PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice of a question of privilege, and I would like to take a few minutes, not very long, to explain my point.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations is not meeting because there is no chairperson. The former chairperson resigned September 9, 1990. The committee has not met since. The committee—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I have to interrupt for a minute. What was the date of the resignation?

Mr. Gauthier: September 9, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: The committee does exist because it was struck some months ago by this House, but it has not met because there is no chairperson to preside over the deliberations. In fact, it is a hoax to pretend that the committee exists when it cannot study the material which is referred to it by this House.

When the House referred vote 1c of the Supplementary Estimates for the Privy Council on February 28, some 11 days ago, to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, the estimate in question represented $17.9 million and touched on the Spicer Commission's work. The House technically ordered the committee to scrutinize the expenditure of public money and asked members of that committee to report to it by March 21 this month, in a few days.

Anything, Mr. Speaker, in my view, that would impede the examination of those estimates is unparliamentary and would put members of the House in an untenable situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the privileges of all members will be breached, because they will be unable to perform their duties as elected representatives, and one of those important duties is the traditional one of examining the Estimates, to subject government spending to careful scrutiny, on behalf of our constituents, the Canadian people.

[English]

Further, this committee is not sitting because of a flaw—and that is my point of privilege— in our Standing Orders.

Standing Order 106(1) obliges the Clerk of the House to convene an organizational meeting of each standing committee mentioned in the report of the Striking Committee, per se, within 10 sitting days after that committee has reported and the report has been adopted. However, there is no provision in our Standing Orders at this time for electing a new chairperson when a vacancy exists.

As a result, the House must fall back on an old tradition which put the responsibility of convening a committee organization meeting in the hands of the government Whip. This is a tradition that we had prior to the McGrath reform.

Mr. Speaker, I refer you to Beauchesne—

Fifth Edition, at citation 579:

> (2) Organization meetings have always been called upon the instruction of the Chief Government Whip when the House refers—

I repeat, "when the House refers":

—or is about to refer matters to the committee.

• (1110)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the decision to convene that meeting must be taken by the Whip when the House has made the decision to defer the estimates to a committee or the appropriate committees. That has not been done.

The decision now is not in the hands of the clerk, an impartial person, but in the hands of the Whip, a partisan who has, in my view, responsibilities to his caucus and who acts in an intelligent manner. I am not saying he has done this in trying to hold up the work of the House, I am just saying it is far from being an impartial decision when the government Whip is responsible for convening a committee because our standing orders, which were reformed, which were revamped some years ago, were not able to cope with the situation where a chairperson has resigned.

The Whip, of course, is carrying out the orders of the House leader or the Prime Minister by refusing to convene the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations to permit the election of a chairperson.

I know the arguments he is going to give me about the 49th report of the striking committee not having been tabled. I know all those arguments. All I am saying is that we have a serious flaw in our Standing Orders. This will create an unparliamentary situation, a question of privilege for all members because we are impeded in our work here as members of Parliament in our obligations to the people of Canada, our electors, to look and to scrutinize the expenditures of the government.

It is my contention that the Spicer Commission, whose spending of public money has been much maligned recently, should be given a chance to present its case in public, before a committee, to re-establish possibly its credibility. If this House does not proceed now with having that person or the chairman of that commission before the committee of the House before the time has expired on March 21, we would be playing a hoax on Canadians. We would be playing a hoax on ourselves.

The House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations is the appropriate forum for this to go on. Unless action is taken in the next nine days—well, 10 days maybe—before March 21 when the parliamentary estimates are deemed to have been reported back to the House, no public scrutiny by Parliament will have been made of the commission's budget.

The future of the country in my view, is much too important to allow some people to score fast political points at its expense. I am not aiming this at anybody in this House. I am just saying it is untenable at this time to have a royal commission which is looking at the future of our country, not being able to defend itself in front of the public in Canada, in front of this House, as to how it spends public money.

There is a serious flaw in the rules which allow the government to frustrate and deny appropriate and democratic parliamentary processes such as scrutiny of expenditures of public funds. You, Sir, cannot remain indifferent. You cannot remain neutral. There are two avenues you could use. You could say that in view of the flaw in our Standing Orders this whole matter could be deferred to the committee. It has been charged with looking at our Standing Orders. It could look at the Standing Orders and possibly come in with a quick recommendation. That would take time, Mr. Speaker.

The other alternative, which I prefer, is to use your good offices to tell the clerk of the committee that in view of the fact that we do not have a procedure at hand that is acceptable to modern parliamentary procedures, that he, the clerk, will convene a meeting of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations today, for a meeting to be held tomorrow, to give the commission a chance to defend itself before the House of Commons.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want an opportunity to present a couple of arguments in this particular discussion. In fact, I want to make three points, but I want to begin by saying this.

I am shocked that the hon. member rises in his place in this House today to make this point because, either one of two things have happened; the Liberal Party has chosen to circumvent the legitimate negotiation process that has been going on between House leaders of this House or, there is a complete lack of discussion among members in their party as to what the process has been, continues to be and will be later today and tomorrow.

I would like to begin by making three points. First, as the hon. member has indicated in his remarks, we do in fact have a striking committee report before this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, you know that the government could have, under the rules of this House, moved concurrence in that report, and had that report adopted. The implications of that would have meant a dramatic change to our committee's system and its process. We chose, as a government, not to use our majority to do that, but rather to let the House and the House leadership have discussions so that we could come to an agreement whereby all members of this House would feel that the committee process was a baby of their own creation rather than one forced upon them by the government. That is why we have not used our legitimate powers, our majority, to force the striking committee report through this House.

The second point I want to make is this. As you know, and all members of this House know, the House leadership and the members of this House are presently discussing a wide variety of rule changes. Included in those rule changes are a fairly extensive list of changes to the committee process. These changes have been shared with the House leader of the Official Opposition, with the House leader of the New Democratic Party and with other members who are involved in the negotiation process. It has not been a secret. It has been widely discussed. There have even been press articles on some of the details.

These negotiations have been going because we, on this side of the House, fundamentally believe that committees are a creature of the whole House. They are not creatures solely of the government and that is why we have worked so hard to make sure that that rule change process, as it relates to committees and other issues, has a fair hearing, a fair discussion and an opportunity for consensus building.

The third point I want to speak to is this, and it relates specifically to the point that my hon. friend raises in the House, relating to the committee on consumer and corporate affairs. I have had discussions with members of the opposition on this issue on probably three occasions. I will not go into detail about the discussions because I do not want to betray any confidences about what was discussed in those meetings.

However, I do want to indicate to the Chair, and I think it is very important that the Speaker realize that in fact these discussions have gone on, that we have been working together to try and come up with a process that would allow this committee to meet, would allow the committee to study the estimates and still would maintain the integrity both of the rule changes that we are looking at in terms of future opportunities and, second, to make sure that the work of that committee would be balanced and consistent with structures that exist in the present system for committees of this House.

That is happening at the moment. In fact, I can indicate to the Speaker that I had thought, from conversations I had this morning, that we, on all sides of the House, were very likely to come to an agreement which would have meant an Order in this House later this afternoon. I had those kinds of indications, and that is why I am very shocked that the hon. member has chosen this opportunity, in spite of all those discussions and all those negotiations, to try and score a partisan point on something we, as a government, have been going out of our way not to treat as a partisan issue. Because, as I said earlier, we do believe that committees are a vehicle of this whole House.

My friend offered to you two options. He asked the Speaker to intervene and to enforce or force a decision.

• (1120)

I offer a third option, an option in keeping with the traditions of the Chair and of this House, and that is to let the process that is going on at this moment continue.

An hon. member: It is not going on.

Mr. Cooper: The hon. member says that it is not going on. Why does he not check with his House leader? Why does he not check and find out what conversations have been going on even this morning? Those discussions are going on; I can say that publicly in this House. There is no need for the Speaker to impose on the House a particular action when in fact I think we are very close to a consensus among the House leadership which will result in a decision of the House, of the membership and will protect the integrity of the committees, which is certainly the most legitimate and consistent goal that we as a government are trying to reach through the negotiations, the discussions and the rule changes.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): On the same point of order, the government deputy Whip claims that he does not understand why we are raising this issue today. The reason we are raising the issue today is that we sent a letter to the Prime Minister last week in his capacity as the Leader of the Conservative Party and asked him to specifically direct the Whip of the government side of the House to give a vehicle for the estimates of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to be heard. In fact, we were very explicit in our letter to the Prime Minister that if we did not receive a response by today, this matter would be raised in the House.

We want to raise it in the House because the clock is ticking.

[Translation]

We have about ten days left to consider the Estimates concerning the Spicer Commission. Since the government and the Prime Minister refuse to act responsibly, it is up to members of Parliament to do so and to consider in detail all expenditures already made and delegated to the Spicer Commission. We advised the Prime Minister last week that if he could not act responsibly as Leader of the Conservative Party, we were prepared to raise the question in the House. We gave the government and the Prime Minister enough time to respond. However, no response was forthcoming. And that is why today, we are trying to get the Chair to rule on a matter that affects the rights and privileges of all members.

If a process is in place according to which we have the right to examine the expenditures of all departments, including commissions, and that process is denied us as a result of the government's refusal to convene a meeting, that is a breach of our privileges, Mr. Speaker. That is why we submitted that the Prime Minister could have dealt with the situation last week. Since he refused to do so, we are taking our responsibility as parliamentarians seriously and we ask the Chair to ensure that this meeting is convened as soon as possible.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege raised by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. The matter of negotiation referred to by the government member is a pretext. There was no real negotiation. It is nothing but a pretext. I too wrote letters and asked the Prime Minister to intervene. I asked the whip and the other members on the government side to intervene. They did not.

I want to make it clear that I can understand the Liberals and the others wanting to have a good look at the books of the Spicer Commission. I agree with that. But there are other problems, including some that directly affect consumers throughout Canada, others related to gas prices and car warranties, in short all sorts of considerations that members opposite may not deem unduly urgent. We have to respond to letters from constituents and tell them that for six months now the government has refused to convene the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations. The average Joe on the street has precious little use for such legal shenanigans and the various points raised by my government colleague. He wants answers to his questions, recalling full well that the government did brag about enhancing the role of members by giving them more latitude with respect to committee work.

Mr. Speaker, pretending the committee system works has to be the most misleading statement I ever heard. The system simply does not work, and the reference to negotiations is a red herring. Our party whip confirmed that right here and, from what I heard, the Liberals did not get to first base either.

Mr. Speaker, the Clerk of the House will have to get involved in this debate, for I have strong reservations about the good will of the government.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West.

I would like to know why a resignation back in September has not been filled yet. All members of this House believed once that in the reform committee this kind of thing would be a matter of the past. I want to know exactly why there has not been a replacement of the chairman.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, we are on very dangerous ground.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. We may be on very dangerous ground and there may be very good reasons why the government does not want to go ahead and do anything because the opposition has not approved, or is not prepared to approve, an order of the House or a proposition that has been put before the House.

I ask the hon. member for Calgary West to tell me how, if we believe in a committee system, we can continue to go without a committee chairman all these months.

The other thing I want to say is this. I probably cannot intervene, but I am being asked to intervene, and this is not the first time. The fault may be on both sides of the House, but for goodness sake, I ask hon. members to get it settled.

Mr. Hawkes: The Speaker is always on dangerous ground when he gets applause from one side of the House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. Let me make it very clear. I am not defending either side of the House in this. I say to the other side of the House be careful about applauding a Speaker, whether it comes from one side of the House or the other.

I spent a lot of years in opposition, I do not have to tell you how many. I thought we had made some very, very positive reforms and changes. All I am saying is that this House and this country, because I do not know that I can do anything about it, are in trouble if we let a committee go from September until now without a chairman.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I have to step back to the year 1985, when this government and this party brought parliamentary reform to this Chamber.

An hon. member: Apply it.

Mr. Hawkes: I hear one of the new members who came into this House in 1988 saying: "Apply it". I look her right in the eye and I say: "We have tried". It is the opposition that does not respect the principles of this place when it comes to committees.

An hon. member: Yap, yap, yap.

Mr. Hawkes: Yap, yap, yap. The less you know, the more likely you are to yap in this place from time to time.

A very important element of parliamentary reform was the existence of a striking committee that would name the membership, the House would approve the membership and members on standing committees would be entitled to the retention of that seat within 10 sitting days of the commencement of the fall session until one year later. Nothing anybody in this Chamber could do, except that individual, would change the membership of that committee. People were entitled to resign but Whips could not take the seat away. Year by year by year, it was a conscious decision of this Chamber. The violation arose last September when the opposition refused to acknowledge the striking committee report naming the membership for the year we are now in.

There would be no problem if precedents had been followed by the opposition in accepting the striking committee report.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Angus: Tell the whole story.

Mr. Hawkes: I will tell the whole story. We have had a whole lot of informal meetings, and I will tell the whole story.

You talk about partisan, petty politics and maybe the member for Vanier did not know what he was stepping into, but we have a situation today where the government, when it comes to committees, and the standing committees of this House cannot meet their responsibility to govern. There are two roles in this Chamber: there is an Official Opposition and an opposition, and there is a government. The government has the responsibility to govern.

We will take this one specific committee example. We call a meeting this afternoon. We elect a chairman with the current membership, and the voting power is in the hands of the opposition and not the government. That is true of seven of the 21 committees in this Chamber right now, and it has been true since last September and they know it.

An hon. member: They are playing games.

Mr. Hawkes: They are playing partisan political games with the future of this country, national unity, Spicer committee and everything because they want to control the committees.

Mr. Angus: That's a lie.

Mr. Simmons: You are making a fool of yourself, Jim.

Mr. Hawkes: They have been offered all kinds of possible adjustment and they refuse because they like the situation. They like to stand up in this House and complain. They do not like to run the nation. It is not their job to run the nation, but it is ours. We have the responsibility as the governing party in this Chamber to run it.

You stand up and ask me that question and I will repeat my answer. If I call that meeting this afternoon, when one of our members steps into that chair the voting control of the committee is in the hands of the opposition. That is true for seven of the 21 committees.

That is what lies behind their obstinacy. They refuse to acknowledge the principle that the government has the responsibility of governing. The opposition has the responsibility to oppose and it is an abomination of democracy for it to attempt to use one rule in the Standing Orders to control the governing part of this Chamber in one-third of the standing committees of this House.

You have not even read the rules. You shake your head, you yack, you talk, but you have to read the rules.

Mr. Barrett: That's nonsense.

Mr. Hawkes: You do not read the rules either. Okay? They are operating on a false premise.

Now you stand up and tell me that you should intervene, Mr. Speaker, and hand the responsibility for governing over to the opposition and see how long—

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Barrett: You lost control.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. I would say with great respect to the hon. member for Calgary West, I did not say anything of the sort. I said that the public of this country is entitled to know, and the fault may lie on both sides of the Chamber, why a committee has not got a chairman since September. One can blame one side or the other, but do not blame the Speaker for being annoyed that it has been brought to my attention, not for the first time.

The country is in no mood to put up with this kind of debate.

Mr. Hawkes: Tell them that.

Mr. Speaker: I'm telling the House that.

Mr. Malone: Don't look at us.

Mr. Speaker: I am not hearing any further debate on it. It is not something I can do anything about. I can say, as somebody who has been here for a long time, for goodness sakes, get it resolved.

The fault is probably on both sides. I do not want to overdo this.

Mr. Malone: Don't look at us.

Mr. Speaker: I will look at everybody in the House. Let us resolve it. I cannot keep resolving these things. It should be resolved in the Chamber.

I can tell you when the country is in peril, to have a debate like this does not do one bit of good in getting us through the difficulties that we face.

That is the end of the debate.

Mr. Hawkes: Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West rises on a point of order. I have said that the issue is ended. I cannot intervene and I am not going to hear further debate on it. If it is another matter, of course I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you might seek from the Chamber unanimous consent to adopt the 49th report of the striking committee?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West has put what, of course, might be a solution to the whole thing. He is asking for consent.

I put it to the House.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, we cannot give consent to adopt the 49th report because it does not fill all of the seats that have been approved by this Chamber in terms of the size of committees. That is the nub of the issue, so we cannot.

Mr. Speaker: I am not going to use this morning to have a full debate on this. There is not consent. If there were consent, of course, it would resolve the whole issue.

All I am saying, and I should not have to repeat it, is for goodness sake, go and resolve this.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PETITIONS

ETHANOL BLENDED GASOLINE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in this House to present petitions containing almost 500 names of persons who call on the government to bring in ethanol blended gasolines that are environmentally friendly and do not contain MMT.

The average cost of ethanol production in the U.S. is 47 cents per U.S. gallon, and one U.S. plant produces it for 38 cents per U.S. gallon. A new Canadian plant has forecast costs at 27 cents a litre. This is in direct contradiction to the 47 cents per litre cost of production in the Canadian government response to a similar petition tabled in November 1990.

I call on this government to update the research on this issue and get on with the implementation of this as an alternative friendly fuel.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

ESTIMATES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise to make some brief submissions in respect of the point of order raised on Friday, March 8, 1991, by the hon. member for Ontario concerning the provision in the estimates, particularly vote 5 in the votes under Parliament on the Senate which authorizes the implementation of the 41st report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy Budgets and Administration in the other place.

I have reviewed very carefully the comments made by the hon. member for Ontario. At first glance his point of order looks as though it is well taken, but there are a few points that I would like to draw to the attention of the Chair for the Chair's consideration in reviewing the point of order.

First of all, I would suggest that in considering whether the estimate in question is in fact out of order, Your Honour should have regard to the fact that estimates are recommended to this House by the Governor General.

In the case of both Supplementary Estimates C and in the case of the Main Estimates, Your Honour will recall just the other day that a message was received from His Excellency transmitting the estimates to this place and recommending them to the House.

Estimates recommended by the Governor General are not just recommended because His Excellency receives these documents and says: "Boy, these are great". He gets advice from his responsible ministers who advise His Excellency to recommend these estimates to the House. That little constitutional convention is a very important one, in that these estimates have obviously been approved by cabinet, by the Privy Councillors who advise His Excellency.

I submit that in making a recommendation to this House the ministers of the Crown have put their stamp of approval on this set of estimates and have recommended them to the House of Commons through the Government General, because the Governor General, as I have stated, does not recommend these on his own volition. He does so only on advice from his responsible ministers. Indeed it would be contrary to all constitutional convention for the Governor General to make a recommendation on these estimates without the advice of his responsible ministers who sit on the Treasury benches in the House. Those estimates have been recommended in this way.

I note that in the precedents cited by the hon. member for Ontario he has referred to rulings of the Chair made over a period of 20 years which suggest that estimates cannot legislate a new government program. The question whether this particular estimate falls within the impugned type of estimates is a matter I think the Chair will have to decide.

I want to point out first that in most cases the arguments for having estimates excluded on the basis that they created new programs were advanced by the person who is now the leader of the government in the House and who must accept very direct responsibility for having recommended these estimates to the House through his boss, the Governor General of Canada.

He, presumably as a member of cabinet, advised His Excellency to recommend these estimates to the House. He, having done so, I presume has satisfied himself as to the form and content of these estimates based on the fact that he is something of an expert on the matter, having raised issues for years and years before the House as to the propriety of the form of various estimates.

I trust we will hear from him in respect of this matter in due course and whether or not he feels this particular estimate is in accordance with the precedents, many of which he established by his arguments.

Second, I would refer Your Honour to two precedents, one I must say the validity of which may be at issue because it was adopted prior to the rulings in 1971 and 1981 which the hon. member for Ontario has cited in support of his proposal. However, I refer Your Honour to Appropriation Act No. 2 for 1965 in which a particular item in the schedule to the act that contained the words of the votes reads as follows:

> To authorize, during the current and subsequent fiscal years, payment of a gratuity in respect of the death of any member of the Senate or House of Commons subsequent to August 2, 1963, to the surviving spouse or the estate of the deceased member, in an amount equal to two months' sessional indemnity and to ratify any such payments made during the 1963–64 fiscal year; estimated amount required for the 1964–65 fiscal year, $12,000.

That was an estimate adopted by this House that did change a program and I think is worth consideration by Your Honour.

In addition there was one other, which I have easily obtained here, in the 1989–90 Appropriation Act No. 3 for that particular financial year. Vote 1 for the Privy Council Office provided in part, and I will only quote the relevant part:

> —the payment to each member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada who is a Minister without Portfolio or a Minister of State who does not preside over a Ministry of State of a salary equal to the salary paid to Ministers of State who preside over Ministries of State under the Salaries Act, as adjusted pursuant to the Parliament of Canada Act and pro rata for any period less than a year—

Then there is a sum mentioned.

I submit that once again the estimate as passed in the Appropriation Act did something similar to what is proposed to be done in this particular estimate.

In looking at whether Your Honour should rule this estimate out of order, I invite you, Sir, to have regard to these two precedents. I hope that they are of assistance to the Chair and its ruling on this important issue.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I this is a very important matter. I intend to be very short in presenting my arguments because later on this morning, our leader, the member for Yukon, will be presenting a motion to this House with regard to the Constitution of Canada and the process that we should be using to bring about changes to our Constitution and the substance related to that. That is also very important and we must get to it as soon as possible.

However, since the day has been chosen to continue arguments on the point of order raised by the member for Ontario, I do want to add to the remarks I made on Friday.

First, I believe that the government has improperly brought these estimates before us. While it is true that the Senate passes its estimates and it is the obligation of the government to present those estimates to both Houses, I believe that the government had the option to look to find out whether or not the Senate estimates were in the proper form. I would submit that that is not the case in this particular case. Vote 2c, under the Supplementary Estimates, for the Senate says:

> To authorize the implementation of the Forty-first Report of the Standing Committee of Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, 2nd session, 34th Parliament, adopted by the Senate on June 5, 1990, and to authorize, in the current and subsequent fiscal year, payment of the allowance referred to in the report.

The Financial Administration Act is very clear. In section 27 it says:

> All estimates of expenditures submitted to Parliament shall be for the services coming in course of payment during the fiscal year.

It is not subsequent years, but during the fiscal year. The Financial Administration Act goes on further in section 37 to say:

> —the balance of an appropriation granted for a fiscal year that remains unexpended at the end of that fiscal year shall lapse.

Clearly what the Senate has done through its estimates is that it has violated the Financial Administration Act, which has been passed by both Houses of Parliament.

In addition, this vote, which is the vote that gives the senators $153 a day for showing up for work, violates the Parliament of Canada Act. Those types of increases which do not require any receipts whatsoever require a change in the Parliament of Canada Act. The Senate, perhaps for the reason that it does not want the public to respond to this vast increase to its salaries, did not introduce any legislation whatsoever and is trying to do through the appropriation that which it did not have the nerve to do through legislation.

The references that were made earlier on Friday and earlier today were to past rulings which are quite clear: one does not use the estimates, whether the Main Estimates or the Supplementary Estimates, to pass legislation. The Speakers in the past have indicated that one must introduce the legislation in order for any appropriations to go forward.

I will sum up because of the important nature of the debate that is about to commence. Clearly, the Senate of Canada has violated two acts of Parliament: the Financial Administration Act and the Parliament of Canada Act. In addition, it has violated the rules upheld by Speakers in the past with regard to trying to do through appropriations that which should be done through legislation.

This is a case where the senators have individual profit from the measure that is before this House. For it to be done in the improper way suggested under the Supplementary Estimates for this fiscal year is completely unacceptable.

I believe that the Speaker has an obligation to protect not only the House and the legislation of this country, but an obligation to protect the taxpayers of this nation as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As all the hon. members know, the substantive matter raised by the hon. member for Ontario is presently under advisement. I am sure that the Chair is highly appreciative of the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for Churchill and that these will help in making a decision on this important procedural matter.

She said: Mr. Speaker, the motion that the New Democratic Party brings before the House today comes at a very critical time in the current round of constitutional discussions. Indeed it comes at a critical time for the country and for the country's history.

We as Canadians have reached a point in our comparatively short history where we are once again taking an honest and sincere look at ourselves, at our successes, at our failures, at our strengths and at our weaknesses. We are looking ahead to where it is that we wish to go as a country, what this country can offer Canadians, and what Canadians can offer to the world.

I have introduced the motion before us today because I believe in Canada and because I want more than anything else for this country to emerge as a united, strong, and compassionate country from this current period of uncertainty. To do this will require significant changes in the way the government and others approach the questions of national unity and constitutional reform.

That is what we are addressing today in this motion.

First on the question of national unity, it is important to realize that it will take much more than constitutional amendments to secure the future of the nation and to ensure that the Canada we want to build for our children is a more caring, compassionate and co-operative nation. It takes more than a constitutional amendment to ensure that we build a Canada in which all Canadians feel at home and that all the world respects and admires.

It will take major economic initiatives, because economic initiatives are not solely designed to make Canada a better country for multinational corporations and corporate profit, but rather to make Canada a better place for Canadian families and a better country for the families of this nation.

It will take a major commitment to building and strengthening the nation's social programs such as medicare, old age pensions and social security. It will take a commitment to national institutions, those institutions that represent the common bonds that we share: the CBC, VIA Rail and the RCMP.

It will take courage to bring in a real environmental program that protects the Canadian environment rather than simply shields corporate polluters.

It will take constitutional change, but not constitutional change that is designed only to meet the needs of governments or the needs of corporations. For Canadians, the debate on national unity is not about which level of government should be more powerful. It is not about who has the larger deficit or about where and how corporations can best operate and profit.

Canada is not simply a Gross Domestic Product, a deficit or a trade zone. Canada is a nation with a heart, with a soul, and a new Constitution must be for all Canadians, all the people of Canada.

[Translation]

It is because the Constitution must belong to the Canadian people that the redefinition of federalism must be an open and democratic process. Constitutional changes must be brought upon so as to be construed as legitimate by the people concerned. Our recent failures should have taught us that much. The processes which produced the constitutional accords of 1981, 1987 and 1990 caused discontent.

Whatever their respective merits, these accords were seen as a breach of confidence by those who were excluded. From this discontent sprung today's distrust. The fault does not lie with the country itself or with the people of Canada. It lies with the leaders and the governments. Successive governments waited before vesting powers in the Canadian people and giving them the tools to make a better life for themselves. They undermined the confidence the people had in them and in their country.

For decades, governments in Ottawa made many people believe that the federal government was either unable or unwilling to meet the needs of the population. People were also convinced that Ottawa was unable to respect diversity, contribute to equity, empower the population or simply unite the country.

[English]

This government has been telling Canadians that the biggest obstacle to justice, equality and prosperity is the federal government itself: deregulation, privatization, the U.S.-Canada trade deal. This government has destroyed national institutions like the CBC and VIA Rail. It is in the process of killing medicare and has virtually given up its regional development as a key tool for developing unity, and that must change.

Now we are told that the Prime Minister, Conservative, Liberal and Social Credit premiers, and large corporations have united in a constitutional alliance that talks about decentralized federalism but promises to deliver something much different, a kind of Dow Jones corporation federalism.

A few weeks ago in Toronto the Prime Minister said that the new Constitution must be built on the same principles that brought us deregulation, privatization, the Canada—U.S. trade deal and the GST.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that he could not be more wrong.

• (1200)

I want to say to the Prime Minister that unless he abandons his vision of a corporate Canada and a corporate federalism, he is doomed to fail because it is a vision Canadians do not share and will not accept. If he is not willing to listen to Canadians on this critical issue, then he must step aside and let Canadians articulate their vision of the country through a general election.

Mr. Speaker, it is the responsibility of every member of this Chamber to do what we can to restore the trust of Canadians. We in the New Democratic Party take that responsibility very seriously and that is why we have introduced this motion today.

The Canadian people are not asking their elected representatives for anything to which they do not have a right. They are asking us to be open, to be honest and to be consistent.

The Prime Minister has said that the government has learned from the Meech Lake process. He has set up a number of public committees and working groups to listen to Canadians and to openly discuss the options available. Yet, while the Spicer Commission is in the headlines and the Commons and Senate committee meet publicly to look at the amending formula, there are clearly a whole series of initiatives under way that are not in the public eye and that are being done behind closed doors.

We have, for example, Mr. Speaker, a group of deputy ministers. I asked the Acting Prime Minister yesterday, and he refused to even table the terms of reference for those deputy ministers. Surely the public has a right to know. Surely the public has a right to know what report they put forward. And I say again, that the Prime Minister should table that report in this House of Commons so that all Canadians can know what kind of thinking has gone into the government's position.

At the same time, we have a finance minister who announces he is beginning to negotiate new fiscal arrangements that determine such programs as medicare and other social programs. He is going to negotiate equalization and that, in fact, could result in a kind of decentralization of programs or different kinds of arrangements among the provinces and territories in Canada in a kind of back door constitution making. Well, that is not good enough. We do not want a back door constitution making. We do not want a closed door constitution making. We want an open door process where all Canadians can see the positions of all political parties and of all of the key players in these discussions.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the Prime Minister today that coming up with a way of muzzling critics in order to make the people of Canada feel good and a new way of doing the preliminary work for another last minute marathon will not be enough. It will not work and I can tell the Prime Minister that this caucus will not take part in that process.

I also hope that the Liberal Party will join us to pass this motion and support the amendments we proposed as well as our suggestions regarding the wider scope to be given to the proceedings of the Committee on the constitutional amendment formula.

[English]

I said in my opening comments that this motion comes before the House at a very critical time, and the Speaker reminded us of that earlier this morning. It comes at a time when as members of Parliament we have the opportunity to ensure that this round of constitutional discussions is an open round and a round for all Canadians.

We have to learn from the past, and I think we have learned from the Meech Lake process about what it takes to include and involve as many people that can and want to be involved in that process, and not to exclude any one group. The process we are suggesting must be open and conciliatory and, in my view, must meet the seven specific criteria that we have set out in this motion.

I will briefly reiterate those, Mr. Speaker. The first principle of the process should be that all sides of Parliament and all legislatures must be represented, not just one party or one part of the parliamentary process and not just government. Parliament and legislatures have a role to play but every member must have the real opportunity to participate in defining the future of our country.

Second, the process must include others with a stake in the outcome such as aboriginal nations, the north, official language minorities, multicultural communities, business, trade unions. Because building a constitution is not the private domain of governments or first ministers.

The Constitution is a constitution for whatever party happens to be in power: New Democratic, Liberal or Conservative. It is a constitution for all of the people, therefore, all of the people have to be a part of forming that constitution. There are many interests at stake. All of them are important and all of them represent that diversity of our country which we want to see enshrined in our constitution.

The third principle is that the process must be genuinely balanced, without the perception of dominance or manipulation by any one group, or by any one participant. It is not enough, simply, to have others attend meetings or to be involved to create the perception of legitimacy. There must be a real and legitimate role for all of those who have a stake.

The fourth principle is that we must draw upon the views of ordinary people and of expert opinion. We must take seriously the various commissions that are under way in the provinces and in the Yukon territory. The Spicer Commission, which is going to report, must function as a legitimate vehicle for Canadians and its recommendations, having heard tens of thousands of Canadians, must be taken seriously by this government.

Fifth, there must be a precise timetable and a commitment from the start of all participants to make a decision on the a final package of proposed amendments.

The sixth principle calls for the process to be open and have no hidden agenda. We cannot have an honest-looking process going on in one room while the real changes are negotiated in another room, behind closed doors.

Finally, the desire to remain within a renewed Canadian federation must be the only precondition to the discussion process. We must embark on this process with an open mind, ready to listen, and with the courage to act.

[English]

There are many mechanisms by which we can proceed with constitutional change that will meet these basic criteria. Some, such is a constituent assembly which I proposed some eight months ago in this House and which, I might add, the Prime Minister agreed to look at very seriously. It has been discussed in this House and has been used with some success in other parts of the world. We can learn from others. We are not the first country that has had to grapple with the issues that we in Canada are grappling with today. There are other models that can be adopted to meet the needs of Canada and reflect the reality of our nation.

We can be developing a new model that will be a model for the world. Constitutional conventions, constituent assembly, constitutional conferences are examples of a process which seek to bring in not only elected politicians but also those others who have a stake in the future of our country. Regardless of what process we choose, it must be a process that involves all Canadians.

I call on this House today to pass this motion and to adopt these seven criteria for an open and honest process. I call upon all members to make it clear that, at this time, we are not prepared to leave the fate of this country and its Constitution in the hands of just a few people.

Canada's future security, the cultural well-being of our communities and the inheritance we leave for the future of our children depends on the outcome of this process. We must clearly define together our vision of where we want the country to go. To do that, we need a process based on the principles we are suggesting today.

We have deliberately said in our motion that this is not a non-confidence motion in the government, but rather it is an attempt to bring together the parties of this House to accept some common principles on the process.

I believe all of us in this House want to build a better Canada. We all have the same objective. Some of us may have different ways we would take to do it. But at least today, let us give hope to Canadians by saying that we can come together, agree on basic principles, that we have learned from the errors of the past. Let us show Canadians that we really are committed to building a true Constitution that belongs to Canadians, that does not belong to one political party or one point of view.

This would be a start today and I urge all members of this House to support this motion.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments of the leader of the New Democratic Party. I want to say that I am very disappointed she would use a subject as sensitive and as difficult as this one is for Canadians in a manner that encourages partisanship and, I think, encourages division within this House and within political parties.

Her comments, particularly, about the Prime Minister were very unfair. I think they were in fact quite wrong. The implication the leader of the New Democratic Party came back to again and again was that somehow the government is stifling public involvement or is not interested in public involvement, is both unfair and incorrect. The leader of the New Democratic Party knows or should know that the Prime Minister has launched initiatives in several areas.

I wish to come back to one other point that has been made again and again in this House. I see nothing wrong with the government, within itself, in terms of deputy ministers and others examining options. I think that is only logical. It would be irresponsible for any government department and individuals who work for the Government of Canada not to be thinking about this very difficult question.

What the leader of the New Democratic Party fails to mention is the fact that the government has a number of initiatives to involve the public. Of course, the Spicer Commission is one of those three different ways that the government is encouraging Canadians to come forward and give their opinion. She touched on that only very briefly. In fact, she and the members of her party should be getting behind that organization to ensure that it is a success. It is one of the ways in which this government is encouraging Canadians from coast to coast to get involved with this.

On the technical side, as well, the Edwards–Beaudoin joint parliamentary committee is one that will visit all ten provincial capitals, both territorial capitals and several other cities in Canada, and address some of the questions she mentioned; the constituent assembly referenda, and that sort of thing. We are encouraging Canadians to give us their opinions. That is something that all members, and members of her own party are involved with as well. This is another initiative.

I am proud, as well, that the Prime Minister has asked his own political party, the Progressive Conservative Party from coast to coast, every riding, every region of Canada, to get involved with the question of Canada's future.

In the next week or two, I will be participating in a forum for Ontario Progressive Conservatives, as well as a national forum. Again, the Prime Minister of Canada is asking Canadians to get involved and help with the future of this country.

I would invite the leader of the New Democratic Party to reassess the partisan view she has taken and get behind people like the Prime Minister who are doing their best to unite this country and keep it strong.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, as I said in my remarks, the Constitution is a series of principles for our country and how we are going to enact those principles. We are talking about something beyond that. We are talking about national unity.

While many Canadians find it difficult to react to the amending formula of the Constitution or particular technicalities, as important as they are, they do know one thing. They know there are 1.3 million people unemployed in this country. They know that poverty is increasing, that the gap between the rich and poor is increasing, that the middle class is finding it increasingly difficult to even maintain the standard of living. Taxes, like the goods and services tax, have made it even more difficult for individuals and small business to survive in this country.

Canadians know that bankruptcies have increased phenomenally in the last year, that the results of the Canada–U.S. trade deal have not proven to increase jobs for Canadians, but to decrease them. You cannot separate that, Mr. Speaker. You cannot separate the policies of this government in the monetary fiscal area, in the economic policies for the feelings of anger about what their country is now able to offer them and what kind of future there will be for their children.

When they see post-secondary education significantly cut back, not just by this government, but by former governments as well, what future is there for young people? What future is there for this country as we cut back research and development to make us less competitive? In fact, this government's policies are doing the very things which make us less competitive and less prosperous.

Those unemployed Canadians, those young children who are living in poverty in increasing numbers in this country, who are standing in the lines of food banks, the increasing number of homeless, has as much to do with national unity as does any constitutional amendment. It is absolutely essential that all of us on all sides of the House recognize that without security in the economy, without policies that will lead to full employment, without real policies to protect the environment, without real commitment to social programs in this country, constitutional amendments will mean nothing.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the leader of the New Democratic Party. I listened with great interest to what she said. I would ask her though looking at her motion if really she is not calling for a constitutional convention or constituent assembly. I know she spoke about it in her comments, but why not call for that specifically rather than call for so many of the ingredients of one without saying explicitly she thinks that is the way to involve Canadians.

I certainly agree with her it is the only way that we can involve Canadians in redoing the Constitution of Canada. She did point out, I think I am quoting her correctly, that it has worked with some success, I think was her phrase. My understanding is that it has worked very well in many countries and it has been a success virtually everywhere it has been tried.

Why does she not make the call for a constituent assembly the substance of her motion rather than saying everything in it but that?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I welcome my colleague's comments about that, because in fact I did address that in my speech today, as I have done previously in the House, and called on the government and others to examine that issue.

The member from Edmonton is quite correct, that the constitutional assembly has worked well in a number of countries. I cite Australia particularly. It is a country that has some similarity of issues to Canada. It was a process that I think worked quite well there.

Why we have chosen today to set out the principles and the process is that we do not want to pre-judge what the best would be. We would like to hear everyone else's ideas but I think the one important principle on which we can all agree, and the member from Edmonton obviously agrees with as well, is that the old process does not work. The old ways do not work. We cannot have 11 men just sitting at a different table this time in a different place. We need to open it up to people from the west, the north, the Atlantic region, from central Canada, to those groups that have particular interests, such as aboriginal people, the multicultural community and women.

We have to make sure that those groups are involved. If we do not do that, we as politicians in this House have dramatically failed the Canadian people. I, for one—and I am sure the member from Edmonton was making the same kind of comment—do not want to be a part of that kind of failure again. Therefore, I would very strongly urge that all parties consider the specific process, whether it is a convention or a constituent assembly. I myself, because I have presented that in the House before, favour that model. There may be better models that I have not thought of. I do not pretend to have all the best ideas, but I think I have some good ones, and the one that is most important is that all Canadians have to be served by this process. All Canadians have to be reflected in this process, and I think we should just get on with it and start doing that. Then we would see some real movement and, hopefully, a sense of hope about the future of this country, because that, of all things, is what Canadians need today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism).

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise here today to share with you my reflections on the current constitutional debate and to outline the initiatives taken by the federal government to find, within Canada, solutions which will lead to a strong and united Canada, ready to meet the challenges of the next century.

Mr. Speaker, whenever I return to Canada from a trip abroad or upon visiting one of our regions, I am impressed and proud of the accomplishments of our parents. With a population of only 26 million spread out over the second largest country in the world, our parents overcame a forbidding climate and geography to build the eighth largest economy in the world. The quality of things our parents built, and which we continue to build, can be seen all around us: first rate schools, clean subways, excellent health care, safe streets, marvellous recreational facilities and wide-spread economic opportunities. Millions of people all over the world admire our quality and standard of living and line up to come to Canada because successive generations of Canadians have succeeded in building an open, democratic, peaceful and very prosperous country.

This is the Canada we have. This is the Canada I am proud of and it is the Canada I wish to leave to my children. However, if we want to continue to develop our economy and meet the intense competition of the twenty-first century, while safeguarding our linguistic and cultural diversity, we must commit ourselves to the challenge of re-Confederation. We should not be afraid to take a fresh and new look at what is best done by the federal government and what by the provinces—what we want to do together, and what we prefer to do separately.

[English]

In fact I heartily concur and support the views expressed by our Prime Minister on December 16, 1990, in Buckingham, Quebec.

In his speech, the right hon. Prime Minister indicated the distribution of powers devised by the Fathers of Confederation. I quote:

> This distribution of powers admirably suited Canada's needs for many years, and it is entirely appropriate to review this to determine how best Canada can accommodate new realities internally while preparing to confront ferocious international competition for investment, technology, trade and prosperity. I believe it is now timely to review and modernize the Federation, to render it reflective of Canada's true diversity.

The government believes this. Whatever new arrangements we may develop over the course of the coming months, renewal of the federation must respect, above all, certain basic principles of change as outlined by the Prime Minister in his recent February speeches in Toronto and Quebec City.

Change should first lead to a more prosperous Canada. Change should secondly lead to a more efficient federalism and a more competitive nation. Change should respect equality, as well as diversity of citizens. Change, too, should be practical and it should be doable. It should maintain national standards and it should move decision-making closer to the people. We should safeguard rights of all Canadians.

The Prime Minister declared in this House on November 1, 1990: "I believe that if it takes major changes to hold this country together, Canadians want those changes made; and I believe that if it takes a new process to achieve these changes, Canadians want a new process designed".

These are the words of our Prime Minister. It was stated so well by him: "I am also confident that Canadians throughout the land have the will to change and to modernize the federation".

We hear so often that Canadians do not necessarily have the will to do this. I do not believe that is so; I think there is a will to change and to modernize.

[Translation]

Discussion and dialogue on change and on the modernization of the federation implies a two-way street. We must never forget that this is a vast and diverse country and we do not want everything run from Ottawa. On many questions and issues, the voices of the regions will be encouraged and not ignored—promoted and not stifled. I believe in a modern and flexible federalism, a federalism that reflects the diversity of Canada.

The federal government cannot modernize Canada alone; the federal government has therefore chosen to listen to all Canadians. In this spirit of listening, the government has undertaken a variety of initiatives and has welcomed the initiatives taken by certain provincial governments.

[English]

We have an opportunity at this moment in history to create a modern, efficient and dynamic Canada for a new century.

The federal government has, therefore, started a process to revitalize the federation and to lead toward a new and modern Canada. As part of this dynamic process the citizens' forum is a specific federal initiative taken to ensure that we do work with Canadians, to listen and to understand.

There are a number of interesting comments on this forum every day in the media; some of them critical, some of them positive, some of them disparaging, some of them hopeful. I read this morning in the Toronto Star on page 2 a very interesting column by Slinger, I do not know his first name. It is entitled "Beleaguered citizens' forum at least offers hope".

I have to commend this column; it is eloquent and it points to the importance of our continuing with this, putting our faith in it and using it constructively. The citizens' forum, therefore, is a specific initiative taken to ensure that we do work with Canadians, to listen to and understand their concerns, their goals, their dreams, and also their frustrations. The Special Joint Committee on the Amending Formula, as the member from Niagara Falls reminded us a few minutes ago, will also provide an opportunity to hear their views and best advise on how to amend the Constitution.

People say that this is a technical subject. Of course it is, but if we come up with new values and new approaches, we need to have a mechanical, technical way to bring them about. That is why that committee is established.

It is true that the federal government, with the citizens' forum, shows a very non-traditional approach in listening to Canadians. The terms of reference indicate that the citizens' forum is not to wait for people to come to them but to seek out the views of Canadians; and once they come in, not to treat them in a stonily way but to encourage them to talk about Canada—this is very unique—and to stimulate suggestions about the country's future. This is a forum put in place to animate and bring alive what people feel. The federal government wanted this process to go to the people, not just to the heads of the big corporations, big unions, or big school boards, but to individuals in their villages, in their work places. This is happening. It is unique; it is non-traditional.

I am confident that The Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future will go a long way to help us understand what this great country is about. I believe that the more Canadians talk to each other, the more they will realize how much they have in common and how much can be lost if we allow our differences to destroy our future together.

My daughter told me the other day that she sometimes thinks Canadians define themselves by what they do not like or who they do not like, rather than defining what they do like and what they do share. Other countries often can do this. I would like to see Canadians do this more. The citizens' forum is meant to encourage that, not to just restrict it to that. Of course frustrations must be vented, but also let us build common values together. It is an important and necessary step in the revitalizing process of this country.

Another initiative of the federal government in the listening process is the establishment of the Special Joint Committee on the Amending Formula.

As the Prime Minister said in his June 23 address to the nation, "we need to find an amendment process which reconciles the need for public participation and open democratic process with the legal requirements now in the Constitution."

The purpose of the committee is therefore to provide us with recommendations, based on broad consultations with Canadians, on a better way to go about changing our Constitution and, in particular, of involving the public in the process.

[English]

Although the federal government has presented a discussion paper to this committee, the paper did not make recommendations. Its purpose is to stimulate public discussion by raising a number of questions and examining a variety of options, without seeking to be exhaustive or suggesting any preferred course. I am confident that the ideas set out in the federal discussion paper will give rise to others and that Canadians will ultimately develop a consensus on the amending process.

In conclusion, the federal government also supports the initiatives of the provinces in their efforts to engage in dialogue; we have that dimension of dialogue occurring as well. All initiatives to revitalize federalism in this country and to prepare us for the 21st century are encouraged and supported by the federal government.

I was approached the other day by the mayor of the city of London who wanted to send a message to the people across Canada about his city's desire to hold Canada together. We should encourage that, just as we encourage other forums of discussion across the country. Once we have heard as broad a spectrum of views as possible, the federal government then will bring forward—and not before—a comprehensive proposal for a new and stronger Canada.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the question that all Canadians must answer is very simple: Do we still have the will to live together as a country? I am convinced that Canadians will answer with a resounding "yes" and will be ready to modernize our federation, to make it more sensitive to economic, linguistic and cultural realities. This is why the federal government has taken thoughtful actions to continue the effort of our forebears and develop a national response to a national problem.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister a question. He may not be able to answer it. He is not directly implicated in the constitutional issue, but I want to ask it anyway because it may be useful to the process in this country.

As the minister knows, we have a group of deputy ministers now working on the division of powers and other substantive constitutional issues. That work is being done, by the way it is defined, behind closed doors in the bureaucracy.

I wonder if the minister can explain to this House what the terms of reference are for those deputy ministers, what they are working on, what is their agenda, when will that report be made public or will it be made public? I wonder if he can tell us more about that committee.

It may be useful. One thing we have learned from the whole process is that people want the whole constitutional process open and up front. They want to be involved. They want to know who is doing what. They do not want secret meetings and they do not want closed doors.

Perhaps the minister can help the process by telling us what he knows, if anything, about the deputy ministers, what they are doing, what their timetable is and so on.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, it is with a note of sadness that I listen to the cast of the hon. member's question which was about secrecy rather than about the country.

The comment was made before this debate began that this country does not want mindless partisanship to dominate this issue. What we want is the love of country to dominate. If that is going to work, we should not talk about marginal issues of secrecy, especially when the process is as open as it is.

I will answer the hon. member's question. He asks about the deputy ministers, and I will answer it. By the way, I hope that when the NDP has its discussions on the Constitution it has its discussions in public. If it does not have them in public, if it can explain to the Canadian people why not, and there might be occasions when it wants to try out some ideas and do some research away from the public, I want the NDP to answer clearly for itself the same questions it asks the government and other parties.

Let me explain here the mandate of the committee of deputy ministers. After the failure of Meech Lake, the Prime Minister made the following observations: The country needed a new process for going about constitutional change; there were serious misunderstandings that Canadians needed to work out in a way so that they could feel they were contributing to solving these problems.

He also said that the federal government will be bringing forward its own proposals once all of these reports were received and once any provincial government if it so wishes had stated its position.

The government also has made it clear since then that it is monitoring not only the initiatives referred to above, but also the provincial commissions that have been established. The Prime Minister has also make it clear that the status quo is unacceptable and that we must all work together to produce a more prosperous united federation.

The question naturally arises: How will the government then develop its proposal? This is where the so-called committee of deputies comes in. For this task, the government is marshalling the best resources available, and in this context the deputy ministers have been given priority assignments whose results will be integrated with the other work that is under way. There is no secret committee and there is no secret agenda.

This has been stated over and over again. It is very important that we use the resources in this country, including our public servants, to help us with the task. Any government that did not would be wholly irresponsible. Of course, we want to use that advice.

The Prime Minister has asked Gordon Smith, Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations, to co-ordinate this activity. This policy advice which deputies will provide will in no way undercut or pre-empt any other review process. I can assure the hon. member and all members of this House that there will be ample opportunity for public discussion and debate once the federal proposals come forward.

That should lay to rest any concern that something secret is going to happen and going to be sprung on the country. This is a preparation for openness, for renewing this country. Let us keep things on that plane, a non-partisan plane.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I think this proposal could be very beneficial for the people of Canada. For Quebecers, it is not the same ball game, as indicated by the very wording of the motion, where paragraph 7 clearly states:

> (7) that discussions begin with only one precondition, a desire to remain within a renewed Canadian federation;

That would exclude, from the start, participants in the Bélanger-Campeau inquiry, including the three central labour bodies, a movement the NDP is usually closely associated with. These people do not meet the conditions set in the motion. I think it is a good thing for Canada to take some time to define itself. Quebec is doing the same. In Quebec, we have a commission and discussions have been going on for several years. I think it is healthy that these two nations define their identity on their own so they can establish better links afterwards.

In that context, I would like to ask the minister if, as a member of the government of a country that recognizes the United Nations Charter, one of the main principles of the Charter being the recognition of the right of nations to self-determination—if the minister were so kind as to listen to me instead of looking to one of his colleagues for an answer—So, will the minister tell me whether he recognizes or not the right of Quebec to self-determination following a referendum? Since they are signatories of the United Nations Charter, I would imagine that this principle does not apply only to other countries such as the Baltic States, but first in our own house. Otherwise, it is pure hypocrisy. I would like to hear his comments on this.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that a referendum was held in Canada some 11 years ago. It was a referendum, was it not?

Mr. Plamondon: Yes.

[English]

Mr. Hockin: It is a question of fact. It is not for us to declare ourselves with regard to any declaration of the United Nations. The facts speak for themselves.

I thank the member for his comment about the importance of us defining ourselves in all parts of Canada. This is what this process is helping us to do: to define all parts of Canada. He has his definition of what he would like to see happen in this part of North America. I know that. However, he commends us, who do not agree with him, to go through the process of rethinking where we are going and how we want to see this country renewed.

That is what all of these processes which have been put in place by the government are meant to do.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the minister will not have to answer because my comments will take about a minute. I trust you will give him a little extra time.

The Spicer Commission is discrediting itself. People such as myself who referred people to the Spicer Commission are finding that it is becoming a source of embarrassment: the expenses, of course the statement by Mr. Spicer on being appointed or words to this effect that "my job", I think he said, "is to prepare English Canada for the recommendations of Bélanger-Campeau, especially if they are radical".

There is another committee looking at the amendment to the constitution formula. The minister will know as a former political scientist, as you know, we need unanimity to amend the Constitution of Canada. It is hardly a burning issue. It is a marginal issue. That is why so few people are, I understand, asking to appear before that committee.

The real problem or the most important problem is the fact that the Prime Minister of this country during the Meech Lake process said in effect time and time again that if Meech Lake did not pass Quebecers should consider themselves rejected by the rest of Canada.

That is patently not the case, and to me that is probably the major problem we have right now in Canada. The chief elected official in this country has created that problem by his grossly irresponsible way of treating that Meech Lake issue.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I have heard this criticism of the Spicer Commission. Let me just quote from a column this morning by Mr. Slinger in The Toronto Star. I do not read him every day, but I certainly read him today. He wrote:

> The loudest critics of the Spicer Commission are in the mass media and the official opposition. What the critics have not suggested is a better idea. They haven't said what might meet their exacting standards.

He goes on to indicate:

> The citizens' forum represents at least a hope for spinning our straw into nationhood. It is a wonderful thing to hear a roomful of ordinary folks, strangers until then, trying to put into words what they feel for this country, whatever else we have sat and listened to, people very like ourselves searching in plain language for a common purpose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time is over.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we are here today to debate a New Democratic Party motion urging parliamentarians to consider what the coming twenty months may entail for the future of Canada.

In the course of those twenty months we will all be called upon to redefine the contract on which our country is based. Few generations of MPs have the opportunity to deal with such a momentous issue which goes straight to the heart of this country. I would not be exaggerating if I were to say that future historians will look upon the years 1991 and 1992 as their predecessors saw the 1864–1867 period, the time which led to Confederation.

[English]

Germany succeeded in a reunification plan within one year. The countries of eastern Europe overthrew a whole obsolete political order. The whole world, for a time, buried the cold war, and South Africa is finally burying apartheid at a time when Canada has been floundering in the midst of a paralysing constitutional crisis.

Many people thought that following the death of Meech the dust would settle and people would go about their business, that Canada would carry on as it had in the past. They were wrong. Like it or not, we are entering a period of intense soul searching, probably without precedent since 1867. The end product will be a different political and constitutional Canada.

The constitutional clock is ticking. It may be tempting; as some have said, it is impossible to come up with something that will satisfy Quebec, so why don't we let it go? I say we must take this opportunity to find a new deal that will satisfy Quebec, that will satisfy the west, and that will satisfy all parts of this great country. Otherwise we will all be the losers.

In 1864 the Fathers of Confederation—and they were only fathers then—faced an almost impossible task, and yet they succeeded in providing a framework that has given us a basis for Confederation which has lasted 124 years. Why can we, the men and women of Canada, now not be the mothers and fathers of a new Confederation?

To those who say let Quebec go, its price is too high, I say the price for separation is much higher for all of us.

To those who say the breakup of our country is just a matter of time, I say no. We can and we must reignite the political will to save our country.

To those who would sleep-walk us to separation by ignoring the constitutional crisis and focusing only on our economic problems, I say a strong economy and a strong Constitution go hand in hand. We cannot have a healthy Canada without a whole Canada, and that includes Quebec.

We cannot have a complete Canada unless we undergo a fundamental restructuring of the way we share power in this country.

Our system, designed in the 19th century, does not meet all the needs of the 21st century. Our present structures and institutions have not adapted to new realities.

Federalism is a complex system designed to deal with complex realities. When the situation changes, so must the specifics of our system. We need a new frame of thinking. We have to find a new constitutional deal for Canada. More than most countries, Canada is the creation of the strong will of our people. We were created in spite of geographic, linguistic and cultural differences in our proximity to a very powerful neighbour to the south.

The great majority of Canadians does not want to destroy Canada. It wants to rebuild it. The great majority of Quebecers wants to rejoin Canada in a new Confederation.

