimes we cannot do better than go back in history in order to discuss certain matters in connection with public affairs or anything else. He said that there was no parallel between what is happening to-day and the reason for asking this adjournment and the situation in 1926. The Minister of Justice is quite correct and I agree with him, but the situation to-day is greately exaggerated in comparison with what it was in 1926. It is true that in that year we had a certain political issue that was not settled perhaps as well as it might have been, but the economic condition then was entirely different from what it is to-day. People throughout this country, men in employment, men in business are anxious that this government should bring down all its legislation and should appeal to the electorate at the earliest possible moment.

So I say to the Minister of Justice that there is no parallel between financial and economic conditions in 1926 and to-day.

My hon. friend also referred to the fact that in 1926 the then government did not have very many ministers elected, and he told us that in Ontario no ministers were elected. As I said a moment ago, the only way in which this government can appoint ministers is by act of parliament; now that the act has been changed, they do not have to go to the country. But even in the constituency of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson), if he had had to appeal to his constituents for reelection, I have no hesitation in saying that there would be a great difference between the vote he received in 1930 and the one he is likely to get in the next general election. Therefore, while those ministers were defeated at that time, I have no doubt the same fate will overtake many ministers of this government. We must not forget also that the Canadian people have spoken in every by-election. They did not have a chance in connection with ministers, but whenever they had a chance, they voted against the government with very large majorities.

I do not know whether the Minister of Justice or I should discuss the matter of the price spreads commission, but perhaps I may say just a word. I agree with him that this commission has laboured strenuously for more than a year, and I understand it has cost the country some $560,000. I have not seen the report and I do not know who is giving out the information. The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has of course on platforms and in pulpits been giving out information as to what the commission should or should not do and so forth. As to whether this was the proper way to proceed or not I have no hesitation in saying it was against all parliamentary usage. This is the first time in the history of the country that the report of a commission before being brought down, has been made the subject of broadcasts throughout the dominion and speculation as to what it is likely to contain. The newspapers must have got their information somewhere, and from press reports it looks to me, if I may say so without offence, that the mountain has laboured and brought forth a mouse. After spending $560,000; after bringing auditors from all over Canada to go into the books of different concerns; after bringing witnesses from all parts of the dominion and after paying special investigators huge sums of money, what does this report in the newspapers tell us? Practically all this commission asks the government or parliament to do is to appoint seven or eight other commissions. In other words, we are to appoint seven or eight other commissions to look into the business of the Canadian people. We are going to have, I suppose, doctors, lawyers, professors and everybody else trying to run the business of the country by different commissions as is being done under the so-called Marketing Act instead of men trained in various industries. If that is the only suggestion this commission can make, then they have not dealt properly with the price spreads investigation. However I am willing to wait for the report; perhaps after all there may be something good in it. But I do not agree with the government that it is necessary to have a six weeks' adjournment in order to give them time to consider the report of the price spreads commission. Of course in this country under our democratic system there are certain things which are kept secret. For instance the meetings of the cabinet are not supposed to go out to the public; meetings of commissions in camera are not supposed to be made public; but you, sir, will agree with me when I say that the government, not to-day, not last week but for perhaps weeks or months have known from time to time what this commission had in their minds and what they were going to report. So there was no difficulty in my hon. friends, who sit on the treasury benches, the members of the government, drafting certain legislation with regard to the report which the price spreads commission will make. If I am not mistaken, the Prime Minister in those wonderful fairy tales which he gave us over the radio in January referred to the legislation which would be brought down in connection with the price spreads investigation. He had advance information, and if he knew practically what should be done, why should we wait not only from January to April before the government is ready with its legislation but for another six weeks?

While we regret the Prime Minister's absence, I think I may say without offence that we have no guarantee that he will be able to return to parliament by May 20 even after a long adjournment, although of course we all hope he will get back. I want to say this to the acting leader of the government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Postmaster General and other members of this government: Under the circumstances you are not doing so badly. We have treated you pretty decently and fairly; we have helped you with the legislation; we have not held up any. If we had held up legislation; if we had fought every item introduced by the government for a week or ten days or longer as my hon. friends across the floor did in 1926, there might be some cause for complaint. But we have helped the acting leader of the government, and in the interests of the country, seeing that he has done fairly well under the circumstances, he should carry on, bring down the legislation and deal with it. If we are to adjourn, we should adjourn from Thursday of holy week until the following Tuesday when we should proceed to deal with the public business no matter how long or short a time this may take. But it is not in the interests of the taxpayers and the business men who are waiting for some lead from somebody, from either this government or a new one, that we should have this long adjournment at this time. If there is anything in my hon. friend's argument that the reason for this adjournment is that they want the Prime Minister to go to the jubilee celebrations and also that they are embarrassed by his absence, as I assume they are to a certain extent, why did not my right hon. friend ask for an adjournment some eight weeks ago? From the bulletins which were being issued and the statements of the doctor regarding the Prime Minister's health the acting Prime Minister several weeks ago, must have known that the Prime Minister could not come back to this house for six or eight or ten weeks. That was the time to ask for an adjournment, if he and his colleagues could not get along without the Prime Minister. But why ask for it now, when the Prime Minister is getting better and the government is getting along fairly well with its legislation? Why send 244 members of parliament and 84 senators back to their homes and disrupt the whole business of parliament and of people who have business to do in this country?

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) made another excuse for the long adjournment. He said: If we adjourn now we would get through the business of the house and there would likely be very great criticism in the country because the government would not appeal to the people within a short time after the house prorogued. He said that the time to go to the country is when you can win. Well, that is an intimation to the people of the country that the Minister of Justice and his colleagues—because I assume he was speaking for them—realize that they dare not face the people now. They have to wait until the last minute of the eleventh hour, but they will find it will make no difference no matter when they dissolve this house. It is most unfair. We shall find that the writs will be issued at the very last minute, and the people will be given a chance to defeat this government only at the very last day that the election can possibly be held.

The Minister of Justice also said that the reason that we on this side did not criticize the budget or speak against it was that it was not open to criticism. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think everyone will admit that there was not much in the budget except the figures, and the financial statement gives perhaps the correct figures of the financial standing of the country but even then it is nothing to write home about. We did not criticize the budget—why? Because it is a diabetic budget. We had a diabetic budget two years ago when there was a tax of two cents a pound put on the poor people's sugar, and this year they bring in another diabetic budget. Last year they reduced the special tax on sugar to one cent a pound, this year they did not take off that one cent, but they took the duty off biscuits which are used for people who have Bright's disease. That is the kind of budget they give us.

It seems to me, sir, that the government of this country is not treating this house right or treating the people of this country as they should be treated. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) read a number of quotations from what some hon. members of parliament said with regard to the adjournment in 1926. They show conclusively that the present Prime Minister, who no doubt is more responsible for asking for this long adjournment than anyone, in 1926 fought with all the vigour he could against a long adjournment. It does not make any difference what the reason was, the fact is that the present Prime Minister fought against it. Not only did he, but Sir Henry Drayton had this to say:

> Certainly before this motion should ever pass, the house ought to know what this government intends to do in the vacation.

Now we would like to know what this government intends to do in this vacation. It is not enough for them to say that the Prime Minister is going to the jubilee and they want to wait until he comes back. It is not enough to say, as the Minister of Justice said, that they want to bring in legislation following the report of the price spreads commission, because that legislation could have been ready long before this. Sir Henry Drayton said about the government of that day, we should know how this broken-up, broken-down government is to be reconstructed. I say that the reason for this adjournment is to try by some sleight-of-hand method to reconstruct this government and its policy before they go to the country. They realize that the radio addresses of the Prime Minister of January last fell flat; in my opinion and in the opinion of many the Prime Minister is a poor politician—he should have held these speeches back until he was ready to come to parliament with some question on which he could force dissolution so that he could go to the country on it. But instead of doing that he gave himself away in these speeches which he made over the radio, with the result that the people of the country do not take any stock either in his promises or his dealt-bed performances.

Mr. LOUCKS: He does not believe in playing party politics.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member was nominated as a Tory a few days ago, was he not? The Prime Minister can play party politics just as well as you or I. Anyone who says the Prime Minister does not play party politics is not fair to him. If there is anything at which the Prime Minister is adept it is that.

Sir Henry Drayton also said:

> We have wasted, if this adjournment is to take place, practically a month's time discussing an issue which my hon. friends opposite now say they are incompetent to handle, and they must have six weeks' time with a view to seeing whether the dead bones can again be made to function.

That is certainly very applicable to this government, because if ever there was a government of dead bones, this government, members of which made all the promises they did in 1930 and did not carry them out, is dead from the heels up.

The government should not ask us to vote for this adjournment. The government should carry on and get through with its business. I have no hesitation in saying that all over the country the expectation was that we should of course adjourn for a day or two at Easter, but we should not have to adjourn for six weeks. Is it fair to you and to me, Mr. Speaker, who came here in January thinking of course that with the "ability" of the Prime Minister and his colleagues they would go on with the business and get through the session at the earliest possible moment? We never anticipated any such proposals as this. We rented apartments, agreeing to pay a large sum of money per month to the end of the session; now if this adjournment takes place it means that scores of members of this house have to pay rent for their apartments and for electric light and telephones during the six weeks' adjournment. I say that is not fair to members of this house. The government have no right to ask the house to await the drafting of legislation arising out of the report of the price spreads commission, because my hon.

friends could have it ready to-morrow morning; anyway when the bill does come down it will be found that there is not a great deal in it. My hon. friends are certainly not going to the country with a lot of legislation about price spreads which is going to lose them more votes than they are going to lose anyway.

This country is in such a condition that there should not be an adjournment. I have word from different parts of the country that they want the business of the government carried on. The trouble is that we are not only sick in the body politic but the country is sick economically. My hon. friends made certain promises to this country. There is a man named Heinz who makes pickles of 57 different varieties, and they are mostly good, but the same cannot be said of the 68 different variety of promises made by the Prime Minister in the election of 1930, and which he has not endeavoured to carry out. The people have waited for five years and they now demand that the government go to the country in order that business may be stabilized and that they may know what government they are going to have for the next five years.

I said a moment ago that this country is sick in the body politic and the body economic. We heard something about bulletins. I am going to refer to a bulletin which has come to me recently in regard to the health of this country. It says that the country is in very bad shape, it is in a neurotic condition, it has paralysis of peristalsis—

An hon. MEMBER: What is that? It sounds like Beauharnois.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend should not talk about Beauharnois after the government handing it over to Sir Herbert Holt and the friends of the Prime Minister. If he wants to hear about Beauharnois I might tell him something he does not like. It is de-watered enough.

Not only has this country paralysis of peristalsis; it also has cataleptic paraplegia, due to promises made by the Prime Minister which were never carried out.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. DUFF: It means that the country's trade is paralyzed. When this government took charge in 1930 we had $2,500,000,000 worth of foreign trade. Under this Tory government in the last four years that has decreased to $800,000,000. That is paraplegia, if my hon. friend the doctor from North Renfrew does not know what it means. This country has lost most of its trade, and this bulletin, which I am going to give the acting Prime Minister so that he can consult his colleagues about it, says the country also has coronary thrombosis. The trade of the nation has gone down so far that the blood of the nation is not flowing freely, and it is suffering from stagnation due to the policies of this government. The bulletin also says the country has icterus.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. DUFF: The country suffers from stagnation due to the policies of the Tory party, the high tariffs with consequent loss of trade. But, sir, this bulletin says that in spite of the dangerous condition of the patient, this great country of Canada, if an operation is performed—in other and more simple words, an election—a cholecystectomy, with proper care and a blood transfusion, and an election followed by a new government, the patient will recover. This bulletin is signed by Doctor Vox Populi.

Now, sir, I leave this bulletin with the acting Prime Minister in order that he may refer it to his colleagues as soon as possible. In the last four or five years under this government conditions in this country have reached a very deplorable state. In seconding this amendment, therefore, I say we should adjourn only from about the 17th or 18th until the following Tuesday. Let us go on with the business of this country; let us stay here, whether it takes a week, a fortnight or a month. It is not fair to the members of this house, to business men or to the taxpayers of this country that we should have to go home for six weeks and then come back and stay here for perhaps half the summer.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said the adjournment was made necessary by the fact that legislation was not ready. If that is the reason I think the house should have been adjourned some time ago, because it seems to me that the members opposite have been holding up their own government day by day to enable them to prepare legislation.

The Minister of Justice said we had not discussed the budget. During this session there has been a tendency on this side of the house to keep rather quiet. There was perhaps a little touch of sympathy over here for a dying party, and it would not become a doctor to lay before a dying patient all his sins and transgressions. But the leader of the government has asked us to enumerate some of those sins and transgressions for the benefit of the people, and we think perhaps it might be well to comply with his request. It is not customary for a person at the wheel of a car to ask a person in the back seat what should be done. If the person in the back seat wants to tell the driver what to do the natural thing is for that person to want to take the wheel. There are, however, a few things which I think should be drawn to the attention of the government, which we hoped would be adjusted without delay. First I would refer to the unfair taxes which have been placed on the poor classes. Some sessions ago taxes were placed on children's clothing, on overalls, on workingmen's shoes and on other similar articles. Taxes should never fall on any man who is near the border line of relief. Why tax him into relief and then support him, thus destroying much of the morale of our people? Why not keep the taxes low on the few simple things he has to buy so that he may get them as cheaply as possible; then give him a little profit on what he has to sell and he will be a help to our country rather than a burden. If we overload these people they become liabilities rather than assets.

The government did one thing, however; they raised the prices of the things the poorer people had to buy, and they gave them cheaper liquor. Perhaps they thought that would be compensation.

I would mention briefly the trade and commerce of the country. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) made a comparison, by which he sought to prove that trade was improving. At the time, however, I thought there was one great error in his computations; that was that while he measured the trade of the country in dollars he did not state that the dollar of to-day is not equal to the dollar of three or four years ago. Our dollar of to-day is worth only sixty cents as compared with the dollar of a few years ago, so the figures given by the minister should have been reduced by forty per cent. If that had been done we would have seen that practically speaking this country is in a worse condition financially than it ever has been.

This government have destroyed the old highways of trade and commerce that were opened by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm). They dismissed trade commissioners. The government maintained that they could find new avenues of trade; then they proceeded to offend many of our best friends; they slapped New Zealand on the face and changed the method of friendly negotiation to one of blasting. That was too overbearing, however, and we lost much of our trade. During the last five years our trade has been only half what it was under the last five years of Liberal administration. Hon. gentlemen opposite say other countries raised their tariffs against Canada under Liberal administration, and that is true; still the Liberal party did not raise our tariffs, and as a consequence the trade of Canada was maintained very well.

The Liberal policy seems entirely different from the Conservative policy. In Canada we have three live stock markets, namely those in Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. If the trading conditions in those markets reach a point where over a week end they have a surplus in all three, the results are catastrophic, so far as the farmer is concerned, because the prices drop. The late Liberal government watched the market very closely. In those days one or even two markets might block up at one time, but they were very careful to see that the three markets never blocked at one time. At the present time we have an unfortunate spectacle in our live stock markets. Thousands of cattle are held over from one week to the other, and the farmers of Ontario have to sell their pigs at $2.75 per hundred weight and their cattle at $3 per hundred weight. I am describing the condition in Ontario, with which I am more familiar; although I cannot speak for the west I have no doubt the conditions out there are even worse. Instead of the present government stating they will open up our markets and attend to the unloading to a point where farmers may bring their cattle for sale, they say they will protect the markets by a process of curtailment. In other words, they will limit the number of cattle or the number of pigs a farmer may bring to market.

Hon. members on this side of the house object strongly to a policy of curtailment. We want the markets kept open. Let our people work as much as they wish. Let them use their brains for their guidance; let us advise and direct, but do not let us coerce them. Our avenues of trade must not be beset with exploiters. Consumers and producers cannot meet the operations of these extortionists, with the result that at one end we have a surplus and at the other a scarcity. This condition arises because of the great spread existing between the functions of producing and consuming.

I say the farmers are to be pitied. They work harder and longer hours than most other workmen. They spend less, but at the same time they have greater ambitions for their children than obtains in some other classes of society. Farmers have been in distressed circumstances. About 3,500 of them came to Ottawa and asked an opportunity to speak to the government, but upon that occasion they received only a very cold reception. They had heard the promises made by the Prime Minister over the radio and in the newspapers, and had heard his speeches before the election. They brought with them the Prime Minister's promises, but the action taken by the government was far from what it should have been. Even to-day our Prime Minister states that it is the right of every man to be heard. Yet when 3,500 farmers spent thousands of dollars to come to Ottawa he showed no willingness to hear them.

We remember that he said the tariff would fight for the farmers—but on the other hand we find him taking the tax off oil pipe and placing an additional tax of ten per cent on farmers' fences. Nearly every tariff change made by the present government has imposed an extra load on our farmers, and I believe the farmers have stood about all they can stand. People in the rural communities should consider tariff legislation from several angles, namely: What are the benefits? Who receives them? What are the sacrifices? Who pays them? The farmer must learn the answers to these four questions.

At the present time many of our poor people are in distress, and have developed a sense of fear. Those people ask simply justice. I am wondering if it is just to have workmen performing their daily task at starvation wages for large companies which, due to tariff protection, are charging high prices. Let us give justice to the poor; that is all they need. All schemes of charity and philanthropy are abhorrent in the absence of justice. A government should be just before it attempts to be generous. High tariffs have raised prices to the consumers and lowered wages to the employees.

To-day people are deprived of many facilities they used to enjoy. They are forced to live without the advantages of telephones, motor cars and radios, and in addition they are deprived of many of the necessities of life. The government has advertised the fact that it will open up new waterways. I can see no reason for such action when they are throwing tariff sand bags in the old channels. They talk about building highways, but I believe our railways would be able to look after the traffic. By means of tariffs on the one hand and sales taxes on the other the government are blocking the railways. Further, their gambling on the wheat market has been detrimental to the railways, operations. Upon many occasions I have heard of subsidies being given to help the movement of certain commodities. Suggestions have been made for subsidies on Alberta coal, and so on. However I have never heard of a subsidy being given on a product which remained stationary. Such a subsidy would not be an advantage to trade and commerce.

The Minister of Railways and Canals has laughed at the book Industry and Humanity written by my right hon. leader, and has made references to what would or would not go down in history. Well, in my view the minister will go down in history as the man to a great extent responsible for the number of men dismissed from railway operations in the last three years. About 60,000 men have lost their positions, and when we consider their wives and children we find about 240,000 are affected. In Toronto these unfortunate people are described as having been decapitated. Perhaps in the minister we have the greatest decapitator of the industrial world. When we speak about certain events going down in history we must remember that in one day to advance the cause of Christianity King Richard cut the heads off 5,000 Saracen prisoners. So we find advances in humanity and in Christianity made at different times. I am not stating that the policies of the present government are responsible for all dismissals but I will state that they are responsible for many of them.

Mr. E. W. Beatty, K.C., president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the present Prime Minister's right-hand man in the last election campaign stated that our tariff policy should be one which would keep internal and external trade at a maximum. We will recall that the Prime Minister was determined to remain on the gold standard. Great Britain went off the gold standard soon after the imperial agreements were formed. In this connection our government crucified the farmers, because when those farmers sold beef, wheat or pork to the old land for $100 they found their sale price equalled only $70 in Canada. This condition remained true in regard to everything we had to sell, and when we recall that because of the agreements our sales were to a great extent confined to Great Britain we will realize the seriousness of the situation. I believe I have not spoken too strongly when I stated that the government crucified beyond endurance the interests of the farmers. This government kept us to that rate of exchange for the benefit of the wealthy until the people almost went bankrupt. They kept our dollar on a parity with the United States dollar, but the poorer classes suffered. Even to-day, when we are competing in the old land with Australia and the Argentine, the Australian currency is something like twenty per cent below ours, yet our farmers have to compete in the old country market against Australia. We should do one of two things, put our dollar on a parity either with the Australian currency or with the Argentine currency so that we could have fair competition with them.

In the last election the great cry was that this government if elected was going to end unemployment. But at present the number on relief is 1,207,345, and the latest report on unemployment is that there are between 700,000 and 800,000 unemployed. This government called a special session to end unemployment. The cry during the election was that if elected they would look after the poor, but once they were elected their support went to the rich. They raised the tariff and kept up the prices of the necessities of the poor. This government increased the tariffs four times, and each time 100,000 more people went into the ranks of the unemployed. The poor who could maintain themselves had to pay dearly for these tariff measures, and those who could not endure fell upon relief.

After five sessions, with things constantly getting worse, when we ask this government what is its policy with regard to unemployment and relief the answer of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is in effect that they had no policy, that they were thinking it over. After five years in power, can you imagine such a declaration of incompetence —that the government really had no policy?

The country as a whole is showing some signs of discontent under the policies of this government. Since the last imperial conference we have had eight Liberal members elected with large majorities. In the by-election in South Huron a Liberal was returned by a majority of 1,989; in the Yamaska by-election the Liberal majority was 84; in the Mackenzie by-election, where there was a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate, the Liberal majority was 1,614; in the Restigouche-Madawaska by-election a Conservative majority in the general election of 548 was converted into a Liberal majority of 6,472; in South Oxford the Liberal was elected by a majority of 1,493; in West Elgin the Liberal majority was 2,893; in Frontenac-Addington, which at the general election returned a Conservative with a majority of 3,371, a Liberal was returned with a majority of 2,651; in Kenora the Liberal candidate was returned with a majority of 6,165, and in North York a Conservative majority of 298 at the general election was converted into a Liberal majority of 3,687. In East Toronto the Conservative candidate was elected by a minority vote, but he had not declared himself a true Conservative, and was a sort of discard from the Conservative party.

The people are afraid of this government; notwithstanding all the taxation to which we are subjected we are going into debt, and our debt has increased by $800,000,000 under this government. That national debt, added to the provincial and general debt, not including mortgages, means a debt on top of every home in Canada of $3,357. Then ask yourselves, do you want a high or a low rate of interest? Do you want the moneyed interests running this country any longer, or do we need a change of government? The members on the other side of the house the other day were calling us on this side Conservatives. We do not like the name. There was a time in this country when in the rural districts, and in the towns and villages, a Conservative could feel some pride in himself, but that time has largely passed. We do not think that the Conservative party will ever improve very much until they clean out the moneyed interests that are running their party at the present time, and we do not believe that this country can be relieved of the depression until practically all of these friends of the government are removed.

With Mr. Bennett we have had nothing but conferences and no action, and the only thing we got out of the conferences was a chance to pay the expenses. He went to the old country and came back to Canada and travelled from coast to coast, and we thought he was engaged upon a study of the industries of Canada, and the unemployment situation, and how to relieve the distress. The papers of this country proclaimed the great things that he would do, but to our surprise we found when he made an announcement that he was searching for a few lords and ladies on whom to bestow titles. That just goes to show how far removed he is from the actual condition of affairs, how entirely he is out of sympathy with our people.

I must again apologize for criticizing a dying government, but the government has asked us to place our objections on record, and I think we are justified in doing so. The Prime Minister is very eloquent, and certainly he is a great speaker, but the greatest eloquence after all is that which gets things done.

Well might the Prime Minister laugh when he saw the title of the book, Industry and Humanity. I have no doubt that he thought the two things were absolutely incompatible and that the association of those two ideas was absurd. That book was written many years ago, and I am going forward to my election proclaiming every idea in that book, but I can assure the Prime Minister that he will have to change many of the ideas he has proclaimed in the last five years before he will be ready to meet the people in our towns and villages; and he is already renouncing many of them. But we on this side feel perfectly safe in proclaiming the fundamental ideas expounded in that book. We preached them in the last election and we shall do so in the next.

The people of this country are beginning to learn the lesson, and it has been a very serious one for them, that when a country starts a tariff war, the first casualty in that war is home industry.

In conclusion, may I say that the great thing that any government has to consider is what it can do for the youth of the country and the coming generation, because the only undebatable everlasting life that any of us have is what we have in future generations. The young people of this country have a right to a fair deal, and we have no right to pass on to them our debts any more than an individual has a right to pass on to his children the debts that he has incurred himself. Every man should be responsible for the debts he incurs and every generation should be responsible for the debt it incurs. If I have nothing to leave to my children, I hope to heaven I shall not leave them with a lot of debts to pay on my behalf after I am dead. That is not fair to the future generation. But what is this government doing? We are handing down to future generations the debt that we have incurred in the last five years, a debt of some $800,000,000, without assets to balance it. I feel that it is extremely unjust, and the people of this country too are beginning to feel that this continuous increase in debt and this continuous oppression of the poorer classes must cease. Because of its incompetency, I feel sure that the people will decide against this government.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I desire to make a few remarks regarding the motion now before the house and to protest against the long adjournment which is being proposed by the administration. It may well be that the Liberal party is somewhat to blame for the fact that we are going to have a long adjournment. When I make that statement, I refer to the fact that we have not opposed any legislation which has been brought down this session; if we had opposed the social and other legislation, we might be now in the midst of an election.

This afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in his speech said that the budget brought down this year was not criticized and he suggested that it could not be. Well, if the attitude of the Liberal opposition towards the budget was apathetic, so was that of the Conservative members themselves, because although a young member of this house I am of opinion that the budget brought down not long ago evoked less applause from members on the government side than has any other budget introduced since 1930. I noticed that in their budget speeches quite a number of hon. members opposite, in referring to the chief Liberal critic, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), linked his name up with St. James street. I am surprised that that attitude is being adopted toward him, and I would just remind the house that the present leader of the government (Mr. Bennett), who is now unfortunately ill, was long connected with men like Holt and with the Canadian Pacific Railway, yet nothing is said against the right hon. gentleman or his long connection with those men. But my view is that the criticism levelled against the financial critic of the Liberal party is being levelled at him for a specific purpose. Might I say in regard to the Prime Minister's illness—and I say this in all kindness—the attitude of the Liberal party toward his illness has been far more sympathetic than that exhibited by Conservative members especially last fall toward the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), because many hon. members opposite one spoke to were saying "Pity poor Billy King; he's through." Even cabinet ministers were heard to say: "Oh, it's a pity about poor Billy King; he is 'done for'" I am quite correct in saying that the attitude adopted by us on this side toward the illness of the Prime Minister has been eminently fair and far more so than that adopted last fall by the Conservatives, when some campaign seemed to be under way to make out that the present leader of the opposition was ill if he was not actually so. I am sure every hon. member sincerely hopes that the present leader of the government will recover, but perhaps we on this side, besides hoping for his own personal sake that he will recover, would like to see him in the position of leader of his party during the forthcoming election. We certainly would like to see him in that position, because it is our firm belief that the people of this country are just waiting for an opportunity to show the present leader of the government their displeasure in respect to what has taken place during the last five years under his regime. Perhaps this is simply my own opinion, but I believe no other man in Canada has done more to shake the confidence of the general public in our democratic institutions and in the leaders of political parties than has the present Prime Minister on account of the definite promises made by him from one end of Canada to the other in 1930 and taken literally by every Canadian citizen, which promises have remained unfulfilled. Those unfulfilled promises made so very definitely in 1930 have in my opinion done a great deal to arouse suspicion of all political parties and especially of many of our political leaders.

What has surprised me this year more particularly than anything else has been the attitude of Conservative members toward unemployment. Although not a member in 1930, in the session when the Liberal party was in office, I can well remember the denunciations by Conservative members of the then government, who were adopting the position, it is true, that unemployment at that time was not a dominion responsibility; that it was primarily a provincial and a municipal one. If members on the government side were placed on the stand to-day and asked whether it was a fact that their leader and they themselves in going through the country in 1930 stated that their attitude was entirely different from that of the Liberal party, they would have to admit that many of them, if not all, so stated either in the house or on the hustings. If I had time I could quote Hansard against hon. members who are now in the government and who in 1930 stated that unemployment was a dominion and not a municipal responsibility. Yet after five years, when the distress is very much greater, we find hon. members opposite stating in the house: Oh, it is a municipal responsibility first, a provincial one next and a dominion one last. The dominion government, they claim, is doing all that is necessary or all it should do in regard to assistance to municipalities. I just draw that to the attention of hon. members and especially those who are prone to repeat what was said by the then government in 1930 and which in my opinion assisted in the defeat of the Liberal administration. I say that advisedly because I was reeve of a municipality at that time when we had unemployment and municipalities were besieging the then government for help.

[Mr. Reid.]

Speaking about the business before the house and the reasons given for the proposed adjournment, may I point out that we have on the order paper a resolution in regard to the Ottawa trade agreements. I want to devote a little time to this question, because I well remember when they were introduced in the house in 1932 and before the vote was taken, the Prime Minister pointed his finger at each member on this side and said: "Will you dare to go back and tell your electors you voted against the Ottawa agreements?" Again this year he said: "We will give you a chance to vote against those trade agreements before the session is over." Where is the resolution? It is still on the order paper. I for one welcomed the opportunity at that time to discuss the Ottawa trade agreements and I intend to say something more about them. Nothing would please me more than that the government should trot this out now and let us go into the various aspects of the trade situation, because I am going to place before the house some figures to show that the Ottawa trade agreements have about ruined trade in Great Britain for Canadian agricultural products. Let us see what happened. As I did before when I put some figures on record I invite hon. members to rise afterwards and confute them if they can.

When the empire trade agreements were first introduced I remember the leader of the opposition warning this parliament and the country what the effect would be. He said they would result in closing the gates to the English markets for agricultural products from Canada. I have before me figures showing the trade of Great Britain to the end of December, 1934, issued to the members of the House of Commons in Great Britain. What do we find? We find that while the import trade of Great Britain has gone up since 1932 in regard to unmanufactured articles, her imports of food, canned salmon, cattle, eggs, butter, cheese, and such articles have fallen off considerably. As Lord De La Warr said, speaking in the House of Lords on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture of Great Britain, this policy of Great Britain started following the Ottawa conference. In 1932 imports of food products into Great Britain, including tobacco, were £372,880,000. In 1934 they had dropped to £347,335,664, but her total import trade in unmanufactured goods and raw materials had gone up. Both her import and her export trade hade gone up. But the point I am making is that she is now buying less food products such as cattle, pork products, butter, cheese and milk products and eggs. That cannot be disputed. That she herself is going in for dairying and cattle raising is evidenced by the fact that her imports of feed for cattle have increased since 1932.

The other evening somebody mentioned lumber and asked where we in British Columbia would have been but for the British market. Let us be clear in this matter. I think all parties are agreed that it is a desirable thing to trade not only with Great Britain but with every country. But the government have been endeavouring to put over the argument that Great Britain is our greatest market. In the time at my disposal I shall endeavour to put on record some figures to show that it is impossible for Great Britain to take all the forest products which we have been exporting. I come first to lumber, about which much has been said. In 1934 Great Britain took considerable lumber from this country. By lumber I mean planks and boards, because Great Britain does not take logs or timber squares, nor does she take hemlock, cedar or spruce; her principal import of lumber has been Douglas fir, and that principally in boards and planks. She took $10,302,495 worth in that year. The total output of Canadian wood for that year, 1934, lumber, ties and poles, was $38,193,347. In 1930, however, we exported $89,717,326 worth, of which the United States took $70,947,960. Of planks and lumber alone the United States took in 1930 more than the whole output from this country last year, $38,399,785 worth, while the total output for 1934 was only $38,193,347.

Of paper products our export trade in 1930 amounted to $151,509,623, of which the United States took over $128,000,000. By 1934 this had dropped to just over $77,000,000, of which the United States took $61,871,269. Will any hon. member say that it is possible for Great Britain to take all our output of lumber? I do not think they would, especially when one considers the amount we exported in 1930 as against what was exported in 1934; but even of that Great Britain took only a very small percentage.

I might point out that we have been importing many things from Great Britain. The other night the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) created a laugh by speaking of the duty being taken off eggs, cut flowers and cast iron pipe in 1930 by the Liberal government but he would have created a greater laugh if he had told what was going to be taken off this year on articles from the old country, that is if we can believe the forecasts in the press the other day. It was said that among the tariff changes duties will be removed entirely on the entry of white mice, rabbit skins, and diabetic bread and biscuits. If he had said that little mouthful when he talked about the duty being taken off eggs, it surely would have been a scream. But the other night he stopped after he had mentioned these three things; he did not tell about the vast quantities of flour and butter that this country has been importing from Great Britain. That would have been interesting to the farmers, when we have more butter in store now than we had this time last year, yet are importing it from a country that imports herself and has been reexporting it to this country.

Then in regard to tobacco, it may interest the house to recall that although this country has not been growing tobacco for many years it is one article of which Great Britain increased her purchases in 1934. Last year her purchases rose to almost £17,000,000. The remarkable thing is that Canada's exports fell in that year. Great Britain took less tobacco from Canada in 1934 than in other years. For 1932 the figure was £767,550, and for 1934 it had dropped to £438,992. Yet Great Britain's importations had increased in that period over fifty per cent, rising from £10,786,487 to almost £17,000,000.

What have we done in regard to certain classes of goods coming into this country? It is true that we have no anthracite coal in Canada, but in looking over the trade returns I notice that Canada is the only dominion that takes coal from Great Britain. While we do require anthracite it is interesting to note that the imports into Canada from Great Britain of all the common grades of coal have increased since 1930, while our own miners are unemployed and the mines in Canada have been unable to sell their product. That is something I should like the government to answer, if they care to do so. Why should we import ordinary household coal from Great Britain when we can produce millions of tons of that coal in this country?

Now for a moment I should like to direct the attention of the house to the attitude that has been taken this year by the group to my left, and to what I consider to be something of a change in their attitude. I may be wrong in my interpretation of their stand, but if so they will have an opportunity of correcting me. I well remember that in 1933, and I think in 1934 also, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) rose in his place and told the house that capitalism was finished and that there was no use in patching it up. He also said that the two old parties were finished, and that we should have some new system such as they proposed. This year, however, I noticed on the subamendment he spoke about a just price, a dividend, taking some of the inheritance and distributing it among the people of the country, and so on. If that is not closely following the Douglas system I should like to know what it is. Certainly the Douglas system is not socialism; it is a readjustment of capitalism, of dividends. I should like to see dividends distributed, but it amuses me very much to see the scramble that is taking place now and which seems to be similar to Douglas. If these hon. gentlemen are not Douglasites or followers of Aberhart certainly they are very close to it. In my opinion some of them are endeavouring to scramble on to the band wagon before the election takes place, and I think the change in their attitude will take some explaining. Certainly it is very different from the theory advanced that we should work for use instead of for profit. They may be able to answer this statement; it may be that my interpretation is not exactly correct, but at least that is the view I take of their actions this year. Then I noticed that when the six hour day was under discussion the old trouble between labour and the farmer cropped up again. There were not enough supporters of labour to have a vote called, and the farmer members of that group remained in their seats.

But when the hon. member introduced that resolution in connection with the six hour day I wondered if he had given it very much thought, or if he had tried to consider it in the practical light. I am afraid he did not do so; I am afraid it was just one of those gestures that are sometimes made. The other evening I took a few moments to work out what would happen if this country adopted the six hour day, and it may surprice many hon. members, as I am sure it will surprise the hon. gentleman who introduced the motion, to learn that we would have a great boom so far as labour is concerned if it were possible to put the six hour day into operation. I worked it out in this way: We will say the average man works two hundred days per year, eight hours per day, and we will say we have three million persons employed. The averaged hours worked per person per year would be 1,600, which would mean a total of 4,800,000,000 hours yearly. If these persons were employed only six hours daily it would mean that each person would work an average of 1,200 hours per year, which would mean a total reduction of 1,200,000,000 hours. So in order to make up the difference it would take exactly one million employees more than are employed at the present time. I think we should devote our attention to the enforcement of the eight hour day throughout Canada before making even a gesture toward dropping the hours to six. So far as I am concerned I will lend my support in any endeavour to have the eight hour day enforced throughout Canada, and then it will be time enough to try out the six hour day.

An hon. MEMBER: It may be weary waiting.

Mr. REID: Yes, that may be so, but I hope not. I thought I would work that out in its practical application. If we had to employ an additional million men I am afraid we would have to open the immigration doors and bring in many more people, because I do not believe we have a million people idle in Canada at the moment

Now, Mr. Speaker, this house is going to adjourn while cities and municipalities go bankrupt and the whole credit of Canada is in jeopardy. The dominion government may take the attitude that they can sit back and see municipality after municipality and city after city go bankrupt, but I maintain that it will not be long until there will be very little credit abroad for this country. I am of the opinion that the situation is so serious that we should have been attempting to devise ways and means to meet it. The loan council proposed by the government may come too late. Great Britain has put her house in order and told the United States they would have to wait a while before any further payments were made, but we hear members of the government and others say that we must pay our interest charges no matter what it costs this country. Would any hon. member rise in his place and say that the credit of Great Britain has been injured because she told the United States they would have to wait for their money? I do not think so. So far as I am concerned, just in connection with this question of debt cutting, I cannot see very much difference in principle between forcing the bondholders to compromise and the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act under which farmers are to be allowed to tell their bondholders that they may have to accept half the amount due. In my opinion there is no difference in principle between our saying to the man who holds a mortgage on a farm, "You will have to take fifty per cent less" and saying to the bondholders of this or any other country, "You will have to take a lower rate of interest." If that is not done I am afraid they will be faced with something even more serious.

Let me point out something that happened in a municipality in my own constituency, the municipality of Burnaby, a word which I can say perhaps better than most members. I well remember that in 1931 some hon. members laughed when I uttered that word. I warned the house then that the municipality was going bankrupt, and that has actually happened; it is in liquidation to-day. Last year they told the bondholders they were not going to pay the stipulated interest; they also sent out notices to the bondholders, some of whom were located in almost every country of the world, and placed the situation fairly before them. In the letters sent out they said, "We are willing to pay one per cent for four years and after that we will pay three per cent. Will you take that or shall we repudiate?" It may surprise this house to learn of the number of letters that came back saying, yes—and I am proud to say the first letter came from bondholders in my own country of Scotland—saying that the one per cent would be accepted so long as the principal was intact. I believe if some strong leadership were given this country the bondholders could be called together and I think they would be found willing to accept a lower rate of interest so long as they knew their principal would be kept intact. This government has been standing by allowing city after city to go bankrupt. That municipality has gone to the wall; they cannot pay and they are not going to pay. I believe, however, that if we had been given strong leadership; if the provinces had been called together and this loan council formed in 1930, instead of waiting for five years to put our house in order, instead of going deeper into the hole and passing acts permitting farmers to go deeper into debt, we would have been in a far better position to-day and would have been much further on the upgrade than we find ourselves at the present time; at least confidence would have been restored.

If there is any one thing I hold against the government more than another it is the fact that this is a government of high salaries, in these days of distress. What have we witnessed in the last few months? High salaries have been further increased; we have the head of the Bank of Canada receiving $30,000 a year and his deputy $20,000 a year, or a total of $50,000; and many others as well. Is it right to give such high salaries, or to raise them to such heights when thousands of our citizens do not know where their next meals may come from, unless they come from the state? I say if we placed our house in order, started after the high salaries cut our interest charges and kept from further wild borrowings, the confidence within the country would be greater, and without confidence we can get nowhere.

It is all right to say we are not interested. After five years I hear hon. members saying, "Why does the opposition say it is our responsibility?" Their attitude now is that first it is a municipal problem, then a provincial problem and lastly the problem of the federal government. In 1930 an election was fought, and I repeat this is one of the reasons which helped to defeat the Liberal administration in that year. This government will have quite a task to explain its stand during the coming election campaign. We adjourn, Mr. Speaker, not for the benefit of the country; we adjourn, in the words of the Minister of Justice, so that they may pick the best time to go to the people. He gave it away when he said that. We knew it before, but to-day we have it spoken. The adjournment is not then for the benefit of the country, at all, but so that "They will pick a proper time." As I said a few moments ago, if we had opposed the so-called social legislation we would now be in the midst of an election campaign, and would not be asked to agree to a long adjournment or not to come back until the government has had time to think up something new before making a final appeal to the electorate.

I should like to make a suggestion in connection with salaries along the lines of one which has been made in Great Britain. We have heard many suggestions regarding Senate reform. Many people in this house and elsewhere have given willingly of their services on school boards and other public bodies, without looking for or receiving any remuneration therefor. In my opinion one way to reform the Senate would be to have its members give their services without indemnity. I make the suggestion in all seriousness, although I notice it has caused some laughter in the chamber. I say in all seriousness that there are not three per cent of the men in the Senate chamber who are not coupon clippers and rich enough, and do not require it.

Mr. WILLIS: Oh, oh.

Mr. REID: Yes, and the men who get up to oppose the cutting of bonds should be asked either in this house or out of it how many bonds they hold. I see the Speaker rising to object. I make this statement because I speak feelingly on the matter. I do hear some hon. members say, "We could never cut bonds." Why? Because in many instances that action might affect themselves. I say these things can and should be done—and would be done if someone had guts enough to go out and do them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I believe that language is hardly parliamentary.

Mr. REID: Well, there is the expression "intestinal fortitude," which might be more parliamentary. I shall use that word instead.

Mr. WILLIS: What about "sityation"?

Mr. REID: There will be lots of bad "sityations" before we get through. I know what the hon. member has referred to. You just try to say "Bur-r-r-naby."

I protest very seriously against the proposed long adjournment, because there are many things we could and should be doing. Even without the leader of the government being present we have progressed very well. Due to the seriousness of the unemployment situation the mayors of the different cities held a meeting in this city only a short time ago. May I point out to hon. members who have not served on municipal councils that in my view the reeves, mayors and councils are in the front line of this depression because they are meeting the people every minute of the day and so are in the very best position to understand conditions. Members of the government are in a different position, because they are further removed and people wishing to see them have to pass secretaries before an interview is possible. I for one am very sorry they were not allowed to address hon. members in this chamber. May I close my observations by repeating that I strenuously protest against and oppose any adjournment for four, five or six weeks.

Mr. W. P. MULOCK (North York): Mr. Speaker, as a newly elected member of this house I welcome the opportunity briefly to discuss the question of the proposed adjournment until May 20. For nearly three months parliament has been in session, and during that period we have dealt with unemployment insurance, the eight hour day and the weekly day of rest. I believe the government would be prepared to admit that upon the introduction of those measures they received the co-operation of hon. members on this side of the house. Certainly no undue delay was caused by the opposition when these matters were placed before parliament. Still left for consideration are Nos. 26 and 27 on the order paper, namely a measure to establish a grain board and another to provide for minimum wages. Undoubtedly we would be well occupied if we were to proceed with the consideration of these measures, the introduction of either or both of which could be left to the acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley).

To-day we are faced with a condition whereby out of a population of about 10,500,000 we have about 1,207,000 on relief. After five sessions of parliament since the elections of 1930—this is the sixth—no constructive measures have been introduced which would have the effect either of improving the conditions or of providing work for the unemployed. Unfortunately the relief problem does not appear to be lessening. We have the evidence of the mayors from the Canadian cities who came to the city of Ottawa to state their difficulties, and who say that they are unable longer to carry the burden of relief, that they have not the money necessary for that purpose. Those municipal officials have asked for guidance and leadership from the federal authorities.

Throughout the country in the face of very trying conditions we find our farmers striving to retain their farms. Hon. members who have travelled through that section of Ontario which I have the honour to represent will know that within the last few years many farm buildings have had to go without needed improvements. Many houses, barns and fences are not being kept in a proper state of repair, despite the desire of the farmer to prevent deterioration. Certainly there is no desire on the part of farmers to let their buildings go to ruin, but the fact is many have been unable to obtain enough money from the sale of their produce to purchase the necessary materials and to prevent this condition from arising. On the other hand when the farmer goes out to buy he finds that due to tariffs, the prices of the necessities of life and implements of production have been artificially kept at an unreasonable height. It may be true that the prices of many articles have decreased, but certainly not to the same extent that farm produce has come down. The unreasonable tariffs imposed by the present government have had the effect of depriving the farmer of a great part of his purchasing power. From year to year the standard of living formerly enjoyed by the people in the rural communities has been forced down. Until the farmer receives his fair share of purchasing power, there can be no real or lasting prosperity in Canada.

Some considerable time has been taken in this house in a discussion of the Ottawa agreements which we made over two years ago, and since that time have been put into effect. Day after day the matter was discussed—something that happened two years ago, not something that was to be done now to help the farmers or the unemployed. Regardless of what the decision of this house on that subject might be, it was not going to help the people of Canada one iota, not to mention the expense that the prolonged debate entailed.

May I remind this house that we are going into debt in this country at a tremendous pace. According to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) the debt of this country since this government took office has been increased by $812,000,000. The situation is one that calls for immediate action. We cannot go on borrowing principal to pay interest. The facts must be faced, and the sooner we face them the sooner shall we get out of our difficulties; but if we do not face them we shall sink further and further into debt with each day.

This government has been in office now for nearly five years, and with all due respect to my hon. friends opposite I would say that to many it seems more like ten years. This is their sixth session. I understand that the report of the price spreads commission is to be signed to-morrow, and I understood the minister to say this afternoon that it would take from two to three weeks to prepare the legislation based on that report. But if the report is signed to-morrow it will be immediately available to the government, and if an adjournment were obtained until the twenty-ninth of April, that would give the government three weeks all but one day in which to prepare that legislation. So it does not help the government's position very much for the minister to say that this long adjournment is necessary to prepare that legislation.

There is another point of view, and that is that having regard to the financial position of this country at the present time the long adjournment which the government suggests is going to cost the taxpayers of Canada a very large sum of money. The Minister of Finance will no doubt be able to give to the house particulars of that expense when the accounts have been paid, if the government proceeds with this long adjournment.

I do not wish to deal with the budget at any length because it has already been dealt with so ably by the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) but there is one thing I should like to point out in view of the reference of the Minister of Justice this afternoon to this budget being a popular budget. May I say that in my opinion the sugar tax is one of the most unpopular taxes that was ever placed on the statute books of Canada. It is an absolutely unjust tax because it bears hardest on those least able to pay. The larger a man's family the more he has to pay in that form of taxation. It is not a fair principle of taxation, and I submit that sugar tax should be removed just as soon as possible even if its removal necessitates more taxation being placed on those who are better able to bear it.

The Minister of Justice also said that the government would go to the country when it thought it could win the election. The first inference was that if they went to the country now they knew they would be defeated, and they were hoping that something would turn up in the meantime. But I hope that the constitution of this country will not be wrecked to such an extent that this government will refrain from going to the country until they believe they can win, because if they carry out that threat I believe a good many members of this house are here for life.

The Minister of Justice also stated this afternoon that the conditions in 1926 in regard to an adjournment could not reasonably be compared with the present conditions because in 1926 the Liberals had been slaughtered at the polls. May I remind my hon. friends opposite that there was a miniature general election in this country last September, during which a by-election was held in the riding of North York. This constituency I now have the honour to represent in this house by virtue of having the support not only of the Liberals of North York but of the people of the riding as a whole, who have come to the conclusion that this government has failed in its duty and has not carried out in any substantial particular the promises it made in 1930; and the people of that riding at least want a general election at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. COTNAM: They do not need it. They have got you.

Mr. MULOCK: You should know. A number of the members of the government came into the riding of North York and spoke in that by-election: the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), and the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), who delivered several speeches; the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton), and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) were amongst the most prominent. I should like to refer to one statement which the Minister of National Revenue made during that by-election in North York as reported in the Mail and Empire of September 17 last. He spoke in part as follows:

> Non-partisan statistics showed that Canada led the United States in recovery because Bennett had sought markets in empire countries after world markets had been closed to Canadians during the King regime. He urged the electors to not believe in the "trash" which they read in the newspapers and heard from Liberal platforms—

And this is the part I want hon. gentlemen to listen to:

> —and to not slap the Bennett government in the face after a successful administration.