Quebecers are putting their ideas on the table in a very articulate and comprehensive manner. The rest of the country is slowly waking up to the scope of those possible changes. We may not like the specifics of some of the Allaire proposals. Then we must make counterproposals. Why not use this opportunity to take a look at other areas of dissatisfaction? To succeed, we must have a realistic focus on our objectives and design an effective and open process.

Unfortunately, the last constitutional round was handled by the Prime Minister like an amateur. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister has already begun the secretive process that failed us in the last constitutional round.

A member on the government side of the House accuses me of getting into the gutter. I have to tell him that I bled a lot and my party bled a lot over the last number of years for the constitutional position I took because I believed it was right. I also believed then—and I continue to believe it—that had the Prime Minister listened to the Parliament of Canada and had the Prime Minister listened to the very process that allowed amendments to the constitutional process which did not derogate from any of the five conditions of Quebec, then we would have had a healthier, happier constitutional framework today and we would not have taken the country to the brink of separation.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: Nothing is perfection in life and nothing is a seamless web. One of the things I have learned in politics is that by listening to those who feel without power and by including those people in the process, we can end up with a product, a constitution and a framework that are happier and healthier for all of us. Surely that is what the new constitutional round must be about.

I believe that is the intent of the NDP resolution, but let me refer to the NDP resolution as it stands.

The resolution as worded is confusing and, particularly, incomplete. Indeed, paragraph 7 provides for only one so-called precondition, namely "a desire to remain within a renewed Canadian federation", the only condition for one Canada.

It makes no sense, Mr. Speaker, because Canada has to be more than a shell. Canada and the new federation will have to be anchored on more comprehensive and deeply-seated principles. We do not want an unconditional Canada if, as a country, it should fail to respond to the quest for equality, justice and the various forms of recognition that have been acknowledged for 124 years.

Mr. Speaker, this is why we intend to move a very significant amendment to the NDP motion. Jean Chrétien, the only leader of a federal party who had the courage to present a brief to the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, set forth the conditions for a real Canada—

Mr. Charest: Do not throw the door wide open, Sheila!

Ms. Copps: —a renewed Canada, and I quote: "A new Canada must accommodate the expression of new balances within the federation. The key to constitutional reform is the sharing of powers between both government levels. The objective sought must be a functional distribution of powers between governments, predicated on the freedom and well-being of citizens".

Surely, Mr. Speaker, even the members of the Bloc Quebecois cannot be against the freedom and well-being of citizens. I should hope not.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing sacred about the way powers are now distributed. Over and above that fundamental and general principle, we must also keep in mind a number of objectives which are peculiar to Canada and which ought to guide us all on the road to constitutional renewal, particularly when re-examining the distribution of powers between the two levels of government. Specifically: (1) any change in the distribution of powers should guarantee the rights and freedoms of citizens; (2) any change in the distribution of powers should ensure that the two main linguistic communities in this country are maintained and strengthened. The very existence of Canada rests on that basic principle, and it must be generously endorsed by all government levels in Canada.

In addition, Quebec must be recognized as the principal focal point of French life and culture in Canada. Any change in the distribution of power should guarantee the respect for and growth of Native people, promote the rights and growth of cultural communities, endeavour to maximize the quality of life and standard of living of all Canadians, ensure the proper working of the Canadian economic unions, ensure, on a national scale the pursuit of social justice through the sharing of resources between regions and citizens, ensure sovereignty for every government within its respective jurisdiction, take into account the diversity of various regions and their own dynamism, including the distinct character of Quebec society—

Mr. Plamondon: Go and say that to Chrétien and you will see!

Mrs. Copps: I am sorry, but the hon. member certainly did not listen to the submission to the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, because this is part of Mr. Chrétien's statement. So why do you not shut up and listen for once!

Mr. Speaker, I continue: Leave to the provinces responsibility for what is not required by the national interest or the best interest of citizens.

Finally, the streamlining of Canadian federalism is not necessarily an affirmation of the principle of total symmetry in every aspect of our constitutional federation. Canadian federalism has always been and continues to be flexible enough to accommodate the asymmetry of some situations.

Mr. Speaker, that is the reason why we propose an extended amendment to the NDP's motion, because we think, as a party, that it will be important to strengthen such regions as the Atlantic, Western and Northern Canada, so that they may have a greater impact on the drafting of national legislation.

At any rate, this is only the beginning of the constitutional discussions.

[English]

To answer the constitutional challenges we need a real Canada round. This round should be aimed at rebuilding the whole country. The task is enormous but it is not impossible.

I see that I am a getting close to the hour of one o'clock. Rather than beginning what I feel to be a very important part of the process, I would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House, if I might, to continue my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent of the House for the motion of the acting leader?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock later this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to congratulate and commend the competition bureau's recent decision to look into retail gasoline prices in the national capital region and various areas across Canada.

I trust that this study will be thorough and in depth, and will cover all regions of the country.

While we await anxiously the results of this study, I would like to call on the federal government, in conjunction with its provincial counterparts to get to the bottom of the situation.

We must ensure that a gasoline pricing system is in place which is fair to both consumers and retailers, no matter where they are situated in this country. Also, we must ensure that when price wars break out in select areas of the country, other areas such as the national capital region are not charged higher prices to cover the losses incurred by retailers elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. I call on the minister to tell Canadians exactly how long this study will take and when the findings will be made public.

MATAPÉDIA VALLEY

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, according to a new prophecy by Nostradamus, "Before the turn of the century, there shall be a marvelous occurrence: The site called Matapédiague shall be designated capital of a great land, between two oceans".

On March 11 last the Matapédia valley was nationally acknowledged as "Canada's forestry capital" for the year 1993.

Such designation constitutes signal recognition of the dynamic and hospitable region of Matapédia.

Over the years, Matapédia has become one of Canada's foremost forest regions where people have very close links with forests.

Congratulations to the organizing committee members who, through sheer dynamism, determination and tenacity, were able to convince our fellow Canadians in the other provinces that Matapédia has always been renowned for its forests and home to people prepared to fight and work relentlessly to enhance end preserve our trees.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, Canada has the dubious honour of being among a select few nations which is actually decreasing funding for basic scientific research. In Canada research and development has dropped from 1.4 per cent to 1.28 per cent of our GNP; funds for NSERC and the National Research Council have been slashed.

The government has poured billions into offshore oil exploration and a U.S. space station that the Americans are even now questioning, while not recognizing the potential of the TRIUMF KAON project at the University of British Columbia.

The proposed project is a world class initiative which would launch Canada into the frontier of particle physics.

Without sacrificing the need for increased funding for basic scientific research, this government must recognize the need for available funding of special projects like TRIUMF KAON.

It is time to wake up and smell the coffee. If basic research and projects like KAON wither on the vine because of chronic under-funding, so too will our national hopes of becoming a world force in future scientific endeavours.

TIBET

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Canadian Tibetan community demonstrated in Ottawa to mark the 32nd anniversary of the Tibetan uprising in 1959. That uprising was to protest the Chinese occupation and domination of this small peaceful country, which intensified in that year.

Recently, the UN Security Council used economic sanctions and military action against Iraq for its enforced occupation of Kuwait. This has been described as a new world order for settling disputes and deterring aggression.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this. Will the same new world order be used to get China out of Tibet? Or has the United Nations and the United States a double standard? Or, at the very least, will the new world order be used to have China respect human rights in Tibet—their language, their religion and their culture?

The Dalai Lama and the people of Tibet have always pursued a non-violent, peaceful approach in dealing with this problem. In 1989 the Dalai Lama won the Nobel Peace Prize for this approach. I hope that Canada, the United Nations and the world community will not let the Tibetans down.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Last week, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Quebec finally signed the federal-provincial agreement aimed at cleaning up so-called orphan polluted sites.

I am particularly elated by the signing of this agreement which signals the early beginning of decontamination activities on Mascouche's PCB site in my riding where Montreal garbage collectors used to dump their loads.

Fifty-one million dollars will be spent to clean up various sites throughout Quebec, and $400,000 have already been earmarked for soil analyses on the Mascouche dump site.

I thank Canada's Environment Minister De Cotret for his support in this case. I am convinced that all people in my riding are very pleased by this news, and I thank them all for their confidence and support in bringing this matter to a successful conclusion.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, Canada's national police force and the security of rural Canadians are in jeopardy because of this government's economic folly.

At the end of March, contracts which provide for the delivery of RCMP services expire, and the federal government is negotiating to force more of its costs on to the backs of municipal taxpayers. Small communities are especially vulnerable to cost increases because some of them already devote up to 75 per cent of their budget to simply maintaining existing RCMP contracts.

The federal cuts in RCMP funding amount to nothing less than another tax on rural Canadians. It is unfair to dump more of the responsibility for this government's economic mismanagement on to the backs of those who can least afford it.

The RCMP is important in Saskatchewan, as well as in the other western provinces and territories. If the government can find the funds to finance international security forces, we should be able to find the funds to maintain our internal security forces.

My colleagues and I in the NDP will continue to work for a fair deal for rural Canadians, and that means supporting federal funding levels for the RCMP.

NATIVE AFFAIRS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Under the program for Natives which Prime Minister Brian Mulroney announced in September 1990, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will allocate $250 million within the federal green plan to accelerate the installation and improvement of drinking water supply and wastewater disposal facilities on the reserves. Also within the green plan framework, Health and Social Welfare Canada will allocate $25 million to finance water quality control as well as training in water treatment technology on the reserves.

From now on, the federal government will be able to step up the provision of secure drinking water and wastewater disposal facilities in order to solve health and security problems, something the former Liberal administration had failed to do.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the government's Green Plan has thrown $10 million at studies for 11 Atlantic hotspots, a drop in the ocean; $25 million at a centre for more studies, consultation with industry, and what not for the Great Lakes; and $250 million to meet old promises for water and sewage facilities on First Nation reserves.

Canadians and the environment are sick and tired of this charade. It is time to implement the monitoring and enforcement of regulations already available, to require industry to clean up its act, to spend Green Plan money on substantial green actions that will benefit all Canadians and not just prop up this morally bankrupt environmental agenda.

It is time to stop the stalling, this facade of green action, to stop wasting the taxpayers' money on study after study, to stop propping up old promises, to stop letting polluters break the laws of Canada. It is time to respect the wishes of Canadians.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, government departments are increasingly being called upon to develop useful science and technology to help Canadians protect the environment, at both local and global levels. EMR is one department which is actively making a difference in this regard.

EMR's research and technology branch, Canmet, co-operates with industry in the planning, performance, and funding of the development and transfer of technology in virtually all areas of mining, recovery, processing and the use of minerals, metals and energy.

In fact, for years Canmet's scientists and engineers have been conducting and co-ordinating research to preserve our environment. Canmet continues to promote environmentally safe technologies to help Canadian industry use our natural resources more effectively and to improve competitiveness of Canadian technologies. I am proud of the contribution Canmet is making, proud of the work these individuals are undertaking in co-operation with industry to find the answers to the world's most troubling environmental problems. I hope all members will join me in commending Canmet officials for a job well done.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, in the recent budget the people of Canada suffered yet another slap in the face. The finance minister ignored the cries of Canadians who are out of work or lined up at food banks. What the finance minister needs is a good dose of reality.

Reality is that over 1.3 million Canadians are unemployed. Over 180,000 children rely on food banks to eat. Inflation is on the rise because of the disastrous goods and services tax. Students will be hindered because of increased tuition caused by this government. That is reality.

During his budget speech the finance minister said: "We must deal with the world as it is and not as we might wish it to be". We in the Liberal Party ask the minister to deal with the world as it is and ask him to help the millions of Canadians suffering because of the recession this government has caused.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the end of the war in the Persian Gulf is a victory for international law and the United Nations. We can be proud of this extraordinary coalition of 30 countries united to protect and promote international law and order.

The world community must now do everything to ensure first the reconstruction of Kuwait, but also to set up a fair and lasting peace under the eagis of the United Nations to prevent a repetition of such conflicts.

With that in mind, on February 12 our Prime Minister submitted proposals for the establishment of a lasting peace in the Middle East. Sharing in the efforts to safeguard and ensure peace is part of the great Canadian tradition.

We must try to put a stop to the uncontrolled arms race, as well as address the Israel Arab issue while acknowledging the legitimate interests of the Palestinians.

To conclude, I wish to send greetings to all the Canadian men and women, members of our Armed Forces, including nine from my own riding, who fought bravely and gallantly during the Persian Gulf war.

SUDBURY

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the NDP government in Ontario recently struck a potentially devastating blow to the economic health of the Sudbury region.

Sudbury suffered badly from the effects of the recession which occurred in the early 1980s. At that time assistance from the Liberal federal government and provincial government helped the Sudbury region to diversify. The federal and provincial governments moved decision making powers and jobs to the Sudbury region to assist in the establishment of the city as the centre for government services in northeastern Ontario.

Over the last few years, the Conservative federal government has cut back its support to the diversification of Sudbury's economy through downsizing, reorganizations, and cuts of government departments and Crown corporations.

The recent decision by the Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources to move its regional office, and possibly as many as 40 jobs, out of Sudbury, represents a stunning reversal in provincial support for regional diversification, and when combined with the similar policies of this Conservative government, will have potentially devastating effects if continued.

It is time the governments reaffirm their commitment to diversify Sudbury's economy. They should be investing in what has been and should continue to be a shining example—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. The hon. member's time has expired.

ISRAEL

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, Israel needs Canada's help. Over 3,000 buildings, many of them residential, were destroyed by Scud missiles.

This could not have come at a worse time. Israel is trying to house 200,000 Soviet Jews. Twice this number more are expected this year.

Even as I speak they are making their way to Israel, their new homeland. But the tragedy is that the only homes awaiting them are apartments to be shared with two or three other families.

Israel is a war victim, struggling to rebuild and in need of foreign aid. United States and Europe have recognized this. But Canada, a sworn protector of Israel during the gulf war, has offered no assistance.

Why not? Israel's credit rating is impeccable and assistance from Canada would enhance our future trade relations.

I can find no ethical or economical reason why this government has remained silent and turned its back on Israel.

I urge this government to act now.

LUMBER INDUSTRY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister and the President get together over dinner tomorrow night, Canadians want to hear a little bit more than When Irish Eyes are Smiling.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member would want to put her question.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, on the bilateral front, the 15 per cent tax this government imposed on Canadian softwood lumber exports is killing Canadian jobs and Canadian businesses. The Prime Minister promised the tax would only be temporary, but it is still there, four years later. It is a ridiculous tax to appease big U.S. lumber companies at the expense of Canadians, and everybody knows it.

I ask the Prime Minister if he will tell President Bush over dinner tomorrow night that Canada is dropping the 15 per cent tax on lumber exports?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague, the Minister for International Trade told the House last week, it is our intention to begin negotiations quite soon with the Americans in accordance with some of the new guidelines and criteria that have been changing since the lumber tax was imposed. Any unilateral action would be harmful to Canadian interests.

We think we now have the consent of the provinces to proceed with the negotiations that will be necessary to terminate the agreement.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, with all the due respect I have for the minister, the Prime Minister is going to be having dinner with President Bush.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister specifically whether he intends to raise another injurious program, the export enhancement program of the U.S., which is unfairly subsidizing American farmers and killing off the Canadian farm family.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister specifically if he intends to raise with the President of the United States Canada's intention to kill our export lumber tax and in particular, does he intend to force the President of the United States to end the export enhancement program immediately?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have made many representations to the United States with respect to their export enhancement tax and their export assistance program. Of course that is tied directly to the Uruguay Round of the GATT negotiations because this American program is a response to subsidization by the European Community under their common agricultural policy.

This is not a simple problem. Representations have been made by the Minister of Agriculture to the U.S. minister in charge of agriculture. We intend to continue with these representations, but the only sure solution is the conclusion of the Uruguay Round in a way that eliminates the right to impose export subsidies.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Minister for International Trade, such as it is, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister, since he is the one who will be meeting with the President of the United States tomorrow evening.

I can understand that he may wish to remain silent on the subject of the Allaire Report, but I would like to hear from the Prime Minister of Canada himself if he agrees with his colleague the Minister for International Trade, who is now ready, at the request of the Americans, to put the Canadian culture on the table at the next round of negotiations on international trade with the United States and Mexico. Will the Prime Minister protect the 250,000 Canadian jobs that are dependent on the Canadian culture or is he ready, like his colleague, to give them up to satisfy the Americans?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this matter was dealt with through questions in the House a week or so ago.

There is no request from the U.S. for cultural matters to be put on any negotiating table because, as yet, there is no negotiating table. That will depend upon whether or not the U.S. Congress gives President Bush and his administration fast track authority and continues fast track authority for the period of the next two years.

The trade representative of the United States has simply said that they would like to discuss cultural matters. We have no objection to discussing cultural matters with the United States. We are not afraid of discussing cultural matters with anyone, but we will continue to protect Canadian cultural industries as the present minister has done so ably in the last several years.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The President of the United States has committed his government to negotiate a free trade agreement embracing the whole of the western hemisphere. The Canadian government has already decided to participate in the Mexico–U.S. free trade negotiations. Does the government now intend to explore, during the visit tomorrow of President Bush, the United States' intentions about free trade throughout the whole of the western hemisphere?

Last June, the minister stated that he needed more time to examine such a proposal. Will the minister now state what the government's intentions are regarding hemispheric free trade?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): The intentions of the government at the present time are to engage in a negotiation for a North American free trade agreement with the United States and with Mexico if the U.S. administration is authorized through the fast track process to proceed.

The President of the United States has indicated that the United States may possibly be interested in other free trade agreements with other countries of either South or Central America, but there is nothing like that on the negotiating table as yet.

The principle that guides us is that the freer trade can become between all nations of the world—this is the policy the Official Opposition as well, which supports the GATT negotiations—the better it will be for all of those involved, because it is the freer and freer trade that has caused the international prosperity since 1945.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well that discussions have already begun about hemispheric free trade, including free trade between the United States and Chile, and between the United States and countries of Central America.

He knows full well, too, that one of the reasons which he advanced for Canada participating in the talks with Mexico is that Canadian interests must be protected in a trilateral deal. Now, is he telling us that Canada will also participate in western hemisphere discussions?

Will the minister tell us what it is that the Canadian government is doing to help equip Canadians to compete effectively internationally? What programs are there? Were there any programs in the recent budget to assist Canadians to compete more effectively in a global economy? When will the government commit itself to doing such things as reducing interprovincial trade barriers or investing in research and development and training and retraining so that Canadians can be more competitive?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is these policies of the government with respect to competition and encouraging Canadians to look outward and to be in a position to compete globally that the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party have opposed so bitterly over the last several years.

The hon. gentleman is now indicating the conversion on the part of the Official Opposition that it is very welcome news, but no one in this House knows just what the policy is of the Official Opposition on anything.

I am glad to hear the minister apparently advocating freer trade.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today our party has tabled a motion before the House to open up the process on constitutional talks. I want to say to the Prime Minister that there is growing concern that, while publicly the Prime Minister and his government is saying that they want to listen to Canadians, privately there is only one voice being listened to, and that is of the corporate elite.

I understand that last week the Prime Minister's top constitutional adviser met with academics at Meech Lake to discuss a paper commissioned by the Business Council on National Issues. In and of itself, there is nothing wrong with that. It is clear that there are many initiatives going on that are not open to the Canadian public, at least even to know the mandate and the direction of this government.

Is the Prime Minister really just trying to formulate a Canada on a corporate constitution, or what is his plan for a new and revitalized federation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend seeks to ask the government to be inclusive in regard to parliamentary or para-parliamentary discussions involving people in the constitutional process and then proceeds to denigrate big business, when we have welcomed the participation of big labour in these discussions as well.

My hon. friend should not be hidebound by protectionist and other old tendencies of the NDP over the years. Open your arms, open your minds, open your hearts to business and you will find that they are as constructive and productive as big labour in this country as well. All people should be invited to participate.

My hon. friend says that he is opposed to larger business. We are clearly a minority party in this House, but we believe that the private sector and small, medium and big business, in a proper economic climate, can provide jobs and new wealth for the country. That is the position of this government. We would very much like to have small, medium and large business participate in the constitutional discussions, along with unionized members and the unions themselves.

Surely, if on the one hand my friend is asking for openness and inclusiveness, she should not be excluding anybody in the process.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary of the Prime Minister. That is exactly the point. We do not want to see anyone excluded from the process.

I would ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to have his offices convene meetings at Meech Lake to discuss with the Business Council on National Issues their constitutional papers? Would he also be prepared to hold similar meetings and serious discussions with aboriginal people, with women, with ethnocultural communities, to discuss those same issues and their views on the constitution and take them equally as seriously in equally as serious a forum?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister. I think that is an important message that all of these groups who have felt excluded from the constitution need to hear. I appreciate the Prime Minister's direct response to that question.

I have a supplementary.

Last week, in the Budget debate, the Minister of Finance mentioned new tax arrangements. The other day, the Minister of Communications suggested that culture could come under provincial jurisdiction. My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will he suspend all negotiations which could jeopardize the future of the Constitution until he has received all the committee and commission reports and until an agreement has been reached regarding the constitutional process?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance already answered that some agreements need to be negotiated anyway to ensure the proper operation of the federal government and his relations with the provinces. This is part of our usual business and the Canadian government is fully committed to carry on with this work.

On the subject of the implications of these various issues, I would invite her to take a look at the speech I made in Quebec City on February 13, where, among others things, I said that:

• (1430)

"The Quebec government will soon receive the Bélanger–Campeau Commission report and is now studying the Allaire report. Other provinces have also established mechanisms to review Canada's political framework. There is no doubt in my mind that from these and other task forces we will be able to find the elements of solutions to the problems now facing the country.

Once as many Canadians as possible have had a chance to speak their minds, once any provincial government that so wishes to has stated its position, once the federal government and Parliament have had time to analyse the comments and suggestions put forward, I intend to present proposals for a renewed Canada, one that is proud of its diversity and stronger in its unity.

No idea or suggestion will be dismissed out of hand if it serves the public interest and improves our political system, but we will reject any formula that aims to dismantle Canada."

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, once upon a time, as a backbencher, the now Minister of State for Housing was a great advocate for the homeless and those seeking affordable housing, but he has become nothing more than an apologist for this government. Budget after budget, year after year, program after program he has delivered less and less for people who need housing more and more.

I want to ask the minister, where has he left his housing conscience, at the cabinet table or in the trunk of his limousine?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, last week in the House I outlined the government's housing program for the coming year. At that time I indicated that, notwithstanding the fact that budgets were tight and money had been restrained, the housing department federally had been able to accommodate and, through efficiencies and cost-effective measures, would be able to produce at least as much assistance this year and help as many households this year as we were last year.

So this year, once again, we will be able to assist some 40,000 more households in Canada, which is over and above the 640,000 we already assist.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, cutting the housing budget by $411 million in five years will hurt not help people waiting for affordable housing in every province and territory in this country. Provinces must now fight each other year after year for the meagre morsels that this minister wants to give them.

I want to ask the Minister of State for Housing why he will not bring this country together, build this country by building good housing policy, by affording Canadians decent and affordable housing today and tomorrow.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): In fact, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what this government is doing. We are not only spending and will be spending this year close to $2 billion with respect to assisted housing in this country, but in addition to that, we have initiatives under way for dealing with surplus federal lands in order to increase the amount of housing that is available to Canadians.

Shortly, I am going to be announcing the creation of a centre for public-private housing partnerships which will also be of great assistance to Canadians in their housing needs.

CANADA POST

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

The people of Lawrencetown, Nova Scotia, are the latest to bear the brunt of Canada Post's rural policy. They join the customers of over 700 post offices across Canada whose post offices have closed since the 1986 policy was first announced.

Lawrencetown is a crossroads in Annapolis County. It is the hub for farmers, students, and government offices. With that level of service demand, I wonder if the minister can say whether there are any circumstances in which a rural post office will now be allowed to remain open.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, without having prior notice from the hon. member, I cannot comment on the specific example she raised, but the question of the policy of modernizing, bringing up to date with today's living styles and so on the postal delivery systems has occurred across the country in many, many locations.

The post office has gone back with post-change surveys to find out how the people affected reacted to it. Over 85 per cent found the changes favourable, an improvement. When 85 per cent approve of a policy, we do not change it.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. In all small communities in Canada, the post office is the pillar or nerve centre for all kinds of activities.

Will the minister confirm whether Canada Post's policy is to keep post offices open only in a few urban centres? And will he table in the House the number of post offices that will still be open in Nova Scotia and Canada, once this policy has been implemented?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I would be glad to provide that detail for the hon. member, but I would say that part of this policy is to increase the service to the public.

It was anticipated when this policy was implemented, I think three years ago, that in the following 10 years the number of postal outlets would increase from 12,000 to about 18,000. So there would be 6,000 new postal outlets to serve the customers of the post office. I am sure an appropriate proportion of those will be located in Nova Scotia.

CANADA–U.S. WATER AGREEMENT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of the Environment. An agreement that was signed between this government and the United States in October 1989 allows the state of North Dakota to call for 50 per cent of the natural flow into the Souris River any time that it is to the benefit of the State of North Dakota.

In other words, in the middle of a hot, dry summer, North Dakota can phone up and say it wants their 50 per cent of the water. This will of course necessitate diverting water from other river basins, like the Qu'Appelle system which is in the middle of my riding.

My question to the Minister of the Environment is this: why did this government allow the province of Saskatchewan to divert water in the licence it granted to it under the international treaty. Second, can the minister assure me that water from the Qu'Appelle River will not be diverted into the Souris and into the United States?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague would be well advised to read the Canada—U.S. agreement. He would immediately find that it does not commit any additional water to the U.S.

The United States has a right to 50 per cent of the natural flow from the Souris River under a 1959 interim apportionment agreement which is being administered by the International Joint Commission.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, today we heard that the Government of Quebec intends to freeze the salaries of its employees.

Last week, the Government of Newfoundland cut 3,200 jobs in the public sector.

These vicious attacks on employees who pay income tax and GST and are faced with increases in the cost of living reflect the present lack of compassion of our leaders for Canadian families.

The federal government was the first to ignore the collective rights of its employees.

My question is directed to the Minister of Labour, but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Will the minister ask the Minister of Finance to withdraw the unfair restrictions he has put on the bargaining process?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, to the credit of the last Budget, the government has taken a certain number of measures that will launch economic recovery in the long run. These measures include a number of major constraints on the government's expenditures.

Mr. Samson: It's illegal.

Mr. Loiselle: After wide-ranging consultations during the pre-budget period, we decided that we would ask our employees, who have been reasonable in the past, to be reasonable once again during the bargaining process and, together with all Canadians, to help us reduce the deficit, so that interest rates can go down and we will all benefit from the ensuing prosperity.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who has just come from a meeting with the tobacco board.

The minister must know that he has tobacco farmers between a rock and a hard place. The government has just levied a massive tax hike on tobacco farmers' produce, while at the same time it has not given one penny this year to the program that helps farmers get out of the tobacco business.

When is this government going to stop punishing tobacco farmers? When are we going to see some money for this year's REDUX program? When are we going to have some money to help these farmers adjust?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is true that I met with the Ontario Tobacco Marketing Board, as well as with Quebec tobacco producers, and I was joined by my colleagues, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to talk about foreign labour, off-season labour.

The hon. member knows that there are ongoing programs in existence: the transition and adjustment programs, the alternative enterprise program, and the REDUX program. We talked about a number of other options that we may explore, particularly in the area of enhancing their export capabilities. I think the hon. member is aware that some 45 per cent of the Canadian tobacco production is now exported to some 50 countries.

We agreed to sit down with them and work out an action plan that hopefully will provide some stability and some promise for the future.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the minister must know that there is uncertainty and anguish in tobacco growing communities and that this government collects over $5.5 billion off tobacco products.

Will the minister devote part of that money to help these communities cope with the disintegration of their economies and their livelihoods?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my earlier response, my colleagues and I sat down with the tobacco producers to explore alternatives and options.

Obviously it is with that in mind, I want to assure the hon. member, that we recognize the impact upon the producers. We will work with them in devising plans and programs that will help alleviate the pain.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, last Friday on CBC The Journal reported a change in the interpretations of the Excise Tax Act that resulted in what some former revenue officials called a "tax scam" and a "tax fraud".

The act provided for refunds to the consumer/taxpayer for any overcharges in the FST, through the manufacturer. But, by revising interpretations in fiscal 1985–86, the minister has since allowed manufacturers to keep some additional $770 million in refunds intended for consumers and taxpayers.

How can the minister justify allowing a scam that lets manufacturers pocket an additional 60 per cent in refunds of taxpayers' money since 1985–86?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been here last week, he would know that I answered exactly the same question by a member of the New Democratic Party, at which time I said that it was quite obvious and apparent that the decision of any refunds to a business or a corporation rests between the business and its clients or its customers.

I also went on to say that is one of the reasons the federal manufacturers' sales tax was riddled with loopholes. In fact there were 22,000 of those suckers in there, exemptions or loopholes. That is one of the reasons why we made the very strong and decisive decision to scrap all of them and replace it with a fair and equitable tax like the GST.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the answer was as unacceptable last Wednesday as it is unacceptable today.

In fact the changes in the interpretations go counter to the suggestions of the Minister of Finance and the justice department. Those changes resulted in windfalls to manufacturers that averaged some $154 million per year over the last five years. By proceeding with those changes through an internal memo distributed to a privileged few, the Minister of National Revenue has diverted some $770 million in taxpayers' dollars to manufacturers in 1985–86.

What guarantees can the minister give the House that taxpayers' refunds under GST will not end up in the same pockets as happened under the former system?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is very obvious that the hon. member has not done his homework, either on the federal manufacturers' sales tax which had to be scrapped and which is long overdue for scrapping or on the GST which it replaced.

I can stand here and assure the hon. member and this House that the provisions of the bill which brought in the goods and services tax in replacement of the antiquated, unfair federal manufacturers' sales tax will not allow for those provisions to which the member referred that were part of the federal manufacturers' sales tax.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture. A special binational panel to settle disputes, created under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, has just examined the case of countervailing duties levied by the United States on Canadian exports of fresh, refrigerated frozen pork and the subsidy aspect.

Could the minister inform the House whether the U.S. International Trade Commission could reverse its decision of February 12 and reconsider its conclusions that imports of Canadian pork constituted a threat to U.S. industry?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member is a vital one for pork exporters. In recent years, Canada has consistently defended the Canadian position. When we managed to include in the free trade agreement a specific clause that gave both Americans and Canadians access to a binational panel to settle disputes between our two countries, it was a golden opportunity to help and do justice to our producers. I hope that the ruling favourable to Canada and Canadian producers who, it should be said, have an excellent product, will be upheld.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, one of the major trade irritants between Canada and the United States is the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding.

Thousands of forestry jobs in British Columbia and Northern Ontario have been lost as a result of this deal. Canadian sovereignty has been seriously eroded because this government has turned over forest policy making to the United States.

My question is for the Prime Minister, and I hope he will answer it to show his concern for forestry workers across Canada. Has the Prime Minister responded to Premier Rae's letter to form a broad coalition to fight the MOU? Will he raise this matter with President Bush when he visits Canada tomorrow?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, anyone who keeps up with current affairs or reads the papers will know that I saw Premier Rae within the last two weeks to discuss this very matter with him. Premier Rae and I are heart to heart. Even though he destroyed my budget, I am still heart to heart with him on the question of the memorandum of understanding.

We are in the process of discussing this with the provinces. I have yet to speak with some of the people from the Atlantic provinces who have a different view on this matter, but when that process is finished I will be consulting the government and taking appropriate action.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister can get heart to heart tomorrow with President Bush.

Given the information released under the Freedom of Information Act regarding the softwood lumber tariff, could the minister confirm that in fact the U.S. government must approve any changes in the export charge? I wonder if that is the minister's interpretation of the softwood lumber tariff MOU. And does he have agreement with the United States to do that?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not need the agreement of the United States to do whatever is in the national interest of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crosbie: Despite the fact that the United States and Canada are allies, we do have differences from time to time. We will prosecute our side of any issue on which we differ with them very strongly, as we intend to do with reference to the memorandum of understanding with respect to softwood timber.

• (1450)

With respect to the question the hon. gentleman asked, with changes in the royalty systems and otherwise, we pass the information on to the United States so that there can be no misunderstanding as to what is happening. It has the right to be consulted and to be given information. We have the right to make the decisions and to bear the consequences of those decisions.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Just last week the Deputy Prime Minister said that the Department of Transport is not cutting air traffic control shifts at Pearson International Airport in Toronto.

I have in my possession an internal government document—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Keyes: —which calls for the elimination of four controller positions at Pearson effective Thursday.

Why is the Minister of Transport prepared to put the lives of the Canadian air travelling public at risk just to meet his financial bottom line?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at no time is the government prepared to put any lives at risk, because safety is the number one criteria in the way Transport Canada operates.

My hon. friend knows that there has been a downturn in traffic and any reductions would be reductions in shifts, which is a temporary matter while there is a downturn in traffic.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the memo states: "Do not cancel any overtime currently assigned" to those "shifts until March 14" and that these shifts will no longer be in place.

It is on the memo. The shifts are gone. There is no temporary movement. These are shifts that will be terminated.

Given the memorandum signed by the manager of air traffic control operations in Toronto, and the fact that it spells disaster for the minister's own recruitment program, how can the minister on the one hand promise safe skies and on the other hand justify the elimination of critical air traffic control positions at Pearson International Airport?

Will the minister now rise in his place and say that he is going to reassess and review these cuts at Pearson.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend might do well to reassess the question and the answer to his previous question.

There is no cutting of any employment at Pearson. My hon. friend knows that we have difficulties in finding enough air traffic controllers, that we have been working to increase the number of air traffic controllers in the system, and in no way are we cutting employment.

OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for External Relations.

This year's budget cuts another $262 million in Official Development Assistance, adding to total foreign aid budget cuts of $4 billion in the last three years; this despite dramatically increasing need in the Third World.

Given the crisis in many of our traditional Third World partner countries caused by their international debt burden and the economic repercussions of the gulf war, will the minister assure us today that the focus of our aid expenditures will remain with human resource development in the world's poorest Third World countries?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that the aid budget was not only maintained but increased by 5 per cent this year, in line with the government's commitment last year.

Mr. Speaker, with projected expenditures of $18 million over the next five years, the government will continue to provide assistance in priority areas, i.e. the development of human resources in the poorest countries of the world, as promised.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Finance.

The last budget, despite so many cutbacks, was able to commit $600 million to defence to cover additional gulf war expenses.

Now that the war is over, it appears that the $600 million will not be required to cover defence war costs. Would the minister commit those unused funds to assist war crippled Third World countries in order not to drain foreign aid funds from our traditional recipient countries?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister for External Relations, has stated very clearly what is the budget of the Official Development Assistance Program.

Her question is addressed, though, to the $600 million for defence as it relates to the Persian Gulf. At this point we do not know the full costs of the commitments we have made in the Persian Gulf. We will be making an accounting of that sometime toward mid-year. At that point we will know how much will be left over, but I should say to my hon. friend that our intention is to put that to reducing the deficit.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

In light of the fact that the Bank of Canada rate dropped to 9.98 per cent last week from a high of 14.05 per cent in 1990—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rodriguez: —but, in the same period, the average interest rate on the major banks' Visa and MasterCard have dropped by only 1.28 per cent, to 20.05 per cent.

Is the minister now prepared to accept the 1989 consumer and corporate affairs committee recommendation of a rate of 8 per cent above the Bank of Canada rate for Visa and MasterCard?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I take great pride in the fact that the hon. member for Nickel Belt who knows this area has recognized that our interest rate policy is working and interest rates are coming down.

Of course, as he knows very well, interest rates are only one factor in determining the total cost of using credit cards. I think he knows that as well as any member in this House.

We believe that finally it is the element of choice which is the determining factor. It is an element of choice that will be essential.

I have, as he knows, introduced legislation that will expand the range of options available. The legislation is presently in front of this House and it will increase competition.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Unfortunately interest rate reductions are not working for millions of Canadian consumers who hold Visa and MasterCard cards.

In view of the fact that the marketplace obviously is not working when it comes to consumers holding these cards, that they are being gouged by white sharks in banks and trust companies, and that the minister has rejected the unanimous recommendation of the standing committee, can he tell this House now what he intends to do specifically to ensure that Canadian consumers are not gouged by the banks and trust companies with these exorbitant and usurious interest rates?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, of course I think the essential element is for Canadians to have access to the best possible credit.

The hon. gentleman will realize—and I think he will agree—that this government by introducing the legislation it has introduced will create many more outlets and will give Canadians much more access to credit sources. In our view this is the best way, by competition in our market economy, to bring the rates down for customers.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. After last weekend's Liberal convention, and given the Liberal Party's new sovereignist approach as well as the adoption of the Allaire report, is the Prime Minister now prepared to enter into bilateral constitutional negotiations with the Government of Quebec?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I simply cannot accept my friend's interpretation with respect to the political approach of the Quebec Liberal Party because, as I recall, Premier Bourassa made it quite clear on Sunday afternoon that "the Liberal Party's first choice was an ever stronger Quebec, but within a strong and united Canada". In my opinion, this was a statement—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: My friend may have found that rather depressing! But in a speech in Toronto February 12 last I stated that—

Mr. Rocheleau: Do you accept bilateral negotiations? That is what I asked.

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, but—

Mr. Speaker: The Righ Hon. the Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: That is what you asked, but first you made a comment to the effect that the Liberal Party has become a sovereignist political formation, and that is quite false. Mr. Bourassa said it was a federalist political formation, and that is the difference. In a spirit of friendship I simply wanted to correct one small mistake among many others. Referring to Canada's problem, I said before the Canadian Club in Toronto that divorces are expensive propositions. They are very harmful and create ill-feelings on both sides. But reconciliation does not come easy either. It calls for humility and understanding. It puts the married couple in a position where they must sit with the rest of the family to discuss their problems until they find a solution. I believe that once Canadians have considered the costs and consequences of a divorce they will choose reconciliation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

COMMENTS OF MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to you at the beginning of Question Period, I wish to give notice of a possible question of privilege. The minister of Indian affairs is not here today but I believe the statements he made in the House on September 25, 1990 have been contradicted by a tape that has been released by the natives in Oka earlier today.

I do not wish to raise the matter in his absence at this time but I do wish to reserve my right to raise it upon his return to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member who gave me notice of the question. He rises on a question of privilege and it will be heard later.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE CONSTITUTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. McLaughlin (p. 18331).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate at 1 p.m. the Acting Leader of the Opposition had the floor. She has six minutes left. The hon. member for Hamilton East.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think that many members of this House welcome what the Prime Minister said about the importance of Canada, about a renewed federalism, a federalism in tune with the new needs of Canada. That being said, I fear that the process this Prime Minister is establishing will deny that possibility.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we are supposed to live in a parliamentary democracy. That means the will of the people should be expressed through the assembly of their elected representatives. This should be obvious.

Why do I care to remind the House of this simple fact? Because as we are entering this period of far-reaching reform, the Prime Minister is ignoring Parliament.

Quebec has understood very well how our system works. Immediately after the death of Meech Lake, the National Assembly established an extended parliamentary commission to look at all aspects of Quebec's political and constitutional future.

The legislatures of Alberta, Ontario, Manitoba and New Brunswick also set up parliamentary commissions to look at this issue. All parties are represented in those groups. These provinces will be holding public hearings and will be coming up with specific parliamentary reports.

This is the real way to allow public input and public discussion. What has this Prime Minister done, Mr. Speaker? What has this federal government done? The Prime Minister has denied the right of the truly elected representatives of Parliament to look at an issue of utmost importance, the very existence of this country and the division of powers that will flow therefrom.

Four months after the failure of Meech, the Prime Minister set up a group to travel across the country to let citizens vent their frustrations and their views. Such a forum is not a substitute for Parliament. Nearly six months after the failure of Meech, the government created a special joint committee of the House and Senate, but immediately after creating this committee, it tied the hands of parliamentarians.

The government explicitly limited the mandate of the committee, and I quote: "—investigate and report on the process for amending the Constitution, including proposals to revise one or more amending formulae."

Mr. Speaker, every time it was suggested in this House by the Liberal Party to broaden the mandate of the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, the Prime Minister said no. Every time we propose setting up an extended parliamentary commission to study all aspects of the Constitution, the Prime Minister argues that this idea could be considered on an opposition day.

Mr. Speaker, I am no fool. The mandate of the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee prevents it from even listening to the people who want to express their opinions on anything besides the amendment formula. The Prime Minister tied the hands of parliamentarians by denying us the chance to examine thoroughly the true issues, including the division of powers, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and any other question dealing with the basis of what makes this country we call ours, Canada.

A group of people coming from here and there, such as the members of the Citizens' Forum, can never be a substitute for Parliament. To claim the contrary, as the Prime Minister is doing, shows great contempt for our democratic institutions. Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister must realize that the failure of Meech is the result of an in camera process. I do not want and we do not want this to happen again. That is why we ask the Prime Minister again to broaden the present mandate of the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee. If he refuses, we should at least, in the 23 months we have left, take a broader look at the conditions that make Canada what it is.

The New Democratic Party believes there is only one condition. I think that the motion could be broadened and freshened by adding the following. At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would want to move an amendment, seconded by my colleague the member for Saint-Boniface, which would read as follows:

[English]

That the motion be amended by deleting everything after the word "federation" and by substituting the following therefor:

such renewal to be based on the following considerations:

(a) the demands on nationhood produced by the globalization of the twenty-first century

(b) the values of Canadian nationhood, including freedom and fairness and equality; a sense of order and justice; the distinct character of Quebec society and the diversity of the provinces; regional diversity; and respect for the collectivities of Canada and

(c) the contemporary constitutional issues of today, including those being raised by Quebec; the issue of Senate reform being raised in the west; and aboriginal issues,

(d) any change in the distribution of powers:

(i) should guarantee the rights and freedoms of citizens;

(ii) should ensure that the two main linguistic communities in this country are maintained and strengthened, with this principle being generously endorsed by all levels of government and with Quebec being recognized as the principal focal point for French life and culture in Canada;

(iii) must guarantee respect for and the growth of the aboriginal peoples;

(iv) should promote both the rights and the growth of cultural communities;

(v) should endeavour to maximize the living and standard of living of Canadians;

(vi) should facilitate the working of the Canadian economic union;

(vii) should ensure, on a national scale, the pursuit of social justice through the sharing of resources between regions and citizens;

(viii) should ensure sovereignty for every government in its respective jurisdiction;

(ix) should take into account the diversity of different regions of the country, including the distinct character of the Quebec society, and should leave to the provinces responsibility for what is not required by the national interest or the best interest of citizens;

Provided that the adoption of this motion not be considered a vote of no confidence in the government.

I so move and I hope that the NDP will accept this as a friendly amendment.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take under advisement the amendment moved by the Hon. Deputy Leader of the Opposition. Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Sherbrooke has the floor.

[English]

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speech made by the acting leader of the Liberal Party of Canada.

To be quite honest, I must say that I was somewhat optimistic at the beginning of her speech because I sensed that the hon. member was reaching for the high ground in this national debate that has had more than its share of partisanship. I sensed in the beginning of the member's remarks that she was trying to reach for a higher ground.

I think it is fair to say that some of the remarks made by the hon. member were very close to what the Prime Minister of Canada and the leader of my party said in his speech in Buckingham concerning changes and the sense that these changes would have vis-à-vis a more competitive Canada in the division of powers.

I am sorry to say though that the tone of the member's speech changed somewhat, but before that happened, I did take note of one important remark that she made.

To make sure that everybody understands how important the speech made by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East in the House today is, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to your attention a comment which she made and which represents, in my view, quite a significant change in the position of the Liberal Party of Canada in this national debate.

On behalf of her party, the hon. member stated that nothing was sacred anymore in the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments. This represents a complete about face in the Liberal Party of Canada's position of the past ten years. I think in all fairness, that this change must be mentioned in view of the fact that during a speech he made on January 16, 1990 at Ottawa University,—one of the very few substantial speeches he has made since assuming the leadership of his party,—the present Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada had clearly indicated that in his view Canada needed, as always in the past, a very strong central government to deal with all major problems for the benefit of all our regions. "A strong central government is more necessary than ever if we want to successfully meet the world challenges in the 1990s".

Mr. Speaker, if I bring this speech to your attention and that of all hon. members, it is because what the hon. member for Hamilton East has just told us represents a complete about face on the part of the Liberal Party of Canada.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend could not resist a partisan remark, which I find regrettable, to the effect that Mr. Chrétien is the only leader who had the courage to appear before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission. We, on this side of the House, cannot overlook such a remark. We find this altogether unacceptable and we cannot let such a statement go without setting the record straight. Mr. Speaker, such are the facts: I personally chaired a Parliamentary committee which produced a unanimous report from this House.

This report, although not the most popular, served as the basis for an agreement signed on June 9 of last year, between the provincial Premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada. Mr. Speaker, this agreement is known as the Charest Report. The Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada had said that he supported the Charest Report. However, between June 9 and June 23, he kept silent, something the Hon. Member for Hamilton East is not only aware, but something she blamed him for and with reason during the campaign for the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada. Today, I should like to know how in all fairness she can blame somebody else for lacking fortitude when Mr. Chrétien displayed such a total lack of courage when he failed to state his position on the June 9, 1990 agreement.

[English]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, it is awfully hard for me to respond to the member's comments about the fact that I have been partisan in the light of the statement he has just made. It is incredible to me that a member on the government side of the House, who in fact undertook in the course of the last Parliament a process that would bring some of the other participants into the constitutional process, is now standing in his place trying to defend the actions of his government which caused the death of the constitutional accord.

I hope that the member does more than read the words of his leader at Buckingham. Perhaps the reason he thought they had been heard before is because the statement to which he refers in my speech was a statement made by the leader of the Liberal Party when he spoke before Bélanger–Campeau. Although the member may believe that his leader is leading the charge on this issue, I would agree with him that we need an approach that brings all political parties together.

What I have said here today I will defend in any part of this country. We need a parliamentary process to complement the process of public participation and to complement the process of private discussion that is now going on behind closed doors. If we do not have that parliamentary process by an expansion of the mandate of the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee, we will find ourselves in the same mess that we did with Meech Lake.

The member should understand that the reason that Meech was doomed to failure was because Senator Lowell Murray called it a seamless web. Had the senator understood, bearing in mind the sanctity of the five conditions of Quebec, that there was room to involve other questions, we probably would not be discussing a constitutional crisis here in the House today.

I supported the government of the day. I supported in a non-partisan way the initiative to find a solution. I realized it was not perfect, but I also felt that the process put in place by the Prime Minister doomed it to failure.

If you want to sell constitutional reform, with all the respect that I have for Senator Lowell Murray, you do not send a no name across the country to try to sell the accord in English Canada. The Prime Minister did a great job selling it in the province of Quebec. Everybody heard day after day, "If Meech is rejected, you are rejecting Quebec", but he sent a second stringer out to try to explain the importance of the deal in the rest of Canada. He did not have the courage of his convictions in English in the same way as he did in French.

I will tell you that I, as one who defended and supported in the House through trials and tribulations of my own party, am prepared to throw my lot in with whatever movement can save this country. But I will also tell you that we have to learn from the message of Meech.

The message of Meech is that if we take constitutional reform as a seamless web, if we prevent public input, if we prevent real parliamentary discussion, then we are dooming the results to failure. We do not want failure on this side of the House. We want success. We want to work with whatever political parties are capable of achieving that, but we want to do it with the full participation of the Canadian people so that we can truly have a Canada round of constitutional discussions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Richelieu has the floor. He has only 30 seconds.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I just want to remind the leader of the Liberal Party that the only reason Mr. Chrétien appeared at all before the Commission was because he had not been elected yet as a member of Parliament when he made his request. We all know that hon. members were not allowed to appear before that Commission. There is nothing heroic about that, specially with all the rubbish he said then. In any case, Mr. Chrétien, as you know, personifies everything that can possibly be harmful and treacherous to the Quebec nation.

Therefore, would the hon. member be prepared to recognize, as Acting Leader of her party, that during the next referendum in Quebec, the federal government should respect the limit of 2,2 million dollars each for the "yes" committee and the "no" committee and not be allowed to spend 25 million dollars as it did during the last referendum to launch a crushing assault on democracy in Quebec?

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): First, I would like to reply to some falsehood expressed by the hon. member. I assumed, coming from a person who has based his whole career on Quebec separation from Canada, that he would admit the truth about the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, because, in fact, hon. members appeared in front of the Commission, including the hon. member for Chambly who made a submission. There was also his seat mate, the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer. I don't see why he argues that members did not have the right to appear.

The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer made a submission, which proves the falsehood of what he was saying. If they want to speak about the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, they should tell the facts as they are, because when they tell Canadians that the Prime Minister and other people were not permitted to appear, this is absolutely false. Anyone who wanted to could appear. Many things can be blamed on the Liberals, but not that, because we appeared and our leader made a submission which provided the basis for the amendment we are proposing today. If the Bloc Quebecois was even so slightly opened to constitutional reality, they would realize that other people—outside the Bloc Quebecois—have ideas about renewing the system for the good of Quebec and the rest of Canada. If you want to play chess with the situation, whether it is on the federal side or on the separatist side, I can tell you I am not here to let federalism be checkmated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I don't want to spend too much time on the case made by my colleague from Hamilton East. I just want to say that I am pretty satisfied with the answers she gave me a few minutes ago. Although very passionate, I think she is much closer to the kind of non-partisan approach we should be looking for in the future in a constitutional debate. And in concluding, as far as the hon. member is concerned and Mr. Chrétien's testimony before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, I think it is pretty clear, Mr. Speaker, and I might as well call a spade a spade, that if Mr. Chrétien, the leader of his party, had taken the trouble to say what he thought about the June 9 accord, without pulling any punches, perhaps there would have been no Bélanger–Campeau Commission and he would not have had to testify. That is the truth, Mr. Speaker, and it should be said. These things should be said quite frankly. We must be open about these things and not let ourselves be fooled.

Mr. Speaker, of course you realize that I have something of a stake in this debate, whether I like it or not. As fate had it, I was again in the midst of the debate on Meech Lake last spring. I tried to make an honest contribution to unravelling the constitutional impasse we had reached at that time. Colleagues from all parties represented in this House at the time, and I, got together to try and find a solution to this problem. We produced a report which was subsequently named the Charest Committee report and was in fact ratified by the provincial Premiers on June 9.

If we take a good look at the report, at the agreement signed on June 9, we see that the Charest report was indeed ratified. I have a comparative study of the two documents, and for all practical purposes, everything the parliamentary committee suggested was approved by the provincial Premiers, with a few exceptions. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, Meech Lake was not ratified, despite the June 9 accord.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that at the time, our national leaders made it clear to the Canadian public and to those who had to make the decisions that, if Meech Lake was not approved, we would be facing a difficult situation. Well, today it comes as no surprise, especially after the Quebec Liberal Party's convention, that we are indeed facing very serious problems, not insurmountable but very serious nevertheless.

Mr. Speaker, this is a good time to stop and consider where we are and remember that Meech Lake contained some very clear provisions that provided that once the accord was ratified, subsequent constitutional debate would take place in a certain order. That was one of the advantages of Meech Lake. Not only would it let us catch up with history, because it was intended to obtain the Quebec government's approval of the constitutional document repatriated in 1981–82, it was also a way of providing an orderly sequence for subsequent events. For instance, in the June 9 document it was agreed that there would be subsequent discussions on Senate reform and discussions followed by initiation of the process to deal with the claims of Canada's native people. That was the advantage of Meech Lake, Mr. Speaker.

As a result, non-ratification—since ratification was supposed to give us an orderly sequence—means that we are now faced with a certain lack of order in our constitutional debate, Mr. Speaker. It is the kind of disorder which prompts everyone to return to base, review his positions, re-assess positions taken in the past, consult Members of Parliament and the population. Mr. Speaker, that is where we stand right now. And it is in that context that we should consider the resolution advocated by the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Speaker, our socialist colleagues in the New Democratic Party are proposing a seven-prong resolution, if my count is right. I want to deal quickly with each in turn. The first goes like this:

> (1) representation by all sides of Parliament and provincial and territorial legislatures, not just governments;

Suggesting that governments do that in future does not create a major problem. I can even go further than that. There is no need for a day's debate to get the opposition parties and the government involved. If that is not precisely what we are doing today, I have no idea what involving opposition parties and government means. And what about parliamentary committees like we had about Meech, Mr. Speaker, what was that if not involving the governments and opposition parties of practically all legislatures?

Mr. Speaker, I am saying this because there is no need to pass a resolution to invent that. The mechanisms are already there. So for now I do not see any point—I have no idea how my colleagues feel about this—in voting on an issue like this one, considering that our entire political system is indeed based on these principles.

The second suggestion is to ensure

> (2) the inclusion of others with a stake in the outcome, such as Aboriginal nations, —official language minorities, business and labour, women and cultural communities;

Mr. Speaker, these groups are represented in our political system, they are structured and organized. No problem there either. I admit I feel no need to vote on this suggestion to endorse or confirm it, for this is something I take for granted.

• (1530)

The third point, Mr. Speaker, is this:

(3) the process is genuinely balanced, without real or perceived dominance or manipulation by any participant;

This feeds on the paranoia of some who think that there is a lot of manipulation right and left going on behind the curtains. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to share with you a secret, provided it does not go any further. If only governments could indulge in as much manipulation as we are led to believe there are days when I would feel re-assured. It would mean that we might be able to do things in some areas where we sometimes feel totally powerless and unable to act. I wish there were as much manipulation as they seem to believe. I should like to re-assure them today by telling them that most of the time the manipulation is a figment of their imagination instead of a reality based in facts. However, this is their own problem, and there are professional people who can cure such disorder. This is the case of the Hon. Member for Gaspé who is here.

Finally, through number 4 which is one of the best, Mr. Speaker, the motion ask the House for change which ensure—

(4) discussion is based on the views of ordinary people and expert opinion;

Ms. Copps: That is quite good!

Mr. Charest: The honourable representative of the Liberal Party says that it is good and that she supports it. Frankly, I should like to tell her that if there are views in Canada which are neither those of ordinary people nor expert opinion, I wish she would tell me where they come from. They certainly do not grow on trees!

Some hon. members: From extra-terrestrials!

Mr. Charest: I do not think that they would fall from the ceiling either. Well, I do not know. I do not think I have been elected by my constituents to tell Canadians that from now on, we are going to accept only the views of ordinary people and expert opinion and nobody else. I do not see where else we could get these views.

An hon. member: We are ordinary people.

Mr. Charest: They may be able to tell us at some point, for this debate is far from over.

Fifth point: The process of constitutional change should ensure a timetable and a commitment. I suggest that in politics, events always dictate. We shall see. Again, I do not feel pressed enough by events to try and set up from the start a timetable. They want an open and transparent process—we have nothing against that—and discussions begun with only one precondition, a desire to remain within a renewed Canadian federation.

Mr. Speaker, all this leads me to believe that we must understand the situation we are in today. Meech did not work. We were then confronted to a failure, a constitutional failure. So, each at our level, in our jurisdictions, our provinces, we must go back to the people we worked with, evaluate our situation and then come back to the negotiation table. This is where we are at, Mr. Speaker. Meech failed more than 200 days ago. We had to give ourselves time to turn ourselves around, as we say. Quebec did just that. It set up the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. The Liberal Party in Quebec produced the Allaire Report. Other political parties also engaged in discussions and reflexions. The same thing was done within the Progressive Conservative Party. We will hold a general meeting in August 1991. The federal government set up the Spicer Commission precisely to talk with the Canadian people.

I do not know what could be more democratic than to go out and talk with tens of thousands of Canadians, after the people had requested just that. At the same time, we set up the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee—with the support of the opposition parties, by the way, except for our colleagues far back—to examine an extremely fundamental issue, that is the amendment formula.

Why focus specifically on the amendment formula? Because, Mr. Speaker, the Meech episode taught us that the amending formula that was really put to test for the first time in those negotiations served neither the interests of Canada or that of Quebec. It is important to mention this, and I will repeat it, this formula did not serve the interests of Canada.

Through this experience, we came to realize that the amendment formula had dimensions that the Canadian people as well as the legislators were unaware of and that appeared when we tried to have the accord ratified. I will give you an example, if I may. The Prime Minister and most premiers believed that the negotiations were over in 1987 when they signed the accord. But what did Meech teach us? That they were wrong, that the negotiations continued until the ratification stage. Now, Mr. Speaker, how could one reproach the Prime Minister for not being aware of this dimension of the amendment formula issue when we know it came to light with Meech? That was not mentionned and is worth repeating, because it might prevent rude and simplistic arguments to be made on what Meech was or was not.

This is a tangible proof, Mr. Speaker, that that amending formula has not served the interests of Quebec nor—and that is the point of view of this government—those of Canada.

That is why we must now find a formula that will allow us to bring about changes without risking to fail because only one or two provinces representing populations that are not always proportional to the power they have in general may stall the process. That is why then, Mr. Speaker, the role of the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee is so important—has become even more important—and why they must focus on that issue.

Mr. Speaker, the Spicer Commission will table its report on July 1st. Then, the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee will table its own; the Allaire Committee has already produced its report; the Bélanger-Campeau Commission will have taken a stand; Ontario will have taken a position in an interior report; other provinces will have done so—and so on. The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada will hold its debate in august 1991. Then, Mr. Speaker, nothing is impossible.

Even so we must not put the cart before the horse. We must take things one step at a time and then the federal government will propose an alternative to Canadians.

What is important in the short term, Mr. Speaker, is to create, invent and develop a process that will allow us to start the debate over in a context where we will be able to find solutions.

What does it ask for, Mr. Speaker? It asks for, among other things—I am not embarrassed to say it—perhaps a less macho approach than the one we had this past year. You know, the macho approach, the "yield-or-break approach", has not often succeeded, as I see it. I do not know of anybody who could settle all his businesses with this method. I do not know of many, Mr. Speaker.

Well, it is also true in politics. If you really want to make changes as profound as those suggested to us today, not only in Quebec, but elsewhere in Canada, let us think for a few moments about the aboriginal groups who also want profound changes. Let us think, among other things, about the people from the West who have been experiencing a feeling of alienation for several years. It does not go back ten years, but several decades.

If we sincerely want to try to solve those problems and sit with these people and start making the big changes that we long for, but which can be different for some and for others, well, we must do it in an atmosphere and a spirit of goodwill. That is our short term challenge.

That is the way things present themselves. In that context, Mr. Speaker, I frankly admit that I do not feel I have a mission today to tell Canadians that, from now on, we will only consider the discussions based on the points of view of ordinary people and on expert opinions.

I admit to you that we should not go to that extreme. We should not either lend ourselves to simplistic outlines of certain methods that could solve all our problems. There are talks about constituent assemblies. I do not have anything to say against that, Mr. Speaker, we are very open about that on this side of the House—the Prime Minister has said he was very open about that.

It has been mentioned today in the House that in Australia, the whole process did work very well. To be honest, I think it is the leader of the New Democratic Parti who said that. It did work very well, except that in Australia, when they set up a constituent assembly, it did sit for ten years. It seems to me that, considering the situation, ten years is a bit long. We should think about it before undertaking that.

Secondly, that constituent assembly in Australia was comprised of only the legislators—the members of state legislatures and of the federal parliament. I am under the impression that it is not what we ask for today. I don't say that to contradict her, on the contrary. What I am trying to say with these explanations, it is that these things are never simple. They are never all black or all white. We will have to find a formula that is more like us.

To conclude on that point, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you I think we must put things in perspective and recognize that Canada is overall a country which has been successful.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I say this in confidence, because if we mention it in certain parts of the country, people are going to say that it does not make any sense. Between you and me, Mr. Speaker, when we consider all the human suffering in the world, when we think about it, I believe we can reasonably say that our country has worked well.

The problems we are presently experiencing are not caused by a constitutional arrangement; it is not the Constitution which determines and regulates peoples' lives and attitudes. The Constitution reflects what we are and what we want to be. And if we are presently experiencing problems in Canada, it is probably because certain governments have taken steps which have caused these problems. But they have not taken these steps, and at times spent too much money, because the Constitution forced them to do it. That is false.

We must recognize the facts for what they are, except that we are faced with an important basic problem. Do you know what it is, Mr. Speaker? The problem is that we have a constitution with which people do not identify, a constitution which is 123 years old. It is a constitution which does not reflect what we truly are. Since a constitution should be a mirror of the people, we should be able to identify with it. A constitution, Mr. Speaker, is made of mythology, of a certain amount of myths.

When people realize that their national institutions, whether the Senate, the Supreme Court or the Federal Parliament do not reflect what they are, they distanced themselves from them. Our Constitution does not sufficiently reflect what we are and want to be. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, do you know what was so great about Meech? It was that by recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, Quebecers could feel that they belonged both to Quebec and Canada. Perhaps for the first time in our history, we had managed to come to terms with our own ambivalence as Quebecers and Canadians. That is the reason Meech was so great.

Now, the real challenge ahead of us will be to find a way to change the Constitution. Yet, in closing I should like to make one point, Mr. Speaker. There are some in this debate who claimed that no change can be made without adherence to the major principles of a certain federalism or system of government. Some politicians with this argument, have managed to attract a great many Canadian men and women to their cause. I will not name them, but I am referring to Clyde Wells. As you will no doubt remember, he said then and repeated it again today and last weekend that we must abide by some basic principles.

Mr. Speaker, let me tell you this: A constitution which represents, respects and reflects the basic principles of federalism to a greater extent than the reality of its country is a constitution with serious problems. But that is a starting point, Mr. Speaker. It is not true to say that people create institutions to their image and that people should try to fit as best they can within federalism. The opposite is true, Mr. Speaker. When people build a constitution, they must make sure that it resembles and reflects what they are, and I conclude on this, they adjust the principles of federalism or republicanism to this great mirror.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you that Canadians are not the servants of some constitutional principle, but that the Constitution should be the servant of the Canadian people.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, because the hon. member was chairman of the special committee appointed late in the day during the Meech process and that committee was appointed in an attempt to break the log–jam existing at that time.

I firmly believe that if that committee had been appointed at an earlier date, let us say in February or January, and if the same report had come out of the committee that was produced, the Meech accord might have been saved.

The hon. member knows because he sat day after day on that committee listening to many groups, including aboriginal groups, women's groups, language minority groups and multicultural groups, and they told him—and although I was not an official member of the committee, I sat in on many of the hearings—of their dissatisfaction with the process that had led to the Meech accord as it stood.

I can recall very well that the chairman, the hon. member for Sherbrooke, was very sympathetic and understanding in listening to those people. As a matter of fact, the report that he helped to produce I felt was a good report. We all supported the report. We felt it was one that could have broken the logjam if it were not so late in the day.

My point is this: this motion and many of the paragraphs—paragraphs 1, 2 and 3—are meant to avoid the pitfalls that existed in the production of Meech. I thought that the hon. member who sat through those long hearings in the spring of last year recognized that. He listened to the intensity and the emotion with which those groups presented their positions. He knows that they had not been listened to and the changes that he himself had suggested to the committee had not been implemented. We know what happened in Manitoba, with an aboriginal member of the Manitoba legislature expressing the dissatisfaction of aboriginal peoples with the final result. We had both ethnic and language minorities in different parts of the country expressing their dissatisfaction.

I ask him again: What is so wrong with the attempt made in this motion to broaden the discussion, to bring in opposition members of Parliament, and to bring in special interest groups representing the aboriginal peoples, minorities, women and multicultural groups? Would that not enhance the process and help to avoid what happened during the Meech process? Would the transparency which is suggested here not avoid the harsh criticism that took place after the last futile attempt to get through the report when we had those long meetings in the Conference Centre?

We are both Quebecers and we both believe strongly in Quebec and Canada. I want to see this new process work. I want to see us rally people behind this great country. The hon. member did a good job as chairman. I thought he understood that more people had to be involved and that is why he supported the report he did.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his remarks and say to him that essentially I do agree with him on the fact that as we undertake further constitutional change in this country we are certainly going to have to devise methods by which we automatically take into account a wide public consultation process. At this point in time with the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee working now, my understanding is that part of its mandate is to deal with that. I am not ready to commit to any specific type. I would rather have the benefit of its wisdom and its work before we reach that point.

Certainly I recognize that Canadians today, more than ever before, want to be part of the process. Let me share one of the reasons why I think that is the case, from our own informal gathering of facts and what we witnessed as we travelled across the country.

From our experience on the committee, it was our sense that ever since the Constitution had been patriated in 1981–82, and ever since Canadians had given themselves a charter of rights, we sensed that there was out there in the country a stronger sense of ownership than ever before toward this Canadian Constitution. Because there was this stronger sense of ownership on the part of Canadians, there was also a willingness on their part and a sense of belonging to this Constitution that compelled them to want to be part of the process. That is what a lot of members—some of whom are in this House today—shared as a vision of what was happening across the country.

What I am saying is that in the very specific context of what we are witnessing today, it is important to let all those provinces, those different political parties and the government undertake the work they have undertaken to bring us to the same place and point in time when we will embark upon a process that I am convinced will devise new methods by which the public will participate.

It would be premature, today, to come forward with this statement when in fact a lot of it I take for granted anyway. I take it for granted in the sense that it will happen. I am not saying that it will happen. I am among those parliamentarians in legislatures who will watch the process very closely and ensure that it happens.

It is important at this time and place to let those committees come forward and then deal with those issues. As we come to those bridges we will cross them.

That is exactly how I feel today. I anticipate that we will all do that together when we cross those bridges.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to make reference to the amendment of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. We certainly welcome the amendment as a useful contribution to the debate and to the issues before us. The amendment raises issues which we will all want to discuss at different times.

However, I would say that the motion does appear to be on a separate issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time is for questions and comments on the previous speaker. Does the hon. member have a question or comment?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): No.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague who obviously has an outstanding background in the current history of our constitutional affairs, particularly with respect to the committee he chaired.

I was interested particularly in his response to the last question in which he outlined his feelings that we should wait until the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee reports to see what it brings forward.

I would like to know my colleague's view. In my view people across the country seem to be asking for public involvement in charting the course for a new Constitution. Does he think that the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee will in effect bring forth the method and approach by which we will have this public involvement and participation in the creation of a new Constitution which all of us want to make sure ensures that we do have a unified and strong Canada?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. Minister of State for Housing for his very important question.

In my opinion—and I think it is quite clearly the opinion of the government—the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee which has a mandate to study the amending formula and operates with representation from all sides of this House cannot escape dealing with the question of public participation.

It has quite clearly been an issue in the testimony that it received up until now. There really lies the crux of the debate for today. If it is dealing with that today, how could we logically entertain drawing conclusions within this House on that issue, if the House itself has mandated a joint Senate and House of Commons committee to study that very question?

In terms of the proposals put forward either by my colleagues in the New Democratic Party or in the Liberal Party of Canada, we are not saying that we disagree with what is in there. What we are saying is that if we have committed ourselves to a process by which colleagues are studying this very issue and will deal with it, why should we undertake to draw any conclusions at this point in time?

It is a matter of logic and a matter of reasonable function. In the meantime, it means we all have our own responsibilities at our own level. For example, within the government there are people within the bureaucracy who are doing what they should do, that is looking at and examining options.

Beaudoin-Edwards is studying the amending formula. The Spicer Commission is speaking to Canadians. Within the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada detailed, extensive efforts are put forward in consultations so that we may deal with this issue at our general meeting in August 1991. We are dealing with this issue at four different levels on this side of the House. I expect that that would be the case for members who represent the other side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Now that the question and comment period is over, I am ready to receive a brief comment on the opposition amendment.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker. I apologize. I did not realize that we were still in comment period. I will be brief.

As I was saying, I think the contents of the amendment moved by the Deputy Leader of the Liberal Party are useful contributions to this debate and to the issues before us.

However, I do think that the motion before the House deals with the process of discussion and debate on the Constitution. It does not deal with the substantive issues about what that outcome might be and the nature of the content of those discussions.

The motion concludes with a precondition for entry into the discussions about constitutional change, and that precondition says in the motion "a desire to remain within a renewed Canadian Federation".

I suggest that what the Liberal amendment seeks to do, if I read it correctly, is to define essentially the objectives of that discussion. In fact, it attempts to define what that renewal might be, and surely that is beyond the scope of the motion. I think it is a separate question.

If you wanted an analogy or a situation to compare it with, Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps rather like attempting to amend a bill by amending an interpretation of a word in that bill, and we know that would be ruled out of order. Similarly, I would suggest that this amendment is out of order too.

I would though, just in closing, suggest that it would be interesting to debate these issues. Perhaps on one of its allotted days in the near future the Official Opposition might introduce this motion as a separate question.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague in the New Democratic Party for being so succinct and coming to the conclusion that the contents of the amendment were perhaps very substantive in that they would add a great deal to the debate and to the deliberations taking place here this afternoon.

It should be noted that although my colleague refers to process I think paragraph (7) of their particular motion goes on to say that discussions begin with only one precondition: "a desire to remain within a renewed Canadian federation".

In view of recent events and things that have been said across this country by a variety of interest groups, it would seem to me that is just not a matter of process but indeed is a matter of substance. As a result, we have made an amendment which addresses the issue of renewal in paragraph (7). We have indicated a number of considerations. They are not exhaustive in every conceivable sense, but they are considerations which we believe to be important to the entire process that is taking place.

On those grounds I would think that the amendment, notwithstanding the fact that it may be lengthy in its content, adds greatly to paragraph (7). I think it is important that we have an opportunity to debate those kinds of considerations in an important element before the House. I would think the Chair would find it both appropriate and fitting for members to have this latitude in terms of discussing the motion of my colleague from the New Democratic Party, as well as the amendment being offered by my party.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to thank the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing and the hon. member for Cape Breton—Richmond East for their wise considerations. The Chair will surely take them into account in its decision on the acceptability of the amendment of the opposition.

• (1600)

[English]

Resuming debate. On a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, it is strictly a short point of order.

We are bound to vote today unless I have missed something. It would be good if you could give us an indication, Your Honour.

[Translation]

Could you tell us, approximately, when we will know whether the amendment is in order or not, because this will change the whole reasoning in the debate. We would say certain things that we would rather not if it is in order and we would say other things if it is not.

Consequently, could you kindly tell us when we can expect a ruling in this regard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair has listened to the request and will take it into consideration when thinking of a way to have a speedy ruling. However, I can safely say that hon. members can now speak to both the main motion and the amendment. A ruling will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I think you shed some light on the matter, but we—the Bloc Quebecois—would like to table an amendment to the amendment to the motion.

If we can speak to both the main motion and the amendment, I would like to know whether we can table an amendment to the amendment, or an amendment should the amendment from the Liberal Party be ruled out of order. We are interested in this debate as long as Quebec is excluded, because Quebec is in the process of deciding for itself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As the old adage says, we will cross that bridge when we come to it. I understand the argument from the hon. member for Hull–Aylmer, but it is still premature. I must allow the debate to develop, and eventually give the floor to the hon. member, but for that the debate has to get under way.

The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: It is on the same point as my colleague, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to add a few precisions.

You know that the vote will be held at 6 o'clock, but the bell will start ringing at 5:45 p.m. There is exactly one hour forty–five minutes left. With 30 minutes per member, this means that a maximum of three members only will be able to speak. But, it is extremely urgent— If necessary, may be we could suspend the sitting while you make your ruling and we could wait a little bit longer to know if we will be able to come up with an amendment which, I am sure, would give rise to an extremely interesting and important debate if it is our amendment that is tabled and if, for example, the liberal amendment was ruled out of order.

On the other hand, if it is in order, then, we will work on an amendment to an amendment. But we must abolutely know where we stand, Mr. Speaker. The text seems to have been drafted in one of the two official languages and the Chair, after looking at it, should be able to judge quite easily whether it is in order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think it is still premature to rule on the request of the member for Richelieu since the Bloc Quebecois would have first to be recognized by the Chair to be able to introduce an amendment. For now, I must, in the parliamentary tradition, recognize the parties according to the percentage of their representation in the House and in that respect, I must resume the debate and recognize a member of the opposition.

[English]

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker. I think it is worth giving consideration to the point that the member behind me suggested, that we should leave it open so that other amendments could be moved. Perhaps it would be best to provide some time later. I suggest it would make some sense to have a short gap and then add that time afterwards so that there is the possibility for another amendment or a subamendment, whichever appears the most appropriate. It might make it rather difficult otherwise for the member to plan his action unless he knows ahead of time.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do not think the hon. member understood what I said earlier. Ten amendments could be moved, if you like, but members must first be recognized. Right now, according to parliamentary tradition, I must first recognize a member of the opposition, in this case the hon. member for St. Boniface, so the debate can continue. It is not new for the Chair to take an amendment under advisement for a while. So that no one will be penalized, members will be able to speak until a decision is announced on both the substantive motion and the amendment of the opposition. This way no one is penalized in the proceedings.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank my colleagues Messrs. Nystrom and Nicholson for permitting me to make my address at this particular time. There is a commitment I have made that I still hope to be able to honour.

This constitutional crisis, or call it a difficulty or a challenge if you prefer, should really give us an opportunity for a new deal, a new initiative to try to bring the country together, to build upon the good that is there and to go beyond where we have been.

I think we can probably have this new deal if we recognize certain basic needs in society today, as they have been expressed by a number of people.

The time has come for us to respond to the needs of our aboriginal peoples. I am talking about land claims. I am talking about greater self–autonomy, self–government, if you prefer.

The time has come, as well, to put away our quarrels between the English speaking and the French speaking people of this nation, whether they be in a minority or a majority position. Clearly, we need to set that aside and go beyond.

In all of this, we must not forget that there are eight million to nine million Canadians who are from origins other than aboriginal, English or French. They do not want to be left by the wayside; they want to be considered.

Some of you have, in fact, followed this debate for a long, long time. You have participated in the Meech Lake Accord process, in the Charest Commission. I was a member of that commission and played a small role. I felt that even there we had started to move forward, because we had started to recognize those groups I mentioned. All of these groups came forward with their representatives and each wanted to be heard and each would have concluded and accepted that they had legitimate concerns to make.

Women, as well, had serious reservations about how the changes might impact upon them. We must not forget that. The handicapped people of Canada too often feel as if they have been forgotten. Whatever it is that we do, we must give them some reassurance that they are valued and important Canadians.

It seems to me that we cannot do anything, until each region of this country, whether we speak of the north, the west, Quebec, Ontario or the Atlantic provinces, feels as if it is an important part of this great nation. Only when men and women from every region of the country, whether they be of aboriginal origin, English, French or other origins, feel as if they are needed and wanted and can build and contribute to this nation, only then will there be some sense of harmony and some sense of future potential growth.

Some will say: "Is the struggle worth it?" And I say, yes, unequivocally. It is worth it. It is definitely worth it. We need to find a creative solution to the problems we have, a new way of doing things. I am an optimist. I believe that we will.

It is a big challenge. Sometimes I like to think of it as if it were a large mountain to climb. But once we have climbed that tall mountain, its success will be that much sweeter. I believe we will climb it.

I want to address the motion of my colleagues from the NDP. I want to stress, unequivocally, at the very beginning, that I support it. In principle, I think the intent is noble and it is worthy of real consideration and serious debate. I have to ask whether or not we have lost a golden opportunity to look at the sharing of powers. This is something that has been mentioned on our constitutional committee, of which I am a member, time and time again. A number of very credible witnesses have, in response to my question as to whether or not we ought to be looking at this as an essential question facing Canada, said yes. I would have liked to have seen it as part of this particular debate today and as an integral part of the proposal that went forward.

It does not include this and I guess the question that I have to raise is, why not? As I have indicated, it has been mentioned several times before.

I would hope that we could support this point. I think it is an important point. I think it is equally important to the other questions that have been raised; that is, the amending formula or formulae as well as the involvement of the public in this process.

I would hope that the party did not forget it, that the party understands the complexity of the problems that are facing us today. The fact that it was not part of the motion is not a manifestation of their lack of awareness of the seriousness of that issue; that is, the division of powers.

The motion contains several areas which I think are somewhat vague. I do not say that in an unkind way, but I think they need to be clarified and perhaps could be improved upon. The motion asks for guidelines which ensure representation by all sides of Parliament and provincial and territorial legislatures, not just governments. Some people could question, "by all sides", means what? Does it include Bloc Quebecois, the Reform Party, independent members and if yes, I think we should say so very clearly. Otherwise people will be confused.

I go to the second part, and I want to quote:

> (2) the inclusion of others with a stake in the outcome, such as Aboriginal nations, the North, official language minorities, business and labour, women and multicultural communities;

I know it says "such as", and I know it was intended to include the west, the Atlantic provinces and no doubt, handicapped Canadians as well as visible minorities. I want to make that point and I want to stress it because I think the intentions were noble, but somehow people reading it might forget that that was also included.

I go to the third paragraph. They want to ensure that the process is balanced "without real or perceived dominance or manipulation by any participant". I guess the question that I need to ask is: How does one ensure participation is not dominated by a participant? I think that needs to be, but how does one go about ensuring that that is so and how do you prevent manipulation? Again, I think it is a noble concept and one that is totally essential, but at the same time, very difficult to control.

I continue to the fourth paragraph, to ensure "discussion is based on the views of ordinary people and expert opinion". Potentially this one is a little awkward. I think we are all ordinary people. Perhaps it could have read "expert opinion on constitutional and other related matters while including other Canadians". I would have preferred that wording.

I go to the fifth paragraph, to ensure that "there is a timetable and a commitment from the start of all appropriate participants to make a decision on the final package of proposed amendments". I have some difficulty with this one, and I would appreciate some clarification. Is it to decide, yes; or is it to decide, no? What happens if some people decide yes on certain parts and no on others? The point that I want to make is that while I have a sense of the intent, I am not sure it is clear enough for people out there to understand what was meant.

I proceed to the sixth paragraph, to ensure "the process is open and transparent, conducting official business in public". Again, and without trying to be picky or naughty I assure you, the word "transparent" sometimes has negative connotations, see-through but flimsy and weak. I think what was meant was above board, on the table. I draw your attention to "conducting official business in public". If one wanted to be Machiavellian about this, I suppose someone could say: "We will call this unofficial business", and then what would happen? So there is some potential for misuse of the term.

Finally, the seventh paragraph, to ensure "that discussions begin with only one precondition, a desire to remain within a renewed Canadian federation". To many Quebecers, that is what Meech was all about and clearly I do not think they are arguing that Meech is the solution. What is appropriate to you, to me, or to others about a renewed Canadian federation may be conflictual, may be problematic.

I think as much could have been achieved if we had simply said that we wanted an honest and open negotiation where everyone affected by the Constitution participates in the process committed to renewed federalism containing a new division of powers.

I think that that is the better way if you wish.

I would like to contrast what was in the particular series of statements with what my leader, the Hon. Jean Chrétien, said at the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, and I quote from the text to ensure that I do not misrepresent anyone's point of view and therefore upset people. When he was talking about constitutional change he indicated that the change, or the division of powers, was an essential element.

Here is what he had to say: "Any change in the distribution of powers should guarantee the rights and freedoms of citizens. Any change in the distribution of powers should ensure that the two main linguistic communities in this country are maintained and strengthened. The very existence of Canada rests on that principle, and it must be generously endorsed by all government levels in Canada. In addition, Quebec must be recognized as the principal focal point of French life and culture in Canada."

No. 3: "Any change in the distribution of powers must guarantee respect for and the growth of aboriginal people". 4: "Any change in the distribution of powers should promote both the rights and the growth of cultural communities". 5: "Any change in the distribution of powers should endeavour to maximize the living and standard of living of Canadians". 6: "Any change in the distribution of powers should facilitate the working of the Canadian economic union". 7: "Any change in the distribution of powers should ensure, on a national scale, the pursuit of social justice through the sharing of resources between regions and citizens". No. 8: "Any change in the distribution of powers should ensure sovereignty for every government in its respective jurisdiction". And finally, No. 9: "Any change in the distribution of powers should take into account the diversity and dynamism of different regions of the country, including the distinct character of the Quebec society; and should leave to the provinces responsibility for what is not required by the national interest or the best interest of citizens".

[English]

I am concerned about the somewhat ambiguous wording which may, unfortunately, communicate a message that was not intended. Perhaps more thought might have gone into the motion to try to capture some of the essential elements that have been mentioned.

Some people may interpret this, and I do not say it unkindly, as a lack of a clear position. I will give one other reason why that may be so. In response to a question on December 20, 1990, at the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, the member from Quebec, from the NDP, said the following: "Yes, I understand your question. Can we have a kind of renewed federalism?" He said: "No".

My understanding was that the most essential part of this particular thrust, this particular initiative, of my colleagues in the NDP was obviously to define how the public might be involved, but also in the spirit of renewed federalism. So I bring this to your attention:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our country is the envy of the rest of the world. Millions of people would just love to live here. I hope that together we will continue to build Canada. I firmly believe that is the intent of the motion of my NDP colleagues and of our own amendment.

[English]

I believe that we should start rebuilding right now, immediately.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I just listened with great interest to the speech by the hon. member for St. Boniface and putting all partisanship aside, I would like to congratulate him. Except for some aspects which I do not agree with, his speech was a heartfelt cry, à cri de coeur showing that Quebeckers and the Canadian people that we are still capable of talking to each other. The hon. member for St. Boniface also took the opportunity to read the Liberal sub-amendment which I do not fully support. I would like to correct one of numerous inaccuracies the hon. member for Richelieu told us this afternoon.

He tried to raise a point of order on the misleading grounds that the Liberal subamendment was only available in one official language. That is entirely false, Mr. Speaker, because as soon as the subamendment was tabled by the hon. member for Hamilton East, I immediately went to the Table for a copy of the subamendment in French and was given one immediately.

So once again, the hon. member for Richelieu would have Quebecers who are watching us believe that the House of Commons provides documents in only one official language, which is entirely false. I wanted to set the record straight, because the hon. member for Richelieu tried to pull a fast one, but we are on to him now.

Mr. Speaker, I carefully read the nine points of the Liberal subamendment, and I am a little concerned about the way these points are presented. Let me explain. We have had a debate on Meech Lake. There were a number of items on the table. The country is in very serious shape, something everybody realizes. On the weekend, the Quebec Liberal Party defined its position. However, I see a disturbing element in the Liberal subamendment, and I would like to ask the hon. member for St. Boniface about this. Does he not think it would be unwise, at this stage of the debate, to introduce guidelines with restrictions in certain areas, as the Liberal subamendment seems to be doing? Why not leave the debate wide open? Why not give all the commissions a chance to submit their reports? Why not give the Beaudoin-Edwards Commission on the amending formula time to give us its report, and the Spicer Commission and the provincial commissions, before imposing the kind of conditions the Liberals are suggesting today? I do not question the Liberals' intentions, but perhaps we could prevent certain parts of Canada from feeling overlooked in these amendments.

I wish the Liberal Party would leave this question open and withdraw its subamendment, which might otherwise cause a return to the counterproductive state of affairs we have had occasion to deplore in recent months.

Mr. Speaker, I would be interested to hear the comments of the hon. member for St. Boniface, who, I may recall, took a very correct position, and I hope I can say the same for the hon. member for Richelieu if he has a chance to speak in the House today.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): I want to thank my hon. colleague for his flattering remarks, and I will attempt to answer his question.

First of all, the conditions. Personnally, I do not see them as conditions, but mostly as principles. I cannot understand how the principles I mentioned would of necessity preclude the addition of other principles should we want to do so later on. I really want to emphasize the key point. I do believe that the division of powers is a key issue. I feel this is an issue that has to be considered. And its importance has been recognized, because as was mentioned many times in this House during Question Period, a committee has been established by the Prime Minister and his government to look at and thoroughly discuss this issue.

So, those are not conditions but principles. Nothing prevents us from adding some or bringing on changes should we come to the conclusion after a lenghty debate and discussion that it would be useful. And I think we should not disregard the main question I asked, namely should we not, through the committee set up by the Prime Minister to look at the process for amending the Constitution, thorougly consider the matter concerning the division of powers? I firmly believe we should.

[English]

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for St. Boniface for his presentation as well.

I would just like to make a couple of comments and ask the member his viewpoint, I suppose specifically about the issue of Senate reform since his party has been in power for most of the years since confederation. That is probably why we have not seen Senate reform to this point. It has certainly become a hot issue since the Meech Lake debate.

In terms of specifics, where we have seen the amendment and the NDP motion as well for this, that we would all get together and talk about what is going on in the country and perhaps what our constitutional future is going to be.

I think many people in Canada are just afraid that the politicians are all getting into this fray, I suppose, and they are wondering about what is happening economically with the fiscal situation in the country. We all seem to be paralyzed with our constitutional future.

I would like to ask the member for his opinion on setting up actual constitutional conventions whereby people would be elected to these conventions at the local levels—they would be elected and not appointed by politicians—and each of those people would contribute to drafting a new Canadian Constitution. There would be technical experts there as well so that these people could go through clause-by-clause what interests them in terms of real and actual change for the Canadian Constitution. Once they had come together for two to four months, they would come back and report and ask us what we thought of it. The only way that could ever happen is by a Canadian referendum.

We have heard time and time again that that is not the Canadian way. I would be interested to know how the member would put forward his party's proposal on actual constitutional conventions as well as true Senate reform.

Mr. Duhamel: I thank my colleague for a number of questions.

First of all, I want members to know that it was the Liberal Party which said that Senate reform is necessary and would be an asset to areas such as western Canada. We have said it and we continue to say it, and I just want to make sure that we recognize that. I shall continue to work for a reformed Senate, and I shall continue to seek additional powers for western Canada, but in the context of Canada. I want to make sure that power is distributed fairly, and I am not sure that the Senate is a panacea either.

With respect to the fiscal situation, I have to agree with the hon. member. I have a signed document from the Minister of Finance which says that the debt was $168.8 billion at the end of 1984; the revenue has gone up from $70-plus billion to $130 billion; the deficit is as large as it was, shaved a few billion here and there; and the debt is more than twice as large. So we have a serious problem.

Let's not kid ourselves. If we cannot come to grips with the constitutional situation of this country, if we cannot bring some calm and stability—I think they are two sides to one coin—if people are not confident that we are going to stay together united and strong and pull in the same direction in the same way with mutual self-help, then we are going to continue to have fiscal difficulties.

With regard to constituent assemblies, I recognize that they, like referenda and other mechanisms, can have very positive features. I would simply caution people coming forward with any one mechanism thinking that it will solve this problem. I do not believe that separation will resolve the problems that Quebecers feel. I do not believe that there is one single answer out there for complex problems.

There are some positives of constituent assemblies; there are some positives in referenda; there are no doubt some positives in independents. But there are some positives in working together to try and find the best tools to attack the problems and to help each other in a generous, sensible and sensitive kind of way.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, before I get to my main comments, I want to express a few words about the Liberal amendment. I see that my friend from St. Boniface is no longer in the House.

He was talking about our original motion and basically nit-picking over the seven or eight different clauses in it. However, they have a very long subamendment here, and one could do the same thing with their subamendment and express all kinds of misgivings.

For example, point No. 9 of their subamendment says that we should take into account the diversity of the different regions of the country, including the distinct society of Quebec, and should leave to the provinces the responsibility for what is not required by the national interest or in the best interests of citizens.

What does he mean by national interest? And who decides that? I do have a few misgivings about that.

They also talk about national economic union. What is the national economic union? Is it defined so narrowly that it infringes upon provincial rights in that case, such as, for example, non-renewable resources?

I do not think there is any need to be greatly concerned about the precise wording of some of the things you are seeing before the House. The main thing and what we are saying today in this debate as a party is that we want to have the process well established.

That process should be a very open, accessible and democratic process that is available for all Canadian people, regardless of where those people may live in our country. That is one of the things that we have not seen in the past. Here I make no criticism in any precise way of the Meech Lake process. It was no different substantially from the process back in 1980–81 when the Constitution was patriated and when Pierre Trudeau was the Prime Minister of this country.

At that time, too, we did not have a great, open democratic process. At that time, too, there were a lot of meetings behind closed doors. I remember 1980–81 very well. The parliamentary committee of the House of Commons did not leave this city. It sat in the West Block for about three months and had public hearings.

There were a lot of provinces that never once had public hearings in 1980–81. In fact, the process under Meech was a bit more open and a bit more democratic. In 1987, the parliamentary committee, once again, did not leave this House. We sat in the Railway Committee Room for a month or so in August 1987. There were a few provinces that had public hearings, but not all of them.

We did have some public hearings that were chaired by the member for Sherbrooke. In the spring of last year, we travelled extensively in a very short period of time—too short and a little bit too late—but at least we were going in the right direction. Many provinces did not have public hearings.

One of the premiers who protested so loudly, long and clearly about the lack of democracy in the process last year was the premier of Newfoundland, Clyde Wells. Did Clyde Wells have public hearings in Newfoundland before he rescinded support for the accord? No.

We do not have to take lessons from that particular premier about democracy and the openness of the process. I think we have to put the past behind us and move on from here to try to construct a process that is more open, more democratic and more accessible to all the people of this country.

And developing a Canadian constitution will be far from easy, Mr. Speaker. We now live in such a complex country, with Quebec's distinct society and its realities, realities which existed even before the founding of our country, Canada.

There is also another reality, Mr. Speaker, the reality of aboriginal peoples living here, in our country. Moreover, there are the language rights, the cultural rights and the legal rights of Indians, the Indian people living here, in this country. We must solve theses problems and find where to enshrine aboriginal rights in the Canadian Constitution.

There are the rights of other persons living in our country: minorities; visible minorities; ethnic groups; West Canada; Newfoundland minorities, because Newfoundland is a province which is also very different from the others.

We must come to an arrangement, Mr. Speaker, for everyone who lives here, in Canada.

[English]

For those reasons, the process is extremely important. What we are saying today in a vote that is not a non-confidence vote is that we must come together as three political parties and have a very open and democratic process.

We are saying that the old ways of meetings of only first ministers is not enough. Sure, some place in the process we need the first minister, but the process must be a lot wider than that, a lot broader and must include members of the opposition from the Parliament of Canada, from the legislatures and the territories of this country in a real, open, equal and genuine way. That is what we have to do.

Second, we must include those who got elected in the process. Non-elected people must be part of the process, whether they be women's groups, trade unions, business groups, aboriginal people, ethnic or visible minorities, or what have you, they must all be involved in the process. That is extremely important. The process must be free of domination by one group, or one leader, or one party or one Parliament, because we are a very diverse and very much federated country. We must also drop on the views of, not just the experts, not just the Gordon Robertsons, the Peter Hoggs, the Meekisons and—

—Mr. Rémillard, from Quebec and the others, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

We must have Canadians, regardless of their occupation and regardless of their background, involved in the process. No one knows better how this country should be run from the point of view of all the diverse regions and groups than the ordinary people themselves, and they must be involved in the process.

I am remaining a person with an open mind on this. I am member of the committee on the amending formula along with the member for St. John's East and others. I am coming around to the point of view that we must have in this country a constituent assembly or a constitutional convention of one sort or another.

All of us should open our minds to that possibility, open our minds to the possibility of broadening the process.

I think it was Peter Russell who said to our committee last week that we should have a constituent assembly that would bring people from the provinces and the territories and the federal Parliament together to determine what the Constitution should be.

Throughout history we have examples of constituent assemblies. In Australia, the United States and other countries around the world, in almost every single case that constituent assembly has been made up of only elected people. I would suggest that if we go the route of the constituent assembly that we should have more than just the elected people. Perhaps we could have the constituent assembly drawn up on the basis of each province, as was suggested to our committee, determining the size of their own delegation, with each delegation having one vote. Those delegations could be drawn up on the basis of proportional representation according to the most previous provincial election and the most previous federal election, so that we have a genuine reflection of the legislature and Parliament during the most recent vote. One quarter or a third or half of those delegations should be made up of non-elected people so that we have a greater balance and better reflection of Canadian society when that group comes together to talk about constitutional change.

This takes tremendous power away from the Prime Minister and from Premiers Vander Zalm, Wells, Bourassa and anyone else who is a first minister. And so it should. The Constitution belongs to the people of this country. The Constitution is a basic law of this land. It does not belong to 11 first ministers who happen to be there at that particular time.

That is why the process does not work. That is why, as somebody said, we got into some trouble the last time around. We have to expand the process, and if we do not do it, we are asking for trouble once again.

One reason I am optimistic this time around is that I think there is a movement in the House of Commons and a movement in the country to expand the process, to make it more open, to make it more accessible, to involve more people, to look at some of the recommendations we made last spring in the Special Committee on the Constitution, chaired by the member for Sherbrooke, which talked about public hearings and making sure there were public hearings in the federal House and the provincial legislatures and territorial assemblies before we had constitutional change. So, those are the things I think have to be done.

The time will come when we have to also proceed with a certain timetable. As happened in Australia, we cannot go on for eight or nine years or maybe even ten years in a constituent assembly without coming to some kind of a conclusion. We need to have a timetable. There has to be a period for discussing the process of constitutional change. Then we have to move to discussing content and substance of constitutional change, the principles of those changes and, finally, the period of ratification. I think that can be done in a very creative and national way.

In the last few minutes remaining to me I would like to say that the whole question of national unity is not just the Constitution itself. We should constantly say to the Canadian people that the Constitution is only one problem in unifying this country.

National unity is about the economy of this country. It is about greater equality. It is about national institutions like the CBC, VIA Rail and the post office. National unity is about a strong and sovereign and economically free and more equal country. National unity is about creating jobs in this country so Newfoundlanders can work in their own province and not have to go to Toronto or elsewhere to find a job. That is also part of national unity, and that must be addressed by this Parliament at the same time.

Another thing we have to address, in addition to the amending formula, is the whole question of substance. I would like to know from the Prime Minister or from one of his spokespeople across the way whether or not they have a timetable as to when we talk about substance.

I suspect the Prime Minister is waiting until after Bélanger–Campeau. I suspect the Prime Minister is waiting until he gets the report from his deputy ministers who are now working in the committee. I suspect the Prime Minister is waiting for the wise words of wisdom of Dr. Norman Spector and others in the government.

It might be very useful—

Mr. Hockin: Don't be partisan with us.

Mr. Nystrom: I am not at all. I used the wise words of Dr. Spector. If the minister thinks those words of Dr. Spector are going to be unwise, then he can stand in the House and be partisan, but I am not being partisan.

I want to know from the government across the way what the timetable is. When can we expect in this House to deal with substantive issues?

The House of Commons itself, sooner rather than later, must be involved in substantive arguments on the division of powers, on the rights of aboriginal people, and on what we do about the uniqueness and distinctiveness of the province of Quebec. These are things this House is going to have to deal with and deal with very shortly. We should know the timetable of what the Prime Minister is planning.

That is what I mean by what I said. Constitutional discussions must involve not only the first ministers, but all parliamentarians and people outside the House of Commons and outside the legislatures of this country. We are going to be dealing with very difficult issues that are not going to be very easy to tackle.

I conclude by saying that the process is important. I think we have to move toward a constitutional convention or a constituent assembly of one sort or the other. We have to involve the people of this country in a really open and genuine way. It has to be as democratic as possible.

We must put everything on the table. The round must not be a round that is dictated by one province or one group or two provinces or two groups or by the federal government. It must be the Canadian round where people can come and say: "Look, these are the problems we have in Newfoundland" or "These are the problems that aboriginal people have", or the people of Quebec, of Saskatchewan or of Manitoba. It must be on the table. If everybody puts their agendas on the table and we debate those agendas, I am optimistic in the long run that we can find the accommodation and keep this country together.

The last point we mention in our motion today is that the only precondition that we lay down at this stage—and I hope members of the House all agree with this, a few may not—is the desire to remain within a renewed Canadian federation.

Mr Speaker, we need a new federation in our country, because the old one did not work any better for the people of Quebec than for other Canadians. I have in mind the aboriginal, many people in western Canada, many minorities in our country. That is why we need a new federation. But there must be a federation. I know the people of Quebec have difficulties with our federation, but Canada has been a good country for Quebecers for a long time. The French language has been well protected, better than it would have been in a separate country. I mean Quebec. I know there are a lot of problems in the province of Manitoba, and our party supported the rights of minorities, the language rights of the French-speaking people outside Quebec.

One thing is certain, Mr. Speaker. If Quebec decides to leave the country, the problems of francophones outside Quebec will be even more serious than they are now because those Francophones represent only a small minority in the country, about 5 or 6 per cent of the whole Canadian population.

[English]

We need a renewed federation. We have to look at the division of powers. We will have to modernize the division of powers. People should put their ideas on the table. My friend from Chambly has gone to the Bélanger-Campeau Commission and put his ideas on the table. Many of those ideas are extremely valid in trying to modernize the division of powers in this country; some may be debatable. At least he has put those ideas on the table. He is talking about some more powers in certain circumstances, like the environment, going to the federal government, and some provincial powers perhaps going to the provinces.

There are other ways of looking at it as well. Perhaps in this country instead of a radical decentralization of power to the provinces, we can look at a decentralization in the delivery of certain programs, in the administration of certain programs, so that we maintain national objectives and national standards. This is so important, in particular for poorer provinces like the Atlantic provinces and Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

In the meantime, we can still have more localized administration of those programs and delivery in the hands of local people. I think that is important.

In day care, for example, there are a lot of differences in my riding, in towns like Kamsack, Canora and Yorkton, and in the riding of the minister from Manitoba, in a town like Steinbach, in comparison to, say, Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver. If we had more localized delivery of programs, perhaps that may solve some of the problems we have today.

There are a lot of ideas out there that I think we should be looking at, but we have to put them all on the table. The best way of coming out of this thing with an accommodation that makes everybody feel at home is to have an open and fair and democratic process, and that is what our motion is trying to accomplish today. Without the process, the end result will fail.

With the process, I am sure that we as Canadians will find the consensus, will find the compromise, will find the accommodation that reflects our reality. That is that great mirror that reflects our reality, and that is how we will build our Constitution and build our country.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before we get into the question and comment period, I would like to inform the House that I am ready to give my ruling.

The Chair has now had the opportunity to take into consideration the arguments put forward by hon. members concerning the admissibility of the amendment moved by the acting leader of the opposition and is ready to give a ruling on this issue.

During an allotted day, the Chair would rather not get involved unless members specifically ask for help. I wish to thank the members for the very useful arguments they put forward. Citation no. 482 in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition states one of the most important prerequisites for this kind of amendments. It says, and I quote:

[English]

> On an allotted day, during consideration of the Business of Supply, an amendment must not provide the basis for an entirely different debate than that proposed in the original motion.

According to this citation, and after due consideration, I must protect the nature of the debate, as moved by the hon. member for Yukon, and therefore, I must rule against the amendment on the basis of today's debate.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make basically a comment, although the member who has just spoken on behalf of the New Democratic Party might want to respond briefly.

It would be very unfortunate to let this day pass without acknowledging, since we are discussing the future of the country, one individual who spent more than a decade in this Chamber and who still serves this country in the other chamber, a man who has already set so many records that there is not time during questions and comments to acknowledge them. I am talking about Senator David Croll, who was born 91 years ago today in the Soviet Union. He immigrated here at the age of 5 and who beginning a political career in 1930 as the mayor of Windsor set a number of firsts; not because he was the first Jewish mayor of Windsor or the first Jewish cabinet minister of Ontario, or even the youngest cabinet minister in the British Commonwealth in 1934, but because he stood for a series of principles about this country which the hon. member from Yorkton—Melville has just referred to in his own speech. Certainly on behalf of another party in this Chamber, I would like to acknowledge the distinguished contribution that Senator David Croll has made and to remember that we have a history in this country that is very important, a history of acknowledging those fundamentals which transcend often the kind of partisan debates that take place in the House and that David Croll in many ways represents the finest of that tradition.

• (1650)

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a comment in the context of this debate. I think what we have to do today is acknowledge in this Chamber that this is an opposition day and our party has put forth in good faith a motion whereby we can bring a resolution to the growing crisis that confronts our country.

As someone who has had the opportunity to travel outside of our country, both prior to being elected and since being elected, I think it is in that context we realize how blessed we are to live in Canada.

This debate is not just about our country. It is about the confidence in our institutions and the confidence in Parliament. I encourage members on all sides of the House to vote in favour of this motion.

It confounds me that if we are going to build a trust, a trust in politicians, a trust in the process, a trust in the work in this place, to vote against such a motion at this juncture would send a very negative signal.

The people of Canada elect us to come here and do the nation's business. We have to do it in good faith. We are trying to conduct this debate not in a spirit of partisanship, but in the sort of dread that confronts us in this constitutional dilemma.

I fear for my country. I urge that all members in the House vote for this motion to send a signal out to Canadians that that we have got our act together here, that we all care for our country and that we are going to support this motion and support our country; that we are willing to work as parliamentarians for all of Canada.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out earlier in the debate, it seems to me that this motion is attractive to the people of Canada but has very little interest for the people of Quebec. I am referring to paragraph 7, which states:

(7) that discussions begin with only one precondition, a desire to remain within a renewed Canadian federation;[—]

With this condition, the majority of the poeple who took part in the hearings of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission are excluded from the start. It excludes central labour organizations who, by the way, had very good relations with the NDP among others in the past, but took a stand for the sovereignty of Quebec and will therefore be excluded from the debate. And that, for me—

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Duceppe: If you wish to speak, my hon. friend, you will have a chance to do so later.

So, we would have wanted to make an amendment at this time, but it seems that, although we have been here since the beginning of the debate, the procedure will not allow us to make one. The right to speak is curtailed. I will, however, clarify a few things my hon. colleague mentioned about language, when he said it was very well protected. I would like to remind the members of this House a couple of facts. First, Quebec had to legislate on the subject, that the Supreme Court of Canada restricted the application of Bill 101 and that the rest of Canada opposed it. Second, the assimilation rate of francophones outside Quebec is extremely high.

Nonetheless, it seems dangerous to say that, once Quebec will have separated, the French-speaking groups outside Quebec would be in danger. That is a kind of blackmail Quebec will not lend itself to, arguing in turn that the survival of the anglophone minority in Quebec would be jeopardized. Quite the contrary, in Quebec, we will recognize their rights. We are lead by higher principles than some second-rate political party.

I appreciate the fact that the NDP was the only other party to recognize the right of Quebec to self-determination. It was a very noble gesture on their part. That makes sense because that is what the UN Charter says. It seems that all parties here have signed and accept it, but when you ask Conservative or Liberal members to recognize the right to self-determination for Quebec, it is as if they could not speak because something is stuck in their mouth.

Mr. Speaker, I have a specific question for my colleague on the Referendum Act. If a referendum is held in Quebec, and there should be one in 18 months at the most, there is a law in Quebec governing expenses on both sides, those who oppose and those who support the question.

Would a NDP government respect that law or would it do like the Liberals did in 1980 when they poured $25 million in the campaign even though the maximum allowed was $2.1 million. Would it do like the Conservatives with their Spicer circus and their national unity group? Would a NDP government respect the Quebec Referendum Act? Obviously, as a federal government, it would sing the praises of federalism, which is quite normal I presume, but in the framework of democratic institutions in Quebec, or would it disregard it like Liberals did in 1980?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have three things to say to my friend. First of all, last weekend, our national council met in Montreal and we have published a four page document in which we say we respect the right of Quebec to self-determination. Quebecers themselves will have to decide freely of their future and fulfill their unique collective responsibility. They must do it through a democratic and fair process. This could be a fair and democratic referendum, but that is for Quebecers to decide.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I am not a Quebecer and I want my country to include Quebec. I am for a Canadian Federation; I want Quebec to remain a part of this country but in the context of a renewed federation. For me and my party, the reality is one of a country that includes Quebec, Saskatchewan and the other provinces and territories. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we have included this proposal no. 7 in our motion today.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the issue of francophones outside Quebec is a reality. It might not be always fair, and it might be sad, but a Canada without the province of Quebec would be a Canada where protecting francophones outside Quebec would be more difficult since they are a minority of 5 or 6 per cent. In fact, it will be more difficult for them, and that is a reality, to preserve the rights they enjoy now.

We have a country which is officially bilingual at the federal level and in Canadian, national institutions. Language rights have been enshrined with much difficulty in our Canadian Constitution, as well as education rights in the language of the minority. Anglophones in Quebec have exactly the same rights and I know these rights are well protected in that province, better than the rights of francophones outside Quebec. I agree with that. The rights of anglophones in Quebec are better protected that the language rights of francophones outside Quebec. That is a Canadian reality.

But I say, Mr. Speaker, that without Quebec, the process to ensure that protection will be more difficult for francophones outside Quebec.

Mr. Duceppe: And what about the legislation on the referendum?

[English]

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I participate in this debate this afternoon with some very mixed feelings. I tell you frankly, and some will say this is not unusual, but I participate with some very mixed thoughts on the situation that we deal with in terms of the Constitution in this country.

I was a member of the Charest Committee. I am today a member of the Standing Joint Committee on the Process for Amending the Constitution of Canada. I guess as a politician from Newfoundland and Labrador, there are probably some other unique pressures that confront me and my colleagues.

As Canadians and as Newfoundlanders we try to deal with the Constitution. Perhaps a little bit unlike my colleagues, I have some very mixed thoughts and have not come to conclusions on some of the approaches that will be taken in the future, that we should take as Canadians in dealing with what I consider to be the most serious problem this country has faced in probably 60 or 70 years.

I would like to start at what I consider at this point to be first principles. I think all Canadians must recognize that this country has changed fundamentally. The process which was started in 1986, which was an attempt by the premiers of Canada's provinces with the help and co-operation of the federal government to bring Quebec back into the Constitution, was not successful in June of last year.

However, once that process started, this country changed because if what we called Meech Lake had been successful, we would have had Quebec back at the table. We would have been able as a country of individuals and of provinces, as governments and people coming together to address over a period of time some of the very real constitutional issues that this country faces in the next period of years.

It was not successful, and because it was not successful, again this country is fundamentally changed because we face the reality that Quebec and Quebecers are very serious about the concerns they have had for many years. They are concerns that successive governments and politicians have tried to address but have been clearly unsuccessful.

I think, as a Newfoundlander and as a Canadian, Quebecers are saying to us: "You've heard our concerns. Our concerns are legitimate." I happen to agree with that, but as Canadians, we are either unwilling or unable to address those concerns.

As a result, what is the point in all of us making our lives miserable for each other and continuing on? The last rebuff was Meech Lake under which I think for whatever reason we were not able to reach the conclusion that would have seen some of the very fundamental and not particularly serious concerns of the province and the people of Quebec address.

When I say that the people of Quebec are serious, I am not just talking about the politicians or the opinion leaders. I am talking about Quebecers of all walks of life and of all parts of the province. I am talking about Quebecers who genuinely believe that they have an economic capability. There is a renewed political confidence in that province that is quite understandable. It gives them the confidence to move ahead outside of Canada.

Where do we go, Mr. Speaker? What do we do? We see the Allaire report and the discussions that the Liberal Party of Quebec has had around the Allaire report, as we await the results of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission and as six or seven provinces—

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: There are barely seven members in this House, Mr. Speaker. We are asking to rise since 11 o'clock this morning. We are being refused and the House talks about the Canadian Constitution. I think we should be serious about the discussion today on that motion and I would call for a quorum count.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would point out to the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer that I recognized representatives from the Bloc Quebecois on four occasions. Having said that, I find that we have a quorum.

The hon. member for Saint-Maurice on a point of order.

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, I just heard in this House, only a few seconds ago, some very insulting comments with regard to the Chair. The member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie told you, and I quote: "I will settle your hash, you Mr. Speaker, in the next election"! These remarks are completely unacceptable. I ask immediately the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie, who is present in this House, to take back what he said.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I recognize again the member for Saint-Maurice on a point of order.

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, I want to be sure the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie has really heard what I said. We did hear very clearly, on this side of the House, that he questioned your authority. He directly challenged you, saying: "I will settle your hash—

An hon. member: In the next election!

Mr. Pronovost: —in the next election"! We heard him. He has questioned the authority of the Speaker of this House. It is something absolutely unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, and I ask him to take back immediately what he said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie seeking the floor?

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): I made no public comment in this House. I was talking to you. I have nothing else to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for St. John's East.