The people of North York, perhaps as a result of that appeal to some extent, decided in no uncertain terms by giving a member of the present opposition a majority three and a half times the record majority for that riding, and defeating the government in 110 polls out of 117. If that is not a slaughter, I do not know to what the Minister of Justice was referring this afternoon.

The people consider that this government has failed. They have lost confidence in the government. They want a general election at the earliest possible moment, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this adjournment is asked for the purpose of delaying an appeal to the people. For these reasons I shall protest against the long adjournment being granted at this time, when there are so many urgent problems facing this parliament.

Mr. C. A. CAMPBELL (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to join with other members, particularly my roommate, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) who has just taken his seat, in protesting against this proposed long adjournment. Like my colleague I also entered this house in the miniature general election last fall. I am sorry there are not more western members and eastern members on the other side at the moment to hear what happened in my riding on that occasion. I want to remind them that that riding had never returned a Liberal until September 24 last since 1791. It was not so much a vote for me personally or a vote for the Liberal party, because in June of last year, when there was a Liberal landslide in the province, I was defeated by the very same electors who elected me on September 24. But the fact is that the people voted against the Bennett policies, and especially against the most autocratic government we have had in Canada for a long time. The people of the riding of Frontenac-Addington are mostly United Empire Loyalist stock, as the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) well knows. He however left there before the people saw the light politically.

I would remind the house that one of the planks in our platform during the contest last fall was the fact that responsible government in Canada was endangered as long as the present government held office. The people of Frontenac-Addington considered this plank very seriously and I am glad to say the result is that I now represent that riding behind the leader of a party which supports the principles we feel will soon restore responsible government to Canada.

I should like to say something further about my riding but I do not want to trespass too long upon the good graces of the house. I would remind the house that the government of the day thought nothing about reforms until after the miniature general election of last fall. This is not the first time the people in this section of the country have started a move for reform. Back in the days of 1827 a very small portion of my riding and a portion of the riding now represented by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Weese) elected a reformer in the person of Marshall Bidwell to the Upper Canada legislature. Certain Tories then held power in Ontario and this gentleman was not allowed to take his seat. Elections were held on different occasions for the next few months and eventually his son was elected along with a man by the name of Peter Perry. The leadership and fighting qualities of these men, coupled with those of the grandfather of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) brought about responsible government in Ontario which we have preserved to the present time.

During the by-election in Frontenac-Addington the policies of the government were placed fairly before the people. I remember that these policies were enunciated by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the Minister of National Health (Mr. Sutherland). The former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) appeared in the riding on two occasions, and then we had the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam), the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol), the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney), the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross), the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver), the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), the hon. member for South Hastings (Mr. Tummon), the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox and the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman). These were the forces arrayed against the forces of Liberalism, but the people of Frontenac-Addington said that this government must change.

We have been hearing a lot about the former Minister of Trade and Commerce as a spellbinder. I do not want to take up much time but I would remind hon. members that the hon. gentleman was brought back to try to save the riding for the government. At that time he was a minister, and as he has done on many other occasions, he did not stick to the ethics of parliament. He spoke of those things which he thought ought to be done when he knew evidence was still being called before the price spreads commission and about which we in this parliament will not be told officially until after we have reassembled on May 20. During the last provincial election I lost by thirty-five votes the polling division of Harrowsmith, in which the minister spoke and the former minister was brought back to try to save the situation. I had no occasion to visit this division but I lost it by only six votes in the by-election. I should like to quote some of the arguments put forward by members of the government. During the joint nomination debate on the official nomination day at Sydenham, the Minister of Railways and Canals had this to say:

> The by-elections have a double purpose in all of these constituencies. It is the day for voters to choose their representative, whom they believe would serve them the best. You have the opportunity of culling out some of the people. In other words, you have the opportunity of either preventing the Bennett government from continuing their policy and voting against the government and against what they have been doing.

The hon. member for Toronto Northwest had this to say a few nights afterwards at Newburgh:

> The issue in this campaign is the Bennett tariff policy, and as a business man, interested in business for 25 years, I will try to prove to you that the tariff policy of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett is infinitely better than the freer trade policy of the old government of Mackenzie King.

A few nights later the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe said at Odessa:

> Ask yourself, why has Canada secured better prices for her commodities? Ask yourself if our credit is better than other countries in the world, as against those who have preached inflation and reciprocity. I urge upon you to support the government that is steadily returning the country to normal and prosperity.

I would remind hon. members, especially those who come from the west, that I was criticized during the campaign because I spoke in favour of freer trade arrangements with the United States. Members of the government came down to my constituency to try to keep me from being elected to this house, and, as indicated by the quotations I have just given, the people were led to believe the government of the day was not in favour of reciprocity with the United States. Therefore the people of Frontenac-Addington and of the other three constituencies which sent Liberal members to this house on September 24 take the credit for forcing this government to seek better trade arrangements with the United States.

The first thing I know I will be making a speech, and I did not intend to do that tonight. I should like to refer to some of the statements made this afternoon by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). I have often wondered why a general election was not held last fall, because I know it has always been felt in the country that there should be an election every four years, and this is the feeling of hon. gentlemen opposite. I should like to quote from a letter written by the former Conservative organizer, and chief whip, Senator A. D. McRae. This letter is dated April 17, 1930, and the first paragraph reads as follows:

> We are now in the fourth session of the sixteenth parliament. Only twice since Confederation has any government had the temerity to stay five full sessions and in both cases they were decisively defeated on appeal to the country. Mr. Mackenzie King, a very shrewd politician, will not voluntarily repeat this experiment.

And a few sentences further on he said:

> Although unemployment is very serious in Canada our government has taken no action.

And again:

> The Canadian people have every reason to feel "it is time for a change."

Everything there stated still holds good to-day. Until the Minister of Justice told us this afternoon I did not know why the government had not gone to the country. He said that the governments of which he had been a member had gone to the country only when they felt that they could win. Perhaps we should thank God for the constitution which provides that we shall eventually have an election whether or not the government is going to win.

The Minister also referred to what he regarded as the parallel of 1911 with the present day. I want to remind the house that in 1911 the then government had been in power for only three years. The present government have been in power five years. It is true they have not gone the full limit to which they are legally entitled, but, as pointed out by their organizer in 1930, they have outrun the length of parliament to which by practice they are entitled, namely, four sessions, and now are on the sixth. We on this side of the house and I think everyone in the dominion feel that Canada should certainly be represented by the Prime Minister at the silver jubilee of the king's coronation, but I do not believe we should at this time have a parallel drawn between conditions in Canada in 1911 and those of the present day. As I pointed out, the government of that day had two years to run, and moreover it had no unemployment problem such as exists at present. It had no financial crisis to face in the municipalities or the provinces or the dominion, and to-day we find that we have to face all these conditions, yet by the adjournment now proposed we in this parliament who were elected to represent the Canadian people admit that we cannot carry on because one man has to leave Canada. We wish the Prime Minister to go to Great Britain, but he has ministers here quite capable of carrying on the business of the country while he is away, and as other hon. members have stated, I fail to see why we should agree to anything more than the usual adjournment over what we may call Holy Week or the Holy Sabbath.

I want to add this to what the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has just stated: we are not at the point where we are waiting for legislation, but we have some already on the order paper and there are still some fifty-three items of supply to be called. According to the order paper, a grain board is to be set up; some amendments have been sent back to us from the Senate in connection with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, as well as other matters. All these matters have to come before us. Why then are we asked to pass these over, to take an adjournment for a long period at considerable cost to the people of Canada, and above all to refuse to try to solve the worst problem we have confronting us, that of unemployment?

I should like now to remind members of the government what they stood for in 1930. On June 26 of that year the Ottawa Journal printed an editorial which was put into pamphlet form, sent out all over Canada and used by the speakers of the then opposition and its canvassers as the principle on which the opposition of that day, now the government then stood. This pamphlet is very interesting to read five years later, and I should like to read a few parts of it, as follows:

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. Bennett At Cobourg

Back in Ontario after his trip to the Pacific coast, Mr. Bennett on Tuesday night at Cobourg spoke with a power and a conviction that must have profoundly impressed countless thousands who heard him. Always a power on the hustings, Mr. Bennett in his first Ontario speech reached an extraordinary high degree of platform eloquence, an eloquence which, reinforced by vital truths, cannot be without effect throughout the country.

The opposition leader was at his best when dealing with the issue of unemployment. Moved by the spectacle of thousands of workless men tramping the streets of western cities, he was desolating in his criticism of the Prime Minister's extraordinary incapacity to grasp the meaning of such things. What, he asked, was the policy of Canada's Prime Minister, when tens of thousands of Canadians were in distress? His policy was that he would call—a conference. Men and women might be craving work, children might be hungry, cities might be setting up soup kitchens; Mr. King's answer to all of this was: "Vote me back to office, and some time next fall I will call a meeting to see what can be done." This from the sometime great crusader for labour, the author of Industry and Humanity!

Why, as Mr. Bennett well asked—why a conference? What is it that a conference would find out? Does it require a conference to discover that men are unemployed? That there is distress? That cities like Winnipeg are spending $3,000 a week to feed workless workers? The proposition is simply a fraud. It is subterfuge to enable Mr. King to dodge his responsibility.

Mr. Bennett's policy—an honest, humane policy—is to meet parliament, to cut through red-tape and legalisms and constitutional hair-splitting, to take prompt and vigorous measures to see to it that in this country people do not starve. That is not merely the policy of a statesman; it is the policy of a human being; the policy of a man who has some sympathy with the masses, who is big enough and honest enough not to let petty politics and pettier legalisms stand in the way when Canadians are in want.

What sense, what humanity, in claiming that unemployment is not a federal responsibility? If the lawyers and the constitutional pundits want to argue about that, let them argue. What is true, and what everybody knows, is that if unemployment is not a dominion legal responsibility, it is a dominion moral responsibility. There can be no argument about that.

And so the people throughout Canada, who knew what unemployment relief was costing each individual taxpayer when he paid his tax bill in the fall or at some other period in the year to the township or village or town or city, believed they were going to be relieved of that direct tax if only they voted for the then opposition, the present government. But at the present time we find it is not a matter merely of Winnipeg paying $3,000 a week, which at that time was, according to the present Prime Minister himself, a staggering figure, but small cities like St. Thomas, with only about 14,000 people, paying $4,500 a week last year for unemployment relief. Kingston, which boasts the highest record for any city in the dominion for paid up taxes, last year paid over $3,000 a week for unemployment relief, yet it is a city a little less than one-tenth the size of Winnipeg. Moreover we have witnessed this government passing on to the provinces and they in turn being forced to pass on to the municipalities more of the cost of unemployment relief on account of men being compelled to go on relief because of the policies of the present administration.

An hon. MEMBER: No; you do not believe that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Well, the only branch of industry that could have benefited by the high tariffs about which the hon. member for Northwest Toronto (Mr. MacNicol) spoke in the by-election of September 24, must have been the manufacturing industry. In 1930 in the manufacturing industry alone there were about 644,000 employees who were drawing $736,000,000 in wages and salaries and producing about $3,500,000,000 worth of commodities. But in 1933, the last year for which there are any figures—and these are from the bureau of statistics—there were less than 500,000 employees who were drawing $465,000,000 in wages and salaries and producing just a little over $2,000,000,000 worth of goods. Therefore by the policies of the present government, the manufacturing industry, the only branch of industry which could benefit thereby, lost $1,500,000,000 worth of business and about 150,000 employees were thrown out of work on account of voting as they did in 1930 for what they thought was going to be a benefit to themselves. And now we have been forced to receive from the present government through the Minister of Labour an admission that they have no policy regarding unemployment relief, that their policy is going to depend upon what requests they get from the provinces. And I know they must receive many. Representing a riding which is fairly close to Ottawa I am able to journey there every week-end, and I can assure the house that although the Prime Minister in 1930 said it was going to be his duty to see that no one should starve, there are many men in this country who are wondering where or how they are going to get food or clothing or fuel to keep their children and themselves from starving.

I have spoken longer than I felt I should but I want to remind the house that last fall the people of Frontenac-Addington, as well as of other ridings in Ontario, in a campaign in which one of the main points was that the people of those ridings were given a chance, as the Minister of Railways intimated at Sydenham, to vote against the policies of the Bennett government, intimated to the government that they no longer felt that it had the right to govern, that they did not agree with its policies or the way it was governing. Yet now we have the spectacle of this government trying to carry on even until the last. Representing this old United Empire Loyalist constituency many of the people of which have been Conservatives since they were born, I respectfully say that I feel sorry for these farmers on account of the policies of this government.

Mr. LOUCKS: Were you born in Frontenac?

Mr. CAMPBELL: No, I was not fortunate enough to have that privilege. But the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) had the privilege of being born in the village of Battersea, which is in a fine part of the county of Frontenac, a very good farming section; and that fine village, although it has been Conservative on many occasions, gave me a majority of 127. Let me tell the hon. member why they did that. I have before me the returns showing the price of milk each year since 1929 at the cheese factory at Battersea, in the month of July, which we take as the average month for the year in the cheese business. In 1929 they received $1.26 per hundred pounds; in 1930, $1.17; in 1931, 83·1 cents; and in 1932, 60·3 cents. In 1933, even with the depreciated currency they received only 71·3 cents and last year they received 70·4 cents, or one cent less than 1933, notwithstanding the empire agreements and trade policies of which this government boasts. That shows why the people of Frontenac decided that this government had outlived its usefulness.

I therefore join at this time with my colleagues in saying that the people of Canada do not wish a long adjournment of the house. They want an election, so that regardless of who is elected they may know that the government is to be stable for the next five years, and so that exporters and importers will be able to buy and sell goods and make contracts for more than a few days ahead. Not only that; we all know that in an election year in the United States business falls off almost to the stagnation point, and much of our business follows theirs. The government are forcing us to go at slow speed in business for all this year, and next year we will have to slow up along with the United States for their election year; so I say the actions of this government are forcing the business and working people of this country to face two hard years. I agree with my colleagues that we should have an election at the earliest possible time, and in order to do that we should stay here and finish the business and then bring on the election without delay.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): My hon. friends opposite premised their speeches on the budget, by saying that they would not have taken part in the debate had it not been for something said by someone else. I wish for a few minutes to refer to some things mentioned by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in his address this afternoon.

We are now in the sixth session of the seventeenth parliament. As has already been said, in only one other parliament besides this, except the war parliament, have six sessions been held. That occasion was the memorable session which ended on June 23, 1896. I say to my hon. friends, and I think this argument ought to appeal to them as much as any argument that can be made, that conditions now and with this government are very similar to what they were with that parliament and that government prior to 1896. Times were bad then. The government had lost the confidence of the people, and the members of the government had lost confidence in one another. They carried on until the legitimate life of parliament expired by effluxion of time and they were swept out of office. They were followed by a great Liberal government under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who for fifteen years gave to this country the greatest era of prosperity it had ever had until my leader came into power in 1921.

I think the last two hon. gentlemen who have spoken are the best evidence that this government could have of how completely they have lost the confidence of the people of this country. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) was elected in a riding which had become almost a Conservative stronghold. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell), who was defeated by a majority of over a thousand when he was a candidate against the Henry government in June last, was elected by a majority of about three thousand. I want to say in all kindness to this government that that shows how much more unpopular this government is than the Henry government was last June.

[Mr. Campbell.]

He was a pretty good organizer who wrote that letter read by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington. I think he was much more successful than his successor is going to be in the present campaign. He was absolutely right when he referred to the fact that a government that had stayed in power for four years, even if they had not had the intimations and suggestions and kicks from the electors that this government have had, should know that they should not cling to power any longer. Why is it done? Why did the Henry government remain in power in Ontario as long as it did? Of course it is true that there was a very close alliance between the Henry administration and this administration; there is no question about that. The best evidence that the leader of this government did not very well sense public opinion last June was the fact that just a couple of nights before the election he recommended the Henry government to the people of Ontario and predicted their return on election day. He practically made it a federal issue. As a matter of fact for some time there was a very close working arrangement between the federal government and the various provincial governments. That I think was one of the greatest reasons for these provincial governments faring as badly as they did. Perhaps you can think feelingly in that regard, Mr. Speaker, coming from the province from which you do come; I believe one of the greatest obstacles that confronted them was the fact that they were known to be in very close alignment with this government, which has outworn its welcome more rapidly, if I may say so, than any other government that has ever been in power in Canada. Consider the government that was turned out in 1896. It had not had the intimations of how it stood with the people to the extent that this government have had them. I wonder now if the government would do the same if they had it all to do over again, with these six by-elections facing them, forced upon them by members of the opposition, because none of them was held until it had to be held. This government have shown less appetite for by-elections than any other government in this country. They do not seem even very enthusiastic about filling any of the vacancies that exist at the present time. Would it not have been better to carry that miniature election last September a little farther and make it a general election and have their troubles over with? Would it not have been better to let the people know just what were the policies of the government that was to administer the affairs of this country for the next few years?

I was very greatly interested in the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) this afternoon. As usual he made the very best out of a very bad case, and I do not think I ever heard him with a worse case than he had this afternoon. However, he pointed out that this case was similar to the situation that existed in 1926. I should like to know the similarity. The Minister of Justice said the situation in 1926 affords only a very slight parallel to the present situation, and I quite agree. As has been stated so well already by my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in 1926 there was a vote of the elected representatives of the people in this house as to whom they wanted to carry on the government of this country, and they decided in favour of the party led by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King). True, they decided that only by the very small majority of three, but I want to point out to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice that a majority of three is a great deal better than a minority of three, and that was just the difference between the two parties at that time.

That having taken place, what was the situation which confronted this house? The leader of the party did not have a seat in the house and there were no ministers from Ontario, the province from which the very best ministers come. It was necessary first of all to have the Prime Minister elected and to elect some other ministers. One would have thought that with a house fresh from the country—there could be no question of its having lost any of its popularity between the time of the election and the time of this vote—this government which speaks of chivalry, generosity and good sportsmanship would have said, "Follow the practice that is followed in England; go ahead and complete the government, organize it and carry on the work of the house." They did not do that; they objected, and right here I want to read a statement that was not read this afternoon by my hon. friend from Quebec East. I think perhaps it describes the situation at the present time better than any of the other remarks made on that occasion. I refer to the remarks made by my revered friend the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White). Of course the statement was not applicable to the facts as they existed at that time but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that you will agree that it is very applicable to conditions as they exist at the present time. If I may say so with the greatest respect for my hon. friends opposite, though I do think they are trying to hang on after they have been invited to get out, I think it accurately describes the situation as it exists to-day. The statement is to be found at page 653 of Hansard for 1926, and is as follows:

> I am opposed to the motion for a long adjournment for this reason—and I endeavour to voice so far as I can the feeling of the man on the street, the outside public—

That is the man whose feeling I am trying to voice now.

> —that parliament was called for the dispatch of business, not for an adjournment of six weeks. I venture to state that no more shocking spectacle has ever been presented in connection with parliamentary government than that which we have witnessed recently in this very country. It recalls to my mind a gibe of Disraeli under somewhat similar circumstances, when he pictured the government of that day in this way.

I should like you, Mr. Speaker, to pay particular attention to this because I think it is a very accurate description of the present government.

Mr. CANTLEY: Go on.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will go on; my hon. friend need not worry.

> He said that from a certain point along the shores of South America you can see a range of extinct volcanoes, from which not one flame flickers from a single pallid crest. So the government sit to-day.

That was the unkind expression used by the hon. member for Mount Royal in regard to a freshly elected government which enjoyed the confidence of the people at that time. What would he have said if he were attempting to describe this government to-day? Then he goes on, and I think this is also very eloquent in regard to the present situation:

> I believe rightly or wrongly that the nerves of the people of Canada are in a state of tension. I believe that the business of this country is being halted for lack of confidence in the stability of government, and the longer we delay getting on with business and determining who are to form the government and manage the affairs of Canada for some years to come, the longer will business be in a state of uncertainty, and the longer will capital hesitate to invest.

If in 1926 the nerves of the people of Canada were in a state of tension, I wonder what state they would be in to-day, after all they have gone through in the last four and a half years. He follows up with a delightful peroration, as follows:

> Is there anyone in this house who does not know the purpose of the adjournment? It is to endeavour to reanimate a moribund government, and for no other purpose, and if that be so, and this is a point I would like to stress—

And I, too, would like to stress it—

—why is it that this so-called government has met parliament?

It would have been so easy before the by-elections last fall for this government to fulfil its constitutional duty. They knew the feelings of the people, and instead of having by-elections they should have had the general elections. However, we know they decided not to do so, and chose rather to meet parliament. Before calling parliament it would seem the government felt some work was necessary to make parliament receptive to the great reform measures to be introduced. These measures were not forecast in the ordinary manner in which measures are made known, namely, in the speech from the throne. In this instance they were heralded and broadcast throughout the land by radio. We were told of the great reforms contemplated and the great change of heart which had been experienced by people whose hearts prior to that time had not shown any pronounced reform tendencies.

Well, the house met and the speech from the throne was delivered. We heard more about the legislation to be brought before parliament. The indications both in the radio addresses and in the speech from the throne were that for over a year these matters had been in the hearts and minds of hon. members of the government and their followers. We understood the government had given the measures serious consideration, and my recollection is that the suggestion was made that some of the legislation had been ready for a year. Following the delivery of the speech from the throne my right hon. leader suggested that if, as was claimed, the reforms were ready, if such reforms were to be of such great benefit to the Canadian people, in view of the fact that undoubtedly reforms were needed, we should have such measures placed before us as rapidly as possible. But, following the adoption of the address we witnessed the remarkable spectacle of a supporter of the government, instead of introducing new legislation, moving a resolution in an attempt to prove that some previous legislation, namely empire agreements which had been passed years before, was good legislation. The government seemed to have some doubt about the matter, with the result that my good farmer friend from Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) moved the resolution, and in his observations indicated the great benefits accruing to the farmers of Toronto-Scarborough and the rest of Canada from the trade agreements. Hours—yes, days—were taken up in an argument about legislation which had been passed, and the resolution, strange to say, has not yet been voted upon. At that time it did not appear as though the government was at all enthusiastic about its reform program or that it was ready to proceed with the legislation about which the Prime Minister had spoken.

As the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) is in his seat I should like to describe that which appeared to me as the next most interesting and ingenious method of killing time which has been adopted since the beginning of the session. As the first item to be considered in the estimates for the Department of Railways and Canals we had for discussion an item respecting tourist traffic. Apparently realizing that all the people in the various countries of the world who contemplated travelling were constant readers of Canadian Hansard, the minister evidently concluded that in order to be successful in the development of tourist trade he must place on Hansard the great advantages offered to tourists visiting Canada. He did it spendidly, and so inspired his followers that nearly every hon. member who had a stream running through his riding or a small clump of trees situated thereon felt constrained to rise in his place and state that he, too, knew of a wonderful place for the tourist to visit.

Mr. MANION: Quite a few hon. members opposite spoke, too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but not as many as my hon. friend would have wished.

Mr. MANION: They do not come from as fine parts of the country.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, may I say to the minister, who undoubtedly knows the county of Middlesex, that if he came from a county like Middlesex he would not need to tell the the world about the beauties of his constituency; they would know. That debate continued for some time.

I believe you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, due to the expense and to the fact that you have work to do at home, that it would be well as soon as possible to terminate the present session. When estimates were offered for consideration my right hon. leader agreed to their passage so that ample opportunity would be afforded to proceed with the reform legislation. Despite that fact, however, hon. members on the government benches proceeded to discuss their own estimates in a manner which to my mind appeared quite novel. When on a former occasion I was charged with the passage of estimates I did not occupy any more of the time of the house than was necessary, a practice which I believe is followed in every well regulated government.

Undoubtedly every hon. member of every shade of political thought deeply regrets the illness which has overtaken the Prime Minister. We are all of one mind in giving sincere thanks for the fact that he is recovering and, according to present indications, will be in fit physical condition to attend the jubilee ceremonies to be held in London in the month of May. May I point out however that there are sixteen other ministers in the government. No person has stressed to a greater degree than has the Prime Minister the necessity for reasonable economies in the transaction of the country's business. All members of this house will join in an expression of thankfulness for his recovery and will share the hope of seeing him in the house before the end of the session.

May I just point out what this adjournment means?

The Prime Minister, speaking in this house on November 10, 1932, as reported at page 1065 of Hansard, said:

> Why waste $15,000 per day of the taxpayers money, $100,000 a week, in reiterating statements not one word of which adds any new information?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who was it said that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The present Prime Minister. He said:

> Why waste $15,000 per day of the taxpayers' money, $100,000 a week?

After all, Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers of this country have come through just about all that they can bear. I wonder if this government has considered what it is going to mean to have this house adjourn for four or five extra weeks. I am not now referring to the legislation with respect to the price spreads commission, because I understand that their report is ready to table at the present time. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) assumed that after that report was tabled it would take two or three weeks to prepare the necessary legislation. That seems a long time, but it is important legislation. That would bring us to the Tuesday after Easter Monday. We could then resume and go on with that business, and that I submit to this house with very great earnestness is what I believe we should do.

The Minister of Justice quoted the precedent of 1911 when Sir Robert Borden, then Mr. Borden, moved that a two months' adjournment should take place so as to enable the Prime Minister to attend, as he said, the coronation. But I want to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that it was not the coronation alone, but the coronation and the imperial conference that was taking place at the same time, and which it was necessary for the Prime Minister of Canada to attend, and it was the unanimous opinion of members of this house that he should go. The Minister of Justice has referred to the great chivalry displayed in that motion being made by a member of the opposition, a gentleman for whom we all have the greatest respect. But I should call attention to this fact, that while the Prime Minister was away in London, those who before his leaving had spoken in favour of a reciprocity arrangement started a campaign against it and enunciated the policy of "no truck or trade with the Yankees." Those who now profess to be so much in favour of reciprocity left no stone unturned at that time to defeat what would have been one of the greatest blessings ever offered to this country, and which the present government have not been very successful in getting if their efforts have been just as diligent as this house has been led to believe they have been in recent years.

It is interesting to recall that during that campaign—of course I was very young at the time, but I remember the speeches made by the present Minister of Justice in favour of reciprocity and I remember his denunciation of the noble eighteen who opposed it and of all the rest who talked this silly nonsense, as he described it, of having no truck or trade with the Yankees.

I think perhaps I have overstepped the time I intended to take up, but I do wish to urge upon the government that they reconsider their decision with regard to the proposed adjournment. After all every member of this house has duties and responsibilities and obligations at the present time, and every member of this house knows perfectly well that if we adjourn until the twentieth of May, thus getting into a season when this chamber becomes at times almost unbearable, business that we could now dispose of in an extra week or ten days will occupy the time of the house for three weeks or more. Many members of the house will have an election campaign to fight, and the demands upon them are pretty strenuous financially and physically at the present time. I do hope that the government will reconsider their decision. If it is going to take two weeks to prepare the price spreads legislation—I know it is an important matter and should receive all the attention it demands—it could be ready for the house to proceed with on the Tuesday after Easter Monday. We could then get through with the work of the house in a very short time, and the members could go to their homes and look after the good of the country by trying to get reelected in the best way they could.

There is not much more that I have to say. No business institution in Canada would make a suggestion of the kind now put forward by the government. I regret that the acting Prime Minister is not in his seat at the moment, but I do ask his colleagues who are here to reconsider the decision at which apparently they have arrived to have this long adjournment. Let us come back after the ordinary Easter recess, conclude the business of the session, and thereby save the very serious drain upon the taxpayers of this country of the $15,000 a day to which the Prime Minister referred, and which undoubtedly is a very serious matter at the present time.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, there are many things that have been suggested by the various debates that have taken place during the session that might call for remarks, but it is not my intention to discuss the past debates at any length. Rather would I confine myself to giving a few reasons why it would seem inadvisable that a long adjournment of the house should be taken.

There is one thing, however, to which I should like to refer, and that was suggested by the number of references that have been made this evening to reciprocity. I met a friend, a personal friend but a political opponent with whom I have had political controversies in the past, and I told him that the best joke of the session was that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) had said that the Conservative party had never been opposed to reciprocity. I said to him, "How would you have liked to go back home during the controversy we had in 1911 and tell the people that the Conservative party had never been opposed to reciprocity?" He said, "I thought we were." That reminded me of a story told of an adherent to a certain sect which does not believe in the realities of evil or sin. This man once met a little girl and he asked her how her father was. She replied, "Oh, he is very sick." He said, "He only thinks he is sick." A few weeks later he met the little girl again and inquired as to her fathers' health. She said, "He thinks he is dead and the neighbours thought so too for they came and took him away to bury him." It is evident that the Conservatives only thought they were opposed to reciprocity. It would be interesting to know whether they were really opposed to it, whether they only thought they were or just what their real attitude was. However, this gentleman said to me, "We thought we were opposed to reciprocity." We certainly thought they were, and I still think there is abundant evidence that the Conservatives were opposed to reciprocity in 1911.

In connection with the proposed adjournment, personally I have no objection to it as it meets my own plans fairly well. However, it does place an undue burden upon hon. members who come from distant places and who have taken up residences in Ottawa for a definite time. This objection has been urged quite strongly. The request for a long adjournment is quite in harmony with the attitude of this government throughout this session. It has been evident on more than one occasion that the government was stalling for time. I would refer to the instance when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) moved a vote of want of confidence in the government. After hon. members on this side had finished the debate, it was continued by hon. members opposite for a full day, indicating that they were stalling for time.

One reason why I would protest against a long adjournment is illustrated by a matter which I brought to the notice of the government. I pointed out that a motion for a return asking for the increases and decreases made in duties during the sessions of 1929 and 1930 was passed but the return had not been made. I pointed out that the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) had asked for a return giving only the increases, and that this had been tabled. I think it desirable, before hon. members are allowed to go into the west to spread these stories about the number of increases in the tariff made in those particular sessions, that the full facts be placed before the house. Evidently the government does not want to give these full facts; it wants to lay stress upon the increases made in the tariff. This is quite in harmony with the practices of the past. I doubt if the government will say anything more about the decreases which were made in the tariff during the sessions of 1929 and 1930 than the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) said the other day when he referred to the reductions in the British preference on hay, straw and such things. The Minister of Railways said that this was one of the things out of which he got a good laugh—the loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind. Hon. members opposite like to refer to the putting of hay and straw on the free list, but I think we should discuss this matter sanely and intelligently. When the Minister of Finance of that day, Hon. Charles Dunning, presented his budget, it was stated quite plainly that about fifty articles had been put on the free list because under no circumstances would any of them be imported from Great Britain. This fact was made abundantly clear. Is it any more foolish to put these articles on the free list than to continue them as dutiable under the British preference? Is it any more foolish to put hay and straw on the free list than to keep them on the tariff schedule with a duty of about $1.60? That is all that was done, yet hon. gentlemen went through the country and tried to create a great laugh because of this.

One of the greatest offenders in this respect was the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), the gentleman who has been talking so much about ethics in business. He forgot there was such a thing as ethics in political controversy. At a meeting in my constituency he referred to the sinister joke and gesture of the so-called Dunning budget, whereas if the facts had been stated properly the explanation would have been that the sheets had been wiped clear of fifty articles which under no circumstances would be imported from Great Britain. It was more sensible to put them on the free list than to allow them to remain in the tariff schedules. I would like to have this return showing the decreases made in the tariff during those sessions before hon. members go out through the country to make their tariff speeches and repeat the misrepresentations they have made in the past. However, I am afraid I will not get this before adjournment.

There is a stronger reason why we should not have this long adjournment. The farm loan bill is now before the senate, and I should like to know if it will come back to us, with possible senate amendments, before we adjourn at Easter. It is of the greatest importance that this bill should be passed and placed upon the statute books at the earliest possible date. The farmers all through the country are waiting for this legislation in order that they may receive its benefits. All the legislation to be offered at this session should be completed as speedily as possible. Any relief measures which this government proposes to bring down should receive immediate sanction. What happened last year? We passed a works program of $40,000,000, but this could not be passed before the end of June, at which time over half the season for the carrying on of public works had passed. We had been told since that only $8,000,000 of this amount was spent. It seems absurd to allow half the summer season to pass, the season for the construction of public works, before passing such legislation. However, that was the situation that prevailed last year and it will prevail again this year if these measures are not presented immediately. What was the use of providing for $40,000,000 to relieve unemployment and then spending only about $8,000,000? I contend it is absolutely necessary that the business of this parliament should be concluded as speedily as possible in order that these very important measures may be placed on the statute books and that the people of Canada who are dependent upon relief may know just what relief it will be possible for them to obtain. This cannot be done until these measures are finally given effect to according to the rules of procedure.

It has been contended that there is no demand for an immediate election. I had a letter from one of my constituents to-day in which he says: "Is there no way by which the Liberals can force an immediate election?" He pointed to the rumours that were reported in the newspapers that an election was not likely to be held until September, and said that the Conservatives always liked to choose for an election the time when the producers, the farmers, would not be able to attend to it, being engaged with their farm work. Perhaps that is the thought that was in the mind of the Minister of Justice when he said that the government would choose the time when they thought they could win. Undoubtedly the month of September is about the poorest time it is possible to choose for an election in the prairie provinces. The farmers are busily engaged with their harvests, and in many cases it is not possible for them to get help to carry on their work. The threshing machines are all running, and in order to get men out to the polls it is necessary for the party workers on both sides to provide extra men to keep the gangs working while the other men are away at the polls. It is about the worst month possible for holding an election in the west. The proper time to hold an election in the prairie provinces is the month of June.

Mr. A. S. RENNIE (South Oxford): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made in the debate on the amendment; I have enjoyed them very much, and in my rambling observations I may possibly cover some of the ground that has been traversed by previous speakers. Let me say first that to my mind three important factors stand out very strongly as to why at this time there should not be a long adjournment of the house. Those three factors are: first, the cost involved; second, the inconvenience to the members and those interested in the government of the country, and, third, the demoralizing effect upon the trade of the dominion. We are all interested in present economic conditions in Canada, and we on this side of the house all feel that those who are bearing the burden of taxation to-day should not be asked to bear any more. The cost involved in a long adjournment will mean that the farmers especially and the taxpayers generally will be again burdened with unnecessary taxes. That is one reason why a long adjournment should not be considered at this time. Another reason is, as I have said, the inconvenience and expense which will be occasioned to members from the west or other points a long distance from Ottawa through their having to go home for a five weeks vacation and afterwards return for the remaining period of the session.

There is another reason, and possibly one of the most important that we as members of the House of Commons should consider. I recall in days gone by in the mercantile business in Ontario the stagnant condition which prevailed during the period before a presidential election in the United States, and I believe in this province to-day a pending election has a great tendency to demoralize the mercantile business. Therefore I think a long adjournment will give the people the idea that the time elapsing before the election is to be prolonged, and such a condition will demoralize trade. That to my mind is a very bad situation for the country to be in.

In my short experience in the House of Commons there has been introduced a resolution which in my opinion is an absurd one. I refer to a motion moved last February by my good friend the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) in connection with the Ottawa trade agreements. May I just retrace my steps to my constituency for a moment? It is my pleasure and privilege to represent South Oxford, which in days gone by has sent to this house such men as Sir Richard Cartwright, the late Malcolm Schell, the late Thomas Cayley, and my good friend Hon. Donald Sutherland, who was of the same political views as those of my hon. friends opposite. Those were citizens from the good old constituency of Oxford who had the respect of everyone in the riding and who were men of high ideals. Coming from that riding, which is practically a farming one, where there has never been any failure of crops and where we find a very fine type of farmers, may I say that during the last couple of years those farmers who were prosperous in days gone by are experiencing most difficult conditions under the policies of the present government. They find they cannot sell their products for the price they should get for them. I was quite interested last year at tax paying time when one of the good farmers in my constituency, one who happens to be a Conservative in politics, said to me: "Rennie, this is the first time in the thirty years that I have been farming that I have found it difficult to pay my taxes. I have the grain in the barn, but it seems almost impossible to sell it." If the Ottawa agreements appealed to the farmers in the days when they were first introduced, I think they would have appealed to the farming people of my constituency. But the people of South Oxford have at least a couple of grievances with regard to the present government. Possibly the house will recall that in 1932 a certain resident of South Oxford was selected by the government to make an investigation into the tobacco situation. I make bold to say that had that report been brought down in the House of Commons long before it was, the tobacco people in the southern part of Ontario would have benefited a great deal thereby. So I say that in that particular case the present government is not one of action, but I believe we might well call it a government of delays.

I should like briefly to outline conditions in my constituency. My predecessor, Mr. Cayley, who was a fine type of gentleman, was elected in South Oxford in the election of 1930. He died in May 1933, and I appreciate the remarks made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as recorded in Hansard of January 25, 1934, when in paying tribute to Mr. Cayley, he said:

> He was a representative of the very finest type of citizenship of the old province of Ontario.

South Oxford had no representation in this house from May, 1933, until May, 1934. If the fine type of citizenship about which the Prime Minister was speaking came from that constituency, why was South Oxford so disfranchised? I think the principal reason was that the government of the day had not enough confidence in their policies to give the farmers of South Oxford an opportunity to express their opinion at the polls. However, an election was brought on in April, 1934. Why do I bring this up? Simply because if there is any evidence from the farmers of what they think of the Ottawa agreements you have it from the farmers of South Oxford. Remember that in that campaign the policies of the present administration were very well expounded. I remember my genial friend the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) going up and down the highways and byways of South Oxford telling the people of the great good that the Ottawa agreements were going to be to them. After all this, and after several of the cabinet ministers had come into the constituency, what was the result of the by-election in 1934? It gave the Liberal candidate and the policies of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King the largest majority ever accorded to any candidate there since confederation. I leave it to the house, therefore, to draw a conclusion as to the views of the farmers of that great constituency with respect to the Ottawa agreements and what benefit those agreements have been to them.

Last February the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough introduced in the house a resolution which it is not necessary for me to repeat. I know what the South Oxford farmers did in 1934, but in order to be perfectly fair I thought it desirable to ascertain what the farmers there think of the situation to-day, so I took the opportunity of writing to a couple of men and I have here telegrams from them. They are men of that standard of citizenship that most counties admire, men who are above reproach; one of them happens to be an ex-warden of the county. I asked him to give me his candid opinion of the Ottawa agreements, and this is what Harry H. Scott, ex-warden of Oxford, said regarding the Ottawa agreements:

> Re Ottawa agreements, my candid opinion is we have benefited some by our bacon quota with Great Britain. Our cattle, wheat and dairy products have suffered by the Ottawa agreements.

I also wrote to one who is a large producer of milk in another part of the riding and asked his candid opinion. This is what Mr. Colin A. Hawkins, one of the fine farmers of South Oxford, said:

> The dairy industry has been practically ruined; dairy products of all kinds are being sold far below cost of production; hence the longer the dairy farmers follow their occupation the further they are becoming in debt.

So that reveals the situation as far as the general farmer in South Oxford is concerned.

I have been looking into the statistics to find what benefit the Ottawa agreements have been to the Canadian farmer. We are thinking now pretty much of wheat, and on checking up the record I find that in 1932, for the twelve months ended November, which covers pretty closely the year before the agreements went into effect, the total export of wheat from Canada was 222,000,000 bushels. In 1933 it had dropped to 202,000,000 bushels, and by 1934 it had fallen to 168,000,000 bushels. I am dealing here with exports to all countries. After all, what the farmer wants is a market for his product; he is not very particular as to the destination of his grain once it leaves his hands. If however we turn to the exports to the United Kingdom we find this situation:

Exports of Wheat to the United Kingdom
(Twelve months ending in November in each year)

	Bushels
1932	135,500,000
1933	124,800,000
1934	118,614,000

It is interesting to compare these exports with our exports to the United States during the same period:

Exports of Wheat to the United States
(Twelve months ending in November in each year)

	Bushels
1932	1,080,000
1933	374,000
1934	6,181,000

So it would seem that the more the present government tries to direct trade in one direction the more it goes in another.

It was supposed that when we adopted the empire trade agreements our imports from the United Kingdom would increase and our imports from the United States would fall off. But the fact has been quite the opposite. I have here a table showing the imports of dutiable goods from the United Kingdom and from the United States which I would like to put on Hansard. The facts tell the story.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Will the hon. gentleman try to keep somewhere near the amendment? These are all budget speeches that we have had.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Remarks similar to these made by the hon. member (Mr. Rennie) were allowed by the Speaker in 1926 on a similar motion.

Mr. RENNIE: This table is in millions of dollars:

Dutiable Imports
(In millions of dollars)

Year	United Kingdom	United States
1932	65.5	168.2
1933	52.3	128.6
1934	61.0	107.3

It is clear that our imports of dutiable goods from the United Kingdom are still below the level reached in 1932. That is all I wish to say at the moment in regard to the Ottawa agreements. The figures speak for themselves.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) referred the other night to the lack of discipline among the youth of the country. It has been my pleasure and privilege for a number of years to be interested in boy scout work and the rover scout movement. I think it is quite uncalled for that we should take the stand to-day that the youth of our country are not up to the standard of those in days gone by. I take great exception to that statement. I think we are turning out of our colleges and universities to-day young men and women with high ideals who are a credit to this country. What I think we need so far as our youth are concerned is perhaps a little more leadership on the part of the present government so that when these young men and women pass their examinations and leave college they may have an opportunity to get a start in life, which at the present time under the policies of this government they cannot find.

These have been rather rambling remarks, Mr. Speaker, but I do think the proposed long adjournment is entirely uncalled for. I believe the great task of the government is to restore confidence on the part of the people of this dominion. Instead of adjourning for six weeks the government should be more active in helping the great mass of farmers who are finding these the most trying times they have experienced in many years. I urge the government not to delay in bringing in some measures of reform which will help the farmers, because after all the farmers constitute the back-bone of this great country which we all love so much.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): Mr. Speaker, as you know, I am the representative in this house of the St. Henri division of Montreal. In that constituency we have what we call a temple of eloquence, a magnificent hall, where we had the pleasure of receiving two outstanding Canadian statesmen. In the middle of November we had the pleasure and honour of hearing the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), who came to our district to tell the people of Montreal of the settlement in the near future of all the grievances he had and they had in regard to trade and industry. Then during the month of January last, a few weeks before this session opened, we had the pleasure of hearing, not only in that magnificent hall but all over Canada by means of the radio, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who announced reforms which were to be brought about during the present session, and some of which were set out in the speech from the throne. Contained in that speech are references to many matters, some of which have been dealt with and others of which as yet have not come before us. I should like to read one paragraph, which eulogizes Canada and her inhabitants, but if you read that paragraph to-day you read it with sorrow. The paragraph is as follows:

> The four hundredth anniversary of the landing of Jacques Cartier was fittingly commemorated in the chief centres connected with his voyages of discovery. Representatives of the governments of the United Kingdom, France, and the United States, took part. The celebration and the visit of a large and distinguished mission from France knit new bonds of understanding.

May I make a reference, sir to the untimely passing of the United States Minister to Canada, Hon. Warren Delano Robbins, who died yesterday. He served the people of his country well. He took part in all the celebrations connected with the Jacques Cartier festival. He was extremely kind to French Canadians, speaking all the time in the French language in order to show that he was bilingual and that, while living in Canada under the British flag, he had sympathy with the people who carry on the traditions of old France in this country. I wish to pay a tribute to Mr. Robbins, who served the United States so well in Canada and who has departed to the great beyond. I hope that God will give him a very happy eternal life.

In the speech from the throne I find mention of many matters that have been presented to this house in the form of legislation. Some of these have been passed; some have not yet received the royal assent, while others have not been even considered. I humbly submit that it is very difficult for us to adjourn at this time. I do not make this reference as a political move on my own behalf; I make it as a matter of business. Those engaged in commercial undertakings, in farming or in professional life, know that to be crowned with success any work must be carried on with continuity of purpose. The people of Canada have sent us here to look after the business of the country and to safeguard their rights, and this adjournment will be a disappointment not only to us as members but to the people generally. We come here from distant provinces, from the Atlantic to the Pacific; we are called together by a proclamation appearing in the Canada Gazette, and we expect to deliberate here until the session is ended. Many of the matters dealt with in the speech from the throne have been discussed and passed by this house; many have not yet been presented. The people are watching these days to see if their representatives are performing their duties and assisting in the passage of the reforms which were announced and which are to be placed before parliament. All people, irrespective of their political leanings, will admit that the people are suffering. Industrialists are discouraged. The farmers have been expecting better prices for their products, but have not received those prices. The professional man is dreaming of better days, and the small real estate owner looks towards better times.

Hon. members who have preceded me in this debate have outlined the case for the farmer, and I believe I would do well to place before hon. members the case for the real estate owner. In my view this is a matter which in the very near future will demand careful consideration. Only a few days ago I read in Montreal newspapers about an answer which had been given by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) to a delegation which had to come to Ottawa and appeared before him asking for remedies for their grievances. It was announced that in the near future a law might be introduced which would have the effect of meeting those grievances. It is known that not only in the city of Montreal but in the city of Quebec and, in fact, throughout Canada the small real estate owner cannot make both ends meet. He cannot pay the interest on his loans nor can he make his payments of taxes at the city hall. On the other hand the farmer cannot make his payments to the county treasurer or to the local municipal council.

I believe all hon. members are anxious to see legislation along these lines put into effect right away, and we are of the opinion that such action should not have to wait until after an election is held. Interest is not being paid to creditors. Municipalities are looking everywhere in an effort to collect their taxes. Bills may be sent but no cheques or answers are received. The last session of the Quebec legislature authorized the city of Montreal to tax its citizens to the extent of nearly $8,500,000. These moneys are not to be collected for the purpose of paying for work, but are merely to balance the budget. Out of that enormous sum no moneys will be paid for future work; their only use will be that of meeting the deficit.

The real estate owner is not paid by the unemployment commission in the city of Montreal even for his rent. The commission is short of money and for that reason cannot hand it out. All the people are hoping that legislation may be introduced which will have the effect of helping the small real estate owner, who after all is a man who is most useful to the country; his prosperity means an encouragement to many lines of endeavour, such as carpentry, plumbing, bricklaying, electrical work, roofing, painting, stone cutting and so on. Of course we agree that our farmer friends from the west need help, due to the fact that they are in distressed circumstances, but we must remember that to some extent they have received relief. I urge now that the urban dweller, the small real estate owner, must be helped. He must receive consideration from provincial and federal authorities so that he may be given a chance to free himself from bankruptcy. These people, through their savings, or through sums inherited, have built homes, but they are obliged to pay taxes which in the city of Montreal are as constant as a summer rain. Because of his heavy burdens he is suffering most severely. The real estate owner has no income and no work, and because of these facts I say a measure should be presented which will extend to him the help which the farmers and the wheat producers have enjoyed.

It is most interesting to note the absence of speakers on the government side. I do not offer any words of reproach to the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Duguay), because he is not often heard in this chamber. He can be as silent as a squirrel, but he should be careful when the hunter is about.

Mr. DUGUAY: But as a squirrel I may be prepared to whistle.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): You will whistle soon enough. Hon. members on this side of the house have not spoken at length because we have been accused of opposing everything. It has been said that it has been the policy of the opposition "to oppose, to oppose, to oppose." We do not oppose what the government has stolen from us in the formation of its political program. When they go before the people of Canada dressed in our clothes and in our colours they will not be disguised sufficiently to prevent the people from voting against them.

The suggestion for the long adjournment astonishes me. We see in the government men who are good lawyers and good politicians. No man under the sun is indispensable. Sir Wilfred Laurier departed prematurely to the great beyond. His life has been told in the words of many authors, and his qualities as a statesman will live in the memories of Canadians of all generations. To-day we have as leader of the opposition a man who with the wind in his favour will be returned as Prime Minister of Canada.

The trouble with this adjournment is that it is too long. We are obliged to go back to our homes, to our farms and to our business, leaving something undone, something on which we have been spending our time since January 17 for the benefit of the nation. We have been here since the opening of the session assimilating the legislation which has been introduced becoming familiar with it; and now it is proposed that we should suspend our deliberations and return after five or six weeks and take up again the legislation we have left unfinished. What would be said of one who started painting a picture on January 17, and then when the painting was still unfinished left off work on April 12 or 13 and did not come back to it until May 20? Of course the picture would not look well; some of the paint would be fainter than the rest, and the picture would lack that which continuity of effort would ordinarily bring to it. It is about the same with this legislation that we are asked to leave unfinished. We have a big task before us. Here is legislation for the benefit of Canada, and it will be bad for the people if we go home and leave it unfinished. Let us put all these reforms through as soon as possible. They are not valentines that we are sending out to the people; they are not simply good wishes; they are laws that we are enacting to help the people, laws that were conceived by the Liberal party but have been put into Conservative shape and are being brought down by the Conservative government. How could we oppose these measures that we ourselves have conceived? It is like bringing up a child that we had cherished; when he is compelled to go elsewhere for a time and meets with other companions, we do not on that account reject him.

What can we say to the people if we go home without passing these social reforms? Everybody welcomed them in my district. One of the listeners-in to the Prime Minister's addresses would not move on when somebody told him the radio address was finished. He said that he was waiting for a souvenir which he thought was going to be distributed with the reforms. But there are no souvenirs accompanying them, and I believe that the reforms themselves are inadequate. I believe that the wind is in our favour and that we shall come back to power, and I am afraid that then we shall find these reforms on our doorstep, which will be a nasty position for the next administration.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We shall have to nurse them.

[Mr. Mercier.]

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I come now to the three propositions contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). First he states that the public interest will best be served by parliament continuing in session until it has completed the consideration of those measures mentioned in the speech from the throne and not yet introduced. That is quite true. We have only to read the speech from the throne to see that it promises many things for the people of Canada, for the working man, for the farmer, for the merchant, for industry, and that legislation should be brought down as soon as possible. The speech from the throne is a sort of agenda which says to the people of Canada: Here is what we are going to give you this session. This is the last chance of this government to bring about prosperity. I do not say that the government should be forced to bring down to the very letter everything that is mentioned in the speech from the throne, but the principles that are there enunciated should be put into force, and the speech from the throne does mention many measures for the welfare of Canada. As far as I am concerned, as a representative of the people, if I see the people happy I am happy. I would like to see prosperity return again. I am not narrow-minded enough not to want to see prosperity return under this government simply because we are now in opposition. No, I should like to see prosperity return, and I should like to see this legislation that was promised in the speech from the throne brought down. The speech from the throne was the most glowing rainbow I have ever seen in the political skies for the benefit of the people of Canada. Let us get on with the legislation and finish our work. We can adjourn for a week at Easter, and then come back and finish up the work of the session as soon as possible, to the satisfaction of the people and our own satisfaction, and then we shall be free to go home and organize our battalions and get ready for the fray.

Secondly, the amendment urges that the discussion of the measures already before the house and not yet passed should be completed. The people of Canada are eagerly awaiting the legislation based on the report of the price spreads commission and the report of the housing committee. If we leave those reports in abeyance for five weeks, what will the people say? Why not take a week to study them, from April 12 until after the Easter holiday, and then come back and try to put the recommendations of those committees into legislative form to help consumer and producer?—because we must work for both to bring about prosperity. One must not be so much strengthened that he will strangle the other.

The amendment calls for the consideration of such legislative proposals as may be rendered necessary or advisable by the report of the price spreads commission and the report of the special committee on housing. The people are expecting this legislation to be brought down in the near future. The acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) is a very refined and able man. He has made a good leader since he has been in charge, but he should not ask that the house be adjourned for twenty days or five weeks. I do not pay him this compliment in order to get something, as I have been elected to oppose the government. I and the people of my constituency think that such an adjournment is not in the interests of the house or the country. We do not want to appear ungrateful; there is so much ungratefulness in the world to-day. If you cannot take care of yourself you do not find many people ready to nurse you. The only castle we have in sight just now is the poor house. I think a vote against this adjournment would be approved by the country. The full program of legislation should be placed before us in order that we may study it, and the house should then proceed with its business without interruption.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, if personal reasons were being considered this evening I could offer a good one against a prolonged adjournment. In company with ten other hon. members of the royal commission on price spreads, I have been here in Ottawa since the latter part of October. Although this city is a pleasant, agreeable and hospitable place, we are all anxious to get home. However, I submit that personal reasons should not be taken into account. The convenience or inconvenience of hon. members is no reason why they should be either for or against the adjournment of the house. The only reason which should be considered is the interest and advantage of the nation. I submit that the interest and advantage of the nation demand that the house continue in session, after the usual short adjournment for Easter, and finish the business of the house in order to give the people a chance to make known their opinion on the way the affairs of this country have been administered during the last five years.

The government have asked for a long adjournment for two reasons. The first is the unfortunate illness of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), and the other, as they allege, is the necessity for considering legislation to be brought down to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying. In connection with the first reason I submit, as I submitted a moment ago, that personal reasons should not be taken into account. We are all sorry that the Prime Minister has been ill and our sincere hope is that he may have a prompt and complete recovery. But I submit in all humility that the interests of the nation are superior to the convenience of the Prime Minister or of the government or of the Conservative party. After all, Canada is not the Prime Minister's kingdom or seigniory. It is too bad that he has been ill, but that is not the fault of Canada. There should be some good man in the ranks of the Conservative party ready to carry on during the time necessary for the recovery of the Prime Minister. When a king dies, we say, "The king is dead, long live the king." A new king is always selected immediately to replace the one who has died, and the same thing should be true of prime ministers, leaders of parties or leaders of governments; if for some reason the recognized leader is unable to continue, he should pass the helm of the state over to the second in command. I agree entirely with the previous speaker (Mr. Mercier, St. Henri) who stated that the Prime Minister was lucky in having a second in command in the person of the acting Prime Minister, (Sir George Perley). The right hon. gentleman has done exceedingly well during the absence of the Prime Minister, and he deserves the congratulations of every hon. member.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What can I do for the hon. member?

Mr. BOULANGER: I am not asking for anything. The second reason advanced by the government for a long adjournment is the necessity of studying the legislation necessary to implement the recommendations of the price spreads commission. If the government do not know what that commission is going to recommend to-morrow morning, they are the only ones who do not know.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 9, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

First report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Chaplin.

Second report of the select standing committee on government railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. Geary.

REHABILITATION OF DROUGHT AREAS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I propose to proceed with the resolution standing in my name in yesterday's votes and proceedings. I realize that it can only be done with the unanimous consent of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): No objection.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the rehabilitation of drought areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and for the appropriation for the said purposes of such funds as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 52 to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1934. (Alternative vote.).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BEYNON: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to introduce the alternative vote so far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned. It is limited to that province for this reason: There is a large body of public opinion in all parts of Canada in favour of some such system of voting, and there is also considerable opposition to it in some sections of Canada. It was thought advisable to introduce the system with reference to Saskatchewan only as an experiment, in order that the people—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: Why divide the country like that?

Mr. BEYNON: I will explain that in a moment. Several attempts have been made to introduce such a system of voting for the whole of Canada, but they have always failed largely, I think, because the people are not familiar with it and do not realize its advantages. It was thought that by experimenting with one province the people would see how it works out, and perhaps they might view it in a different light.

The object of this method of voting is this. It very often happens under the present system that where one candidate is to be elected more than two candidates run, and the candidate elected receives a minority of the votes in the riding. One of the main reasons for applying it to Saskatchewan, so far as I am concerned, is that I am familiar with the situation in that province. The other reason is that hon. gentlemen opposite have told us, and I have no doubt they were sincere, that in the province of Saskatchewan there is a great preponderance of public opinion in favour of the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BEYNON: The only danger they face there is that with third parties intervening their vote may be split up, and the Conservative might be elected by a minority vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BEYNON: While we like to come to Ottawa, as supporters of the government we do not like to come representing a minority of our riding. Of course if hon. gentlemen opposite are merely boasting; if they want to come down here by a minority vote, that is a horse of a different colour, but if they have behind them that preponderance of public opinion which we are told they have, this system of voting will be all to their advantage because it will enable the majority to express their will without allowing some third party to come in and split that majority so that some candidate, receiving only a minority of the votes, may find himself elected.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill read the first time.

PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

PUBLICATION OF REPORT IN THE PRESS IN ADVANCE OF PRESENTATION TO PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I understood that to-day the house was to receive the report of the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying. Up to the present time the report has not been presented to the house, but what appears to be a very complete statement of the recommendations contained in the report appeared yesterday in the afternoon papers in some parts of Canada and is in most of the morning papers of today. I have a copy of one paper under my hand in which five or six columns are devoted to the final report of the commission. I am not complaining with respect to the attitude of the press; it is the business of the press to get all the information it can, but after what has been said in this house with respect to preserving the privileges of this parliament, not only on this side but by hon. gentlemen opposite as well, it certainly would appear that the giving out of what is published here is, on the part of someone, in the nature of an act of contempt alike of parliament and of the government. I think the government had better appoint a commission to inquire into what member of this commission, if any, or what person connected with it is responsible for giving this information to the press before either the government or parliament have received it.

I should like to suggest also that when the government are considering the legislation that is to be based upon the recommendations of this commission, with respect to unfair practices and unethical proceedings, it might consider whether it is not possible to enact some legislation which will prevent unfair practices and unethical proceedings on the part of chairmen of committees of this House of Commons when dealing with price spreads and mass-buying, and on the part of some member or members of royal commissions when they are dealing with the same subjects. This is a matter that should not be allowed to pass lightly; it is a matter that concerns the government and all hon. members of this house. I submit that parliamentary government can only be carried on if we observe the rules of parliament, and judicial and quasi-judicial bodies can only be upheld if judicial procedure is followed. The rules and practices both of parliament and judicial bodies have been violated by someone who has had a pretty intimate association with the committee and also with the commission. I hope the government will take up this matter seriously, in order to preserve the privileges of this house and the rights of all parties with respect to matters of this kind.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The report of the royal commission has not yet been received by the government.

Some MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an absolute fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That makes it worse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am only dealing with one point at the moment. I am informed by the chairman of the commission that the report was signed this morning and is to be presented to me this afternoon. With respect to the matters to which the right hon. gentleman has alluded, I find myself more or less in agreement with him, but the government is in no sense responsible. We will give consideration to the statements he has made.

DISTURBANCE AT PROJECT NO. 42

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday I was asked by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell) whether I had information as to a disturbance last week at project No. 42, and as to considerable amounts of goods being missing.

There has been no disturbance at project No. 42 since March 8, 1935, when four agitators endeavoured to cause dissatisfaction and discontent in the mess room. The complaints were fully investigated at the time and found to be unfounded, and the agitators were discharged. The particular complaint with regard to the food was in respect to the fish. This was inspected before and after cooking and found to be of good quality. The same diet was served in the other mess rooms and there were no complaints.

With regard to the hon. member's statement that goods were missing, he may be referring to a loss of gasoline which occurred on April 4, 1935. It appears that one Morey, on the strength of the project, gave away five gallons to the driver of a visiting car, and that he then left the project without permission and has not since been located. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are investigating the matter.

FREIGHT RATES REVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the acting Prime Minister. During one of the addresses of the Prime Minister some intimation was given that certain instructions would be issued to the board of railway commissioners instructing them to undertake a revision of the freight rates structure. Is it the intention of the government this year to issue such instructions, and if so will the present freight rates structure in the province of British Columbia be included in any order for revision, particularly the rates on grain and grain products used in that province?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, probably this is a question which should be answered by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). I suggest the hon. member place his question on the order paper.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling) regarding the investigation to take place by way of commission into the relief camps in the province of British Columbia. Is it the intention of the minister to lay that report upon the table soon after he receives it?

An hon. MEMBER: Wait and see.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would imagine that in the ordinary course of events such report would be laid on the table of the house.

WAYS AND MEANS

OBJECTION TO PROLONGED ADJOURNMENT EXPRESSED IN AMENDMENT TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Monday, April 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Rhodes for committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend unnecessarily to prolong the observations I began last evening. May I state briefly that I oppose the long adjournment because I do not want the business of the country to be delayed. On this occasion I do not wish to be accused of delaying the business of the house by making a long speech.

Last night I was discussing one of the reasons given by the government in favour of a long adjournment, namely, the considerable time required for the preparation of legislation to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying. I said last night, and now repeat, that if the government does not know the recommendations of the commission they are the only ones who have not that information, because for days, weeks, and months the newspapers throughout the country have published columns concerning those recommendations.

The report of the commission was signed at eleven o'clock this morning and should be presented to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to-day. Yet, last evening's newspapers and again the newspapers on the streets this morning contained columns about the recommendations of the commission, and quoted verbatim whole sections of the report. Therefore the government surely will not profess ignorance of at least a general idea of the report. Now the report has been signed and will be presented. The legislation suggested by the commission is expressed in great detail in the report, and full and complete indications are given of the type of legislation the commission desires. Therefore very little time should be necessary for the government to draft bills arising out of the recommendations. As the first member of the commission to speak, after the presentation of the report, it is only fitting that there should be a tribute of appreciation to the secretary of the commission, Mr. L. B. Pearson, of the Department of External Affairs, who was loaned to us. We cannot be too grateful for the assistance and help received from him. What I say about Mr. Pearson I would say, too, about his assistants, Mr. W. J. Cooper and Professor C. A. Curtis, and the other competent and expert economists who have assisted us throughout the investigation.

Only a few moments ago I listened to the observations of the right hon. leader of the opposition regarding the leakage of the report of the commission. It is not necessary for me to state that this unfortunate leakage has not been due to any action of any Liberal member of the commission.

Mr. DURANLEAU: How do you know?

Mr. BOULANGER: What I have said about Mr. Pearson and his assistants, and their help in preparing the report prompts me to bring to the attention of the house the advisability of having the Canadian universities represented in parliament. This matter has been discussed in the French press and more especially in that excellent Montreal paper l'Ordre. The universities are represented in the imperial parliament, the mother of parliaments, and I believe it would be advisable to have our universities represented in the Canadian house in order that we may have the advantage of the points of view, outlook and opinions of university men. I hope my suggestion will be studied by the government during the long adjournment, because I have no doubt that despite our protestations the government will carry its point and that we will have a long adjournment. The opposition is merely stating its position; we are placing on record our points of view, knowing all the while that although the government has not a majority throughout the country they have a majority in this chamber and for that reason can carry their point.

Mr. DURANLEAU: You will be surprised at the next election.

Mr. BOULANGER: If I see the Minister of Marine after the next election I shall recall what he has said.

Mr. DURANLEAU: You will be very much surprised in the province of Quebec at least.

Mr. BOULANGER: I was saying last night that reasons of convenience should not be considered or advanced in support of the motion for the adjournment of the house. We know very well that the reason for a long adjournment is the convenience of the Conservative party. They are demoralized and disorganized. They are not ready to render their account to the people. They are not ready to face the electors, and therefore they want to drag this session on and delay the appeal to the people just as long as they possibly can.

Mr. DURANLEAU: What about your organization in Quebec?

Mr. BOULANGER: This government is waiting for something to turn up, for some calamity or catastrophe or some sensational event which will give them a reason for establishing a dictatorship in Canada and do away with the necessity of facing the electors. They did that in 1916, when they invoked the war as a reason for prolonging for one year the life of that parliament. I suppose they are expecting another war to break out in Europe to furnish them with a reason for not having an election this year. But if there is no war, we may be sure that they will delay till the last second of the last minute of the last hour of the last day before they dare render an account of their stewardship to the people.

If they want a reason for not going to the people, they might adopt the reason advanced by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) the other day. He advanced reasonable and eternal reasons for never having any more elections in Canada, reasonable as "le cochon raisonnable" and eternal as "la vache éternelle," of our old donation deeds of the province of Quebec. He argued that we could not have an election immediately because some young people have become of age since the lists were prepared and that it was only fit and proper that their names should be inscribed on the electoral lists during the revision which was started on the first of this month. Well, if that is a reason, it is a perpetual and eternal reason because young people will be coming of age every day in every year for years and centuries to come in Canada, and if that is to be adopted as a reason for delaying the election which the people are demanding, there is no reason for ever having an election in Canada.

During the last summer I frequented the homes of the farmers whom I have the honour to represent in this house. I have lived with them, I have talked with them, and during the fall I visited those nice Liberal parishes which the government has annexed to the county of Bellechasse.

Mr. COTNAM: They must have fed you pretty well.

Mr. BOULANGER: For which I am thankful.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Male or female?

Mr. GOTT: Are you afraid of the young electors?

Mr. BOULANGER: I am not as afraid of them as my good friend from Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) should be. I think therefore, Mr. Speaker, I can safely speak in the name of the farmers of at least that section of the country which I represent. I know what they are saying; I know what they are thinking. They are saying this: For heaven's sake let us have the election immediately. They are demanding an election. They want to express their opinion of the way they have been governed for the last five years. They want a change. There is nothing they want so much as a change.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BOULANGER: In the province of Quebec more than anywhere else, and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) will find that out to his sorrow.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is a change in the Liberal party they want.

Mr. DUFF: What about the Shipping Act?

Mr. BOULANGER: The farmers are anxious to settle their accounts with this government, which has done nothing for them in the last five years in spite of the prolific promises which the government made to the electors in 1930. Although the present Prime Minister of Canada said in the election of 1930, "Farmers of Canada, we will make tariffs fight for you," the tariffs have been used in the last five years, not to fight for the farmers, but to fight against them. Immediately after the election, at the special session of 1930, the tariffs were raised against the farmers and on account of that raise in the tariffs the farmers had to pay more for their farm implements, more for their cream separators, more for their gasoline motors and for many other articles which they have to buy. They had to pay more for everything they had to buy, and at the same time they received less for their butter and for all the products they had to sell.

But that was not sufficient. At the general session of 1932 the tariffs were raised again against the farmers. Then we had the imperial conference in 1932, and following that, occasion was taken again to raise the tariffs against the farmers and to restrict the markets and the outlets for the produce of the farm. Therefore I am not surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers are anxious to meet this government and to settle accounts with them. The farmers of Canada want an election right now, even though some few young people may not have their names on the list.

It would not be such a bad thing for the farmers if there was not a revision of the lists at all. This revision is going to cost quite a pile of money, too much money. The printing of the lists themselves has cost a lot of money, and I understand that the printing and the revision of the lists is going to cost over a million dollars, an expense that is absolutely unnecessary. The old system was a good one, and there was no demand for a change. It was working to perfection, and there was no complaint against it. Under the old system the lists were made on the eve of an election by the electoral officer and the returning officers all over Canada, and it did not cost much money. One of the advantages of that system was that if an elector's name had been omitted from the list he could vote if qualified on being identified at the poll by someone who knew him. But under the present system a lot of unnecessary officials have been appointed and a lot of money has been spent unnecessarily, and there is the danger of names being misspelled or misinscribed on the list, and danger also of names being omitted altogether, and that has occurred in every county of the province of Quebec. Many names have been misspelled and wrongly inscribed on the lists. The farmers are tired of seeing their money spent unnecessarily and foolishly by this government. The public debt of Canada has been increased by some $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 during the five years of this administration, and the interest on the public debt takes more than half of the revenues of Canada. The people have been taxed almost beyond their capacity to pay taxation, and the farmers of Canada do not want to pay any further taxation. They want no more public money spent uselessly. They do not want to see the taxes increased, and these are the reasons why they want a change of government.

The prices of the goods which the farmer has to buy have been increased not only through manipulation of tariffs but by an increase in taxation also. The farmers must pay a sales tax of six per cent on everything they buy. There are very few of us who have to pay income tax, but those who do have found this tax increased. The duties on imported goods have been increased and to cap everything, the farmers have been saddled with an additional tax on sugar. This tax was cut in half last year but it has been continued this year by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes).

I know the minds of the farmers better than the minds of any other class, but I am quite sure that all classes in Canada are anxious for an immediate election. Knowing the sentiment of the people as I do, I know they are against a long adjournment. I am against a long adjournment because I do not want to see the business of the country delayed and I want the people to be given a chance of expressing their opinion on the maladministration of this government.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, my first word will be one of regret at the illness of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). As a friend of many years' standing I sincerely regret his serious illness and hope that he will soon be restored to health. I trust he will be in a position to lead the Conservative party during the next elections. It is unfortunate for the Conservative party that the Prime Minister has been forced to absent himself from the house because the members of this party have shown how impotent they are to deal with public questions. I say that in all sincerity.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): We are all good.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is nothing personal in that. I think I should be given credit for always having the friendliest feelings towards the government. I have always wished them well ever since they took office but unfortunately they will not live up to the standards and ethics of good government. They have delegated to themselves authority in every direction. This is being demonstrated to-day as it has been demonstrated in the past. One of the members of the Conservative party has taken upon himself the responsibility of publishing a report which belongs strictly to the House of Commons and no where else. When I say hon. members are impotent, I have good reasons for my statement.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): There is no proof he did that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We were told by a responsible minister of the government that they knew nothing about it and were helpless to redress what is a clear insult to the House of Commons.

Mr. QUINN: All the members of the commission do not sit over here.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): There is no proof any member did that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I wish I was as credulous as my hon. friend.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): That is just newspaper talk.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should be permitted to finish his remarks without interruption.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It does not disturb me in the slightest. I have a few things to say and I am going to say them whether or not I am interrupted. I do not intend to rehash ancient history but I think the government should be held responsible for some of the promises which have been made during the five years they have been in office. This government has made a most remarkable right about face. It told the electorate it believed in sound money and would blast its way into the markets of the world irrespective of obstacles.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. gentleman says, "Hear, hear." I suppose he will subscribe to a government which takes a right about face when it discovers its mistake in the light of events which have transpired in recent days. The policies of sound money and the blasting into the markets of the world have been relegated to be brought up again at some future date when another government of Tory calibre may be in office. We have had the leader of the government making a statement that he was amazed at the lack of opposition to the government program of social reform. Why should there be opposition when ninety per cent of this legislation has been a Liberal policy for years? Why should we oppose that which we have been advocating for a number of years? This government has had the autocratic habit of enforcing their will not only upon parliament but upon the people and upon the provincial governments. Despite all that has been said in this house by hon. members who are in the legal profession, I am still of the opinion that this legislation is ultra vires of the dominion parliament.

I have been permitted to be in public life for some considerable time and I have some respect for the constitution of this country. I have respect also for the rights and privileges of the provincial governments. We hesitated to put similar legislation into effect because we believed it would have to be done with the consent and cooperation of the provincial governments. When we are told that it is not necessary to do anything of the kind, I cannot believe it. If I wanted further proof of this statement I could find it in what the government say. They say that they do not intend to put this legislation into effect until an appeal has been made to the electorate. What better proof can we find of their fear as to their ability to enforce this legislation. The Prime Minister stated that he did not intend to put this legislation into effect until boards had been set up. I have been told by friends of the government in my own province that it was the intention of the government to appeal to the electorate some time before the middle of May.

Not only has this government misled the members of the House of Commons but it has misled the people of the country. We have not been told in so many words but I think we could assume that the legislation which they hoped would have such beneficial results politically has proved to be a dud and it has not been considered worth while to make an appeal to the electorate. Therefore, they must have six weeks in which to sit around and think up some new scheme which they hope will interest the electors.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): All I want to ask the hon. gentleman is—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): If the hon. member will be good enough to answer me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Let us hear the question.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am not trying to be controversial—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Shut up, you fools.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to withdraw the remark he has made to the opposition members. He has used a word which is not parliamentary and I must ask him to withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Of course I have to withdraw it, no matter what they look like. I did want to ask the hon. gentleman a question in all sincerity and I thought he would answer it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): All I want to know is the date on which the statement attributed to the Prime Minister was made.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The statement with respect to legislation? I have not got it before me, but I have a clear recollection and I will get the statement and hand it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): That is all I want to know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think it is imperative that this session should be ended; I do not think it is at all necessary to have this delay. I do not think that even the illness of the Prime Minister warrants delay at this late stage in the life of this parliament. We have seen almost every promise made by this government broken, and we have seen the futility of the legislation they have brought down. That legislation has not in any single instance effected a cure or brought about any relief in the situation that now exists. Take the statement which has been made by my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger). We were told that by an increase in tariffs unemployment would be ended in Canada; the electors of the country were given that assurance. The Liberal opposition in the House of Commons have remained quiescent; they have given this government every chance in the world, they have subscribed to any particular legislation that seemed to be in the interests of the people, though the opposition have warned the government of course on all occasions that the legislation would be without effect. And has not our word been amply proven? What is the state of employment to-day? Has there been any relief to the unemployment situation in the last three or four years? For two or three years we have been hearing that business was on the upgrade, prosperity being just around the corner, but statements of that kind are no longer being made by members of the government. It has been conceded not only by business men but by economists that the root of all evil of the trouble lies in the fact that this government have placed barriers against trade and restricted trade on every occasion; hence the position in which we find ourselves to-day. Year after year we have had deficits and additional taxation, and year after year individuals engaged in the basic industries of the country, with the exception of gold mining and the production of nickel, have found themselves in the unfortunate position of being less able to pay their taxes than in previous years. What is the situation to-day? Unless there is a right about face in Canada we shall not be able to pay the taxes imposed on us. Worse than that, the effect of this legislation has spread to the provinces, for the provincial governments are facing difficulties right and left. Take the financial statement of any of the provinces; does it make pleasant reading? Have we a feeling that we are making progress, or do we not rather feel that we are going backward? Every one of the provinces has to announce deficit after deficit with an addition to its debt. Need I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there can be only one end to this sort of thing? In a private business it does not matter who finds himself in this unfortunate position, he must sooner or later succumb and have the sheriff take control.

The government of the day have made much of the fact that they have preserved the credit of Canada and have been able to pay their way. Well, they have been able to pay their way by further borrowing; that is the only way. Then they take much credit for the fact that they have had favourable balances of trade. How are favourable balances of trade secured? When they took office the trade of the country was nearly two and a quarter billions, and what is it to-day? It has gradually decreased until it averages a little over one billion, and by the reduction in trade, by restriction of imports into the country and partly by the empire agreements, regarding which I shall have a word or two to say, they have been able to show a favourable balance of trade. But they have done so at the expense of the people of Canada; there is a heavier burden of taxation on the people's shoulders, added to every session of parliament, and that condition would continue were hon. gentlemen permitted to hold another session.

My hon. friends do not seem to realize that there must be, as I say, a right about face in the policy of the government before the people can secure any relief. That does not seem to occur to them. No; we have nothing but procrastination in dealing with these matters. My hon. friends have imbibed the spirit of nationalism from other countries despite the fact other countries are in as difficult a situation. They follow these other countries; there is no originality about their proposals for relief. All we are told is that their social legislation will meet the difficulties of the situation. Will anyone tell me how unemployment insurance will benefit the situation? I have not yet discovered anyone who wants it as we have it under the present act. How will the shortening of hours of labour and the minimum wage improve matters? An amusing thing gleaned from the report this afternoon, which one reporter seems to have got hold of in some way, is the statement that they are not recommending a forty-eight hour week but one of forty-four hours. Again, the government of the day find themselves in the unfortunate position of having to make changes in that respect. I suppose this is the reason: They want to have some relief, some time to get their second wind, to see whether they cannot think up some new idea that will catch the popular fancy.

I was greatly amused yesterday listening to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when he made a statement as to when the election would be. He said dispassionately to this house that they would have an election when they thought they could win. If we have to wait until this government think they can win, we may as well all go home and go to work and wait another five years.

Mr. GOTT: There is not a safe Liberal seat from the head of the lakes to the coast.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We should have had an election last year. I believe that if the government had had the courage to face the electors last year they would have had a much better chance than they have to-day. They got some false courage after the Prime Minister's broadcasts, and for a time they were greatly encouraged. I was told by one who is in the councils of the mighty that at last they had struck something that tickled the popular fancy. But the real reason for their change of heart was the fact that one of their number became a malcontent, he was not satisfied to pursue the tenor of their way and went out on his own. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Stevens. He broadcast his ideas throughout the country and scared the life out of the government, and they succumbed to fear.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): He is not a malcontent; he is an honest man.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hon. gentlemen opposite had a change of heart largely as a result of his propaganda.

Mr. McINTOSH: A change of heart over night.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They would change in a minute if they thought it would catch a vote. It is a question of staying in power at any cost, on any program. Look at our friends in the corner, they have done nothing but smile, largely in derision, since they came to this session, at the spectacle of hon. gentlemen across the floor who in large measure have stolen their clothes. They go to sleep once in a while and wake up and discover that some of their most attractive garments are gone. Not up-to-date forsooth; and indeed they have troubles of their own. In our province we have a new cult, that of Social Credit as enunciated by Mr. Douglas, and now improved upon materially by one named Eberhart. So my friends in the corner are doing their best to stem the tide, and between what Eberhart is doing and what this government has done to them they are in a somewhat difficult situation. They are watching their clothing; even their underwear is in danger, there is nothing safe to be left loose around while this government is in power, if they thought it would tickle popular fancy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what sort of program we shall be presented with after May 20, after the government have cogitated for another six weeks. I do not know whether that program will be heralded by a broadcast. I fancy it will not for I think the earlier broadcasts are recognized as having been a huge mistake; they were prematurely exploded before they reached the objective, and of course as with all duds the reaction was disastrous for the Tory party. They will probably have something which they hope will catch the popular fancy of people in the towns and cities as a result of this price spreads investigation.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Don't sneer at Mr. Stevens, he is an honest man and everyone knows it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not sneering, I consider Mr. Stevens a very shrewd politician. I did not know however that my hon. friend had espoused his cause. I do know that there is considerable dissension about the leadership. My hon. friend knows something about the various aspirants for leadership; if I have time I shall have a word or two to say about that. But there are not many men in Mr. Stevens' class and I have not a single word to say against him.

Mr. MALONEY: What about Mr. King's proposed broadcast?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will let the hon. member into a secret if he will have patience. He heard my remark that even the underwear of hon. members down in the corner is not safe, everything that seems to have any appeal is grabbed. It struck me while sitting here listening patiently to hon. gentlemen opposite defending their budget that they would mighty well like to get some inspiration as to a policy that would have some appeal and that might help to save their deposits at the next election.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): What is your policy, if you have any?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We shall tell you when the proper time comes. In the words of your leader when he was in opposition, "When we are called in we will prescribe." There is another reason why they want to delay the election. It has been seen in every by-election—and there are still some that should be held—with the single exception of that of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church); everywhere it has been hopeless defeat for the government. The waters do not look good at all, they look exceedingly chilly, and as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) said, they evidently are going to delay until the last minute and hang on to power as long as they can. The result will be that in common with every other government that has ever tried a similar experiment they will get the results they so richly deserve.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Why complain about it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hanging on to office will not help them, but will rather create an adverse sentiment. As far as we are concerned whether the election is in May, June, July, September or October, the results are inevitable.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): But what is your policy?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I told my hon. friend that he will hear our policy at the proper time. And may I say to him and his colleagues that their business is to convince the electors that they have one. We will attend to ours. So far any policy that my friends or any one of them have suggested has had no popular appeal whatever. I had hoped that at this session the budget would bring what a good many of us were informed was coming—true we are not supposed to be in the councils of the mighty—a reduction in the tariff on secondary commodities, which bears so heavily on the people on the land in particular through the cost of living. The tariffs on textiles put into effect by this government are a disgrace. They are not required for the protection of the textile industry, they never were. Moreover the promise was made that they would encourage the consumption of Canadian wool in the manufacture of woollen goods. But what do we discover? Over eighty per cent of woollen textiles made in Canada are made from Australian wool, and our own wool is at a lower price than it has been for a considerable time.

Then we were told that the empire trade agreements were going to cure the wheat situation, yet just lately we have it reported that there are 240,000,000 bushels in store. I am one who believes that the unprecedented low price of wheat, for which this government are not responsible, for which they or any other government could not be responsible, warranted assistance being granted to the wheat producers of western Canada. I say that for more than one reason; I say it for the reason that if you are going to grant to secondary industries the kind of protection that has been given by this government, then in all fairness something should be done for the primary industries. The government were warranted in granting the bonus of five cents a bushel, they were warranted in putting Mr. McFarland in control and purchasing wheat and keeping the price up, but they never were warranted in holding that wheat as an overhang on the markets of the world. Why did they not sell it? Why did they allow our competitors to take the British and other markets away from us? Why did they penalize the millers to the extent to which they were bonusing wheat daily, and I say quite properly so? Why did they do that sort of thing? I say the stupidity of that action is going to cost the primary producers of Canada unending trouble, grief, worry and money before this matter is cleared up. I notice that Mr. McFarland states that he hopes to sell this wheat, and how does he hope to sell it? He hopes to sell it as a result of the difficulties in the United States, and the fact that there is practically a famine in that country.

Mr. LOUCKS: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I will answer questions when I am through. I repeat that I have no quarrel with the action of the government in bonusing the purchase of wheat; my quarrel is with the unbusiness-like methods they pursued in dealing with that problem. What has been the result of the enhanced price to the millers? As a result we have lost our market for flour in Great Britain. I have heard hon. gentlemen stand up in this house and state that our exports were much the same as in former days. Will you, Mr. Speaker, or will any hon. gentleman tell me what would have happened if in Canada we had had normal crops of 400,000,000, 450,000,000 or 500,000,000 bushels, and this same policy had been pursued? What position would we have been in to-day? The problem that must be solved by the government, no matter what government it may be, is how to regain the foreign markets for wheat and flour that we have lost through the actions of this government. It is not so easy to regain them, and here we have this overhang of 240,000,000 bushels that we have been told repeatedly, month after month and year after year was going to be cleaned out of the country. Then what about our cattle? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) is not in his seat; as a matter of fact we have a very sparse attendance this afternoon, and from the evidence I see upstairs I presume they are busy on the election now. I see not hundreds of pounds but tons of literature going out from this building. I have no quarrel at all with that—

Mr. COTNAM: Are you sending out any?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly we are, but in armfuls rather than bagfuls. We have not the facilities or the funds of my hon. friends.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): What about Beauharnois?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not quarrelling with that; it was done in 1930, but I do say that instead of sleeping as many of them did while the budget speech was being delivered, and instead of paying so much attention to the sending out of literature which they hope will convince the electors that they should be returned to power, they should be devoting themselves to the real problems of the country. If their literature is anything like the material I have seen, the more they send out the better for us. More power to them; send out lots of it, because it will not convince anybody. But may I say, Mr. Speaker, that with our cattle practically shut out of the British market and with the uncertainty of that market the cattle industry of Canada is practically demoralized. Had it not been for the fact that drought in the United States opened up a market for our western cattle, at reasonable prices, stark, utter ruin would have stared us in the face.

And then hon. gentlemen opposite talk about a reciprocal agreement with the United States. Of all the jokes that have been perpetrated upon the House of Commons the greatest is to hear the Tories talk about a reciprocal deal with the United States. Upon my word, you would think we were born only the day before yesterday, that we had not lived in 1911 and listened to those voluble gentlemen, headed by their own Prime Minister, travel from one end of Canada to the other denouncing in no uncertain terms the proposed treaty, fearful that American dollars would destroy Canadian sentiment. Now we have the same gentlemen telling us that this is one way we can save Canada, and that Canada will be saved because the Tory party are going to negotiate this treaty. I am quite certain the electors of this country will be told that fairy tale, that bedtime story, during the coming campaign; I am sure that will be one of the appeals of the Tories, particularly in western Canada, that they are going to bring about reciprocity with the United States. That will hang in the air like a pillar of fire to lead those people who still have some faith in Tory promises to vote and work for the Tory party. But let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I am one of those who believe that so long as the Tory party are in office in this country we never will have a reciprocal deal with the United States. They do not mean what they say.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Why?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend asks me why. In the same breath they say they will not allow any of our secondary industries in Canada to be interfered with even by our best customer, the United Kingdom. Are they going to negotiate a reciprocity agreement with the United States, the country they have denounced as a menace to Canada, after the embargoes they have placed against the goods of that country and after they have used every conceivable method to shut out those goods? What was the cry when we were in office? They said, "Keep out American carrots and cabbage." We were told that we were ruining our vegetable growers by permitting carrots and cabbage to enter the country. Go to our stores to-day, and what do you see? Long before we have a carrot in Canada we are buying fresh vegetables; they come from the United States, and they will continue to come from that country until they are produced here, when they will be shut out for perhaps a month or two. Oh, what a wonderful party; what a spectacle! That is a mild word to apply to the situation that exists in Canada to-day with respect to the operations of this government.

Why do we not have an election? If hon. gentlemen opposite are as sure of themselves as they pretend to be; if they were so sure when we came to this session of parliament early in January, why do we not have an election? Why do they not submit themselves to the final court, the country, and find out exactly what the electors think about them, their policies and their administration? As I said a few moments ago I had expected a reduction in the duties on farm implements and textiles in order to make conditions a little easier for the farming industry of this country, but nothing happened. There was no mention whatever of any action of the kind. No doubt the government are hoping that through distress and difficulty in other countries some market may open up that will absorb the surplus products of this country, while day by day in my own city and province people are forced to abandon the homes which they have spent a lifetime to build up in the hope that they might have a competence for their old age. The only answer they receive from this government is that they can go on the old age pension, go into an unemployment camp or receive relief through the agency of the municipal authorities. Year by year we are told something is going to be done; why is it not done now? Not long ago we had the mayors of the various cities here, asking that the federal government take over the complete responsibility in connection with the payment of the dole. They received no answer. We have the provincial governments wanting to know what they can expect from the federal government, but they get no answer. The government are impotent, hoping like Micawber that something will turn up to-morrow that will relieve the situation. They have not done a single thing, nor do they seem to have a single idea as to what they should do to meet the actual situation that exists in Canada to-day. That is the happy situation.

Mr. SPENCE: What answer would you give them?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They will get their answer, in due time, let me say to my hon. friend.

Mr. SPENCE: Tell us now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. member who has just interrupted, along with other hon. members campaigned in 1930 against the then government. They said they would work through the agency of the provinces, and stated further that unemployment was a national problem, leading the people of Canada to believe that they intended to take the whole responsibility for it.

Mr. SPENCE: No, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, exactly. They were not in power fifteen minutes before they discovered they did not have the authority to administer relief. That is the way they fooled the people of Canada; that is the way they would attempt to fool them again. Fortunately however the people are becoming wise in these matters. The Liberal party would do exactly as it agreed to do in 1930, namely, work in cooperation with the provinces, so far as relief is concerned. We would set up a commission for the purpose of controlling and issuing relief, and for the care of the unemployed. I would not be surprised, if sufficient time elapses, to find that hon. members opposite have thought even of that; probably they will recommend a council for that purpose.

The advisory council which is to meet once in six months is a capital idea. The Prime Minister is to be the chairman and no doubt their efforts will be tremendously helpful in curing the present situation in Canada; I expect wonderful results. The trouble is however that hon. members opposite will never have a chance to let the council function. It will be like the rest of their promises to the people of Canada, promises they made so glibly on every occasion and failed to carry out. That is the situation as I see it.

Should it be necessary to wait for the recovery of the Prime Minister before holding an election? Why, there are any number of gentlemen in the government who, whether they are capable or not, at least think they are capable of carrying on. Certainly the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) could carry on if he were supported by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil). They would make an excellent pair to carry on the affairs of this country. Then, I wonder why the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) could not carry on if he had the support of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott). What an excellent combination they would make. Then, as they have been making love to our friends in the corner, can we not conceive what an excellent government we would have by joining the Minister of—

Mr. GOTT: I knew you would get all mixed up before you got through.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I have no doubt the minister could easily persuade the hon. member to become superintendent of penitentiaries,—and what excellent results would be obtained. Then, my good friend, my revered friend, the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan)—would not he and Mr. Stevens, the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, make an excellent pair to work together? Certainly the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) would support a government of that kind.

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to attempt to follow anything said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I do feel—perhaps very wrongly—that at this present day and date the parliament of Canada must be more concerned in trying to do something to remedy conditions existing than simply scoring off opponents. I do feel the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) whom I have known for a great many years, whom I have admired and respected during all that time and whom to-day I admire and respect, regardless of any badinage across the floor of the house, is very anxious and earnest in his desire to seek a solution of the problems confronting this parliament and the country. It was for that reason and for that one only that I asked the hon. member what he had in mind, in regard to statements made by my right hon. leader, and I had no intention of throwing any disparagement on the hon. member, but asked my question in the hope something might come out which would assist the House of Commons to get a little farther towards a solution of the important problems facing us.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Now, of course, if that is funny I am quite willing to have hon. members enjoy themselves. I am quite willing to have them laugh their heads off—and I don't know that much would be lost if they did. I am willing to sit down. I was just trying to lend my small assistance and to give what might be some help to the people of Canada. That I have desired to do from the time I entered parliament; that I have desired to do on the few occasions I have risen to address this chamber. That I still desire to do.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): And so long as my hon. friends who sit across the floor of the house think there is nothing better to do than to sneer at and to deride an honest effort, then I sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my humble word of protest—

Mr. SPENCE: Wonderful, wonderful!

Mr. McPHEE: —to this proposed adjournment. What a spectacle this government presents to the opposition and to the country.

Mr. COTNAM: Don't worry about it.

Mr. McPHEE: The government that was elected on the political effervescence of 1930 having received a blow on the solar plexus now wants an adjournment of six weeks to get its second wind. What a contrast, Mr. Speaker, politically speaking, between the knock-kneed, rickety, bandy-legged government of to-day—

Mr. SPENCE: Talking about yourself?

Mr. McPHEE: —and the blatant, bellicose, braggadocio of the speeches over the radio during the first week of January last. I believe there was a real flutter in the dovecots of the Tory party after listening to those bedtime stories.

Mr. COTNAM: There was a bigger one in the Grit party.

Mr. McPHEE: Many a Tory said, "Never man spake like this man."

Mr. COTNAM: That is what you thought, too.

Mr. McPHEE: What were some of the statements he made? Probably I would do well to read two or three lines:

As a lawyer I had to do, for more than thirty years, with big business and finance. I have some knowledge of finance.

Mr. SPENCE: That is more than you can say.

Mr. McPHEE: And more than my hon. friend can say.

Mr. SPENCE: Hot air for yours.

Mr. McPHEE: No doubt my hon. friend is referring to himself. However if he wishes to heckle, may I tell him that I enjoy it, and I will hit him back just as hard.

Mr. SPENCE: Because you don't know any better.

Mr. McPHEE: I have been in this house for ten years and outside of an interruption of that kind I have never yet heard the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) make any other statements. Then the Prime Minister continued:

> When in the past I praised it (the capitalist system) I did so with knowledge. When now I analyze it and point to its defects, I do so also with knowledge. Bear that in mind.
> Knowledge comes but wisdom lingers.

Then I read one other line from another fireside story of the Prime Minister's, the third in the series:

> The point is, that at a time when your government was fighting for the life of this country, we were handicapped and embarrassed and opposed by a party which seemed to think far more of getting back into office than they did of you.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McPHEE: I am glad my hon. friends say "hear, hear," because when I heard that statement with respect to the capitalist system and the reforms proposed by the Tory party—since when in Heaven's name did the Tory party ever become the party of reform?—my mind went back to the little city of Guelph where I remember the Prime Minister made a speech in 1930 criticizing my right hon. leader for the countervailing duties in the Dunning budget. It would appear that tariffs and duties are the special prerogative of the Tory party in this country, Mr. Speaker. Well, the Prime Minister speaking at Guelph on that occasion of the countervailing duties said with reference to the right hon. leader of the Liberal party, "Whenever you have any convert doing something that he is not brought up to, he will always make a bad mess of it." I do not know whether that had any special significance being delivered in the city of Guelph, the seat of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). It might equally well have been delivered in the city of Fort William, the seat of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), or at one or two other places that are graced by being represented by our Tory friends across the way. Now what about these reforms? How much has this present opposition blocked the present government in its reforms? Reform of the capitalist system! I go back to 1931. One of the first resolutions brought down in this house by the present Prime Minister was to amend the income tax. This was no doubt a reform of the capitalist system. A resolution was brought down in this house on June 1, 1931, whereby the maximum income tax would be imposed on incomes of $25,000, and incomes over $25,000 would bear the same maximum tax of twenty-five per cent. But thanks to the Liberal opposition which blocked this reform the legislation stands now as it stood previously under the Liberal government. A man who had an income of half a million dollars, and we are told that there are two or three gentlemen in this country who have incomes of that size, under the Liberal income tax legislation that existed prior to 1931, and which exists to-day thanks to the Liberal opposition, paid $245,000 in income tax, but under the proposed reform of the right hon. the Prime Minister that man would have paid $125,000 only in income tax. That meant a saving to the man with an income of half a million dollars of $120,000, only $10,000 a month—not much when you say it quickly. But the leader of the government took offence because we criticized that particular reform of the capitalist system which he proposed, and then withdrew his resolution.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he mind telling the house and country how much income tax that man is actually paying to-day under the law, not under proposals that were never carried into law?

Mr. McPHEE: He is paying simply what he paid when the Liberal government was in office, with one or two modifications.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. McPHEE: Let me draw a picture—

Mr. RHODES: Give us the facts.

Mr. McPHEE: If my hon. friend's leader had had his way in 1931 that man would not have paid the income tax he is paying to-day nor what he paid previous to 1931.

Mr. RHODES: He pays twice as much to-day.

Mr. McPHEE: Let me draw a picture for the people of Canada in connection with this particular reform. I can imagine, Mr. Speaker, the power barons, the corduroy plutocrats, and the tinplate aristocrats coming around the council table when this proposed income tax reform in 1931 was being hatched. I can imagine these men on their knees praying that this great burden of income taxation should be removed from their already over-burdened shoulders. And who were the gods to whom they prayed? The millionaire Prime Minister of Canada, and sitting at his right he that sitteth at the receipt of custom, the former Minister of National Revenue, and the then Minister of Pensions and National Health, now occupying the gubernatorial chair in the province of New Brunswick, and across the council table from him the right hon. gentleman who now leads this house (Sir George Perley).

But there were other knights around that table, silent knights, and one of those silent knights represents the province of Saskatchewan as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), and another silent knight represents the province of Manitoba as Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy). How stoically these silent knights looked on at these other knights praying that this burden of income taxation should be removed from their overburdened shoulders, and if the silence of these silent knights in this House of Commons is any indication of their silence around that council table they might as well have been in a deaf and dumb institution where people talk with their fingers. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, if you can so far stretch your imagination, the venerable gentleman, the former Minister of Agriculture, my hon. friend from Melville (Mr. Motherwell) and the former Minister of the Interior, my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), sitting around that council chamber in silence while this iniquitous reform was about to be perpetrated upon the Canadian people. So much for reform No. 1.