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, the question I ask is, where do we go from here? As I was saying, we have seen Allaire, we await Bélanger-Campeau. Six or seven provinces have started the process of consultation on the future of the Constitution and the amending process in their own provinces.

In this House of Commons and the Senate, we have undertaken the process of considering the amending formula and the process of changing our Constitution and what that does.

It is my belief that the people of Quebec have a far greater sense of where they want to go and what they want to do than, perhaps, the rest of Canada does. I think it is absolutely incumbent upon us, as Canadians, to decide exactly what it is we want to do. The first step is to decide as Canadians if we want a country. My own view is that we do want a country and one of the most integral parts of that country is the province and the people of Quebec.

Second, I think we have to decide what it will look like. That involves a process to which we have been a little adverse. That is the process of each of us defining and deciding, individually and collectively, I guess, in the end, what it means to be Canadian. It is that perception of the country that must guide what this Constitution is going to be.

As my friend from Sherbrooke said earlier: "A constitution is a mirror of the country". It is absolutely essential that we build a Constitution through a consensus that reflects the needs of Canada in 1991 and into the next century and that Constitution not be based on a series of principles so, therefore, we define the country based on the Constitution.

As well, a part of that has to clearly be our history. How did we get here? What has happened to this country, not only in the last 125 years, but also in the last 400 or 500 years, as we moved towards 1997, which is a big anniversary in our history.

The third question is, how do we get there? First of all, as Canadians, what we must stop doing is looking at the future development of our Constitution and our country in terms of what Quebec wants or what we are going to give Quebec. That will lead us nowhere and it is not the approach that is going to find a solution to this problem.

As I say, all of us must look at what we see this country to be. The consensus that is going to be absolutely essential is the consensus that must come from all Canadians, from all parts of this country. Without that consensus, we are not going to be there.

We must talk about some of the fundamentals of this country. We must talk about the best way to reflect things that have historically been important and, to an extent, have given us some definition in terms of process and in terms of substance in this country, our parliamentary democracy, our representative and responsible government, our tendency to look upon the provincial governments as the best way to provide programs to our people and that, by the nature and the definition, they are closer to the people who depend upon government.

What is it that a national government in this country must have to be a national government? What is it that a federal government must have so that we can be properly represented internationally, so that we have the broad control of the economy that is so essential for a central government and, I think, at least from my point of view, the ability to redistribute wealth in this country so that those individuals and regions of the country that need the help from others that have the capacity to help them can be properly facilitated?

I think it is fair to say that the problem of Meech Lake, as we have come to call it, is a problem of process. I am not one who completely accepts the argument that some of the fundamental, substantive issues in the agreement and some of those issues such as distinct society really were the things that, in the end, cratered the process.

I do, however, accept the argument that the Canadian public was concerned that perhaps they were not part of the process. I think it is fair to say that no process of amending our Constitution has been as open. There were public hearings sponsored by a number of provincial governments, and certainly the Government of Canada, but there is no question that Canadians believed that they were being asked to discuss something that they did not feel they were a part of or that they did not feel they could have an affect on.

Be that as it may, that is past history, but there are lessons to learn. There are things that we can take from that and that we must take from that. But what kind of participation do Canadians want? What role do Canadians perceive that they can play or should play in the development, in the acceptance and in the changing of our Constitution?

I do not think we know that, and I think it is probably unsafe to make assumptions. I look forward, as the Edwards–Beaudoin committee travels across the country starting next week, that we talk to individuals about their perception. I get the sense that Canadians want to know that they have the ability to express an opinion on the Constitution, have their leaders listen to it and have the ability to have it changed.

What is it that Canadians expect of their leaders in this process? We have a democracy where elected politicians, as we are, are accountable for our decisions, for our actions and, ultimately, to provide some leadership and some focus on how we deal with issues, be it energy policy, fish policy or constitutional development and that accountability is ultimately the thing that ties this country together in a political sense.

How do we change our Constitution? One way or the other, all Canadians must feel that they are part of that process. We talk about amending our Constitution and I think that is an unfortunate choice of words. Technically, amending our Constitution is a legal process and, I think, a process that, quite clearly, is one that has to be addressed in a legal point of view. But the question of changing our Constitution talks more about public participation, talks more about how all Canadians can be part of the development of the initiatives, can perhaps be part of the development of the words around the Constitution and, perhaps, can be part of the ratification process around the Constitution, but all Canadians must feel they are part of it.

The Charter of Rights had an interesting impact. Somebody here in this House today talked about ownership. Canadians felt that they had an ownership of the charter. I believe that the charter gave a number of Canadians the feeling that there was a recognition in some very fundamental and important institutions in this country and the charter is one of them. Status has been conferred and as a result those that are not there feel that status is to be conferred to them.

I think it is unfortunate if we look at the charter in terms of status. It is critical that we look at the charter in terms of the protection of rights. I recognize that it raises some interesting problems concerning individual rights and collective rights, but that is part of this country and the history of this country, and one of the things that we are going to have to deal with as we address the substantive questions of the Constitution.

I am one that believes that a charter is absolutely essential. I also believe that there is room for amendments within our charter, but I think the impact of the charter on the constitutional process is important to recognize. We must clearly address the concerns of a number of Canadians.

The native people in this country have some very real historical and current grievances which I think, partly through the Constitution, but primarily through the will of the Canadian people we can and we absolutely must address. Any politician knows it is risky to go into a list. There are a number of other groups. I want to mention only one because of the importance that I place on it, but not exclusive to others.

In the few short minutes I have, with all the disturbances and the carryings on, I thought it important to talk briefly about some of the things that we have heard in the committee. Quite clearly, the government and the Prime Minister on January 24 last year said that in the coming months and years we must find a way to reconcile the need for public participation and open democratic process in the legal requirements now in the Constitution.

When the committee was set up, the Prime Minister again stated that the mandate was to consult broadly with Canadians in the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, in particular on the role of the Canadian public in the process. I do not think we are going to come to a consensus that will allow us to change the Constitution in substantive terms, nor in process terms, unless the Canadian public feels that it is genuinely involved in the process.

As I said before, it is unfortunate and premature for us to assume that we know how that is going to work. I think there are a number of approaches to take. We started our deliberations on February 19 and since then we have heard 26 witnesses. I think all of them have stressed, and I know my colleague from Saanich—Gulf Islands will agree with me that there is no question that public participation is important and vital in the process. Unfortunately not every agrees on how to find that. They do not know where the answer is. The 17 of us on the committee have no consensus on what that is either.

A number say that what we should do is take the current process and make it work better. There are two or three arguments around that. One is the question, as we have talked a bit about it, the nature of our democracy. The other is the reality that one way or another the current amending formula, technically and legally, is the thing that we must address and we must deal with.

There are problems. We all know that there are potentially very serious problems. We have had the debate over legitimacy and legality in terms of our ability to talk to the Supreme Court about a broad Canadian consensus overtaking a legal question, and that is one we are going to have to grapple with again. But are there ways that we can do it?

I think my friend from Yorkton—Melville talked about the ability to come to agreement; the question of allowing powers to be delegated through a variety of different processes, that we as Canadians can find the accommodation that is so essential to make some of those jurisdictional questions become less of a problem.

There have been a number of discussions on the question of a referendum. Many believe that a referendum is particularly important to make democracy more democratic, somebody said that. Vincent Lemieux from Laval said that a referendum makes democracy more democratic, but he worried about the tensions of the time.

Gordon Robertson talked about a referendum that could perhaps be operated in two stages if people were not prepared to participate: Quebec to clarify its position, Canada to respond to Quebec.

There is the question of a constituent assembly, which has gained some great currency in this House and in a number of other places. However, there are some real problems with that. Some say not to get into a constituent assembly because too much time would be spent in discussing how to set it up. Some worry that a constituent assembly will in itself create a whole new class of politicians who get elected to it if they are broadly elected based on the position that they take, and the whole thing becomes a foregone conclusion.

Some argue that a referendum does not protect the rights of the minorities, that it is in itself in a funny way anti-democratic.

Suffice it say, Mr. Speaker, that a number of these questions will be considered by this committee, will be considered by this Parliament, and I hope will be considered by Canadians over all. It is absolutely essential that as Canadians we start to think about the future of this country. It is not good enough to say: "Let one part of it leave and we will continue on without it." It quite simply does not work that way. It will not work that way in terms of economics; it will not work that way in terms of the political future of what is left. And it denies a history that we are all so terribly proud of, if we take the time to think about it. It denies the construction of this country that has been built over 500 years of history, and it denies the fundamental approach that was taken in 1864 and in 1867 to set this country up.

We must recognize that what we have seen in the last 125 years, the contributions we have made to the world, the way we take care of ourselves as Canadians, and how we present ourselves to the world is based on so many people coming together. This country does not exist without Quebec. It is an opportunity today to be looked on in a positive way, for all of us to see a future that we have come together, a conclusion that we have developed together, for a great country for the 21st century.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): I was struck by my colleague from Newfoundland when he talked about the elements of a possible agreement with Quebec, maybe in relation to the next Constitution that we might negotiate.

I have a comment to make on a subject that I think the hon. member touched upon. There is one thing that goes beyond all the provincial boundaries and it is the values that we have in common.

Because, you know Mr. Speaker, I do not have the cultural background that people born in Quebec or in Ontario would have, I come from the United States, but I have enjoyed taking the time to study at both cultures: the Quebec culture, of course, and the English Canadian culture. But I can see there are obvious differences.

But there are similarities. And if we are not prepared to recognize those some similarities, whether we come from an English or French background, we really refuse to acknowledge this reality. One of the similarities that I think the two cultures have in common here in Canada is the spirit of compromise. I think we have had this similarity for a long time. We can now see some changes, of course. We notice a certain polarization which is the result I think, of provocative action on both sides.

There have been some actions that have been considered provocative by the English speaking Canadian. I am referring of course to Mr. Bourassa's Bill 178. As for me, I was perfectly satisfied with Bill 101, and I thought that Bill 178 was really a nonsense. But Mr. Bourassa is the one who made it into law. English-speaking Canadians considered that their freedom of speech had been violated. Mr. Speaker, as a former reporter, I can tell you that when French-speaking Quebeckers saw people in Brampton, I think it was, in Ontario, trample on the Quebec flag, the atmosphere in the province of Quebec was electric. I cannot begin to tell you how awful it was to see their reaction. It was really electric.

One thing is for sure, when those provocative acts took place, I could see the spirit of compromise beginning to vanish in Canada. Today, in the House of Commons, following the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, we find for the first time in the history of our country a Federal political Party which preaches sovereignty, something unheard of in the past. Personally, I feel it is quite natural to have a Bloc Quebecois, because during the Meech Lake debate Quebecers found some arguments revolting. It should be emphasized that if there were no Bloc Quebecois, there might be some other group, because in Quebec people are polarized just like everywhere else.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I suggest the government should accept the blame for the polarization which resulted from the improper handling of Meech Lake. Finally, because of the unsound process we have inherited from Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Chrétien, I suggest that the failure of the Meech Lake Accord was inevitable.

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, my friend from Chambly has raised a number of questions, some of which are even connected to each other.

When I consider the culture and history of Newfoundland and Quebec, I find some similarity in their history. I know it is not a good choice of words. But in spite of the all-perversive presence of the Church, the dependence on natural resources such as the fishing industry in Newfoundland and farming in Quebec, their cultures were also very different.

[English]

Newfoundlanders are as different from other Canadians as Quebecers are in many ways and I do not want to equate the distinct society thing.

If you end up at a party with Canadians from every province, you end up with the Newfoundlanders and the Quebecers fighting over the rum bottle in the kitchen.

Mr. Langlois: Screech.

Mr. Reid: We end up in construction camps in northern Canada together. We have large families, or we used to have large families together. I think, Mr. Speaker, we have viewed the world very much the same way. We got forgotten a little bit. Perhaps sometimes by nature we got forgotten, left out there, in my case on a cliff and in Quebec on a large field on which it is difficult to grow things.

But that is something that should draw us together, something that demands that we look at the world very much in the same sort of way. I use the example of Newfoundland.

The shared values that my friend from Chambly talks about are shared values that we can have between any of the provinces in Canada, if only we take the time to look, and stop throwing barriers up in front of ourselves, providing excuses for us not to go ahead and find some solutions. We are allowing ourselves to be angered by things that normally would really not anger us if we thought about it.

Sometimes in some parts of Canada it is kind of cool to walk on flags, where it is accepted to be against one group or another. Unfortunately, it is far too easy. It is too easy to be anti- somebody, and it is too easy to insult a particular group, or exclude a particular group, because perhaps sometimes to accept that we may not be as tolerant as we like to think demands that we not only look at ourselves as we are today, but demands that we do things in the future a little bit differently.

I think if we are willing to take some of those steps, some of the things that my friend from Chambly talks about, perhaps that may see us through all of this.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to the speech by the hon. member for St. John's East. The remarks and the arguments that he made seem to me to be strongly supportive of the motion before us by the hon. member for Yukon. His remarks strongly supported a broadly based process. He supported consultation with many groups, including aboriginal peoples, minority groups and so on.

When I look at the motion, that is what the motion says. It says that the process must be broadened, that it must include not only governments but parliaments, including the various parties in parliaments. The motion also says it must include discussions with the aboriginal peoples, with women's groups, cultural communities, language minorities and that the process must be open and transparent.

Consequently, I want to ask my hon. friend what parts of this motion he is opposed to. I cannot seem to understand that he is opposed to any of the parts. I know he is with the joint standing committee and it is studying the amendment formula and consulting broadly, but it is not studying all the different aspects of the Constitution. Therefore, I put the question to him, listening to his remarks, how can he be opposed to this motion? If he is opposed to the motion, what parts of the motion is he opposed to?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, my friend from Notre-Dame-De-Grâce knows that I try to be positive and I try to be supportive. However, as I said before I started, I also try and be sure of where I am going. The essence of the individual points of this motion I obviously have very little concern with. Yes, I could enter into a debate on some of the specifics.

I think, though, the time is not right in that, as I said earlier, we have the process of Bélanger-Campeau, we have the process that has been undertaken by Ontario, by Quebec, obviously, and by Manitoba. I think there is a process under way in New Brunswick. We will see processes undertaken in other provinces.

As we wait for Mr. Spicer, as we wait for the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, as we see and hear what those groups have had to say, it is the time for us to take our direction and to see in which direction we want to go. That would be my concern. It is simply one of being a little premature.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this important debate this afternoon. There is no subject more critical to Canada at this time than constitutional development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: It is about the quorum, Mr. Speaker. We are talking about Canada, about its future. Could we take a count of the members present, please?

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Very briefly on the same point of order.

We are talking about an open constitutional process and I think the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party represent a certain point of view. I think they should be heard, even if only for a few minutes. What about the idea of dividing the remaining time between my friend from New Brunswick, who understands the necessity of all Canadians being heard, and one of our colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois. I think that would be fair.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as you know, we have only had two Liberals participate in this debate. I have been waiting here all day on the list. It looks like I will not get on. I have great sympathy with members of the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party in wanting to speak in the debate. I think you have to follow the order of precedence in recognizing parties and we all have to take our chances.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am ready to give my ruling. Since there is no unanimous consent, I will follow our Parliamentary tradition.

Up to now, we have had seven speakers, three on the government side and four on the opposition side. In all fairness, I have now to recognize an opposition member. I will therefore give the floor to the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

[English]

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I regret that there is not time for everybody to speak on this issue. I hope that there will be before the debate is over. We have a great many important days before us in Canada, and I am sure there will be ample opportunity for all of us to state our position.

I would like to quickly tell you this afternoon that as a New Brunswicker and as a Canadian, the kind of message I have thought seriously about giving to one of the many forums examining the constitutional future of Canada, the one that is now operating within my own province of New Brunswick. What I would say to them would not attempt to be a reasoned analysis of constitutional matters nor a political science treatise, but rather an effort to state one or two key values which I hold as much in my heart as in my head, about my province and about my country.

There are many ways, in my view, that New Brunswick seems a microcosm of Canada. That is particularly true in the composition of our citizenry, which uniquely portrays the balance among those of English-speaking and French-speaking heritage. Although our multicultural content is small in comparison to some areas, we have displayed a reasonable capability to accommodate and embrace a wide range of cultures with sensitivity and respect. Therefore, I feel that New Brunswick has a special opportunity, indeed an obligation to help set the tone for Canada and to be a model in several respects for what our country can become.

If there is any one expression to describe my feelings as a Canadian and a New Brunswicker, it is the sense of real freedom which is to be found here: Freedom to exist and to live in a vast country with lots of room for everyone. Freedom to grow, freedom to expand, freedom to develop in a society that is open, generous and tolerant; freedom to participate in a democracy that is just and accessible; freedom to dream and a potential which is overflowing with opportunity.

Those are the feelings I get when I think about the unique privilege of being a Canadian. They represent a state of mind not easily attainable in most other parts of the world, where landscapes are becoming ever more limited, population densities ever more burdensome, society ever more volatile, democracy ever more fragile and dreams ever more distant. Therefore, it is critical in my view that in any vision for New Brunswick or for Canada, we always be mindful of the special reality of individual freedom which exists for every one of us here. That is a value above all others and should be the foundation for any vision of nationhood.

There are other exemplary values which New Brunswick models for Canada. Among the most obvious of these, of course, is the manner in which we have advanced the accommodation of our two official linguistic societies, English and French. In so doing, we have become Canada's only officially bilingual province, not just in a formal sense, but very much also in a practical context. While there do remain a few who have resentment and intolerance about language issues in New Brunswick, I believe that the overwhelming momentum is toward a future that will be enriched by the abilities of an ever growing number of our citizens to speak and to work in both official languages. Yet, it will also be a future where a full life can be found in only one, and either one, of those languages.

I am frequently inspired and encouraged in these respects by the signs of the future to be found and seen in the youth of New Brunswick. The ability to speak both languages is ever-increasing, but what is even more important about our young people is that standards of goodwill and acceptance are growing and levels of intolerance are waning. Those are also fundamental characteristics on which to build any New Brunswick vision and ones on which to build a national vision as well.

Another value that is not unique to New Brunswick but always prevalent there is the entrepreneurial spirit. From our beginnings in the shipyards, the forests, the oceans and the farms, New Brunswickers have demonstrated the imaginative capabilities to create enterprises and the willingness to take risks in running them, which have led to a disproportionately high record of entrepreneurial success in this country.

It is not necessary to mention the family names of our citizens who have founded fortunes both within our province and elsewhere in Canada, but they do exemplify the spirit of enterprise which permeates our population.

Perhaps it is because we exist as a geographic link between Atlantic Canada, central Canada and the United States or for whatever other reasons, but New Brunswick has always clearly taken aggressive and positive directions toward economic growth that convinced me of our ultimate economic viability in a united Canada. We have had our successes and our failures, but we have never lost our sense of enterprise. For example, the province's solid support for the free trade agreement was an expression of that spirit.

It is also a fundamental value of any vision of ourselves and of Canada that prosperity and economic growth are part and parcel of Canadian unity.

I could go on about New Brunswick values, but my time is brief so I will close with a reference about the land both here in our province and throughout Canada. If ever there was a promised land, with clean water and clean air and great beauty and broad horizons and green forests and running rivers and rolling oceans, Canada is it and certainly New Brunswick is part of it. Nature has blessed our nation almost beyond imagination and, for me, a large part of the meaning of life has been found in the enjoyment of our natural environment and its resources. Those are values which are increasingly endangered around the world and ones which we must commit to preserve in every aspect of our vision. It is a vision, an area of our vision, with which New Brunswick has commenced to deal and one where we all must lead.

However, given the historic nature of our task, I do feel the need at least to declare in this debate my deep pride and affection for my province and my country and to try to convey some of the particular values which support those emotions within me.

In the final analysis, it seems to me that it is the spirit of Canada that needs renewal. If the will to be a nation can be restored, all else will follow. It seems to me also that this exemplary spirit is to be found in New Brunswick, and in Canada today; perhaps more faintly now than in the past, but it is here. If we can start by rekindling this spirit again for ourselves then I have no doubt that we can help to breathe new life into Canada.

The Prime Minister has articulated seven principles on which the future of our constitutional development will be found. The first is that any change should lead to a more prosperous Canada. The second is to promote constitutional change that makes us more efficient and competitive as a country. The third principle is fairness as a nation to show respect for the equality of our citizens and the diversity of our citizens. The fourth is to avoid stale dogma or tired ideology. Now is the time for innovation. The fifth is the need to maintain national standards in the interest of all Canadians. The sixth is to consider any and all arrangements that have an effect of moving decision making closer to the people. Lastly, the rights of all Canadians must be safeguarded.

Those are seven powerful principles for the future of our Constitution and we must not settle for less.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply, pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise in the House today to affirm that under this government the gap between the rich and the poor is widening at tremendous speed.

While the government plays with the unemployment insurance benefits, employment is suffering its largest drop since 1982 and the economy continues to show no signs of recovery. The Minister of Finance predicted at budget time that the unemployment rate would be 10 per cent, but as I speak today, it is much higher than 10 per cent.

I am afraid for the people of Prince Edward Island and for Canada. The Canadian Jobs Strategy fund has been cut by $100 million. Between April 1990 and January 1991, Canadians have lost 288,000 jobs. At a time when the people of Prince Edward Island need work to support their families, funds for new social housing have been reduced and Islanders have been forced out into the street.

Since 1984, the people of Prince Edward Island have come to expect economic hardships. How much more will this government ask Islanders to take before it stops catering to the rich and faces the real problems of the average Canadian.

RED CROSS SOCIETY

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, when we are honouring Canadians for their efforts in the Persian Gulf war, let us not forget one of Canada's great traditions, the Red Cross Society, leaders in international war relief.

To assist them in the role of the Persian Gulf, the federal government has pledged $4 million. In addition to this money, the society has launched a $1 million Persian Gulf appeal. So far individual Canadians, participating banks, provinces and territorial governments have contributed more than $370,000.

This year, 1991, marks the 95th anniversary of the Canadian Red Cross Society. This volunteer based organization, with over 3,000 volunteers in my city alone, provides emergency relief blood centres to 600 branches in more than 1,000 operating units.

It is particularly fitting at this time, when the original role of the Red Cross is highlighted by the gulf crisis, to invite all Canadians to congratulate the board members and the staff of volunteers of the Red Cross Society. They do a great service for Canada.

CANADA POST

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, without any consultation with the residents to be affected, Canada Post advised the people of Freetown, Breadalbane and Winsloe that all three post offices would be closing down. This "close them down and ask questions later" policy of Canada Post has got to stop.

Once again, the policies of this government have impacted negatively upon the lives of my constituents in Malpeque. Once again, this government has taken away another pillar of rural life in three communities in my riding. Once again, the only federal presence in these three communities is being removed.

The very fabric of rural life is being threatened, and rather than try to assist rural Canada in its fight for survival, this government's policies are accelerating the process.

I call on the federal government to demand that Canada Post review the damage its policies are causing rural communities. It is obvious the needs of rural Canadians are a low priority for Canada Post and for this Conservative government.

CLEAN AIR ACCORD

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, today's much-touted Clean Air Accord remains deficient; celebration is premature. The ceremonial signing offers appearance without substance, hiding government failings in a flashy replay of previous agreements.

Compliance mechanisms required from monitoring and enforcement remain window dressing at best. Transboundary pollution of Canadian lands by toxic chemicals continue to be a threat. Funding for energy conservation and alternatives to fossil fuels has been slashed. December's promise by the environment minister for national acid rain caps in the Green Plan has been forgotten. Federal air standard agreements with the three western provinces have not been achieved.

This accord may be better than nothing, however, it fails to prevent pollution or protect the health and environment of Canadians. It leaves Canada satisfied to follow the lead of the U.S. in setting standards for air emissions and fails to commit the resources to determine our own stringent regulations for the well-being of Canada's future.

KIDNEY FOUNDATION OF CANADA

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to express my appreciation and sincere good wishes to the Kidney Foundation of Canada on the occasion of Kidney Month for 1991.

Dedicated volunteers of the Kidney Foundation of Canada ensure that Canadians afflicted with kidney disease and related disorders have access to quality information and specialized services.

In addition, the Kidney Foundation of Canada, with the help of thousands of donors, raises significant sums of money which go toward research and public education programs. The foundation's diligent work in enhancing the quality of life for people with kidney disease and in sensitizing all Canadians to the special needs of those affected is to be commended.

I invite all Canadians to join me in saluting the members of the Kidney Foundation of Canada and in wishing them continued success in their important work in promoting public awareness of kidney disease, supporting excellence in research and encouraging organ donation.

ACID RAIN

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, to you, first of all, and your colleagues, my congratulations for the role you have played over the last decade in the long and difficult saga of reducing acid rain pollution in Canada.

• (1410)

As the Prime Minister and President Bush pose for a photo opportunity today, 3.2 million tonnes of sulphur dioxide pollution continue to cross from the U.S. to Canada every year. Put another way, in the 17 hours that President Bush is in Canada, over 6,000 tonnes of U.S. pollution will have crossed the border too. By 1995, 2.7 million tonnes per year will continue to drift our way and, by the year 2000, still two million tons.

Therefore, the Canadian public should keep in mind that the political accord signed today is only the first, not the final, step in the battle against transboundary acid rain. The next phase is to establish how much we must reduce acid gas emissions beyond the 50 per cent goal that was established a decade ago.

The acid rain battle is far from over.

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Madam Speaker, my statement concerns acid rain. Once again, we see the benefits of co-operation between the United States and Canada. In a few moments, a very important event will take place in Parliament.

The President of the United States, Mr. Bush, and the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Mulroney, will sign an air quality agreement. As result of this agreement, substantial funds in the United States and Canada will be released to guarantee cleaner air for a healthier environment in both our countries.

This is a great day for the whole North American continent, since our countries are committed to controlling transboundary air pollution. I want Quebecers and the people of Beauce to realize that without the leadership shown by Brian Mulroney, today's ceremony would not take place.

Madam Speaker, as the member for Beauce, I take pride in having organized a major seminar on acid rain and in having kept up the pressure on the government. Once again, the voice of the people of Beauce has been heard!

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, since President Bush is in town today, I hope the Prime Minister takes an opportunity to discuss the U.S. loan rate on grain with him. The loan rate guides the price established on the Chicago grain market, and a modest increase of at least $1 a bushel in the loan rate would substantially raise world grain prices and reduce government deficiency payment expenditures to farmers.

Beneficiaries of such a policy would be taxpayers in the U.S. and Canada and farmers in both countries and in all other countries, including Third World farmers; U.S.-Canada deficits would be reduced; trade figures and trade balances in Canada and the U.S. would increase substantially.

Surely our leaders cannot reject such a good and sensible proposal, and I trust that the Prime Minister and the President will be able to make such an announcement after today.

CLEAN AIR ACCORD

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, at 3:35 p.m. this afternoon, our two great nations will conclude a formal Canada-U.S. air quality agreement of historical proportions. With the signatures of President George Bush and the Right Hon. Prime Minister Brian Mulroney firmly affixed to the document, a major precedent will have been set in undoing some of the damage man has inflicted on the environment.

Beyond a doubt, the fight against acid rain has been long and hard but Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is to be commended. By placing acid rain high on his personal agenda, we are here today reaping the fruits of his efforts.

As one of the many who has been heavily involved in the battle against acid rain for over ten years, I can honestly say that today is the culmination of time and energy well spent and invested. The future now looks clearer and cleaner.

As well, we must not fail to commend Speaker Fraser for the great job that he has done as an environmentalist and a former Minister of the Environment.

MIDDLE EAST

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the most positive outcome to the recent war in the gulf would, of course, be a lasting peace between Israel and its Arab neighbours. When we consider that Jews, Muslims and Christians have lived side by side in the Middle East for thousands of years, such a peace is long past due. Until now, the deep rifts of hatred and misunderstanding have often led to horrible abuses. For example, Jews, living in Syria since before Roman times, see their most basic rights denied.

In the past we have had difficult and unpleasant relationships with Syria, but during the gulf war Syria was our ally; Syria was Israel's ally. This very fact of fighting on the same side has created an opening for new understanding between them.

Peace must be built on such an understanding and human rights abuses on all sides must stop.

THE BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, I have an important point to make, further to what was said by the Prime Minister yesterday in the House. The Prime Minister said that reconciliation does not come easy. It calls for humility and understanding. It means the whole family must be able to discuss their problems.

Yesterday, in this very House, members of the Bloc Quebecois wanted to take part in the debate on the motion presented by the New Democratic Party, and we were denied the right to speak directly to the motion. We were only allowed to ask questions but not to speak to the motion as such. Is that Quebec's place within Canada? Is that the kind of respect Canada has for Quebec: Ask questions but don't speak to the motion? Madam Speaker, I should think that in the interests of democracy and out of respect for the rights of all members, you would want to hear what everyone in this House has to say.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. If an agreement on the environment is to be at all useful, it must contain the following: sanctions, enforcement, mechanisms for public scrutiny, independent monitoring mechanisms. My question is this: Can the Deputy Prime Minister give the House the assurance that the air pollution agreement to be signed today meets all these criteria? Can he give us the assurance it will not be just another case of window-dressing, like the Green Plan?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, today is an historic date for Canada. Our Prime Minister and President Bush will be signing an agreement very shortly. We have been discussing these possibilities since 1978, as some of my fellow members who were in the House at the time will remember and others who were not. However, the Prime Minister, Brian Mulroney, was the first one to raise this issue, with very substantial support from all concerned, and especially from the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka who, for as long as I have known him, has worked very hard on this issue, and I want to congratulate all those who have given this matter their support.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, members of the government ought to know that this initiative was begun by my colleague. That is where it started.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: I will say something else. The agreement that this government finally came to is just so much political puffery and so is this minister's answer.

The issue in an international agreement, if the minister does not know, ought to be, how can the citizens of each country be assured that the other country will carry out its terms?

The question I put to the minister is this. Is this agreement enforceable, one country versus the other? If not, of what value is it other than to provide a photo-op for a couple of Tories?

An hon. member: Sour grapes.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, the policies of his hon. colleagues did little or almost nothing in this area for 20 years.

Some hon. members: Nothing, nothing.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Weiner: Today is a day to reflect on achievement and accomplishment, to celebrate what we have been able to do together. A vigorous new partnership has been brought together. Why not congratulate today instead of belittling. Today is a day to reflect on this success.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, it is very clear that the agreement is not enforcable; that the agreement is an empty agreement. This is an agreement of absolutely no significance, so let us go on to something that is.

This week the Rawson Academy reported on the secret diversion of water from Saskatchewan to the United States. In the last two months, a number of incidences have been reported of potential exports of water. Let there be no mistake about it. We are dealing with potential precedents under the free trade agreement. The question is when will this government bring forth comprehensive legislation on water exports so that Canadian citizens, both those who are for and against, can argue the issue out in public debate?

• (1420)

The true question is when will this government understand that Canadians do not want to be faced with a fait accompli by a government that is hiding its true agenda under a mound of public relations flackery.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, when will that member understand that this Canada–U.S. agreement does not allow for water exports.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Weiner: Except for bottled water, of course, which, coincidentally, I am able to buy from time to time in the United States.

An hon. member: There you go.

Mr. Weiner: The United States is entitled to a certain portion of the natural flow of the Souris River according to a water apportionment agreement which was developed by the IJC in 1959 and revised as part of this agreement.

The licence issued on August 31, 1989, under the International River Improvements Act, included a condition prohibiting any water diversion from outside the Souris River drainage basin which would increase the natural flow of the river at the international boundary.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of the Environment and another minister told the House that a 1959 agreement developed by the International Joint Commission controls the diversion of Canadian waters to the United States.

Surely both ministers are aware that the IJC, a hallmark of co–operation between Canada and the United States, was entirely excluded from the amendments to that agreement, which are contained in the Rafferty–Alameda agreement—

Mr. Harvard: Shame.

Mrs. Catterall: —which are effective for 100 years and that even today the International Joint Commission has not been informed that its mandate has changed.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister commit the government to immediately call on the expertise of the International Joint Commission and get an agreement that lets Canada control Canadian water in the interests of Canadians?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am sure I was clear in what I said.

Mr. Cadieux: Absolutely.

Mr. Weiner: The agreement that is in place does not allow export of any water except bottled water. The IJC is a public body. The United States is entitled to what I underlined and I am sure when the hon. member reflects on the answer that I have given her colleague, she will appreciate that there is absolutely nothing but bottled water that could be available right now in the United States.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I can understand that the minister is not familiar with the agreement, but it is very clear that this agreement for 100 years surrenders control of Canadian water, no matter what Canadian needs are. Surely, both Canadians and Americans are entitled to a straightforward position and answer from the government on Canadian water and its availability to Americans.

Will the Prime Minister take the occasion of President Bush's visit to say that an unfortunate error has been made with this agreement, that it is not acceptable to Canada. The President is a reasonable man and I am sure he will understand that the Prime Minister wants to correct his mistake.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, the straight answer is no. No.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS COUNCIL ON NATIONAL ISSUES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the Business Council on National Issues is one of the loudest big business voices calling for major cuts in government spending. The BCNI in fact has called for "sacrifices on the part of everyone" and said that no money at all should go to business.

Yet, now we learn incredibly that this government is giving $400,000 as a hand-out to the BCNI to help with the study. Will this government block this hand-out to the corporate elite and tell the BCNI that this is the sacrifice that it must make?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member that this was a study that we wanted to do in the government. We went to the BCNI and asked it to share in the cost of this study. It agreed to share in the cost of that study. The reason why we asked it to share is because we view the question of competitiveness as a matter which involves both the private sector and the public sector.

We are participating in that study, the BCNI is participating in the study, and I believe there are others who are participating in that study, because we believe that with a partnership, with both private sector and public sector addressing this problem, we can have a broader commitment and therefore broader chances of success.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, while we are on the topic of hand-outs to the BCNI, I have another question for the Minister of Finance pertaining to the draft legislation that he released on February 11 that allows people to keep the capital gains in private trusts safely sheltered from tax beyond the original 21-year period that ends in 1993, allowing some of the wealthiest families in Canada a tax dodge potentially worth billions of dollars.

I want to ask the minister, given his persistent rhetoric about burden sharing and deficit reduction, how he can justify a measure that would allow the super-rich to avoid a tax that they have had 21 years' notice to pay, while calling in his recent budget for everyone's help in sharing the burden of debt.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): This is one other example where this government is closing a loophole.

The provision was originally put in place in 1971 and explicitly called for more precise rules surrounding this particular rule, and it was contemplated that those rules would be designed prior to the termination of the 21-year period.

What the paper that I released in February does is provide those precise rules which permit the government to put a tighter control on this and avoid the extension of the rule, as my hon. friend would allege.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that what he is referring to could have been done by another means and is only part of the legislation that I am referring to.

The fact is that this amounts to, as Professor Neil Brooks has said, "a gift worth several billion dollars". Katherine Bush of Blake Cassels says "the government is giving away money".

The fact is that this is a boondoggle, this is a tax break for the very rich, and it belies everything the Minister of Finance says about burden sharing and deficit reduction.

Will the minister rise now and make a commitment not to bring this in; to deal with some of the problems that need to be dealt with in another way, but not to provide this tax break to the rich.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): I would point out to my hon. friend that if we do not do this, it will be a tax break to the rich. What we are proposing to do with the paper that I put out on February 11 is to bring in far more precise rules to avoid the extension of these trusts, which could be done under the existing rule.

It is another example of this government tightening up on tax provisions to make it far easier for this government to gain a greater share of revenues from people in upper income brackets so that they will bear their fair share of tax.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Montreal Island.

In 1990, the manufacturing sector in Montreal lost 31,500 jobs. Today, 188,000 people in Montreal are unemployed.

An hon. member: Shame!

Mrs. Maheu: Forty-one thousand of these jobless are young people. Is that how we build a country? When is the minister going to wake up and do his job, which is to look after the development and prosperity of Montreal?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, it takes a lot of nerve for a member of the Liberal Party to try and teach the Conservative Party how to create jobs on Montreal Island.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Corbeil: Perhaps, Madam Speaker, we should make allowances for the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville who may not have all the facts, but we cannot make the same allowances for the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who has been sitting in this House as a Liberal member for 25 years.

Before 1984, Madam Speaker, during the last 17 or 18 years the Liberals were in power in this country, Montreal lost not 100, not 200, but 4,000 jobs. When they were defeated—a good thing for Canada—there were 4,000 jobs less on Montreal Island than when they came to power. When this government took over in 1984, it managed to create what is today a total of 83,000 jobs, many of them in the riding of the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, when for instance, we helped Canadair with the stretch jet.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, the answer is totally unrelated to the current situation in Montreal.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Maheu: You are always referring to the past, seven years ago. Come back to the present!

My supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. How can a $100 million cutback in the Canadian Job Strategy make the unemployment rate drop in Montreal where it stands at 15.1 per cent?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, if my colleague wants to talk about what has been happening since 1984, I must tell her that economic and regional development agreements with the province of Quebec are already planned and will amount to approximately $440 million for the period between 1988 and 1993. As Minister of State working with the hon. Barbara McDougall, I have personally participated in the constitution of committees in support of the recommendations of the CREESOM Report. We developped programs concerning the industrial base, with the help of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. I could also mention the housing assistance we provided.

In response to the hon. member, the $100 million cut she is referring to will enable us to pursue the programs that are already part of the process. We will continue to work with the collectivities which are aware of their needs and we will identify priorities. Bill C-21 and the Labour Force Strategy finally enable us to provide training and have an adequate labour force. I could go on. We supported MACs. I was with my colleague in Montreal, last Monday, to make a joint announcement—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. minister will have a chance to finish answering later.

The hon. member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. The government's logic is pitiful. She claims that taking $100 million out of the job creation budget is going to help 41,000 unemployed young people in Montreal. Considering that 41,000 young people under 30 have been laid off in Montreal since last year, doesn't this government realize it is destroying the heart and soul of one of the greatest cities in the world? When is it going to do something to create jobs instead of spouting political rhetoric?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that the Canadian Jobs Strategy is part of our global strategy at the Department of Employment and Immigration. For the current year, we have a global budget of $1.7 billion, an increase over last year's. Repeat, we intend to keep implementing community-based programs. Our philosphy, which has been applied since 1984, has proved to our satisfaction that this is the right way to do it, and that is why we will keep trying to create jobs and get through the recession. We have helped in the past, and we will continue to do so in the future.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Considering the Minister responsible for Montreal has utterly failed in his task, doesn't he think it is time to give the people of Montreal jobs and some real hope, and that a first step in this direction would be to get rid of the minister who is supposed to be responsible for employment in Montreal?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, once again it is clear that hon. members opposite are totally irresponsible, considering the fact that for over a year, they prevented Bill C-21 from being passed, legislation that would provide hundreds of millions of dollars for training and retraining. Today, those same members are complaining that workers are not able to adjust to the new technological jobs we have created, and I simply want to mention some recent measures taken by the federal government. We helped set up the training centre for the petrochemical industry. We helped establish the training centre for flat glass workers. We invested several million dollars in Canadair to update the stretch jet. We contributed $40 million to a—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the minister will want to continue at some other time.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for ACOA. Is the minister prepared today, as he suggested he might be yesterday, to identify or otherwise characterize those 12 Enterprise Cape Breton or ACOA supported projects that are under RCMP investigation, a fact that he revealed also yesterday?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I want to tell my colleague that I welcome his interest in helping the part of Canada that badly needs help, but I would hope his interest would be more constructive and less prurient.

I told him frankly in answer to a direct question that there were RCMP investigations. If I were to give him any more details, he would be the first one to condemn me for lack of giving these people and these organizations due process.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, of course I hope the minister realizes by failing to provide even minimal information, he leaves a cloud over a good many projects supported by ACOA.

My supplementary is that on May 10, 1990, when some very serious questions were raised about the ECB support for Technitread, which is also now under RCMP investigation, the minister said if there were a mistake made, he would take full responsibility for it. There have been a lot of mistakes made at ECB and at ACOA.

Is the minister now prepared to take the appropriate ministerial responsibility for those 12 RCMP investigations; for Nsc Diesel, Celcom, Universal Metals, Arrow LM, Hi Tech Woodworkers, Atlantic Defence Industries and for that salmon farm, all of which, it would seem to me, Madam Speaker, are serious mistakes?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): I wish my good friend would fuel his questions with less vitriol and adrenalin and little bit more logic. He must know, being a very erudite individual, that these particular instances are under investigation. They do require due process of law. As the president of ACOA pointed out yesterday, some 7,600 of these enterprises have succeeded with a great deal of economic benefit to a poor region of Canada.

If he wishes to kick the entrails of 12 that are in trouble, then that is up to him.

HOUSING

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing. The Toronto Star recently quoted Mayor Lastman of the city of North York as saying that he has not heard form the federal government any more on the Downsview housing initiative and that it does not appear to be working on it.

Has the federal government given up on its proposal to make more affordable housing available to people at Downsview?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, most certainly the federal government has not given up on that initiative. In fact, when the concept plan for housing on that particular site was completed, it became clear that the traffic capacity on the roads in the area was overburdened and that in order to solve that problem it was going to involve the de Havilland property.

• (1440)

Unfortunately, until we find a resolution to the ownership of Boeing for de Havilland, it is impossible to resolve the traffic problem in the area. However, talks are ongoing on a regular basis, in fact usually on a weekly basis, with the staff of the city of North York. It is very much on the go.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, why is five million square feet of office construction going ahead on Yonge Street but housing that is affordable cannot go ahead in Downsview?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, again I think the hon. member appreciates that there are a number of issues involved with this particular site.

One is sewers, which obviously is an aspect that involves the Yonge Street development and commercial development. Certainly that involves the Downsview property as well, but that is not the key to the Downsview property at the moment. The key is solving the traffic problems, and that depends on what is ongoing on the ownership of Boeing for the de Havilland site.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who will be aware of the incident at his offices in Port aux Basques yesterday.

I do not ask the minister to condone the vandalism; I certainly do not, but I do ask him not to blind himself to the real issue here, which is a desperate cry for help, for some attention, from the fishermen and plant workers whose only demand of the minister is that he let them go out there and catch fish and cut it.

He knows that he can solve this problem by a stroke of the pen, by making a simple paper transaction between two adjacent zones, between 4–R and 3–PN with respect to redfish. I ask the minister now: Would he agree to do that?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, maybe the hon. member does not condone these acts, and I do not either, but I would want the House to recall that last year, for example, the people in that very area were experiencing a similar problem.

This government funnelled over $3 million through the local IAS committee to look after the welfare of those people, so I do not see why it was necessary to resort to that kind of violent action yesterday to draw attention to the problem. I do not think it is necessary at all.

As for the question of whether we are going to take fish from 4–R and give it to 3–PN, he will recall that this minister gave these inshore fishermen double the quota of redfish in 4–RST.

Today I am being asked to take the fish away from Paul and give it to Pierre. No, I will not do that.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, first of all I say to the minister that it is not welfare these people want; it is some work.

It is his own diabolical agenda which has incited those people in the first place. He has refused for seven months to meet with them. He botched the opening of the winter fishery. He slapped on outrageous user fees at a time when they could not pay, and now he refuses to make a simple paper transaction.

Will he call off this deliberate campaign he has going against fishermen and plant workers, his cowardly intimidation and harassment of people whose only sin is that they would like to work?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it takes the tiny politician in the hon. member to try to score political points out of the misery of people. That is what he is doing.

Madam Speaker, a stroke of the pen. We are talking in Newfoundland, Labrador and all the rest of Atlantic Canada about a sustainable fishery. We have worked with these fishermen, these people; we keep working with them. They have asked us to enforce the rules. Now that the rules do not seem to fit a little tiny group, they want me to put all the rules aside.

I will not do that, and the member knows it. What he is asking me to do, what he does not want the people to acknowledge, what he does not want the people to know, is that we took the allowance.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

PORK PRODUCERS

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, in March 1987, Canadian pork producers were assured by the Prime Minister in this House of Commons that a free trade agreement with the United States would help Canadian farmers by increasing predictability and security of access of exports by the farm sector to United States markets.

Now, four years later, the United States is refusing to accept the January decision of the free trade dispute settling mechanism on Canadian pork exports.

Can the Minister for International Trade inform this House of the nature of the discussions between the Prime Minister and President Bush today on this most important matter?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the series of actions that we have taken together with Canadian pork producers in connection with pork has been an unparalleled example of success. We have been successful in the GATT panel with reference to this question. We have been successful with respect to a panel under the U.S.—Canada Free Trade Agreement.

Now, in desperation, the U.S. National Pork Producers Council has filed a petition asking United States trade representatives to establish an extraordinary challenge committee to review the panel's action. That is an act of desperation on its part. It is an extraordinary procedure the council is asking to be used which has not been used so far. It can only properly be used with respect to some misbehaviour of panel members. It is extremely unlikely, if the USTR gives permission for it to go forward, that it would be successful.

To date our record is unparalleled in the success we have had under the U.S.—Canada Free Trade Agreement in this important area.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, Canadian pork exported to the United States makes up about 3 per cent to 4 per cent of its total market, yet this harassment continues.

In 1987, Clayton Yeutter, told his colleagues that in the event of a dispute between the free trade agreement and U.S. trade remedy laws, the U.S. law shall prevail.

Can the minister assure this House that yet another panel review, article 1904 of the free trade agreement, will not be superseded by U.S. trade remedy laws?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, this is a matter that started, actually back before—

Mr. Peterson: Before Confederation.

Mr. Crosbie: No, not before Confederation; before Canada received enlightenment and we took over in 1984. This is a matter that started then.

Thank heaven we have the U.S. Canada—Free Trade Agreement, so we have the process we are now going through.

I can only say that when this whole process is through, $70 million will be coming back to Canadian pork producers and the value of the U.S.—Canada FTA will be proven beyond doubt for every member of this House.

ARCTIC NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

President Bush, as I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister knows, has endorsed plans to drill unlawfully for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. This is the last great tract of pristine land in the United States and is the calving ground for Canada's 180,000-strong porcupine caribou herd.

Since the United States energy secretary yesterday warned that the President will veto any attempts to protect the wildlife refuge, in particular the 10-02 lands, will the Deputy Prime Minister tell Canadians what steps he and the Prime Minister will be taking to drive home to President Bush that the drilling in the refuge will violate four international agreements with Canada and decimate one of the last great wild herds of mammals on earth?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member would know, the position of Canada on ANWR has been clearly stated a number of times, both from External Affairs as well as International Relations at the highest level.

Also the member should note that when the Secretary of Energy for the United States put forward his new national energy strategy, it was out of a long list of public hearings they had on how they could increase the domestic production of oil and gas. That is their position. Our position on ANWR has not changed from that stated previously.

HUDSON BAY MINING AND SMELTING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister. I gave him notice earlier today of this question.

The minister is aware of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting, which is the sixth largest source of sulphur dioxide emissions in Canada, over 250,000 tonnes in 1990, must start to modernize now in order to meet the Canadian SO_2 by 1994.

Will the minister confirm that the federal government will participate in the modernization plan through loan financing? While he is on his feet, will he also assure the communities and workers affected that the final decision will be made soon?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the courtesy he extended to me by giving me notice of this question.

The hon. member will know that there have been negotiations on HBMS for some period of time. It is in conjunction with what we are celebrating today, namely the accord that is being signed between our country and the United States. With the seven eastern provinces, including Manitoba in that configuration, we were party to reducing SO_2 emissions.

I can tell the hon. member from the federal point of view that we have concluded our negotiations. I believe the province of Manitoba has also accepted that and we have also conveyed that to HBMS. In fact, I have conveyed to the other two parties that whenever they are ready to sign the agreement we stand ready to sign it. I think we will do it literally within days if suitable dates can be found.

CSIS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General.

Will the minister tell the House why Ryszard Paszkowski of Edmonton was sent by CSIS to Rome during the summer of 1986?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would just like to remind my hon. colleague that he tabled an Order Paper Question to that effect, I believe on March 7 or 8, and it will be replied to at an appropriate time.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the Solicitor General should be aware that a government travel document was provided by CSIS to Paszkowski that summer. This has been documented by Richard Cleroux in his book Official Secrets.

My supplementary question is for the Acting Minister of Employment and Immigration. Excuse me for putting it in English.

Mr. Paszkowski's wife, Elzbieta, has recently been found, as the minister knows, to be a refugee in Canada. The minister's own department is seeking to expel him. Will the minister not intervene in this case to allow her husband who has rendered significant services, I believe, to CSIS, to remain in this country with his wife and son?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would just like to tell my hon. friend that if he knows the answer to the question I do not see why he is asking it, assuming that the information as to that travel document which he alleges is true. I will neither deny or confirm that.

With respect to the book to which he refers, I do not think it is my responsibility to become a literary critic. With respect to Mr. Paszkowski, as my hon. friend knows, SIRC has looked into the case of Mr. Paszkowski. In its report of 1987–88. SIRC said: "We satisfied ourselves that CSIS dealt properly with Mr. Paszkowski".

PENITENTIARIES

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Recent events at the prison at Renous involving Allan Legere have led to questions regarding security in our prisons. Allan Legere, the convicted murderer who escaped last year, has had unauthorized and unsupervised visits, and potentially dangerous metal objects were discovered.

What is the minister doing to resolve this dangerous situation and to reassure the people of New Brunswick?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Legere is not presently entitled, Madam Speaker, to any contact visits.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I am concerned about public safety and the citizens of New Brunswick are also concerned. They remember well when Legere escaped and was on the loose for six months. He is in familiar territory and he knows the guards and the people in that area.

Would the minister be willing to arrange for Legere to be moved to a special handling unit outside the Renous prison in another institution?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the security measures with respect to Mr. Legere have been reviewed, and all appropriate corrections have been taken.

EL SALVADOR

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade in his capacity as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

It concerns the recent election in El Salvador which according to OAS observers from Canada and elsewhere was marked by intimidation, threats and fraud.

In view of the latest allegations that the ARENA Party which controls the electoral council is trying to manipulate the election results to place the democratic convergence in fourth place despite its strong third place showing, will the minister assure the House that he will voice Canada's serious concern to the El Salvadoran authorities about this attempt to steal the apparent victory of the democratic opposition in these already very seriously flawed elections?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, with reference to the legislative and municipal elections in question which were held March 10, Canada dispatched eight official observers to the elections who were serving with the Organization of American States monitoring group.

They are going to report to the OAS, and we will have an opportunity to hear their views informally once they return from El Salvador.

In addition to the eight official observers, we had an unofficial observer in the person of the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina. He was down there as well. I do not see him back as yet, but we would be pleased to hear from him when he comes back.

At the present time, based on the heap of information we have, we cannot give a definitive reply. When we receive these reports from our observers, we will then make a considered opinion on this matter.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina who is in the region would be pleased to speak on behalf of the Government of Canada on this question, if he is authorized to do so.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robinson: Since January 15, when U.S. President George Bush released some $42.5 million in military aid to the brutal military authorities in El Salvador, death squads have killed and injured El Salvadorans in El Zapote and elsewhere. Troops have detained journalists and the offices of the newspaper Diario Latino were destroyed.

I want to ask the acting minister: Will the Prime Minister today, in his meeting with U.S. President George Bush, urge President Bush to stop funding this bloody military regime which has been responsible for over 70,000 deaths? Will he ensure that President George Bush's new world order includes at last a commitment to peace, democracy and justice for the people of El Salvador?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I by no means accept all the alleged statements of fact made by the hon. member.

We all do know that there is a very difficult situation in El Salvador and that this has been a very tragic situation for some at least eight or ten years now.

We are pleased that the governments of El Salvador and the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front are continuing peace negotiations, which we would certainly hope and urge could be concluded.

With respect to American policy in the area, that is a matter for the United States government to decide. I believe that today the President and the Prime Minister will be devoting their main efforts to discussing what the chances and prospects are for peaceful solutions in the gulf area in the Middle East. That will be the main thrust of their talks today.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In the House last week, Conservative, Liberal and New Democratic members supported my motion to include in the Canada Labour Code a provision for paid precautionary withdrawal from work for pregnant employees in federally-regulated businesses in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada.

Since the motion was introduced the Bloc Quebebois has not joined in this important debate.

My question to the minister: Can he tell us today that our concerns over that issue are under consideration and that the Canada Labour Code will be amended to promote the well-being of pregnant workers in Canada and Quebec?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I commend the member for Abitibi for his enduring concern and his relevant questions. I can assure him that since his representations we did refer the matter to a department committee made up of employers and employees. Once their report has been filed later this spring we intend to introduce the appropriate legislation in early fall.

DESIGNATION OF ALLOTTED DAY

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would like to designate tomorrow as an allotted day for the purpose of supply.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It contains 688 signatures, gathered in part by the Hamilton Baltic Crisis Committee.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to do two things; first, immediately recognize the legitimate democratically elected governments of Lithuania, Estonia and Latvia and establish diplomatic relations with them and second, demand that the Soviet Union withdraw all its military forces from the three Baltic republics.

GULF WAR

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition under Standing Order 36. The petition is in respect of the gulf war which of course is now over, but it seemed to me important that the views of those who had signed the petition be recorded in the records of this House and so I file it on their behalf. They had called for a cease-fire. I am sure that the effort they put into this, along with the effort of millions of other Canadians, has been taken into account by this House in its deliberations on this tragic war.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition which outlines the undue hardships of families that are trying to bring their spouses from India. It now takes three years to bring your spouse from India through immigration procedures.

The petitioners are urging the government to devise a system whereby in a bona fide marriage the spouse would be allowed enter Canada on a visitor's visa, pending the granting of landed immigrant status.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of people in my riding who are still hopeful that the government will come to its senses and rescind the goods and services tax.

CANADA POST

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my delight to present a petition signed by almost every single resident in the great community of Westwold, British Columbia, concerning the closure of their post office and urging the government to reconsider the closure. I am pleased to see that my good friend, the minister, is here and perhaps I should pass along this petition to his usual enthusiastic self.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops, British Columbia, and some of the communities in the North Thompson Valley.

The petitioners are asking the government to reconsider the decision to cut back on the quality of VIA Rail service and to not only improve VIA Rail service by having a more first rate passenger rail system but also to reinstate the main line route that was cut through the Canadian Rockies.