Then I come to the next reform, the imperial conference agreement. We had heard in 1930 that all that was necessary in Canada was a dose of super-tariff taxation, that the panacea for all our ills was to be the tariff. My right hon. friend the leader of the government was to blast his way into the markets of the world. We had a special session of parliament at which the tariff was increased, doubled and trebled. Then the Prime Minister went to London to tell the good old free trade people of Great Britain what they should do; that what they should do was to impose a ten per cent duty upon imports in order to give Canada a preference in their market. That offer was rejected, and the Prime Minister came back to Canada. He addressed a meeting in Saskatchewan, in the armouries in the city of Regina, and I heard him over the radio. My hon. friend from West Edmonton has referred to reciprocity. The right hon. leader of the government said that it was treason in 1911 to trade with our American cousins. Canada will become the back door of Chicago—that was one of the slogans that he used all across this country. We would become the back door of the United States if we traded on equal terms with our cousins to the south. Then again in 1930 it was treason to trade with Great Britain under the Dunning budget. As I said, the leader of the government came back from London in the fall of 1930 somewhat crestfallen because the British people did not fall for his high tariff ideas so far as Britain was concerned. He called a meeting in Regina and I heard his speech over the radio. I had some friends in to listen to him, and what did we hear him telling the people of western Canada? We all know what he said during the elections of 1930. "Listen, you agriculturists from the west and all the other parts of Canada you who have been taught to mock at tariffs and applaud free trade. Tell me when did free trade fight for you. You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you." He came back in 1930 and at this meeting in Regina he said: My fellow Canadians who are now within sound of my voice, just at this minute Mr. Marler, the Canadian ambassador to Japan, is on his way to China to negotiate a treaty with that great nation for the sale of your Canadian wheat. China has always been a favourite of our Tory friends. It will be remembered that in 1912, having defeated reciprocity in 1911 because it was treason to trade with the Americans, Sir George Foster, then Minister of Trade and Commerce, went to China with a retinue from his department to negotiate a treaty with that country. In 1930 China seems to be the Mecca of the Tory party. The tragedy of it all is this, Mr. Speaker. We were taught in our early school days that the Chinese were a nation that lived on rice and rats, but it would seem that the Tory party under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden and under the leadership of the Prime Minister would have the Chinese go back on their traditions and give up their rat traps and their chop sticks and buy Canadian wheat, Canadian ovens and Canadian flour. How much wheat did we sell to China?

Mr. ROWE: Remarks like that will not help to sell it.

Mr. McPHEE: It will sell just as much as the attempts of Mr. Marler, whose appointment my right hon. friend the leader of the government opposed. How much did we sell?

Then we had the second imperial conference in 1932. What were the results of this conference? A duty of ten per cent was placed on barbed wire, a commodity which had come in free since 1897. A duty of twenty-five per cent was placed upon cream separators which had been permitted to come in free since 1897. That is the way my hon. friend who is a farmer would help the dairymen of this country. During the early days of this session we were told by the Prime Minister that we would have an opportunity before this session ended of once more expressing our approval or disapproval of the imperial economic conference agreements. What happened to that resolution? The other day the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) referred to some legislation introduced by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) as having been placed in cold storage. Anything placed in cold storage would have some chance of ressurection but this resolution to permit approval or disapproval of the imperial economic conference agreements has gone into the morgue as far as the rules and regulations of this house are concerned. It will never be resurrected.

Mr. ROWE: How would you vote on it if it was?

Mr. McPHEE: Against it. I would do the same as the electors of South Oxford did last spring and as the electors in other parts of Ontario did later on in the year.

Mr. ROWE: Are you speaking for your party?

Mr. COTNAM: How much money was spent in those constituencies?

Mr. McPHEE: We were told by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull), a colleague of my hon. friend, that the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) spent $750,000 of his own money in 1930. I assume my hon. friend knows how much was spent in South Oxford.

Mr. COTNAM: It was not Beauharnois money.

Mr. McPHEE: That seems to hurt. We can go on to something else.

The next item of reform was technical education. This bill was passed with the unanimous approval of this house but it has been placed in cold storage; it has not yet been declared law by order in council. We come next to the investigation into price spreads which I suppose will be considered as a reform. The former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is the only hon. member on the other side of the house who can be classed at all as a reformer. Yet he had his head chopped off by the man who announced himself during the first week in January as the Messiah of reform. I should like to place on Hansard a paragraph of the letter written by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to the Prime Minister after he was decapitated. It reads:

> Your letter dated October 26 accepting my resignation, was delivered to me at my home by your special messenger at 4.30 Saturday afternoon, October 27.

Apparently the mails were not considered swift enough and this letter had to be delivered by special messenger. It continues:

> In your letter you seek to establish that in my work as chairman of the "price spreads and mass buying committee" I had enjoyed the full support of my colleagues of the government. This, sir, you know is not true.
> From the moment of the organization of the committee, following my speech in Toronto of January 15 last, almost daily throughout the long period of the last session I was subjected to irritating criticisms. One day it would be regarding my manner as chairman, the next the treatment of witnesses, particularly that of Stanley McLean of Canada Packers and the heads of the Imperial Tobacco.

It would be interesting to place side by side with this letter the evidence in connection with the Imperial Tobacco Company. The letter continues:

> Then the question of cost was constantly thrown in my face, and through it all from one of your senior members ran the constant refrain on a minor key, "what can you do about it anyway."
> The fact that I refused to be influenced by these mischievous interferences is now advanced by you as evidence that I have had an "absolutely free hand." In the interests of simple truth I must protest your claim in that respect, for, on the contrary, there has been constant criticism emanating almost exclusively from a small minority of the cabinet who, together with yourself, now seize on the "pamphlet" as a culminating excuse for an unwarranted attack on me as chairman of the commission and as a minister of the crown.

It was only six months ago that the only supposed crusader for reform in the cabinet was being criticized by the right hon. gentleman who had announced himself during the first week in January, 1935, as the Messiah of reform.

We come now to the marketing bill. I suppose this will be considered a reform which we have blocked for the past five years. This is a Mussolini, sovietized bill. In this connection it is interesting to note that the poultry pool under the provisions of this bill has been defeated in the three western provinces. If the rest of Canada has the same idea in connection with this legislation I know hon. friends opposite will regret that this has been part of their reform policy.

The next thing which I presume we shall be accused of obstructing is the budget—a budget that maintains a tax of one cent per pound on sugar and reduces the duty on alcoholic liquors by $3 a gallon. I presume this is the government's idea of a poor man's budget. It is a budget that supports the nation as the hangman's rope supports the hanged. Now here we are asked to approve of an adjournment for six weeks to enable this moribund government to get its second wind and to come back with more proposed reform legislation—a government which, according to its own Minister of Finance, admitted in the budget speech that it had gone into debt to the extent of $669,900,000 in its five years in office. In other words, hon. gentlemen have gone into debt $669,900,000 in 1,680 days, the number of days they have been in office—$400,000 a day. Just imagine what the adjournment would cost this country; $16,660 an hour, or $2,750 a minute, or $50 a second is the rate at which this government has gone into debt in 1,680 days in office, and we are asked to grant this adjournment. Multiply the 42 days of the adjournment by $400,000 per day and you will find this country going into debt to the extent of $16,800,000 during the time of this adjournment, the time gentlemen across the way want to get their second wind. They have received a blow on the solar plexus and cannot carry on unless they get their breath again.

I oppose the adjournment on grounds of policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McPHEE: If my hon. friends will keep quiet over there I will give them the antithesis in this matter of debt. According to the Minister of Finance the net debt of Canada has increased to the extent of $669,900,000 in the five years from 1930 when they took office to March 31, 1935. Contrast that with the five years preceding 1930. During those five years the public debt of Canada was retired out of surplus revenue to the extent of $257,806,000. There is the contrast between the two.

An hon. MEMBER: Give us the whole story.

Mr. McPHEE: Some day I will, but I have not the time now, and the hon. gentleman in his present mind has not the intelligence to grasp it if I did. The people of this country want an election. All over the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, on the political horizon is inscribed in letters that can be read from afar: Mene mene tekel upharsin: You have been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

The people of this country are anxious to take advantage of the privilege handed down to them by Liberals who have gone before and to place the sacred symbol of the cross on the sacred parchment, the ballot; and when they do, hon. gentlemen across the way will go out of office, so that in the next parliament there will not be a shadow of the present government in this house.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): I certainly agree with the present amendment for the good reason that not only has the government a great deal of legislation still to put through but the fact that what it has already accomplished will not meet the situation that exists in the country to-day. I think I am perfectly in order in directing the attention of the house to certain conditions which must be faced, more particularly in northern Ontario.

I wish to discuss two very important subjects this afternoon, the first being the radio situation in our section of the country and secondly the work on the trans-Canada highway. May I observe in passing, Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Morand), that all sections of the country greatly appreciated the work which you did as chairman of the radio committee. I was allowed to state before that important committee the case for our section of the country and I am glad to say that I was given a very good reception. I am bound to add, however, that we were greatly disappointed in the result that has been obtained after four years of experience with the radio commission. I am not criticizing any individual members of the commission, but I am pointing out that no steps have been taken to ensure the reception which we think we are entitled to. It is true that in the last two years local stations have been erected at North Bay, Kirkland Lake and the town of Timmins, and with these stations we have no quarrel. They have performed a useful function and done a great deal of good in their own localities, but surely they do not serve the purposes of the other sections of that country. We have not been given the service we are entitled to get, not only in northern Ontario but also in northern Quebec. On that ground alone, I contend that we should have a very brief adjournment, and in the meantime every section of the country, through its federal representatives, should be given an opportunity to state its grievance in this regard. We were very hopeful a few weeks ago when we learned, through certain newspaper reports, that a high powered station would be erected in the northern part of the country, but an answer given a member of this parliament by the Minister of Marine shattered that hope. So far as reception is concerned, I think the solution must be found in our own section of the country. In the newer sections of Canada the people are all in favour of the nationalization of the radio, for a good and practical reason; they get better service than they formerly had. The population is more or less lukewarm as far as that is concerned, but the pioneer population of the whole of northern Canada was absolutely in favour of nationalization of radio, though I must say that they have been sadly disillusioned. We have no quarrel with radio programs from the United States to a reasonable extent, but we maintain that we must also have a national radio program. One must also be seized of the enormous extent of the area for which that service is required. It covers the whole of northern Ontario, the whole of the basin of James bay and part of Hudson bay, and northern Quebec and part of northern Manitoba. I am speaking for every section of that great expanse of territory with its rapidly growing population in saying that they have not the radio reception that they deserve. In my own riding it is not satisfactory, and the population in that section is increasing rapidly from day to day. In the Porcupine district alone there are at the present time over 25,000 people gainfully employed in the mining industry, and there has been the greatest agricultural development in northern Ontario for the last twenty years. The same applies also to our forest industry. In all, the population concerned is nearly a quarter of a million. Surely we deserve more consideration than we have received in the past. We were told some time ago by the radio commission that they would send fully qualified men to study the situation on the ground, but I am not aware of any of these men having visited us. We were expecting also to have a visit from some member of the radio commission. That promise was made by the chairman himself in a letter to me of November 18, 1932, in which he said:

> Honourable Maurice Dupré has directed my attention to a question you asked in the house the other day. I may say that the matter of radio service in northern Ontario is receiving our close attention, and when my technical colleague, Colonel Steel, returns from Madrid, we hope to make a tour of Canada and investigate conditions in northern Ontario on the spot with a view to devising remedies.

I have no doubt that the chairman was sincere when he wrote that letter, but I must repeat that as far as I am aware we have never had a visit from any high official of the commission, and I say this is absolutely unfair to the population in our section. I know that people in all parts of Canada greatly appreciate the tour made some two years ago by Mr. Maher who was then a member of the radio commission. He toured some of the western provinces and became familiar with the radio situation there.

I expressed the hope before the commission last year that they would find it possible to have at least half an hour a week to tell the people of Canada of their own activities. There are some technical problems involved in that question, and I am going to read a kind of brief in which our problems are stated:

> The main Canadian radio commission station in Toronto, that is, CRCT, has not been heard satisfactorily in northern Ontario since they changed their wavelength from 840 to 960 k.c. some months ago. On their present frequency they are hopelessly heterodyned. According to comments in the press, even in Toronto itself CRCT is received only with a bad whistle in the background.
> I may say it is absolutely impossible to receive CRCT properly in the daytime in northern Ontario.
> CRCM, the Montreal Canadian radio commission station is also seldom heard free of interference. CKAC comes in fairly well after dark until about 11 p.m. when it is ruined by a Mexican station.
> CFRB, the Rogers station in Toronto is really the only Canadian station on the broadcast band that comes in northern Ontario with any consistency or clarity. Unfortunately it is on a frequency of 690 k.c. while WLW, the Crossley station at Cincinatti, is 700 and have a very bad habit of swinging on their frequency at times, bad enough to drown out CFRB altogether. Furthermore WLW will shortly put in steady operation if they have not already done so their new 500,000 watt transmitter, the most powerful in the world, and it would appear to me that once they do this it will be almost impossible to listen to CFRB as long as the two stations remain on the adjacent frequency channels of 700 and 690 k.c. respectively.
>
> As far as the regular broadcast band is concerned we still get very little daylight reception. Timmins of course, and a very limited area do come audibly, although weakly, under favourable conditions, CFRB and WLW.
> I am of the opinion, that the solution of adequate Canadian radio coverage of the north at reasonable cost lies in short wave transmission. The Canadian radio commission deserves a great deal of credit for reopening station VE9GW on 49.22 metres at Bowmanville, and through this station we do hear many of the commission's programs in daylight. Under most conditions VE9GW comes in fairly well from early morning until about 10 p.m. when it is on the air. Alas, there's the rub; several days a week VE9GW does not go on the air till noon. They should be on every day including Sunday from 8 a.m. on. Furthermore, once the United States 49 metres stations get going, VE9GW is badly crowded and it is very difficult to listen to them without W3XAL Boundbrook butting in. I would recomend that if at all possible they use more than one frequency simultaneously, and if a channel can be obtained, one between 50 and 60 metres.

There is a great deal of room for improvement in the international allocation of short wave frequencies for broadcast purposes. For instance, GSA at Daventry, England comes in quite well after dark but is drowned out by W3XAU, Philadelphia or WIXAL, Boston if either is on the air. The Boston station is particularly bad, as their programs are of the cheapest commercial type, advertising cut rate clothing stores, etc., of interest only, if at all, to listeners in Boston. Short wave reception is world wide, and the programs should be arranged accordingly.

In connection with the very good reception during daylight from VE9GW, except for interference late in the afternoon and the evening from the United States station, one point that should be brought home very forcibly is the comparative cost of operating one or more of these short wave transmitters, to give adequate coverage to northern Canada, and the cost of broadcast band transmitters.

VE9GW is only 400 watts. CFRB is 5,000 watts or more. Plenty of United States stations use anywhere from 50,000 watts to 500,000, yet no broadcast band station ever comes in up in our section, in daylight, with one-quarter of the volume of VE9GW.

I think that I am safe in stating that the Canadian radio commission could operate four or five short wave transmitters of the same power as VE9GW for less than the cost of one 5,000 watt station on the broadcast band, and secure excellent reception all day and most of the evening. These short wave transmitters should be located so that each section of Canada would be able to hear at least two, and the programs of course should be different. Under some conditions 25, 31, or even 19 metre wave lengths transmit better, and if possible each station should transmit simultaneously on more than one short wave frequency, the same as the British Broadcasting Company do now with their English programs.

Now I just want to say a few words about the collection of radio licence fees in Ontario. Last year the collectors had a real fight on their hands, on account of the fact that the people, not receiving radio programs, in many cases absolutely refused to pay the $2 licence fee. The principle of no taxation without representation also extends to no payment without service. But a lot of our people were brought before the police magistrate and fined for not paying their radio licences. I maintain that is absolutely unfair, that we should not pay a licence fee until we get reasonable radio reception. In our section of the country we have no quarrel with other sections, but hon. members must realize that our pioneer population has been a wonderful stabilizing factor in the last few years of depression. It must be realized also that we are doing pioneer work and that we are far away from the daily press. For instance, the daily issues of Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa do not reach our section of the country until twenty-four hours after they have been printed, and I submit that those people are entitled to receive the news of the world. That is now made possible by the radio, if the same service could be given all sections of Canada. In a way I am sorry the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) is not here at the moment; perhaps he could enlighten me on this question. We were astounded a few week ago to be told that no consideration had been given the erection of high powered stations in the north. On the other hand I am told, and I believe my information is correct, that it is the intention of the radio commission to increase the power of the Toronto station. It must be remembered, however, that Timmins is nearly five hundred miles from Toronto and no matter how much you increase the power of the Toronto stations it will not give the north the service to which it is entitled. The only way to afford proper reception in our section of the country is to erect a high powered station or a relay station, and I leave it to the commission to decide which it should be.

This is a very important question. The people of this city and of other sections of Canada are not suffering at the present time but surely you cannot have one section of the people discontented in connection with a matter of such national importance without having that discontent felt all over the country. I am making this appeal in all sincerity; it is absolutely outside the realm of politics. All the newspapers in our part of the country, regardless of their political affiliations, are a unit in demanding better radio reception. They have asked the cooperation of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Belec) and of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), who lives in northern Ontario. I believe these gentlemen have appeared before the radio commission in order to give their views on the matter. I do not intend to criticize the commission to any extent; I understand their power is limited, but if we do not get the reception to which we are entitled the blame must rest on the threshold of the present administration. Surely it is possible to remedy the situation. Last year the government found it possible to vote nearly $50,000,000 for a public works program. We do not object to that, though very little of that amount will be spent in northern Ontario. Under the farm loan act some $90,000,000 is to be loaned the farmers of Canada. We do not object to that, though our section will receive very little benefit. At the present time wheat is pegged and we have to pay more for our flour for that reason. We do not object to that, because it helps some of our people, but surely it should be possible for the government to remedy the situation that exists in our section of the country. I am making this appeal in the hope that I may get the ear of the government, if not the ear of the commission. We cannot go on forever with only pious wishes. Every time I appear before the commission I am well received; they always listen to our case, but this is not sufficient. I hope every member will be fully seized with the situation and find it possible to help us in this regard. I am told on good authority that to give us a proper service would not entail a very large expenditure. I am told by an expert in these matters that $100,000 would be ample to provide proper facilities, which would give proper service to at least a quarter of a million of our pioneer population, who certainly are entitled to it.

I should like to say just a word on another matter which is very important to northern Ontario, and which also affects every section of this country; I refer to the trans-Canada highway. During the campaign of 1930 we understood that this question was settled so far as our section of the country was concerned. All candidates, both Liberal and Conservative, agreed that the road should go through our section of the country. That was particularly so in regard to the Minister of Labour; I know that hon. gentleman was sincere when he made the statement that our section would be on the route of the trans-Canada highway, but I regret to say that very little has been done in the last five years with that end in view. It is true that the so called Ferguson highway has been improved to some extent, but that highway cannot compare with the road that has been constructed in the last four years northwest of the city of Pembroke, nor can it compare with the highway now under construction in the southern part of northern Ontario. The work in our section has been held back for one reason. The ministers of the late Ontario government told us that if the route had not been definitely decided it was because they had not received definite and final reports from the surveyors who had been working on the project for a number of years. So I was astounded when, last winter, I read a certain document issued by the Ontario government dealing with this question in which it was stated that in November, 1932, the route had been arrived at. I say that was not fair to our section of the country, because we were not made aware of that fact. This is the route that was agreed upon:

[Mr. Bradette.]

Whereas the route of the said trans-Canada highway across the province of Ontario has been fixed by the province as to parts thereof, as per order in council dated the 26th day of August, 1931, as follows:

Section 1: Trans-Canada highway, Ottawa valley section. From Pembroke through Mattawa to North Bay.

Section 2: Trans-Canada highway, Thunder Bay section. From Schreiber to Nipigon through Port Arthur and Fort William to English River.

Section 3: Trans-Canada highway, western section. From English River through Dyment, Dinorwic, Dryden, Kenora to Manitoba boundary.

Not a soul in our part of the country knew such an order in council had been passed, which made no reference at all to our section of the country. I must give the Minister of Labour due credit, however, for the way he dealt with this very important matter. I have under my hand a reference to the routing of that road over the Hearst division to White River. I have a letter written to the present Minister of Labour, dated December 7, 1934, by Hon. Peter Heenan, minister of lands and forests of the provincial government, in which he says:

You will realize, of course, that your letter of November 27 was written when the highway from Sault Ste. Marie north to White River was under discussion and therefore does not enter the discussion at this time because, as you will recall, it was agreed at the last conference to construct the highway from Schreiber to White River, and the question whether or not the trans-Canada highway will go north to Hearst or south to Sault Ste. Marie from White River would be left in abeyance for later consideration. Answering your question directly, I am satisfied that the connection to Hearst and Sault Ste. Marie comprising the circle ultimately will have to be built.

That is the only redeeming feature at present, so far as we are concerned. Again I must give credit to the Minister of Labour for being fully seized of the exact situation. We have no quarrel with other sections of the country; we realize that Fort William, Sault Ste. Marie, Sturgeon Falls and Sudbury should be on the highway, but surely no hon. member will suggest for a moment that the northern section of Ontario should not be directly connected with that wonderful highway system. I am raising the question at this time in order that the government through the present Minister of Labour, who is very familiar with that question, may see to it that the trans-Canada highway follows the Ferguson highway, and that the route is not changed again.

I must make myself very clear in this connection. During the 1930 campaign definite pronouncements were made in our section of the country by supporters of the present administration. This matter was included in their political propaganda; in their manifesto they made it plain that the trans-Canada highway would pass through the northern section of northern Ontario, that it would go north from North Bay by way of the Timagimi reserve, through the town of Haileybury to Cochrane, then on to Hearst and westward. We are not parochial in our point of view; we realize that it would be more economical for the government to build the road from North Bay along the route of the National Transcontinental railway, but we also know that if this is done a large section of northern Ontario will be left out. We do not want to be fooled in that matter. A promise made in the heat of the campaign is a promise which must be fulfilled. In his discussions last fall with the Minister of Lands and Forests for the province of Ontario, the federal Minister of Labour made it clear that our section of the country would not be forgotten. It is time that the House of Commons was fully seized of the radio situation in northern Ontario and also the conditions obtaining in connection with the trans-Canada highway.

Some people hold the view that local matters should not be brought to the attention of a federal government. My answer would be that in many instances regional problems are in fact national. At times by not attending to regional matters we do an injustice to all the population. In this connection I have in mind what happened last year when the budget was presented. The Minister of Finance was of the opinion that the provisions in regard to gold would affect only a half dozen ridings throughout the country. He afterwards realized however, that every citizen in Canada either directly or indirectly was interested in gold mining. The same would apply to the building of the trans-Canada highway. We must be very careful to build no barriers against the project, and we must take great care in the routing selected because in years to come the highway will be paid for through the traffic we may gain not only from Canada but from the United States. I am in favour of the vote which was made recently for the development of the tourist traffic, but I would say we must be very careful about the way we spend our money in the construction of highways.

The matters about which I have spoken affect vitally the section of Canada from which I come, and deserve the attention of all hon. members. I realize the difficulty of building up a case for northern Ontario, because only one or two members are directly interested in that section of the dominion, and for that reason they are the only ones with accurate knowledge of our problems. Nevertheless hon. members must realize we are as familiar with conditions in the east as with those in the west. In one sense we in northern Ontario are westerners and in another sense we are not. We know as much about the municipal politics of Toronto as we know about municipal politics in the city of Winnipeg. I regret to say, however, that in many instances we have not been understood and we were not given the attention and support we deserved.

May I urge that the government have this matter of radio reception remedied? The people in northern Ontario would be grateful to any government which would give better service than that which now obtains, because our people have the faculty of recognizing whence their help may come. I well remember that the people in my constituency sent letters of appreciation to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy) for certain work he did in my section of the country. The same would apply to the matters I have brought to the attention of this chamber.

Mr. H. B. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with other hon. members in expressing my pleasure in the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is again regaining health, and that at the forthcoming jubilee he will be well enough to represent Canada in Great Britain.

As a member of this chamber elected in one of the more recent by-elections, and coming from a constituency which represents a typical cross section of public opinion throughout the dominion, may I say that in my view the results in that by-election were highly significant. To a great extent my constituency consists of industrial workers, although many farmers are scattered throughout the various sections of it. As one who has belonged to the army of industrial workers I have been vastly interested in the social legislation placed before parliament at the present session. In my working days I had a keen interest in these matters, and as a consequence the legislation placed before us has received my careful study. I find in it a number of provisions with which I do not entirely agree, although I do approve of the general principle involved.

Let us turn to the legislation for unemployment insurance. In my opinion, sir, that measure does not go far enough. I am of the opinion it should include many workers who, as the Prime Minister pointed out, are very seldom unemployed. If we are to apply the law of averages I say the legislation should be extended to include workers employed in banks, in insurance offices and in other vocations,—workers who are not now included. I can remember that in 1930 the statement was made during the campaign that if elected the Conservative party would take care of the unemployed. Well, they were elected, but they have had very little success in carrying out their promise. The unemployment insurance legislation merely shifts the burden to the shoulders of the employed. Under normal conditions in Canada the vast majority of people now employed will, undoubtedly, continue to be employed. Consequently while these employed persons have no objection to bearing their fair share of the costs they feel the privilege should be extended so that the law of averages should apply. My view is that the scheme would be more effective if it were extended to include more than it does at the present time.

If I remember correctly, during the campaign of 1930, speaking in the maritimes, the present Prime Minister expressed a great deal of sympathy for the railway employees. He felt they were being unjustly treated, and stated, so I understand, that if the Conservative party were returned to power two trains would be running for every one train running at that date. Well, since he took office 60,000 or 70,000 railway men in Canada have lost their employment. It would seem, therefore, that the Prime Minister's promise to have two trains running where only one had run previously did not work out as well as the right hon. gentleman imagined it would.

The government has undertaken the setting of minimum wages. Labour organizations in Canada have always contended that they do not want minimum wage legislation, because employers invariably have construed minimum wage measures as measures setting maximum wages. However, conditions have changed and the government has seen fit to introduce such legislation. There is one principle which I think should be followed in connection with that matter. It could not very well be worked out when it was a question of private negotiation between labour organizations and employers, but it should be possible to work it out now. A man with a family should most certainly receive more money for his labour than a man who has no children, if we consider that children are an asset to the nation. A man with a family of six or seven or eight should be given some consideration over and above what is given to the man who is single.

I was vastly interested also in the constitutional aspects of the question. The Prime Minister and his side were very sure that this legislation was within the power of this parliament to enact. Our leader and the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) were equally sure that it was not. As a new member of the house I was confused by these conflicting opinions and did not know exactly where I was at. I was in very great doubt until I read a notice of motion that had been placed on the order paper of the legislature of the province of Ontario shortly after the leader of the opposition in the Ontario legislature had been down here in Ottawa. That notice of motion by the Hon. Mr. Price reads as follows:

> Be it resolved that this legislature approves of the principle of the legislation for insurance against unemployment and other forms of social insurance recently given a unanimous second reading in the House of Commons at Ottawa and is prepared to supplement, complement or augment such laws of the parliament of Canada by provincial legislation, so that the dominion wide scope of unemployment insurance may be maintained without recourse to litigation over questions of jurisdiction.

After reading that notice of motion I was entirely satisfied in my own mind that the position taken by the leader of the Liberal party in this house and by the ex-Minister of Justice was sound, because if the government had been so sure of their position what could be the purpose or necessity of having this resolution brought up in the Ontario legislature?

In common with the rest of the members on this side of the house I very much object to the long adjournment that it is proposed to take. It will put the members, particularly those from distant parts of Canada, in a very embarrassing position, because when they go to their constituencies the first question they will be asked will be: When are we going to have an election? Every place I go I hear that question asked. Business is being held up. Business people do not want to make commitments. There is an atmosphere of uncertainty until this question of the election is decided. People want to have the air cleared, and the only way to do it is by giving them an opportunity of saying what government they want here at Ottawa to bring down legislation that will be in their interests.

Although I represent an industrial riding—and I may say that my interests have been largely industrial all my days—I should like to say on behalf of the rural parts of the district I represent that the farmers have been complaining bitterly about the prices they have been receiving for their products. The Ottawa agreements, which were supposed to do so much for the farmers of this country, are certainly not finding much favour in the constituency I have the honour to represent. All the arguments that we have heard advanced in this house in favour of the Ottawa agreements were made by various speakers in the by-election in my constituency last September. They were put forward quite plainly and I believe quite fairly to the electors of my district, and of course the result is history now. The people there could not see where this legislation was benefiting them in any way, shape or form.

There are industries in my riding that will be vitally affected by the reciprocal arrangement that is now in course of negotiation with the United States. I do not suppose I should say very much about it, as negotiations are still pending, but I should like to point out the position in which some of the companies in my riding find themselves. Their market is necessarily to the south. In the year 1928 one of these firms shipped out 86 million feet of lumber. That figure dropped in 1932 to 21 million feet, and in addition the value of the lumber dropped from $30 a thousand in 1928 to $19 a thousand in 1934. I would urge upon the government that these firms are finding it very difficult to carry on, and in any negotiations that take place I would urge upon the government that some concession be given to our timber operators. There is now a one dollar tariff and a three dollar excise tax against our shipments of timber to the United States. I do not know that it makes any difference what the tax is called, but it is certainly a burden on these industries which they are really unable to carry. Along the border we have had a very serious situation, and it would have been much worse had it not been for the fact that some concessions were given by the Ontario government to our timber operators to enable them to carry on. But they will need more assistance than that, and I urge upon the government that they endeavour in the treaty negotiations now in progress to see that such assistance is given.

Mr. WILFRID GIROUARD (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, the government's determination to adjourn the present session until May 20th clearly shows that they intend to remain in office until the extreme limit, in spite of the lack of confidence which was clearly expressed in different parts of the country. Nothing could better illustrate the fear felt by the government than to see them try to delay the expiration of their term—which will be a fatal date for them—until they are bound by the constitution to face the electorate. We have seldom seen such contempt for our parliamentary practice and such unjustified refusal to grant an election to the people who, especially since a year, demand a change in the management of public affairs.

Rather than consider an adjournment—an adjournment that is unnecessary, but will cost a lot money to the already overburdened taxpayers—the government ought to introduce measures to settle the most pressing problems at the present time. Among these problems which the government has neglected since five years, or for which it has failed to seek some effective solution, one must certainly mention the painful conditions under which the farming industry is striving at present.

Representing as I do a riding where butter and cheese making constitutes the main source of revenue for the farming community, I may surely be allowed to call the attention of the house to the fact that no proper steps were taken since five years to increase the price of these products. In order to convince oneself and to establish the difference between a promise and its realization, I shall remind you of what the farmer of this country had a right to expect, by quoting a short extract from a speech delivered by the right honourable prime minister at Ormstown, on June 30, 1930, as reported by the Ottawa Citizen:

> It was necessary that farmers should receive just compensation for their efforts "and rewards equal to the professions" to keep Canadian boys and girls on the farm. Agriculture stood first in Canadian development ... "we must supply the same advantages to agriculture as to other activities. It must be made as profitable as any other profession in which men are employed."

Mr. Speaker, after five years in office, the prime minister and his colleagues have not yet presented any measures to give the farming industry benefits equal to those granted other occupations. They forgot their pledges of 1930 that agriculture was to be made more remunerative and should be first cared for by those who lead this country. I regret to say that instead of stating a policy which would help the farmer, the greatest anxiety of this government, its first care, has been simply to secure an adjournment.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), while putting his estimates through the house in 1932, said, at page 2795 of Hansard, about butter and cheese:

> However, there is another dairy product which we can produce and sell in the old country markets at a premium; I refer to cheese.

So I think if we are to concentrate on dairy products we should concentrate on cheese, and since many think we cannot separate butter and cheese, what assists one is bound to assist the other as well.

The minister suggested a greater production of cheese and some time later, during the summer months, the Ottawa agreements were reached. Not only has our production of cheese been dwindling, but our exports of that product were alarmingly reduced as a result of the agreements.

Although it might not be very pleasant for this house, sir, it is of importance in this occasion to give figures in order to prove that the agreements reached at the Ottawa Imperial Economic Conference, in the year 1932, have been damaging to our agricultural class in the province of Quebec, in so far as our production and exports of cheese have been reduced. In the year 1931, Canada exported to England 706,726 cwt.; in 1932, when the agreements had not had any result yet, we were exporting, also to Great Britain, 747,417 cwt. In 1933, after the agreements had been operating, a great reduction took place, and our exports stood at 629,498 cwt., then dropped to 526,508 cwt. in 1934.

In December, 1934, we exported to England 2,927,000 pounds of cheese, whereas, for the same period in 1933, our exports were 6,408,512 pounds. In the Commercial Intelligence Journal of March 2, 1935, I find the following on the subject of our cheese exports to Great Britain:

> Canada, with 520,221 hundredweight of cheese out of a total of 2,988,567 hundredweight, is now relatively an unimportant factor in this trade in which at one time she was preeminent.

Since the Ottawa agreements have been signed, British imports of Canadian cheese have dropped from year to year. Here is an official government publication declaring, in March, 1935, that Canada is in a poor position in respect of cheese exports.

While our exports were dwindling, Australia and New Zealand, who signed the Ottawa agreements, were shipping far greater quantities of their cheese; that is to say, while our exports were reduced, the exports from those two countries were reaching a considerably higher figure, to the prejudice of our own farmers. In 1931, England imported 1,732,000 cwt. from New Zealand; in 1933, 2,059,393 cwt. and, in the eleven months ending November 30, 1934, New Zealand shipped 1,973,703 cwt. Australian exports are also greater. I submit respectfully, sir, that, instead of asking for an adjournment of the house, the government would be well advised to review the Ottawa agreements in order to put our cheese factories in the same favourable position as they were before the conclusion of those agreements.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), in his splendid speech this afternoon, reminded us that one of the chief causes of the miserable situation in which the Canadian farmer finds himself to-day might be found in the fact that our farmers are selling their products at a low figure, while they have to pay high prices for the manufactured goods they have to buy.

Farmers in my constituency—and those of Quebec generally—have signed a petition addressed to the Prime Minister of this Dominion asking the government to fix a minimum price on a number of products and establish an export premium on butter and cheese. As this petition is of great importance, perhaps the house will allow me to quote it. Having described the pitiful condition of our farmers, they were asking the government, in January last, to fix—

> . . . a minimum price as follows on the following products: butter, thirty cents per pound; cheese, fifteen cents per pound; eggs, twenty-five cents per dozen; pork, ten cents per pound; potatoes, fifty cents per bag.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers who signed this petition are very moderate in their claims.

They ask, in the second place, for an export bonus on cheese as well as on butter. Their petition continues:

> The undersigned believe that with such a minimum price and such an export bonus, the agricultural situation, which forms the basis of our economic system, would very appreciably improve and that, as a result, the general business situation of the country would benefit to a great extent.

There is at present a minimum price on wheat; this government has already granted a bonus of 5 cents a bushel on wheat exports, and the right hon. the Prime Minister has moreover announced a bill to reduce the hours of labour and one to establish a minimum wage. The legislation requested by the signers of this petition is somewhat similar to that which the Prime Minister has submitted to us. In order that such legislation may be effectual, it must necessarily apply to the whole country, as butter and cheese are produced in every province of Canada.

The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), in his letter of January 19, 1934, which was at the same time as his letter of resignation dated October 26, 1934, wrote to the Prime Minister as follows:

> On your return from the International Economic Conference I submitted to you in writing, and discussed later with you in conversation, proposals regarding certain problems in Canada, among them being the plight of the butter producer, and the necessity of action being taken before the winter months set in, to raise the price of butter to the producer,—

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister had this plan before him for over a year, but he did nothing about it. That is no doubt the reason why the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce added to his letter from which I have just quoted the following words:

—you will allow me to say most clearly that I fear you have permitted certain problems of a more or less international or general character to so obsess your mind and your attention that it has made it impossible for you to appreciate some of these pressing Canadian problems, which, while difficult of solution, are quite within the power of parliament.

If, as the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated—and he had been the Prime Minister's colleague during four years—international questions so obsessed the mind of the Prime Minister as to make him neglect purely Canadian questions, it is not surprising that he and his colleagues should not have had time to direct their thoughts towards improving agricultural conditions in this country.

I transmitted to the right hon. the Prime Minister petitions signed by a large number of farmers in my constituency, and I sincerely trust that the ministers from the province of Quebec will remind their chief of the promise he made in 1930 to obtain for the farmer a higher price for his products and that they will urge him to grant the request contained in these petitions.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Mr. Speaker, that is one of the reasons that lead me to oppose the adjournment requested by the government. The agricultural problem of this country requires an immediate solution. This is not the time for an adjournment. On the contrary, it is the time to provide remedies and to fulfil the promises made to the farmers of the country and of the province of Quebec, particularly in regard to butter and cheese. The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce communicated to the government in 1933 a plan to increase the price level of butter and cheese in this country. His plan was not accepted by the government. It seems to me that if the government really had the interests of the farming class at heart, they would, instead of asking for a one-month adjournment, immediately bring forward the measures required to increase the price of the principal products marketed by the farmers of Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto East) moved the third reading of Bill No. 50, to amend the Post Office Act (newspaper ownership).

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Before this bill is read the third time I wish to say a few words regarding it, seeing that I had not an opportunity of joining in the discussion when it was previously before the house. I do not exactly desire to oppose the bill but rather to qualify the support I am willing to give it. There is nothing wrong in principle about it, but I am afraid it will not serve any great purpose. In the first place I regret that it proceeds in an indirect way. I appreciate the fact that it might not have been possible to put through a bill covering this subject which would deal directly with it, but I have my doubts as to whether we might not safely have left the matter alone instead of proceeding with it as here proposed. It is a bill to amend the Post Office Act, though the purpose is to obtain a list of the shareholders, owners and others associated with every newspaper. As pointed out before in the discussion in committee—and I think it was also pointed out when a similar bill was before the house in previous sessions—there is no possible sanction for it, though the bill declares that if its provisions are not observed by any publication that publication shall be denied the privileges of the mail. This is an indirect and circuitous way of dealing with the matter, and it leaves in my mind a doubt whether this parliament could deal with it in a direct and more regular way. I admit that at the present time the privileges granted by the Post Office Department to large newspapers is so considerable, in the reduction of post office rates, that the sanction may work; but I wish to qualify that part of the bill. I do not think that this way of legislating on different matters should be greatly encouraged, even if in this instance it may seem to be the proper method of dealing with a situation that might not be met otherwise.

The main point I wish to make is that even if you succeed in obtaining a list of editors, publishers, shareholders and others connected with a newspaper—my hon. friend has tried to make it as complete as possible—I am not sure that this will finally achieve the purpose the hon. gentleman has in mind. A list of the names of owners and especially shareholders of a large newspaper to-day will not necessarily disclose the motive that may be behind a particular attitude which that paper takes. A newspaper to-day is primarily a business concern and quite a number of persons invest their money in it, as in any other industrial enterprise, merely for possible profit. They are not necessarily interested in the attitude of the paper on a certain occasion towards a particular question.

In Montreal for a considerable time we had two English papers published in the evening, one giving the Conservative attitude and the other the Liberal, and yet it was well known that they belonged to the same man, the object of the so-called Liberal newspaper being merely to close the field of competition in order that the larger paper might have it all its own way. You may say that this is the very thing which this bill would prevent, inasmuch as it would compel the owner to disclose his identity and the fact that he owned both newspapers. But the fact is that everyone was aware of his ownership of these papers; it was common knowledge. Had a bill like this been in force then there is no doubt that he would have used other names so as to avoid disclosing his ownership of one of the papers. A bill such as this might have operated in the opposite direction to that which the hon. gentleman desires.

I would point out further that newspapers are the year round primarily purveyors of information. The old party paper which used to give only one side has pretty well disappeared; to-day a newspaper of a certain standing gives information on both sides. I do not overlook the fact that we have very strong party newspapers which, through their editorials, espouse a political cause and certainly exert an influence in that field. But even such newspapers, if they wish to retain their standing in newspaperdom, must convey information to the people; they must give information on both sides of the question—or may I say, in deference to my hon. friends in the corner, on all three sides of the question. With respect to a party paper of that description, supporting one or other political group, it is not very material that you should know who precisely is the man or who are the men giving it financial support. You know that it is Liberal or that it is Conservative. But the larger newspaper—and we have quite a number of them to-day—is not devoted strictly to one or other of the political parties; it is a business concern, a purveyor of information; it disseminates information in all directions, gathering it from all sources, and its pages are read, if it is a so-called Conservative paper, by Liberal readers, and vice versa if it is supposed to be a Liberal journal. And it is read by those belonging to the third party. But the main object of such newspapers is, I repeat, not political; it is a business proposition. And when these newspapers attain a certain degree of efficiency as carriers of news they also become a medium for advertising. Here again it is merely an industrial concern. I do not think there is any need to get a list of all the people interested in a newspaper carrying advertisements or printing news in that way, any more than there would be such a need with regard to any other industrial enterprise. For that reason, it seems to me that even if this bill is adopted it will not serve the purpose its promoter has in mind.

Judging by his own commentaries, the object the sponsor of the bill seeks to attain is to find out who is the sinister influence behind a certain attitude on the part of a newspaper towards a particular question, or who is the political fiend that has inspired a certain comment on a certain bill. I do not think you will obtain that information by getting a list of the shareholders of newspapers, for the reasons I have given. I repeat, most of the shareholders are interested in the paper for business reasons; they are anxious to see the paper maintain its circulation by disseminating news to as large a number of subscribers as possible, and they want it to get as many advertisements as it can. If at a particular moment in the life of a newspaper —I am not speaking of the party newspaper but of the large journals—it appears to support a particular party in the first part of the year and another party in the latter part of the year, then I do not think that by obtaining a list of the shareholders you will find out the reason for these changes in the newspaper's atmosphere. If that sort of paper wishes to carry special propaganda, those who are really interested will carefully hide behind fictitious names; they will take care not to disclose their identity. This list, prepared with great care and submitted to my genial friend the Postmaster General, will not disclose the purpose behind it.

I read in subsection 2 that it is also proposed to have all reading or editorial matter for the publication of which money is paid or valuable consideration given plainly marked

"advertisement." That also reads very well, but what does it mean? It means that if editorial matter is directly paid for by someone who wants it published, it will be marked "advertisement," but anyone with a little experience in newspapers knows that is not the way it is done. A financial institution or industrial concern will give an advertisement to a newspaper and will pay for it at so much per line. Then they will submit besides some reading matter which they suggest it would be desirable for the paper to publish, but they do not pay for it. It is not likely the reading matter would be published if the advertisement were not published, but in the long run when a paper has a client of that description there is no money paid directly for the publication of such reading matter. There again you will catch the small fish but miss the larger one. If a man wants a little bit of reading matter printed to serve a special purpose and pays for it, you reach him, but a large concern that has a contract for a year with a newspaper, and there is an understanding that these men, being good clients, should be treated liberally, reading matter will be printed in the paper for which they do not pay. That will not come under this section at all; yet there is no doubt that it is advertising in the same sense as the smaller ones I have just referred to.

From these remarks it would appear that I am not very strongly in favour of the bill. But I do not desire to oppose it. I do not think it is going to be very useful, but at the same time I believe it is harmless. I have no objection to the list of shareholders of a newspaper being known to the public. But from my experience as a newspaper man I wish to warn the public against attaching too much importance to such a bill, or concluding from the publication of such names that those people and those only are responsible for whatever the newspaper publishes. In short, this bill is very much like some of the reforms of the government; it is good in principle but it is not going to accomplish very much in practice.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): While I am quite in favour of this bill, I take this opportunity, now that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is here, of asking if he would be good enough to give his view. I draw his attention to subsection 2, which I submit conflicts with the jurisdiction of the provinces over property and civil rights. In the first place this is an act to amend the Post Office Act, but subsection 2 has no reference to the Post Office Act in any way, shape or form. This subsection requires that any matter published for which money or other valuable consideration is given shall be marked "advertisement", and for failure to comply with this requirement a fine of not less than $50 and not more than $500 is provided. That is a peculiar provision to put under the Post Office Act. As I said the other night, a similar bill was put through this house some years ago and was thrown out in the other chamber for the reason that it conflicted with the rights of the provinces.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I have no objection to expressing my own personal opinion, but I believe it is the rule that it is not proper to ask for legal opinions from the Minister of Justice in regard to these matters. However, I think that the section referred to is within the competence of this parliament if it sees fit to enact it.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): With reference to the objections taken in the house last Friday night to this bill and the question of jurisdiction raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), under the British North America Act the regulation of the post office is under federal jurisdiction. Subsection 2, to which the hon. gentleman referred, is simply a regulation for the post office. The Postmaster General can refuse admission to the mails of any newspaper in Canada and need not give any reason for doing so. For that reason the section is intra vires of this parliament. It does not in any sense relate to property and civil rights.

With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), who supports the bill, I entirely agree with his comments about certain scurrilous publications. They are not newspapers; they do not conform to the law of libel and slander; they show no editor or office of publication, and parliament should in some way control that type of scurrilous circular. They do not come under the provisions of the Post Office Act; they are under the authority of the chief electoral officer under the new election act, and it is his duty to see that this class of literature is prohibited. It is contrary to both the Dominion Elections Act and the criminal code as well as the law of libel and slander, which is provincial. If the hon. gentleman will draft an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act to take care of circulars and dodgers of this kind used at election time, commonly known as roorbacks, I will second it. Such publications do not come under this bill or any act of the federal or provincial legislatures, because they are not newspapers.

Referring to the observations of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), he was a member of the administration that supported this bill for six years in this house. While he is not opposing the bill, he offered some criticisms of it; but I may tell him that this has been the law in England for many years and in the United States since 1912, and it has worked well. Why should any society, because it is incorporated under the newspaper law, be free from obligation to disclose any details regarding its business? This is a very moderate bill, providing for what has been found to be in the public interest. There never was a time in the history of this country, in view of the many important problems facing it, when it was more necessary that hon. members should speak out and demand publicity as to the owners of that small section of the press that would be opposed to this bill. I paid tribute the other night to what the press has done, and I need not say anything further on that. I believe this is good legislation. It was part of the Liberal platform of 1919. It originated with the Liberal party in Great Britain. This particular bill has been examined by the law officers and other lawyers, and is intra vires of this parliament.

WAYS AND MEANS

OBJECTION TO PROLONGED ADJOURNMENT EXPRESSED IN AMENDMENT TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Rhodes for committee of ways and means and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. J. A. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the amendment which is now before the house is timely and imperative. There is no other way of regarding it. The conditions which prevail throughout the entire country demand our immediate and undivided attention. During the first and second weeks of this year the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) delivered a series of radio addresses, and by the statements he made therein set the country all agog. The old order, which has existed for many centuries, was to be obliterated, he said, and replaced by a new social order. This new social order has been advocated by and has been a part of the policy of the Liberal party for many years. When the house opened this year and the government undertook to place this reform legislation on the statute books, therefore, the official opposition rendered every assistance possible in order to facilitate the passing of these measures so they would become law and be put into operation in this country. Now we have the government coming forward with the proposal that we should have an adjournment of five or six weeks. Having regard to the conditions that prevail throughout the country I contend that this request is very unreasonable and savours of insincerity. There is not a political party in this house, or in the country so far as that goes, that is better equipped to put these reform measures into operation than the Liberal party, because the Liberal party is a party of action and reform.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): I am glad that my statement meets with approval on the other side of the house as well as on this side. I hope it will not be considered that I am using very strong language when I declare that the present government is a government of usurpers. This government came into office in August, 1930. Its popularity began its great and unparalleled retreat in 1932. In that year a by-election was held in the constituency of South Huron, and naturally it was expected, as is always expected, that a supporter of the government would be returned. It is only fair to the government to say that the seat was held by a Liberal prior to the by-election, but the important point to consider is that in the by-election a Liberal was elected by a greater majority than had been given the previous candidate in 1930. That was the first intimation to the government that their popularity was on the wane to a considerable extent.

Then in August, 1933, a provincial election was held in the banner province of Liberalism, Nova Scotia. A Conservative government dissolved the legislature, but after the election the Liberal party formed a government. Then there were three by-elections in different parts of Canada on October 23 of the same year. The constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska, which was represented by a Conservative prior to the by-election, returned a Liberal by such a handsome majority that the Conservative candidate contributed $200 to the general revenue of the Dominion of Canada. In the constituency of Yamaska a Liberal was returned with an increased majority, and in the constituency of Mackenzie a Liberal was elected wth a majority of 1,614. That was the first time in twenty-one or twenty-two years that a Liberal candidate had been elected to represent that constituency. Then a provincial election was held in British Columbia; a Conservative government dissolved the legislature but when it reassembled after the general election a Liberal government was in office. That was a further indication to this government that they should seriously consider dissolving parliament and consulting the people.

On June 19, 1934, a terrible catastrophe—so far as the interests of the Conservative party were concerned—occurred in two widely separated parts of the dominion. In the province of Ontario a Conservative government dissolved the legislature, but after the election the Liberal party formed the government. In the province of Saskatchewan a Conservative government dissolved the legislature but after the election not a single Conservative was returned to tell the tale. Of fifty-five members returned fifty were Liberals and five belonged to the new party which is fast disappearing. Of those five only one was elected by a majority vote. We all remember the good old hymn:

> Time like an ever rolling stream
> Bears all its sons away—

Because of this there were three by-elections in the province of Ontario, and two other vacancies caused by the resignation of members. I am not going to mention the political complexions of those constituencies prior to the by-elections, which were held September 24, 1934, but as a result four Liberals and one very independent Conservative were returned. I submit that the day following those by-elections the government should have acquiesced in the logic of events, made an unconditional surrender and gone to the people. So in relating the political events of the Dominion of Canada in the last three years I am sure hon. members will agree that I did not use a very strong term when I said that this was a government of usurpers.

You know, Mr. Speaker, when rats know that the ship is sinking they drop their can openers and beat it by the short route. The ship of state of the Dominion of Canada has been bombarded from all sides for the last three years, but the captain and crew, instead of veering the vessel to port, made for the open sea. With regard to these by-elections to which I referred and the representatives returned to this House of Commons, in all humility I am going to make the statement that the most important and the biggest shot of all came from the constituency of Mackenzie. My reason for making that statement is that that shot not only did untold harm to the ship of state; it also ricocheted and knocked the block clean off an unnatural enemy of the state.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having related the political events that have taken place in this dominion since 1932, let us come to the conditions which exist at the present time. I submit that the government must go further than they have gone in order to assist the people and alleviate the distress which exists in many parts of the country to-day. I am referring more particularly to western Canada, from which I come. Every part of the country is well represented in this house; each member can speak for the part he represents, but I am now speaking for the province of Saskatchewan, and the conditions that prevail in that province are the conditions that prevail in the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta. We have had a period of depression lasting for five years. The farmers, who form the basic industry of the three prairie provinces, have not been able to make ends meet. That has not been through any fault of the farmer or the toiler; it has been because conditions have prevailed over which they have had no control. We must remember that many enterprises in this country have made profits and declared dividends even during the period of depression. The chartered banks and other financial institutions have been declaring dividends since 1930. Of course they declared dividends prior to that time, but I am not going beyond 1930, when the depression began. Even in 1932, probably the poorest year in Canadian history, the chartered banks and financial institutions of this country declared dividends while the farmers were declaring losses. The farmers are not able to make ends meet; they cannot meet the obligations they incurred during days of prosperity. Something must be done to help those people, and I submit that before dissolution of parliament the government should do more than it has done in the past. I do not speak in any spirit of criticism, because undoubtedly the government has experienced difficulties since attaining office in 1930. I submit, however, that they could have done more than they have done. It is inevitable that the debts of the country are not going to be paid one hundred per cent. I believe I made the same statement when I spoke last year in the debate on the budget. What can be done? I submit the government could do something, and that it would not be necessary to add one cent to our public debt. When I make these observations I mean there must be an adjustment of debts.

The statement may be made that legislation was passed last year which would have the effect of helping people who are in debt and who wish to make settlements of those debts. The farmers throughout the country are an independent class of people, a condition which I believe is only natural when we realize that day in and day out they are communing with nature. They are men of honour; they are men with every desire to meet the obligations which they have incurred, and they do not ask reductions or anything else. However when those farmers are placed in a position where they cannot meet their obligations then I submit it behooves the government, and every person in a position to do so, to render assistance to those people by making it possible for them to meet their obligations.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have a platform. Of course their platform changes with every new moon, but since that party came into existence there is at least one plank they have always had, namely the statutory settlement of debts. I submit that is the only way to assist the farmers. Although giving the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) due credit for the legislation passed during the last session, I must say that when the farmer has to prostrate himself before his creditor, when he has to make an application to an official receiver in order to bring himself and his creditor together for the purpose of making satisfactory arrangements, he is placing himself in an undesirable position. Under conditions such as I have described, conditions over which the farmer has no control, there should be a statutory declaration on the compromise of debts, and debts should be classified. That is the only way in which settlements can be properly made, namely by statutory regulation.

Speaking of the classification of debts, may I illustrate by some further observations. There is an old saying that every tub must stand on its own bottom. Let us consider the man who has borrowed $1,000 in cash and given security by way of a mortgage on his homestead. I say that $1,000 should be paid. Some arrangements should be made with regard to interest. I will go farther and say that since the year 1930 any man who has been able to pay interest on his indebtedness —and if he has done that he has done well— a portion of that interest should be credited by compromising on the interest and reducing it to a rate not higher than five per cent. On the other hand if a man sells me a quarter section of land, and by selling me that quarter section makes a profit of $1,500, then I say that not only should the interest be adjusted but the profit he made on that transaction should be compromised as well. I use that illustration so that hon. members will understand what I mean, namely that the debts should be classified.

I am not going to say any more about debts: possibly all of us talk too much about them. May I now come to another matter which in my view is of extreme importance to the people of Canada, namely the reform measures, some of which have already been introduced by the government. In all fairness may I say that those reform measures are not being received very cordially by the people throughout the country. At least after giving them serious consideration the people are not very enthusiastic about them. According to a biography of the Prime Minister which I read only a short time ago I believe he is the type of man who undoubtedly attended Sunday School in his early years, and for that reason must be conversant with the bible. When they were starting out on a great reform program which was to replace the order that has been in existence for three or four centuries they should have gone back to Holy Writ and endeavoured to obtain some assistance therefrom. From that book they should have taken a guide which could have been followed in forming their reform legislation. Why did they not take a lesson from the life of Jacob, for example? We read that at one time Jacob was travelling from Beersheba to Haran—and by the way, he travelled by aeroplane, and that was about five thousand years ago. I say that because the good old book tells us that he landed on a certain place, and for that reason I judge he must have travelled by plane. Anyway, we learn that after the setting of the sun he landed on this certain place, and being very tired prepared for himself a bed. He took a few stones, placed them together, used them as a pillow, went to sleep and had a dream. He dreamed he saw a ladder reaching from earth to heaven. This was not a ladder reaching from earth only part way to heaven; that would have been a mockery. That would have been inadequate—it was a ladder reaching all the way from earth to heaven. I submit that if hon. members of the government when framing this legislation had considered the dream of Jacob their reform measures would have been entirely different and would be adequate to meet existing conditions. Were that the fact the results of the reforms introduced would reach beyond this chamber and into the cottages of the men in distress and those people for whom the reform measures are being placed on our statute books.

At the outset may I say that the policies and platform of the Liberal party are always fresh and up to date. It is the only party in Canada to-day in a position to meet the requirements of the hour and the demands of the future. Even if elected, is the party in the corner of the chamber in a position to alleviate the existing distress? Is it in a position to place on the statute books of Canada legislation which would be sufficiently effective? I submit they are not in that position. In the year 1932 the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation came into existence. It had its birth in the city of Calgary in the last days of August, 1932. While in session over a period of two or three days they framed a platform, and I must say that for a period of time I had sympathy with that platform.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Shame.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Mackenzie): Yes, I had sympathy. I am sympathetic towards everything, but that does not mean that I will support everything. I am sympathetic towards the man who is lost spiritually, politically and otherwise. The platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation received a great deal of consideration and thought in western Canada. I know it did in that portion of Saskatchewan from which I come. The fundamental difference between the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as it originated in Calgary, and the platform of the Liberal party was the stand taken on the land policy. many parts of our platforms were in common, and it would be impossible to have conditions otherwise. The Liberal party has much in common with the Conservative party; that is inevitable. On land matters, however, platforms of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the Liberal party are not in common; in fact that was the fundamental difference between those two parties. It is not necessary for me to elaborate on their land policy, for every member of the house knows as much about it as I do. They were going to give assistance to people who were in debt; those people in return were to transfer their land to the government if the party attained office, and the owners were to become tenants. Now suppose such a thing were to happen that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation should come into office as the federal government of Canada and put their land policy into operation; what effect would it have upon the people? The great Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose name has gone down to imperishable renown, speaking in the city of Montreal fifty years ago, said that property rights and property possession were the most sacred things belonging to the individual. But would it remain that way if this policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were to become operative? I submit that it would not. To become a tenant I submit that a man would have to surrender entirely his spirit of independence. We are not unmindful of the sad and bitter experience of the first tenant known to us in history, that of the Adams' in the garden of Eden. Because of one single violation by one of the tenants of one of the covenants in the lease, the whole family was expelled from the garden. I sometimes think that there must have been a cooperative commonwealth federation group in existence at that time and that it was the leader of the group who found his way into the garden and beguiled the tenant.

If the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were carried out, we would lose all property rights. I have here an article which contains an extract from Morgan's Ancient History, as follows:

> The idea of property was slowly formed in the human mind, remaining nascent and feeble through immense periods of time. Springing into life in savagery, it required all the experience of this period and the subsequent period of barbarism to develop the germ, and prepare the human brain for the acceptance of its controlling influence. Its dominance as a passion over all other passions marks the commencement of civilization. It not only led mankind to overcome the obstacles that delayed civilization, but to establish political society on the basis of territory and of property. A critical knowledge of the evolution of the idea of property would embody, in some respects, the most remarkable portion of the mental history of mankind.
> Independently of the movement which culminated in the patriarchial family of the Hebrew and Latin types, property, as it increased in variety and amount, exercised a steady and constantly augmenting influence ir the direction of monogamy. It is impossible to overestimate the influence of property in the civilization of mankind.
> The growth of the idea of property in the human mind commenced in feebleness and ended in becoming its master passion. Government and laws are instituted with primary reference to its creation, protection and enjoyment.
> The growth of property is thus closely connected with the increase of inventions and discoveries, and with the improvement of social institutions which mark the several ethnical periods of human progress.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if that land plank in the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party were to become operative in this country, before the present generation would pass away we would be reduced to the condition of the nomadic wanderers, upon the primeval plains.

Strange and devious are the paths of history. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had to pass through the fiery furnace of affliction, and during the year 1933, as I have already mentioned, they fought strongly in the constituency of Mackenzie. It was their best fighting ground, and they met with defeat. Then in the provincial elections in Saskatchewan on the nineteenth of June last they were practically put out of business, only five being elected out of fifty-five, and four of them by minority votes. They began to see that they were human like everybody else. They were very anxious to attain office.

Then what happened? At their convention held in the city of Regina in the year 1933 many of the farmers were opposed to nationalizing the land. The farmers were in favour of nationalizing the banks and every other enterprise except themselves. They expressed themselves very strongly in the matter, and I believe the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis), who was an active participant in that convention, lost his temper. I am only surmising that, but when I read the statement that he did make I cannot imagine that it would be made under any other conditions than that his mind was agitated and that he was not quite normal.

> If the farmer wants a cooperative commonwealth in which everything is socialized but himself, he had better have a cooperative commonwealth of his own.

I would not make that statement unless I was somewhat agitated—offended. He went on to say:

> If the farmer is anxious to benefit from the cooperative movement he will have to come half way.

I do not know what is meant by "half way," whether he meant that the farmer should allow half of his possessions to be nationalized and the other half not, but that was the statement of the hon. gentleman, and I admire him for the ground he took; he was sincere. He was espousing principles and policies in which he believed and he wanted to stand his ground. He had said:

> If the farmer wants a cooperative commonwealth in which everything is socialized but himself, he had better have a cooperative commonwealth of his own.

He was quite right. When fate was deciding against the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, when they were losing all their elections, they had a convention in the city of Winnipeg last July, and I just want to show you, Mr. Speaker how the influence of that party has dwindled. At every convention they have a group photograph taken; it is the most important business of their convention. I have here the photograph that was taken of the group in the city of Regina. They sat there on July 19, 20 and 21, 1933. I do not know on which of these three days the photograph was taken, but it was the day on which they all looked their best. I have counted the number in the photograph and I find that there are 198, so altogether there must have been 199 persons in the group, because I know that the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) made it his boast in this house last session that he attended that conference. I cannot see his physiognomy in that group, and what happened I think was this; that when the photographer was adjusting his camera my hon. friend from Weyburn started talking about sound money and somebody sat on him. Mind you, there were 198 people present. Subsequently the party met in the city of Winnipeg on the seventeenth of July last. Of course they had their photograph taken there also, and would you believe it, Mr. Speaker, there are only eighteen in the group; the number had dwindled in one year from 198 to 18. Of course, we have to allow a certain latitude because the city of Regina is not very attractive compared with Winnipeg, and no doubt in Winnipeg some of them were out taking in the sights. But regardless of attractions in the city of Winnipeg the fact remains that in Regina in 1933 there were 198 present in the group and a year subsequently in Winnipeg there were only 18. Compare that with what took place in the Chateau Laurier on the twentieth of last month. On that evening nearly a thousand souls met to pledge their loyalty and devotion to the Liberal chief. It can easily be seen which party is in the best position to administer the affairs of this country and to satisfy all the electors. There is only one party, the Liberal party. I am not taking the present Conservative government into consideration at all because for the last two or three years the people have decided that they are out or will be out as soon as they have the opportunity to put them out.

I should like to return to a discussion of the human element to which I referred a short time ago. These people have a very human weakness, they are anxious to get into office. As I said before, the fundamental difference between the two parties is the land policy. What happened last year at Winnipeg? They came to the conclusion that they were pursuing the wrong policy and they decided whether or not that policy was in the interests of the people, they would forsake it for the time being. They decided to drop their land policy. The provincial elections which were voted upon in Saskatchewan on June 19 were fought on a platform containing a land plank, which was the chief issue. What happened at the convention when the agricultural plank was presented? This convention was held in Winnipeg last July. Mr. Hyman, a non-voting member of the convention but a member of the provincial legislature, declared that the plank, in its drafted form, was the weakest in the platform. This is the plank they had previously considered as being the strongest. He pointed out in a powerful speech that enemies of the C.C.F. had so worked on the psychology of fear of the farmers by misrepresentation that farmers were afraid of the name. Farmers as a class resisted socialization the world over to a stronger degree than any other class. Yet they wanted to nationalize the farmer. Here is the excuse this man gave, according to this article:

> The farmer's land was his most valuable possession and usually it was something he had wrested from nature and developed by the work of his own hands, and he did not want it taken away from him. The farmer feared what had happened in Russia. Mr. Hyman thought that the soviets action in dealing with agriculture had been its greatest mistake.

That was the opinion which Mr. Hyman advanced at this convention. However, the main thing to be considered by this house is the result. They all fell for this suggestion, even their leader, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He is one of the few men in Canada who I think would never veer from a policy he was pursuing once he thought it was right. However, on that particular occasion he fell and the results are accumulating upon him with astonishing rapidity. This party is losing out in every part of Canada. The convention passed a new platform eliminating the land policy, and I shall say no more about what took place at that time.

Subsequently, on December 15, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking in Reston, Manitoba. The people were not yet satisfied; they had grave doubts that if the C.C.F. party was returned to office they would nationalize the land. The hon. member is reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of December 15, as follows:

> He advocated public ownership of all utilities such as water power, railways and banks, stating that the bad feature of the new central bank is that it is privately controlled.

In that we agree. The article continues:

> He stated the aim of the C.C.F. party is to bring about the kingdom of heaven on earth while we are living,—

I concede that, as many of the C.C.F. supporters are saying that this will be a long range program, that it will take many years to be brought into being, and it is quite likely that we will have to be born again, that we will have to return to our kindred dust when we are reanimated from the tomb to find the C.C.F. at the helm of state. When questioned as to whether they would nationalize the farms, the hon. member said, "no." He made that very emphatic. I shall say no more about the C.C.F. and their platform, as I see that my time is rapidly passing and I am sure the clock is right to the minute.

This group claims that they have no connection or association with the communist party of Canada. I believe that that statement is correct, but the fact remains that this Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is the best incubator that I know of for the hatching of communist ideas. What has taken place recently? The following appeared in the Western Producer of March 21:

> Parties Agree on Joint Aims
> To work together in a campaign of public meetings on three points, the Regina C.C.F. council and the communist party have come to an agreement.

This is the official organ of the C.C.F. for the province of Saskatchewan. The article continues:

> The three aims for which the two organizations will direct their joint activities are:
> 1. For the improvement of conditions of unemployed workers on relief.
> 2. Against forced labour and disenfranchisement, or partial disenfranchisement, of workers, whether employed or unemployed.
> 3. For non-contributory unemployment insurance.

The C.C.F. and the communist party are working hand in hand in connection with three issues. When the fox once gets his nose through the net, in a very short time his whole body is through. That is just what is happening. The communist party and the C.C.F. are working hand in hand on these things and in a very short time the communist party will be in control. I give my hon. friends in the far corner this warning.

This party is preaching peace day in and day out. The other day we heard a very brilliant speech in this chamber by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). It is unfortunate that the hon. member is as old as he is, as I should like to see him one of those of whom it is said, "Millions now living will never die."

Mr. BOURASSA: That is too long.

Mr. MacMILLAN: A resolution was passed at this convention in Winnipeg in favour of peace. They said they were not going to send their sons across the Atlantic ocean to fight the battles of civilization. They said they were not going to participate in the battles of Europe regardless of what country might be involved, but listen to this report of what happened at the conference:

Willingness to leave Canada's shores to fight was expressed by E. Winch, British Columbia M.L.A., but he emphasized that it would be only to defend socialism against capitalism.

I believe the communists are getting the better of them; they are too easy going and I warn them to be careful. I would hate to see my hon. friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in the ranks of the communist party. I do not think he belongs there, as he looks more like one of those priests who used to adorn the ancient temple with the oil flowing down his beard rather than a meandering marauder with a scalping knife and a tomahawk concealed on his person. The article continues:

Everyone had a responsibility to fight when soviet Russia was threatened with attack by capitalist powers in his opinion.

That sentence is pregnant with admonition for every hon. member in this chamber. They did not repudiate that statement and there is nothing in the press to indicate that they did. If they had repudiated it I should have as much confidence in them now as I had when they came into existence in 1932.

The acting leader of the government is in the house and for his benefit and the benefit of his colleagues I will read a letter that appeared in the press a short time ago. I have a feeling that after I have read this letter the right hon. gentleman will put his hand over his intrepid heart and with all emphasis announce, "The recess is off; we will go on with the business of the house, sitting steadily until the proposed reform measures become law."

I quote the following:

Kitchener, Jan. 14.—The following business letter regarding a mortgage recently arrived at Waterloo from a southern Saskatchewan farmer:

"Received your notice calling for payment of $6,238.92. Some figures. this amount has grown from $4,000 in 1928, our last crop. This is certainly some racket. I wish I could make money as fast. Your offer of giving $2 for every dollar paid on interest arrears is a step in the right direction, but of no avail, as we have had no crop this year to pay anything, so you can put a few more figures on for next year; they look nice, anyway. You will soon have it up to $10,000 on paper and on paper it will remain unless you make a real adjustment of balance and give me a definite amount to pay, not one that grows by leaps and bounds like a baby elephant."

The writer said the original loan, when assumed by him was $6,000. He said payments made totalled $8,355.96, "and according to notice I still owe you more than I originally did. I may be dumb, but what I would like to know is, who the h— owns the place?

Many hundreds of farmers in western Canada could justifiably write letters of a similar nature. It is evident that an immediate move is urgent.

We all regret the absence of the Prime Minister from this chamber owing to illness. There is a pall hovering over the chamber and it is of as deep a hue on this side as on the other. We are all aware of the exceptional abilities of the Prime Minister; they are in evidence every day we see him at his desk. He works hard and we all recognize that his integrity is like a fixed star—the darker the night the brighter it shines. I might appropriately apply to the Prime Minister the words which Charles James Fox employed with reference to George Washington:

The breath of censure has not dared to impeach the purity of his conduct, nor the eye of envy to raise its malignant glance to the elevation of his virtues.

We sincerely hope that he will be back in this chamber in a very short time because, since his absence, the government has been like a rudderless vessel on an uncharted sea.

Now Watchman, what of the night? In a few more weeks we will be fighting the battle of democracy. We on this side of the house are of good cheer.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): I wish to support the amendment because, coming from the Pacific coast, I naturally object to the proposed adjournment; it is not convenient for the members from British Columbia. If there were to be the ordinary adjournment of two or three weeks we would not mind, but we object to an adjournment of five weeks. It takes almost a week to go and a week to return and that is too long a journey for the sake of three weeks at home. It is a hardship and I am opposed to the long adjournment.

Several members on the other side of the house have discussed the lumber situation more or less. A short time ago the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) proposed a resolution in connection with the Ottawa agreements. In this house, during the session of 1932, I spoke opposing the treaties and I gave my reasons, from the point of view of a lumber man. I have been in the lumber business all my life, and at that time I pointed out that we were making a mistake in connection with these agreements, because the lumber business in this country would be ruined. Let us see what our trade has been so far as lumber is concerned. In the nine years prior to 1932 we were importing from the United States, in round figures, $11,000,000 worth of lumber. That is just lumber, and does not include shingles or any of the products of wood. Most of that lumber was expensive hardwood for furniture, and our average of importations was $11,417,000 per annum. Those were our average imports for nine years. In the same period our exports of lumber to the United States averaged $40,665,000 per annum, so that we had an advantage of almost four to one.

In the 1932 session, on October 27, page 672 of Hansard, I gave figures showing our exports and imports, and at that time I went on record as being opposed to the Ottawa agreements for the reason that we were simply making trouble for ourselves and would lose a market that had been the backbone of the lumber business in Canada for all time. No one can deny that statement; it is absolutely true. I made that speech on October 27, 1932, and on November 15 I received a letter in which this statement appeared:

It seems to me this contains—

"This" was a copy of the speech which I sent my correspondent, asking him for his criticism.

—more information pertinent to conditions in the lumber industry than anything yet stated in the dominion house.

In 1934 I went on record again as opposed to the agreement. On May 14 last I said:

Speaking in this chamber on October 26, 1932, I made the statement that in my opinion the lumber business in Canada would not get back to anything like normal conditions until we got back into the United States market. For years the Pacific coast states have been asking for a higher rate of duty or tax on Canadian lumber going into the United States, but until 1932 they could not get Washington to act. During 1931 and 1932 a very strong lobby movement was engineered by the Pacific coast states to raise the tariff or put a tax on Canadian lumber imports into that country, and finally the argument was advanced that through her imperial conference treaties Canada was raising her tariffs against the United States, through preferences granted to other countries. Let me quote some of the statements which were made in Washington in support of the proposed increase in the tariff or tax on Canadian lumber. The Pacific coast lobbyists made a very strong move for the imposition of extra tax, or duty, whichever you choose to call it. As evidence of the points I have made I shall read from the proceedings before the Senate finance committee on the Revenue Act of 1932.

Then I went on and quoted the evidence; it is here in Hansard of May 14, 1934, and it is not necessary to repeat it. I gave the names of the senators and others who testified before the committee in Washington. That was their argument all the way through, that British Columbia was getting a preference in the United Kingdom and at the same time was doing more business with the United States than with the United Kingdom.

Prior to the enactment of this tariff or excise tax and the granting of the ten per cent preference, there was a time when more lumber was shipped from Oregon and Washington to the United Kingdom than from British Columbia. Now of course with the ten per cent preference we have been able to get practically all the lumber business of the United Kingdom formerly held by Washington and Oregon, but in the meantime we have lost the United States market. I should like to give the figures. I am sorry the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) is not in his place, because I wish to show him how careless some of these statements are. I do not altogether blame these gentlemen; I think the information they get is often incorrect. For instance I have here some information that was supplied to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) from H. R. Macmillan, one of our biggest lumber exporters in British Columbia; the picture is simply misleading, but one cannot blame the Prime Minister. I do blame Mr. Macmillan, who is supposed to be a lumberman, although he is not a practical lumberman; he is a lumber dealer. Presumably the Minister of Railways got his information from the same source. He said, speaking in this house on March 27 last as reported in Hansard at page 2158:

Then in regard to lumber may I say that I have before me a report from the British Columbia Lumberman, the official journal of the British Columbia lumber industry. This report is dated January, 1935, only a couple of months ago and from it I intend to quote only one sentence. They say:

"The exports of British Columbia lumber in 1934 easily beat all previous years with a total of 860,000,000 feet board measure."

That included not only exports to the United Kingdom but all exports. It continues:

"Note how gains in empire trade have more than compensated for the loss of the United States waterborne trade. More lumber was exported to the United Kingdom alone last year than was ever shipped by water to the United States of America in any twelve monthly period."

Now, Mr. Speaker, any lumberman or any boy who knows anything about lumber knows that practically all our shipments to the United States go by rail. What lumber would go to the United States by water from Canada? It would not be shipped from Ottawa or Montreal by water. At least ninety per cent goes by rail, so that that statement is very misleading. I have here the figures of shipments from British Columbia. I have heard so much of the all time record of lumber shipments from British Columbia. It is true we have been getting some business, and we are very glad to have it; if we had not had the United Kingdom business things would have been worse, but they have been bad enough. If you speak to any lumberman out there he will tell you: We are doing a little business but we are not making any profit. That is absolutely true. The reason we have been able to get the business as against the United States is the ten per cent preference; I grant that. As to the reason why there was a little more business than usual, you will remember that two or three years ago in Great Britain they started a building program to the amount of £50,000,000, but that money is nearly all spent now, and we shall be lucky if our shipments hold up to the average of the last two years, unless they go along and spend another £50,000,000. We are extending our markets in some other directions, but not to any great extent as compared with former years. For instance in 1929 the total shipments to empire markets, which includes the United Kingdom, amounted to 160,000,000 board feet. For the following year the shipments in round figures were:

	Board feet
1930	171,000,000
1931	162,000,000
1932	251,000,000
1933	428,000,000
1934	633,000,000

Of the latter figure, 455,000,000 went to the United Kingdom. That year is an all time record. But the United States shipments have practically disappeared. In 1929 they were 654,000,000, a little more than our total exports to the whole British empire during 1934. Then they dropped, as shown by the following figures:

	Board feet
1930	579,000,000
1931	308,000,000
1932	101,000,000
1933	25,000,000

I have not the amount for 1934, but I imagine it will be much less than even 25,000,000. So while we did get some more business from the British empire, we have lost our American business.

[Mr. Munn.]

Here are the facts in a nutshell. The average price received in British Columbia for lumber during 1929 was $18.50 per thousand feet, loaded on cars or ships. In 1934 it was $13.50, or $5 per thousand feet less. Then as to quantity, this is the picture: the production in 1934 was 52 per cent of the amount we produced in 1929. Yet they tell us that the lumber business in British Columbia is flourishing. I think that is all I have to say about the lumber situation.

We not only suffered in lumber, but the copper industry suffered. We were led to hope that there would be a preference given on copper. We have an extensive copper mining industry in British Columbia and it has certainly had a hard time. The Ottawa agreements gave no relief whatever; on the contrary I think they worked against it.

I am glad to see that the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs (Mr. Murphy) is in his seat, because I want to say a few words on behalf of the Indians in Canada, and I hope the minister is listening. There are several Indian reserves in my riding, and I should like the job of straightening out the Indian agents who are supposed to be looking after those Indians. A few years ago at Alert Bay there was an Indian agent named Halliday. He lived very close to the settlement, and was a wonderful success as an Indian agent. A short time ago he was superannuated, and I regret to say there are very few Indian agents in British Columbia in his class. I know several of these agents; they are well paid for their work, but they are not doing it. Instead of getting around, helping and encouraging these poor Indians and setting them some kind of an example, they pay no attention to them whatever. I know whereof I speak, and I think the carelessness of the Indian agents in connection with the administration of Indian affairs in this country is nothing but a crime. I think every one of these men should be fired. Those who are competent and capable of doing the work could be put back on the job, but many of them should lose their jobs at once. The minister has paid no attention to what I have said, but perhaps he will read my remarks in Hansard.

Mr. MURPHY: I beg the hon. member's pardon; I heard every word he said.

Mr. MUNN: I am very glad the minister was interested enough to listen, because I know whereof I speak. There is an Indian reservation at Pemberton. Those Indians have a very fine tract of land; all they need is a little encouragement and cooperation, but the agent very seldom goes there himself. He sends some understrapper who lords it over these poor fellows so they get no satisfaction whatever. This is a serious matter and I think something should be done to straighten it out, perhaps not in connection with the Indian department itself but in connection with the treatment of the Indians. They are entitled to fair, human treatment which they are not getting so far as my riding is concerned. Close to Vancouver we have what is known as the Squamish valley, in connection with which I have had considerable correspondence with the department, since there is quite a large Indian reserve there. I wrote the minister from Vancouver on July 25 last. I am sorry to have to put this on Hansard, but really there is only one way to do business and that is along business lines. I wrote as follows:

For your information I am enclosing a reference to the Squamish river published in the Vancouver Daily Province on the 25th instant.

I happened to be at Squamish a few days ago and went to the trouble of looking over the flood situation at that point and I have come to this conclusion, that your Indian agent is neglecting his duty. There is a lot of land in the Squamish Indian reserve being washed away, and in order to correct the situation it would only cost possibly at the outside $1,000.

Unless something is done to protect the river bank there is liable to be serious damage and my private opinion is that you should instruct your agent in charge of that reserve that you have a report with a view to protecting not only the Indian reserve land but the other lands tributary. This is really serious and should have prompt attention.

The minister acknowledged receipt of my letter on July 31, saying he had asked for a report. Then I heard nothing further until February of this year, when I wrote the minister as follows:

In July, 1934, I wrote you from Vancouver pointing out a very serious flood situation at the above mentioned river in British Columbia. At that time you acknowledged receipt of my letter and stated that you would have the Indian agent secure a report for you and when it was received you would write me again. To date I have heard no further word from you.

At that time I did not get my information in regard to conditions sitting in an arm chair in some sort of office or at some hotel. I put on old clothes and a pair of rubber boots and walked miles to personally acquaint myself with conditions and decide what should be done. I have been associated with woods operations in connection with lumber all my life, and naturally have had some experience in the handling of water in rivers.

I may say that one poor fellow lost his land and his house, and when I was there last July all he had left was the garden gate and a little piece of fence in front of his farm. To-day there is a very serious situation at that point; the property not only of the Indians but of other persons as well is being washed away, and the river is running wild. One poor fellow sends me a letter in which he complains that his fruit trees and even his poor old horse and buggy have been washed down stream. No one paid any attention; no one tried to help him out. There is a real danger at that point, where there are two rivers and the soil is very light. There is a town of perhaps five hundred people at that point, and there is danger that some day that river will take the whole town into the ocean. A very small expenditure for river bank protection would remove any possibility of danger of that kind. I do not entirely blame the Indian department, but in cooperation with the provincial government and the Pacific Great Eastern railway I believe they should do something to protect both the Indians and the white people living in the Squamish valley.

I do not want to take up too much time, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to say a word with regard to tariffs. We have heard a good deal with regard to high tariffs and low tariffs. It is no wonder that we in the west are against high tariffs because we suffer and pay because of them. I have a statement here which appeared in the Financial Post of September 1, 1934, showing the net cost and the net loss or gain from the tariff, as follows:

	Benefit from tariff	Cost of tariff	Net loss or gain	Net L or G per capita
	$	$	$	$
Prince Edward Island	467,992	2,042,150	L 1,574,158	L 17.88
Nova Scotia	9,488,493	15,784,123	L 6,296,631	L 12.28
New Brunswick	8,126,059	12,891,077	L 4,765,118	L 11.67
Quebec	132,867,447	101,171,562	G 31,695,885	G 11.03
Ontario	220,722,484	168,732,723	G 51,989,761	G 15.15
Manitoba	19,910,971	29,185,740	L 9,274,769	L 13.25
Saskatchewan	3,274,950	29,228,285	L 25,952,335	L 28.16
Alberta	8,211,148	27,909,396	L 19,698,249	L 26.93
British Columbia	22,378,571	37,737,247	L 15,358,676	L 22.33
	425,448,115	424,880,384

I shall not take up further the time of the house.

Now that the Prime Minister is on the way to recovery I sincerely trust his improvement will continue, that he will be able to attend the jubilee celebrations and return in fit physical condition to continue with the business of the house. Before taking my seat I would urge that instead of asking for an adjournment of five weeks the time be shortened to three weeks; surely that would be sufficient. Three weeks' time should be long enough, and at the end of that time we could proceed with the remainder of the work of the session and then return to our homes where we could do some real work.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, by their latest action the government are running true to form, because ever since they have been in office they have run contrary to public opinion. I am satisfied public opinion throughout the country is not favourable to a long adjournment which is asked for no apparent reason. Some excuses have been given, but that is all. The Canadian people want an election, and surely in the face of what has been said in this chamber, and particularly after the observations of the new members who only in the last few months have come from their constituencies, the government will realize that an election should be called. I believe the results in those by-elections furnish sufficient evidence that the government has lost favour with the people and as soon as possible should appeal to them.

Hon. members on this side of the house are at a loss to understand why the government cannot realize the fact that they have been a dismal failure. The budget brought down only a short time ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), which indicated that in the four and a half years this government has been in power the national debt has been increased by $669,900,000, should be sufficient proof of the fact that this government has not functioned properly. In reality, from the time the present government took office until this date, the national debt has been increased by over $800,000,000. Do hon. members realize what that means? It means that in each and every year hon. members opposite have held power we have added about $160,000,000 to our national debt. The people are asking, "How long can we keep up? How long can we continue to borrow money to pay interest on our debts? How long can we continue to pile on more debts?"

But this is not all. In addition to increased debts we find that in every possible way taxes have been increased. Since taking office the present government have increased the sales tax from one per cent to six per cent; they imposed an import tax of three per cent on all commodities entering the country, and they imposed a sugar tax of two cents per pound, which was later reduced to one cent per pound. A return tabled in this chamber about a week ago indicated that increased taxation since this government took office had brought in the following revenues:

Increased tax against tea, 1931..	$5,658,181
Increase to newspaper postage.. ..	952,251
One per cent tax on net premiums received by insurance companies	2,273,034
Automobiles..	537,128
Oranges..	4,874,138
Canned fruits..	1,083,195
Canned vegetables..	293,342
Hops..	562,193
Seeds..	878,189
Cheques..	906,405
Telegrams and long distance telephone calls..	2,737,810
Railway sleepers..	1,129,017

In addition to these increases in the national debt we have taken from the pockets of our people by taxation the sums I have indicated. I have not the figures showing the amounts received from the sugar tax, the sales tax, the import tax and several others which were imposed.

Let us contrast these conditions with those obtaining under the Liberal regime prior to 1930. In each year for a period of seven years the Liberal party brought about a reduction in the national debt and a reduction in taxation. These facts have been set forth earlier to-day, and for that reason I shall not dwell upon them at this time. One remarkable fact so far as I am concerned is that despite the fact we are plunging into bankruptcy—and I use the word "bankruptcy" advisedly because undoubtedly we will reach that point if we keep up the present pace much longer—we find that the present government is from year to year increasing salaries and pensions.

On March 6 last a question standing in my name was passed as an order for return. On that occasion I asked how many appointments had been made by the civil service commission or by the government since July, 1930, at salaries of $5,000 or over. I asked for the names of those appointees and the positions they occupied. I asked, further, for the names of all civil servants and government employees outside of the civil service who had been given increases of salaries of $500 or more since July, 1930. This afternoon, when making an inquiry for the return, I was astonished by the statement of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) to the effect that the answer was very voluminous and that some time would be required before the information could be brought down. I want the house to understand that the order was passed on March 6, and that we have now reached the 9th day of April. If in five weeks the government cannot bring down a return showing the number of names of certain employees I would say the number must be very extensive. I cannot understand why a period of five weeks should be required unless the number is such that it should be revealed to this chamber and to the country.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the hon. member permit me to make a statement? The preparation of his return entails the searching of many documents. Many other returns are equally voluminous. All I can say is that we have not the assistants necessary to prepare all these voluminous returns in a week or ten days.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): If it is so voluminous, that is all the more reason the government should resign, and not drive us into bankruptcy by employing so many additional employees at salaries of $5,000 or over.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not a fair criticism.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: In order to obtain the information required, a search of fifty or sixty thousand names is necessary.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): You had five weeks to do it, and yet to-day you say it cannot be presented for some time.

Just while I am on that question of salaries, permit me to say that speaking in this house on February 26 last I made mention of the question of salaries and pensions. One of the local papers in the city of Ottawa rather took exception to what I stated then, and attempted to show that I was talking about the civil service superannuation fund. I made no reference whatever, Mr. Speaker, to the superannuation fund, and I do not think we need raise any objection to that because the civil servants pay for their superannuation themselves, and they are entitled to it. Nor did I make any reference to soldiers' pensions. But I did refer to certain other pensions, and I would ask the members of the government to turn to page 22 of the estimates of this year and state whether or not they think that the list of pensions provided in the bottom half of page 22 and on all of page 23, amounting to something over $300,000 a year in payment of pensions to ex-judges, is really justified under conditions as they exist in Canada at the present time. The number increases year by year. These pensions run, very many of them, from five, six and seven thousand dollars to as much as twelve thousand dollars a year. I do object to pensions of that kind, and that is what I was referring to. These judges do not pay one dollar while in office to help pay for the pensions which they draw.

There is another thing. This government employs officials, such as the members of the tariff board, at exorbitant salaries, and after they have served a certain number of years they draw pension equal to half of their salary. One of my colleagues mentioned last night the salaries paid to the men in charge of the Bank of Canada. The governor of that bank I believe draws a salary of $30,000, his assistant $20,000, and another assistant $10,000, while the men who do the work are probably drawing from $1,200 to $3,000. That is the thing I object to, and I say that sooner or later this country must come to grips with that problem. This country cannot afford to go on paying pensions at exorbitant rates without receiving something by way of compensation for the donors. It will have to stop.

It is unfair in another respect. In the constituency that I represent in this house there are some ten or twelve lawyers living in the little towns and villages, maintaining an office and employing probably at least one stenographer at least a part of the time, paying their taxes, and doing their duty to the community as they should. Those men, in spite of the fact that they are maintaining an office and giving part time employment at least to one employee, would be pleased indeed if they thought they had $100 a month to themselves. I believe there are plenty who do not make that. Then why in the name of heaven should we pay a pension five or six times the amount that these men could earn if they were out in private practice, and give it to them for nothing whatever? It seems to me that if the country were seized of what is going on in that respect they would not stand for it any longer. I intend as long as I can to raise my voice in this house in protest against these pensions.

I do not think that the members of our tariff board, who are engaged at enormous salaries, the chairman at $15,000, and the other two members of the board at $10,000 each—they have nothing to do; they are afraid to do anything; the only one judgment they handed down that would be of any benefit was appealed by the government and the decision of the board reversed, so they are there for nothing—I do not think they should, after they have served a few years, draw half their salary by way of pension without paying anything towards any pension fund. A few years ago a Liberal government established an annuities branch in the city of Ottawa, and I believe it is a very fine thing. It seems to me that these men who are drawing such enormous salaries should be able to buy their own pensions. By the payment of a few dollars they could provide a pension for themselves, and surely a man who is drawing from eight to thirty thousand dollars a year should be able to pay a few dollars into a pension fund in order to be able to provide a pension for himself.

It is also very unfair to the people who are paying the taxes of this country. I come from a part of the country where there is real hardship. I had a letter today from a lady in one of the towns of my constituency, who said that through the past winter she was drawing $9.50 a month for some work she was doing, taking care of a building in the town, and with that $9.50 a month she kept five of a family off relief. Now when people are existing under such conditions as these, why should they be called upon to pay a cent a pound on all the sugar they consume? Why should they have to pay these high taxes on tea and other necessaries in order to provide pensions of five and six and eight and ten thousand dollars a year to men who neither paid for not earned them? I say that it is very unfair indeed. This government of course will say: Oh, well, that has been going on for years, and it is not only this government that is doing it but other governments have done it as well. I realize that that is true, but conditions at the present time are such that we must not continue to do it any longer.

During the recent budget debate, supporters of the government in their speeches endeavoured in the first place to lay the blame for the loss of trade since 1930 on the previous government. Let us see to what extent that is true. I have here a statement of the trade of Canada with all countries by fiscal years, and I find that in the year 1930 our imports amounted to $1,248,273,000, and our exports in the same year amounted to $1,144,938,000. In 1934 our imports had fallen to $433,776,000, and our exports had fallen to $585,680,000. When this government came into power our total trade was almost two and a half billion dollars. Now it has fallen below one billion dollars, but this government will try to prove that business had fallen off before they came into power.

Another thing which this government always stresses is that there was a favourable balance of trade of some $115,000,000 during the past year. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think possibly one of the reasons why our imports have fallen down to $433,776,000 is because of the action which this government took in raising the tariff as they did, which prevented goods from entering this country in the first place; and a second reason for the fall in imports is that our working men and our farmers have no income with which to buy the goods even if they were imported. That is why imports fell off to the extent they did. A favourable balance of trade does not mean very much. I would rather have the volume of trade as it was in 1930.

Certain hon. members have made the statement from time to time that Canada has come through the depression better than other countries. I would like that to be true, but when we consider how business has fallen away during the last five years, how revenues have decreased, how debts have increased and how everything possible to be taxed is taxed, how can we say that this country has come through the depression? A week or so ago there appeared in Ottawa a delegation of mayors from cities all the way from Halifax to Vancouver. I should like to repeat some of the statements made at their meetings, which I think are conclusive proof that we are far from being through this depression. It was stated that unemployment relief constitutes a national emergency. It was said that the municipalities are facing bankruptcy and that the country was in the direst distress. These mayors are close to the people and these are some of the expressions which were made at their meetings. They claimed that the depression is not less than it was, it is greater. For the first time the actual facts are now available to hon. memers. We were told that there would be no want in Canada, but there is want. These men were talking about the conditions in the cities, but how much worse it must be in the rural areas. I do not think the government of the day has kept its finger upon the pulse of public opinion, especially when such statements as these are made. If this government puts its program into effect and appoints many more boards we will be into bankruptcy much sooner than anticipated.

What does the government expect that people who have not worked eight hours in any day for the last four or five years will think of legislation for an eight hour day or forty-eight hour week? This matter took up considerable time a few weeks ago, but in my opinion the time is not opportune for such legislation. It might be all right if things were normal, but they are not. What does a man who has no work care about minimum wages or maximum hours? All he wants is some work and he is not particular as to the number of hours. I do not think there is much need of this legislation at the present time. I expressed my opinion of the unemployment insurance measure when it was before the house earlier in the session. I do not think the government expects that this legislation will be ever put into force, and it will be a good thing for the country if it is not. The Prime Minister has told us that the cost will be between $6,500,000 and $7,000,000 per year.

One measure was passed by this house which I believe will prove to be of some benefit to the community I represent. I refer to the amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act. What is going to happen to this legislation? It passed this house over a month ago but it has not passed the senate. Is this house to adjourn for five or six weeks without this legislation receiving royal assent? I receive letters almost every day asking for information in connection with this act. People want to know when they will be able to get money under the provisions of this measure, but I have to tell them that for some reason this bill has not passed through the senate. Perhaps the government could throw some light on the rumour going about to the effect that there is to be no money made available for the dried out areas of southern Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba.

The government has given as a reason for a five or six week's adjournment that they must prepare legislation made necessary by the report of the price spreads commission. I contend that the government knows at this minute—if it does not know it can find out by inquiring from any daily newspaper in the country—what the legislation is going to be. It is intended that four or five boards will be appointed, and that is all that is to be done. Why not go ahead with the appointment of these boards and let us finish the work of the session and go home to hold an election? That is what the people want.

In conclusion I should like to put on record the particulars in connection with some tariff items which are of considerable concern to the farming communities of this country. I should like to show what has been done in the way of increases in the tariff on agricultural implements. This is a very perplexing question and it will become more so as the years go by. If we have a few crops in the west we will be needing new machinery. Very little machinery has been bought during the last few years and the people have not felt the effect of these higher tariffs on agricultural implements. Some hon. members opposite, particularly those from western Canada, endeavoured to show that there is no difference between the two parties when it comes to tariff matters.

The following table shows the duty which prevailed in 1930 against different agricultural implements and that which was put into force by the present government:

Article—	1930 Per cent	1930-35 Per cent
Mowers, binders, reapers, combines	6	25
Cultivators, harrows, seed drills, et cetera	7½	25
Field growers, fodder and feed cutters	10	25
Hay loaders, tedders, grain crushers, post hole diggers, et cetera	10	25
Incubator brooders	10	25
Threshing machine separators, fanning mills, farm wagons, sleds	10	25
Barbed wire	free	10
Cream separators	free	25
Windmills	17½	25

There are several other items I could mention but these are the ones in which the farmers are particularly concerned. I think this government should consider reducing these items before the farmers will be requiring new machinery. This could be done after we come back from the Easter recess, provided the government still insists on the long recess.

I think this government should also do something about the pensions being paid and for which no contribution is made by the persons receiving them. That is a very sore spot, and I think it is a good thing for governments that the people of the country generally do not know how much is being paid out in this way. It is simply ridiculous and I hope the government will see their way clear to do something about it.

For these reasons I am opposed to a long adjournment. I do not think there is any necessity for a long adjournment to prepare the legislation that will come out of the price spreads investigation. The government must be pretty well assured of what it will do in that regard, and there is little else to detain us here. I submit that we should adjourn for not more than two weeks and come back so that we may conclude the business of the session and allow the people to decide who shall govern the country for the next five years.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): We have just listened to the twenty-first speech made by hon. gentlemen opposite on this great question of national importance as to whether we ought to adjourn for three or four weeks instead of one or two. Everyone understands that a motion of the kind that has been proposed, which is tantamount to a motion of non-confidence, cannot be moved unless the member who wishes to exercise the immemorial right of putting forward grievances before supply has some question of national importance which he intends to discuss. What is that question? I gave a summary of it a moment ago when I said that the only question at issue was whether or not it was wise or advisable to adjourn the house for four weeks instead of two weeks. But this is not the real grievance; it is rather an imaginary one, because there is no motion before the house for adjournment. It is true that the acting leader of the government (Sir George Perley) a few days ago stated that in a week or so a minister of the crown might move for an adjournment, but that motion has not yet been made; therefore I humbly submit that the whole discussion is based on a wrong principle and the procedure is unsound. However, we are living in a world of surprises and we must not be too scrupulous in regard to the procedure to be followed.