PARKING

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present which has been signed by hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of taxation data centre employees in Winnipeg. They are protesting the fact the Department of National Revenue has had a policy not to charge its employees for parking where the workplace is located a long distance from public transportation routes. The Department of National Revenue has in the past decided not to charge the employees of the Winnipeg District Taxation Centre for parking for this reason. The employees at the Winnipeg District Taxation Centre have been advised that the Department of National Revenue will begin charging employees for parking even though the centre is no closer to public transportation than before.

All these petitioners are calling upon Parliament to direct the Department of National Revenue to continue to not charge its employees at the Winnipeg District Taxation Centre for parking.

You might notice, Mr. Speaker, that this petition is worded in the past tense as if the parking charges have not already become fact. The fact is that employees are being charged for their parking and this petition is presented late because it took the clerk's office several months to determine whether the petition was in order or not. Therefore, I apologize to the employees for the length of time it took to present this petition and for the fact that they are already being charged for parking. But it had nothing to do with me, Mr. Speaker, it had to do with the quite lengthy, and I believe inappropriate, delay in determining whether this petition was presentable to the House or not.

POST OFFICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from constituents in the community of Port Alberni on Vancouver Island. These constituents are complaining about the constant number of what they call unwanted and unfair cutbacks in the postal service in that community.

As Mr. Speaker will know, the post office has been cutting back services in my constituency, closing down rural post offices at Royston and Coombs on central Vancouver Island, and my constituents would like to see the post office restore its customer services and act as if it wanted to stay in the business. They request that Canada Post Corporation be instructed to keep existing outlets, operate longer hours, expand revenue generating services, stop privatizing, and start increasing services to raise revenues.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to bring forward petitions asking the government to reconsider the position it has taken with GST on its printed material.

Obviously throughout history, printed material has never been taxed in this country and now, at this time, we are really hurting a lot of Canadians who are going to school and need printed material in order to educate themselves to enter the labour force.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On September 27, 1990 I put motion P-29 on the Order Paper to ask the government to follow up on my request to table in the House copies of all correspondence between His Excellency and Her Majesty the Queen concerning the operation of section 26 of the Constitution Act. I also have motion P-32 dating back to October 19, 1990 and asking for copies of all letters, documents and correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec concerning the deployment of Canadian Forces at Kahnawake and Kanesatake.

Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting for months. Does the government intend to respond and produce these documents, yes or no? That is a very simple question.

• (1510)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): These are Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers. We are presently on Questions on the Order Paper. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): I am aware that my colleague is getting impatient. As it happens, both these motions for the production of papers are still under consideration. I might point out to my colleague that since the opening of the session we did respond to 31 of 41 such motions, an average of 77 per cent.

I know that my colleague is still waiting for action on his two motions. They are under consideration.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make a similar point in regard to Notice of Motions for the Production of Papers. Is it the wish of the Chair that I wait until that item is called before raising the point?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues opposite will not appreciate this, but I ask that the notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on March 7, 1990, I tabled in the House a motion asking for an order of the House to issue a copy of the list of all the strip clubs and other establishments receiving funding from the Federal Business Development Bank since 1972. I want the government to answer this question, No. P-19.

Also, on item No. P-23, standing in my name, on March 28, 1990, I asked for a copy of all logs, registers and correspondence pertaining to the use of CN business cars by Mr. Brian Gallery for the years 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Speaker, I also want the government to tell us if it will answer item No. P–41 standing in my name. That is for the Canada Post Corporation to give us a list of all management personnel that have benefited from golf club memberships.

I want answers to those important questions, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Hudon: Mr. Speaker, I made a note of the representations of my colleague and I am sure the government will clarify the matter in the near future.

Motion No. P–19

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the current list of all companies, strip clubs and other similar establishments to have received funding or loans directly or indirectly from the Federal Business Development Bank since 1972.

Motion No. P–23

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all logs, registers, correspondence and reports pertaining to the use of CN business cars by Mr. Brian O'N. Gallery in 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990.

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of invoices or summaries of invoices outlining any or all expenses of the Canada Post Corporation in purchasing golf club memberships for its management, board of directors and employees, including the names of all persons benefiting from the expenditures in question.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to our rules, I would ask that all three of those items, the one in relation to CN business cars, the one in relation to strip clubs that have been financed by the government and the one in the relation to golf club memberships bought for Canada Post officials with public dollars, be transferred for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax) moved:

That this House call upon the Prime Minister to appoint a royal commission on violence against women.

She said: I rise today in support of this motion because the women of Canada are in crisis. It is unfortunate that it took the unmitigated tragedy of December 1989 in Montreal to bring to our attention the crisis facing Canadian women in the area of violence. In my party we call most strongly for the appointment of a royal commission on violence against women.

We are not alone in this call. We are supported by our colleagues to the left in the New Democratic Party. We are also supported by any number of women's groups, nationally, regionally and provincially, some of whom I will be speaking about later in my remarks.

I am going to go at this in a rather unusual way to begin, in that I am going to talk about the reasons against a royal commission.

One of the reasons most frequently cited since various women's groups and political parties have been calling for the establishment of such a commission has been the cost. There is no question when Canada is in a recession, when cutbacks are facing us all, that we all have to be concerned with the question of costs.

The second area with relation to costs has been raised again by a number of people. The cost of a royal commission would be better spent on direct services to women in crisis, to transition houses and so on.

Indeed, if I thought that kind of money would go in direct services, the kind of money it takes to run a royal commission, I might be briefly tempted to adhere to those beliefs myself. But it would be a brief temptation. I will go into the reason I say when I speak of the reasons for a royal commission.

But let me come up against some other criticisms. Frequently we hear that the reports of royal commissions are left to die on the shelves of libraries across the country. They gather dust or they are only partially implemented. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, that is true.

Just some royal commissions that have been left to this fate are the Cooke commission on child care in Canada, the Abella commission on employment equity, the Fraser commission on pornography and prostitution, and many, many sections of Senator Florence Bird's incredible and, if I may call it this, "the grandmother of royal commissions", the 1970 Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Royal commissions tend right now to be a bit in disfavour because of the Spicer Commission, which is irritating many Canadians because of what they see as amorphous and fuzzy national exercises in navel gazing. But a royal commission, constituted correctly, rooted in women's experience, with built-in guarantees can create the kind of action and the kind of success that we desperately need.

First of all, a royal commission on violence against women, before it is appointed, the Prime Minister and the government should engage in a wide consultation with front-line workers, with transition house staff, with sexual assault crisis centre workers, with women's centre workers, with police in those few municipalities with programs that truly identify problems and respond appropriately; and with academics in women's studies, sociology, anthropology, criminology and various other relevant departments.

I said that a number of women's groups, nation-wide, have been calling for the appointment of a royal commission on violence against women. Some of these groups are the YWCA of Canada, various advisory councils around the country, the Canadian Research Institution for the Advancement of Women and the Canadian Congress for Learning Opportunities for Women—just to name a few. They are calling for a royal commission, always provided that it is not a way to back-burner an issue that is facing us on a daily basis and threatening the lives of women.

The mandate of a royal commission must be to hear the experience of the victims, to determine empirically the incidence of violence against women. We suspect that as yet we cannot prove empirically that violence against women crosses all boundaries—economic, social, cultural and educational.

The royal commission must seek out the causes of violence against women. Is it related to alcohol and drug abuse? Is it stress related due to economic conditions? Is it rooted in the economic dependency of women? Is it rooted in the fact that women are, in general, physically weaker than men? Is there, indeed, one lowest common denominator, or are there a variety of indicators and triggers?

Yesterday at the Subcommittee on Violence Against Women, Dr. Eileen Sanders of Carleton University's School of Journalism spoke to us on violence in the media.

One of the things she told us was that the traditional areas of research are inadequate to deal with this problem. In other words, the all-pervasiveness of violence, and in particular violence against women, in our society does not necessarily respond to old-style cause and effect research projects. We must look at a broader base and a broader experience of women throughout the country and of those who work with women in crisis to give us at least the beginning of the answers we need to construct the solutions.

Can we predetermine indicators of violence and can we thus educate and violence-proof our children to break what has become a vicious cycle of abuse in our society?

Ever since the Montreal massacre, women across the country, and men too, have been galvanized—academics, professionals, housewives—asking why. Why is it that our country and western society in general, indeed world society, is faced with what is a plague of violent behaviour of men toward women? Women are asking, perhaps in the saddest voices of all, how do we protect ourselves and how does society help us protect ourselves, most terribly from those we love?

Random violence in the street is terrifying, but how much more terrifying is violence against women which, like its antithesis, charity, appears to begin and flourish at home. It is a fact that in this country women are beaten and murdered primarily by their partners. One suspects, and I say again, this is the problem, suspicion is not empirical proof that the increasing violence against women by strangers, Marc Lepine, date rape, street attacks, stem from societal attitudes.

Clearly, to some extent, if women and beaten and harassed at home, and as a society we do nothing constructive to combat this, then an insidious belief that the battering of women is inconsequential becomes de facto a part of our communal fabric. We need desperately to shine the harsh light of reality on this dark side of our society, on this dark side of too many people's daily lives.

Again, we believe that a royal commission, travelling nation-wide, hearing evidence nation-wide, can do this where lesser initiatives cannot.

Many women committed to ending this horror say that money spent on a royal commission, as I said before, would be better spent on direct services. Let me state now that I, and my colleagues in this party, men and women, have and will continue to plead for money for services. It is a national scandal that 50 per cent of the women and their children who seek help from transition houses must be turned away. Yes, 50 per cent. That is both disgraceful and terrifying.

Remember, this is not an either/or situation. We desperately need both. We need transition houses, but we also need the research, the education and the publicity that a royal commission can engender.

We know, for example, that the province of Ontario in the last several years put on an excellent ad campaign to raise awareness of the battery of women. Hosts of women in that province, encouraged by these ads, came forward to seek assistance. They were turned away because the money, the beds, the facilities just were not there.

We also know that as yet many judges and legislators and police still do not react correctly. Every lawyer and social worker in this House knows the answer to this one. Police in general do not respond to domestic disputes as they do to other complaints. I recall one incident when a battered wife who had a court order from the Chief Justice. She called me on the phone and said her husband was banging down her kitchen door with a baseball bat, that she had the police department on the other line and they were saying to her: "How do we know you have a court order". I called them, identified myself, told them of the court order, gave them the date and all the relevant information and they still refused to come.

Fortunately, that particular incident did not end in actual physical abuse. But, I ask all members of this House to imagine the psychological abuse that took place from that encounter. Imagine the kind of faith that woman would have in our system after that took place.

Too many judges sentence when a conviction is obtained inappropriately. We cannot forget, and it is again to our national shame, that in this country in the last two years we heard one judge call a pre-school female child sexually provocative. We heard another judge state that sexual assaults on native women were less serious because the women may have been drinking or sleeping in a public place. Another judge in the province of Ontario implied that an exotic dancer, the victim of a sexual assault, had by reason of her employment invited the assault and thus gave up her right to say no.

As a nation, we must act now to stem this tide of violence. Those bright, ambitious and non-traditional young women who died so tragically at École Polytechnique must be memorialized, but not by white roses, white ribbons or plaques, but by remedies.

We cannot restore their lives. We cannot return them to their families, to their beginning careers, to their friends, nor can we restore the lives of the other 119 women who died in 1989 in Canada at the hands of their partners.

The other day, in questioning the Prime Minister about the economic situation facing women in this country, he responded with a list of appointments made by the federal government of women to boards, commissions, to the courts and so on. I have applauded every one of those appointments, but that was not the issue. The issue is ostensibly economic and, I believe, inextricably wrapped up with the issue of violence is the position of women in our society.

I would like to respond to the Prime Minister with a few facts of my own from the Index on Canadian Women, published in December 1990.

We already know, we have heard it ad nauseam, that Statistics Canada reports that women still earn only 66 cents for every dollar earned by men, that Canadian women face a higher risk of being poor than men. The National Council of Welfare reports that in 1987, 57 per cent of single mothers lived below the poverty line and that 1,515,000 Canadian women lived in poverty. That was four years ago. We were not in a recession in 1987. How much worse are those figures today?

Statistics Canada figures for 1988 show a high proportion of women, 17.2 per cent, have less than a grade nine education, and that 84 per cent of Canadian women working outside the home are employed in service industries and concentrated in non-unionized, lower paying occupations.

In 1988, 28.2 per cent of female workers were clerical workers. In 1986, 1,001,340 clerical workers worked part-time or part-year and earned salaries that were below the national poverty level. Only 36 per cent of women covered by the Employment Equity Act earn over $27,500, compared to 80 per cent of men; 28 per cent of aboriginal women, compared to 72 per cent of aboriginal men; 38 per cent of disabled women, compared to 81 per cent of disabled men earn over this figure and 28 per cent of visible minority women, as compared to 73 per cent of visible minority men earn over this figure.

In 1989, three out of four Canadian women in prime child-bearing and raising age groups, 20 to 45, were in the labour force. Adequate child care has become less accessible rather than more accessible.

By 1989, there were 450,000 more pre-school children with mothers in the labour force without licensed child care than there were in 1979. In 1987, only 8 per cent of children with working mothers were cared for in licensed child care services.

One in four Canadian women are sexually abused at some time in their lives, half before they reach the age of 17. One in ten women are beaten by their male partners. In the last two years in Canada, over 100 women per year have been killed by their male partners.

Twenty years after the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, women are still not even close to being equal participants. Of the 167 recommendations made in that royal commission, only 55 have been implemented.

Last week I was accused of being negative. I guess I have to plead guilty to that. The truth is that the vast majority of Canadian women do not share in the Canadian dream. They live in poverty and work in job ghettos. They cannot move freely in our society. Every woman in this House as well as every woman watching this and every woman in this country, whether she admits it or not, is vulnerable to violence.

Project Haven and the recent initiatives announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare are well intentioned. I have no doubt of that, but they are criminally inadequate.

The workers on the front lines are themselves overworked, underpaid and subject to burnout from the enormity of the task they are attempting to perform.

Last week in response to a question, I was as I said, accused of being negative. Again, I say I plead guilty. The violence experienced by women in Canada is inextricably tied to economics, to discrimination on the basis of sex and to the failure of all governments to take meaningful action.

Yes, the country is burdened with a deficit. Yes, we must be sound fiscal managers. Yes, we must keep our house in order financially, but a government that preaches these truisms must also remove its blinkers. If women, who make up 52 per cent of our population, cannot enjoy basic security of the person, and if their government ignores their crisis, it does not seem to me to be much of a government.

We need immediate and concrete action. Groups across this country cry out for a royal commission on violence against women. We need to find answers, solutions and a resolution of the problem. If we ignore these cries, we do not deserve the title of representatives of the people.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I obviously know of the hon. member's interest in this subject.

I wonder if she has given any thought to ways in which provincial and territorial governments might be involved in a royal commission, being aware, as she indicated, that this is not an issue that the federal government alone can solve or deal with.

If as a result of some of the presentations she has heard at the standing committee she could give any advice in this area, it would be appreciated.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for her question.

One of the things that I think is very interesting is taking place in my province of Nova Scotia. It has been recommended and I hope it is taking place. We have not heard definitely yet on a response.

Debbie Forsythe Smith, president of the Nova Scotia Advisory Council on the Status of Women, has asked for a review. At the time that she asked for the review, there had been five murders with the same profile—women murdered by their partners—in under two years.

Tragically, there have been two more murders in the last month in the metropolitan area of Halifax—Dartmouth. Indeed, there was another one shortly after I spoke last week.

Deborah Forsythe Smith and her council have asked the Attorney General of Nova Scotia to set up a special review commission to look at these five murders in particular to try to find if there is a common denominator and if there are indicators that could give us some idea of how to anticipate and possibly prevent this kind of behaviour.

There was some comment by the Attorney General in Nova Scotia, but there has not yet been a final response. I would hope they would do that. I would see that as something that could feed very well into a royal commission in the sense that a royal commission, of course, does not just hold hearings, it also commissions reports and takes reports from whatever source. I would think that a report such as this in Nova Scotia would be invaluable.

I would also think that a response to the situation in Ontario, following that ad campaign, would be of great assistance as well, because a number of witnesses who have come to us at the committee talked about how particularly well done the Ontario ad campaign was. I had a very special feeling about that. A good friend of mine, an actress whom I had worked with, was one of the main actors in those ads. It was very moving, very compelling and communicated the thought well. As I say, the response from the people was overwhelming, but the facilities were not there. I would think the Ontario government could be of help.

A third response to that relates to the whole question of native women. When we had native women appearing before the committee several weeks ago, they talked about the special needs of native and northern women in this area. I think this is something to which we must be extremely sensitive and, indeed, it may well be that we discover what works for women in urban centres like Halifax, Toronto, Montreal and so on, will not work in rural Canada, will not work with native aboriginal women and will not work perhaps with immigrant women. That is why this royal commission must be rooted in women's experience to bring across, as Dr. Saunders, from Carleton, said yesterday, "a new form of research that really hits the problem".

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax gave a vibrant and compelling testimony in support of the motion put forward by the official opposition, the Liberal Party of Canada, which reads:

> That this House call upon the Prime Minister to appoint a Royal Commission on Violence Against Women.

I have here, on my desk, a huge file on the subject, Mr. Speaker. I have always taken an interest in this matter. In my riding, we have the Maison de l'Amitié, or friendship house, a shelter for battered women, and I have to admit that, even then, one shelter does not seem to be enough. I think we would need two of them.

I was impressed by the comment made by my colleague from Halifax who stated that 50 per cent of the women and their children who seek help cannot have or are denied access to shelters. I share her concern for the serious problems facing the million or so Canadian women and children who are abused every year by a spouse. I also agree with her that, in our career as members of Parliament, we have all seen various cases of cruel and even sadistic treatment, Mr. Speaker, inflicted upon too many women and children.

I have a question to ask the hon. member because she mentioned in her speech that perhaps we should consider broadening the mandate of this royal commission to include the effects of violence in order to prevent it and involving as many Canadians, men and women, in this much needed process.

[English]

I received, just in the last day or so, a letter from the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario. I think she is familiar with that organization. It concerns their desire to establish a royal commission on violence against women, to which they attach a long list of groups and organizations which support this proposal.

I just want to ask the member one question. In asking for a comprehensive study on the subject of violence, does she agree that we should at least involve as many Canadians as possible and that we want to prevent violence, not just deal with its consequences? Does she agree with this group of people, the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations, that it is imperative for us to address this system?

Ms. Clancy: I thank my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, for his comments.

Indeed I agree most strongly with the Ontario women teachers association. I am happy to say that its representatives have spoken to us and have been witnesses before the subcommittee on the status of women on the topic of violence against women.

They have as well in the province of Ontario, through the good offices of Ontario teachers, come up with a number of programs in the schools. This relates as well to the minister's question. This kind of program can be of tremendous value, shared across the country.

The creation of a royal commission can solve a problem that many of the front-line workers against violence against women have told us about, that is that there is no mechanism for them to communicate with each other at the moment. If persons working in a transition house in Nova Scotia could communicate with their colleagues in British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, and so on, it would be of invaluable assistance and the data collected would be tremendous. The exchange of programs such as the kind the Ontario teachers have come up with would be of great assistance to the Nova Scotia Teachers Union, B.C. teachers, and so on and so forth.

It is the need to pull all this material together, to pull together the kind of research that is necessary to get at this all-pervasive problem, that causes women such as those in the Ontario Women Teachers Federation and the other groups I have mentioned, such as the YWCAs and so on, to call for this commission.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Halifax for bringing this motion forward to the House of Commons. It is essential that we debate this issue.

We sit together on a subcommittee of health and welfare, the subcommittee on the status of women that is right now hearing witnesses on violence against women. We have been hearing various groups from across the country—transition home workers, teachers, some victims of violence themselves, and religious people working to provide assistance to women who are battered. We have heard from a cross-section of Canadian women on this issue.

What does the hon. friend feel is the underlying theme that we are hearing over and over again from these presentations? How would she respond to my concern about the systemic discrimination against women in our society and how that contributes toward the whole issue of violence against women?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby for her question.

That in a sense is the whole root and branch of the issue. We live in a society that is systemically discriminatory against women. Indeed, I look around this House right now and I count six women sitting in seats, duly elected, and I think: wow, are we ever lucky that we are here, because the odds were sure against us; all of us, no matter what party we belong to, and I think we all know it.

That is why I rhymed off all those horrific statistics that I mentioned before. The problem is that systemic discrimination against women is intrinsically economic. It is rooted in patriarchy and it is rooted, with the greatest of respect and affection to the vast majority of my male colleagues, in a lack of understanding on the part of the people who truly wield the power.

In the vast majority of cases, I think men do not really comprehend how deeply rooted discrimination against women is. It is so deeply rooted, it is so much a part of our society and the way we live, it is so utterly a part of their daily lives, that they cannot see the forest for the trees. Until those of us who are lucky enough to crash through these barriers and make our voices heard, make those voices loud enough and united enough to bring these issues home, we are still going to be voices crying in the wilderness.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would be the last one to cut off the hon. member, but her time has expired.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the chance to join in the debate on this issue this afternoon. It is very important that we debate an issue as fundamental to society as violence against women. It is an issue which I would hope members on all sides of the House are concerned about, care about, and are prepared to join in finding solutions.

While it is an issue that women have primarily brought to the public agenda and have brought to the public fore, it is absolutely essential that men understand and become involved in this issue. We need their co-operation and understanding, as my hon. colleague has just talked about, if we are to make some of the fundamental changes and attitudinal changes, in society which are going to enable us to one day eliminate violence against women.

Violence against women is not only physical violence when we talk about the issue at large. Physical violence is often the final result of many years or months of emotional abuse which many women suffer, whether it is in a marriage, another family situation, or with a partner with whom they are living. We have to understand that when we are talking about violence against women, we also have to include that kind of emotional, psychological abuse which many workers in this field that I have talked with say can often have more devastating long-term impacts on women because it so destroys their sense of self-esteem and self-worth that they do not find any way of getting out of those situations.

Physical abuse, yes. That is absolutely heinous in every way, but we have to find ways to address emotional abuse as well.

It is important to understand the statistics, to know just how grave this situation is across Canada. From the various studies and reports that we have been able to put together from Status of Women—and there has been a number of works done both in Canada and elsewhere—the most commonly known statistics at this time indicate that one in four women will be sexually assaulted at some time in her life, and that half of the sexual assaults will be perpetrated on women under the age of 17. That includes the issue of sexual abuse of female children, which is so appalling, and of teenage women as well.

Statistics show that one in ten women in Canada is assaulted by her husband or partner, and that half the women in Canada are afraid to go out after dark in their own neighbourhoods. Rightly or wrongly, that is the perception they have. I would imagine that all women in this House have felt that at certain times. I know I have in certain situations, certain cities that I have lived in. If I can't be as free as a man to go out and be able to participate in every aspect of society, that denies me my freedom and my equality.

We also know that one homicide in five in this country is a family violence homicide. Also, about 4 per cent of seniors now report being abused, which is a whole new issue. As violence against women was not talked about 20 years ago in the royal commission on the status of women, it is only in the last five years that the whole issue of abuse of seniors has really been talked about. That includes physical violence and also emotional abuse of seniors as well.

One study of disabled women found that almost half of disabled women had been sexually abused as children, that one in four were sexually assaulted as an adult, and that most of these women had been abused by their caretakers. We could rhyme off these statistics, but when we think of the devastation of the lives of these women behind these statistics, it gets pretty emotional as far as I am concerned. I am sure we have all known women who have been victims of violence. We have probably known the perpetrators as well in different instances.

My colleague mentioned aboriginal women. The statistics there are even more horrendous, some as high as eight out of ten aboriginal women have been sexually assaulted or have been physically abused at some time in their lives. And we know what that leads to.

It is not only the physical, the emotional harm that is done to women through violence. It leads to inequality. It is almost a chicken and egg situation: inequality that leads to the violence but violence then leads to inequality. It leads to the diminution of self-esteem, self-worth, and the ability of women then to get themselves out of situations. Without the kind of support that many women's organizations, shelters, and crisis lines across the country have provided, many of these women would continue to live in silence and terror. I think it has been only 18 years since the first women's shelter was opened in Canada. They have done an enormously important and successful job, and we all applaud those efforts.

Certainly the goal of federal and provincial governments everywhere has to be to work toward the achievement of equality of all citizens in our society. I guess I perceive Canadian society, despite the dark and gloomy statistics that I have just reported on violence, as being one of the most fortunate societies around the world. When I had the opportunity last fall to chair the Commonwealth Women's Affairs Ministers' meeting, in recognizing of most of the countries that we were dealing with around the Commonwealth we were indeed more fortunate in this country. We had the legal mechanisms. We had more economic and social equality than even some of our closest friends in countries like Australia. Yet we know there are ways to go. How do we work toward achieving that equality?

Certainly one way is by having women here in this House of Commons as role models and being able to speak out to show women across the country that it is possible for women to be involved in the decision-making processes of this country. We want to encourage that in every possible way, as I know all my colleagues do from whatever party they represent, that we need more women in this House of Commons, in legislatures and in municipal councils who understand and can raise these issues at every level.

Our Prime Minister quoted statistics the other day about the numbers of women in various government positions. I know in a sense that those are just numbers, but they are important because they are again showing women as role models. We see that women have now gone from 37 to 83 in judicial postings and that women now are holding judgeships at the federal level within our system and are having an influence. We have seen women assuming positions of responsibility in the Public Service at the deputy minister level. Women have increased from 7 to 24 as the heads of missions at the diplomatic level. All those kinds of examples are important because they too become role models.

When we look at the kind of initiatives that have been taken over these past few years to move toward economic equality, each one of those is a step and part of the road to progress of economic equality. Some might say that it has not been fast enough but always there is balance.

We have moved forward on employment equity. We have moved forward on pay equity. We have moved forward on changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act in areas such as maternity benefits. We have moved forward indeed on family violence.

Three years ago was the first time that a federal government initiated a family violence program with $40 million. As a result of that program we are seeing a lot of the action. We are seeing a lot of activity generated across the country, which is raising the voices of women and making people aware of this issue.

I was looking at a report on the funding that has been provided in the last four years. The types of projects are fascinating: everything from workshops in Stony Rapids, Saskatchewan on the prevention of family violence to the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. Obviously that is an area where police have to become more effective in their intervention work. The Provincial Advisory Council of Newfoundland has established an inter-agency commission to create a model of co-ordinated activity against family violence. There are projects in my home province of British Columbia dealing with disabled women. There have been 600 or 700 projects funded—some for a couple of thousand dollars, some for hundreds of thousands of dollars—as we work forward toward investigating areas of research, prevention, education and support services.

Obviously more needs to be done because still violence persists. We have only just started to skim the surface in our understanding. I do not think we have a full understanding of what it is that creates or triggers a male to become the batterer or assaulter. We know that statistics show about 85 per cent of violence against women is related to those in trust and about 15 per cent to those who are unknown to the women.

What is it? Is it frustration? Is it indeed the fact that women are perceived as both physically less equal and in some ways economically or psychologically less equal? There are all those kinds of issues. We know that there is a generational component to this as well. Both the abusers and those who are victims of abuse are more likely to continue that into the next generation. We have to find ways of breaking that cycle of violence within our society.

We know there is a need to review our laws. My colleague, the Minister of Justice, today in Vancouver made some announcements about some of the initiatives she will be taking in the criminal justice system to review our laws and to work with judges, the Solicitor General and law enforcement agencies to be more effective in dealing with family violence. This is all part of the new $136 million program that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced two weeks ago. I know he will be talking about that a little later.

We know there has been a lot done in education. The program in Ontario was mentioned. I agree that was an excellent program. The province of Quebec has undertaken education programs, the province of British Columbia has as well. Yukon territory has just announced a fascinating new policy dealing with family violence. It is probably the most comprehensive policy statement I have seen in this country and deals with all facets of it. Those kinds of initiatives at provincial and territorial levels are very important.

We need education of our young people. The Canadian Teachers Federation project "Thumbs Down" will take into the schools programs to help children right from kindergarten all the way up to understand the root causes of violence, to deal themselves with how they might react in violent situations, to be able to say no, and to understand that violence is not acceptable in our society. That is an important part of the whole puzzle we are dealing with as well.

My federal and provincial colleagues, including myself as Minister responsible for the Status of Women, last May produced what we called The Lake Louise Declaration on Family Violence, in which we have agreed to work together to develop a national strategy. Our officials have been working on that. We are planning to bring it forward later this spring when we meet again in Newfoundland and to find ways to co-ordinate our efforts so that at the federal, provincial and territorial levels we will try not to duplicate or overlap our efforts and to see what are the gaps.

We have just recently commissioned through Status of Women Linda MacLeod, one of the foremost experts in this country on family violence, to do a review for us, a kind of a pre-study to indicate what in her opinion are the gaps in terms of research and what are the mechanisms we should be looking at to move forward.

I do not think there is any doubt in my mind or in the minds of anyone in this House that we need mechanisms to move forward in our understanding of this issue. I would ask my colleagues who sit on the subcommittee on the status of women and are examining this issue to give us their advice on the kinds of mechanisms that are most appropriate. If we are talking about a royal commission, I worked for a royal commission for four years so I have a somewhat jaundiced view in that I do not think four years is necessary to get on with some of the actions required.

We need innovative approaches, whether it is through a royal commission or other kinds of mechanisms, to reach out to women; not just sitting around hotel rooms and having regular hearings but mechanism by which we can actually find out from women what their experiences are and be able to make women feel comfortable in relaying those kinds of experiences to some kind of initiative that might help us understand the issue as well.

Obviously what I would like to see is something that is cost effective, that does not duplicate what is already being done, and that can help us move forward, maybe on a step-by-step basis. I would like to see something for which we do not have to wait until the end to finally have action. I would like to see us not have to set up whole new infrastructures to deal with an issue where there are perhaps some existing infrastructures through the National Advisory Council or groups like that, where we might be able to do things more effectively and perhaps from a feminist point of view and not just copy-cat what has been done in the past, but think creatively of how we can address this issue most effectively in the future.

We need a focus on research. I have met with the Canadian Association of University Teachers on some of their proposals for centres of excellence. They are working now with the Social Science and Humanities Research Council on those. We have existing groups out there that I think we could bring together.

As I indicated, because many of the things that need to be done in terms of service delivery, fall primarily within the jurisdiction of the provinces, we obviously need their involvement, co-operation and support. There is no sense spending time and putting forward recommendations when there is no one there to pick them up and run with them. As I mentioned, the province of British Columbia has just recently set up a task force on family violence. The province of Manitoba is doing some work in that area as well, and as colleague mentioned, the province of Nova Scotia is also active in that area.

Maybe we can find a way of linking all these activities together so they are not all going off separately and ensuring that again we are not overlapping, not duplicating, but we are trying to get to the real core of the subject.

When thinking about some of the things that need to be done—and I do not pretend to be an expert; I do not imagine any of us are experts in this field— and from my own experiences of talking to women who are both victims of violence and those who work with women at the grass roots level, many of them have said to me that we really have to do more with our young people, that is the age we really have to start addressing on this issue.

I feel more needs to be done with the media. So many of the messages our children get about the values of our society and on issues of equality of men and women, or on issues of violence, come from the media. Surely there are some ways we can bring the media together, to be involved in helping us to deal with these issues.

I am sure my hon. colleagues know these same stories, and it is not only from a personal point of view and my daughter's point of view, but others that I meet, there is something that seems to happen often to young girls between the ages of 12 and 14 that somehow their sights become diminished and from that stage on there is a transition where. often their own sense of equality changes. How do we get to young women at that age, to stop that from happening? The editorial in this month's Chatelaine deals with that issue and I think is a very interesting comment as well.

So we have to deal with our young people if we are going to look at education and prevention. We also have to look at whether there are really effective measures that we can take to deal with abusers or potential abusers. The jury is still out. I have heard reports both ways, as to whether some of the rehabilitation programs are effective or not. Some seem to be, some do not seem to be. Again, if we are going to deal with this issue with our present population, we have to find out what it is that works, that can trigger a change in behaviour among abusers or potential abusers.

So the challenge is there. It is a challenge for us all to work on. I am delighted with the work that my colleagues are doing, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, through Indian Affairs, $36 million that will be made available for aboriginal communities to decide for themselves how they want to deal with the issue of violence within their communities, both child sexual abuse and family violence. I know they have welcomed that, and we can use these resources over the next four years to take some significant steps forward.

I also welcome other ideas and suggestions of mechanisms by which we can develop our understanding and do it effectively without stalling on the progress that needs to be made.

Neither I nor any of the women here want to be sitting here four years from now, as I am sure we all shall be, and feel that we have not made any substantial progress.

So I would ask all colleagues to join together so that we can say, as a Canadian society, no to violence against women, that it is not acceptable in our society and that we can work together to change the attitudes, the causes and put in place those measures that can truly ensure that Canada is a place where women can be truly free and truly equal and free from violence.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, family violence is a social problem. It is the outward sign of some attitudes, such as sexism, ageism, and tolerance toward violence.

No social group, no socio-economic group, no culture and no region is safe from family violence. It is a challenge to our traditional approach with regard to prevention, protection, and treatment.

Assistance programs for the victims involve several service networks and institutions. Twenty years after the last public inquiry on this issue, we must all work together, Madam Speaker, because of the complex needs and different cultural backgrounds of the victims.

[English]

Those words are from the government's own document on family violence. If the minister really believes that, knowing our cultural communities, our adverse and diverse cultures today, a lot of violence is propagated there, how can you say that we are prepared to just go at it without having someone study the situation? Then we may be able to shame those that need the help and the communities that have to give the help into doing something about it.

Mrs. Collins: I will respond to the hon. member and say, yes, indeed. I think it is very important for the public to understand that violence against women knows no economic bounds. Sometimes people think, well that only happens to poor women. That is not true. I know in my own region that the women who go to clinics are often professional women living with professional husbands.

It does not necessarily relate to one's socioeconomic background. Certainly in terms of the different ethnic communities in our country, one of the things we do know is that many of the women in those communities have been more afraid of coming out. Many of them have come from a culture where violence perhaps has been tolerated, are not aware that in our society it is not tolerated and are not aware of the services that are available. It has been good to see, for example, the province of Ontario's program. All of their materials are being made available in a number of languages so that they, hopefully, can get into those places in the community where women can access them.

A lot of research has been done. I would want to say to the hon. member that if she looks through the listing of studies and research that have been done in universities and by other organizations, a lot of work has been done and a lot is known. I am not sure it has all been put together and integrated in some way that enables us to be most effective. That is why, as I mentioned earlier, we have asked Linda McLeod, who is one of the experts in this field, to help us with this process over the next month or so, and we might have a better understanding at Status of Women of where we should go next. We do not want to spend money uselessly on research that has already been undertaken.

There obviously are areas where research is required and probably areas where it would not be that helpful. We have to be able to use our resources effectively to find the answers that are still unknown.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): It is really interesting to sit today and listen to the member for Halifax and the minister who is from my province of British Columbia.

As I sat here, I could not help but wonder: If the positions were reversed, if women had the majority of seats in this House of Commons and if men were only 14 per cent of the members of the House, perhaps this issue would get the full attention that it needs. I just had to say that.

I listened to the minister carefully. She talked about the chicken and egg scenario and the evidence was not clear on whether violence leads to inequality or whether it is the inequality that leads to violence. I believe very clearly that is the inequality, the sexism and the misogyny that we see in our society that extends itself to violence against women. I would like her to kind of expand on the either/or statement that she made.

The other comment that I have is that the minister talked about the 14 per cent of us who are here in this place being role models for other Canadian women. I do not want to be a role model any more. My mother had role models. She had Agnes MacPhail and Grace MacInnis. I had role models. I had Pauline Jewett and Margaret Mitchell. Darn it, it is time that we no longer look for role models, but we look for equality in society where women participate in every sector of our society on an equal and just basis.

Mrs. Collins: I think the reality is that, as young people grow up, they do need role models. That is not necessarily sexist. It is in all aspects of life. They look to adults as role models. As we know, back in the 1940s and 1950s the only roles that women were playing were homemakers. That was the kind of role that they anticipated they would play.

Men need role models, too. It would be nice to have a lot more. I know that all my hon. colleagues would work towards that end. It is still going to be a while.

In terms of which leads to which, I think there is both. I have known women who I would have perceived felt totally equal in all sorts of ways and yet, as a result of violence that was perpetrated, it was so demoralizing and created such a terrible trauma that they were not able to operate continuously in that manner.

It can have that effect individually on women as well, particularly as I mentioned, the kind of emotional abuse to which many women are subjected. A young women, through her teenage life and then enters into a marriage supposedly thinking it is all going to be wonderful, finds out that the partner is the kind of person who is constantly putting her down. Nothing is right. The house is not clean. The supper is not ready. These things may sound trivial, in a way. Finally, they just bear down on someone who is constantly being criticized.

I think one thing we tend to do in our society is criticize people too much. As young women, as teenagers they are constantly being criticized. If someone is always being criticized it is very difficult to develop one's own sense of self-worth.

I might extrapolate that to this Chamber. If we did not criticize each other as much as my hon. colleague from Rosedale said last week, maybe we could move on in a much more positive way for the improvement of all members of society as a whole.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, want to make a couple of comments and put a question to the hon. member.

The disadvantage of following the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby is that she took the words right out of my mouth. I was going to say that until such time as there are more women in this House, equality will never be there.

I made a comment when I was speaking on the abortion issue earlier this year about how if men were able to conceive, we would never even discuss an abortion bill. I think it is the case that if men were on the receiving end of the majority of violence today, the laws punishing the offenders would be much stricter than they are. I think it is a shame that sometimes men who commit violence against women are not given enough time in jail to reflect on their offences.

I just wanted to ask, and this may seem like an unfair question to the member, because I am not sure whether she was as member at the time, but some years ago in the House one of the members—the party really does not matter, but it was the party that this hon. minister belongs to—one of the members committed spousal assault and was convicted of that spousal assault. However, I do not think strong enough measures were taken to ensure that this member would understand the feelings against spousal assault. I wonder whether she would be willing to entertain, and I think most people would, that a member of the House should be evicted or ousted who commits spousal assault or violence against women?

Mrs. Collins: I think there are mechanisms in the House by which the House manages its own affairs and so it would be inappropriate I think as a minister to be commenting on that.

I would like to comment on your earlier point though, because we do not have as many women in the House as we would like. We have to ensure that the men in the House understand and appreciate the issues that we were talking about. Perhaps there is a special burden on the men in the House to really take the time to make sure that they get out in their communities and visit the shelters, visit the women's centres, talk to women who are victims and show that as male members of Parliament they are as committed to dealing with this issue both in your personal behaviour and in your behaviour as a member of Parliament and are committed to coming back to the House to support us as women in our efforts to eradicate violence in Canadian society.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, in 1989, 119 women were murdered in domestic violence. Wife battering is a national disgrace. It is epidemic. Two and a half million Canadian women are beaten by their male partners and in many ways society closes its eyes.

Just over a year ago on December 6, 1989, one man gunned down 14 young women at the École Polytechnique in Montreal and the country was in shock. Journalists, commentators, politicians all tried to make sense out of this horror. But few could accept the fact that he killed these young women simply because they were women, women he targeted as feminists. How many Canadians know that more women were killed by their male partners in 1990 in Montreal than were murdered at the École Polytechnique?

There is an urgent need to balance programs that treat today's violence with programs that prevent future tragedy. Women and children are in danger now. Transition houses, aggressive charging practices, counselling of victims and offenders all recognize the problem, yet they are not enough. They treat the result of violence, but they do not challenge the root of violence in our society, violence against women and children.

Prevention is an overwhelming challenge. We have heard it spoken about here today on both sides of the House. It is a massive challenge for our society. But violence against women is endemic in our culture.

Sexism and misogyny exist in newspapers, videos, rock videos, films, newspapers, ads, virtually everywhere. The images that our society sees on a daily basis are images that include violence against women.

Violence against women is the horrible extension of sexism in our society. It is sexism and misogyny taken to its worst degree, this most horrific degree and it is increasing.

Concentration on intervention alone marginalizes the victims. We have all heard the line: They deserved it; they should have left; they should never have married a man like that—and on and on it goes.

Yet we know that it is not a marginal problem. Conservative estimates tell us that one in 10 Canadian women in Canada today are beaten by their male partners. One in four women or girls are sexually assaulted. In 1988 15 per cent of all Canadian homicide victims were women killed by their male partners.

In 1988, according to the Canadian Centre for Justice statistics, 75,921 men were charged with assault, including wife abuse.

In 1987, the Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General reported 16,282 domestic assaults, and in 93.5 per cent of those assaults, those charged were male.

One of every two women and her children are turned away from transition houses in Canada because of a lack of space. Where do they go? Where do they end up? We know that the rate is even higher in some sections of this country. That is the national rate.

Women still earn on average 65 cents on every dollar that men earn, and we know that that wage gap has widened in the last two years. It was 66 cents, it has got worse. We are not making the kinds of economic gains for women that we know are so necessary and we know are part of the root of all of this problem of inequality and women's sense of powerlessness in our society.

Yet this government refuses to take strong and effective action on the issue of violence against women. Last month the government announced $136 million over four years for a family violence initiative. This means $15 million will be spent in the year 1991–92; $34 million in 1992–93; and the remainder allocated for after the term of this government ends.

But the real priorities of the government are revealed in their budget that was released a couple of weeks ago; a continuation of the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, a decapitation of the Canada Assistance Plan, which is the federal–provincial funding mechanism that currently funds shelters for battered women, counselling for both victims and abusers, sexual assault centres, child care spaces, child welfare services. All were funded under the Canada Assistance Plan.

It seems that this government gives a drop in the bucket to the women of Canada one day and then empties the bucket a day or so later.

It is clear what is needed. We must increase shelter spaces and second-stage housing for battered women. We must provide funding to regional associations of battered women's houses so that these people can communicate and get the message out and understand what is going on in their communities and how it relates to the situation in other parts of Canada.

We need a comprehensive education program which includes mandatory gender sensitivity training for judges and for police forces and all of our judiciary.

We need flexible community-based programs for our rural areas.

We must recognize our multicultural diversity in this area. We must recognize it when we are providing programs and these programs must be developed in consultation with those communities. We must combat violence in the media. The minister spoke earlier of violence in the media. We know that the Ontario native women's association tells us that eight out of ten native women are battered. This is horrific. We must listen to native women and we must act. I acknowledge that the program introduced by the government does give an opportunity for the native people themselves to have input into that program.

I sit on the status of women subcommittee of the standing committee on health and welfare. I wish that the status of women committee were a standing committee, as it was in past Parliaments. It is not now; it is a subcommittee. We are now conducting hearings on violence against women. We have listened. We have listened to women from shelters for battered women; we have listened to women in the Canadian Teachers Association who have produced a great resource called "Thumbs Down", a classroom response toward violence against women. We have listened to the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario which has also put out a document and a newsletter outlining all of the problems and concerns. Things are happening at the educational level of young people in our society. The professional associations are taking their responsibilities seriously on the issue of violence against women and working toward dealing with it in an educational sense in the classrooms.

We talk about the statistics in the House, and all of us who have spoken today on this issue have raised the statistics. While sitting in that committee room, I heard individual women from every region of the country tell us the same things. The women who work in the transition homes virtually said the same things. When the women from British Columbia spoke, they were surprised when we told them that the women from the Atlantic region had said the same thing or that the women from Ontario had said the same thing: that they were experiencing second generation abuse of families, and that they were both experiencing the same kinds of needs and seeing the same kinds of problems.

I think virtually all of the organizations that appeared before the subcommittee called for a royal commission on violence against women. I support their call for a royal commission. I support it wholeheartedly, and the New Democratic Party supports it. We also called for a royal commission on violence against women some time ago.

It must be more than simply a public relations exercise. It cannot exist at a cost to essential services, some of the services that I have already talked about: shelters for battered women, counselling, educational services. And it most of all cannot be an excuse for lack of action.

It must be mandated to explore all aspects of violence against women, including the systemic causes of sexism in our society. It must deal with the issue of economics and the fact that women are not equal economic partners in our society, and that much of the violence against women results from this inequality. The commission must be made up of professionals and workers who deal with violence against women, who understand the issues surrounding violence against women, and it should also be made up of women who themselves have been victims of this violence. I think that the commission should be at least 50 per cent female.

I am pleased to support this call for a royal commission. I would urge the government to take this call seriously, which has grassroots support right across Canada. We do know that the Royal Commission on the Status of Women which was held some 20 years ago did serve a purpose. It pulled Canadian women together. I remember when that commission was being held, as a young woman in Vancouver, who was at home with three young children and whose own consciousness around these issues had not been raised at that point.

I remember hearing about this commission that was travelling across the country and the issues they were raising that were of concern to women. I think we can achieve the same kinds of educational benefits from a royal commission on violence against women.

The minister spoke of educating and encouraging males in our society, in our House of Commons, to take on this issue, to understand this issue and take some responsibility for finding a solution in our society for violence against women and children. I think that a royal commission would serve that purpose. I think it would be a wonderful educational tool. It would travel to every section of Canada and listen to women's voices, listen to the women who work in the field and educate the men in our society as well about the horrors of violence against women and just how much, in real terms, it costs our society in every way.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member. I know she has been a very active participant in the subcommittee dealing with this issue. As I mentioned, we will look forward to its report which I hope will give some definition to the specific areas it thinks require further study.

I just want to make one comment. The member, in her statement, indicated that the CAP payments through which much of the money flows for support of shelters had been cut. I just like to remind the hon. member that, indeed, is not correct. CAP payments have not been cut. They continue to grow. In the wealthy provinces of Ontario and Alberta and British Columbia, they continue to grow at 5 per cent, and in the other provinces continue their full growth. So, I would not see that should have any impact on the provinces' ability to continue their funding, as I would certainly encourage them to do.

The question I have for my colleague has to do with something I read in the paper this morning and I was really quite shocked. I am sure that my colleague is as well. In the NDP government in the province of Ontario, the consumer affairs minister, as I understand it, who last week posed as a "Sunshine Boy", is now purported to have an assistant who, indeed, had been charged and convicted of wife battering and is now working as a special advisor dealing with sexism in advertising.

My hon. colleague talked about advertising and the media being a very important area where we have to root out sexism, so I am wondering what advice she is giving to her colleagues at Queen's Parks, on something which I was really shocked about. Perhaps, it goes to prove the point that violence against women exists not only in every sector of society, but within every political part of society as well. I wonder if my colleague could comment on that.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, the minister spoke about the Canada Assistance Plan, CAP, for the three wealthiest provinces, as she said. I would remind the minister that 46 per cent of the poor in Canada live in those three provinces.

The minister comes from the same province I do. She is familiar with the actions of the premier of British Columbia, Mr. Vander Zalm. She knows what is going on in British Columbia right now as that government disintegrates right before our very eyes. She knows what his position has been on the equality of women in society. If she is relying on the faith of Bill Vander Zalm to provide those shelters and to provide child care spaces, I would say she is sadly, sadly naive, because he is not going to do it and I think the minister knows that well.

She mentioned a situation that happened recently in Ontario where we saw the foolishness of a minister in the Ontario government posing as a "Sunshine Boy". It seemed very foolish to me. I agree with her.

The issue around his assistant or adviser, I think, is a much more serious issue. I think it was a very inappropriate appointment. I understand that Mr. Grimaldi has been removed from that position. I commend the Rae government for taking action quickly. I am not embarrassed to admit that New Democrats sometimes show poor judgement as well.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment both the mover of the motion and particularly my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby, the women's critic in our party. Certainly we have heard from all the speakers who have spoken so far of the need for the men in this Chamber and in the political system to grasp the issues that are at stake here and to get involved in these issues behind the 14 per cent of MPs who are women in this House.

Certainly the member needs to be credited by all women in our society and certainly by all of us who are interested in these issues for the role she has played not only within our caucus, but within the debate in Canada on these issues. I compliment her for making more of us aware of this issue in a much more constructive kind of way than many of us had been before.

There are two particular issues that I would like to raise with my colleague. First, she mentioned the economic factors that are involved. I would like to point out to her that in my constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River, the federal government through the Department of Indian Affairs pays family assistance in a community like Fond du Lac at about the level of $450 for a family of four.

Unfortunately, the economic circumstances are such that many people are on social assistance. The traditional economic base has eroded, as many people know. It is not the fault of those women and children living on that amount. The government recognized that in part and raised it another $100, I believe, to about $550 because of the isolation.

However, there has been a study which indicates that it costs $950 in those communities just to feed a family of four in accordance with the Canada food rules, and all they get is $550. They are $400 a month short and that puts all kinds of pressure on those families. It causes family breakdowns, people moving to the cities and so on. It is strictly an economic matter that we are looking at.

In those communities they certainly welcomed the new initiative on family violence in Indian communities. However, we have a serious problem in that because of isolation and historic factors of one sort or another, it is very difficult to organize in those communities. You need to have proposals; you have to be able to deal with government bureaucracy. In a lot of these cases the kind of support to women that exists in many of the other communities and urban centres does not exist for these people.

We are talking here about people who not only face a gender problem, but also a race problem and a regional problem. I invite my colleague to address that question.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question and his comments, particularly the one about the purpose I have served in our caucus, perhaps, of heightening the consciousness of some of my male colleagues in my own caucus. I appreciate that.

My colleague talks about a situation for rural women and native women in our society and outlined, I think very clearly, just what some women in Canada are up against, and how difficult it is in rural areas of Canada to provide these kinds of services and to get the community together in order to do that.

I think it is very important that when we are dealing with violence against native women in our society, as I said in my remarks, native women themselves must have some control over the programs that are offered, over the way the transition home they want to start, or is started, operates.

I would point out too that economics, in my view, the fact that the gender gap in wages is widening, the fact that welfare rates in our country have not kept pace with inflation, has continued to serve to keep women down in these positions in our society.

In Vancouver there was a food bank established only for women and children. I think that is really a damning indication of what is happening to women and children in our society; a food bank simply, and only for, women and children.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The next two are 10 minutes, plus five minutes questions and comments.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today compels me to speak to a subject that is painful, one that should not even be on this government's agenda in 1991 and should have ceased to exist years ago. I am referring to violence against women.

I know there are programs. I realize the federal government has just announced it will spend $136 million on measures to deal with family violence. However, I fail to understand how we could have let the situation become what it is today.

Mr. Speaker, violence against women has become almost common place. This is unacceptable. Unfortunately, respect for women is far from a foregone conclusion in any country.

Women represent half the world's population and work two thirds of all hours worked. They also constitute the largest group of poor, exploited individuals. One wonders how women an still be neglected to that extent in a world that claims to be increasingly civilized, a world that is exploring the outer edges of the universe.

Today, one would almost think technology seems more important than the basic well-being of human beings, especially human beings of the female sex.

Mr. Speaker, violence against women, which includes assault, mutilation, murder, infanticide, rape and criminal negligence, is probably the most widespread human rights issue but also the one that gets the least recognition. Why? Because it is so disturbing.

Each year in Canada, one woman out of eight at least—that is more than one million Canadian women—are abused by the man they live with. Women are victims of violence on the sole basis of their sex, and that remains a major obstacle to human growth. Unfortunately, too many women are considered as mere objects: luxury items, baby machines, domestics. If it sounds appalling, too bad! The fact remains that such is reality in this great country of ours. It is a fact of every day life for too many women.

Mr. Speaker, spousal abuse can take many forms. Women can be physically or sexually assaulted, emotionally and psychologically intimidated, degraded, deprived or exploited by their partners. Violence can leave not only visible marks on the body but also invisible emotional and psychological scars. The victim can feel terrorized, depressed, humiliated, desperate, shamed, abandoned and anxious.

Sadly, spousal abuse is an integral part of the Canadian society. It has become imperative that governments at all levels get involved to ensure the protection of Canadian women of all walks of life. They must get involved. No one must be allowed to abuse women in any way in Canada.

The federal government must relentlessly emphasize the greater welfare of the population. It must keep providing assistance to women groups, community organizations and front-line workers so that this problem can be eradicated by the end of the century.

Every woman must be allowed to play her role to the fullest in our society. Women must be allowed their dignity. The problem of spousal abuse must be dealt with urgently because, too often, it leads to family violence.

[English]

The campus reality is another area we must seriously look at. The use of sexist language in the classroom and educational materials, sexist articles in papers, demeaning graffiti, sexual harassment and assault are all part of a vicious circle of attitudes and actions that send the wrong message about gender relations, at the expense of women. Why is it that some examples of sexism and violence against women on Canadian campuses make it into the news? Why do so many go unreported? What does this say of our society?

In most cases, after a headline everything is forgotten. In general, professors and the administration have done nothing to prevent or respond to sexism and violence against women. Things must change.

Slowly a few institutions are establishing sexual harassment policies and committees. It is a beginning, but it is only a beginning. It will not be able to go very far without financial assistance.

Federal and provincial governments have repeatedly cut back in funding for the operation of our universities and colleges. The federal budget announced this week continued this trend by extending the freeze on transfer payments to the provinces for health and education. In an already strained system campus initiatives to better the status of women will undoubtedly be among the first to be cut.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, battered and raped women need support and medical care. Funds are lacking. The government must respond to the urgent needs of such a large number of its citizens. Violence can only breed violence. Is this the future that we want to give our youth? Is this the vision of man that we want to give our daughters? No, Mr. Speaker. We must rethink our structures and, particularly, our priorities. We must consider these women who are at the roots of this country. They must be able to live without fear, without shame.

Poverty, misery, unemployment, illiteracy, these are all evils that can only increase the anger, the assaults, the rapes. It is unacceptable. We must put social problems at the top of this government agenda. We must give back to Canadian women their position in this society.

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the problem cannot be solved by legislation or by a government program, but the federal government must show leadership. It must mobilize and help fund those who are ready to make changes. It must show Canadian women that it takes the problem seriously, but particularly, that it really wants to solve it.

A Royal Commission on Violence Against Women could be a welcome gesture and a sign of goodwill from this government. It has already been 20 years. It is time to re-examine the situation today.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this evil must disappear so that every woman can regain her dignity and live with pride.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Saint-Laurent for a very thoughtful and sensitive speech on the motion before the House today, that this House call upon the Prime Minister to appoint a royal commission on violence against women.