We remember that a week ago the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) asked leave of the house to discuss a question which was really a matter of great national importance—the menace of war which is beclouding every issue in Europe, and the probability of Canada becoming entangled in a European conflict. The house was ready to hear the hon. gentleman and everyone agreed unanimously to the principle of his motion. But if we carefully examine each of the twenty-one speeches that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite we find that the grievances they urge are rather curious. I have made a note of some of the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite and I observe for instance that my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) discussed for about twenty minutes the great qualities of the secretary of the commission that investigated mass buying and price spreads, Mr. Pearson. Surely my hon. friend would not contend that this is a grievance. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) discussed the question of by-elections, and like his colleague the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) he boasted that the opposition had feathers in its cap from two by-elections. Surely this is not a grievance which must be urged before supply. We have heard also the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), who spoke with eloquence and talent with regard to by-elections, enumerating the number of Conservative gentlemen who had spoken in the ridings they represent. Surely that is not a grievance to be urged before supply. All these speeches were made on the same line, but they are not real grievances of such a kind that we must stop voting the money that is needed for administration. These speeches are merely a litany of hotchpotch arguments of no serious importance. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to meditate on a certain article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on July 28, 1933, in which the eminent journalist who wrote this article said:

> Nothing has been more pathetic in Canada in Canadian politics since 1930 than the failure of Liberals in parliament to advance any effective alternative to the government's policy.

We can understand why hon. gentlemen make their budget speeches in this roundabout way. Yesterday the hon. member for Quebec East said that the Liberals this year had spoken only one hour and twenty minutes on the budget, and he was right in that statement. The budget was so good that the Liberals, who are prone to criticize anything coming from this side of the house, deemed it wise to discuss it only one hour and twenty minutes, but now they regret that decision and have made twenty-one speeches on the question now under consideration—speeches which are absolutely out of order but which suit their purposes.

I quote again from the editorial of the Ottawa Citizen of July 28, 1933:

> The self-satisfied ignorance of Liberals on other issues than tariff in world politics, as on the collapse of international finance, the progressive departure of nations from the gold standard, the revolutionary experience in national planning, particularly in Russia and the United States of America, has come more to turn young people from the Liberal party into the lines of the C.C.F. than anything else.

Hon. gentlemen all conclude their speeches by praying that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) may be restored to health so that he may come back to the house. Are they sincere, when their friends and lieutenants out of the house say that the right hon. gentleman is so ill that he will never come back? But since they are so well disposed to hear compliments about my leader may

I quote what the Ottawa Citizen said on May 20, 1933?

However strongly an opponent may disagree with Premier Bennett on vital issues of policy —and there has been no fundamental challenge to the government this session on national policy—no one can fairly charge that personal ambition has been an actuating motive. It would rather be fair to acknowledge that Premier Bennett has retained the confidence of the Canadian people, under the devastating collapse of almost everything else in politics during the last three years, largely because he has demonstrated beyond dispute that he is prepared to sacrifice himself to Canada. No public man——has shown greater courage in adversity; no political leader has shown himself more ready to put national interests above party or personal interests.

This is what the Ottawa Citizen says—a very important Liberal paper.

May I humbly urge my good friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain), who has to do with publicity for the Liberal party, to publish some extracts from that article that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen.

Now when we analyze the speeches of our hon. friends opposite we are surprised at their arguments. Of course I am not presumptuous enough to profess to be able to analyze everything they said, but there are a few observations I should like to make, especially with regard to the speech made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard) this afternoon. He dwelt mainly on a petition which was circulated in the rural districts, which had something to do with setting the price of butter, eggs and other agricultural products. This petition dealt also with the advisability of voting a premium on the export of butter, eggs, cheese and similar commodities. I should like to show that hon. gentlemen opposite have not always been unanimous on the question of bonusing rural products and even paying a premium on their export. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1932 a very interesting debate took place in this house on a motion proposed by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw). He moved a resolution on the sugar beet industry, as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should in cooperation with the sugar factories encourage in every reasonable way the use of sugar made from home grown raw material.

And the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart), who as you know is an expert on the sugar beet industry, added an amendment asking the house to refer that motion to the committee on agriculture. I had the honour of speaking to that motion, and I profited by the opportunity to draw the attention of the house to the very important industry which flourishes in the province of Quebec, the maple sugar industry. I suggested that the hon. member for Medicine Hat should add to his motion the following words:

and encourage the production and extension of the maple sugar industry in Canada.

What was the stand taken on that by hon. gentlemen opposite? Only two spoke on it, the former member for West Elgin, now the Premier of Ontario, Mr. Hepburn, and the hon member for Prince (Mr. MacLean). Mr. Hepburn was a strong opponent of bonusing the sugar beet industry, and the present Deputy Speaker of the house (Mr. Morand) interrupted and asked him the following question:

Mr. Morand: After listening to the hon. gentleman's speech I would ask him: Is he in favour of helping the sugar industry?

Mr. Hepburn: I am opposing the motion and the amendment thereto, absolutely.

The hon. member for Prince was also emphatic in his opposition to the policy of bonusing rural products. What has taken place since? In my remarks on that occasion I urged the government to do something for the maple sugar industry, and you may be surprised to learn that Le Soleil, the great Liberal organ of Quebec, attacked me for having dared to move in the house that some bonus be given to the maple sugar industry. I have here an extract from what was published in that paper on Monday, October 28, 1932. I shall read the article in French and translate it afterwards:

Dès que les Américains vont entendre parler de cela, ils vont remonter leur tarif au niveau où il était avant que M. Vaillancourt nous obtienne les concessions qu'il nous obtenait l'an dernier. C'est d'ailleurs le résultat qu'on obtient avec tous ces bonis du Gouvernement. Les acheteurs étrangers en prennent occasion pour augmenter leur tarif contre nos produits. Le résultat est donc au désavantage des cultivateurs.

I should like to add a few words to explain the argument made by the writer of that article. The article said that Mr. Gagnon, the member for Dorchester in the House of Commons, and other members, have recommended that a bonus be given to the sugar beet industry or the maple sugar industry. Le Soleil said: This principle is wrong, because Mr. Vaillancourt; who in Quebec is the head of the cooperative maple sugar producers, has met with serious obstacles in the United States because it was shown before the American congress that the Quebec government was helping the sugar industry, and when the Americans knew that, they raised their tariff on sugar; therefore, the writer added, Mr. Vaillancourt was obliged to go to the United States and make representations to show that the farmers ought to be helped. This is why the writer in Le Soleil added the words I have just quoted a moment ago, and which I am going to translate into English:

As soon as the Americans hear about that they will raise their tariff to the level where it was when Mr. Vaillancourt obtained the concessions which he secured last year. Futhermore it is the usual result that we get when with all these subsidies supplied by the government to purchasers from abroad the producers from abroad take advantage of that to raise their tariffs against our products. Therefore it follows that the result is disastrous to the farmers.

I was blamed, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house were blamed by Le Soleil, the Liberal organ of Quebec, because we had advocated the giving of a bonus to the maple sugar industry. But now the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is having petitions circulated in our counties asking this government to give a bonus on butter, cheese and eggs. When I received that petition I was rather curious to find out if the great union of farmers of Quebec, which has more than ten thousand members, had approved of that step, so I wrote to the secretary and I shall read to you the letter which I received:

L'Union catholique des cultivateurs de la province de Québec, Inc.
Head office and general secretary's office:
5505 St. Lawrence Boulevard
Montreal, February 19, 1935.

Mr. Onésime Gagnon,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

I made an inquiry about the petition you are mentioning in your letter. Some farmers had started preparing a petition to be sent to Mr. Taschereau. Mr. Wilfrid Girouard, member for Drummond-Arthabaska, told them: You should rather send a petition to Mr. Bennett requesting him to raise the price of farm products. He gave $15 out of his own pocket or from the party funds to pay for the printing of that petition. The U.C.C. has nothing to do with it. We know that the price of butter and specially the price of cheese depends on the world market which in turn depends on supply and demand.

The best method to secure a fair return for farm products would be to organize their marketing through the Marketing Board. But the very people who are asking Mr. Bennett to fix the price of farm products on the world market refuse to avail themselves of the Marketing Board.

Believe me, hon. Sir,
Yours very truly,
Albert Rioux,
President.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, this gentleman is right. He says that the farmers of Quebec ought to take advantage of the Natural Products Marketing Act which was passed by this government last year. Everyone in this house and in Quebec knows that at first Mr. Taschereau was opposed to the marketing act but the pressure of public opinion was so strong that a few days ago we heard that Mr. Godbout, the provincial minister of agriculture, had consented that the producers of potatoes in Quebec should come under the eastern potato marketing scheme. I have here a letter which was sent to me by Mr. L. S. Burrows, the chairman of the eastern Canada potato marketing scheme. I think it is worth while to put it on Hansard:

Following your request for information regarding the comparative prices being paid for potatoes to the farmers in the area under the regulation of this board, that is Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, on January 31, 1935, and February 28, 1935, I wired to our various offices and secured the following information:

Ontario—
(Per 90-lb. bag)	Jan. 31	Feb. 28
Orangeville	17c.	35c.–40c.
Alliston	15c.	35c.
Uxbridge	15c.–17c.	35c.–40c.
New Brunswick—
(Per 165 lbs.)
Woodstock	17c.–20c.	40c.
Hartland	17c.–20c.	45c.
Perth	17c.–20c.	35c.–40c.
Grand Falls	17c.–20c.	40c.–45c.
Prince Edward Island—
(Per bushel)
Four largest dealers report paying	8c.–10c.	13c.–14c.
Nova Scotia—
Barrels for export (including the barrels)	75c.	$1 00
90-lb bags	22c.	30c.

Mr. Burrows adds:

The eastern Canada potato marketing board while authorized on January 18, 1935, did not begin active operation until February 1st. I think you will agree directly due to the operations of this board the price which the farmer is receiving for his potatoes is showing a very strong increase.

I am also glad to advise you that the movement has remained normal in spite of the materially increased price.

These figures show in a very convincing manner that the farmers of the province of Quebec ought to follow the example of the farmers of other provinces and enjoy the benefits of the provisions of the marketing act. I think the provincial minister of agriculture was well advised to encourage this eastern Canada potato marketing board. I heard today also that the jam manufacturers of Quebec have decided to join the producers in Ontario and come under the provisions of the marketing act. If the butter and egg producers decide to do likewise, they will certainly derive great benefits which will be extremely advantageous to them.

Before taking my seat I should like to dwell for a moment on a subject raised by my hon. friend from Quebec East. As one of the subjects which he thought should be discussed before going into committee, he raised the famous question of decorations, honours and titles in Canada. I was really amazed to hear the hon. gentleman raise that question a second time, because everyone knows that in the province of Quebec there is an annual shower of decorations on the members of the Liberal party. Therefore, I am at a loss to understand why my hon. friend from Quebec East, who is one of the leaders of his party, should be scandalized if the King of England deems it wise to grant decorations to English speaking people in Canada. In the province of Quebec almost every Liberal provincial minister and deputy minister has received decorations from the republic of France, the King of Belgium and His Holiness the Pope. I have no objection to that; on the contrary, I am very happy that hon. gentlemen opposite may have done something to entitle them to decorations, but I would ask them to be more consistent and not to vote against decorations in this house while they are pleased to have their friends in Quebec benefit by this shower of decorations to which I referred a moment ago.

The hon. member referred to the Nickle resolution of 1918 with respect to titles. It is true that the hon. member for Quebec East supported that resolution, but every child who has begun the study of constitutional law recognizes that a mere resolution voted by only one house cannot bind parliament. This resolution never received the support of the Senate or the governor general, and, therefore, it never bound parliament. But why did my hon. friend support the Nickle resolution while at the same time he approved of that shower of decorations falling from the republic of France on the provincial ministers of Quebec, and even on some hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side of this house? I may say frankly that when the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) moved a resolution against titles, I was scandalized to see the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) rise in his place and vote against honours and decorations in this country. That hon. gentleman wears in his buttonhole the rosette of the Legion of Honour, which has been awarded to him, quite properly, by the republic of France. Why should he vote against decorations? Why should he seek to prevent Englishmen from receiving decorations from the King of England when hon. gentlemen opposite are so alluring to the government of France that they receive decorations by the tens and hundreds in a year?

The hon. member for Quebec East said that the practice of giving decorations was obnoxious and abhorrent to the people of Canada. I was surprised to learn that this practice was abhorrent to the Premier of Quebec, who has received at least five or six decorations from foreign countries and who, just this year, received the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, for which I am pleased to congratulate him. Just to show how easy it is for gentlemen to get decorations in Quebec, there is a Liberal chief in that province who is a bailiff of the superior court. He has received five decorations, one from the King of Belgium, one from the republic of Argentina, of which he has been consul, one from the republic of France, one from His Holiness the Pope and one from the King of Montenegro, because several years ago he was consul for that country also. When hon. gentlemen opposite are so enraptured with these much coveted decorations why should they object to gentlemen in other provinces receiving decorations which are merely a recognition of the services they have rendered their king and country? I think hon. members opposite from the province of Quebec ought to be ashamed of themselves for being so inconsistent in regard to this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GAGNON: They will probably ask for a decoration for keeping order in the house.

The hon. member for Quebec East has also proposed that a referendum should be taken on this question of titles. If we are to have a referendum on every secondary question that may be raised, where should we stop? Why should we not have a referendum on the advisability of removing the tax on liquor or on the advisability of awarding the title of king's counsel? Where should we stop? Why should not hon. members opposite move for a referendum asking the people what they think of the policy initiated by Mr. Hepburn within the last few days which will cause the bondholders of the province of Quebec to lose $40,000,000, according to what Mr. Taschereau said at Quebec just last week? Hon. gentlemen opposite ought not to be so insistent on referendums. By breaking the pledges they made in 1919; by their utter disregard of principles; by their obnoxious and unscrupulous methods; by their utter disregard of ethics and conventions they have corrupted the wells of public opinion.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, because I understand that a vote is to be taken in a few moments, may I say that I am not afraid to place myself on record as being in favour of decorations. That is not because I expect to get one; in the province of Quebec no Conservative would dare hope for a decoration of this kind, but I am in favour of the principle. I think if hon. gentlemen opposite are so keen on receiving decorations from foreign countries they should not try to prevent Conservatives or even Liberals in other provinces from receiving decorations from their king. The motion of the hon. member for Quebec East is not serious; it is not declarative of any principle; it is merely a motion to delay the work of this house, and therefore I will vote against it.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, before taking the vote I should like to say only a few words on the debate generally and to refer briefly to some of the remarks we have just heard. The first observation of the hon. member who immediately preceded me (Mr. Gagnon) was to the effect that we have not a real grievance, that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) did not express a grievance and therefore should not have been moved. I will say that if we were dealing with a motion for adjournment the objection taken by the hon. member might have some weight. May I point out, however, that the real grievance lies not so much in the proposal of the government to adjourn the house for an extended period as in the fact that the adjournment is merely adding to a sequence of political acts through which this government month after month has been delaying what the public has demanded, namely a general election.

If the government had followed tradition the results would have been suicidal, I admit, but we would have had elections last fall. But instead of having the elections, the government, realizing it did not have a ghost of a chance to survive public opinion, made an heroic but futile effort to divert the attention of the Canadian electors to the program of reform that came into existence with the new year and was diffused throughout the country through the medium of radio speeches. Instead of appealing to the country on its record of four and a half years, a procedure which would have been according to tradition, we were confronted with a new program backed by practically a new government. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) put it at the time, we were to become the Conservative party and they were the new Liberal party with the new program of reform.

Parliament met, and it was quite evident that had we opposed the reform program we would have been branded immediately as a reactionary party and one opposed to all progress. Immediately upon the commencement of the session we did everything by omission and commission to assist the government in putting through the reform program as quickly as possible. However we were confronted with delays—this bill would not be ready; that bill would not be ready; that resolution was not ready; this resolution was not ready; that minister was not feeling well on a particular day and would not be able to introduce his measure; this minister was not feeling well, and so on—and from week to week we have been waiting. Then came the budget, when we witnessed the extraordinary performance of a government and its supporters day after day obstructing their own budget. That, Mr. Speaker, is our grievance.

Now that we are willing to put through additional reforms, if there are any—not because we think they are so very good, but just to make sure that this government is forced to the country on its record and not on a program newly adopted at the last moment—we are met with another proposal. Not only are we not to go on with the reforms, and not only are we to be given the opportunity not to oppose them, if I may put it that way, but we are going to adjourn for six weeks. That is the grievance, Mr. Speaker. This proposal is part of the sequence of political acts whereby the government have postponed a general election, notwithstanding the fact that throughout the country there has been a general demand for it. They have delayed the elections to suit their own convenience and their own comfort, and to prolong for a few months the pleasure they have in holding office when nobody wants them there but themselves. They hold office without the least regard for public opinion or for the rights of the people. That is our grievance.

We want to be here to discuss whatever the government may have to offer as ante mortem testimony, and then we desire to proceed to a general election. We may win or we may lose—I think we will win.

Mr. DURANLEAU: You will lose.

Mr. RINFRET: The country wants a new government, a stable government. It does not want a moribund government hanging to power by the tips of its fingers. It does not want a government which, had it paid the least attention to the desire of the people as expressed in by-elections, would not now be in office.

Many references have been made to the by-elections. The statement has been made that if we take the whole record of the five years the government has held power, it has lost only one or two seats. I have not taken the trouble to ascertain whether or not that statement is correct. But this I do know: You must not go back to the by-elections held about five years ago if you wish to obtain accurate information. It is only natural that when a government has just been elected the first by-election will turn in its favour. This government in that respect has been treated as other governments have been treated. They won an election in Three Rivers about a year after they had been in power. On the strength of the promises made during the general campaign and repeated in the by-election campaigns they won a few by-elections in the first years in which they held office. But let us look back at the last two years. What do we find? They lost three by-elections in 1933; they lost four out of five in 1934, and they have only a little Church left—and we are not even sure it is perfectly orthodox.

Mr. DUGUAY: The hon. member did not have—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not know what my hon. friend has to say, but I would invite him to go to his electors and say it there.

Mr. DUGUAY: I am ready to go at any time.

Mr. RINFRET: To sum it up, this government has been dead for a number of months. Not only is it dead, but there are no relatives left to fix the date of the funeral. We have to wait for the constitution to do that. When we asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) the position of the constitution in the matter of elections he said, "Well, on August 18 this parliament will not exist," but when we wanted to know further whether that meant we would have an election he said, "Well, there is nothing in the constitution concerning that." As an hon. member put it earlier in the afternoon, if we were to follow the reasoning of some hon. members opposite there would never be a general election.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is Toryism.

Mr. RINFRET: Parliament is out, automatically, but that does not matter to them. That does not mean we must elect another one. It is out, that is all. Were it not for the fact that they need supply they would stay there forever. Of course the framers of the constitution never dreamed of a government attempting to remain in office after its powers had automatically ceased, and for that reason those framers forgot to remind such governments that when a parliament was completed it might be a good thing to elect another one. They forgot about that. We are here to remind the government of that fact. We want the elections to be held. We do not wish particularly to disrupt the plans of hon. members opposite; if the people want them—well, they deserve them, and that is all there is to it. We do not say that we are going to win; we simply say the people are entitled to make a choice. Yet the Minister of Justice states, "Well, parliament will be out automatically on August 18, but that is no indication that an election will follow." That is the way the matter stands. That is our grievance and the grievance of the Canadian people. We want to make sure that after that day the people of Canada will still be represented by a parliament of some sort. We want the government to tell us that instead of adjourning they are going to expedite the business of this session, and for the Canadian people we want the assurance—and the Canadian people may choose hon. members opposite; we never know—that on a certain day some group of members will be chosen. That is all we want to know.

I have still another point to make. The hon. member who preceded me in the debate stated, among other things, that in this debate we should not discuss other than the motion for the adjournment, and then the hon. member proceeded to speak about everything except that motion. I will admit, though, that he was replying to some hon. gentleman on this side of the house, and there is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that when one is arguing that parliament should not adjourn it is quite in order to mention different matters that should receive the consideration of parliament.

My hon. friend quoted the Ottawa Citizen, and he went pretty far back, citing what the Citizen said in 1933. Well, I have here the Ottawa Citizen of 1935, for the third of April. What does it say? I shall not read it because I am not supposed to quote a newspaper, but I shall just refresh my memory by glancing at it once in a while. The Ottawa Citizen if I remember well, says that there is no shadow of an excuse for a performance such as we have now. It is speaking not of what happended three years ago but of what is happening now, and it says that there is not the shadow of an excuse for parliament carrying on the way it is. I shall be glad to hand this extract to the whip of our party if he is going to quote extracts in reply to my hon. friend from Dorchester. It will be a good companion to what we heard a moment ago.

The Ottawa Citizen also says, if I remember well, that there does not seem to be any special reason for keeping up this performance. That is exactly what we are arguing. But the Ottawa Citizen goes further, and goes a little too far I think, but sometimes the newspapers are a bit violent in their terms. The Ottawa Citizen, not of three years ago but three days ago, says that it is a crime against Canada to keep up this negative performance—a crime against Canada. I think so too. Shakespeare has one of his characters speak of a Daniel come to judgment. It is a crime against Canada because a general election has to come eventually, and it is well for constituted authority in Canada that the people, who are in desperate circumstances cannot see this daily performance of futility in Ottawa because it would produce something like revolution. That is the Ottawa Citizen, the same paper that appeals to my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), but evidently he does not read it every morning, or perhaps he chooses only the editorials that suit him.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He misses those that are against him.

Mr. RINFRET: I should enjoy very much going on, Mr. Speaker, but I think we are all anxious to vote, both those who think that parliament should work and those that think it should not. I merely want to say in conclusion that the precedent of 1911 cited by the Minister of Justice is not an appealing one to me. That was not an election year notwithstanding what the Minister of Justice said. It is true an election was held that year, but it was not an election year because the then parliament had run for only three years, and when Sir Wilfrid Laurier after presenting to the house his new measure of reciprocity asked for an adjournment that he might go to London, there was not much expectation at that time that that measure would receive the opposition that it did meet with when he came back. He came back, and what happened? There was opposition in this house and opposition in the country also. That is an example that we are very proud to cite to-day. Let the government do what Sir Wilfrid Laurier did. It is the very thing we ask, because Laurier went to the people. He was defeated, it is true, but it was not an inglorious defeat.

We Liberals, as I said at the start, and I was not speaking in light fashion, do not want to wrest power from the people. We merely want the people to pronounce for themselves —that is all. I know that that is not the policy of the Conservative party. In 1896 parliament sat until the last minute of the last hour of the last day. In 1916 again a Conservative government extended the life of parliament for a whole year, and here we are in 1935 and we have not even the assurance that when the life of this parliament expires automatically, it will be immediately replaced. The whole purpose of the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Quebec East is to express the grievance of the Canadian people who want to choose a new government, who ask for that opportunity, and we are here voicing that desire of the Canadian people.

Mr. QUINN: They are not represented by you.

Mr. RINFRET: Did I hear a sound from the other side? I shall vote, Mr. Speaker, to express the desire of the Canadian people and shall support with all my might the amendment that has been moved by my hon. friend from Quebec East.

Mr. J. L. DUGUAY (Lake St. John): Just one word, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret). We will be frank enough to go to the people and tell them what our program is, but the hon. member for St. James did not dare go before the people of Montreal when he was mayor of that city.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Third report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. —Mr. Geary.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the estimates referred to in the third report of the standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. WILFRID GIROUARD (Drummond-Arthabaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in the course of his remarks last night, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) read a letter from a man named Albert Rioux, as reported at page 2588 of Hansard. This man Rioux writes to the hon. member for Dorchester, among other things:

He—speaking about myself—gave $15 out of his pockets or out of the party funds in order to pay for the cost of printing this petition.

I must declare, Mr. Speaker, that it has always been a pleasure for me to help the agricultural societies of my riding, but it is both false and ridiculous to claim that such help came from the party funds which do not exist, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Referring to the statement made by the hon. UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

REPORTED WALK-OUT FROM CAMPS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Has he any statement to make with reference to the walk-out of certain relief workers at some of the camps in British Columbia?

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to send me a few moments ago intimation that he proposed to ask such a question. The information in my department indicates that about 1,300 out of a total of 4,400 men in the camps west of the centre line of British Columbia have moved out. A considerable number of them have gradually found their way to Vancouver. I cannot say definitely how many have reached that point, because the information is to a certain degree affected by the fact that in a good many of the camps certain men moved out rather than become entangled with this movement. The house will realize of course that as soon as these men leave the camps which have been under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence they pass beyond the charge of the dominion government and are again in the charge of the provincial government. Indications are that both the city of Vancouver and the province of British Columbia consider they have the situation well in hand.

THE KING'S SILVER JUBILEE

DISTRIBUTION OF MEDALS IN COMMEMORATION OF EVENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) a telegram I received from Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, with regard to the celebration in connection with the silver jubilee of the coronation of His Majesty the King. The telegram is as follows:

> Citizens committee planning celebration Their Majesties Jubilee would like 500 medals to give school children. Please wire me if Canadian mint is making these. If so quote size and prices for this number in bronze or silver.

I think we should have some information about this matter.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): The medals which will be distributed on the occasion of the King's silver jubilee will be the medals expressly donated by His Majesty the King to persons who are selected in accordance with the instructions of His Majesty. So far as I know none of His Majesty's medals will be distributed to school children. The government of Canada is not distributing medals.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, following the answer to the question of the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) may I say that I have had a communication from some person connected with the mint to the effect that medals having to do with the jubilee celebration were for sale. I believe it would be well to have an announcement made to-morrow concerning this matter. I believe there are two sizes available.

Mr. CAHAN: I have only the personal knowledge gained from having seen certain communications to His Excellency the Governor General. However, I understand certain commemorative medals were to be issued by the royal mint for sale and distribution in England, merely as souvenirs of this anniversary. It was suggested that a certain number of these medals might be made available for sale at the mint in Canada. As to whether or not the mint in Canada has received the medals from the London mint, I cannot at the present time give a definite answer.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Would the minister be good enough to make an announcement to-morrow, because the fact is I have written letters giving information to people in my own constituency who have made inquiries. I hope I have not been misled in the matter.

Mr. CAHAN: This matter is not within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Secretary of State, I believe the inquiry should be made through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) who has direction and control of the Royal Mint in Ottawa.

Mr. BOTHWELL: May I direct my question to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. RHODES: I shall be pleased to make specific inquiries and, I hope to-morrow, advise the house definitely.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the government if the distribution of such medals will carry the conferring of a title?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance said, regarding the business of the house for to-day, "We will take up the bills and resolutions on the order paper." May I ask him if the house will consider order No. 28, the second reading of Bill No. 40, concerning minimum wages?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that that question cannot be answered at the moment, because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has a meeting presently in his own room, but if it is convenient to take up that bill to-day we shall do so.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

BUTTER RETURNED TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of order as well as one of privilege with regard to question No. 19 standing in my name on to-day's order paper. That question has appeared on the order paper before and an answer was given to it on Monday of last week by the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews), and to-day I received exactly the same answer: "Information not available in this department." But in the original of this question which was handed to the officer of the house there were a few words which do not appear in the question on the order paper; they were "Inquiry of the hon. Minister of Agriculture" (Mr. Weir), and the answer of the hon. Minister of National Revenue to-day is that no information is available. But I would point out that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has already stated in the house that some Canadian butter was shipped back to Canada from England, and he gave the number of boxes. I put this same question now to the Minister of Agriculture, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will decide that question No. 19 on today's order paper shall stand on the order paper until I receive an answer from the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question appears there.

Mr. POULIOT: I ask you, sir, to decide that this question shall stand on the order paper until I receive an answer from the Minister of Agriculture, because the question was directed to him.

PROPOSED EXPERIMENTAL FARM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture based on representations sent to him by the associated boards of trade of central and northern British Columbia and from farmers' institutes, and based also on representations that have been made to the minister by myself and I believe by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser), in respect to the establishment of a model or experimental farm in that portion of British Columbia. Such a farm was promised by two former governments, Liberal and Conservative. It seems impossible for me to get a reply from the minister to communications that I have sent to him. I would therefore ask him now if any consideration has been given to the subject and when I may expect an answer from his department to my letter.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I thought my hon. friend would have received my answer before this. I wrote him at length and he should have received my letter before this.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I called at the post office fifteen minutes ago. There has been no answer yet.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to provide for the requirements of the public service for the month of May it is desirable that we should have interim supply, and I would therefore ask for unanimous consent for one-twelfth of supply except in the case of a number of items where a little larger sum is required, and for which we are asking for an additional one-sixth. Those are for services where the expenditure is required to a greater extent in the earlier season of the year. It is of course understood that I can only proceed by unanimous consent.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, while reiterating our protest against the proposed length of the adjournment of the house, it is not our intention to oppose the request of my hon. friend. Of course, the king's government must carry on and the public service must function.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker I think before unanimous consent is given we should have some idea when the motion will be brought down fixing the date of the proposed adjournment. We do not need supply until the last of April, and I for one would like to know for different reasons when the government intends to bring down its motion for adjournment and on what date the house will adjourn.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I have been waiting to see how the business of the house progressed in order to try to fix a day on which I thought we might get away. We would like to complete as much as possible of the business that is on the order paper before adjourning, in order that when we come back in May we shall not have to sit any longer than is necessary. Therefore I would ask the hon. gentleman to let his question stand over until to-morrow and perhaps in the meantime I shall be able to figure out a little more closely how we are going to get along.

Mr. RHODES: May I say in answer to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) that irrespective of the day we adjourn we should still require interim supply, and our object in asking for it now is that the bill may proceed to the Senate in order that there may be no delay in having assent at such time as may be convenient.

Mr. DUFF: I have no objection to that, and I do not want to hold up supply, but I think we should know about the adjournment before the house is asked to grant supply for May, and I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to leave his request for interim supply over until to-morrow so that the government can bring down their motion and inform the house when they intend to adjourn.

Mr. RHODES: Of course, Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances we cannot proceed, and there is no recourse but to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 39, to establish an economic council.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The amendment made by the Senate to the bill for an economic council is a very simple one. In the bill itself reference is made to the Prime Minister being the head of the economic council. The usual wording used heretofore has been "the member of the king's privy council for Canada holding the position of first minister," and the effect of the Senate amendment is simply to replace the word "Prime Minister" by those words. Until a few years ago no reference was ever made to the Prime Minister in any legislation, he being always referred to as "the member of the king's privy council for Canada holding the position of first minister." I know that in England there was a Chequers Estate Act of 1917 in which reference was made to the Prime Minister, as there was also in an act of this parliament incorporating the national committee for the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation, in which Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King was referred to as the Prime Minister. However, I see no objection to this amendment made by the Senate, because the words "member of the king's privy council for Canada holding office as first minister" are generally used. Therefore, I move concurrence in this amendment.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no objection to this alteration. I am quite sure that this bill was not drafted by the law officers of parliament or of the Department of Justice. I am curious to know who did draft the bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I know that that has been the custom. I would remind my hon. friend that in an act passed to incorporate a national committee for the celebration of the diamond jubilee of Confederation his own leader is referred to as Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, P.C., C.M.G., Prime Minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No doubt, but I do not think that act was drafted by the law officers of that time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In so far as this is an amendment to define more clearly the skull of the skeleton, I do not think there can be any objection on the part of those who believe in accepting the skeleton.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 10, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendments are three in number and will be found in the minutes of proceedings of the Senate of March 20. The first amendment is an addition to section 5A of the bill. It reads:

> No proposal under this act nor the approval or confirmation thereof shall release any person who, under the Bankruptcy Act, would not be released by an order of discharge if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt, nor shall the approval or confirmation of a proposal release any security given by any third person.

I understand it was thought that this amendment would make it clearer that the endorser is not released in respect of his obligations to pay the creditor if there is a proposal formulated with regard to a farmer. I am advised that this is merely declaratory of the existing law in all the provinces with the exception of Quebec, and that this amendment is suggested by the Senate with the object of making this applicable to Quebec, thus making the law uniform throughout the country.

The second amendment is an additional clause to section 12, and reads:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bankruptcy Act, an insolvent debtor resident in the province of Quebec, engaged solely in farming or the tilling of the soil, whose liabilities to creditors provable as debts under the Bankruptcy Act exceed $500, may make an assignment for the general benefit of his creditors in any case where the board declines to formulate a proposal and certifies that in its opinion the debtors' affairs can best be administered under the Bankruptcy Act.

It was the opinion of the Senate that this provision should also be made applicable to the province of Quebec so that the farmer who is unable to have the board of review formulate a proposal may have available to him the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, provided the board of review certifies that it is a proper case to come under the provisions of the act.

The third amendment is an additional section, which reads:

> The said act shall not, without the concurrence of the creditor, apply in the case of any debt incurred after the 1st day of May, 1935.

These are the three amendments.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

GOLD EXPORT ACT

PROVISION FOR LICENCE TO BANK OF CANADA FOR EXPORT OF GOLD

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 42, to amend the Gold Export Act.

He said: Under the present act a licence to export gold may issue only to a chartered bank. This act was passed prior to the incorporation of the Bank of Canada, and this amendment makes it possible for a licence to issue to that institution for the export of gold.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Licences for export of gold.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Why should not the control of gold in all its aspects be under the central bank?

Mr. RHODES: This bill has reference to the Gold Export Act, which provides that the export of gold may take place only under certificate of the Minister of Finance. Hitherto such certificates have been issued only to the chartered banks. This bill has no reference to the gold holdings of the banks; it covers the sale of gold, which is a product of our mines.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand that in the future the chartered banks are not to hold any gold at all; why, then, should they be given the privilege of exporting gold?

Mr. RHODES: This bill has no reference to a bank's gold; it has reference only to the export of the product of our mines.

Mr. McINTOSH: I should like to know if the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act makes provision for a counsel to represent a farmer appearing before a provincial board of review.

Mr. RHODES: I have seen very wide latitude allowed on occasions but I think it would tax the ingenuity of even my hon. friend to bring that question within the purview of the provisions of the bill now before the committee. However, I can say to my hon. friend that we have not yet been convinced that it would be in the interests of the farmers to have counsel employed. I gave the reasons for this decision the other day. No requests have been made to me that that course should be taken, and this would seem to indicate that the farmers as a whole are accepting the point of view that their interests are best served under the existing arrangement. As was intimated at an earlier stage of the bill, if it should be demonstrated that it would be in the interests of the farmers to employ counsel, the government will not hesitate to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it the intention of the government that the chartered banks shall continue to receive licences for the export of gold?

Mr. RHODES: It is really a matter of convenience. For example, in the Yukon a licence issued to a chartered bank would prove of convenience to a shipper. If it were through Vancouver it would no doubt be the Bank of Canada.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SALARY DEDUCTION ACT

RESTORATION OF FIVE PER CENT OF DEDUCTION FROM SALARIES, COMPENSATIONS AND INDEMNITIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize a deduction of five per cent from the amount of certain salaries or other compensations or indemnities payable by the government of Canada during the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1936, and to provide for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of such amounts as are necessary under the proposed legislation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. RHODES: I should explain that the bill which will be founded on the resolution is similar in terms to the one of last year except that the deduction is five per cent instead of ten per cent. There is this exception however. It will be recalled that last year we removed the deduction from those up to and including the salary of $1,000 per annum. In this bill we have made a further step and have raised it from $1,000 to $1,200; in other words, those who are in receipt of $1,200 per annum will be in precisely the same position as they have been heretofore—no deduction will apply to them. It may interest the committee to know that—

Mr. VENIOT: They are still debarred from statutory increases.

Mr. RHODES: That is a consideration apart from this bill; it is a matter dealt with by the treasury board and is not a question of legislative enactment. By raising the figure from $1,000 to $1,200 the effect will be to bring within the provisions of the measure some 4,000 temporary employees and 3,000 permanent. It will be remembered that last year those affected by the $1,000 provision were altogether 18,000 in number, and the total number now removed from the application of the salary deduction will be 25,000.

Mr. NEILL: This includes those receiving $1,200?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, up to and including $1,200.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My colleague and I, representing Ottawa, cannot say that we are fully in accord with this resolution, though of course we shall have to proceed on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread and accept the resolution as it stands. We desire to say however that our acceptance of the resolution must not be construed in any way as the acceptance of the underlying principle, namely, that the ten per cent deduction was warranted. It was absolutely unwarranted, it was unjustifiable, and it was a curtailment of purchasing power to a devastating extent in this community. We reserve further comments until the bill which is to be introduced is brought down for second reading.

Mr. RHODES: In answer to the senior member for Ottawa, who has always been consistent in his opposition to the principle of a salary deduction, I may say that this bill provides a little more than half a loaf, because while it is true that only half of the salary deduction is applicable, on the other hand the whole loaf is extended to some 7,000 employees, and to that extent it goes a little more than half way in the endeavour to meet the situation. I am not going to repeat now what I have said in former years, namely, that it is not a pleasant duty to have to be associated with anything in the form of salary deductions, and I can only say once more that I regret the financial situation is such that we cannot make the full restoration. I think however that the civil servants, even those adversely affected to the extent of five per cent, appreciate the situation and realize that an extra five per cent means a little more than $3,000,000, which in these days is no inconsiderable sum.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When will the statutory increases be given to the employees? I understand that they have been stopped during the last few years, and in many instances those employees who were entitled to statutory increases and have not been receiving them have been contributing a good deal more than five per cent—more than ten per cent—because they are not getting the advantage of the augmented salary to which they would have been entitled.

Mr. RHODES: I only express my own view on the subject raised by my hon. friend from Quebec East, but it is a view which I have formed after giving a great deal of thought to the matter. The statutory increases were designed in the first instance to reward service; they were intended to apply only to those who were entitled, because of service, to receive increases. Unfortunately however, through carelessness down through the years, the increases became more or less automatic, and therefore those who richly deserved them were in no better position than members of the civil service who did not deserve an increase. It is unfortunate that because of that fact—and it runs into a large sum of money—many faithful employees who no doubt have earned and are entitled to increases have been debarred. I make that observation only in passing. I do hope the original intention of the act will be carried out in future, because on balance it would be vastly to the benefit of the civil service and of good civil servants if the statutory increases applied only as originally intended. However, that is more or less by the way. Coming directly to the question submitted by my hon. friend, I have a hope that during the recess we may be able to address ourselves to the question of statutory increases. I am not at the moment holding out the hope that a blanket increase, as has obtained heretofore, will be given. On that I am not expressing a final opinion. At all events, it will be our hope and purpose to deal with the question of statutory increases at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. VENIOT: As regards the statutory increases, it will be remembered that I took this matter up last year and directed the attention of the Minister of Finance to what I considered to be an injustice to certain members of the service. Let me give an example in point. Take the case of a man receiving $1,320 a year and still entitled to statutory increases up to a certain figure. In the last three years, 1932, 1933 and 1934, including the lack of his statutory increases and his ten per cent deduction, he has contributed to the benefit of the country in round figures the sum of $1,100, while a civil servant with a salary of $3,000 a year, who in 1932 was receiving all the statutory increases to which he was entitled, has contributed only $900 in the same period. There is certainly an injustice there, and it should be remedied.

I was going to make this suggestion to the minister at this time: Since he is reducing the ten per cent deduction to five per cent, he might consider the question of still further reducing it to, say, two and a half per cent in the case of those who have not yet reached the limit of their statutory increases under the law. The minister said that during the recess the government might consider some other scheme than that of a blanket deduction. That is a suggestion which he might consider. I claim it is unfair that civil servants who have not reached the limit of their statutory increases should have deductions made from their salaries at the same rate as that applied to those who have reached their maximum. Some remedy should be applied. Under the law civil servants are entitled to their statutory increases provided they fulfil certain conditions.

Mr. RHODES: Qualify that a little.

Mr. VENIOT: I am going to. When they are appointed by the civil service commission at a minimum salary, it is stated what their annual increase shall be until the maximum is reached, and that maximum is named.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will recall that they do not receive that statutory increase as a matter of right. That is the point I want to make clear.

Mr. VENIOT: I am coming to that.

Mr. RHODES: They receive it only upon recommendation of the head of the department.

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all. I know in the Post Office Department—and I speak of it because I know it better than the other departments—they have to undergo a qualifying examination to show that their ability or efficiency is sufficient to merit the increase. When that is submitted by the deputy head of the department to the civil service commission, the latter investigate the matter, and if they find that those civil servants are entitled, under the conditions under which they were first appointed, to the statutory increase, they get it. In fact I claim that the government, prior to the time they started in to make the deduction, could not refuse the statutory increase once the order was approved by the civil service commission. What has happened in this instance through the action of the government or the treasury board is that the civil service commission have been debarred from considering the meritorious or efficient service of those who are entitled to statutory increases, and that is why they are not being considered under the statutory increase regulations. That is why I contend that an injustice is being done to those civil servants. If conditions had continued as in the past; if this depression had not taken place and if the treasury board or the government had not issued an order debarring the civil service commission from giving effect to statutory increases on grounds of merit or efficiency, those civil servants would be entitled according to their grade to statutory increases of from $60 to $120 a year. But they are debarred from obtaining that, and because of their being so debarred, under a blanket deduction from salaries, a civil servant receiving $1,320 is called upon to pay more than another who is receiving $3,000 a year. That is not fair.

Mr. RHODES: I want to say just a word and not to traverse the ground covered by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) because that is a matter we have to deal with apart from this bill. As a matter of fact salary increases have been given in individual cases. I rose however merely for the purpose of saying this: I admit at once that there have been cases of injustice and some are quite serious. I have had of course to investigate these cases myself and of necessity they are bound to arise when one comes to the border line cases in any process of adjustment one attempts to make.

Mr. VENIOT: When a blanket deduction is made.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; that is the difficulty. I hope we are nearing the time when we shall be past that difficulty, and the committee will bear in mind the answer I gave to the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I did not intend at this stage of the proceedings to say anything regarding statutory increases; I thought the proper time would be when the bill was introduced. There is only one matter I would like to point out to the minister. He has stated that while the return is five per cent, quite a large number of civil servants will be placed in as good a position as they were before.

Mr. RHODES: Seven thousand.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is this feature about the matter that up to a certain point, as far as I can understand the situation, the five per cent will be returned, but every civil servant will now have to contribute the five per cent to the superannuation fund, whereas before those under a certain classification did not have to do so. Now they are getting back their five per cent, but they will be asked to contribute the five per cent to the superannuation fund, so that they will be no better off than before. It may be all very well to say that this affects only seven thousand, but those particular ones are not placed in any better position than before. When we talk about putting them into just as good a position as that which they occupied before, the minister will remember that when this matter was under discussion in the first instance it was stated that when these deductions were abolished the service would be placed in exactly the same position as it was in before the deductions were made; that civil servants would not get any more but would not get any less than what they were entitled to. I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Gloucester as to the statutory increases, but there is much more to be said when these matters are being considered. I do not think this is the opportune time to discuss the matter, but if the minister wants to abide by his word—that when the deductions are entirely eliminated the civil servants will be placed in the position that they occupied before the deductions took place—he will see to it that steps are taken to give back to the civil servants the statutory increases of which they were deprived and the amounts to which they were entitled. At present a large number of employees are acting in a capacity for which they are not being paid. If they have been promoted to positions in connection with which the salary range is very much wider they are performing duties very much more onerous and responsible. They ought to be paid for those duties, but they are still receiving their old salaries. However, I think the proper time to take up these questions is when the bill is in committee.

Mr. RHODES: I will resist the temptation to reply to my hon. friend and adopt his suggestion, which I think is very sound, that it would be better to discuss these matters when the actual bill is before the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: Did I understand the minister to say the government were going to consider further the matter of statutory increases and promotions?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: In that case I have very little to say, but I think the statutory increases and promotions, as they have operated up to the present time, have been very inequitable and discriminatory in regard to employees now in the service. I understand that if a permanent employee is promoted to a higher position, that does not automatically carry with it the increased salary that goes with the higher position. On the other hand if it is certified that there is no one in the department who can fill the position; if applications are invited from outsiders and someone is appointed temporarily to fill the position, that temporary employee receives the salary that goes with the position. I think it is absurd to carry on in that way. Surely if a temporary employee—of course he may be made permanent later on—is appointed to a position and given the salary that goes with it, the employee in the service who is qualified for promotion to a higher position also should receive the salary that goes with that position.

I do not know if the matter has been drawn to the attention of the minister in this way, but I hope he will give this point some consideration and, if possible, do something in the matter.

Mr. RHODES: I do not seek to question the circumstances as put forth by my hon. friend; they may be so, but I am not aware of them. Certainly it would be a very grave injustice if a temporary employee were allowed to come in and receive the salary that attached to the position while a permanent employee in the department who is looking for promotion should be denied that opportunity unless he accepts a lower salary. I will make particular inquiry in view of the suggestion of my hon. friend, but he will realize that this has no reference to this bill as such. Certainly it will be considered in connection with the whole question of statutory increases.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53 to provide for the deduction in compensation in the public service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

INCOME TAX OF JUDICIARY, MILITARY, NAVAL AND AIR FORCES AND POLICE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that the members of the judiciary, and the members of the military, naval and air forces of Canada, and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, other than enlisted men, shall be liable to pay a special income tax of five per cent upon their salaries received during the fiscal year 1935-36, in addition to any other tax payable under the act.

Motion agreed to, resolution considered in committee, reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 54 to amend the Income War Tax Act (Special Tax).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REHABILITATION OF DROUGHT AREAS

DEMONSTRATION AREAS AND INVESTIGATIONAL WORK FOR RECLAMATION OF DRIED OUT LANDS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the rehabilitation of drought areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, and for the appropriation for the said purposes of such funds as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, at this stage there is very little to add to what has been said already in this connection. It is proposed to carry on investigational work and at the same time give a demonstration of what we believe can be done with the co-operation of the farmers in these large drought areas. The policy we propose to follow if this bill receives the approval of the house is to set aside small areas where there has been a certain measure of success attained by the farmers through their own efficiency, in spite of the great difficulties with which they have had to contend during the past number of years. It is felt that these areas are so localized at the present time that the efforts even of those farmers have been frustrated because of the conditions immediately surrounding their own land. It is proposed to set aside five very much larger areas, corresponding to a township or thirty-six square miles, three in Saskatchewan, one in Alberta and one in Manitoba. We propose to carry on these investigations and at the same time demonstrate what can be done in the way of reclaiming areas that have been abandoned entirely and given up as well nigh hopeless.

In addition to that a program is being undertaken to increase as quickly as possible the development of the best grass seeds, grains and clover seeds, and to make them available in these areas, if it is demonstrated in the present year that they will do what we hope may be done with them. Further, tree planting will be carried on to a limited extent in the first year, increasing in extent from year to year. Careful plans have been drawn up in an effort to assist the farmers and the ranchers in the conservation of the water in the district. Throughout the whole program it is our purpose to assist the farmers, and to demonstrate whether or not the people in these areas can continue to live there with only very little more moisture than they are now receiving. Our first aim is to do everything possible to make these people self-sustaining. Secondly we must decide which areas are best suited for grain growing, which are best suited for ranching, and the best way to handle those areas which are intermediate.

Mr. BROWN: With the purpose of the proposed bill I am in entire agreement. One of the tragedies in the west is that we have districts which in years past have produced enormous crops of grain, in which there were splendid houses and other buildings but which are to-day abandoned and in some instances are almost in the condition of deserts. I believe that is one of the greatest tragedies witnessed in Canadian history. Certainly I should not like to say anything which could be interpreted as being in opposition to the principle of the bill, but at the same time there is a possibility of becoming too optimistic as to what may be accomplished. For instance, reference has been made to the conservation of water supply. That is all to the good, but my opinion is that it will not have as great an effect upon the rainfall as some people seem to think it will have. If it were true that the damming up of streams and the creation of reservoirs of moisture would increase the rainfall—and after all, that is the great consideration—we might very well ask: Why was it that in 1870, 1880 or 1890, at a time when we had many lakes scattered throughout that country, we came upon a period of drought? Of course it may be contended that drainage was a factor in the problem. I question that argument, however, because in the part of Manitoba with which I am familiar drainage has been carried on only to a very limited extent. Outside of the Red river valley the drying up of the sloughs was not brought about by drainage, but simply by a continued lack of rainfall.

Many newspaper correspondents have written concerning this matter, but there has been a failure to take into account the fact that western Canada passed through previous periods of drought, of which fact abundant evidence is available. From my own experience and observations, extending over a period of fifty-three years, and dating from the time I first came to the community, I could speak with some authority on the point. In the early eighties there was abundant moisture, but there was evidence that a few years before that time there had been drought. During the greater part of my fifty-three years in that community I have lived in township 4, range 11, section 10. On section 3, immediately south of the one in which I reside, there is what is described on the surveyors' notes as Dry Salt lake. That township was surveyed in 1872. I have in my possession the surveyors' notes, and for that reason I know this particular spot is described as having been Dry Salt lake. Yet, in my time I have seen eight feet of water in that lake. I recall having discussed the matter some years ago with a man who had been in that district four years prior to the time I came, and as a point worthy of note he mentioned that he had picked strawberries between the water and the bush. At the time he spoke however the water was right up to the edge of the bush. This particular township is wooded, a point to which I shall make further reference later.

I have seen eight feet of water in the lake, so I believe it reached its maximum point about the year 1882, and has varied from time to time. Last year some hundreds of tons of coarse hay were cut upon the marsh. As further proof that there must have been a considerable period of drought may I say that on section 12, not far from my home there is another lake. When in the year 1885 I first saw it the lake was right in among the hills and the water reached right up to the edge of the bushes. Dead trees four or five inches thick were standing out in the water, proving that for a considerable number of years there had been dry ground at that point. The lake was full of water in 1885, but has since become dry. I know of one instance where the old Missouri trail, an old buffalo hunters' trail which used to run from Winnipeg to the head waters of the Missouri, ran right into and out the other side of that which in my time, at the time I first saw it, was a marsh. Evidently the trail through the marsh had been travelled when it was dry. Therefore I believe we must question the possibility of our being able to influence rainfall to the extent we may hope.

In making this observation I do not wish it to be understood that I am attempting to discourage anything now being done. That country was dry, but I believe it is true to say that in those days the soil was not blowing as it is to-day. About the year 1887 I can recall an occasion when some men from the Regina country came to my section of the west. If I remember correctly two families came down, and one of the men told me that in two years they had not been able to grow enough grain to feed a hen. Yet we know that in years following those Regina plains produced enormous crops of grain. I could give many evidences of the fact that in earlier years the west passed through a long period of dry weather. The drought was evidently just as great then as it is at this time, and so while the conservation of moisture and the building of dams to hold water is all to the good, I question very much if it is going to realize the expectations of many that it will bring about increased rainfall. I may say the same in regard to the planting of trees. The township in which I live is a timbered township along the edge of the Pembina river valley. There was an abundance of moisture there in those early days, but while it was a timbered country I doubt very much whether the difference in the amount of timber that was there then and what is now there was sufficient to affect the rainfall, if it does affect the rainfall at all. Timber grows because there is rain, and I doubt if the rain comes because there is timber. I think it is the other way, and I think we are confusing cause and effect in that matter.

I doubt very much if the planting of trees can be carried on to any great advantage. The fact of the matter is that many groves that were planted and which flourished well during periods of moisture died last fall. I have in mind particularly one fine grove which for years was a beauty spot, and yet when I passed by it last year following the dry season I noticed that it was all gone to nothing. So I have grave doubts whether tree planting in view of the drought conditions can be made a success from the point of view of attracting moisture.

As to what the minister has said with regard to the distribution of grass seeds and bringing back the land into grass, and as to the conservation of the moisture supply, I think that is all to the good, but I have felt that in many of the discussions that have taken place in the press and elsewhere with regard to the matter sufficient importance has not been attached to the fact that the western country has passed through long periods of drought in times past when there was not any great number of settlers in that part of the country engaged in agriculture. I remember distinctly talking with a descendant of one of the old time Selkirk settlers, and he told me that for two years in succession back in the sixties, I think it was, they had to take their cattle from Winnipeg up to Portage la Prairie. Another old timer, a Norwegian who came out in the early days and was a Hudson's Bay Company employee, said he had seen the Red river so dry that he could step over it. It was inconceivable to me at that time. These are facts that I think the public should know when we are entering upon a scheme of this kind. I do not say that to discourage the efforts that may properly be made to overcome the difficulties of the drought situation as much as it is possible for us to do, but at the same time I think we should be prepared for what may possibly happen, that the outcome of our activities may not have all the effects that we may wish them to have, and that after all we may have to wait for nature to take its course and provide recurring periods of abundant rainfall.

Mr. WILLIS: Mr. Chairman, as one who comes from the drought area of Manitoba I should like to place a few facts before the house. First I should like to point out to those who do not come from the west that the section of Manitoba known as the drought area of that province is a settlement of Ontario citizens. I point that out particularly because sometimes we think that those who are experiencing these conditions out there are of a different sort from ourselves.

I should also like to point out that in that drought area of Manitoba the general practice is to engage in mixed farming, and not to engage in the practice that has been described in this house as mining for wheat. That area was opened up about 1885, and from it many fortunes have been made. Thousands of people have made their money there and moved to the Pacific coast or elsewhere, and at the present time it is largely the second generation that is there.

In the drought areas of Manitoba there are thirteen municipalities. Five of them are in what is known as drought area A; they have suffered for five years a complete crop failure. The eight municipalities in drought area B have for two or three years suffered a crop failure. The land value of these thirteen municipalities is some $56,000,000. The annual crop value within these municipalities, as it was formerly, was some $20,000,000. I realize that in the province of Saskatchewan you could multiply those figures many times over, but that is the situation in Manitoba. The average rainfall there in the past has been some fifteen inches per year. I point that out with a view to demonstrating that the reclamation of that area is completely worth while from a national point of view.

The present situation within that area is that we are now having about one-half of the normal rainfall, the streams have largely dried up, the soil has drifted, with the result that the rate of evaporation has increased, and relief has become general. But the particularly bad feature which I desire to point out, and shall probably stress again, is that the drought area is expanding. Dry winds due to the conditions there have a much greater scope, with the result that more moisture is needed now than was needed in the past. The crop last year within that area was approximately one per cent of the crop which we had in 1928 in the municipalities within drought area A.

It does not help us much to say that conditions south of the line—we are close to the international border—are much worse, but actually they are much worse. The present situation however presents an opportunity, and a special opportunity, of guarding against a recurrence of these conditions. When times were good people would not bother with reclamation, and that is why the present time creates a special opportunity with regard to the projects which are now going forward. I say that this question has a national aspect due to the fact that the drought areas are expanding, and some of those who now sit complacently back may in the future, if nothing is done, face a similar situation even if at present they are not affected by the drought conditions. The people of the district from which I come never suspected in the past that these conditions could obtain there at all. We believed that we had good soil. We have close to that area the Turtle Mountain forest reserve, giving a degree of protection which is helpful. I want to point out to those farmers who do not live in the drought areas that they are carrying on precisely the same practices that we in the drought areas carried on in the past, with the result that they are themselves inviting the same conditions, and if a change is not made they will receive that which they invite. Therefore I think it is absolutely necessary that we plan now, or we shall face worse conditions in the future. I think Joseph was right, that years of plenty are followed by years of poverty, and that that will happen in the future. The dry area itself might be likened to a mighty octopus which is constantly pushing its tentacles into new territory.

I think the proposals outlined by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) will prove very helpful. According to articles which have appeared in the press, he has been working on these for some time. I should like to quote a Canadian press dispatch dated September 5, 1934:

"Officials of this department have made extensive studies of the driedout district," the minister explained. "We have much data with regard to blocking streams, thus holding back the water, lands that should be planted with trees and in regard to the proper grass for other districts.

"Anyone who looks back over the great crops those districts have produced must be convinced that with proper methods they could be saved and made big producers again," Mr. Weir said. "Carefully planned and coordinated effort is necessary over a term of years."

The Mail and Empire of September 6, 1934, quoted the minister as follows:

The Minister of Agriculture has a plan for the districts in which soil erosion prevails. He would remove them from provincial jurisdiction and form them into a federal area. Then he would inaugurate a policy of strip farming along with the cultivation of suitable grasses and coarse grains. He has expressed the belief that within ten years it would be possible to alter the entire face of the countryside, to bring the land back to its old fibrous state, and to have the farmers self-supporting during the process. His scheme would include the damming of streams for a more effective use of the water supply which is available.

A little later Premier Bracken of Manitoba made a valuable addition to the discussion of reclamation. It might be interesting to note that the premier is a dry farming expert and I believe his textbook in connection with dry farming is generally accepted by agricultural colleges. On October 25, 1934, Premier Bracken put forward certain proposals in this connection. The first was the offer by the provinces of the services of such technical men and departments, without charge, as can be utilized in the prosecution of such a major project. The next was the appointment by the dominion of a coordinating body to correlate the thousand and one efforts being made in a variety of directions by many individuals, both in and out of public service, and by many departments both of governments and of universities. The third was the provision by the dominion for the necessary additional finances to ensure the successful carrying out of a sane, well-balanced program over the next ten years. The fourth was the active and sympathetic and generous cooperation of individuals, communities, railways and governments in a joint effort to solve a major problem.

I believe the proposals made this afternoon by the minister more than cover the suggestions made by Premier Bracken. Other aids are to be provided in connection with this matter of reclamation. The government is to furnish the very necessary funds, and perhaps that is most important. The plan of setting a township aside for demonstration is very good as this work should be done on a large scale. Smaller demonstration plots will be laid out to show what can be done by the individual intelligent farmer. I think great care has been taken in the preparation of these proposals but I would suggest that the experience and opinion of the men who may have lived in a dried out area for forty years or more should be considered. I have confidence in experts but I have greater confidence in a man who has demonstrated over a period of years that he can carry on successfully in spite of drought conditions. I was glad to note that the minister called into conference at Ottawa experts from different parts of Canada. I might mention in particular Mr. T. C. Main, who has given a great part of his life to the study of this particular question. Much material has been gathered on this subject, but the time has come when it should be demonstrated whether or not the different theories will work.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) stated that dams will not make rain. That statement may be correct but at the same time dams will prevent the actual rainfall from running off the land. Many mistakes have been made in the past. The practice has been to drain any pond that might be located on a farm in order to obtain more land. The result was the drying up of more land. The same thing was done in the case of lakes. There was a large lake in my area known as Whitewater lake. An attempt was made to drain this lake in order that the land which it covered might be cultivated. The result was that the surrounding district was made much drier that it had been in the past. The construction of roads has had a harmful effect. In the province of Manitoba alone there are 3,600 miles of highway with ditches on both sides. The result of the building of these ditches has been the running off of thousands of tons of water which could have been conserved. It is very necessary that streams should be damned up, as well as any small runways. This would prevent the usual spring runoff. This is an engineering problem but I believe much assistance could be given by men who have come through these difficult times. They know from their own experience just what should be done. I would point out that the Souris river runs right through the drought area of Manitoba and this river could be used for demonstrating the value of dams throughout drought area A, the worst district in the province.

The hon. member for Lisgar pointed out that you must have rain before you can have trees. I would point out to him that trees have been planted and have continued to grow within these drought areas. During the last four years I have planted some fifteen hundred trees on my own farm and I believe at least ninety per cent of them have continued to grow. Our practice in the past in connection with trees was very bad. Many trees were cut down and in some cases where they could not be cut down fast enough, a fire was started. The result was that in addition to wasting wood which could have been used, we lost the benefit which would have been derived from the trees. Shelter belts are most necessary. In spite of what has been said by so many experts, I think we must turn to England and Russia for proof that the planting of trees has proved of tremendous value. In England 45,000,000 trees are planted each year and I think this is some indication that they are not doing it just for the fun of sticking trees in the ground. Such planting has a definite value in the wood produced besides preventing soil drifting to a certain extent. The Russian experiment in the planting of trees has proved a success. Demonstration plots which have been laid out prove that trees provide a greater conservation of moisture and bring about an increased rainfall. The rainfall in the northern part of Manitoba has been only slightly greater than that in the south, there being probably a difference of an inch of rain during the year. In the north they have had good crops but they have not had such crops in the south. We could have conserved that moisture in the south by trees or by cultural practices, and we should have had in the south, had we done so, as good a crop as they had in the north. Dean Shaw of the university of Saskatchewan is an expert who points to the value of cultural practices but overlooks the value which may accrue from the planting of trees and the building of dams. In the past we have misused the soil. Our cultural practices have been to get as much wheat in one year as possible, trying it again the next year, and continuing in that way. We have not had the summer fallow every second year, nor have we had to a sufficient degree strip farming. We have kept on getting as much out of the land as we could and have not replaced by means of fertilizer anything we have taken out, with the result that the land has been steadily getting poorer. It is necessary through these cultural practices to save if possible every ounce of moisture which comes to the land. By these practices also we could stop the general runoff of water in the spring. These practices are of great value. But what happens when you call in an expert? Dean Shaw, for instance, seems in my opinion to be able to see cultural practices only. Call in experts in regard to trees and they can see only the trees, and the engineer believes that you have only to use the dam in order to conserve the water. I am glad to note that in the present program it is intended to use all these experts for what they are worth, giving them an opportunity to demonstrate whether they can actually create the conditions which they think they can. The minister indicated today that grasses are to be used which will demonstrate that pastures can be created. If it is possible to get grasses sufficiently hardy to be used on the submarginal lands, then in the future we shall be able to have larger pastures, such as we ought to have had in the past, and we shall then be able to go into mixed farming in a way that we have not done in the past. If possible those lands which are known as the light lands should be taken out of cultivation. It is a most heartbreaking thing to see people moving into a district and going on a farm which has never in its existence yielded a proper return to anyone who owned it—to see newcomers going on such a farm, spending a few years on it only to leave and be replaced by someone else who will work his heart out trying to earn a living on submarginal land.

Crested wheat grass has, I think, undoubtedly proven that it is of tremendous value provided you can get it started. That is the real difficulty. You need a certain degree of moisture before you can get it started. I planted crested wheat grass and was unsuccessful owing to the fact that there was not sufficient moisture in that area. Where it can be started it is of considerable value and we should use it. We should also have larger pastures than we have had in the past.

The need for action is immediate because seasonal preparations are being made at the present time within that area. Certain farmers are moving out to other areas and if they knew what was coming some of them would remain while others would not. It is immediately necessary to demonstrate what can be done in order that these people may know precisely where they stand. I would urge that the farmers themselves should be consulted, and I am glad to note that that is contemplated in the plan with regard to the smaller areas. The plan would indicate that certain farmers who in the past have been fairly successful will be given assistance to demonstrate to the rest of the community what can be done under these conditions. In connection with the plan itself, I very much fear the return of good crops. That may be a strange thing to say, but I fear it for the reason that if good crops return we shall never have a reclamation scheme and therefore we shall not be able to demonstrate, as we should have demonstrated in the past, that these dry periods recur from time to time. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) spoke of times in Manitoba long before I was born and gave evidence to show that such periods have occurred before. We should bear in mind that they have occurred before and probably will occur again. That is a most important thing to keep in mind, because when we are having good crops we think that they will get better every year. I submit that we should not be caught napping again as we have been in the past. Future rains will blot out the memory of the dry periods, but such periods will come again and we must be prepared for them.

I should like the minister to bring his experts to the area I represent so that they may see the actual situation for themselves and understand it from firsthand knowledge. This is very necessary. It is all very well to visualize it 1,500 miles away, but it is different when you go there and see conditions as they are. Had they been there in 1925, 1926, 1927 or 1928 they would have thought that in that country we had the finest land in Canada. In times of adversity we must remember that formerly lands flourished and bloomed, and in times of plenty we should remember on the other hand that sand piles up and in some instances the winds do much damage; the fence posts entirely disappear and you have a condition that suggests the sand dunes of Africa. As I say, these conditions will occur again and every possible aid should be employed to meet the situation.

I should recommend the use of the Canadian Conservation Institute, which has started in Winnipeg and, I think, will spread to other parts of Canada. It is a very useful organization, gathering material and giving advice which will be helpful in the solution of the problem. I think also that the National Research Council should be used. No doubt it will be used for various purposes to overcome that difficulty. That council in the past has given inestimable advice with respect to various problems that confront this country and it can do so again. We must if possible avoid the practices that have prevailed in the past of cutting down timber, mining the land instead of having the summer fallow, and so on. These things must be avoided in the future and we must start our reclamation program. This must be started at once lest greater harm be done than has so far taken place. This calls for action and I would point out that if something be not done now the opportunity will be lost as far as reclamation is concerned, because the country will come back and demonstrate its ability to produce crops. If that demonstration takes place immediately all thought of reclamation will be forgotten and those who follow us will go down as we have done and discover once more that Joseph was right. Dry periods necessarily follow periods of plenty.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Coming from the drought area of Saskatchewan, I appreciate very much the action the Minister of Agriculture is taking in bringing this legislation before the house. I am also glad that there is apparently some cooperation between the minister's department and the same department of the Saskatchewan government, and I hope during the administration of this reclamation scheme that cooperation will be continued. It is not my intention to endeavour to advise the minister how that area should be reclaimed. He has in Swift Current an experimental farm that has been studying the situation for the past five years, ever since the drought affected us so seriously. All the information that has been collected there is available to him, and various men from the west have made written reports on what they believe should be done. The minister in his opening words to-day said that it was the intention of his department under this legislation to carry on investigational work. I understand from that he means that he through his officials will consult with the old residents in that area, gather what data they have collected during many years of actual living there, and will, without tying himself to any particular scheme, put into effect the plan that all this data will lead him to believe is the proper one to adopt in order to reclaim that district.

The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) made a remark which I want to stress to some extent. He said that in dealing with the situation there, "We should not overlook the men who have carried on without assistance in spite of drought conditions." In other words, the men who have been able to make a success, although to a very limited degree, of their farming operations, must not be overlooked in any reclamation project that is put into effect. One of the most important matters in connection with this whole project in the drought areas of the west is to bring back again to the people living there a little bit of the morale they had a few years ago, and those who have carried on in spite of the most adverse conditions must be encouraged to continue what they have done in the past. I have before me a letter from one of those men who have never received any relief. He has made his living off the land in some kind of way, and he has become actually discouraged with the situation in which he finds himself. He sees his neighbour willing to accept relief to the extent of hundreds of dollars; he realizes that if this land is ever reclaimed he is going to have to help to pay for that relief because it may not come out of the individual who gets it now, and he wonders whether it is worth his while to continue living as parsimoniously as he has done; if it is worth his while to continue to try to make ends meet. I want to read just a word or two from that letter, because I think it will give to those in the east who hardly realize what the people in the drought area have gone through, some indication of the situation. He says:

> I have had no crop for the last five years, not much prospect for next year.

This letter was received by me on December 8, 1934. He goes on to speak about the matter regarding which he has a complaint to make:

> The railway cut my land in half, put gates in just wide enough to get through with four horses, when we go through with six or eight we have to unhitch.

That is only one extract from that letter. In a subsequent letter he says:

> I am enclosing statement received from the board. I understood that the debt adjustment board was to help us poverty stricken farmers out of some of our difficulties. If they serve others as they have me we are just as well without them. Five years' crop failure with implements worn out, buildings going to ruin, before this can be paid I will owe them more than the place is worth at seven per cent interest, they sure are generous. In 1931 some of my neighbours got between $400 and $500 in relief; what happened, it was given to them. I never got one cent of relief. I schemed; what we couldn't get we done without. Again in 1934 some of my neighbours had as much crop as I did. No, sir, they didn't save it for seed, it was sold; let the government furnish the seed, clothes and food. Encouraging!

I am going to make this suggestion to the minister and also to the Minister of Finance: A little while ago we were discussing the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and I drew the attention of the Minister of Finance to some of the difficulties that we encounter in the drought area. I believe it is necessary for all departments of government that are concerned with that area to endeavour to make arrangements whereby debts will be reduced. Let me put the matter in this way. The farmers who went out into those districts some years ago invested what money they had, and spent years of work trying to build up their farms, used just as good judgment as did the men who bought dominion government bonds, and the former constitute a more valuable asset to Canada than do the men who bought the bonds. Those farmers have put in their lives in that district and many of them are now up in years. In the past five years they have seen the work of their whole life go by the board. At best their holdings are not now worth more than fifty per cent of what they were worth a few years ago, and as a matter of fact most of those lands could not be sold at the present time at any price. After using just as good judgment in going into that area as anybody else in Canada used in making investments, they have seen the work of a lifetime cut in two, and in many cases it has vanished altogether. It is really a famine condition in that area. In my opinion there is no use telling those farmers: We are going to work out some reclamation scheme and after we get it worked out, we expect you to follow our instructions and to pay those debts that were incurred on the land at the price at which it sold before we realized it was a drought area; debts that were incurred at a time when farmers were receiving high prices for their products, and we expect you to pay interest thereon. I honestly believe there must be a substantial cut in all debts in that whole drought area. Mortgage companies will have to take their losses. Some people say the mortgage companies only borrow their money from estates, from widows and orphans and so on. I do not know how many widows and orphans are going to suffer through a cut in that debt structure, when you come down to the final analysis, but I do say that the people holding securities in these mortgage, trust and insurance companies can better afford to take the loss than the men who are struggling to reclaim the land. I believe these people can well afford to share that burden. It is not fair that this group of men and women and children as well, who have done everything in their power to carry on, should bear all the loss resulting from the calamity that has overtaken them. If the land was not fit for cultivation the government never should have opened it for settlement. They encouraged the people to go there, and I say they were encouraged to put forth the efforts they have expended on the land.

Just in order to strengthen what I have said, or that my words may endorse what has been said by these people, I want to read part of a resolution that was passed at a certain gathering of farmers, who realize their rather hopeless situation. They do not ask for a fifty per cent reduction in their debt, though I believe it would be in the interests of all concerned if a general reduction of fifty per cent could be made throughout the whole area. This is what they ask for:

1. That all arrears of taxes be reduced fifty per cent and the remaining fifty per cent be then consolidated.
2. That owing to the shortage of horse power and the poor state of farm machinery and farms (very few machines having been purchased during the immediate past five years) sufficient funds be retained from the first paying crop to replace worn out and aged horses and repair and replace the essential machinery so that the business of farming may be carried on efficiently.
3. That interest on all debts from January 1, 1929, to date of adjustment be cancelled.
4. That all short term mortgages and agreements for sale be extended for a period of at least twenty years from January 1, 1935.
5. That all existing long term mortgages be extended for a period of at least five years.
6. That interest on all mortgages be reduced to a maximum of five per cent.
7. That mortgage company's share of crop be not more than one-quarter clear and that no share be payable to mortgage company unless the balance of crop left for the farmer be at least ten bushels per acre of wheat out of which the farmer must furnish seed, pay taxes, thresh bill, etc.
8. That when wheat yield is not more than ten bushels per acre, only taxes be paid and that time payment on all other debts be automatically extended for one year; also that no pressure be brought to bear on any debtor when wheat average is ten bushels per acre or less.

That may sound, to people in the east, rather an extreme resolution, but as the hon. member for Souris knows and as many hon. members on this side who have been through that drought area also realize, it is impossible to reclaim that area unless the farmers who are still there can be encouraged to carry on. I believe it is as important as anything the minister can do to restore the morale to those people.

Now just a word in regard to the towns and cities, particularly the city of Swift Current, which I represent. It was not exactly through drought conditions that this city got into financial difficulties; at one time it was sort of a boom town. We grew a little too fast; we spent too much money, and then we met with certain misfortunes. Some years ago that city had to approach its creditors. An adjustment was made; the time for the payment of the indebtedness was extended for a period of five years; interest was reduced, but nothing was done in regard to the principal. That agreement was renewed for a further period, and at the time of the renewal all interest in arrears other than the percentage that was agreed to be paid was wiped out. Within the next year or two we will have to make a further adjustment with these creditors, by reason of the expiration of that agreement. Conditions are very much worse now; something over twenty-five per cent of the population are on relief. The other day the mayors of many Canadian cities were in Ottawa, and most hon. members of the house know the situation that exists in those cities. In addition to having twenty-five per cent of the people on relief there is another large percentage of people who are not able to pay their taxes. As a result the cost of relief in that city—and it is not alone by any means—is falling on fewer and fewer ratepayers all the time. When the time comes to consider the renewal of the agreement I believe the only fair thing so far as the people of the community are concerned, and also so far as the creditors are concerned if they ever expect to get any principal, would be to make a straight cut of fifty per cent of the indebtedness. The property there is not worth fifty per cent of what it was worth a few years ago. It simply means that the debenture holders have made a bad investment, just as some of the people living in that city have made a bad investment, and both will have to share the tragedy that has come upon the country.

The illustration I have given in regard to the city of Swift Current applies equally well to the whole drought area. I have a similar resolution from another town out there. I need not mention the name, but I understand a copy has been sent to the minister. The resolution states that it is impossible for the ratepayers to continue to carry the burden of relief. We heard that statement so often in connection with the visit here of the mayors of the various western cities that I need not labour the point. When we have the minister here working with the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture—and I am speaking particularly of the province of Saskatchewan and that portion of the province within the drought area—who was one of the officers of his own department until a year or so ago, a gentleman of whom I am sure he as well as I have a high opinion, I am sure the difficulty will be solved as far as that may be possible.

Hon. J. G. Taggart, Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan, has a plan which I should like to read to the committee, and which I believe will work well in conjunction with the plan outlined to-day by the Minister of Agriculture here. Mr. Taggart's proposition is as follows:

> Divide the province into a number of small units, each comprising some eight municipalities. Into each area send a person armed with available information regarding the climate, soil, crops, finances and other records concerning the locality. This person, to be made available through the aid of the University of Saskatchewan, would confer with municipal heads and farmers of the locality, glean from them their experience, and then form a basis for immediate action.
> Certain lands might have to be abandoned; others could be put to different uses; new lands might be opened up. Generally, agriculture could be reorganized and reestablished on the basis of scientific information.

You see the picture we have; the federal Minister of Agriculture operating three experimental plots in scattered portions of the drought area of the province of Saskatchewan. Those plots would consist of one township each, and all possible information would be obtained from the experiments, such information being passed on to the provincial department in Saskatchewan. Then we have a supervisor for every eight municipalities in the province who would be disseminating this information, advising the farmers, consulting with them, examining their soil, telling them what their land could be used for, telling them what kind of crops their lands are best suited for, and how they should be worked and operated. If there is any possibility of saving that country I believe this action should do it. If in addition the minister would consider the matter of debt structure in the drought stricken area, and working through the appropriate departments in conjunction with provincial authorities, would consult with the mortgage companies and others holding claims against that area and would recommend making a reduction to give encouragement to the farmers, I believe in the course of a few years those areas of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta could be reclaimed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): So that I will not omit any points which have been raised I shall take this opportunity to deal with some of the observations made by hon. members who have spoken. The problem which has confronted departments of agriculture is one which is known in one way or another to almost every person in Canada. The challenge to those who hold positions of authority is whether or not we have left undone anything which should have been done to alleviate the difficulties through which those people have passed. In passing may I pay a tribute, one which I believe is hardly necessary, to the fact that although during the last four years millions upon millions of dollars have been poured into that large area of Canada this is one expenditure upon which all Canadians have agreed, and against which no criticisms have been raised. But the load the country has carried in endeavouring to assist the people in that area who through no fault of their own have found themselves in these unfortunate circumstances, pales into insignificance when it is compared with the load which the people in those districts have carried. No words could describe their difficulties as emphatically as a first-hand observation of the difficulties under which they have been living. I realized that fact when last October I attended a meeting of farmers and farmers' wives held in the midst of one of the larger drought areas. One could see unmistakable evidence on the faces of those people who sat in front of me at the meeting of the trying conditions through which they had lived. The lines in their faces were sufficient evidence for any person. Despite their difficulties however, with the optimism of pioneers still in them they were building and planning in the hope that conditions would improve.

The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) has stated truly that all they need is something to keep up their morale, and it was with that in mind—together with other points which I did not think we would have discussed in such detail at this time, but would have waited until the bill was before the committee—that we have asked the mortgage companies of western Canada to name at least one of their ablest men to act on the advisory committee, and it is again for that reason we made a similar request of the bankers' association, and some other organizations. If this is a national problem the whole country must work in cooperation. No person realizes more than I do the difficulties which must be met; there is a part which each must play. Those people living in the areas will devote their time and I believe they will do that voluntarily because I have under my hand a summary of the offers which have been made since this project was given publicity. As these offers have been received they have been passed on to a small committee and have been listed, and following that investigations have been made to ascertain those who could best help.

The people living in the district will give their time, their labour and will make available the land they own. Our work is to give them all the expert advice and assistance we can give them. At this point may I correct an impression which seems to be general. There is a tendency on the part of certain people to associate experts with theoretical people, and I do not believe that association is fair. The experts, so called, who will deal with this problem in both the provincial and federal departments, are not theoretical people. They are experts because they know the practical difficulties, and no people can appreciate to a greater degree than they can the great efforts, the success and the intelligence of the farmers who throughout this time have made a success of farming in those areas. The whole program has been built around those key men, because all will admit that they know more than any other people about the difficulties and the efforts which have been made towards a solution of those difficulties. Many farmers right in the worst sections of the dried out areas have had crops and, as the hon. member for Swift Current has stated, have been able to carry on. It is almost impossible for us to understand how they have been able to do so. We have investigated the reasons for their success as compared with the lack of satisfactory results obtained by farmers around them.

Upon a number of occasions the hon. member for Swift Current expressed the hope that there would be and the belief that there should be cooperation in this matter. To entertain any possible doubt of cooperation in the matter would, it seems to me, almost amount to a criticism of my efforts. To satisfy the hon. member and other hon. members who may follow him may I say that a national advisory committee on agricultural services has been set up in each province of the Dominion of Canada. That is, in each province of Canada joint committees are interlocked. Here we may have a committee on grain, on livestock or on grasses on which there would be a representative of the province, one from the agricultural college and one from the federal Department of Agriculture. Those committees are doing investigational work in their own particular lines of agriculture. They are not acting as separate units, but act in cooperation, and will continue so to do. At the present time in the province of Saskatchewan and in the other provinces work of this very nature is being carried on. These committees do not proceed each in its own line; they meet two or three times in the year to review all available information to bear on the problems remaining to be solved. For that reason I say that in the ordinary acceptance of the term we have not separate departments. So far as agriculture throughout the dominion is concerned we work as one body, and could not work more closely if in fact we were concentrated in one department. I have no doubt the hon. member for Swift Current had not realized just to what extent the cooperation has been exercised.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In uttering those words it was not my intention to express any criticism in that regard. It was really to set at rest some of the rumours that have been circulating and which I thought should be set at rest.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is just what I was going to say, that I had no doubt my hon. friend did not have that in mind. With reference to debts and accrued interest, we have representatives on the advisory committee, and from the very nature of the publicity which centres on a closer relationship and an even better understanding than they have now of the necessity of keeping these people free from any worry so far as possible and giving them every encouragement, it is hoped that they will be able to devote their whole energy in cooperation with all the different phases of life in Canada to the reclamation of that area where there has been such a national and such a costly calamity.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) made a point that I think was well taken when he said that we should not lead people to be too optimistic about this program; that it was all to the good to dam up water, but that the people should not be led to expect too much. I thought I had made clear in my statement the one thing that in our estimation should be given prominence in this program more than anything else, and that is: What can we do that we have not done to make it possible for these people to be self-sustaining to a greater degree than they are, and to be more thoroughly prepared if this present condition does not last, to meet drought conditions if there should be a recurrence of them. The basis of our work is a study of the people who have farmed in the district and who have made use of trees and dams and grasses and cultural methods, and then after an analysis and a summing up of what the experts so called have felt were the most important factors in each case, they will be able to place before a committee of farmers themselves in each province information that will be the basis on which all the work will be done.

Mr. DONNELLY: Mr. Chairman, for the last four or five years this question of the drought area in western Canada has occupied the attention of a great many people throughout the dominion. Last year I brought it to the attention of the house, and I am glad to know that at the present time the government are bringing in a bill to do what they think can be done in order to better conditions in what is known as the drought area in western Canada.

In order that the committee may obtain some vague idea of the importance of this question I should like to give to hon. members an idea of how large a territory is covered and what I mean when I speak of the drought area in western Canada.

In the year 1929 a small portion of the south central part of Saskatchewan, about one hundred miles square, had no crop. We had dry weather and there was a drought area consisting of a district about one hundred miles square. Since that time this drought area has gradually spread until it has reached into Manitoba and to the foothills of Alberta, the area east and west extending for four hundred miles, and north and south in a triangular shape for a distance of 150 to 200 miles. It stretches over a large portion of what is known in western Canada as the short grass country or the open prairies. That district in years gone by has produced wealth amounting from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 a year, but in the last few years it has been producing no crops whatever, and that has been through no fault whatever of the people living there. It has been simply due to the fact that there has been little or no rainfall.

Some may speak of soil drifting and all that, but the fact of the matter is that we know that if we had rain, soil drifting would not be anything to contend with, and would present no difficulty whatever. It is because we have had no rain or not sufficient rain to produce a crop in what is known as the short grass country or the open prairies.

Let me also say with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) that this district is occupied by our own Canadian people. It is open prairie, the part that was easiest to bring under cultivation, and the result was that our own Canadian people went to the open prairie and brought it under cultivation. The foreigner from central Europe is the one who went to the park areas or to what are known as the wooded areas and cleared his land in there. So I repeat that the people living in that drought section are Canadian people or of the Anglo-Saxon race. Now this section of country for the last four years before these drought conditions came, did produce crops. This south central portion of Saskatchewan where the drought area began, for some twenty years produced crops, and good crops. It produced the best wheat that was grown in the world. It produced more wheat and better wheat than any other part of the world. I remember quite well speaking to one of our Canadian Pacific Railway officials, and referring to the line of railway running into that district and saying that it was the best paying branch line in western Canada. It produced more wealth than any other part of western Canada year after year. But when the drought arrived in 1929, then for year after year we had crop failures in that area.

Some ask, why do not the people that are in there move out and go into other districts? Let me say this. I know many of the men that went in there practically with nothing in 1908 and 1909. They took up 320 acres of land, and since then they have probably bought another 320 or 640 acres. They built good buildings, they made good homes for themselves, they fenced their land, and now they have 640 or 960 acres of land, and they have made their living by farming that land. Now they are 55 or 60 years of age, and it is pretty hard to ask these people to leave everything behind them, and get out and go into another district, perhaps to scrub land and hew out a home for themselves up there. In fact they won't do it; it is impossible to get them to do it. There are many people leaving that district, but they are chiefly those who are living on rented farms or have such large mortgages on their farms that they have very little equity in them. Some of these people are moving out, leaving the older settlers and the best settlers behind them in that dried out area.

Now as to what can be done or what should be done for these people in the drought area, there are various opinions as to the cause of present conditions. But in my opinion they are due to nothing but a lack of rainfall, the need of rain. There are many theories and many ideas as to why we have no rainfall or not sufficient rainfall. Many people say that the main thing to do is to get back to the old conditions that existed before the land was taken up or that existed when the land was homesteaded years ago. If we get back to those conditions, then problably we shall have rain again. This will mean that we will get back to having small bodies of water scattered over the country in the form of sloughs and lakes. A lot of the land will be covered with vegetation. One of the theories in connection with this drought is that there is not sufficient moisture in the land to keep the air cool. The warm air from the south carries the moisture and it is precipitated when it meets the cool northern air but at the present time this air is warm also. The result is that the warm air from the south mingles with the northern air without bringing about precipitation. It is claimed that if we got back to the old conditions we would have rainfall again. That may be true but we should do whatever is possible to store up moisture in different places.

The government should use the men now in the relief camps. These men are doing practically nothing at the present time and they could be put to work in the building of dams in western Canada. This work would prove of benefit to the farmers and might bring about a change in climatic conditions. These men would be able to do work which would be of advantage to the country.

I believe the planting of trees would be of doubtful value. This section of the country is not like that referred to by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis). In his part of the country trees once grew but they never grew in our part, it was wide open prairie. I know a man who planted ten or twelve acres of trees around his home as a shelter belt. He had fifteen or twenty rows of trees but when I visited him last fall I found this shelter belt drifted in with tumbleweed and Russian thistle. The trees had all died and all he had was a dyke about fifteen feet in height all around his place. I do not think trees will bring moisture; I think moisture brings trees. I have seen other places where 25,000 to 50,000 trees have been planted, but in practically every case all the trees have died from the drought of the last five years. It may be all right to spend a lot of money on the planting of trees but in my opinion it will prove of doubtful value.

I agree with the hon. member for Souris that it would be of benefit if some sort of grass could be got to grow. However we have found it very difficult to get crested wheat grass or the other grasses like brome or sweet clover to take root. I have known of cases where some of these grasses have been planted for three years in succession but there was not a single spear to be seen. It does not blow or drift away, it simply will not grow as there is not enough moisture. If you can get a grass of this type to grow, well and good, but the difficulty is to get it to take root.

I believe that much of the dried out areas will have to be left in an uncultivated condition. When we bring all our land under cultivation and have our summer fallows, great heat is developed and the evaporation is more rapid. We need more moisture than we have at the present time. Last year up until the end of June we thought we had a crop but there was no rain after that time and the result was a crop failure.

I suggest to the minister that the municipalities should be put in charge of this work. The people could be given work and thus taken off the dole. Plant trees if you like, build dams or do anything, but give work to these people. The closer the government can get to the people through the municipal authorities, the better it will be. Our municipalities have absolutely no money with which to grant relief. When they do grant any they simply sign notes and pass on the obligation to the provincial government. The provincial governments have no money and they are forced to borrow from the dominion government. The federal government will have to finance this work and if these people can be provided with employment it will improve their morale to a great extent.

The provincial governments should cooperate with the dominion government. The provincial ministers of agriculture could give assistance while the departments of telephones and schools are interested in this class of work. They should be able to cooperate with the government and assist in many ways. I contend that the main problem of financing this work rests with the dominion government. This problem which faces western Canada is the most important problem facing the country at the present time. I believe it is as important as our railway problem. There are two or three hundred thousand people in these areas who are solely dependent upon their crops. Anything that can be done to help these people should be done. I believe that in years to come we will again have sufficient rainfall; we had it in the past and we will probably have it again in the future. In the meantime it is the duty of all governments, municipal, provincial and federal, to cooperate with each other to relieve the condition in which these people find themselves.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the various speeches made this afternoon, especially those by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), and the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis). I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Lisgar. He goes back to the days of experience, and experience is what is needed at a time like this. My sympathy goes out to the people in and around Swift Current. It does not seem like so many years ago—in reality it goes back many years—when they undertook to grow grain in that district, but their efforts were an absolute failure. I remember Sir Lester Kaye who owned 10,000 acres around Swift Current. He imported water carts and undertook to water the grain. Any old timer from that district will remember the circumstances quite well. There was no rain there; it never rained, and they imported rain makers and tried in every way to get water because it was impossible to grow grain. My sympathy goes out therefore to those people who went there to farm. I remember the drought referred to by the hon. member for Lisgar—the drought that occurred in 1885. It was a serious one and the pioneers at that time suffered and bore it; they fought it. But I say for the benefit of this house that this is the end of the seven years; we have had the seven years, and I do not think that next year you will want any water conservation. I believe that next year we shall have two crops in one. We have had two crops in one in that western country, and I can tell you that there is all the difference in the world between having rain on the land and not having it. Soil drifting? Yes; but give us a year such as we are looking for this year and, with the faith of the old pioneers in that western country, we shall come back in the west and we shall not need to ask the minister for any expenditures for the conservation of water because we shall have enough of it. We have not suffered so much in the constituency I represent though we have had years when we could have done with more water; we should like to have had more rain. However, my sympathy goes out to the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell), because I do not believe that is a farming country. It is on the tail end of the chinook belt. I have seen the grass dry, I have seen it cured in June, and I do not know for the life of me how any man could ever farm on that land.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The hon. member knows that that area has produced the best wheat and the best crops of any place in the west in different years.

Mr. MULLINS: It has; but may I ask the hon. member how many years in ten.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In a sufficient number of years to enable the people to build as fine homes as can be found in the west.

Mr. MULLINS: Yes; I agree with the hon. member that if that land gets moisture you can grow a crop and it does grow good grain. But it is susceptible to the chinook belt and the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that it is on the tail end of that belt that comes from the mountains and peters out around Swift Current. I repeat, however, that my sympathy goes out to these people, and anything the minister can do to help them I will support. I would agree to the expenditure of any money to help them. The hon. gentleman will remember that in Medicine Hat we had a rain maker named Hatfield. He tried to make rain and he took a lot of money. In the west we will try any new thing, any old scheme or any old political party they want to form. We have a new one in Alberta, and we are susceptible to any kind of political party that comes forward in that country. Well, they brought a rain maker named Hatfield—

Mr. POULIOT: Does it include social legislation?

Mr. MULLINS: —and he took a lot of money from the people of Medicine Hat. I do not think he was in the Swift Current district but he operated at Medicine Hat and he was a failure, just like the man they imported named Sapiro. All these novices have been imported in the west, but the spirit of the old pioneer will prevail. My hon. friend is one of the pioneers and I always like to shake hands with him. We have faced the elements, we have fought drought before, and we have asked nothing from anybody. I say therefore that the same spirit will bring that country back. I would not waste any money unnecessarily until we see what the conditions really are. I have lived out there and I believe that this will be a wet year.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I am sure the minister will be highly pleased with the general acceptance of his proposal. This problem of the drought area in the west is now recognized definitely as a national one; everyone agrees that it is. If there is any place where national planning should be put to the test—and I say this particularly to my hon. friends in the corner—it is in this drought area, because after all the picture presented here this afternoon by hon. members living in that area must have demonstrated conclusively to others who are not as familiar with the conditions that exist there how grave the problem is. Fortunately for myself, I am just on the edge of the drought area, but my particular concern now is whether or not that area will extend and take in a larger territory which will include at least a part of my constituency. I was very much interested in the historical sketch given this afternoon by the hon. member for Lisgar with regard to his early experience in Manitoba. I have heard many of the older people of the province relate similar experiences, and the strange fact is that we can have such extremely different conditions in one province, varying from one district to another. I have mentioned before the incident of part of an area in my constituency which I should judge was not more than 150 miles away from the dryest part of Manitoba, where they have suffered for several years since this dry period started by having flood conditions, and drainage was a problem with them. It is difficult to appreciate the fact that these two conditions exist in one province, but it is a fact.

I do not propose to say much at this time seeing that the matter has been well covered by those who have already spoken, but I would emphasize again the condition that may affect the adjoining areas or the condition that may be created should the drought area extend. No doubt the minister appreciates the possibilities of the extension of the drought area, and I think it is time we considered taking steps to prevent encroachment upon further territory. I do not know whether anything is contemplated in this resolution in that regard, but I should hope that something will be done to encourage people to adopt sound farming policies in those areas where experience has shown that such policies have not been in force. I think it is important to bear that fact in mind, and the only thing I would urge on the minister in that regard is the lending of some assistance to procure grass seed and to take care of publicity work with respect to strip farming and corn growing. I think that very special consideration should be given to that part of Manitoba located within the drought area to try to establish it as the corn belt of the province. There is a possibility in that area for corn growing that would be of particular benefit not only to the district itself, but to the rest of the province. Corn has been successfully grown in Manitoba and that area is especially well suited to it.

I was pleased to note this afternoon, when the minister was discussing this measure, his reference to the information that the department had gathered and the people that he hoped would interest themselves in the rehabilitation of this drought area. There is in this district such a large interest on the part of so many different classes that it is imperative we get the wholehearted cooperation and support of as many people as possible. The farmers themselves are the first ones who have a big stake there; then there are the business people who are established in the towns, and in addition there are the railways. There are also involved insurance companies, mortgage companies and so forth. Therefore it is necessary to bring together under any organization that is going to carry out a policy of rehabilitating this drought area just as many people as possible.

I should like to refer in passing to some publicity activity that has been going on in Manitoba; I think the organization that has been doing this work is called the Conservation League. I should also like in passing to emphasize what the hon. member for Swift Current mentioned. The indebtedness of the farmers themselves in that drought area is such that their condition will be so discouraging that they will not be able to face the future with any degree of confidence unless measures are taken to give them some assurance that they will be placed in a position to earn a livelihood for their declining years. If that is not done, I doubt very much whether we can expect them to put forth their best endeavours in connection with any policy of rehabilitation.

That is not the only problem. Even if we are successful in years to come in rehabilitating that area, we must still deal with the question how these people are to be sustained in the interval. We cannot expect immediate results, although we may hope for them, so the problem is one that will require the best efforts of everyone interested and the cooperation not only of this Department of Agriculture, but also of the provincial departments of agriculture, the business people interested, the municipalities and the local residents. I hope some means may be found whereby we can secure the wholehearted cooperation of the individual farmers themselves in that area. I believe that will be secured for the most part, one danger being that if we should have a period of greater precipitation with improved crop conditions, it may be just a little difficult to carry out the plans which may be prepared and intended to be used as a means of permanently rehabilitating the area. History has shown that drought conditions have recurred time and time again, and the fact that we may get a good crop for a few seasons may make us forget the hardships through which we have passed.

I feel satisfied that we can do a good deal in connection with this scheme, and I am pleased that the minister has seen his way clear to introduce this measure now, recognizing that the problem is a national one.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As I had an opportunity of discussing this matter about ten days ago on the minister's estimates, it will not be necessary for me to say much now, particularly as we shall have another opportunity on the second reading of the bill. Both before and since I last spoke, I have been reading up the story of the deserts in Arabia and Palestine. When we were young and going to school, if the word "desert" came up we always thought of the Sahara. Now we know something of the work of archeologists in Palestine, how they have been exhuming cities that have been buried there, where once fertile land is now covered by sand. Three thousand years afterwards this has been dug up and exposed to the world. I think this was about the time when King Tut was entombed. This shows us that deserts grow. Like the last speaker, I thought I lived on the edge of the drought area in Saskatchewan and I did so for over forty years, but the last six years have revealed to us that a desert really grows. It extends over the adjoining area until the whole country may be involved in it unless some action of an effective nature is taken. To my mind, there is no secret about the matter. There was no drifting of soil when we went into that section half a century ago except along the buffalo trails or cart trails where the sod was broken. What we have to do is to restore the grass covering; that is an immense job, but it must be done. The minister is on the right track and he has two good officers who have lived for a time in that area. There is Doctor Kirk who homesteaded or purchased land there, and then there is Doctor Booth who was engaged in extension work for two or three years about the time the war broke out and who is well equipped in that and other respects.

I conclude—as it is just six o'clock—by wishing the minister well in this great undertaking. If my blessing is any good to him, why, I bestow it upon him. This work of rehabilitation on the wind swept prairie is no week end holiday, no midsummer pastime, and I think he knows it. It is the biggest thing of its kind undertaken in my time in the Dominion of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Weir (Melfort) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 55, to provide for the rehabilitation of drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. W. G. Weir.]