I have a couple of questions which I think I can roll into one. A recent release of Amnesty International's report called Women on the Front Line outlines extreme violence against women's human rights. I wonder if the member could comment on whether this should be the mandate also of the royal commission, which would include discussion about the role Canada could play in the international community to combat violence against women.

Second, in speaking with a former colleague of mine from Saskatchewan, there is an increase in family violence in that province due to the horrible state of the farm economy. This is probably due to the high interest rates, the GATT issues, and all kinds of things like the weather. Many farms are going bankrupt and wife battering, child abuse and suicide are certainly on the increase in the farm community. The issue is that there is no place for women to go. Farm women and children are isolated even from their closest neighbour. There could be many miles between them. It is very difficult to keep track of the types of abuse that are going on in this situation. As I mentioned, most farmers cannot even see each other's houses and programs are not readily available for these women.

I am wondering if the royal commission could also look at ways to better provide services to the people of rural Canada. Will it be looking at putting in place a better system of tracking violence against women in the situation I have just asked about?

I would like a response to these questions.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Nepean. When we are talking about a royal commission and about what Canada can do in the international community, I would be tempted to say that we have to start in our own community.

How can we possibly advise anyone in the international community? How can we possibly complain or criticize what is going on elsewhere when we have not been able to look at what is going on in our country?

Twenty years is a long time. Canada has changed a great deal in the last 20 years. I think we should be in a position to look at the international community as it touches violence against women, but first of all I would like us to look at our community.

I beg the ministers, since they are both here, to do something about this issue and to stop using bits and dregs of information that is out there. An in depth study has not been done with our cultural communities, and that is where a high level of violence is found.

I do not have any answers for families living in the western part of Canada, but I do know one thing. Coincidentally the member for Hamilton Mountain gave me her figures on increases in violence, in sex offences, and in assault. In 1987 the figures in just one Canadian city show 37 sexual assaults. In 1989, 536 in the same city and it is increasing. Normal assaults, which are not absolutely classified as sexual assaults, have probably increased in the same proportion.

This is why we need someone to work on this problem. Even though I realize the money has been given, we need to know where it could really be put to best use.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I too am delighted to speak to the motion brought forward by my colleague from Halifax.

In part the motion reads:

> That this House call upon the Prime Minister to appoint a royal commission on violence against women.

Certainly the Liberal Party gives a tremendous amount of importance to this issue, and so we have taken this initiative and challenge to government.

It is hard for me, a man, to comprehend totally the feeling of fear the night holds for women. They are conditioned from birth to be wary. They learn to recognize situations that may hold harm.

Traditionally those situations have been connected to the night. An assailant attacks a woman alone in a secluded spot, a darkened area. Now tradition is changing. There are few situations today that do not hold harm and fear for a woman.

More and more often danger comes not in the shape of a stranger, but in the form of a woman's husband, son, male friend or date. Beatings and murders of women have increased phenomenally over the past five years. Terms like date rape, which I first heard in 1984, and gender violence, last year, are now being woven into our language.

The sanctuary of the home is becoming a myth. Sixty per cent of women murdered die at the hands of their partners. Twenty-five per cent of women had been sexually assaulted and abused, half before the age of 17, as reported by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

What of women who choose independent living? Do they feel safe living alone? At least 4 per cent of seniors are abused—and I am sure a good proportion of them are women too—by a family member at some time.

In 1989, 119 women were murdered by fists and knives, not by guns. And 75 per cent of the assailants were known. They happened at home, as reported by the December 1990 issue of the Canadian Forum.

I have heard of cases where young native women, hoping to escape abuse in the home, have turned to pregnancy and a subsequent welfare cheque as a means of escaping their homes and abuse. In fact, women on reservations and in remote aboriginal communities suffer a level of abuse that far exceeds the national level. They have nowhere to turn, nowhere to escape their abusers.

Fifty-two per cent of disabled women have been raped, assaulted or abused. This is truly a tragic commentary on our country. At least one in ten women is assaulted by her spouse or boyfriend.

The government has countered this flood of violence with its Family Violence Initiatives Program, a program that still falls short of delivering the solutions we need.

We must know the reasons behind the aggression of some men toward women. To understand the enemy, it has been said, is the best way to disarm the enemy.

Why does one man in ten assault his female partner? Who are these brutal men? They have to be accountable. What has led them to do the things they do? What are the best ways to help the victims of violence, most importantly? What more needs to be done?

Answers must be sought for these questions. The Minister of National Health and Welfare on February 20, 1991, in announcing the Family Violence Initiative, said in his opening statement: "I appeal for concerted national action on family violence".

In the previous December, I and many more of my Liberal colleagues called upon the government to create a royal commission on violence against women. We are asked: Why is there need for this commission? Let me attempt to answer that question.

First, I believe it will help Canadians to identify fully the spectrum of the causes of this grievous problem. On an individual basis we will know whether the poverty, insufficiency of income, unemployment, and poor education are related to insufficiency of government programs. We will also know whether they have the capacity to make a living, to buy a home and whether at times of crisis, illnesses, accidents, separation and divorce they have a transitional shelter to go to. We can examine whether as a society the government has been doing its job. Has the government been doing its job, for example, in the area of pornography trade and prostitution, just to mention one, that always is promoted on the backs of women who then become victims?

We will be able to ascertain the true magnitude of the problem. We will even be able to ascertain the age distribution in a very accurate way. Knowing the dimension of this problem will make us able to provide the proper approach—and it will give us a sense of the true gravity of this situation. It will tell us the nature of the problem, whether it is physical, sexual assault, psychological or even financial deprivation. It will tell us where violence occurs and what magnitude of that occurs in the homes, on the streets and even on school campuses. We will be able to examine the sequelae of this problem: The immediate and the long-term. As the critic for health and welfare, I have discussed this issue with my associate critics, the member for Hamilton Mountain and the member for Mississauga. Truly, Mr. Speaker, when we imagine the sequelae of violence against women when they survive the physical violence, they end up having problems with alcohol and drug abuse, delinquency, prostitution, mental incapacitation and even suicide. When we fully appreciate the gravity of the problem, then perhaps this government will be compelled to truly take all the necessary steps.

We will be able to provide a comprehensive approach and not the piecemeal approach, and this is another value of a royal commission.

Last, Mr. Speaker, a royal commission during its process will be able to focus public awareness on this issue, sensitize Canadians, sensitize women as to the manifestations of violence, and even sensitize the media. The history of royal commissions on many other major issues in our country has taught us that great results have emanated from them.

We need great results to emanate from this proposed royal commission. It is worth an investment, Mr. Speaker. It is worth an investment. It will be a true signal to Canadians that we are serious. It is wise and it is right and it is timely.

AMENDMENT TO STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to interrupt before the minister gets started. There have been consultations among the three parties and at approximately five o'clock I was instructed to come in the House and ask for unanimous consent for two housekeeping motions, which I think you will find have been agreed to.

If I could read the first one:

That Chapter XIII of the Standing Orders of this House be amended by including the following paragraph:

Members of Standing, Special, Joint and Legislative committees shall give 24 hour prior notice of any substantive motion to the Chairman of their respective committees, before such motion may be considered.

Point of Order

And that this Order be deemed rescinded when the House prorogues or alters the Standing Orders to cause a reorganization of committees to occur, or when the forty-ninth Report of the Striking Committee is adopted.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm that, yes, there have been discussions, almost endless discussions, for many months now. This is part of a solution that will allow us to have some of our committees resume functioning, at least between now and when one of those three events occurs. And we do support it.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that what the government whip indicates to us is correct. However, I have not had the opportunity to consult with our own representative on this issue and I am not apprised of it. If the House concurs I will endeavour in the next few minutes to ascertain that what is proposed by the government Whip is indeed what was agreed to. And I will come back to the Whip immediately after the discourse of the next member who is scheduled to speak.

If the House concurs with that, perhaps we could hold in abeyance approval of what has been proposed by the government Whip until the next speaker has terminated his or her remarks.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the deputy House leader on the other side left my office 20 minutes ago and it was at the request of that party that I was to do this around five o'clock. I don't know what has gone wrong, but people have other commitments.

I wonder if he could take my word for it that in fact the wording is exact, that it has been checked, that it has been in the hands of his party for quite some hours, that the House leader was involved, that the Whip was involved, and that that was the recommendation.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the member is doing this with all good intentions, but I cannot pretend that I have heard—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hope that you can come to agreement outside the House and when you do come in, I will be able to listen to it.

The hon. Minister of Health and Welfare has the floor on debate.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Clancy (p. 18406).

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, when I came to the Department of National Health and Welfare I knew that family violence, and especially violence against women, was a serious problem in our culture, but I don't think I realized how deep and difficult a problem it would be to solve for each of us.

Many of our colleagues who have spoken in the debate before me have mentioned the ugly picture that is painted by statistics. They show that 10 per cent of women are assaulted by their male partners. We know that at least 25 per cent of girls are abused by the age of 16 and that about 60 per cent of the women murdered each year die at the hands of their partners.

These figures may well be conservative. Abused women are often too frightened to disclose the oppression they suffer. Experts estimate that the spoken or perceived threat of reprisal keeps more than half of the victims of abuse from speaking out and seeking help.

Violence against women is classic tyranny, and the tools of its perpetrators are entrapment, humiliation and intimidation. Victims of extreme cases become depersonalized, like survivors of other traumas. Efforts by victims to change the patterns of violence or to escape the offender are often met with increased threats of beatings and murder. The result is that women who have tried to escape and reorient their lives cannot be guaranteed safe haven in far too many cases.

Much of the violence against women takes place in the home. The family, the central unit of our society from which individuals gain their sense of security, compassion and self-esteem, is for many Canadian women a purgatory of rejection, manipulation and abuse. For far too many women, the family is experienced as a structure in which the supreme power of one over others is maintained through violence.

The abuse can be physical, sexual, psychological, emotional, or material. Some consequences of wife abuse, such as bruises and broken bones, are visible. Shelter workers will attest to the pitiable condition in which some of their residents arrive, maimed and disfigured, when the violence they suffer finally drives them into hiding. Less evident, though often more severe, is the emotional and psychological damage the victims of wife abuse endure, wounds that never heal; terror and depression, hopelessness and isolation.

The reluctance of victims to speak about their abuse and the refusal of others to become involved creates a conspiracy of silence which protects the abuser. For far too long Canadians have been tempted to simply look away, to accept the brutal treatment of the innocent as someone else's problem, or to say that it is something that should be dealt with behind closed doors.

It is not someone else's problem. It belongs to all of us. If we simply look the other way, we are complicit in acts of violence which leave the victims intimidated, sexually assaulted, molested, beaten, tortured and, far too frequently, dead.

The question that begs a response is: What twisted logic makes some men think that they can abuse women? The answer is elusive, but clearly social values and conventions which do not assure equal rights and status to women, children and seniors make them vulnerable to violence in the family. Traditional views which deem men to be the head of their household, demand that women honour and obey their husbands, and insist that children be seen and not heard are major factors in the cultural permission that men feel when they channel their emotions through a tunnel of violence.

In the past, action to protect the victims of abuse, apprehend and punish the offenders, and address the root causes of family violence has been slow to evolve.

Women's groups have long stressed the importance of protection and shelter for battered women and their children. They have taken a leading role both in developing a response to the needs of the victims and in promoting general understanding of the nature of violence itself.

Their efforts have been fruitful and tireless, since the first shelter was opened in British Columbia in 1972. We now have over 300 shelters in Canada.

The late 1970s in Canada saw widespread legislative reform of family law, particularly matrimonial property law, aided by a new cohort of feminist lawyers working toward recognition of marriage as a partnership of equals.

Among the federal responses to the problem of family violence in the 1980s was the Badgely report in 1984 which examined the adequacy of laws designed to protect the vulnerable. On the basis of that report and for the first time in this country's history the government of Canada addressed family violence as a matter of national concern in the Speech from the Throne.

In 1986, the federal government launched a $25 million five-year Child Sexual Abuse program and, two years later, a $40 million four-year Family Violence Initiative.

We built new shelters. We learned how to train people to deal with family violence. We conducted research and learned a great deal about the extent and nature of violence against women.

We funded more than 700 projects, each of which had a practical and measurable objective. Under Project Haven, for instance, which is administered by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, up to 500 new shelter units are being created for abused women and their children.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister. I have now consulted with my colleagues and I am pleased to offer the unanimous consent that was previously requested.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, there is a second motion that I would like to read to the House and I think there is a similar understanding:

> That, notwithstanding Standing Orders 104 and 114, the Chief Government Whip may appoint one additional Government Member to the membership of the Standing Committee of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, by advising the Clerk of the House, in writing, before Monday March 18, 1991.
> This Order shall be deemed rescinded when the House prorogues or alters the Standing Orders to cause a reorganization of committees to occur or when the forty-ninth report of the Striking Committee is adopted.

I believe there is a similar understanding and I would like to make comments once we have accepted it.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, yes, there has been consultation and we agree with the government.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, yes, there has been consultation on this motion as well and I think it is an excellent way around the particular dilemma we have.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it is my job to give notice to the Table and I do so now that we would like to have an organization meeting of the committee Monday at 3.30 p.m. I think it might be helpful to the members of the committee if, in the meantime, the clerk's office could make some approach to the citizen's forum about their availability because I suspect that that will be one of the items the committee would like to deal with some time next week.

I would also like to make a public commitment to the notion that the committee once up and running, obviously has a bit of a backlog, and if it met several times next week, certainly government members would be prepared to meet as frequently as necessary after the usual consultation between the three parties regarding suitable topics and witnesses.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I actually want to rise on a point of personal privilege. Yesterday, in the heat of debate, I used some unparliamentary language which is found on the bottom of page 18327. I want to unequivocally withdraw those remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It has been withdrawn. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I just want to tell my friend the government Whip that I understand and appreciate this turn of events. After yesterday's events in this House, where I was partly responsible for raising the matter, I think we have now seen that common sense and lot of understanding prevails. I am very happy that consumer and corporate affairs will be reconvened on Monday to proceed with the examination of the whole question of the Spicer commission.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Now, can we get back to debate. The hon. Minister of Health and Welfare.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Clancy (p.18406).

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is very gracious of you to recognize me again.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the federal Women's Film Program was supported in its effort to produce and distribute films related to women's issues. The Disabled Women's Network was funded to conduct workshops with transition house staff, raising awareness about the vulnerability of women to abuse.

The Canadian Teacher's Federation was able to distribute to its member network the resource "Thumbs Down—A Classroom Response to Violence Against Women." And 56,000 Canadian physicians received a special adaptation of the Ontario Medical Association's "Reports on Wife Assault."

Today in every jurisdiction in Canada we have mechanisms to address family violence and our common efforts have led us to loudly reaffirm a central value of our society—that violence, in any form, is unacceptable. We recognize that violence in Canada is a serious, pervasive and intolerable ill. Will recognize also that it is a national problem, one that will require nothing less than a national response if we are to succeed in a significant way. This is society's problem. No law or program enacted by government can make it disappear. What government can do, however, is to provide leadership and to help to mobilize the efforts of countless individuals, agencies and organizations to make a concerted and sustained effort to stop the suffering. Last month we did just that when we announced a new Family Violence Initiative, one designed to build on the experience of the past four years and to encourage new approaches and alliances.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I listened earlier as my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby mentioned in her remarks the fact that this new initiative on family violence would amount to $136 million in new funds, a figure that she dismissed as a mere drop in the bucket.

For the women who are suffering from family violence and for the others who are all too often its victims, this $136 million in new funds is important and welcomed news, indeed.

When members opposite denigrate the role of the federal government in dealing with issues related to family violence, they should be aware of the fact that through our contributions in health care, through our contributions through the Canada Assistance Plan, through direct spending we are making under the family violence program, we are spending, likely, in excess of a billion dollars a year to provide assistance to victims of family violence. That is an important contribution that is made by this Parliament and by the federal government.

I listened, but listened without success, to hear colleagues on the other side make suggestions for ways that we could be more effective in terms of targeting that money. I listened for concrete suggestions and new initiatives that could be taken and new ways in which we could assist the victims of family violence, or that we could intervene today to prevent the cycle of family violence from continuing for yet another generation.

What we have heard from the other side is two things: first, that we should simply be increasing the amount of money, that $136 million is trivial; and second, that instead of acting what we should be doing is studying.

I listened to my colleague and friend from Winnipeg as he gave his remarks a few minutes ago in calling for more study, as his colleagues did as well. How much more study is needed for us to recognize that all too often women and children are left in situations that are abusive because they have no place to go?

How much more study is needed before we recognize that family violence is part of a cycle that carries on from generation to generation and that it is essential for us to act now to break that cycle?

How much more study is needed before we recognize that there are problems all too often in our courts in an insensitivity to the needs of victims of family violence, or should we be acting now?

How much more study is needed before we come to the conclusion that policies in the past, that have required that women who have been abused in homes would have to lay the charges, were wrong and that police officers should be given instructions when they are called to domestic disputes that they should lay the charges? We do not need more study of that, we need action.

How much more study is needed before we are able to conclude that measures have to be taken to look at the portrayal of women and children in the media, to recognize the fact that all too often that portrayal diminishes their humanity, reduces their worth and allows them to be abused? Need we study that further, or can we act today to deal with this sort of a problem?

That is what the policy on family violence is designed to do. It is designed to build on the enormous reservoir of talent that there is in this country, on the commitment, which is growing at all levels in our society across Canada at all levels of government and throughout society, that recognizes that it is time today, not two years hence, but today for attitudes to change, for programs to be put in place, for all of us to recognize that this is society's problem and that all of us are involved. Let us not wait until later to do it, let us act now.

That is why that $136 million in new funds is so very important. That is why the other legislative initiatives that were disclosed in the Family Violence Program will be so important for Canadians as well because we can act today. We do have the data that we need to make significant progress and we will learn more. We will learn more from studies, there is no question about that, but there is no excuse for us not taking action today, action which will help to stem the suffering and the loss of life of far too many people.

The evidence is there. It is incontrovertible. It is powerful. The silent suffering of so many women across Canada implores us to take action at this level in this Parliament to provide leadership today and not years from now.

Mr. Speaker, if the strategy is to be successful it must serve as a catalyst for action, part of a series of initiatives at different levels of government and society which are needed to combat deeply rooted societal attitudes.

Consequently we undertook a massive series of consultations with provincial and territorial governments and the non-government sector. We consulted widely with all levels of government, women's groups, child advocacy organizations, senior's groups, front-line service providers, professional associations and researchers.

In June of 1989, we hosted a National Forum on Family Violence to identify major issues and suggest avenues for activity.

The result is a new program which will make available $136 million, in new funds, over the next four years, more than twice the level of funding currently committed by the federal government to address the problem of violence.

The federal strategy has three main objectives: to combat the attitudes and stereotypes that encourage and excuse this senseless violence, to ensure that the brutal people who commit these acts are called to account, and, most importantly, to provide help to the innocent victims who, all too often, are asked to bear their cruel burden in silence.

Through the initiative the Government will strengthen intervention and treatment services by training RCMP recruits, and the staffs of Correctional Services Canada and the National Parole Board to better understand the patterns of violence faced by women.

Training materials will be developed and supported for judges, physicians, nurses and social workers—both those who appear in court and those who work on the front lines. Of major urgency, availability of housing for victims will be substantially improved. Treatment will be provided to violent and sexual offenders in all 60 federal correctional institutions.

[English]

Today in Vancouver my colleague, the Minister of Justice, is announcing the government's plans to review provisions of the Criminal Code, the Divorce Act and other legislation with regard to pornography, the adequacy of current bail provisions and the forcible removal of offenders from the home. This is action which should be taken now to begin this and not waiting until later.

Within my own department we will fund community projects designed to treat and prevent abuse, train physicians and social workers, collect and disseminate information and conduct research and evaluation. The national clearing house on family violence will receive an almost fourfold budgetary increase, enabling it to build upon existing resources and improve public access to its materials.

We will continue our support to the National Film Board family violence collection, a collection of videos which have been seen by 8.5 million Canadians. We are not waiting until later, this is action that needs to be taken now.

In consultation with aboriginal communities, we will train 2,000 health care and social service workers serving Indian reserves and Inuit communities, relying upon their help to develop prevention programs in over 500 communities.

Undoubtedly, the most important element of this initiative is to serve as a catalyst for all of society to mobilize its resources to pull together to deal with this issue. It is not a federal government issue; it is a national problem in which all of us—governments, the private sector, voluntary agencies and individuals—must share together. All must work together. All of us must mobilize what resources we can find to deal with the problem that is pervasive, that cuts across all demographic and geographic lines in our society and a problem which causes suffering and, in too many instances, death on the part of its innocent victims.

That is the plea that I make today to members of the House: not to put things off until later, not to say that we do not have enough information to know that this problem is pervasive or to know that there are measures we can take today to begin to bring down the level of this violence, but for us all to work with all sectors of society starting today, to mobilize those resources, to change attitudes, to begin to ensure that the human worth and dignity of every Canadian is respected and to begin to bring down that level of violence in our society and to ensure that those people who suffer the senseless violence receive the aid and assistance that they so desperately need.

By working together, we can do precisely that. No issue is more fundamental for this Parliament, no issue more demands action today than that we work together on this. Studies, yes; studies will continue. But it is essential that we commit ourselves today to acting today before more innocent victims have to suffer for our failures.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): I begin my comment with a sincere apology to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is quite clear that I obviously used words which the minister did not understand in my speech. I apologize for that.

I cannot believe that anything other than a misunderstanding could give rise to what I find to be unacceptable in the minister's tone and in his speech. I cannot believe that the members on this side of the House or, indeed, on his side of the House would denigrate the question of violence against women.

I do not think I, my colleagues in the Liberal Party or in the New Democratic Party have ever tried to take that kind of a shot at the minister. I am sure that one of us is misunderstanding the other here. If it happens to be me, then I certainly apologize.

I want to ask the minister a couple of questions. First of all, he says that this is a national problem. I could not agree more. Of course, it is a national problem. He talks about co-operation among all sectors, and I agree with that as well. I hope that means that the minister is talking to his friends in business, in the professions and in other parts and sectors of this society. I would like to know about that because as yet, if he is doing so, he is not getting much of a response.

I would like to know what the minister thinks is the root cause or causes of violence against women. For weeks we have been sitting in the violence against women subcommittee and hearing that we do not know what the actual causes are. Yes, there are the indicators of alcoholism; yes, there are the indicators of economic stress; yes, there are indicators of dysfunctional families and so on. There are others who do not fall into these categories.

I know the minister to be an intelligent man. I know the minister to be a compassionate man. What we are calling for here is concrete action today.

I said in my speech earlier that I believe the initiatives announced several weeks ago were in good faith. I am not going to get into a numbers game with the minister, but $136 million given the cuts that came the following week is one tiny example.

Second stage housing was cut by $23.6 million. Laudable. That is one building per province if we do not count the territories. At the same time, the government cuts $411 million to government subsidized housing.

Where I come from, they call that "robbing Peter to pay Paul". I do not think it is robbing Mike to pay Perrin. At any rate, I want to know, if the minister thinks that we are not advocating action in a royal commission, what he has to say about the fact that none of his $136 million is going directly to transition houses when 50 per cent of women are turned away every year.

I want to know what he thinks about the fact that Project Haven has spent barely a third of its budget and it is almost at the end of its program life. Women's groups across the country which work in the field of abused women are complaining that they cannot access this money. When I asked this minister two weeks ago if programs for judges and police in this country would be mandatory, he would not answer me.

I want to know, today: Will they be mandatory? Those judges who go voluntarily do not need the courses. It is those who will not go. He asked for concrete suggestions, and we said: "a royal commission". I repeat that it is not either/or. We need a royal commission and we need direct services.

Come to our committee, I tell him, Mr. Speaker, through you, and hear what the front line workers are saying. Stop these pious platitudes. Stop the band-aid responses, give us real action and ask the Prime Minister to do it today.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says: "Stop the band-aid response of $136 million and legislative responses in changing legislation to try to deal with this problem. Sensitize people to try to make sure that this sort of abuse does not exist any more. Have concrete action", which is to study the problem further.

I do not think that that is a very constructive suggestion to make. What we need from members participating in this debate on both sides of the House is proposals for action. Study, yes.

My colleague, the Minister of State for the Status of Women has made it clear that we will be inviting from the subcommittee on the status of women suggestions on how best to proceed in terms of further work. One of those recommendations made by the subcommittee may well deal with the question of a royal commission.

What we need today is action today, where the information is before us today as to what the problem is. There is a broad range of information on that.

Mrs. Clancy: How much money for transition houses, Perrin?

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member mentions transition houses. I am glad she did that because she has systematically, since the announcement was made a couple of weeks ago, given information that simply was not accurate.

Either already built or committed to be built are in the neighbourhood of 440 units of housing under Project Haven. If the hon. member had checked her facts she would have found that. In addition to that, some $21 million will be added to the budget of CMHC to provide for additional housing, much of it second-stage housing.

Mrs. Clancy: Second stage.

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member dismisses this again as unimportant. Where do these people go after the first two weeks that they spend in the transition house? Where do they go?

We will be putting money directly in to providing assistance to enable people to set up homes that people can go to to become re-established in the community. We will be continuing to do what we can to broaden the services available for women who suffer from this sort of abuse all too often.

Had the hon. member, before she made comments that were ill-informed and which were just plain wrong, taken the trouble to inquire of CMHC or of National Health and Welfare we would have been glad to give her that information. But this should be much more than a partisan issue, it should be an issue which transcends partisanship, and on all sides of the House there should be a commitment for us to work together today, not later but today, to deal with an issue which is causing far too many people to suffer.

The hon. member asked whether I misunderstood the comments that she made in the House. I would refer her to comments that were made by one of her colleagues who talked about the need for studies so we can set priorities on the $136 million. We do not need to put it off, we need action.

Ms. Clancy: What about the 50 per cent?

Mr. Beatty: What is important today is that we do have the information that we need to know that housing is important. We know that we need to have intervention, that offenders need treatment. We know that all too often women and children are taken out of the houses and the abuser remains behind afterward. We know, today, that the portrayal of women and children in the media all too often create the conditions in which violence is possible. We know that this is a problem which is not going to go away and that it requires that each of us commit ourselves today to working together to redress this problem before it becomes worse.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, take offence at the tone of the minister's remarks in relation to comments and speeches that have been made in the House. I, too, agree that this is not a partisan issue. It is in fact an issue of women's lives and women's very survival in our country. It is not a partisan issue.

Women from every economic sector are battered and beaten, not just poor women. I, too, wonder if the minister listened or heard. Perhaps he listened and did not hear the comments that have been made here today, because the comments that were made gave concrete suggestions to the minister and to the government on steps that can be taken right now, immediately.

We did not just ask for research, we asked for action on this issue. When he talks about Project Haven, a program that was announced before the last election that was to provide 500 new beds in shelters for battered women, the fact is at this time, 1991, not even one-third of them have been completed and they have not all been allocated, and I have checked with CMHC.

The minister mentioned that the Minister of Justice had a press conference today. Again, it sounds like another press conference about the same initiatives. Did she announce that there will be mandatory gender-sensitivity training for the judiciary, for judges and for police officers? Did the Minister of Justice announce that in Vancouver today as the communication that I have had with her has asked her to do, as the communication of women has asked her to do? Did the Minister of Justice make that announcement today in Vancouver?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that this should not be a partisan issue and that perhaps I did not hear what she had to say earlier.

I did hear what she had to say earlier as she dismissed a commitment of $136 million of new funds as, in her words, a drop in the bucket or as, my colleague from Halifax repeats, peanuts.

Ms. Clancy: Peanuts.

Mr. Beatty: This, she says, is peanuts or a drop in the bucket. They dismissed over a billion dollars being put by the federal government into dealing with issues related to this sort of violence, a billion dollars a year or more than that going into the Canada Assistance Plan and EPF to assist victims of violence, in addition to the sort of money we are talking about here. That is to be dismissed.

If we are to be successful in dealing with this sort of an issue, it is important that we mobilize all of the resources at all levels of society. The federal government is showing a range of initiatives here that we have already announced. What we are doing is building on initiatives already in place and on partnerships which have already been developed to enable us—

Ms. Clancy: You are building on sand.

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member from Halifax says that we are building on sand. We are building on sand, she says, when we are giving assistance to social workers for training to deal with issues of family violence. We are building on sand, she says, when we are giving training, for example, to police officers. There are some 500 of them going through the RCMP academy each year.

Ms. Clancy: Is it mandatory?

Mr. Beatty: We are building on sand, she says, when we are building housing units for victims of violence. We are building on sand, she says, when we give money to community groups to enable them to provide services to victims of violence.

I do not believe we are building on sand. I believe that we are building on a bedrock of co-operation which will have profound effects in improving the quality of life for Canadians.

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this debate, the opposition has been saying the government is indifferent or seems to be indifferent to the problems facing women. Mr. Speaker, it so happens we are very much aware of what the government is doing to deal with the disastrous effects of violence against women.

Perhaps the minister could expand somewhat on the program he announced a few weeks ago, a program that in my opinion is taking great strides towards eliminating violence against women.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, indeed I would be glad to do that.

What we have done is take an initiative which involves some six different departments of government. It is a designed deal at the criminal level with people who are abusers. It is designed to ensure that there are services made available to offenders to try to train them and to try to rehabilitate them. It is designed to provide assistance to people who suffer from family violence. It is designed to build partnerships with groups in the private sector, non-governmental organizations, to work together to try to change attitudes and to provide services. It is designed to activate networks at the provincial and local levels, which can be important in terms of making people more aware of when family violence occurs and how to deal with it. It is designed to build upon services through police officers, Correctional Service Canada and the National Parole Board to ensure that offenders guilty of family violence either receive the treatment that is necessary or that measures are taken to ensure that their victims are properly protected from them.

It is designed to look at issues which all too often take a woman and children who have been abused out of the home and leave the abuser still in the home, with them losing both their whole way of life and their home.

Through this concerted action we are confident that we can have an important impact on the level of violence from which far too many women in this society suffer.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by congratulating the member for Halifax on proposing this motion today.

We have gone through a period of time over recent weeks and months, in which the attention of virtually all Canadians was glued to one issue and almost nothing else. Of course I am referring to the war in the Persian Gulf. In that period of time other issues that we could have and perhaps even should have been talking about were not raised as much as they could have been.

That does not mean to say that everyone in public office or even advocacy groups did not do their jobs. Even in instances when very important issues were raised, the attention of the media and Canadians generally was focused in another direction. To a degree, raising important issues that should have received much attention was sometimes like whistling in the wind.

Our colleague from Halifax reminds us today of an important topic that indeed should have been raised in the House before and has been raised in the House before by her and others. She has been very vigilant in raising issues involving family violence, and more particularly violence against women. A few weeks ago she raised criticism involving the minister's initiative. She has questioned the government on several occasions, and I congratulate her for that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House today is a sad one. I think it is appropriate that both men and women are speaking to this issue in the House today. We are talking about violence against women, but we are also talking about the violence perpetrated by men against women. Of course, in most cases when we talk about violence in this connection, we are talking about violence by men against women, and that is what we are talking about today.

I am not proud of the fact, Mr. Speaker, and think it should be repeated over and over again, in this House and elsewhere, until such time that men, both collectively and individually, realize that violence against women is unacceptable and that it must stop.

[English]

As late as the end of the last century, women, once married, were considered to be chattels of their husbands, a form of property. Perhaps some of that mindset is regrettably still there among some people today, treating indeed their wife or partner or significant other, however one wants to put it, as being their property.

The issue in question has been studied a lot. The minister has referred to that. However, if it has been studied so successfully and if all has been done, why is the problem still there? Why is the problem still there in the numbers and magnitude that we know that it is? Obviously we do not have all the answers. I would like to think that if the minister had all the answers he could have given us all the solutions. If any of us had all the answers we could have provided all the solutions and the problem would be gone. But it is not; the problem is still there in very large numbers.

In my previous incarnation in politics, if I may put it that way, when I was a member of the Ontario legislature, I was the social policy spokesperson for our party. We had a study by the Ontario legislature committee on social development, on violence against women. Day after day we listened to testimony from women's groups, even on occasion from battering husbands. There were days in which the evidence was virtually impossible to listen to. There were days on which I had to walk out of the committee room several times during the deliberations because it was just so awful to hear.

It is almost a decade ago. As a matter of fact, as I look now at the calendar in front of us on the clerks' table, I notice that we are only six days away from my 10th anniversary of my election to Queen's Park, March 19, 1981. It was shortly after that that we had this study. Ten years have gone by, or close to it, and yet the problem is still there.

I do not accept the minister's argument that the request of my colleague from Halifax is unreasonable. I do not accept his comment that we have all the answers now and that there is no need to have this royal commission.

I am paraphrasing his words earlier. He said: "We don't need to study the issue further. We can act today". If that is true, I will have to back up one day and pretend we are on March 12, 1991 and say that if we could act today, why did we not act yesterday or the day before? Presumably if as of half an hour ago the minister had all those answers that he was referring to, he must have had them for sometime. He must have had them yesterday or a week ago or at some other period of time.

I am not blaming the minister in the sense that I hold him responsible for the violence that exists. That would be unfair and untrue, but I do blame the minister for that attitude of saying that we do not need to revisit this issue again and to study it further.

I am the first one to criticize expenditures on government use or sometimes overuse of royal commissions on a variety of issues. I can say as an opposition critic on government expenditures that I certainly would not criticize the principle of having such an expenditure now. The issue is of such import that all members of the House should join together and request that royal commission by the government.

It is my hope that the government, notwithstanding the remarks only moments ago of the minister, will undertake such a study on family violence and violence against women particularly.

As I indicated to you a little earlier, Mr. Speaker, I wish to share my time with our colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. With that I will end my comments and I will look forward to the contribution by my colleague from Cape Breton—East

Richmond who is the former critic of this very important issue for our caucus.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to remind my colleague that in the previous Parliament the government did take the first step concerning family violence.

I do not know whether he remembers that. The first step has been made. The government has decided to give priority to this matter and continue to take action.

Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I fully agree with the minister's position. Perhaps I should draw my colleague's attention to last Sunday's Martine Corriveau editorial in Le Soleil entitled "No more commissions of inquiry".

She was referring to the request made by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women to have such a commission appointed. She said about this request that "the least one can say is that it lacks originality and raises suspicions".

I will not read the whole editorial, but she went on to say: "If we are to review past experiences, analyze current data, consult university research projects and explore new ways of intervening, there are procedures lest costly and probably more effective than referring the issue to an inquiry commission, royal though it might be".

We need evidence and opinions? Why not use the very simple tools available to the first human democracies, such as informal meetings, genuine citizens' forums, sectorial sessions chaired by advocacy people from various fields of activities in each county, each region, and each province?

She concluded that "the millions of dollars saved could be used to reduce the deficit, eliminating one cause of economic violence against Canadian society as a whole".

Mr. Speaker, what I want to know from my colleague is how, at a time when we seek to give priority to measures designed to reduce violence, would we proceed with a study which would only delay any action we might take to repress violence?

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, first of all those two initiatives are not mutually exclusive. There is no reason why Parliament cannot undertake this royal commission and at the same time continue all those those great programs that the hon. member refers to.

Finally, the member has said that she has an editorial that proves her point. I can table a similar editorial that proves the exact opposite point. This one is from the Daily News of Friday, March 1, 1991 entitled "We need a royal commission on violence against women". One editorial does not the truth make.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the short time that I have I do want to be on the record in support of my colleague from Halifax who has called upon the government to commission a royal commission with regard to the violence against women.

It was approximately 15 months ago that a troubled young man, full of blind hatred and unfounded fears and armed with a semi-automatic rifle, marched into the École Polytechnique at the University of Montreal. The cold, insane reality of that day saw him go after young women in the hallways and classrooms of the engineering school last December 6 and trumpeting his rage brutally cut down 14 young, innocent female students.

Surely those young women, in the fleeting moments of their lives, must have felt a fear that men my age and perhaps your age, Mr. Speaker, cannot fully appreciate or understand.

It is the fear that a woman feels when she is walking from her in a dark and lonely underground parking garage and hears the hollow sound of footsteps close behind. It is the fear a woman feels when late at night her husband or boyfriend comes home drunk, angry, full of violence and unrepentant rage. It is the fear a woman feels when she is walking alone on a quiet sidewalk in the chilly early evening and sees her own shadow cast by the street lights being overtaken by someone else's presence. It is a fear that seizes you in the stomach and it is a fear marked by terror and by tears.

But violence against women is much more, much more than a lone gunman stalking the hallways of a school or a rapist lurking in the shadows of a quiet street. Violence against women occurs everywhere: at the work place, in the home and on the street. It can occur unfortunately at any time.

The attacker can be wearing jeans and a tee-shirt or outfitted in a dark grey flannel suit. Sometimes the abuse is between a husband and a wife and sometimes it is the corporate executive who earns $80,000 a year.

I will give an example. There is the man who picked up his wife of 32 years at the restaurant where she had worked and said he had to take her to a lawyer's office to sign the divorce papers. Instead, he took her to an isolated field, killed her and then he killed himself.

There is the young woman, the young mother and her little boy. I defended individuals such as these. They were both very much alone, getting ready to move out after five months of living in a shelter for battered women. You can picture it, Mr. Speaker. The room is filled almost to the ceiling with green plastic garbage bags that contain their clothes and other belongings. But they have courage, confidence in a new start and growing hope for a better life.

Finally, in those two moments that I have, sometimes the abuse is rape.

It is the 16-year old girl, just an average person, a so-so athlete and a mediocre student but friendly and outgoing. She loves being with her friends, listening to a few tunes and partying on the weekend. But one Friday night she is out at a party and the parents are not at home. What starts out as a handful of young people hanging out in the family room, gathered around the stereo, turns into a crowd of over 100 teenagers and young adults. There is beer, hard liquor and cheap wine.

The 16-year old girl has agreed to have a drink, and the drinks keep coming. In the early morning hours she is dragged upstairs to a bedroom by three or four of the older boys, boys she does not go to school with, boys she does not even know. She does not know what is happening to her. She is raped and she passes out. She is left all alone in a strange room until sometime later in the day when she can find her own way home.

It happens, Mr. Speaker. It happens all too often.

When I see the list of organizations in this country that have called for a royal commission on violence against women, from the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women—and I want to table this list with my remarks—I cannot see any justification in any government, regardless of one's partisan political affiliation, for not having a royal commission which can thoroughly discuss the issues and, more important, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure you would agree as a father and a husband, and I as a father of two girls, would want to know the real causes of family violence against women.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being after six o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) proceedings on the motion have expired.

This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

FOURTEENTH REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN SECTION OF AIPLF

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, the fourteenth report on the activities of the Canadian section of the International Assembly of French-speaking Parliamentarians.

This report concerns the meeting of the AIPLF executive, held in Delémont, Switzerland, in the canton of the Jura, on February 7 and 8 this year.

REPORT ON OFFICIAL VISIT OF PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO CUBA

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, the report on the official visit of a parliamentary delegation to Cuba from February 3 to February 10, 1991.

Mr. Speaker, I may add that this was an opportunity to establish closer ties between Cuban and Canadian parliamentarians, to consider new opportunities for bilateral trade exchanges and, especially, to obtain family reunification for a Canadian citizen of Cuban origin.

As leader of the delegation I had the privilege of arguing this case, and I am proud of the results, which have vindicated our stand on human rights.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

TENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the tenth report of the Standing Committee on Finance in both official languages. The report is in connection with Bill C-97, an act to provide borrowing authority. The report is without amendment.

BILL C-85—TABLING OF REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the report of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-85, an Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports. PETITIONS

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present almost 500 names on petitions from people across southwestern Ontario who are asking this government to implement legislation banning the use of MMT in Canada because it appears to have a health impact on the children of this nation and other people who work closely in the automotive sector.

Also, this petition would encourage the use of ethanol, which would create a market for approximately five to eight million bushels of grain which we have here in Canada and can easily supply. It also has another impact in that it reduces dramatically the hydrocarbon emissions into the atmosphere and assists in stopping the global warming of this planet.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by constituents in Ottawa—Vanier, to the effect that Canada Post's decision to close Branch No. 23 located at 580 Rideau Street, Ottawa, will inconvenience all customers. It will make things much harder for all the pensioners who live right next door. They will be deprived of a service that is essential to their needs.

The undersigned are asking for a review of this decision. Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ask Canada Post to review its decision to close the branch.

Mr. Speaker, there are hundreds of families living in this area, mostly senior citizens who would greatly appreciate a favourable decision as a result of this petition.

WHARFS AND HARBOURS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table this petition in the House today, signed by many constituents from my riding.

It urges the federal government to fulfil its duty to provide proper maintenance of our wharfs and harbours, many of which are in a deplorable, unsafe condition and require major repairs.

I join with these constituents in urging the federal government to evaluate the state of wharfs and harbours, proceed with the necessary maintenance and repair, and ensure the future safety of the fishery of Prince Edward Island.

URANIUM MINING

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present petitions signed by people from many communities in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, Quebec and Ontario.

The petitioners recall the regulatory meltdown which led to the spill of 2,000 litres of contaminated radioactive waste at Wollaston Lake in the fall of 1989. They repeat the call for an independent, comprehensive public inquiry into the whole uranium mining industry.

They are happy to note that AECB has recommended that an ERP panel be struck and they hope that pending a full scale inquiry that the ERP panel proceed immediately.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition from citizens of Lamorandière, Despinassy, Rochebaucourt, Lac Castagnier, all in Abitibi, who insist that the government of Canada drop its plans for the development of Parliament Hill, which would cost $68 million and involve building a parking garage and a shopping concourse under the Parliament of Canada, and that the government recognize the need for preserving the natural environment and historical character of the Parliament Buildings and Parliament Hill.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure, indeed, an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents of mine from Kamloops, British Columbia.

The petitioners point out their concerns about the government's treatment of VIA Rail service throughout Canada. They are complaining about the government's decision to curtail VIA Rail service through the southern route of the line between Calgary and Kamloops. They suggest a whole set of reasons why this would not only be important in terms of providing passenger rail service, but also environmentally would be the most appropriate way to move large numbers of people, to say nothing about the tourism industry.

They are asking the government to reconsider the decision to close that line.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all the questions be allowed to stand? Agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount) moved:

That this House condemn the government for failing to honour the Prime Minister's promise to "double Canada's spending commitment to research and development".

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit, we intend to proceed today with ten and five minute speeches. I am sure members would agree with that.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government, of course we have no objections to that.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party we too agree that this would be an appropriate way to continue for the day. It would simply be a decision of each of the political parties whether they decide to use that option or not.

An hon. member: Advise the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I presume that the lead off speaker will take 20 minutes or 10?

An hon. member: Ten minutes.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today reads, and I quote:

That this House condemn the Government for failing to honour the Prime Minister's promise to "double Canada's spending commitment to research and development".

Seven years ago next week, on March 22, 1984, the Prime Minister, speaking before the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, promised, and I quote: "—to double the collective national effort in the field of research and development during our first mandate".

He added, and I quote: "Through this effort, we expect to create hundreds of thousands of new jobs and increase overall sales by several billions of dollars each year".

It is not often, Mr. Speaker, that we, Liberals, agree with the Prime Minister's ideas. However, I can say flat out that we agree totally with those he expressed seven years ago about the importance of increased investment in research and development. Therefore, it is only logical that, today, we condemn the government and the Prime Minister for not delivering on this promise. We remember that, in his book entitled Where I Stand, the Prime Minister stated, and I quote: "Research and development, and the resulting innovations, are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country". The Prime Minister believed that, if the percentage of gross national product allocated to research and development were increased by a mere 1 per cent, we could create in Canada one million new jobs and $20 billion in additional sales of manufactured products.

We know what has happened since 1984: Spendings for research and development, instead of increasing, decreased by 1.4 per cent to 1.3 per cent of the gross national product. That was due to a reduction in the overall support to the research and development effort in Canada, and I can give you examples of that.

First, the Conservative government cut back on the support to industrial research and development. For instance, first-rate purchasing programs have been cancelled and the National Research Council Industrial Research Assistance Program is always starved for funds.

Second, the government reduced post-secondary education transfer payments and vocational training appropriations.

Third, the government went after Canada's foremost research agency—the National Research Council—and cut down the budget for research projects on environment and alternate energy sources.

Fourth, it cut in half the budget of the Science Council of Canada.

Fifth, intent on promoting university research, the government created the Centres of Excellence Program, yet at the same time it froze the funding of the main source of financial support for Canadian university research, the federal grants councils. The Prime Minister did not follow the recommendations of his own national advisory council which had advocated doubling the appropriations of grants councils.

Sixth, health care research was the latest victim of conservative restraints, including programs on health care research, health promotion, prevention of diseases—cancer, for one—as well as labour injuries and accidents.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that in their remarks today members of the government—and I see that the Minister for Science is here— will down-play the significance of research and development. They will say that research and development is a measure of input, that doing research and development does not necessarily lead to jobs and sales.

It is true that there is not as direct a link between R and D and jobs and sales, as the Prime Minister led people to believe in his remarks some seven years ago. Investment in research and development is needed but not sufficient for jobs and sales. It is also true that a company is not likely to increase sales without doing research and development. That becomes more and more so with advanced technology, goods and services. In theory, a bad firm can spend money on R and D and get nothing from it. Yet all successful firms spend a lot on research and development and get a lot from it.

Of course, Canada's major competitors routinely spend twice as much as Canada does on their R and D investments. Are they all stupid? Are they throwing billions of dollars away for nothing? The new products, all the technological improvements that we see every day have to come from somewhere, and that is from research and development.

Increasing spending on R and D is part and parcel of developing in Canada a research and development culture or a culture which values knowledge and education, and which would place top priority on developing Canada's human resources. Developing an R and D culture means giving Canadians the opportunities they deserve to attain their potential, to have meaningful choices for a variety of kinds of employment without having to leave Canada to pursue a rewarding career in science or in research.

In the budget the finance minister announced that the government will launch, and I quote: "a national effort to build a new partnership for prosperity". As a first step he said, and again I quote: "We will release a discussion paper in the spring to help focus public debate about the problems we face and the development of solutions". The Minister of Finance said that "more needs to be done to assure our future prosperity. We need to look hard at the quality of our investments and infrastructure, machinery and equipment, training and education, and research and technology". "There are signs", the Minister of Finance says, "that in some areas, such as private sector research and development and training, we are not doing enough".

My reaction on hearing these remarks of the Minister of Finance was, this is news to the Minister of Finance. For 10 years now members of Parliament have heard from countless sources that we are falling behind in all the areas that he identified in his budget speech two weeks ago. From university teachers, presidents and students, from business executives and workers, union leaders and from the government's own advisory committees the case has been made eloquently and consistently and now seven years after the government took office it proposes to focus public debate on these questions.

Where has the government been for the past seven years? Has it not been the government's responsibility to take action in these areas, to show leadership, to develop the kind of research and development culture that I said earlier values knowledge, education and the development of our human resources?

The debate the government proposes to engage Canadians in coming months is an admission of failure, an admission that we have lost seven years when we should have taken steps to ensure that all Canadians receive quality education and that Canadians businesses do enough R and D.

John Polanyi, the University of Toronto chemist who in 1986 won the Nobel Prize for Chemistry, said shortly after being awarded that prestigious prize, and I quote:

> Speaking from the perspective of someone who's been famous for almost 24 hours, I have found that good research is a combination of good luck, good colleagues, good students and adequate facilities.

The first, he said, comes from God; the rest from a university system properly supported by the government. Polanyi concluded:

> I wonder whether we aren't relying rather more heavily on God these days than on government.

Canadians need a government that will do its share.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but make a couple of quick comments here.

My hon. friend has said that funding for university research in Canada has decreased. He knows that is not so. He knows in fact that the funding to the granting councils has increased every year. I will give him some figures later on just to refresh his memory.

He talked very briefly about Established Programs Financing. I remind him that it was his government in 1977 that changed the formula so that EPF was transferred to the provinces without any conditions whatsoever, where it could be used for roads, sewers or goodness knows what. It did not have to be used for health care and it did not have to be used for university or post-secondary education. It was not our government that threw the baby out with the bath water, it was his. He has got us into this situation now where the provinces have complete carte blanche to do what they want. They also have complete carte blanche to support the system for which they have the responsibility. It is time they began to do that.

I am glad that my hon. friend is learning that we need to support industrial research in this country. I will give him more figures on that this morning. I might ask him what in heaven's name his government did over all the years it was in power to support, promote and encourage industrial research in Canada. If there is anything, it has been hard for me to find.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, it is now seven years since this government took office and it is time that it started accepting responsibility for the economic circumstances which this country finds itself in now.

The minister said that funding for the granting councils has increased. He can try to fool people with figures, but I would remind him that there is only one appropriate way to look at the figures for the budgets of the granting councils and that is to determine what percentage of our gross domestic product funding for the granting councils represents. He knows that that percentage has gone down, that funding for the granting councils, as a percentage of gross domestic product, has declined since 1984, and that is in constant dollars. The buying power, in other words, of funding for university research has gone down since 1984.

If the minister travels, as I know he does, to universities across this country, he knows that university researchers cannot keep up with inflation with the meagre stipends that this government has accorded them.

The minister says that our government transferred money to the provinces without any conditions in 1977. That is, of course, what the provinces asked for. But I would remind the minister that the Liberal government commissioned a study of the problems with post-secondary education funding, which we recognized as early as 1981, three or four years after the current EPF arrangement was established.

Al Johnson tabled a report in 1984 which this government has chosen not to act upon. Therefore, it is time again, as I said earlier, that this government took responsibility for the circumstances that we find ourselves in. It is now seven years since it took office and I think it is time that this government stopped telling people about the history of this country prior to 1984 and present to Canadians a program to deal with our problems today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. Questions and comments have expired.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in 1984, the Prime Minister promised Canadians that he would undertake to double Canada's level of research and development.

• (1130)

This promise was reiterated at Halifax when he spoke to a Conservative gathering on June 19, 1989. He said to all Canadians that "Canada's place in the world is not guaranteed; either we meet the challenge of competitiveness and ride the crest of the technology wave into the 21st century, or we exhaust ourselves in the rip-tide of history, fading inexorably backward."

Beautiful words. I commend the Prime Minister on his eloquence, but we are here today to hold his feet to the fire. What is his promise? We have heard it. What has he done? The facts show just the opposite.

When the Conservative government took over running Canada in 1984, our level of R and D was 1.42 per cent of the gross domestic product. Every year, under his stewardship, it has fallen so that today it is at 1.28 per cent of gross domestic product. We are at less than one-half the level of all our major competitors.

For example, let us look at what they did to the National Research Council Canada, NRCC. Since 1984 the federal government has reduced its NRCC appropriations by 12 per cent, or more than $5.7 million. In constant dollars this reduction would amount to roughly 48 per cent.

Last year the government appointed Pierre Perron President of the National Research Council. When he appeared before our committee at that time I asked him whether he thought his role as head of Canada's premier research and development agency was to lead the scientific community or to do the government's bidding. He was miffed, he said, so I had to rephrase my question: Well, Mr. Perron, do you think your role as president should be to fight against the government's NRC cut-backs? He replied: No, I cannot do that.

That is what I call doing the government's biding without question. And just a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, we learned that sixty-odd important employees had to resign. The NRC spirit has been flattened by this government.

And that is not all. Is the government really intent on promoting science and technology? Mr. Speaker, budget increases for science and technology amount to a mere 3 per cent. That is much less than the inflation rate and it spells fewer grants and less support for the NRC.

With respect to education in Canada we have only 90 scientists and researchers per 100,000 inhabitants. That compares with 140 in Britain, 150 in West Germany, 240 in Japan, and 280 in the United States. As to federal transfers to the provinces for health and education between 1986 and 1995, the cut-backs of this government will translate into a $40.1 billion loss for the provinces.

This has now become a serious issue. Even the Minister of Finance acknowledged in his budget that it is a matter of competitiveness for Canada. The World Economic Forum has shown that Canada lags far behind in terms of international competitiveness—down from fourth to fifth rank last year. —In research and development we are sixth among 24 industrialized countries, and that explains why we have so many bankruptcies in Canada, why our country is being de-industrialized.

Over the past 26 months Canada lost 277,000 manufacturing jobs, a frightening figure which accounts for 13 per cent of all jobs in the manufacturing sector. There is a direct link between this government's lack of support and the vanishing jobs in that major sector.

In the few minutes I have left I should like to comment on the recommendations of the Committee on Industry, Science and Technology. The report was drafted and endorsed by all three parties, and government members made up the majority of the committee. Here are some of the recommendations. We should raise the level of research and development. But this government has done nothing. In three years we were to double the budgets of three research councils, namely the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council of Canada, the Social Sciences and Humanitys Research Council of Canada, and the Medical Research Council of Canada. The recommendation was to double appropriations over three years. What did they do in the budget? They limited government support to 3 per cent, which amounts to a loss in constant dollars.

The Science Council of Canada budget was to be brought up to the previous level of $5 million, but the SCC will have to make do with only $3.2 million. Our recommendation was an immediate boost to $100 million for IRAP—Industrial Research Assistance Program—but the budget has been kept down to only $85 million.

The committee recommended that the federal government reduce the renewal rate of these programs and staff for industry. We can see what they did with the National Research Council Canada. And then the government took $55 million off the total industry, science and technology budget.

Mr. Speaker, de-industrialization is creating a major problem. The only way to create sound manufacturing industries is to reverse these trends and double our efforts for science and technology and research and development. The government is headed in the wrong direction, it needs to be set straight!

• (1140)

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment, and I would like the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount to stay in the House and listen to what I have to say. I also have a question for the hon. member. Earlier, I heard him say "for seven years". But he forgot something. Why didn't he say "eight or nine years"? I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker.

I have a newspaper article here, dated September 30, 1987—that was during the past seven years—and the heading says the Liberals lost Canadians billions of dollars. This information came from Kenneth Dye, Auditor General of Canada, who said that because of the political situation, the previous Liberal government caused taxpayers to lose billions of dollars, for no good reason, and he was referring to scientific research. The program set up by Marc Lalonde with a budget of $200 million in 1983-84 went so far over budget that costs skyrocketed to $3.9 billion. The Liberals lost this country billions of dollars. That is my comment. Out of those $3.9 billion, $1.9 billion were misused. they even gave money to a guy in Victoria, a mechanic, to do scientific research on data processing. He used the money to go to China and write a book on break dancing!