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Second report of the select standing committee on marine and fisheries.—Mr. Ernst.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE'S REPORT RESPECTING PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turnbull for the concurrence in the second report of the standing committee on industrial and international relations, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Cotnam.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said when on a former occasion this motion was discussed, and at which time the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) moved an amendment to the effect that the report be returned to the committee from which it came.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

COPYRIGHT ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ACT IN VIEW OF APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 58, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: The bill can be explained shortly. On March 22, P.C. 738 was passed appointing His Honour Judge James Parker senior judge of the county court of the county of York, province of Ontario, commissioner under part 1 of the Inquiries Act to investigate and report in respect of certain matters relating to performing rights in musical works, and the fees, royalties and charges exacted by the companies, societies and associations controlling those rights.

First the bill provides that broadcasting companies, theatres and others who wish to acquire performing rights may not be stayed by injunction for infringement if they actually pay or tender payment of the fees, charges and royalties prescribed in accordance with the statute. The second amendment is to the effect that, pending this inquiry and report, the Performing Right Society will not be permitted, except with the consent of the Secretary of State, to bring suits for infringement, for fees, charges and royalties or for an accounting, in order that, if necessry, there may be a revision in accordance with the law before such suits may be instituted or carried to a conclusion.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 56 for the relief of Emma Gelfman Goldman Stokolsky—Mr. Heaps.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MR. ELZÉAR BEAUREGARD

Mr. LAFLECHE:

How much has the government paid to Mr. Elzéar Beauregard, solicitor of Montreal, for professional services between 1921 and 1930?

Mr. CAHAN: $263.45.

MR. ÉLIE BEAUREGARD *

Mr. LAFLECHE:

What amount has been paid by the government in legal fees to Mr. Elie Beauregard, solicitor of Montreal, between 1921 and 1930?

Mr. CAHAN: There may be duplication here, Mr. Speaker, I gave an answer to question No. 3, asked by the same hon. gentleman, and that question appears to be repeated as question No. 5. I think both questions may now be answered with the information I have given.

Mr. SPEAKER: No. 3 is answered, but No. 5 will stand.

RIVIÈRE-DU-LOUP, QUE., WHARF EXTENSION

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Referring to sessional paper No. 200, reference No. 91 of February 25, 1935, when was the plan contained therein and showing proposed inside extension of Rivière-du-Loup wharf (a) drafted; (b) signed, and (c) received by the Department of Public Works in Ottawa?

2. Before or after the said plan showing proposed coppered steel sheet piling was drafted, signed and received in Ottawa, were any soundings taken around the said proposed piling?

3. If so, when and what are they?

4. If not, why, and how did the government (a) figure out, and (b) approve the estimated cost of that work, as it appears from vote No. 114 of the estimates for 1935-1936?

5. Is there any regulation in force in order to have plans drafted for the extension of wharves without preliminary soundings being taken?

6. If so, since when?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. The plan contained in sessional paper No. 200, reference No. 91 of February 25, 1935, is a photostat made from a print submitted by the district engineer to illustrate his report dated March 15, 1934. It is a copy of the plan which accompanied his report dated August 30, 1930, and showing soundings of dredging operations in front of the wharf at Rivière-du-Loup. He used a copy of this old plan, on which he added in outline the proposed extensions in front and in the rear of the landing-head of the wharf, dealt with in his report of March 15, 1934.

2. Soundings were taken in connection with dredging operations in 1933, which information was available to the district engineer in preparing his comparative estimates for wharf extensions, including the steel sheet piling projects.

3 and 4. Answered by No. 2.

5. Plans for wharf extensions are always based on preliminary soundings.

6. Answered by No. 5.

RIVIÈRE-DU-LOUP, QUE., WHARF PILING

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Does the plan of the proposed coppered steel sheet piling of the proposed extension to Rivière-du-Loup wharf contained in sessional paper No. 200, reference No. 91 of February 25, 1935, show the length of the western side of that piling (a) outside the wharf; (b) inside the wharf?

2. If not, what are they?

3. Does it show the length of that piling from east to west?

4. If not, what is it?

5. What is the proposed length of the east side of the head block of the wharf including that of the proposed piling?

6. Has the department ascertained the nature of the bottom of the river right over which it is proposed to construct such piling, in order to describe the nature of the footings required for its structure?

7. If so, when and what is it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1 to 5. The plan shows in a general way the existing landing-head, measuring 50 feet in width at the east and west ends, and 260 feet long to be enclosed, as well as the proposed triangular extension to the rear, with steel sheet piling extending around a length of some 620 feet of wharf face.

6. Borings have been taken around the landing-head of the wharf.

7. Borings made in May 1933; bottom for penetration of steel piling consists of sand, clay and stones.

AID TO DRY DOCKS

Mr. COWAN:

1. What dry docks in Canada are receiving aid from the Dominion of Canada?
2. What amount was paid to such dry docks authorized by statute or otherwise in each of the years 1921, to date?
3. When do the grants authorized by statute cease?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Saint John, N.B., dry dock; Montreal, P.Q., floating dry dock; Port Arthur, Ont., dry dock; Burrard dry dock at North Vancouver, B.C.; Prince Rupert, B.C., dry dock.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

INCOME TAX COLLECTIONS

Mr. COWAN:

1. What are the totals of the income tax collected in each of the years 1929 to 1934 inclusive?
2. What is the amount collected in each province for each of the said years?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Return tabled herewith.

ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY

On the order of government notices of motion:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I am responsible for the preparation of this address, and I find there are two slight corrections I should like to make. I therefore suggest that I should hand to the clerk of the house a corrected copy and have it reprinted to-morrow, so there will be no doubt as to the actual terms of the address.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

CONFERENCE OF MAYORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): In an article appearing in to-day's newspapers it is stated that the convention of mayors, which met some time ago in Montreal, has sent word to all the mayors of Canada stating that so far they have not received any answer from the dominion government. I think this has reference to the proposal made by that conference that the government should assume the entire cost of unemployment relief. I should like to ask the government if they have an answer to give and, if so, when it will be given.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I sent an answer to Mr. Houde, mayor of Montreal, who is chairman of the continuing committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I sent an answer to His Worship the Mayor of Montreal, who is chairman of the continuing committee of the conference, which I think must have crossed the statement appearing in the press. That answer will have been received by now.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Might I ask the leader of the government if he would be good enough to give the public and the house the answer he has sent the mayor of Montreal. It is in the public interest, I believe.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly it will be made public. I have not the letter with me at the moment.

BANK OF CANADA REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): I should like to present a request to the right hon. leader of the government. In the last four issues of the Canada Gazette there have appeared the weekly reports of the Bank of Canada, in English only. Would the right hon. gentleman be good enough to see if it would be possible to have these reports published in both languages?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): I will cause inquiries to be made of the Bank of Canada, and give the hon. gentleman the information as soon as we obtain it.

DATE OF BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the acting leader of the house whether the report appearing in the press this morning is correct, that the date for the six by-elections to fill vacancies existing in this house has been fixed as August 19?

Right Hon. SIR GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): That is quite correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say to the government that I am sure the electors of these constituencies will be tremendously pleased to learn that their only opportunity of being represented in this parliament will come after parliament itself is dissolved.

THE KING'S SILVER JUBILEE

DISTRIBUTION OF MEDALS IN COMMEMORATION OF EVENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) made inquiry with respect to the distribution of silver jubilee medals which will be available for public purchase. I find that the master of the Royal Canadian Mint, acting on behalf of the Royal Mint at London, has received a quantity which he has arranged to be distributed through the T. Eaton Company Limited, the Robert Simpson Company Limited, the Henry Morgan Company Limited, the Hudson's Bay Company and Mappin and Webb of Canada Limited.

RUMOURED JUDICIAL APPOINTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): On page 4 of the Montreal Gazette of to-day's date I read the following:

M.P. slated for bench. Montreal judgeship may go to Sullivan or Duranleau.

Has the government any information to give the house as to who is likely to win this race?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No information.

IMPORTS OF BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement in reply to questions asked by the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) and the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil). Imports of butter into Canada from the United Kingdom are not due as suggested by the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville, to the butter being "exported in transit," if by that the hon. member means shipped from an exporting country on an alternative bill-of-lading. Shipments of butter from exporting countries to the United Kingdom are not diverted to Canada while in transit.

In reply to that part of the hon. member's question as to whether imports from the United Kingdom are due to the fact that the United Kingdom is "producing more butter than they can consume." the answer is in the negative. The reason butter is imported from the United Kingdom is as follows. The tariff on butter entering Canada by direct shipment from New Zealand and Australia is, under the agreements with those dominions, 5 cents per pound while the British preferential rate of tariff applicable to shipments of butter from the United Kingdom is 8 cents per pound. Six to eight weeks are required to secure delivery in Canada of butter on direct shipment from Australia or New Zealand and deliveries in Canada of butter from the United Kingdom may be secured in about ten days time. For this reason buying from the United Kingdom is less speculative and if imports of butter into Canada during the late winter or spring months are necessary, Canadian importers prefer to pay the higher rate of duty and import from the United Kingdom rather than to risk buying so far ahead as is necessary in order to secure the lower tariff rates on direct shipments from either New Zealand or Australia. Below is a statement showing monthly imports into Canada of butter from the United Kingdom and other countries, and exports from Canada for the eleven months ending February 28, 1935, as requested by the hon. member from Laprairie-Napierville; also similar information for the year ending March 21, 1930, asked for by the hon. member from Compton:

BUTTER RETURNED TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As the minister is dealing with butter, perhaps he will give me the information asked for in question number 19 of the orders of the day of yesterday. When this matter was under discussion yesterday I directed attention to the fact that this question had been answered twice by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews). I do not want another answer from that minister, I would like one from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). I should like full information for the period from 1930 up to the present.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): During the discussion on my estimates I stated that of the butter shipped to the United Kingdom from this country something in the neighbourhood of 3,465 boxes had been reshipped to Canada from the old country. These boxes would not appear in the records of the Department of National Revenue because the butter had not changed ownership. I believe the information given on that occasion was correct and as the butter had not changed hands it would not be dutiable when returned to this country. This is all the information I have on the hon. member's question.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister has no further information about the matter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: I might tell him that this did not occur on the estimates, it was a question asked on the orders of the day.

PRIVILEGE—MR. McKENZIE (Assiniboia)

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege: A return was tabled yesterday in reply to a request from me for the names of those appointed by the government since they came into office at salaries of $5,000 and over, and also the increases in salaries of $500 and over made since July, 1930. The return made is incomplete and inaccurate. The information from the Department of National Defence states that there were no increases in salaries but in this connection I should like to refer to the discussion which took place when the estimates of that department were under consideration. At that time the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) asked if the chief of staff had been given any increase in salary and the minister replied, as reported on page 1547 of Hansard, as follows:

> With regard to the chief of the general staff, his salary was increased two years ago from $8,000 to $10,000, less ten per cent.

I should like to know why that information does not appear in the return. In connection with the radio commission, the return gives three appointments which were made at salaries of $5,000 and over but it does not mention the three commissioners who receive salaries over the amount stated. The return does not mention the appointments made to the Bank of Canada. If the information appearing in the press is correct the salaries in this case are very much in excess of $5,000. No mention is made of the appointments made to the supreme court or to judgeships throughout the various provinces. I am not blaming the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) for the incompleteness of this return but I ask him to endeavour to give the house the accurate information.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I will direct the attention of the various departments to the criticism of the hon. gentleman.

PRIVILEGE—MR. WOODSWORTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. Just before I entered the house last Monday the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) rose to a question of privilege and quoted a speech which I had made in Montreal. I do not think that this should have been introduced as a question of privilege as the statement was not made in the house. However, the statement was put on record and I desire to say now that the newspaper account was very abbreviated and not altogether correct. What I had tried to say was that on three recent occasions the Liberals had voted with the government in opposition to certain policies which we in this corner thought fundamental. I gave as one occasion the request of the mayors to address the house and I tried to point out that it was technically a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The statement was made and I have the right to set myself right in this matter. The fact is that the mayors were prevented from appearing before the house. The second occasion was the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), and the third was on the motion of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) for the nationalization of not only the central bank but the chartered banks. I do not like to reflect on the newspapers but in this case the report was very abbreviated.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am pleased to accept the apology as far as it goes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No apology whatever.

[Mr. R. McKenzie.]

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

PROPOSED RECESS FROM WEDNESDAY, APRIL 17, UNTIL MONDAY, MAY 20

On the orders of the day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I intend to put in a notice of motion to-day which will appear in to-day's votes and proceedings to the effect that when this house adjourns on Wednesday, April 17, it stands adjourned until Monday, May 20, at three p.m. daylight saving time.

Mr. DUFF: Lost.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I protest against this long adjournment as I think it is very unfair to the members from western Canada. It will take them four days to get home and an adjournment on Wednesday evening will prevent them from participating in the Easter exercises. If the house adjourns at all, I think it should adjourn on Saturday evening.

Mr. HANBURY: I concur entirely in what has just been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). It would appear to the members from British Columbia that the only members whose convenience is being considered in connection with this recess are those from Ontario and Quebec. If the members from British Columbia are to have a recess, or as some call it a holiday, they should be given the same consideration as other members. I hope the government will reconsider this motion and let the house sit on Saturday to adjourn on Saturday evening, if they insist on an adjournment at all.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I regret that the hon. gentleman finds some difficulty in connection with this matter. There is before the house sufficient business to occupy us until Wednesday if we are to have as much as possible accomplished before the recess. I suggest to members from British Columbia that they pair with each other. There is no reason why they should not pair on both sides and go home for the holidays.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Get rid of them.

Mr. HANBURY: I suggest to the leader of the government that the members from British Columbia are interested in what takes place in this house and wish to be here when the house is in session.

PRICE SPREADS COMMISSION

PUBLICATION OF REPORT IN THE PRESS IN ADVANCE OF PRESENTATION TO PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I wish again to raise a question of privilege—not a matter of personal privilege but one affecting the privileges of the house. A few days ago, I directed the attention of the government to what appeared to be a serious violation of the privileges of the house in the giving out, to a portion of the press of the country, of some of the report and the recommendations of the royal commission on mass buying and price spreads. In reply the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) mentioned that the government would look into the matter. I have been expecting to hear from the government as to the results of its inquiries. I think this house is entitled to know how the recommendations of the commission were given in advance to a portion of the press. May I say that since I raised the question I have had an opportunity of comparing what appeared in the press with what is in the report, and it is perfectly clear that the press must have obtained the report from someone who had the report in his possession. I think we are entitled to know who that person was, and I would ask the government if they have inquired into the matter.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): All I can say is that the question is still under consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend, I do not want to have to make many inquiries, but I shall inquire each day until I get a definite reply.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would ask the right hon. gentleman under what circumstances he got a copy of the report. It has not been tabled, and not distributed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was published in the press.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But my right hon. friend said he had a copy of the report. I shall have to inquire into that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As given in the press, yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As given after tabling in this house.

An hon. MEMBER: We know where it came from.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That would make it worse, not better.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Just one word on this. I agree entirely with the attitude taken by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in regard to the publicity that has been given this report, but I understand that a question has arisen as to whether the commission, not being a committee of this house, is bound by the rules of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The rules of ethics.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, but the rules of parliament. Now, I am inclined to think that it is merely a matter of propriety on the part of the commission, and I think it is very improper to give out that information. I was consulted by a royal commissioner on one occasion as to whether he might make public, a few days in advance, certain findings that had been signed by the commission, and I told him distinctly no, and he did not make it public. That would be my view. But it is not a parliamentary rule because it is not a parliamentary committee, and judging it only as a matter of propriety, I suppose the commission would have a right to exercise its own judgment. But personally I think it is very improper—

Mr. DUFF: Absolutely.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —and we should find out how it happened.

Mr. CAHAN: The members of a royal commission are sworn on entering upon their duties, and I am informed that the oath was administered to each member of this royal commission.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): On a matter of privilege, as chairman of the royal commission on price spreads, I wish to refer to a statement made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this house on Tuesday, relating to the matter of reports as to the deliberations and findings of the commission getting into the public press. Without reading it in full, I wish to refer to this part of the right hon. gentleman's remarks. Speaking on the 9th instant, the leader of the opposition stated:

> I should like to suggest also when the government are considering the legislation that is to be based upon the recommendations of this commission, with respect to unfair practices and unethical proceedings, it might consider whether it is not possible to enact some legislation which will prevent unfair practices and unethical proceedings on the part of the chairman of committees of this House of Commons when dealing with price spreads and mass buying, and on the part of some member or members of royal commissions when they are dealing with the same subjects.

In the first instance, I wish to point out that I was not chairman of the special committee of this house dealing with the matter of price spreads and mass buying. I was appointed chairman of the royal commission on price spreads on October 29 last, and throughout the deliberations of that commission I continued to act as chairman. The commissioners met on Tuesday morning last and signed their report at eleven o'clock. At four o'clock on Tuesday afternoon the report of the commissioners was handed by me to the Hon. Mr. Hanson, Minister of Trade and Commerce. Up to that time no authority was given by the commission as such, or in any way as a commission, for the release of any portion of that report or anything in respect to its deliberations. Since the question is raised in the house, naturally it reflects upon all members of the commission. It reflects upon the staff of the commission. I think that at this time it would be unfair for me to enter upon any denial or any statement, so far as I am personally concerned, inasmuch as such a statement would just bring it down to ten more members of the commission who would have to make statements. But I am in entire accord with the point of view expressed by the leader of the opposition and as expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to the impropriety—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Minister of Justice.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): —the Minister of Justice—as to the impropriety of such a report getting into the press before it was tabled. Speaking for myself—and for the members of the commission, as far as I know —I would welcome a complete investigation into the question, by what method or through what channels that report was published. I would point this out also. Not only was the publication of it unfair to the commission as such, and unfair to the staff personnel, but it was unfair to a large section of the press as well. Representatives of the press came to me as chairman, time and again, pointing out that certain information was appearing in the press and asking for reports. I told them my views on the matter, and those views I have maintained throughout. Yet some sections of the press obviously had exact copies of parts of the report and published them, while other sections of the press had not the same facilities. Let me say this. Personally, as chairman of that commission, I regret the publication of its report in part, in advance of the complete publication. I would welcome a full and complete investigation.

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): I think I should be permitted to add a word. I am wholly in accord with the sentiments expressed by the chairman of the commission, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy). I think I am expressing what is in the minds of myself and my colleagues on this side, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), when I say that we would like to have an investigation into this whole occurrence, so that the public may know in what way this matter got into the press prematurely.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): May I add this word? When I was in Toronto on Monday night, I read in the Toronto Daily Star of that same afternoon a complete report of all the recommendations of the price spreads commission. I want to assure the house that so far as I am concerned I at no time gave any information to any member of the press in reference to any of the contents of the report or the proceedings of the commission.

Mr. DUFF: Who is the Judas?

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): Lest some hon. members may think I am the guilty party, I wish to assure the house that I am not guilty.

Mr. JEAN LOUIS BARIBEAU (Champlain) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure you that I am not the guilty party and I would welcome an investigation to find out who he is.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): We are proceeding by elimination!

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (South Waterloo): As this seems to be a sort of testimony meeting, as a member of the royal commission I want to say that I have not yet seen the summary that appeared in the press and I do not expect to see it until the report is tabled in the house. I know nothing at all about these reports that have got out.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): As the member of the commission who has not signed the report, I wish to express my hearty approval of everything that the chairman and the other members of the commission have said.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand) I just want to add my word. This process is rather a narrowing down, and if I do not, as the rest have done, make a categorical denial, I am afraid some suspicion might fall upon me. However I want to say, as the rest of the members of the commission have done, that at no time have I given out any information regarding the character of the report.

Mr. THOMAS BELL (Saint John-Albert): As I think I am the last one on the list, I may be considered guilty if I do not make a denial. I am heartily in accord with the remarks made by the chairman of the commission.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Following up my previous observations, I think the action of the other members of the commission in themselves individually making denial, relieves me from the reservation that I made at the opening of my remarks when I said that I did not want to enter a denial because I thought that to do so might carry some implication. I feel myself relieved now from that reservation, and I beg to state to the house without evasion, equivocation or mental reservation of any kind that as chairman of the commission I neither gave out any report nor any authorization therefor, nor had I any personal knowledge in any way, shape or form of how any report or reports got into the press.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are there any other members of the commission who have not yet declared in the house where they stand on this question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Peace River.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): I have not given out any part of the report nor have I discussed it with anyone.

ARGENTINE CORN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): If I might be permitted to change the subject, I would like to direct to the government a question which concerns thousands of farmers in the counties of Essex and Kent. It is necessary that I should make some explanation. Last year we grew in those two counties six million bushels—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. GOTT: In view of the fact that the Argentine is going to have 400,000,000 bushels of corn available for export during the season of 1935, will the government take ample precautions to protect the corn growers of Essex and Kent counties?

An hon. MEMBER: Of all Canada.

Mr. GOTT: Yes, of all Canada. Will the government prevent the Argentine from flooding the Canadian market with cheap corn? I do not expect an answer to-day. I would like them to give consideration to the matter.

BUTTER RETURNED TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): For the sake of getting a proper understanding of the situation, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews). The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) stated that because butter shipped from Canada to the old country and reshipped to Canada had not changed ownership, it would not appear in the records of the Department of National Revenue. What I want to know is: Is that really the practice? My experience as a former collector of customs has been in past years and is that no matter what the goods may be that are shipped to England or any other country and then returned to Canada, even if they do not change ownership, they must come in on an export entry from Great Britain and an import entry through the customs of Canada. I understand that is the law.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The information I gave to-day was the information obtained through my department.

Mr. VENIOT: My question was directed to the Minister of National Revenue. He should give the information.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I repeated the information to-day for the benefit of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot).

Mr. VENIOT: I want the information from the Minister of National Revenue.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I feel it my duty to renew my request of yesterday for interim supply. I would ask for the unanimous consent of the house to go into supply.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Now that the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) has given us an intimation that at some time in the near future he will introduce a motion to adjourn for the Easter recess, I have much pleasure in consenting and agreeing with my colleague from Nova Scotia, the Minister of Finance, to grant him interim supply or anything else he may ask in reason.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I would like again to submit to the acting leader of the government that he take into serious consideration the situation of hon. members from British Columbia. I see no reason why, if he wishes to meet their convenience in any way, the house could not sit to-morrow morning and all day Saturday so as to let the members conclude the business and this house begin the recess on Saturday night. I would like to have an answer from the government.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

1. Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $16,058,144.05, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936.

2. Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $820,889.37, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several following items to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936, namely:—

Vote No. 33, Administration of justice;
Votes Nos. 35 and 36, Legislation;
Vote No. 67, Canadian Pension Commission;
Vote No. 154, Topographical and air service bureau;
Vote No. 189, Government of the Yukon Territory;
Vote No. 190, National Parks and Migratory Birds Convention Act;
Vote No. 196, Sheltered employment;
Vote No. 200, War veterans' allowances;
Vote No. 205, External Affairs (Paris);
Vote No. 226, Miscellaneous unforeseen expenses.

3. Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $278,083.33, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936, for Canadian National Steamships and Maritime Freight Rates Act, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have just one observation to make regarding what the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) has said about butter. There were some shipments of Canadian butter to England which are called Canadian exports to the United Kingdom—

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. RHODES: I rise to a point of order. I asked for unanimous consent, and unless unanimous consent is given we may not proceed. If my hon. friend the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) proposes to exercise under these circumstances the right to enter into debate it follows that every other hon. member of this committee can do the same, therefore we would not have unanimous consent and could not proceed. In these circumstances I ask my hon. friend to bear in mind the amenities that arise in respect to a matter of this character, otherwise I shall have to move the committee out.

Mr. POULIOT: In reply to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) let me assure him that once more I am ready to cooperate all I can, and will not insist for the moment on the matter of shipments of Canadian butter from Great Britain. But may I ask the hon. minister if the public works estimates will be taken afterwards? If so I shall dispense with further remarks now.

Mr. RHODES: Certainly this interim supply has no bearing on, nor does it impair in the slightest degree the right to discuss these items in supply.

Mr. POULIOT: But may I ask the minister if the public works estimates will come after this to-day?

Mr. RHODES: I think that is the intention.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. RHODES moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936, the sum of $17,157,116.75 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 59 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st of March, 1936.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time.

Mr. RHODES moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just one question to ask the hon. gentleman. I understand this supply is for the month of May, one-twelfth of the total for the year, and that it is understood that there will be no governor general's warrants issued while parliament is in session or during the adjournment?

Mr. RHODES: I can give my hon. friend no undertaking with respect to the issue of governor general's warrants other than to intimate that none may be issued while parliament is in session, and parliament will be in session although adjourned.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Motion agreed to, bill considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

REHABILITATION OF DROUGHT AREAS

DEMONSTRATION AREAS AND INVESTIGATIONAL WORK FOR RECLAMATION OF DRIED OUT LANDS IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 55, to provide for the rehabilitation of drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the bill published in French, as well as in English?

The CHAIRMAN: I am advised that it is.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay proceedings in the committee, but I should like to mention a certain matter affecting the Red river. In the last few years the flow of water in that river has been so small that the situation is becoming serious, so far as the residents along the river are concerned. I believe the minister knows the district very well and would appreciate the conditions. In that Red river area it is very difficult to get water, unless it be obtained from the river. I should like to know if under the present measure action would be taken towards damming the river at different points so as to raise the water level. If the river were dammed at points twenty-five miles distant it would be possible to have at least three or four feet of water in the river at all points. The situation is very serious, due to the water being at such a low level. The river water is about the only water available to the residents along the Red river, because the well water is not of good quality, due to the fact that it contains quantities of iron and salt. Could the minister give any information as to whether or not anything could be done, and whether or not he would take this matter into consideration.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This matter will be placed before the advisory committee which will deal with all points mentioned.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will they have power under this measure to investigate a situation such as I have described?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot say whether or not the point raised by the hon. member would come under provincial jurisdiction. If that were the fact some authority would have to be received from the provincial government. The hon. member will note that a representative of the provincial government will sit on the advisory committee. All matters, with the exception of those which it has been considered should not be proceeded with in the present year, will be placed before the advisory committee before any work is done. The matter about which the hon. member has spoken will be brought to their attention.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The river is still classed as a navigable stream. Any time bridges are built permission has to be obtained from the federal government. I have no doubt the matter I have raised could be considered under the present measure.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not rising to oppose the bill because as a matter of fact I strongly favour it and realize that something must be done. Section 1 states: "This act may be cited as The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act." As I understand it it will have the effect of caring for drought areas and conditions of sand drift. I should like to see this work extended. There are certain sections along the Atlantic coast of the maritime provinces where sand storms take place, and when that occurs sand drifts on to the farms, in some instances rendering the land unworkable. I should like to see a provision placed in the bill whereby a situation such as I have described might be considered. Would the minister kindly consider the point before the bill passes.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Yesterday afternoon, when the minister was discussing the resolution I wondered how the commission or the authoritative body would be in a position to have actual control of or to carry out some of the regulations which might interfere with the ordinary plans of individuals in particular areas. In other words how will the commission obtain power to deal with these matters?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is the hon. member referring to farmers?

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only by their consent.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): What will happen if they do not cooperate?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No work would be done and no action taken in that particular part. However may I say we have received applications from entire municipalities and from councils promising to cooperate. We do not expect any difficulty in that regard. As a matter of fact, due to the great number of applications, the difficulty will be to decide which would be the best ones to take. I would assure the hon. member however, that there will be no compulsion in the matter.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Of what nature are the applications?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are from municipalities asking that those municipalities or townships be chosen as the areas in which the demonstrations might take place.

Mr. BROWN: I understood the minister to state yesterday that he proposed to set apart one township in each province.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Practically a township.

Mr. BROWN: Working within a township regard could be had only for cultural methods and some tree planting. Within the boundaries of a township they could scarcely carry on work such as the damming of streams which, of necessity, would have to be conducted over a larger area. They could not perform any conclusive experiments within the small area.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In that small area there would be individual farms or groups of farms which could be benefited by small dams to collect the run-off of water. Or, on the other hand, such work might be done in connection with small streams.

Mr. HOWDEN: Following up the interrogations of the hon. member for Provencher may I ask if the commission will have power to deal with conditions such as those obtaining in the Red river area. The hon. member mentioned that some miles south of the city of Winnipeg this river formed the water supply for the people in that part of the province. However there is no possible chance in the wide world of the Red river forming a water supply for the people north of the city of Winnipeg, because from that city, on to lake Winnipeg, the river is simply a cesspool of sewage and infection. As a matter of fact just now the Red river is not capable of carrying away the sewage from the city of Winnipeg. That is a very great menace. I was going to say it is a very obnoxious matter, but it is more than that. The Red river of Manitoba has become a cesspool from the city of Winnipeg to lake Winnipeg. Generally speaking I believe our whole country is drying out. At one time Manitoba was the site of a tremendous lake, but all that remains of that lake at present is a couple of comparatively small lakes, lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba, and they are shrinking yearly. Hundreds of thousands of acres of swamp land once covered with water are now as dry as the proverbial whistle. I believe it will be necessary for this federal government to deal not only with a limited portion of the country, as it is proposed at present, but that in the near future we will have to take into consideration this very serious situation in the province of Manitoba, to say nothing of the other western provinces. We will have to try to find some way to provide more moisture for the country.

The question I wanted to ask the minister was whether this commission will have power to investigate the conditions that exist in regard to the Red river.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should say they would have power to investigate and recommend, but if hon. members will notice the amount that is to be expended in connection with this scheme they will appreciate that very little of a practical nature can be done with regard to a problem so vast. At least, however, the setting up of this committee will provide a medium which will bring this serious condition, together with the need for some action, to the attention of the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. HOWDEN: Before leaving the matter I believe it cannot be too strenuously and forcefully impressed on the commission that will be formed that there is need to deal with the conditions that exist along the Red river in the province of Manitoba. Certainly at the present time that river is stinking to heaven, and it is a very decided menace to the health of the people of that province.

Mr. DONNELLY: As I understand the minister a committee will be appointed to investigate and recommend, to certain districts or certain people, what should be done. I understand that there will be three districts set aside in the province of Saskatchewan, and the minister also said he had received applications from a number of municipalities and that it was the intention to take over a whole township. Will this committee only give information to the people who own and work the land; will they pay these individuals to do what they recommend or will they only supply them with seed? Will the minister give us some information as to how this will be worked out? Will the commission just tell the farmers what to do and not pay any more attention to the matter; will they give them some remuneration, or how is it proposed to do this work?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The officials of the department have been collecting information in connection with this area for some time, and they have carefully gone over the applications that have been received from different councils and public bodies suggesting that the work be undertaken in various localities. I think this whole matter has been boiled down as well as it can be at present. It will be submitted to the advisory committee set up under this bill, and under that advisory committee there will be an executive committee. This work will be administered by the experimental farms branch under the Department of Agriculture, and they will have their own officials there to supervise it. In the illustration stations and farms—not the townships—the same principle will apply as has applied in the past to illustration stations. That is, men will receive certain remuneration for which they will agree to carry out certain work, and they will be supplied with seed. Previous to the introduction of this bill very careful consideration was given whether that should not also apply to all these farmers in the townships. It was felt that due to the extent of the area, the necessity of having the cooperation of every person in it, and the fact that undoubtedly some farmers in almost every township will have a good deal of summer fallow in excellent condition, in the first year it would not be fair to ask these farmers, for instance, to give up part of that summer fallow and follow some definite, hard and fast rule with reference to farming. We have different types of contracts drawn up which will be considered when we go to western Canada. We feel that everything is in the best possible shape to expedite the work. In regard to the townships, recommendations are to be made to the advisory committee in order to obtain their best advice as to the steps that should be taken, and it is also hoped that in each township there will be set up a committee, either elected or appointed, of the best farmers, to cooperate with the officers of the experimental farms branch.

Mr. DONNELLY: It has not been decided definitely whether or not the township work will be taken up this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, that will be taken up this year in cooperation with the farmers, but we felt that we could not come to a definite decision this year until we consulted the farmers in the townships, as to how far we should go in trying to carry out one definite plan. It is different with an illustration station, of course; in that case only one or perhaps two farmers would be involved, and if we could not agree with them we could get another location and find other farmers who would agree to our terms.

Mr. DONNELLY: With regard to these illustration stations or these private individuals, are they to be picked out here and there, or how are they to be selected?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This whole field has been carefully surveyed and studied during the entire drought period, and particularly during the last two or three years, with a view to selecting the farmers who have met with the greatest success in their work even under these conditions. We have lists of those farmers, and from those lists the selections will be made.

Mr. BROWN: May I say that I think the best hope of success for this scheme lies in the commission devoting their greatest attention to cultural methods such as strip farming and the reintroduction of grasses that will put fibre back into the land. I think the commission would be wise to devote the greater part of their energy to that end. In speaking on this matter yesterday I intimated that I had very little faith in the efficacy of either tree planting or the damming of streams, with regard to bringing about any increase in precipitation. While the planting of trees is a good move undoubtedly it will mean a number of years before any results can be achieved. No doubt the damming of streams will be all to the good also, but I do not think we can hope for any great result with regard to the amount of precipitation. I do think, however, we cannot lay too much emphasis on the need of experimenting, with the aid of the experience and help of the best farmers, along the lines of better cultural methods, such as strip farming and the introduction of grasses. I think in that way we may obtain the best results.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The minister referred to certain petitions he had received from municipalities urging that something be done, and even volunteering the use of farms. I understand that where a township or other area is selected, this commission will be in position to go in and take charge of the work undertaken.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With the consent of the farmers in the particular area.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Would the petitions already received indicate that that consent will be forthcoming?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say, yes.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I understand that the petitions received from the municipalities would indicate that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I notice that the railway companies, the mortgage companies, the provincial governments and so forth are to be represented on this commission. I suppose these different bodies have endorsed the project and have agreed to give their co-operation and support?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The individual farmers and ranchers have not been definitely selected nor will they be until we go west. A number have been asked to come in but there is certain information we would like to have before going further in this regard.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): How about the provincial governments?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There will not be any difficulty in that connection. It has not been decided as to whether it would be better to ask them to name representatives from the departments of agriculture or from other departments. In Manitoba there is the question of water rights to be considered and in Alberta there are the ranching privileges to be taken into account. It will have to be decided whether the representatives will come from the departments of agriculture or from other departments.

Mr. DONNELLY: I believe in the usefulness of dams and reservoirs. Practically four-fifths of the moisture which falls in the province of Saskatchewan is drained out by the rivers and creeks. I think the building of dams is the most important thing that could be undertaken. Some of the farmers have been building small dams for themselves and in many places community projects have been undertaken. The province has permitted the building of roads to some of these dams, but after all they are only small affairs to benefit a few farms. The large works which must be undertaken will require considerable money which should be provided by this government. Crop rotation and the kinds of crop may prove to be of some benefit, but in my opinion they are very doubtful. I am very sceptical as to the good which may come from planting trees but the building of dams will prove to be of inestimable benefit. Could the minister tell us whether this bill will provide for the building of dams as well as for the taking over of land, the rotation of crops and the demonstration of proper methods of farming?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The practice of taking a preliminary canter on the first section of a bill has become so general that I suppose I will have to do the same thing myself if I am to be in on it. In looking over this bill which has just been placed in our hands I cannot find anything new or startling. We do not want anything startling as we have had enough of that, but I cannot find anything different to what has been tried out already in a smaller way. Perhaps the only new thing is the advisory committee. This looks like the economic council but I do not see that the minister is a member thereof.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is a brain trust but what we need is a rain trust.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The first minister is to be the chairman of the economic committee and I have enough confidence in the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to want to see him on this committee instead of having merely two members of the department. In a big affair like this we should have the head of the department as chairman. Last evening in the two or three minutes I had at my disposal I made what I thought were some encouraging remarks on the resolution stage of this bill but the receiving and reading of the bill has been something like having a pail of cold water thrown over me. Before I suffer further disappointment I should like the minister to enumerate the remedial measures provided by this bill, outside of the advisory committee, which have not been tried out already by the provincial governments during the past 25 years. Private individuals have also been actively engaged in trying to conserve water by dugouts and dams; in fact, they started that work.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): First, with reference to the request made by the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly). On every occasion I have taken care not to paint too glowing a picture or give the impression that we hope to do what might be considered as the impossible thing. For example, as far as the building of dams and the planting of trees is concerned, no person is in a position to say that these things will have the tendency to produce rain. We hope to use the information we have in the best possible way and to go as far as we can to ensure greater economic security for the people in these districts should these climatic conditions continue, or, if for a time they do disappear, with greater rainfall, to prepare them to meet a similar condition should it recur; because, although the government of Canada and the provinces as well as the people have been very anxious to pour money into this great area, I am sure we all feel, whether we are outside the area or in it, that we cannot look forward, as has been suggested, to rain coming this year. So that should we have a number of bounteous years, and make no provision, should another dry period ensue, the only solution would be for the dominion to pour money again into the same area. As we have stated before, the fundamental thing we have in mind is to see whether, from the knowledge we have, supplemented and backed up by dominion finance, we can give the farmers a very definite demonstration as to whether or not certain things will assist them, which they feel might be of advantage if they had the money, so as to enable them to go ahead. One of the difficulties with some of the farmers is this. For the first two or three years they achieved a fair success, but now their resources are so drained that they cannot do the things which they themselves believe would make them self sustaining.

The hon. member for Melville has said he sees nothing new in this. I believe his leader said on one occasion this session that there is nothing new in the world, and with that statement I am inclined to agree in many respects. Those of us who know the people of western Canada agree that they do not want any great flare to be made about this. They want something substantial. They want us to go slowly, but they do want us to tackle these problems and to answer some of the questions that have been in their minds as to whether or not it is worth their while to remain in certain areas or to move out of the district. The only information we have is information obtained from other countries, and which we have collected. Where a man has not been successful through his own operations, to the extent that he should be, the reason has been that the districts around him have not followed the same cultural methods that he has.

As regards the observations of the hon. member for Willow Bunch, with respect to the question of water as compared with cultural methods, if we take steps that insure a water supply either for small communities or for larger communities, that will be one of the best things we can do to bring about greater economic security. I believe that about a thousand or more applications have been received for assistance in the building of small dams. The work might be done by the farmers themselves, but often the difference between success and failure, from the standpoint of the benefits derived from dams, depends on how the dam is put in, where it is, and on the engineering work in connection with it. As regards the labour, the people in the locality will themselves do the work—that is, apart from the engineering work. It is felt, in view of the difficulties in which they find themselves and the fact that their resources are depleted, that some assistance will have to be given these people in the way of material where necessary, and also in connection with the work they are doing.

As regards tree planting, there are two schools of thought. Some people hold that it is impossible to reap any benefit from the planting of trees in the wider shelter belts. They seem to think that it constitutes a trap for weeds, and others believe that they are killed out in the prolonged dry periods. We all agree however that we have in the west, both in the nursery station at Indian Head and in the substation at Saskatoon, men best qualified—and this is recognized not only in Canada but on the American continent—to give expert advice as to how far we can go in the planting of trees; and we shall be guided in that connection almost entirely by their advice, together with what is known to have existed in western Canada, where certain farmers have been successful in the use of shelter belts which have withstood the drought.

The hon. member for Melville said that the Minister of Agriculture should be chairman of the advisory committee. That was also discussed in the drafting of the bill. It is under the administration of the minister, so that in that way he has full authority over the recommendations at least of this advisory committee. There is provision for two representatives from the federal Department of Agriculture. One of these is the director of the experimental farm system, because the actual work done here will be carried out under that branch of the department, and it is felt that he or the assistant director should be ex officio chairman, because meetings might be called at times when it would be difficult for the minister to be present. It was considered that this would ensure greater continuity.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is it intended to build dams outside these townships scattered in different parts of the province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Will it be necessary to obtain consent? Suppose a dam flooded a large area of land. A railway might be involved, and who is to compensate those who own land or property which is covered?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would be investigated before the dam was built. We have at the present time a sufficient number of applications, together with the consent of the people affected, to give little concern in that regard for the first year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The minister assures us that there is nothing new in this bill, and is not in favour of making any spectacular estimate of what may be done under it. I agree with him, but he is a little late in making that pronouncement. This has already been heralded all over Canada as a great reclamation movement which will beneficially affect even the landscape and the climate. It has been talked about, written about and dreamed about, and I feel quite sympathetic with the minister in his intentions. But I am still further sympathetic with him that his friends should put him in wrong so much by making such extravagant prophecies as to what will be done. There is not a man in this house, familiar with that area, who does not know that the minister is undertaking a tremendous task, and we believe the time has come when this effort should be made or that we should abandon that part of the country to wild life or give nature an opportunity to replace the grass and other covering which was taken off by the husbandman, and which it may have taken millions of years to produce. The settlers took it off in about a quarter of a century and now, in a large part, it is a waste place. More than that, it is likely to damage areas further east and north of the worst affected area. I approve of the minister going at the problem, because the time has come when we must do something or get out, and I am not one who thinks that it should be the latter. This bill which is preceded by a resolution is, I suppose, a part of the reform policy of the government, but as already intimated it is merely an evolution of what has been under way for the last quarter of a century. It is true there is this brain trust, if I may call it so. That is what it is meant to be, and I hope it will be a brain trust with real practical brains. But there will be this difficulty. The minister is not on this committee but he will have to accept the responsibility for any action or inaction thereof; besides there is sure to be a difficulty in regard to getting decisions unless more local, practical farmers are appointed on it.

I believe in this policy of rehabilitation, and I want to say a friendly word with respect to every feature of the bill if I can do so conscientiously.

Prior to last June, I do not think the word "rehabilitation" was in the government's vocabulary as applied to this area, neither has it been in former years. But we have never before had such a scourge as we have had during the last five or six years. In former years, only one or two years and sometimes only one would be dry at a time, and the following year there would be double the crop. For instance, 1914 was one of the very worst years we had in that area and indeed over much of northern and eastern Saskatchewan, but it was followed in 1915 by the most remarkable crop we have ever seen. When that happens, we forget all about the former bad years. Now we have had six dry years in succession and the minister has at last broken new ground by bringing down a bill to provide for an advisory committee. I approve the name of the bill; I believe in having an advisory committee on this matter, but I would like to see on it more practical farmers from the area concerned, men who must know a great deal more about the problem than anybody else.

In addition to that, there is a sum of money to be associated with the scheme, and that is good too, but all that, with the exception of the committee, was available before. However, this is really a start and to that extent we would commend the minister. But he speaks of the length of time the government have been preparing for this and the data they have secured. Well, if they had the data and if the seasons have been growing worse instead of better, why did they not start in 1931? I remember hearing the Prime Minister on the first day of June, 1931, announcing from his seat in the house that a national calamity had stricken the southern prairies of the western provinces and everybody was visibly impressed by his statement that this was a national calamity. Why has the government not acted nationally prior to this year? In a couple of months or so, by next July, four years will have elapsed since that statement was made, and it is left until now for the government, recognizing the national nature of this problem, to take steps by bringing down this meagre bill. This is the result of four years' cogitation. I must confess I feel disappointed. I was, I suppose, infected with the same virus or bacteria or whatever you choose to call it that other enthusiasts were affected with who read the glowing description in the Toronto paper to which I referred on a former occasion, stating that the minister was to take this area under his wing as a sort of little crown colony affair and was going to do wonders. Those papers did the minister an injustice; we all know he cannot do that. All we can do is to do our best and leave nothing undone that is within our power in the way of expenditure or the appointment of this committee to advise or any other committee or individual that would like to tender advice.

I would like to make this suggestion at this stage; I am afraid the minister has started off on the wrong foot. I remember quite distinctly that the premier of Manitoba got busy early in connection with this proposition, more than a year ago, and I should like to have seen the minister show a little stronger disposition to cooperate with the provinces. Of course he tells us that he is cooperating, but we would like to see some more practice of that nature and some more evidence of cooperation than merely a pious wish to cooperate. As a matter of fact the minister is invading what is strictly provincial work. It is true that in a small way, in an experimental, demonstration way, the dominion was in it before and was recognized as being within its jurisdiction. But now, to go into an area of that proportion without the closest consultation with the three provinces concerned, I think is undiplomatic. Questions regarding production are essentially provincial in character. There is no law delineating where provincial powers and activities in agriculture stop and those of the dominion begin, but over a period of many years there has grown up between the dominion and provincial departments of agriculture a practice that allocates questions of production to the provinces. This is invading that field to greater extent than has been the case previously that I think the first thing to do, if I might so suggest, would be for the Minister of Agriculture to call the provinces together, take counsel with them and say: Here, I want to help you further than I have done in the past, to aid you in such a way that we shall have some business intercourse with the rural municipalities; in order to do that we must have your assistance. The municipalities are of course the creation of the province, and I do not see how in the world much is going to be accomplished if such a course is not taken. For instance, there is the establishment of grazing areas. In my estimation one of the first things that should be done in that area is to segregate as much as possible those lighter lands that are more predisposed to drift and on which nothing can be grown in a dry year. Lands with lighter subsoil and of a gravelly nature, that are hit worse in a dry year, should be seeded down as rapidly as possible. How is the federal government going to acquire those lands without invading provincial rights? I do not want to raise that difficulty, but it is there just the same. Many of those lands are reverting to the municipalities or the provinces now for taxes; how can the dominion government handle them unless they have the cooperation and very close cooperation of the provinces? Unless these matters are attended to at the outset, we shall have three provincial governments, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, each running little shows of their own, and on top of that the federal government running theirs; that is what it will mean. I cannot help thinking the dominion is now taking a step in the direction of invading provincial acitivities in the matter of production to an extent that it did not do before, and yet not to a sufficient extent to be of any use except as a natural evolution of what has been taking place in the past. Therefore, unless we get those areas seeded down as quickly as possible and thereby make those dust storms, subside—because not only is damage caused to the area from which the dust blows, but also to the area on to which the dust is blown,—our little activities as described in this bill will never be noticed; the dust will blow faster than the remedy can overtake it.

We do not need to go to Arabia or the Sahara desert to see what happens; all we have to do is to look across the United States boundary and see right in the panhandle of Texas, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma and a number of adjoining states, the terrific storms of dust occurring now as we talk taking not only the top soil, but the subsoil in some places to a depth of two or three feet. That is what is happening to the south of us and that is what will happen in our country unless effective measures are taken right away. The point is this: will this legislation bring about the desired result? It is good as far as it goes, but I am afraid you will never see it in the midst of one of these storms that are liable to occur any day in that territory, as has occurred in a relatively small way even this spring. I suppose there has to be a beginning with all things, but one should at least start diplomatically, start with a feeling that everyone interested is backing you, and particularly the provincial governments, who are all actively concerned about this problem and have their plans already worked out. It may be that the minister has conferred with them, but not as far as I know. Such conference it seems to me should have preceded any action. For instance, do the provinces know about this bill? Were they consulted about it? What is their opinion about it?

I have nothing further to add except to congratulate the minister on breaking new ground, introducing a new term in relation to this area so far as the government is concerned, the word "rehabilitation." But I trust they will back it up by something more substantial in the way of remedial measures than are provided for in this bill.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am not a western member, but this is a matter of national concern, being before this federal house. A few minutes ago the Minister of Agriculture mentioned the personnel of the commission. I notice it will consist of thirteen members, which is a very bad number, perhaps some will not want to sit on it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why not add one from Quebec and Ontario?