I have another comment to make, Mr. Speaker. I heard the hon. member for Willowdale say the government is giving nothing. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but the latest Budget, and the news was out several months ago, provides that the federal government will set up a mining research centre in Val-d'Or, in the Abitibi, at a cost of $14,830,000 over five years. In today's paper, since he often refers to newspaper articles, the people of Abitibi thanked the Canadian government for establishing and starting up a research laboratory specialized in fragmentation. This means $15 million for a research centre to help the mining industry in our area, so it is not just in the large urban centres. You must know about this. My question is as follows: What do you think of the $3.9 billion that were lost in 1984?

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, it is not my job to defend the actions of the previous Liberal government. However, it is a fact that since 1965, Canada has been losing its competitive position throughout the world.

Mr. Saint-Julien: The robbery of the century didn't make a lasting impression!

Mr. Peterson: I meant that during the past decades, we, as Canadians, whether it was the Liberal government or the Conservative government, have missed opportunities.

Mr. Saint-Julien: It was the Liberals!

Mr. Peterson: Maybe there were a few problems in 1984, when we tried to establish programs to encourage the private sector to do more research and development. I admit, there were some problems with our tax programs. However, the minister at the time is to be commended for having tried to do something about one of our country's biggest economic problems.

You have been the government for seven years now. Since you were elected, the level of research and development has gone down, down, down. You must acknowledge your responsibility. In seven years, you had plenty of time to keep the promise made by your Prime Minister, a promise that was well received by all Canadians because they knew it was necessary for Canada to have more.

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues across the way but for quite different reasons, I am sure, I am delighted to participate in this debate today.

Hon. members of the Liberal party are quite right when they say that science and technology are crucial to the future of the Canadian economy. That is a message that cannot be repeated often enough. It is a truism, but one that I and many of my colleagues have been crossing the country to deliver. Nothing could please me more than to see it discussed in the House today.

We take very seriously our commitment to science and technology. At a time when we have had to cut back on government operations in order to fight a debt that will now reach almost $400 billion, the federal government has increased its R and D spending from $2.5 billion in 1984 to an estimated $3.2 billion in 1990. That is an increase of 28 per cent, while the government at the same time has been under expenditure restraint trying to bring the economy of this country under control.

Total federal science and technology expenditures amounted to approximately $5.5 billion in 1990–91. Those expenditures on science and technology have increased in real terms by 8 per cent since 1984, by an average above inflation of 1.1 per cent each year since taking office. That is not too bad.

Our spending on science and technology grew from 11.1 per cent of all discretionary spending in 1984–85 to 12.3 per cent in 1990–91. That is the true indication of the priority that the government awards to spending on science and technology. This, I might add, is in contrast to the record of the previous government.

I would suggest to this House that these figures demonstrate a strong federal commitment to science and technology in Canada.

Hon. members opposite would like us to do more. We would all like to do more, certainly I would, but the strength of the Canadian economy does not depend solely upon science and technology.

Canada's performance in research and development does not take place in some sterilized atmosphere in some test tube. It takes place in a real world which is influenced by all kinds of important factors. The strength of the economy depends upon the availability of capital, the accessibility of international markets, the value of our dollar, and the general climate for business in the country. We cannot separate science and technology from any of those components.

Each of those factors is strongly influenced by the public debt in Canada, a debt that has been growing since 1970 and a debt that we must get under control.

As the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech a couple of weeks ago, "the interest on the debt alone this year is going to be $43 billion". Just compare that to what we are able to spend in terms of science and technology. The amount we spend in interest payments is eight times what we can afford to pay for all the federal R and D and related science activities.

Think of what we could do with that $43 billion for the granting councils, for the National Research Council, more for big science and little science, for small business involved in the leading edge of the high technology revolution, and more scholarships to young people—all of the things that members of this House want to do, but we cannot do them in the range we wish unless we also take steps to control government spending.

I have lots of favourite programs, as has every member of this House, of the things we might like to do, but we cannot do them if we cannot pay down the debt. We cannot do them if we are spending $43 billion a year just to pay the interest on the debt.

In contrast to some of my colleagues on the other side of the House, I congratulate the finance minister for his budget. He has set us on a real course of fiscal responsibility. He has set us on a course where we will be able down the road to do all the things we want to do. In terms of science and technology, we have always had preferential treatment in every budget that this government has brought down; not as much as I would have liked, but we have always had top priority. I believe that is as it should be.

If finance ministers a decade ago had used fiscal restraint but at the same time had delivered a priority to science and technology, we would be in far better shape today. There is no question about that. We have to tighten our belts, but we recognize the critical role that science and technology plays in the economy.

The recent budget placed expenditure controls on many programs. My colleagues opposite scoff that science and technology, beginning in 1992–93, will receive increases of 3 per cent. When I look at what has happened to other government programs and the way we have to exercise that restraint, I know the Minister of Finance has given us a top priority. That is important. If members opposite would look at the situation realistically, they would agree that the government has done quite well in terms of science and technology operating in these difficult times.

People should know that the Government of Canada by itself cannot change the attitude of industry in terms of promoting more research and development. We cannot shoulder the financial burden. It has to be shouldered by Canadian industry; it has to be shouldered with the provinces, with the universities. When hon. members opposite refer to GERD, gross expenditures on research and development over GDP—and I heard them on many occasions—we have to be very precise in our analysis of the problem. It is not what governments spend, because we compare with most of our competitors in terms of what governments spend. It is what industry in Canada has not found itself able to spend, and that is where we lose out with respect to other countries.

Canada's ratio of gross domestic expenditure on research and development to GDP is 1.35. The ratio in the United States is 2.86, and in Japan it is 2.72. It is an interesting figure to have and points out once again where the funding must come from, where the impetus must come from, if we are going to move forward. I agree with hon. members, and always have, that this is a disturbing situation. But the way to improve the ratio is not to pour more Government of Canada money into science and technology; it is to encourage industry to do more, to devise programs that will allow them to do more.

Incidentally, concentrating on the GERD is in fact only looking with one eye at what industrial people need in this country. It is equally important to concentrate on the amount of technology inflow that we need, as well as the R and D that we need. It is useful to open both eyes and look at both sides of this question.

We compare favourably in terms of civil expenditures. We are about the middle of the pack in terms of public sector spending on research and development. We spend more as a percentage of GDP than does the United States or Britain in terms of civil research; less than France, Sweden and the Netherlands; and about the same as Japan and Italy. Where we fall behind is in our private sector.

When we look at the ratio between industrial and public sector civil R and D we notice once again that Canadian research and development is very heavily dependent upon taxpayers' dollars. That has to change. The ratio in Japan between taxpayers' dollars and industrial dollars is something like 4.38; in France, 1.38; and in United States, 3.13. We have all these figures.

Sweden, in spite of its reputation as a socialist nation, is well ahead of Canada in terms of private sector spending in research and development. Its ratio is 2.49. Again, it points out what we have to do in Canada: increase the amount of industrial research. That is the challenge and it is clear.

Mr. Funk: Elect a socialist government.

Mr. Winegard: We will not get into that today. We must encourage more private sector investment in research and development.

The difference between my colleagues opposite and the government is that we are not just going to say if the private sector increases the amount of research and development, everybody has to increase it by x per cent. We do not know whether that is appropriate or not. We do not know whether some sectors would be far better off to spend their money on technology inflow to adopt and adapt new technologies rather than invest significantly in R and D.

In our opinion there is only one way to go, and that is to do the analysis of the Canadian economy sector by sector and see what the problems are, why they do not invest in R and D, or indeed even if they should. That is one of the contracts we have given to the Science Council of Canada. We expect some of those results will be with us over the next few months.

The solution, as I have said, is not to replace private sector spending with public spending. That has been the record of our country now for 25 years. It does not work, and it is not going to work. We must get the private sector involved.

What can the government do to encourage more private sector R and D? For one thing maybe not generally known—and it certainly would not be known to some of my colleagues opposite—we have created one of the most favourable tax regimes in the world for private sector R and D. We do not say that. A recent Conference Board of Canada study put Canada's support for R and D through the tax system ahead of that of the United States, Britain, Japan, Korea, France, Italy, Sweden, West Germany and Australia. Australia's is probably very close to our own.

Canada's tax system for research and development consists of two main features. First, the ability to write off fully R and D current capital expenditures in the year the costs occur. Second, R and D tax credits are used either to reduce a company's federal income tax liability or they are refunded in cash. The system helps start-up companies, particularly the small companies, get going. That is what we have done.

Canada's tax system—and the latest figures I have are for 1988—was responsible for $764 million in tax credits. That is a substantial contribution to $3.4 billion invested by business that particular year. What is more, 65 per cent of the claims came from small and medium sized businesses, which is the kind of business we are hoping to promote.

Indeed, we have even met with the industries, sector by sector, again to ask: "Does the income tax system work well for you? Is the R and D system working well? What problems do you have? " We have sat down again with Revenue Canada and worked it out sector by sector to see what we could do.

Those things take time. They are not things that are on the front page of the newspaper, but they are the things that will make Canadian industry grow and that is why we are doing them.

Look at the initiatives that we have launched. I do not need to repeat the networks of centres of excellence; 500 researchers at 35 universities and 37 other research bodies all involved in these networks across Canada. That is the way to promote the interaction we need, $244 million to 15 networks. That is a significant amount. The strategic technologies program to promote networks and alliances are being led by industry itself. Forty of these alliance projects are now in place; 13 of them in advanced industrial materials, 20 in biotechnology, seven in the information technologies.

The Canada scholarship program is a massive acknowledgement that young men and women should be studying science and engineering today. That initiative came from the Government of Canada through the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology.

I want to take a moment to talk about the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. It has been very influential in setting the science and technology policy for Canada since it was formed in 1987 with the Prime Minister in the chair. NABST is really responsible for the networks of centres of excellence. It is the one which came up with this idea.

NABST was really behind the Canada scholarship program and particularly the concept of allowing or insisting that 50 per cent of the scholarships go to women. NABST recognized that we are not going to resolve the people problem of Canada unless we can somehow encourage and recruit more young women to science and engineering. NABST was the one which made that recommendation.

It was NABST that was behind the $1.4 billion to science and technology announced two or three years ago. In recent days, the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology has presented to the Prime Minister, and he was in the chair, the financing of industrial innovation, human resources development, and science, technology, innovation and national prosperity. Those recommendations had a significant influence upon the finance minister and the government's commitment to look again at the whole concept of an agenda for prosperity, using innovation and research and development.

I wanted to get those words in on the National Advisory Board because many of the members will be retiring from NABST after serving for three or four years. I wanted to acknowledge publicly their influence, not only upon government programs, but their influence upon government policy. They have had this constant interaction with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the ministers of our department.

Let me conclude on a subject that has always been discussed in the House, and I think all members are very interested in it, and that is women in science and engineering. We heard from my hon. colleagues this morning how we had to do more about the people situation in Canada and we had to change attitudes. I have just a few things to add. Half of the Canada scholarships go to women. Corporate members, institutions and industries are now beginning to support mentor clubs and additional corporate funding for other kinds of scholarships, all hooked into the Canada scholarship program.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, recently the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council have made some interesting innovations. NSERC's policies are intended to encourage women to pursue graduate studies and research and to encourage universities to hire more women as faculty members. In the last competition they had so many good applicants by encouraging women to take faculty positions, that instead of offering 10 fellowships, they offered 20. They just had to do it because the applications were so good.

We have 200 new undergraduate student research awards by NSERC and just a couple of months ago the National Research Council announced that they have in fact a new summer program for women to work in their laboratories across Canada that will stimulate once again the interest of young men and young women in these things. They will go back to their own high schools. They will tell their colleagues and their young friends and their sisters and their brothers of the importance of science and technology.

We have done something about these things. We have had a large program. We have not stood idly by.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I have difficulty containing my anger when I hear the Minister for Science equivocate on the subject of R and D and come up with a zillion excuses to explain why his government, and he as a minister, has failed to increase R and D spending in Canada.

I never said, and no member of my party ever said that the federal government could solve this problem by throwing money at it. What we want from this government is a strategy to encourage Canadian industry to increase its spending on R and D. The minister refers to the deficit and the debt. I would suggest to him that to reduce the deficit, an appropriate balance is needed between raising taxes, cutting spending and increased growth.

I would suggest this government has been singularly unsuccessful in achieving the objectives it set for itself, not only with respect to R and D, which is the subject we are debating here today, but also with respect to reducing the deficit. This minister has the gall to stand up and give us lectures about the importance of controlling the deficit and the debt.

The Minister of Finance, in his first budget some six years ago, forecast that he would reduce the deficit to $18 billion by the end of the decade. Where is the deficit this year? It is forecast in the latest budget to be $30.5 billion. So the Minister of Finance missed the mark by the small sum of $12.5 billion, and this minister has the nerve to stand up here and tell us that reducing the deficit is something that his government knows something about.

The minister studiously avoided the subject of the debate. I wonder whether he even picked up the Order Paper and looked at it. The subject of the debate today is a motion to condemn the government for failing to honour the Prime Minister's promise, and I quote: "to double Canada's spending commitment to research and development."

That should be a matter of some importance to the Minister for Science. But he did not even refer to it during the course of his speech. Why not? Why was it important to the Prime Minister seven years ago when he made that speech, and why is it so unimportant to the minister today that it does not even bear mentioning in his speech? I would remind him that the Prime Minister said also that increasing spending on research and development by just 1 per cent would create some one million jobs in Canada and $20 billion in additional sales of manufactured products. I would suggest that in 1984 the Prime Minister had some idea that R and D might permit the economy to grow and therefore reduce the deficit and debt. But that is a matter which has been thrown out the window by this government.

I would suggest to the minister that he ought to do more than simply berate the private sector for its failures, which is what he has taken to doing like his predecessors. Berating the private sector is the sum total of the efforts of this government to increase R and D spending. It is an admission of failure by the minister. It is abject failure and he should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I find it very interesting that my friend across the way would say we have made no effort. Look at the programs we have put in place.

Maybe what he is talking about is this. Maybe he wants an effort such as they had when he was in power. Maybe he wants a scientific tax credit system that bleeds the system.

There are two ways to do things. It can be done that way, where the only people who make any money are the money shufflers, or it can be done the way we have done it, that is by changing the tax system so that industry is actually encouraged to do more.

I remind the hon. member that since 1984, industrial spending on R and D has increased by 73 per cent. That is better than anything the Liberals were able to do. All they did was to put in tax schemes that made sure no research and development was ever done.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to these exchanges.

I have to say that the hon. minister is a man who came to this place with considerable respect from the scientific community of this country. I think those of us who were involved in science welcomed his appointment because we thought that he would be an advocate for science.

We did not expect him to play games with figures in order to demonstrate a point that cannot be made. For example, he attacked the Liberal record, which is worthy of attack, and said that industrial expenditures have increased since 1984 by 73 per cent. I would ask him: "How does that compare to the growth between 1975 and 1982?" In the absence of comparison those figures mean nothing.

He insists on saying that there have been increased expenditures by government on research and development, and on science and technology. Yet he knows bloody well that the figures he has been providing do not represent a significant increase in expenditure.

He has a right to defend the policies of the government. I wish he would defend research and development, but he has made his choice. I should think that a former president of a university would show sufficient intellectual honesty in defending his position and his government so that we can have a clear understanding of where he really does stand.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, one of the things you learn as president of a university—my colleague might learn a little bit from this—is that it is also necessary to deal with reality.

In fact, the reality is that what this Minister for Science has been able to do with all of my colleagues on this side of the House is ensure that in the last year the granting councils received the highest increase of any part of the Government of Canada. In this current year, they received approximately a 4.8 per cent increase and in the finance minister's budget, they received approximately 3 per cent. Again, this is the highest increase available.

If the hon. member thinks that happened because the people on this side of the House do not care about science, he is quite wrong. We care about it. We have put in whatever money is available. It is discretionary funding, as I have said.

The hon. member across the way may not care about simple things like budgets, but presidents of universities have to worry about things like that. When discretionary funding can be increased from 11 per cent to 12 per cent, that is a significant shift in dollars. It is more than the Liberals have ever been able to do, and I doubt if my hon. friend, who should perhaps go back to teaching biology, would do any better either.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not respond to the latter statements of the minister, who utterly failed to respond to what I would have thought was an extraordinarily provocative statement. I said that the way he uses his figures belies his university experience because they represent, in the manner in which he uses them, intellectual dishonesty. His answer to that was, that I should go back to heading a biology department, a biology department that had a balanced budget for the first time when I became head of the department and had a balanced budget thereafter.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCurdy: And an expanding department at that. I made my case without playing with figures.

We are here to consider a motion that would condemn the government for its failure to fulfil the promise of the Prime Minister, made in 1983, that he would double the rate of national expenditures on research and development by the end of his first term.

If there is anything that is transparently clear in all this world, it is a promise that has not been kept. In fact, as others have noted, the national expenditures on research and development have, in fact, fallen, tumbled since this government came into office. That is indisputably clear.

It is not that the hon. minister, if listened to carefully, seemed to dilute the importance of the gross expenditures in research and development. I think we got a hint that the government is deserting its previous position. But we ought to take note of the fact that virtually anyone who has commented on research and development in this country, including the house committee on industry, science and technology, has identified 2.5 per cent of GDP as an appropriate target for national expenditures and research and development.

Indeed, on my suggestion that committee was quite specific. It said that we should achieve approximately 2 per cent by the year 2000 and 2.5 per cent by the year 2005. This will still leave us behind Sweden, Germany, the United States and Japan.

It is important to understand that what we are talking about is a fundamental requirement for Canadian economic development, for our capacity to produce wealth, for our capacity to produce jobs. A certain kind of job. A job with high wages, high salaries. The kind of wealth that will enable us to sustain our social programs. I say that because the hon. Minister for Science is so facile in blaming this government's failure on the deficit.

If there is anything that anybody by now ought to begin to realize it is that the deficit is not just a question of interest rates. It is not just a question of profligate expenditures by this or any previous government. It is a problem essentially created by our incapacity to generate the kind of wealth that we must generate.

So if we are going to ultimately deal with the deficit, it is not going to be by the helter-skelter cutting of programs left and right, and it is certainly not going to be in the absence of reasonable decisions about appropriate expenditures in areas that ultimately will contribute to Canada's capacity to produce that wealth in a knowledge and technology based economy.

The minister has said, and rightly said, that this is not a problem that has been precipitated by this government. It is not a situation that can be blamed exclusively on it. The fact of the matter is that in the early years of the Trudeau government, 1968, the percentage of our gross domestic product that was spent on research and development was in fact 1.4 per cent.

By the 1970s the Liberal government had allowed that to drop to 0.9 per cent.

I am not talking in abstract terms of statistics, down statistics, I am talking about a full knowledge of the situation in this country with respect to science. There is no one who was in the universities during the late 1960s and 1970s who does not recognize the utter failure of Liberal policy in the area of science. It was the almost overwhelming preoccupation of everyone. Several specific scientific organizations were formed in order to do something about a situation that was made bad by the Liberals but which has been made still worse by this government.

If you look back to 1979, to extend this example, the Conservative government at the time, under the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, did at least undertake to approve a five-year program of assured funding for the granting council, a decision that was completely annulled when the next Liberal government came into office.

We have a situation where a Liberal government promised in 1980 that it would increase GERD, that is gross expenditure on research and development, to 1.5 per cent, but by 1984 it was sitting at 1.4 per cent. But it has fallen since. It has fallen under the leadership of this government.

Every time the question is posed in this House the minister says: "Well, yes, that's true, but it is industry's fault". There is no question that there is a fault in industry, but what kind of leadership is it when expenditures by government do not increase or if they stay steady over that period of time? When in fact this happened, as that percentage that GERD has fallen, the percentage executed by industry, and paid for by industry, has increased. The minister knows that.

It follows, therefore, quite logically, that this government's contribution must have fallen. He will tell you that, for example, the government expenditures on science and technology have increased since this government has been in office from $4.083 billion to $5.450 billion.

He says that is an immense change, an immense increase, and we are all supposed to shudder at the sheer commitment and bravado of this government in pursuing the mission of increasing research and development.

My calculations have that at a 33 per cent increase and over the same period of time the CPI has increased by 35 per cent. My God, fantastic. Are we not all impressed? No, we are not. No, we should not be impressed.

If we look at almost every area in which there is any role for the government, this government has not done what it ought to do.

When this government came into office, we had the lowest percentage of scientists and engineers per thousand in the labour force of virtually any of the OECD countries. That is unchanged.

Let us talk about education. What is the situation at our universities? Our universities are in a state of deterioration because this government's contribution to post-secondary education has decreased.

Mr. Thacker: It's still higher than inflation.

Mr. McCurdy: It is not higher than inflation, sir, I am sorry.

Let us look at what has happened with respect to the GDP between 1978-79 and 1987-88, during which period the GDP increased by 127 per cent. In the meantime, expenditures on university libraries increased by only 93 per cent by comparison. Physical plant expenditures increased by only 81 per cent, capital expenditures by 97 per cent, instruction by 103 per cent.

We have a situation in which the universities are suffering, and meanwhile we have the Established Programs Financing levels being cut at the same time. What has been the situation there? If the EPF formula had not been changed, and had it not been subjected to the six and five formula that was imposed by the Liberals, the EPF payments would have been $7 billion by now.

Mr. Thacker: And the deficit would be 70 billion.

Mr. McCurdy: Even with the six and five it would have been $6.7 billion by now. And, in fact, in 1991 it turns out to be $5.78 billion. On top of that, they are going to cut university expenditures by another $3.8 billion between now and 1996-97.

We have all herd the discussion about the cutback and elimination of cash transfer payments. If one looks at the contribution of the federal government to the research function of the universities—which is really the subject for discussion now—higher education expenditure per researcher in Canada is $60,000 per annum; in the United States, it is $140,000 per annum.

The percentage of the gross domestic product that is spent on the granting councils has fallen from .12 per cent to .1 per cent.

If we could turn to the issue of government-executed research, we have the sorry tale—which all of us in the Ottawa area had an opportunity to hear last night on CBC—where approximately 80 NRC scientists have accepted early retirement. What are they really doing? These are people looking for life jackets to save themselves from what they see to be a sinking ship. And this minister has the gall to tell us that he is doing the best he can, that 3 per cent increases or 5 per cent increases amount to a significant improvement in government's role.

Of course, he returns to that usual song and dance, that it is industry that is failing.

This is the government that has allowed a fantastic increase in the rate of foreign ownership of Canadian industry. And yet his own National Advisory Board on Science and Technology has pointed out that one of the most significant failures in the Canadian economy to achieve a reasonable level of research and development is precisely attributable to the fact that such a high proportion of Canadian industry is foreign owned and does not do research here. Yet they continue to improve and encourage and in no respect prevent this increasing takeover of Canadian industry.

To top that all off, this minister should have understood as others have understood that there are certain kinds of measures that one can take to improve our research and development levels in this country, to encourage industry to do so, such as procurement and other things. The free trade agreement has eliminated some of those mechanisms, as he very well knows, just as the free trade agreement has encouraged the takeover of precisely those industries where science and technology, research and development, can make the greatest contribution to Canada.

He claims that he has fought hard for research and development in this government. If he has fought so hard, why has he not achieved what all members of the committee on industry, science and technology thought could be achieved? Why relatively minor changes in priorities?

Let's take the NRC once more, whose complement of scientists has been cut by about 250 since this government has come into office, whose budget has been cut commensurately, which institution has been so demoralized that it may likely become irrelevant if the efforts of this government are allowed to continue. It was a year ago that its president, monsieur Perron, submitted—and not too many are supposed to know about this—a tentative five-year plan that asked for $250 million in additional funding over five years. Of that amount, $125 million was supposed to go to IRAP. What did they get? The whole of the NRC got $50 million.

We heard a former executive scientist at the NRC on radio last night condemning the actions of this government in having caused such a dispirited complement of scientists that, as I said, they are trying to leave. But he has done such a great job.

That report made a number of other recommendations that could easily have been responded to and effectively responded to by a science minister who was an advocate for research and development for science and technology rather than an apologist for government. It is about time that we had advocacy. It is about time that we had somebody who is going to stand up, as those of us on this side are standing up, for not only research and development as something worthy in itself but something which is fundamental to the future of this country. When he says that they have had tax incentives which have been so generous, maybe it is time to talk about focusing those tax incentives to produce useful activities within the context of national economic priorities rather than giving great sums of taxpayers' money to those who are not adding to our capacity to increase wealth.

The business luncheon, the Dome cabin, the real estate speculation, the foreign investment, all contribute not a thing to Canada's capacity to grow.

Mr. Speaker, I think you would agree with me that there is reasonable concern throughout the leadership in this country in the industrial sector, in the academic sector, in the political sector, about the deindustrialization of this country. With that deindustrialization, we have the descientification of this country. And it will become worse. Unless we address the needs for research and development in industry, in academia and in government, unless we do something about the constant underfunding of a deteriorating university system, unless we do something about the fact that we are graduating fewer and fewer scientists and engineers than we have in a decade, then we are going to see all potential for production of wealth through knowledge fleeing to the United States while the minister insists that the Minister of Finance is doing a good job even while he causes the deindustrialization of this country.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I rise because the member who has just spoken and I come from the same part of the country. I must say that I welcome his speech. I think he has expressed his views in his usual articulate fashion. But what is particularly remarkable about his speech is that it is so inconsistent with the stands that are regularly taken by his party. His party is the one that has consistently over the years engaged in deep, profound and vicious attacks on the Canadian private sector. They have never differentiated between foreign ownership and Canadian ownership. The fact is that if it comes from the private sector, it is simply out exploiting the workers. If it comes from the private sector, it is engaged in activity which is exporting jobs. Never does the member's party ever give any thought that if you are going to spend money on research and development, it must be spent on a basis that is world-wide.

Why is it that the Japanese and the Germans have done so well? It is because they operate an international market, a market that this member's party would have Canadian companies issue. I find it completely inconsistent to understand this member talking about R and D when he would have us live within the narrow borders of our own country as opposed to giving Canadians the competence to take on the world.

The second point that I would make to the hon. member is how can he stand up and talk about what government should do when it is very clear that if the private sector is going to pursue R and D, it will only do so on the basis of confidence in government policies—that means, governments that do what they say they will do—when he belongs to a party that in the province of Ontario has consistently broken every election promise that it made.

Education, they promised us great things in education. The member talks about education. Yet in the province of Ontario the government of Bob Rae is not doing what it said. The government of Bob Rae said that it would do great things for the environment, the basis of all new technological development. The government of Bob Rae has broken every promise, and no one can have anything. The government of Bob Rae in Ontario is not investing the way it said, or the way the private sector requires, or the way Canadians require from the most important economic province in the country in terms of research and development.

The member stands here in the House representing a political party that has broken its word, that is destroying the economic system of what was once the motor of the Canadian economy. My only question to the member is that his party stands for a destruction of the economic system and I do not understand how within that basis he can talk about research and development, because research and development operates with a combination of government, the universities and the private sector. That is where jobs are coming from.

The member represents a party that will create yesterday's jobs, but not tomorrow's.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, that is from a gentleman who has produced so many foreign jobs in his own enterprise.

The member talks about the broken promises of the Ontario government. I did not notice him mentioning the secret $2.5 billion deficit that his party left to that government. But the rest of what he says is so bizarrely out to lunch that I find it almost impossible to respond to him.

He said that we would not open this country to foreign markets.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, the hon. House leader for the opposition.

Mr. Dingwall: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may facilitate the Chair and the hon. member that if he is not able to respond to my colleague in his assertions, I would dearly love to take the floor and perhaps provide further information so that my colleague will then have an opportunity to respond.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order.

Mr. McCurdy: If the hon. member, who has a slightly more than casual relationship to my home city, has not expressed himself clearly enough to be responded to, well then I do not think that we should now accord anybody else an opportunity to clarify it.

If the hon. member had ever come home, then he would have had an occasion on any number of occasions to see precisely what this member and therefore what this party considers is the fundamental of economic development. He will not have heard me say or this party say that we should not compete on the international markets. What he will have heard us say, as I think he might have said on occasion, that the free trade agreement that this government negotiated ties our hands with respect to developing that kind of competitiveness that would allow Canada to compete in the open market.

This I have said. It has not been any Liberal in Windsor who led the construction of an economic development strategy in that city. There was no Liberal who was involved in leading it. This New Democrat was involved in it. If he wants some lessons on how to improve the economy, how to use research and development, how to encourage a community to prepare itself in international competition, I am prepared to do it, but he must first correct his ignorance about where I and my party stand.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I will comment on just exactly who is out to lunch here. There has been enough of it.

I would like to make a comment about my friend talking about generating wealth. Like my friend from the Liberal Party, I too find this quite surprising coming from a member of the NDP. This is a party that wants to tax away anything called profits. This is the party that says it is a nasty word.

Of course the hon. member is absolutely correct. This country must generate more wealth but, at the same time, to ignore the expenditure side of that equation is foolhardy. One generates wealth by looking at how industry can thrive, how it can make profits, and therefore how much research and development it is able to do. The tax regime in this country, which we changed, has been established so that R and D is given very favourable treatment.

Is it not interesting that my colleague just does not seem to want to acknowledge that? In terms of the practice of the R and D tax credits, I have already said that we have gone out sector by sector and looked at how it is working. In the sector, the one my colleague from the Windsor area is so interested in, we have been discussing this with the automotive industry and meeting with Revenue Canada to iron out some of the wrinkles that might be there. Those are the important things to do.

My colleague says that industry has done more, that the ratio is increasing and that is a terrible thing. I do not know what he would expect. If industry does more R and D, then of course the percentage that is done by government is going to be lower as the percentage done by industry increases.

An hon. member: Where?

Mr. Winegard: It is in Hansard, sir; I will show your comments to you.

In the public sector in Canada, .60 GDP is what government does; .5 GDP in Japan. On the industrial side in Canada it is around .7 GDP. So we get a ratio. Of course, as it changes, the government ratio is going to go down. In Japan it is 2.05 GDP. Of course the ratio is quite different. I do not know, but it is simple arithmetic. If we do relatively less on one side than the other, which is what the whole policy is designed to promote, it seems to me that what my hon. friend misses is that the policy is working, hence the numbers that he has put down on the Order Paper here today. Of course it is working.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I provoked both the Liberals and the Conservatives into intellectual dishonesty.

First of all, I have never said, you will never hear me say, nobody will ever hear me say, and nobody can claim to have heard me say that profits were in and of themselves bad things. There is a word for an expression such as the minister's that is so contradictory to the truth.

The minister then goes on with another classical example of the games he plays. He claims that I condemned the increased contribution of industry. He knows very well that what I was doing was stating a simple statistical fact, that if the GERD goes down as a percentage of GDP and industry's contribution goes up then the government's contribution must be going down.

What is bad about it is that the debate is about the fact that this government promised to increase the gross expenditures on research and development, and it is doing it by cutting government expenditures. That is a hell of a way to meet a goal established by a Prime Minister.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a motion which draws the attention of this House and indeed of the people of Canada to a subject of prime concern.

There is no question that Canadians are deeply concerned about our ability to compete internationally in an increasingly global economy. The success of our efforts in greater international competition will depend of course in large measure on our ability to be more productive, particularly in the areas of research and development and in the training and retraining of our work force.

The increasing interdependence in the world means that all industrialized countries place increasing emphasis on research and development, on science and technology in the broadest sense, and indeed on the quality of education of their people.

In Canada we no longer have the possibility of hoping to achieve greater global competitiveness through reliance on our resource industries, industries which for many generations provided Canadians with a high standard of living, but which can no longer provide that level of living to Canadians. We are increasingly challenged by a global economy and by the higher technologies that emerge from such a global marketplace.

If Canada were to engage in protectionism there would be no solution to the questions of our future prosperity. The route we must go is of course to engage fully in the liberalized global trading economy. To do that, we must equip ourselves with the necessary higher technologies and improved human skills which will enhance our comparative advantages and our competitiveness.

The only way to increase our international competitiveness, as I mentioned a moment ago, is through improved productivity. In the high technology sector opportunities for increased productivity are the greatest. Quite obviously Canada should move aggressively into such areas especially as the Third World takes on the simpler forms of manufacturing and mass production. The impetus is there for Canada to engage in higher technology manufacturing and production processes.

It is past time in Canada that we gave more attention to the need for science and technology and for research and development. The current government, when it came to office in 1984, set itself a priority to define a new science and technology strategy. I am sure all Canadians would join me in regretting that, despite the high flown statements of that period, the government did not make the progress it had set for itself.

Through a consultative process, a process which I am sure all of us would endorse, the government of the day did attempt to identify where it is that we could best develop science based innovation in the Canadian economy. However, since setting itself that goal, it has not provided the incentives, the tax incentives in particular, that could have helped to make a reality of that policy initiative.

The centres for excellence which the government committed itself to establishing have not flourished. The networking of university, government and industry laboratories has not proceeded in anything like the way that it has proceeded in the countries with which Canada competes in the global markets to which I referred a moment ago. Canada, on the contrary, continues to fund and conduct its research and development at low levels.

For example, in recent years merely 100 companies accounted for 75 per cent of Canadian industrial research and development, with only 10 companies accounting for 40 per cent of that total. The situation in essence has not improved. The vast majority of Canadian businesses still does not conduct any research and development.

In those circumstances I would ask how it is that we think in Canada that we can keep up with state of the art technologies which are being developed among our principal trade partners.

I want to quote in that context a statement by the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research, which three years ago noted:

> Canada's—capacity to perform in industry strategic applied research—is appallingly weak—A strong capacity to perform long-term applied research is essential as part of our industrial structure, if strategic market opportunities are to be identified by industry and pursued through sound programs of investments keyed to all the elements in the chain of innovation.

That was the judgment of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research some three years ago. There is certainly no reason today to challenge that judgment. In fact, there is every reason to believe the situation has not improved, despite the fact that the reduction in trade barriers including those in the United States—Canada Free Trade Agreement, make it all the more imperative that Canada's research and development capacities be fostered.

I am not one who would advocate that we merely throw money at science and technology. No such simplistic answer would meet Canadian circumstances. There is already some degree of research and development support in our country, although it is relatively low, but it really is the market success of the research upon which we should concentrate and industry should be encouraged to address.

Our traditional comparative advantage in resource industries, which I noted a few moments ago, may have made Canadian industry and indeed the Canadian government rather complacent, but certainly the time for complacency is long since passed, especially in light of the global trade liberalization which I have already touched upon.

It seems to me that the efforts of the government should in general be to develop a broad consensus on the need to improve our scientific and technological base and to identify and capitalize on strategic market opportunities. We should promote industrial consortia, groupings of industrial companies that can augment our capacity for long-term applied research. That too is an area where government incentive could be of great importance.

Equally important, the linkages among industry, university and government to train specialists and to aid in technology transfer could certainly be fostered through the increased privatization of government funded research. Such a policy, I might add, has been in the forefront of the recommendations of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce for sometime, as well as in the case of universities, and yet we have seen little action on the part of this government in that direction.

I would also suggest that we should expand the availability of private equity capital to finance smaller technology based companies. We should look again at the way in which we finance R and D through tax incentives and tax credits.

If this government were to pursue those policies, we would today have a much stronger research and development based industry with which to compete with others.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague on the other side for his as always very thoughtful comments about this issue.

He mentioned the Canadian Institute of Advanced Research and its preoccupation—and it is a good one—with the lack of pre-competitive research in Canada.

That is where we hurt. That is where we are having our difficulty. It is hard to get Canadian industries to co-operate with each other in that area. I like to mention the Sony-Philips consortium which did all of the pre-competitive research for the compact disc. Then, when they realized they could in fact have a product, they went their own separate ways again.

It has been hard to get Canadian companies to accept that kind of philosophy, that kind of co-operation. That is why the networks of centres of excellence were established, to see if we could not bring those units together somehow.

The Strategic Technologies Program responds to some extent to my colleague's concern about industrial consortia. In that program we will provide 50 per cent of the funding for pre-competitive research, either in advanced industrial materials, the biotechnologies or the information technologies. It is a move in the direction that my friend has been talking about.

I think in terms of funding for start-ups and that kind of thing. I hope, when the latest National Advisory Board on Science and Technology reports are released within the next few weeks, that he would be kind enough to give me his personal comments on the issue of financing, which one of those reports does address in some detail. I know his interest and I know his expertise. I would be very grateful for his personal comments when we are able to deliver those reports to him.

Mr. MacLaren: I should be pleased, Mr. Speaker, to respond to the minister's kind suggestion. I certainly shall take the occasion to offer a few comments.

However, let me say at once that I recognize, as I believe he does, that part of the difficulty in this broad area of research and development has been the degree to which foreign ownership has marked the manufacturing industry in particular.

We could, I suppose, engage in a debate today about the merits of previous governments' policies about promoting or indeed discouraging Canadian investment in Canada. However, the time is so limited I think I shall resist that temptation and merely suggest that any government action, and I hope the government would share this view, should be on the supply side, that it would and provide the circumstances through education, through tax incentives and other devices to encourage greater private sector activity. The government would not itself reach in, designate or select specific corporations where some funding might be thought to be of assistance. That would be of course a direct intervention on the part of the government.

I would instead urge this government to look again at its budgetary policies with regard to promoting the circumstances which can give rise to the enhanced growth of R and D in our country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the entire country has become more aware of the crisis problem of violence against women. Indeed, yesterday we debated the need for a royal commission.

For the past few months, the subcommittee on the status of women has been hearing testimony on the terrible and terrifying subject. But it is clear that not all legislators are as concerned with or as sensitive to this issue as we might wish. I refer to Ontario's Minister of Consumer and Corporate Relations, sunshine boy extraordinaire, who has hired as his adviser on sexism a man convicted of assaulting his common law spouse.

Premier Rae's office said that Mr. Grimaldi has made his penance. While no one disagrees, I ask: "Is this the message that Bob Rae and the New Democrats want to send?"

This appointment is no joke. It is an affront to the women of Canada. Mr. Kormos and his cavorting demeans himself, his government and the profession of politics.

CANADA POST

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, according to a Decima poll released this week, 90 per cent of rural Canadians are satisfied with the results of Canada Post's rural conversion program.

Yet people are complaining of a reduction of service in towns like Dubuc in Saskatchewan where one person wrote to Canada Post saying: "We have no counter service at all on Mondays. Any emergency mailings have to be taken out of town even though we used to have counter service Monday through Saturday".

A person from Claremont, Ontario sent a letter to us to protest the closure of their post office. She says: "You just have not seen this the way the average Canadian resident does. We want our post office". These letters and many others in the same vein were also sent to the minister's office, but it seems he has chosen to ignore them.

The minister should know that polls do not always reflect reality, except maybe when it comes to evaluating the popularity of his party. But this is one exception.

TIBET

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, last Monday, I had the honour of addressing a group of Tibetan Canadians to celebrate the 1959 uprising in Lhassa.

It is true to say that the government of Canada does not recognize Tibet, but it is also true to point out that no Canadian government did since 1959.

However, I want to remind the Tibetan community that the government of Canada cares greatly for their fellow countrymen and women and did not hesitate to condemn the Chinese government in the UN, through the Canadian ambassador, Mr. Yves Fortier, who told the UN Human Rights Commission last November, and I quote:

> We will continue criticizing the Chinese government for its breaches in the field of human rights. By proclaiming the concern of the people of Canada for the respect of basic human rights in China, we are not trying to isolate that country. We believe that we are encouraging China, by keeping it in contact with ideas from abroad, to start up again the reform process launched ten years ago.

We are hoping, Mr. Speaker, that this would allow Tibet to regain freedom.

INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF CANADA

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, we had an opportunity, yesterday, to hear what the President of the United States had to say about the political status of Canada and particularly the exaggerated interpretation given by the Prime Minister of Canada.

I think that, if it was unacceptable for De Gaulle to come and state his views of the Canadian and Quebec political environment in the 1960s, it is equally unacceptable for the President of the United States to interfere today in the internal affairs of Canada.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we hope that the President of the United States will have seen through the Prime Minister and, in the future, apply a strict non-interference policy regarding Canadian internal affairs.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in my riding, we are very proud to have a higher than average population of veterans.

We are naturally pleased at the positive attitude taken by the Minister of Veterans Affairs last week when he indicated that services to veterans and their families will not be affected by the budget and spending restraints. The minister is confident that his staff and officials can meet the fiscal restraint as an opportunity and management challenge. Just as private industry has been required to cut its cloth to fit today's competitive times, so the Public Service is more than capable of adjusting to the new realism.

The Department of Veterans Affairs plays a very important role in Cumberland—Colchester, and I appreciate the minister's firm stand and the support of his department.

INDUSTRY

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Canada's only fax machine manufacturer, the Widecom Group of Mississauga, has recently been recognized by the Guinness Book of Records for developing the world's largest facsimile machine.

This new product will allow for the first time the transmission of blueprints, engineering drawings and other oversized documents. Three years of privately funded research by Widecom will create many new jobs in Mississauga and help the Canadian economy when manufacturing escalates to meet foreign demand.

This government should learn from high technology companies like Widecom and reverse its decision to cap funding to science and technology and post-secondary education. The future of Canada should be given more credit.

CANADA-U.S. AIR QUALITY ACCORD

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, for more than ten years, the whole eastern part of Canada, particularly the Eastern Townships in Quebec, have been plagued with the very serious problem of acid rains. The maple groves of Tingwick, Ham-Nord and Disraeli, in my beautiful riding of Richmond—Wolfe are economically very important for farmers and producers. The same can be said about deciduous and coniferous forests that are unfortunately suffering also from those acid rains.

The signing of a treaty between Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Bush in Ottawa yesterday fortunately ensures our environment will be saved and preserved since the treaty lays down precise rules regarding maximum levels of emissions. It also forces both parties to cooperate closely in environmental planning.

That is a tremendous gain for Quebec as well as the riding of Richmond—Wolfe, and it took only five years to achieve, while previous governments sat and did nothing about that for ten years.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERMEN

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, nobody can support acts of vandalism like those that were perpetrated last Tuesday in Port-aux-Basques. But we have to understand the nub of the problems that led Newfoundland fishermen to resort to such measures.

Those fishermen are in a wedge, Mr. Speaker. While large foreign factory ships swallow up our fish stocks, their quotas are cut. High interest rates and new taxes increase their production costs.

And above that, the Minister of Fisheries is imposing this new burden on them: a wharf suveillance program for which the fishermen will have to pay themselves.

Mr. Speaker, Newfoundland fishermen see their standard of living taking a plunge and the Minister of Fisheries is slapping them in the face. That is why they are angry. If the Minister wants to avoid any more violence, he will have to stop ignoring the demands of the fishermen and start listening to them.

CANADA-U.S. AIR QUALITY ACCORD

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, two days ago I was pleased to mention in this House the good news with respect to the decontamination of different sites in Quebec because of the initiative taken by our government. But today, Mr. Speaker, we have one more reason to be happy since the Prime Minister and the President of the United States, Mr. Bush, have signed yesterday the long-awaited agreement on acid rain control and air quality.

Mr. Speaker, that is another of our government's tangible achievements in the environmental area. And that was made possible for both countries thanks to the dedication and never ending work of the Prime Minister, Mr. Brian Mulroney, who has been so determined as to put forward an agreement that will benefit both our countries as well as future generations.

In the name of the people of my riding, I want to pay him a tribute today and I urge all members of this House to do the same because that is an important achievement for all Canadian men and women. Congratulations, Mr. Prime Minister!

MEDICARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): After Michael Wilson's budget comes the deluge, Mr. Speaker. For Canadians depending on medicare, this has meant a deluge of proposed user fees, deinsuring of medical services, closure of hospital beds, and lay-offs of health personnel. Yesterday the Tory Nova Scotia minister of health suggested charging an annual premium for all Nova Scotians using medicare, similar to the premiums now levied by the Tory provinces of B.C. and Alberta.

• (1410)

This user fee would be in addition to the higher charges for such services as prescription drugs and children's dental care. All of these charges and fee increases flow directly from the five-year freeze on federal contributions to provincial medicare plans.

When asked how he will protect Canadians from the growing erosion of medical services, the minister of health and welfare always mentions the Canada Health Act. Nothing in that act stops the provinces from charging premiums, laying off health personnel, closing hospital beds or taking away services.

What the minister is really saying to low and middle income Canadians who depend on medicare is: "Let them eat cake".

SEAN O'SULLIVAN

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the House a very important and, for me, a most sentimental occasion which will take place on Parliament Hill next Monday, March 18.

Many on all sides of the House will remember with fondness the late Sean O'Sullivan, who was my predecessor as MP for Hamilton—Wentworth and, indeed, one of the youngest and finest members of Parliament ever to grace this Chamber.

Sean resigned his seat in 1977 and dared to become a priest with great distinction. He was appointed a member of the Order of Canada.

God took Father Sean from us in March 1989 at the age of 37 after a long battle with leukemia.

This House will commemorate Sean in a formal way. We passed a resolution in November 1990 that a sitting room at the Wellington Street entrance to the East Block be set aside as a meditation place for people of all faiths. This room, to all those who enter it, will forever be a reminder of God's special friend, Father Sean O'Sullivan.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, on Monday in my riding of Dartmouth at CFB Shearwater I had the pleasure of welcoming home some of the first of the Canadian men and women returning from the Persian Gulf.

These troops, from various Canadian forces bases, returned after proudly contributing to the successful efforts of freeing Kuwait from the oppression of Saddam Hussein.

These brave Canadian men and women are a model of strength and courage which all Canadians should greatly admire and respect. They placed their lives on the line in the name of Canada to preserve freedom and democracy, life and liberty, peace and humanity.

The remainder of their colleagues serving on the Terra Nova, the Athabaskan, and the Protecteur is steaming back toward Canada. I know, Mr. Speaker, that when their ships arrive in Halifax harbour, they will be witness to the gratitude and thanksgiving of all Canadians as tens of thousands of Nova Scotians will line the shores of Halifax harbour to say thank you and welcome home.

They have served us well but, more so, have caused us to reflect on how fortunate we all are to live in this great country, Canada. For their service and their example we say thank you and wish them a safe and speedy trip home.

AIR QUALITY ACCORD

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, sustainable development, one of the most important issues in Canada and around the world, focuses on balancing economic concerns with environmental concerns.

In the pursuit of the goal of sustainable development, Canada's Prime Minister Brian Mulroney and American President George Bush signed the historic Canada–U.S. air quality accord.

This agreement sends an important signal to the world and demonstrates that a key element in achieving sustainable development is a determined spirit of co-operation, not only between countries but also between various levels of government, industry, the scientific community, and the public.

If we are to continue to address successfully the needs of our society, then we must work together to ensure that environmental goals are responsibly pursued in our efforts to meet the ever-increasing economic challenges.

Let us work together for a cleaner environment and a better quality of life for all Canadians.

HEALTH

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, a woman in New York was just awarded $4.5 million after a jury ruled that a toxic substance released from the foam covering of a Meme breast implant caused cancer in that woman. They were amazed that a product which contains a known carcinogen would be implanted in women.

Canadian women are not protected from this. Since last April I have twice raised this issue in the House with the minister of health. I asked that he remove the product from the market until it was proven to be safe. He accused me of fearmongering.

The FDA in the U.S. has recently taken steps which would implement the strict regulation of breast implants. They will have to prove the safety and effectiveness of implants before they are allowed on the market.

This is similar to measures which are included in a private members' bill which I have introduced in this House.

The minister of health must listen and take steps to ensure that women in this country are protected, and to ensure that Canada does not become a dumping ground for implants ruled unsafe in the United States.

MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to learn that the provincial minister responsible for sexism in advertising appeared as a sunshine boy in a widely circulated Toronto newspaper.

As if that wasn't bad enough, I have since learned that the same minister saw fit to hire his close friend, a convicted wife beater, as his policy adviser on sexism in advertising.

As a woman, I am concerned that someone with such questionable credentials should be given any responsibility for women's issues. It also speaks volumes about the provincial minister who has shown such poor judgment on both counts.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On Tuesday the Prime Minister refused to answer a specific question about whether he would be telling President Bush that Canada is now dropping its 15 per cent tax on softwood lumber exports.

Given the length of the photographic opportunity and the meetings between the President and the Prime Minister yesterday, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in fact, he informed the President that we will be dropping this tax which penalizes Canadian lumber exports.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret that my hon. friend was offended by the length of the photographic opportunity. It was to accommodate the growing number of Liberal members of Parliament who wanted to have their pictures taken with the President. I was happy to arrange it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister could answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: No, he didn't ask for you, Paul.

Apart from the signing of the acid rain treaty, which this Parliament has sought for over a decade and which I think brings honour to all members of Parliament who fought for it, we also dealt extensively with a number of important bilateral issues including the softwood lumber issue.

The Minister for International Trade continues to consult with the provinces that are affected by it, and once all of the provinces have agreed to a common approach, then I will follow through on the very productive meeting I had with President Bush last night in regard to this, preparing him for the positions that we hope will emerge from the consultations of the minister.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, indeed, Canadians were pleased that the Prime Minister was finally photographed signing the agreement which he announced in a similar photographic experience about a year ago.

In a second question specifically related to some bilateral issues that have not been settled, I would like to ask the Prime Minister this. In light of the fact that the Canadian Lumbermen's Association has stated that the combination of the high dollar policy of this government, combined with the 15 per cent lumber tax, has led to rampant mill closures and has created a situation which is the worst since the "dirty thirties", I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he discussed this issue very specifically with the President of the United States, and whether he put a deadline on when Canada intends to withdraw this tax which is penalizing our own industry.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members know there is an intensive consultation under way here in Canada with respect to this question between myself and ministers and premiers of provinces that are involved in the question of softwood lumber exports to the United States.

That process of consultation should soon be concluded.

There is opposition, as the hon. Acting Leader of the Opposition should know. There is opposition in the Atlantic provinces to our even taking this matter up with the United States. I am meeting tomorrow morning with ministers from the Liberal government of New Brunswick, who are, as one example, opposed to our taking this issue up with the United States at all. When we have these matters resolved, if we can get the consensus in Canada, we will certainly be proceeding. In the meantime, we are going to finish our consultations before we engage the United States directly on the matter.

• (1420)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, once again, given the fact that it was not the Minister for International Trade but the Prime Minister who spent at least a full working day with the President yesterday, during which he should have had an opportunity to discuss this issue, I would like to ask the Prime Minister—

My third question is for the Prime Minister. Given the fact that thousands of jobs have been eliminated by his high dollar policy and the 15 per cent tax on our lumber exports, I would like to ask him whether he is ready to announce today that he will cancel the export tax on lumber to give workers in that industry a chance to go back to work?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the government is not going to announce today any such thing. There is a process of consultation under way between the government, provincial governments and the industry in this country. There is no 100 per cent consensus on what action should be taken.

I would make this point, that if the then Liberal Government of Ontario had been more co-operative by implementing some measures with respect to the situation in Ontario, our case might have been easier. Nevertheless, we think there have been certain fundamental changes since the MOU went into effect. The time has now come for it to be removed.

I have no doubt that the government will decide on a course of action involving consultations with the U.S. presently, but the first thing we are going to do is finish our consultations with the interested parties in Canada.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance.

The budget is forecasting that unemployment will remain at 10 per cent during 1992 and 1993. According to Laurent Thibault, the outgoing president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, half of the manufacturing jobs lost because of the recession will be lost for good.

What kind of help are the minister and the government going to give to people thrown out of work, not until next summer or next fall, but forever?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, to respond to the hon. member, who asks about the level of manufacturing activity in our economy, he should know, first of all, from reading the Royal Bank report at the end of 1990, that the manufacturing base of the Canadian economy is 9.6 per cent ahead of where it was at the end of 1982. That is still there. We have a stronger manufacturing economy than we did at that time.

Even more important, we had record investments in capital and new machinery and equipment in 1988 and 1989. All of this was put in place thanks to the prospect of the free trade agreement and, of course, the experience of the free trade agreement.

As a result of all this, we have a good base for the future if we can continue to get interest rates down and bring inflation down, and that is what the new budget was meant to do.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, comparisons to 1982 do not do anything for the 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work today.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Given the fact that in the last two weeks both his Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have admitted that they pursued the wrong policies prior to the last election and that Canadians are now paying the price for that, will he assure us that he will take the first step necessary to promote economic recovery in Canada and give us a new Minister of Finance who an be trusted to handle this economic crisis?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all, my hon. friend will understand if I take exception the interpretation that he has placed on statements made by the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada. An accurate reading will indicate that that is not the statement, as he has reported it, that was made. That being said, I think there is general acknowledgement in this House and certainly across the country that Michael Wilson is probably one of the finest ministers of finance—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: You notice that I said "one of the finest ministers of finance", the other being seated not very far from me right here.

BUSINESS COUNCIL ON NATIONAL ISSUES

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The finance minister said yesterday in the House that the Business Council on National Issues that commissioned a study on competitiveness was actually a government-initiated partnership with the BCNI and other groups.

These reports on this very important study could in fact have an impact on the national unity debate. Yet I understand that it will be in fact the Business Council on National Issues which decides what will be released and when it will be released.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. The government has given $400,000 to the Business Council on National Issues for research purposes. I ask the government if today it will commit to spending the same amount of funding for research for other groups which might have a similar interest, not only in competitiveness, but in the national unity debate, such as aboriginal people, the ethnocultural community and small business?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada gives grants from time to time to organizations. It has given millions of dollars to the Canadian Labour Congress over the years in grants and for specific purposes to other organizations.

I am not acquainted with all of the details of this. It would not strike me as being inappropriate that there would be a study on competitiveness done jointly with the Business Council on National Issues. That strikes me as being more appropriate than with perhaps an aboriginal group. The aboriginal groups receive grants for perhaps other purposes.

If my hon. friend, in respect of the question which she raised which dealt with international competitiveness and enhancing Canada's productivity, is making a request for a grant to a specific organization to conduct such a study, we would be happy to look at it.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. Will there be just, fair and even-handed treatment for all groups which have an interest in the future of this country?

Last week the Prime Minister's chief constitutional adviser met at Meech Lake to discuss a number of papers commissioned by the Business Council on National Issues and done by distinguished academics across Canada. Two days ago, the Prime Minister, in this House in response to a question that I asked as to whether he would have similar meetings held with aboriginal groups, ethnocultural groups and other such interest groups, agreed that he would do so. I understand that the Prime Minister has received a written request from the Ethnocultural Council and the Assembly of First Nations for such meetings.

My question for the Prime Minister is this. Given his very positive response on Tuesday, can he tell this House when those meetings will be held and who will be involved in those meetings?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in an earlier question my hon. friend suggested that the meeting that had taken place at Meech Lake, of academics and people interested in the Constitution, was somehow directly or indirectly associated with the BCNI. That is not the case. It was a consultation conducted by the Government of Canada of groups totally unrelated to the BCNI. I indicated to my friend that if she had any ideas or if anyone else was interested in a consultation that we would be happy to oblige.

The member seems to be more aware of my correspondence than I am. She indicates that I have received a letter from the Ethnocultural Council. I will be happy to look at it and let her know. I am struck by the fact that the leader is on her feet today asking for more grants to bodies and last week she was on her feet saying that Spicer was too expensive.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister is missing the point. The national unity debate belongs to everyone in Canada, not just the corporate community and everyone must have equal access to resources and to the expertise and time of the Prime Minister's office. Canadians deserve that.

This week, the government voted against our motion which would have opened up the constitutional process.

This government is saying that it wants an open process. This coming summer, provincial and territorial commissions as well as the committees and groups appointed by the government will have finished their work.

I am asking the Prime Minister whether he can guarantee us that all this work will not result in a federal-provincial conference or in bilateral negotiations, but rather in a real people's forum, like a constituent assembly or convention.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the NDP motion that was debated in this House would place the Canadian government, the Parliament of Canada, in an unacceptable strait jacket in terms of future negotiations and consultations.

The hon. member knows it, and that was the aim of the motion, which is not a very noble goal. The leader of the New Democratic Party will have to recognize that.

As to her fundamental question, I mentioned several times— I don't know whether she has been traumatized, but every time she gets up she talks about the corporate elite.

[English]

What about the big labour elite? Why is the hon. member so traumatized by the corporate elite and so comfortable with big labour rules?

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. The minister told us today that he is trying to seek a consensus among the provincial premiers on the surtax on softwood lumber exports. He has said some provinces, notably New Brunswick, are against approaching the Americans.

The question I would like to ask is, what is the position of the federal government and what is the minister advising his provincial counterparts?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the position of the government and my position is that matters have changed since 1986 when the countervail duty case was launched. There have been considerable changes since then. Several provinces have instituted new stumpage charges in their provinces, such as British Columbia and Quebec. There have been significant changes in the industry. Our dollar has appreciated 19.4 per cent. Our share of the U.S. market has dropped from 33 per cent to 27 per cent. So there have been very considerable changes.

Anyone who examines this question impartially and rationally will agree, I am sure, that the time has come for the memorandum of understanding to be done away with. However, we are not necessarily dealing with people who are rational or impartial. We are dealing with people like the hon. gentleman opposite. Therefore, it is not going to be easy to accomplish this. We have to assess the risks and the possible benefits, which we are now in the process of doing.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister.

The 15 per cent surtax coupled with a high dollar policy have caused close to 100,000 job losses in the forestry industry. The minister has said that he wants to renegotiate the agreement, but the American Congress has said that it would not. Can the minister tell us what the government will do if the Americans refuse to negotiate? Will the government take some firm action on behalf of the tens of thousands who have already lost their jobs in the forestry industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the memorandum of understanding with reference to softwood lumber is not the only matter that has affected the softwood lumber industry. When we decide upon a course of action, I want the provinces—or most of them—supportive of that course of action. When I am out in front leading the charge down in Washington, I do not want them suddenly disappearing behind my back. That is the purpose of this consultation; to make sure we are united and agreed on the course of action we are going to follow through, no matter how tough it might be.

POVERTY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, with an unemployment rate of over 14 per cent and retail sales that dropped 20 per cent this month, Montreal has become the unemployment capital of Canada. With unemployment comes poverty. So much so that this year, 53,000 families are obliged to go to the Sun Youth Food Bank. This is a disgrace, and it also very sad. I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister what kind of programs the government is going to set up in Montreal to help these families get out of the poverty cycle and store their dignity?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I agree the economic situation in Montreal is difficult. We realize this and we sympathize with the people who are in this situation. However, it must be said that the government has done a great deal since 1984 for the Montreal area. We have invested hundreds of millions of dollars, and I could name a number of examples for the benefit of the hon. member for Mount Royal. Recently, the Minister of Science and Technology invested $112 million in one of the poorest areas in Montreal, and I am referring to the southwest. And we also set up a training centre for petrochemical workers in East Montreal. Since 1985, we have created 83,000 jobs in Montreal, and that is better than the previous Liberal government which lost 4,000.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): The ex-psychiatric people, the single parent families, the poor and the elderly are not interested in being statistics. These are human beings who are lining up at these food banks and need to be fed.

Even in my own riding of Mount Royal, a food bank and food aid are needed. Formerly, Multicaf used to distribute about 30 baskets per month. Now we are up to 350 baskets per month. This is a terrible human catastrophe. My supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. In a country where we have a food surplus, I would like to know whether he is prepared to help food banks fill their shelves. And if not, who is going to feed the poor in our communities in Montreal?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member when she says there are many poor people in Montreal. However, my colleague should also realize that since 1984, we helped 760,000 people in Canada rise above the poverty line. This is cold comfort for the people who are still living in poverty, but nevertheless, one-third of these people—the hon. member refered to children as well—one-third of those 760,000 people who are no longer living below the poverty line are children. So we have made progress in a number of other areas. In Montreal, for instance, the Space Agency has created jobs. The Liberal party tried to kill the petrochemical industry in Montreal but the Prime Minister rescued it. It is true Montreal has problems, but this Conservative government has done a lot for Montreal.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My question is to the Minister of the Environment. On November 18, 1987, the Prime Minister and President Reagan signed an agreement on Great Lakes water quality, which adopted zero discharge of persistent toxic substances into the Great Lakes.

The principles of that agreement have never been enforced and the horrible effects of toxics are now seen on fish, wildlife and human health.

• (1440)

In fact there have been only seven pollution prosecutions in all of Canada under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act since 1988.

Would the minister explain why the government plans now to enforce zero discharge of toxics only in Lake Superior? Will that not turn other water bodies in Canada into toxic waste dumps?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my colleague opposite that the government has acted very aggressively in terms of cleaning up the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River basin.

We are making progress both in the Great Lakes and in the St. Lawrence River with programs that total some $260 million. We will be moving in the very near future with the U.S. on a joint agreement in terms of further clean-up operations in the Great Lakes. We are moving very firmly to meet the commitment that we have made for the virtual elimination of toxic chemicals by the year 2000. We still maintain that we will move to zero discharge down the road.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as of today, only seven of Canada's provinces are part of the national acid rain reduction program, while all the United States is covered by the 1990 U.S. clean air legislation, both National CAP and National Reduction Program.

Would the minister explain why last November 27 he said that the agreement of the three western provinces was necessary to make yesterday's acid rain accord fly?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the answer is very simple.

I met all the members of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment in Victoria. We discussed the issue thoroughly, and I got the agreement of all provinces to meet the goals of limiting emissions as we have stated in the agreement yesterday.

LAND CLAIMS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Justice.

Members will know that the crisis which erupted last summer in Kanesatake and Kahnawake resulted basically over a land dispute. When the minister realized that this disputed land was destined to become a golf course, why did the minister not exercise his or her authority and bring in an immediate moratorium on the development of any land in dispute?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, if I may, as my hon. colleague probably remembers, at the time of the dispute there had been negotiations with respect to that particular land in Oka.

The negotiations had been going on for about two years. As a former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development at the time, I had appointed negotiators to do that. Negotiations at the time were suspended by the new chief and council that had just been elected at that time.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question goes unanswered.

Basically, the acting minister will know that indeed the Government of Canada has myriad statutes available to it, providing expropriation powers that could have been exercised to diffuse the situation.

Having said that, testimony received last night from an environmental group provided unprecedented evidence that the land in question has historical environmental significance. This is supported by a petition of 1,200 names.

If this group considers it to be of such value that it would equal the status of a world heritage site, why then would the minister not exercise his or her authority and put on a moratorium?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, again I think everybody would agree here. The hon. member in particular should agree to the proposition that best way to settle land claims issues in this country is at the negotiating table.

If the band and council had come to the negotiating table, as we were prepared to be there for over a year, it might have been settled then and would be settled now.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last June the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick unanimously adopted legislation to enshrine the principles of Bill 88 which acknowledges the equality of both official linguistic communities in New Brunswick. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to ask the Parliament of Canada to adopt this amendment to our Constitution?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will recall that the constitutional agreement signed by the First Ministers in June 1990, when that legislation was adopted in New Brunswick, provided for two amendments to Bill 88.

One bilateral amendment provided for the enshrinement of the principle of equality of both linguistic communities in New Brunswick and the role of the provincial government as protector and promoter of that characteristic. As the hon. member will recall, the second amendment was to protect the contents of Bill 88 by preventing amendments without the unanimous agreement of the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick and of the federal Parliament.

Now since the second amendment, linked to the first, died with the Meech Lake failure, any over-all approach to the Bill 88 solution died right along with it. What the Governments of Canada and New Brunswick should do now would be to get together and consider the best way to achieve our common goal—Canada's and New Brunswick's—of enshrining Bill 88 in the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the Prime Minister this: Is the Prime Minister of Canada, through the minister who just answered, saying no to the Premier of New Brunswick who is asking, on behalf of Acadians from his province, for the entrenchment of Bill 88, as passed unanimously by the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly, an essential Act for the survival of Acadians in Canada, under the present circumstances.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker. I told the Premier of New Brunswick that we also wanted to see the rights of Acadians entrenched. That is one of the reasons why it was so important for all legislative assemblies to approve the Meech Lake Accord, because the entrenchment of those rights was directly related to this project. But unfortunately, it is also one of the reasons why the rights of an important majority, the Acadian people, were affected by all this.

As the minister just said, I have met the Premier of New Brunswick and we are working together to find means, and even constitutional means, to entrench and better protect the vital rights of the Acadians and French-speaking residents of New Brunswick.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): I have a question for the Minister for International Trade, and I want to assure him that I am entirely rational and certainly impartial.

I want to point out to him that there are two sides to every story, and some members today have called for the government to drop the 15 per cent tax on softwood lumber. In Atlantic Canada we are very much opposed to such an action because it could have very damaging effects on an area of Canada that has really been an innocent bystander throughout this whole argument.

We seek the consensus of all the provinces or I understand you do. I want to ensure that all those provinces included all the Atlantic provinces, that you do not risk any countervail action through these negotiations and consider the concerns of Atlantic Canada in this very important issue.

Some hon. members: What is your question?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is certainly the first rational question I have had today.

The fact we have to keep in mind is that 90 per cent of softwood lumber exports to the United States, valued at $2.6 billion in 1990, came basically from two major producing provinces, British Columbia and Quebec, and their concerns have to be paid close attention to by us.

I am aware of the views particularly of the industry and Governments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

• (1450)

We have had three consultations with them. I will meet again tomorrow with the New Brunswick minister responsible for forestry and the acting minister of commerce and technology.

Everyone's views will be kept in mind, but there is one salient fact: 90 per cent of the softwood lumber exports, valued at $2.6 billion, are from these two provinces, British Columbia and Quebec. We simply cannot ignore their interests which are being seriously affected in this case.

ACOA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Back on December 30 The Ottawa Citizen reported that CB Chemicals, a company that received $13 million in support from ACOA and the Government of Nova Scotia, was under RCMP investigation.

My question to the Solicitor General is simply this: Could he tell us whether CB Chemicals is one of those 12 companies that the Minister of Public Works cited as being under RCMP investigation?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am the acting minister for ACOA today, in the absence of my desk-mate.

I think the minister responsible for ACOA gave an excellent answer yesterday when he said that he was not going to give the names of any of the firms in question that might be at the present time investigated by the RCMP.

There were 12. In over half the cases, seven cases, the matters complained about were caught at the officials' level before any funding whatsoever was made or disbursed by ACOA. Most of the cases are old news. They were known a year or a year and a half ago.

I think the House should remember that 7,600 applications have been approved by ACOA since 1987, with $600 million committed and $1.8 billion leverage to the private sector, creating over 20,000 jobs.

When the hon. gentleman carps and brings this up in an attempt to embarrass the government or to embarrass individuals, he should keep that in mind.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I will be very straightforward. I think the government does enough to embarrass itself.

My question is really very simple. If the Royal Canadian Mounted Police provide press releases by which we find out, for example, that Technitread is under RCMP investigation, then why can't the government come clean about those 12 RCMP investigations set out by the minister himself in the House of Commons, rather than wait for press releases from the RCMP?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, not only is the question very simple but so is the hon. member.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could answer the question.

Mr. Crosbie: All right, I will say that the hon. member is very complicated, Mr. Speaker.

With respect to this issue, some months ago the minister responsible for ACOA took the initiative with respect to the Enterprise Cape Breton operation to appoint a commissioner or a person to look into the operations of Enterprise Cape Breton, in the person of a Mr. Tony Brait.

There is no attempt to hide that there has been difficulty in certain instances in Atlantic Canada, but these are a very small proportion of the 7,600 applications. One wonders why the hon. member is carrying on a vendetta against Atlantic Canada with these questions.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Agriculture.

In 1985, after a reduction in commercial interest rates, the Minister of Agriculture reduced the interest on Farm Credit Corporation loans from 14 per cent to 12.75 per cent.

Given recent reductions in interest rates, will the Minister of Agriculture now announce the same thing for the period of high interest rates that we just finished?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the Farm Credit Corporation is a Crown corporation and a good one. It regularly lends money to farmers. It has to compete on the commercial market.

As interest rates go up, unfortunately it charges more. As interest rates come down, it will be charging less. The Farm Credit Corporation will be judging that itself and making announcements accordingly.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): If that logic is so wrong today, why was it so right in 1985?

[Translation]

Back to the Prime Minister. I would like to ask him the following: The farm industry needs the assistance of this government and the Prime Minister. A precedent was set in 1985. Since his minister is unwilling to take action, will the Prime Minister announce today a reduction in interest rates on existing Farm Credit Corporation loans? If not, could he tell us why, since he did it in 1985?

[English]

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, that member was not around in 1981 and 1982 when the Farm Credit Corporation was forced to charge interest rates way above what we have now.

I happen to have been a farmer and a member then and know what kind of damage the policies of that government did to the agricultural community. We are still trying to recover from them.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade is quoted in Maclean's magazine: "Most of the auto parts work in Canada is not highly skilled. That kind of work will be done in Mexico or it will be done somewhere like Mexico, other than in Canada".

Is this why the minister is rushing hell-bent into a free trade agreement with Mexico?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to discover that the hon. gentleman reads Maclean's magazine.

If he looked at the transcript of the reporter who conducted the interview he would see exactly what I said. I said that with respect to low value-added and less skilled work in the auto parts industry, that is a matter where we cannot stop competition from lower wage countries such as Mexico and many others being extremely effective.

We are interested in the higher value added, skilled end of the industry, and there Canada can compete just as the auto parts manufacturers say they can. There we will compete and there we will be very competitive under free trade. With free trade we are globally competitive, and there is nothing to be afraid of if you have any faith in the auto parts industry or in Canada.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, auto parts manufacturers of Canada do not agree with the minister. According to their letter, the auto parts industry is in the vanguard of high technology in Canada's manufacturing base in terms of automation, robotics, and other technologies. They say: "Your comments are unacceptable to us. Your comments are criticizing the technological skills base of not only the 75,000 auto parts manufacturers in Canada, but the 300,000 other related workers in related industries".

Will the minister take back his statements? Will he start fighting on behalf of Canadian jobs and workers rather than just dismissing them with the stroke of a pen?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, these are the gravest accusations since Emile Zola.

Members of the auto parts industry just wrote me a letter. Apparently they sent the hon. gentleman a copy, because they read the same article as the hon. member and have drawn the same wrong conclusion as the hon. member. I never said what they say I have said, or you said I said. I never said it, as I just explained a few minutes ago.

ARMS SALES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the United States President appeared to dump cold water on the idea of a global summit on arms sales, an idea which had support on all sides of the House.

The United States and other countries in fact are already lining up to sell arms to the Middle East, despite the admonition of the Prime Minister to the contrary.

Can the Prime Minister report to the House on this aspect of his talks yesterday with President Bush? Is the global summit dead? Are there alternatives that the government would have in mind if in fact the idea is a goner?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that President Bush, were he here, would want me to correct the misstatement in the prefatory remarks of my hon. friend. He did not throw cold water on it.

As the minister of trade suggests, it is important to read the transcript. Here is what he said. "I am not sure exactly what the proper structure is for this, but clearly that idea"—namely the one that Canada put forward—"may, indeed, have some merit".

Pursuant to this, we began the process of examining it last night. The Secretary of State for External Affairs met with eight heads of government, I believe, throughout the region in the last number of days. All of them believe that it had some merit. The President is going to examine it today with President Mitterrand and over the weekend with Prime Minister Major, and slowly but surely, hopefully the idea will advance.

We think it is a good one. We put it forward vigorously on behalf of Canada. I indicated the contradiction, of the five permanent members of the Security Council persist in large, vast arms sales to the countries in the region, and then are perplexed by the fact that some members in the region decide to use them to wage war against innocent members. This does not make any sense. We believe the Canadian position is a consistent and a reasonably thoughtful one. After a period of reflection, others will subscribe to it.

TELEVISION NETWORKS

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of Communications. The sale of TV Quatre-Saisons and CFCF is raising serious concern in the Quebec television circles. There are two potential buyers competing, namely Intermédia and Global. It seems, however, that Global's offer contains a clause calling for the creation of yet another televison station in Montreal, the Global Network, which would cause the further splitting of an already insufficient advertising revenue base. Considering several television stations in Quebec are already in deficit, is the Minister ready to commit to defending the interests of the television workers presently working in Montreal and, thus, protecting the quality of programming in the province?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I too learned through the papers that offers were made to CFCF, Mr. Pouliot and Quatre-Saisons. I want to point out to the hon. member that any such agreement must be approved by the CRTC and that it will go through the usual channels.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I have a question of privilege from the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Labour, when asked what the government would do about the 14.3 per cent unemployment rate in Montreal, the highest municipal rate in Canada, did not answer the question, but said, and I quote from page 18397 of Hansard:

> —we should make allowances for the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville who may not have all the facts, but we cannot make the same allowances for the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who has been sitting in this House as a Liberal member for 25 years.

He went on to say:

> Before 1984—during the last 17 or 18 years the Liberals were in power in this country, Montreal lost not 100, not 200, but 4,000 jobs.

Between the election of a Liberal government in 1965 and the election of a Conservative government in 1979, a period of 14 years, when I was a member of this House and a member of the government, the average rate of unemployment in Canada was 6 per cent, and in Montreal it was 6.7 per cent, and thousands of new jobs were created, a record never matched by this Conservative government.

Mr. Speaker: I have looked at the exchange in Hansard. I also have examined carefully the notice which was given according to the rules by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

I think I have to indicate to the hon. member that there may very well be an argument between himself and the minister and others. But I have to say that it is not a question of privilege.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose the weekly question to the government House leader. Could he indicate to the House what the business will be for tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday and the rest of the next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to formally designate tomorrow as an allotted day for supply.

It would be my intention at this time to designate next Monday as an allotted day as well. I would like to keep open the possibility of discussions with respect to that date, but that is the intention at this time.

On Tuesday, March 19, I plan to call report stage and third reading of Bill C-97, the borrowing bill and, hopefully, complete both stages by the end of that day.

I would like to carry on with the discussions between House leaders to see how we might most effectively and efficiently decide on business for the remainder of next week.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order with my hon. friend the government House leader, I wonder if I could seek clarification on the point regarding the eventual introduction of legislation to impose the tax on cigarette products.

When the budget was tabled on February 26 a ways and means motion was also tabled. We have yet to have the final two days of the budget debate. My hon. friend will know that until those two days of debate take place the Standing Orders make it impossible to introduce the ways and means motion which would then give legal authority to collect the tax on cigarettes.

I suppose one could always make the case that at the moment the government lacks the legal authority for the collection of this tax but I would like to say that since it has already been introduced perhaps we should talk about ways and means of facilitating the passage of this bill.

Could my friend give some indication as to whether or not he plans to bring in that legislation soon.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows in fact there are ample legal precedents to collect the tax at the time indicated in the ways and means motion during a budget. I know that from experience having, while in opposition, challenged the government's right to collect taxes on the basis of a ways and means motion. It wasted a lot of time and money on legal opinions which confirmed that, in fact, all that is necessary is that at some point legislation be brought forward to change the law. That needs to be preceded by adoption of the ways and means motion.

The hon. member is right, it can be done after the approval of the general motion attached to a budget. Of course should events intervene such as prorogation, none of that applies and it becomes academic.

It is in regard to discussions such as that that I look forward to discussing our plans for future deliberations in this House with my hon. friend and the House leader of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend has misunderstood the point I was making.

Technically, I agree with him based on terms of past precedents, but retailers have been collecting this tax and consumers have been paying the tax in good faith based on the announcement of the Minister of Finance during the budget presentation. Yet the government does not seem to be delivering in good faith, in terms of their initiative, legislation that would clearly authorize the collection of this tax.

I am simply saying to my friend that I look forward to facilitating this discussion so that we can react in the same good faith that consumers and retailers are showing.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the point I was making is that it is not merely good faith. I do not think there is an option available to consumers in that regard.

I appreciate the offer of the hon. member to facilitate the passage of the budget bills. There will be that budget bill, plus one or two others coming from the budget and I look forward to our discussions to find a way in which we can facilitate the passage of those bills as early as possible.

My seatmate, the Minister of Finance, informed me yesterday that the draughtsmen are beavering away and in short order should have those bills available for first reading.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the government House leader. He is talking about some delays as a result of the government draughtspersons not being ready to introduce legislation. However, prior to the House sitting in mid-February, the Minister of Finance had draft legislation on the northern tax benefits. He circulated not only the legislation, but he also circulated the regulations. However, that legislation which he circulated across this country has never been introduced into the House of Commons.

Since the Minister of Finance felt capable of circulating this legislation far and wide, could the government House leader indicate why Canadians who are now able, as a result of the government's announcement last December, to claim for at least a partial northern tax benefit; why they have to sit and wait for their rebates and any money that is owing to them by the federal government, and why they have to wait and wait when this legislation was presumably written, since the government can circulate it.

This is the third week in a row that I have asked this question. Why has the government not introduced that legislation into the House?

Mr. Andre: The hon. member is right; this is the third week in a row. And for the third week in a row let me say that just as soon as his party is ready to discuss and co-operate in getting legislation passed, we are ready to proceed.

It is absurd for the hon. member to imply that this program, which was brought forward by this government, which we recognize as beneficial to northerners—we did it deliberately—that somehow we would be wanting to drag our feet on it. That is absurd. Of course we want to proceed with it.

We have some other matters. We are running into time difficulties. I am looking forward to profitable discussions, which I hope we can have soon, to find a way to expedite the treatment of that bill and others.

Mr. Murphy: Again, to remind the government House leader, there has not been a request from the government to the opposition parties to move on the northern tax benefit legislation. It is awfully hard for us to respond if we are not asked to.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Berger (p. 18439).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa West will have 10 minutes plus 5 minutes questions and comments.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): It is my pleasure to rise today and speak on this motion, bringing to the attention of Canadians promises of the Prime Minister with respect to research and technology in Canada, and the abysmal failure on the delivery of those promises.

I would like to begin by talking about the fundamental importance I see of investment in science research and technology, particularly at this stage in our history.

Canada went through a period where exploration was extremely important to our development as a nation. At that time the new frontiers were the frontiers of geography, climate and distance. We mastered those and we conquered those and we created a country. Now we are heading into the 21st century and the frontiers are no longer physical frontiers but the frontiers of the human mind and spirit.

That is what science is all about; it is launching off on those marvellous explorations, not knowing necessarily exactly where and when we will get to where we are going, but knowing that inevitably tremendous and new discoveries will be made.

It is in those discoveries by the human mind of the way the world functions that the prosperity of any nation rests in the coming century.

The failure of the government to recognize this has done irreparable damage to the Canadian economy, which is only now beginning to be felt and which will become even deeper and more prolonged as time goes on.

I want to go to the promises made by the Prime Minister in 1984 when he was still leader of the opposition. He promised Canadians a spending commitment on research and development during the first mandate of his government. He promised lower interest rates. He promised the development of job training and the development of trade.

I will come specifically to the abysmal failure to keep the commitment on research and development in a moment. I do want to talk about lower interest rates. We know that one of the reasons we have the huge debt and deficit we have now is because of the high interest rate policy of this government. We know that rather than the development of job training we have had major slashes to funding for job training and development. We have had massive cuts to post-secondary education.

He promised the development of trade. In the days since that promise, Canada's trade surplus has dropped dramatically. Our trade in high technology is in a deficit position. We have a competitiveness with our major trading partners that is less than it was 10 years ago. We now rank last, or second last, in eight of the ten economic indicators in science and technology used by the OECD. R and D spending has declined.

Our competitiveness has been reduced, not increased. The only thing we are trading and exporting more than we were before is jobs.

The government has failed to deal with poverty, which is a major impediment to education and to the improvement of the talent and the use of talent of our young people.

Going specifically to research and development, I want to go over what is a rather sorry history of this government and a total abandonment of the Prime Minister's promise. It has been a reversal of the progress towards improved research and development in this country. It goes well beyond simply the fact that funding to research and development has been decimated. It goes well beyond blaming the private sector for not doing the job that is the job of the public sector, namely, protecting the national interests and protecting the national wealth of knowledge and the foundation of progress in technology.

As the minister himself has said, "Our competitors increase their research and development, when times get bad. They know the answer is to look for new ways." Why is the minister out there admonishing the private sector to increase R and D when times are bad, while he stands in this House and says we have to cut research and development; that we have to cut science when times are bad? The same lesson applies for the government that applies for our competitors, the same lesson the minister wants to deliver to the private sector.

The National Research Council, a hallmark, the envy of the international community in progress in science and innovation, has been subject to savage attacks repeatedly over seven years. We have had a downsizing program in the public service that has left scientists spending half their time doing their own clerical work. Who, with a grain of economic common sense, would save money on a $25,000 a year clerical position, to have a scientist earning $65,000 a year do clerical work half the time?

We have companies specializing in research being sold off or bought off by foreign interests, further reducing the ability of the private sector to build the intellectual wealth of this country. We have the loss of Connaught Labs. We have the loss of Lumonics. We have young people refusing to go into science. Only 20 per cent of admissions to university are in science. They see no future, because this government has said there is no future. Twenty per cent of the National Research Council now has either been shoved out the door or bought off.

The minister had the temerity today to talk about women in science. Increasing the number of women in science is a useful and important strategy because we know that we have fewer young people coming into the labour market at all levels and that we are going to face a severe shortage at all levels of the labour market. One way of overcoming the shortages is to ensure that women, as well as men, develop their talents to the fullest.

What does this government do to women scientists? Less than 25 per cent of its professional scientists are women, and most of them are in short-term positions. They are renewed and renewed, but they are never hired as full-time permanent employees. Very few women scientists ever retire from the Government of Canada because they get fed up and they leave.

All the words the minister may have about attracting women into science are not going to work until women see career opportunities in government science, and career opportunities in the private sector in science. Until then we will be wasting our money.

We are losing opportunities to be world leaders in environmental technology. The NSERC told us years ago that this was a major trading and growth opportunity for the Government of Canada, and yet this government—in the midst of the global warming crisis—has decimated, literally, from $500 million to $50 million what we spend on alternative energy and on conservation of fossil fuels.

Instead of pursuing all options to show the world new ways of using energy and of prospering without destroying the very air we breathe, the government has cut out the energy sector at the environmental secretariat and it has cut the energy division at the National Research Council. Now it is scrambling to restore some symbolic but insignificant remnant of both of those important divisions that existed and were thriving just seven short years ago.

I could list a litany of cuts to environmentally important programs. While the world is desperate for good environmental technology to preserve the very ability of this planet to survive and thrive, not only are we failing to perform a useful function in the world through the development of our environmental technology but we are missing a major economic opportunity to make Canada a world leader in many environmental areas.

The government talks about the deficit and the debt, and I like to talk about the human deficit.

We would not have a debt and a deficit if we did not have 10.5 per cent of our people unemployed. If we had people earning and contributing to the economy instead of requiring support from the economy, if we had people with purchasing power in their pockets creating jobs for other Canadians by the purchase of goods and services, we would have a healthy economy. If we were investing in the education of our young people, if we were investing in the kind of science and technology that gives us new opportunities in the world and gives us an opportunity to reverse our deficit in the export of high technology, then we might start to work our way out of this difficult economic situation.

But that is not the way of this government. The way of this government is to destroy, to cut, to squander opportunities. That is what has been happening in science and technology, in research and development in this country now for seven years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I was so interested to hear what my hon. colleague was saying—she makes such good common sense, something that seems to be lacking from the members opposite—that I would like to ask her if she would continue with her observation, specifically as it relates to the cuts which have a terrible impact, and perhaps the implications of the loss of application of the Lortie report. We have had so much rhetoric in this room since this morning from the government side.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you would allow her to continue and explain why the government has, in particular, ignored its own advisory board science and technology recommendations, which was to double the funding to the granting council so that it could really do a task, and we could stop listening to all the rhetoric which adds up to nearly nothing in the long term.

I wonder if you would allow my colleague to continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes. The hon. member for Ottawa West has three minutes.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to continue. I am sure the member is aware, but I am sure many government members are not aware that the government has indeed ignored the advice of NSERC, the National Science Engineering Research Council. It has ignored the advice of its own advisory board which was set up by the Prime Minister with great fanfare. It has, in fact, cut funding to the granting councils, and that means that university research and private sector research are suffering.

Having cut the floor out from under research in the private and academic sectors, it has proceeded pell-mell to cut out research in government as well leaving Canada with virtually no foundation.

I will mention one particular area that is of great concern; that is, the government even cut Canada's ability to have people participating on international standards councils. It is now telling people who volunteer their services to sit on international boards looking at international scientific and technical standards to pay their own way to get to these international meetings. That has cut Canada's participation dramatically.

While the minister sits there and talks about international trade, we are not even at the bargaining table when standards are being set for the products, goods and technology that we want to export. Does that make any sense?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member who just sat down a question.

What is her solution to these problems? We have heard a long list of complaints. We know that provincial Liberal governments are doing exactly the same thing that we are doing because they do not have money any more than we have. We know that we have a deficit of $30.6 billion despite the restrictions we put in to try to stop the increase in spending. There is still a deficit of $30.6 billion.

For example, this year beginning April 1, we are going to have to pay $43.2 billion in interest. That is the first item that will come out of the budget, 35.5 cents for every dollar of revenue. What is the point of the hon.

member opposite just giving us a repetitious list of areas in which spending is being restricted? We cannot spend as we would like to spend, and we all know this is the case.

I would like to know what the solutions of the hon. member and the party that she represents are. Since 1984, I have never once heard in the House any member of the Liberal Party give us the solution to this dilemma. It would be in the same dilemma would it be here. It would be in even a worse dilemma with all the spending commitments it has made since.

What does it see as a solution to the fact that midway through this year, we are going to have a national debt of over $400 billion? We spent $43.2 billion in interest. We transferred $36.7 billion to the provinces. What are the member's answers to that?

I do not want to hear about the fact that there is not enough money for standards councils or to send people away. We know that. Our own departments are being gutted and restricted, et cetera to try to keep the deficit down, not to zero but to $30.6 billion. Why give us a litany of complaints? Let's hear where the solutions are.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, we have had seven years of empty promises, slashes in spending, cuts in science of valuable personnel, cuts in programs, damage to the unemployed, and a transferring of costs to the provinces so that they are strangling because this government will not meet its commitments to international programs.

We have not seen one iota of reduction to the national debt. We see only increases to the deficit. Is it not about time to stop delivering empty promises and to start delivering debt reduction?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly pleased to participate in the debate this afternoon.

I will not be as fiery as my colleague, the minister from Newfoundland, but I will do my bit to perhaps antagonize some of my colleagues opposite as they are trying to do to us.

When a member comes into the House, he usually brings with him several interests or hobby horses that he may have. When I came into the House back in 1974, 16 years or more ago, I was like that as well. One of those interests was science and technology, and research and development. Mr. Speaker, you will not be offended if I suggest that you, Sir, along with two others in the House this afternoon are old-timers here. You, Sir, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce will remember, but other members will not recall the policy of the then Liberal government regarding science and technology. When I listened to the member for Ottawa West try to criticize us, it was unfortunate that she had not taken a little time to read about the history of science and technology as it relates to the House of Commons and the various governments over the last couple of decades.

The truth of the matter is that roughly 15 or 16 years ago I sat in the House here and listened to the then minister of science and technology. I believe he was at that time the member for Westmount. He indicated to the House when we were challenging him from the opposition, that really we did not have to spend much money on science and technology. That was a waste of money. We should be just buying our research and development and our science and technology from neighbouring countries like the U.S.A. or U.K. or Germany, where they were doing that. They would do it for us and we could acquire it from them. That was the official position of the Liberal Party at that time.

The other interesting thing, to take you a little bit back in history, that you will recall yourself, Mr. Speaker, is that at that time if you were interested in science and technology and you wanted to question the minister, the estimates did not come before any standing committee on that at all. Where they went at that time was to a committee known as the committee on miscellaneous estimates. That was a waste paper basket of all sorts of little things.

That was the priority that the government at that time gave to science and technology. Estimates at that time were referred to the miscellaneous estimates committee. There were three or four of us in the opposition who thought that was not good enough for science and technology, that we should be doing better. We tried to prevail upon the government of that day to create a standing committee, but no such luck. Nothing happened.

It was not, Sir, and I will remind you, until 1984 when our present government came into power that a standing committee on science and technology was established. The Conservative Party recognized the importance of science and technology. We now have that committee. I believe you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the original chairman, if my memory is correct, was Dr. Bill Tupper, who sat here from one of the ridings in the Ottawa region, a very renowned scientist in Canada and a lecturer at the university. He sat as the first chairman of that committee and I had the privilege of sitting on that committee.

I think it is imperative that we bring to mind the past history before we start criticizing too much the present government. As the Minister for International Trade has pointed out, there are very trying circumstances at the present time and in spite of those circumstances, we are managing to increase our contribution to science and technology, albeit we would like to do it a little bit faster.

There are a number of areas that one could talk about in a debate such as this, but I would like to put a little emphasis on the area of the Canada Scholarship Program. The motion we have before us today in the House does not even mention perhaps the most crucial aspect of research and development and science and technology, and that is people. I think we have to remind ourselves that when we speak of research and development, and we speak of science and technology, we cannot afford to lose sight of that vital ingredient in the equation. That ingredient is indeed people. We are talking here of the highly qualified men and women who need to drive this remarkable technological revolution forward from the present time.

There have been recent studies done, including those done by our own Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council which have shown that Canada faces a crisis situation with a shortage of highly qualified scientists and engineers. Here we are talking about people. The proportion of students who now enter science and engineering has remained relatively constant at about 20 per cent over this past decade. I think that was alluded to by the member for Ottawa West. It has not grown actually in response to the needs that are out there at the present time.

Though we may be only second to the United States in the number of post-secondary school graduates as a percentage of the work force, we do have a low rate of scientists and engineers. That is the problem that we as a government have identified over the last six years and are now trying to correct.

Moreover, the Economic Council of Canada has predicted that the technological content of all jobs, not just the scientists and engineering jobs but all jobs, are going to increase. The requirement is going to increase down the road and we will, therefore, need an even higher proportion of scientists and engineers in the work force than we have had over the past decade.

There is no doubt that we are committed to valuing scientific and engineering achievements and to providing appropriate recognition and rewards for contributions in these fields in order to attract students into it. It is this kind of remuneration and reward system for the science and engineering professions which has never been on par with some of the other professions such as the legal and medical professions. As a society, we have to take some blame for that.

It seems to us that the key, if we are going to reach our young people, these young women and men in our elementary schools and high schools, we have to make it attractive for them. We need to make them aware of how science and technology affect their lives. We need to get them excited about science and technology and we need to encourage them to pursue the wide range of career opportunities that exist in these fields.

I am proud to say that our government is playing a leadership role in this regard and we have done so under a number of initiatives, an important one of which is the Canada Scholarship Program, which is an excellent example of one of those initiatives.

When the Prime Minister launched the Canada Scholarship Program some three years ago, he spoke then about the bright minds and about the commitment of our government to ensuring that the talents of these young Canadians would be appropriately recognized and rewarded.

This program is now entering its third year. It represents an $80 million investment, which is a significant amount of money, over five years by the Government of Canada in its continuing commitment to excellence in scientific and engineering education.

Based on outstanding academic performance, first-year students at the post-secondary level enrolled in science and engineering related disciplines are eligible to receive $2,000 a year for up to four years for a total of $8,000. We have now, over the course of the last three years, been able to help some 6,200 scholars, who are benefiting from what is offered under this Canada Scholarship Program.

One of the interesting things is that we are also getting industry involved. That has been alluded to by my friend from Ottawa West. For example, the Ballard Power Systems of Victoria and the Corel Systems here in Ottawa, among others, are funding the Canada Scholars Frontrunners Project which will be of some significance. The DuPont Company-Governor General's Canada Scholarship in Environmental Engineering also has to be recognized. Canadian Marconi is supporting the creation of Canada Scholars Mentor Clubs. The Nova Corporation of Alberta is funding special scholarship awards for Canada scholars.

Other corporations such as GE Canada, SCIEX Inc., MDS Health Group, DuPont Canada, Merck Frosst Canada, Rio Algom Ltd., Pan Canadian Petroleum and Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting are all involved from the private sector in trying to help out in this area.

But without a doubt, the success of these programs depends on the scholars themselves and their motivation and the ability that we have to encourage them to get into this field of endeavour, which is so crucial for our future competitive position in world affairs.

It is this Canada Scholarship Program which now stands as a glowing example of our government's ongoing effort to foster excellence in science and engineering education here in Canada. Combined with initiatives such as the science and technology public awareness campaign and the National Networks of Centres of Excellence, it represents an unprecedented federal commitment.

I conclude by suggesting that it is a commitment that I am indeed proud to talk about this afternoon and it is a commitment that will ensure a competitive Canada and a prosperous and rewarding future for our young people.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): I compliment my colleague and friend on that very fine talk on research and development, but there are some questions that we have on this side of the House that cause us a great deal of concern and seemed not to be properly addressed in this budget with the expenditures of money.

Let me just relate some facts. I am so glad that the Minister for International Trade has decided to stay with us because I think these facts reflect something about what he had to say to our previous speaker.

It is a little known fact in Canada today that the largest single industry is forestry. It is larger than either the automobile or the petroleum industries in Canada. Forestry in Canada employs over 8 per cent of our Canadian labour force and it supports over 900,000 forestry manufacturing and service jobs.

One out of every seven manufacturing dollars in Canada is related directly to this industry, and it contributes more than $17 billion to Canada's net trade balance. Forestry accounts for close to $2.5 billion in trade within our country alone.

Government policy does not reflect the importance of this industry to over 300 communities in Canada that are dependent solely on the forestry industry for their sole survival. It does not reflect this industry's contribution to the national economy and its treatment toward more than 30 single industry towns in northern Ontario alone, the area I represent.

With that background, let us consider the remarks the Minister for International Trade made just a few moments ago and discuss what the forestry industry is doing for our country and the lack of public expenditures to this most vital of all industries. Looking at the forecasts for 1990 and 1991 in the budgetary expenditures, $53 million was spent last year in that area. In the estimates for 1991 and 1992 that has been reduced by almost $20 million. It is now down to $33,900,000, a drop of $20 million which certainly does not reflect the tremendous importance of this vital industry in Canada.

Perhaps I may just address the comments made by the Minister for International Trade. One of the things that can be done—and it is so vital and does not cost our country one penny—is the elimination of the 15 per cent export tax that was placed in 1986 on the softwood lumber exports to the United States.

We have been asking the government to remove that tax because of its unfairness to the people in small communities in this country. It is not going to cost Canadians anything. It is just a simple determination that the 15 per cent tax on the softwood lumber industry in Canada, particularly in British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario, has imposed personal anguish and suffering on people who are involved in these single industry towns. It can be eliminated by eliminating that unfair tax and letting these people in these industries in these towns compete with the Americans on a level playing field.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to this, although it is a little bit off the topic of science and technology and research and development. I have a bit of a personal interest in the subject area of forestry, having worked one summer in the area of Thunder Bay—Nipigon. Having cut pulp up there, I have quite a bit of sympathy for the work that goes on in that area.

I am also concerned about science and technology in the forestry area. There is no doubt that we need to spend money there. I had occasion to meet with a Russian scientist a little over a year ago in Moscow and subsequently here in Canada, who is working very diligently on a scheme that will eliminate waste products that currently come from our forest product manufacturing plants here in Canada, whereby pulp would be produced without any waste product of significance at all. I agree that there is room for further study.

As to the tax on softwood lumber, I suppose the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon should probably speak with his colleagues from New Brunswick. He might get a little different slant on that tax from them. I appreciate the needs of our lumbering industry and the forest industry.

I am pleased to say also, from the point of view of the private sector and as one who is interested in disabled and handicapped people, that members of the union in the forestry sector and the management of those same plants are now working together to try to help injured workers and reintegrate them into the work place.

Those workers and those management people in the forestry sector deserve credit for the work they are doing, which I think is of great importance to Canada.

I share the member's concern about this tax problem. It is a difficult one. But the Prime Minister, as we heard this afternoon, is addressing that problem with the President of the U.S.A. himself. I hope we will see a resolution that will satisfy all sides.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Before recognizing the hon. member for Portage—Interlake, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Kent—Bankruptcy; the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona—Housing; the hon. member for Ottawa West—The Environment.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, like many of my colleagues who are participating in this debate this afternoon, I welcome the opportunity to review the opposition motion and its suggestion that the Prime Minister failed in honouring a commitment to double Canada's spending commitment to research and development.

An hon. member: Could you repeat that?

Mr. Holtmann: If the members opposite have a hard time hearing, maybe they should plug in their hearing aids. I think I have made myself fairly clear.

Let us examine the statement. Perhaps the exact doubling of these expenditures, which they have a complaint about, is the problem. We have heard this afternoon from my colleagues who just spoke, the member for Oxford and the Minister for International Trade, and in fact the Prime Minister. I can assure all members in this House that from the perspective of one area of Canada, the one I come from, our Prime Minister is light-years ahead of anything that has ever previously been accomplished by any leader of this country, probably Conservatives included, in focusing on science and technology.

Let us recognize that fact. Our Prime Minister made this one of his projects. He made some commitments for funding. Although the argument has been made that they have not been totally achieved according to what he said in 1984 or previously, I think the example that he has given and the leadership role he has played have focused attention on this particular area of concern to Canadians.

I do not think anyone in the seats opposite can argue otherwise. They may sit and laugh, but what other Prime Minister can they mention who has taken such a tremendous initiative and a leadership role? I do not think they should sit in their places and laugh at it. Certainly Mr. Trudeau didn't, certainly the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra didn't, certainly Mr. Pearson didn't, and quite possibly they might say that for nine months neither did the right hon. member for Yellowhead.

I do not think using this particular style of discussing the issues of science and technology will really indicate that we have not gone far enough. I suppose members on this side will suggest that maybe we should have gone further. But this party, under its leadership, has not gone out in any reckless way to throw money at projects, because we have always used that as a consideration point.

I would like to say, if I may, that if we look at some of the things that have happened as a result of the leadership of our Prime Minister, we see that a lot of things have happened to our young people as well. My children in school have science fairs, and I really believe that a focus on science and technology is occurring in the schools. They have taken it upon themselves from the educators and a direction, not just from the Prime Minister but from a lot of the scientific leaders in our country, to focus attention on the importance of the changes in technology and bring it to the attention of the young people.

As I said, my children in school do a lot of things differently than when I went to school some 20 years ago. Science fairs are really an "in" thing, and I think my colleagues opposite will probably have noticed that change as well.

That is drawing attention, maybe not with big dollars, to create an awareness in young people so that when they reach maturity and have completed their scholastic activities, they will see the importance of science, change, and technology and why we should continue this research, this important part of the development of our country.

As a farmer, although not active in recent years but in former years, I know that the importance of technological change in agriculture is fantastic and phenomenal. Canadian companies and researchers in universities are very often in the forefront of the technological change we are talking about.

Let us look at the production of wheat. We may argue and the opposition may argue that the farmers are not getting enough money for that wheat. Through the technology and science that has been applied to this very important part of agriculture, not just within Canada but around the world, scientists in Canada are producing wheat that doubles production compared to what we had in the late 1930s and 1940s. Consequently we are helping to feed the world.

That research has not stopped. It continues even in the oilseed crops. Canada is a leader in the production of a canola meal that has fewer impurities than in the beginning. This crop, through Canadian science and technology, has been developed into what is almost a perfect crop.

An hon. member: What about hog research?

Mr. Holtmann: My colleague suggested that I talk a bit about hog research. He is absolutely right. The technology in the production of better quality pork has made Canada's pork among the very best in the world. This is a result of research done at universities. A lot of people do not realize that we are now producing a hog that grows faster with greater feed conversion and less fat. This kind of research continues because the average consumer and everyone in this room do not like to eat as much fat. Because of such things as cholesterol it is not the healthy food we once thought it was.

It is also important to the farmer to produce a hog at less cost; in other words, feed efficiency, the ability to convert roughage and feed into meat, into protein. There have been tremendous steps forward in agricultural research. This is continuing, and I think we owe a great debt to the many scientists who are working on such projects.

Cuts to projects in terms of funding concern those on all sides of the House, but we have to balance that with what is available and what are the priorities. These are difficult decisions. No one will deny that it is not an easy decision to cut a project on which scientists in this country are doing research. It would not matter if members opposite were sitting on this side of the House.

From time to time those decisions have to be made and I have experienced that.

It is important to look at the technological change and transfer that is going on. I think the fact that the Prime Minister has focused so much of his personal time on this particular endeavour is, consider him as you may, the most positive thing that a Prime Minister has done in this country for years.

Science is important to us and we should look at other countries. The best thing to do is compare. My colleagues opposite see what has happened since the war in the great countries of Japan and Germany, as well as in some other countries such as that great giant to the south of us, the United States. I was an international exporter as well as a farmer before coming here and know that these countries consider Canada to be doing tremendous advance work in many fields important to Canadians and to Canadian business people.

We should consider those few facts alone and consider where we ought to be going. Sometimes we look at a country like Germany and say: "How is it able to come out with this fantastic Mercedes Benz?" Lately we have seen the latest research and technology going into the Lexus car from Japan and the energies private companies have used, not the government so much but private companies.

I believe that in our efforts to continue that scientific research and technology sometimes we ought to give more assistance to the companies as maybe a tax write-off, which I am sure they get anyway, if their research is going to lead to better productivity, more efficient products and ones that Canadians can help work to build and manufacture, where we shine.

We do shine in agriculture, but I think we also shine now as a country in bringing this awareness to our youth. The young people are doing so much more. I think that whole attitude will bring them into the sciences at university. It is a future they can depend on because we need a lot more scientists. I am happy to say that one of my sons is looking into computer science. I am very proud of him because he sees a future in it. There is lots of opportunity if we keep letting our young people know that they exist and that we support them.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Portage—Interlake for his interesting presentation. I took into perspective what he said about the reputation he alluded to that Canada has in agricultural research. I would accept that because I do recognize his expertise in the field of agriculture. I had some personal experience on the trip that we had together. Certainly as somebody who has knowledge of the fishing industry, I was impressed with his knowledge.

Probably where we stand on this issue could depend on where we sit with respect to how selective we want to be. I will accept that Canada has leadership in technology, research and development in the agriculture field, and I would like to relate that to the fishing industry. I would like to bring to the member's attention that Canada is the world's largest leading fish exporter. I was at a conference about three years ago where it was suggested that Canada's fisheries, from the scientific viewpoint and scientific research, are now where Europe's were 15 years ago.

I really have to reflect on what the fishing industry could be doing without this technological lag, what the predictions would be with respect to the northern cod and other areas of scientific information, knowledge and indeed research that I would have to recognize have been addressed to a certain extent in the Atlantic Fish Adjustment Program.

The fact remains that certainly we are the largest exporter in the world and I think a leading authority because of our geography, our three coasts and our continental shelf. Areas of excellence and centres of excellence could well be developed.

I am going to speak in a few moments on this subject. I do not want to take up any more of the hon. member's time. I would like him to reflect that there are certain areas we really could be improving in and they are key areas as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge my hon. colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and I have had a small association in looking at different parts of the country once on a short visit. I cherished the exchange of views that he and I had.

I can only agree with his statement that there are many areas of importance with respect to the advancements of technology. I will just give him a brief example of what he has said with regard to fish. Believe me, I represent an area, for some who do not know, that has 1,200 commercial fishermen producing something like $40 million worth of fish products in the heart of this country, on the prairies of Canada, through the Freshwater Fish Corporation.

While I was campaigning in Gimli in 1984, I was met by a street vendor who was selling some crab sticks. These were made in Japan. They were not made of crabmeat, but they tasted so much like crabmeat that the chap was doing very well.

I thought to myself, in the middle of fishing country and in the heart of the continent, here we have a Japanese technology that has produced a very palatable product and something that I would buy. We have a long way to go to match the technology that exists throughout the world in some countries in developing products. We should be making the crab sticks, possibly with fish caught in Lake Winnipeg and selling them to Japan.

I concur with what he points out. There are many areas where a lot of work needs to be done to bring this kind of technology forward and find new technology.

I agree that there are many areas with which he and I probably have no association or understanding. They are very highly technical. I am associated with reviewing telecommunications with the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. The technology is changing so quickly that there are not too many in this room who can understand how it operates. But there are people who can assist us in recognizing the importance of technology being allowed to continue within the means of Canada's ability to pay.

I think that is really my point. I rest my case.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Speaker, I will focus today on environmental research, on oil spill research and its importance to Canada, particularly to the northern part of this country.

In June 1989, the Prime Minister commissioned a special review of Canada's capacity to respond to marine spills of oil and other hazardous material. That review, known as the Public Review Panel on Tanker Safety and Marine Spills Response Capability made its final report to the government last October.

I had the pleasure of making a submission to that panel in September 1989. The panel's report called Protecting our Waters is a devastating critique of Canada's current ability to prevent or respond effectively to oil spills. I will quote from the report:

> The capacity to respond effectively to a spill of any significant magnitude does not presently exist anywhere in Canada.

The panel had much to say about oil spill research and development, or rather the lack of it. Again, I quote from the panel's report:

> A major research and development effort is urgently needed to develop more effective spill clean-up equipment and technology because what is now available is essentially primitive and largely ineffectual.

This panel made over 100 recommendations and costed them at approximately $1.5 billion over a 10-year period. It suggested that $800 million to $1 billion could be raised through a $2 per tonne levy on all oil products transported in Canadian waters.

It recommended that part of these funds could go towards enhancing Canada's spill response capability. This would be done by upgrading government co-ordinated and government funded research and development into spill response technologies and by supporting the establishment of a major industry operated spill response co-operative in all high risk areas in Canada.

The panel's interim report in September 1989 noted that both government and industry have significantly reduced their funding of oil spill response R and D over the past decade. According to the panel, there is a glaring need for more extensive research into the long-term effects of oil and chemical pollution.

The interim report listed some of the technologies requiring additional research and development, techniques for containing spills at their source, remote sensing and spill tracking technologies, beach clean-up techniques that minimize disturbance, better techniques for cleaning up spills in the Arctic and disposal techniques.

The final report last October stressed again the need for a major collaborative research and development initiative by industry, government and universities. This panel acknowledged that the level of required expenditures is high, but it also said that this cost would be minuscule compared to the cost of cleaning up a catastrophic spill such as the one from the Exxon Valdez.

Hon. members will be aware of Exxon's out of court settlement announced yesterday. Exxon will pay $1 billion in civil damages, criminal restitution and fines, in addition to the $2.5 billion already spent during the clean-up. And that is not necessarily the end of it for Exxon. Aboriginal people in Alaska may still sue.

The panel had some specific funding recommendations for Canadian spill-related research and development.

> The annual level of Canadian funding, for spill-related R & D at all levels, should immediately be raised to at least $10 million—the objective must be to reach $20 million per year within five years.

In sharp contradiction to the need for continued and increased expenditures in spill research, funding has declined over the past several years. Since 1986, under the current government, funding for oil spill R and D has shrunk dramatically.

It was another federal government which began research into the spills in the early 1970s responding to the Arrow tanker spill off Nova Scotia. Environment Canada co-ordinated a multimillion dollar government-industry research program, but Environment Canada's funding for oil spill research and development has declined substantially since the 1970s. In 1978-79, $2.3 million went towards spill countermeasures R and D, almost all of it for oil spill research. Last year that funding was $1.1 million, and that money was divided equally between oil and chemical spill countermeasures.

A research paper I commissioned from the Library of Parliament last year estimated total funding of other federal government agencies at approximately $500,000, and half of this came from the now defunct Unsolicited Proposals Program.

The Tanker Safety Panel pointed out the cutbacks to Environment Canada's R and D team at the River Road Environmental Emergencies Technology Centre. This team manages the Arctic and Marine Oil Spill Program and has produced a variety of oil spill response techniques and equipment. Their research budget has been cut from $2.3 million to $300,000 in 1979 dollars. Over that same period, expenditures by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans on oil spill fate and effects has remained at about $300,000. Canadian Coast Guard expenditures on equipment evaluation has remained at less than $100,000.

Other federal funding programs which have supported some R and D in the past have either been terminated or severely curtailed. They include the Environmental Studies Research Fund managed by the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration; the Arctic Marine Transportation R and D Program funded and managed by Transport Canada; the Northern Oil and Gas Program managed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; and the Unsolicited Proposals Program managed by the Department of Supply and Services.

Industry funded spill R and D has been declining. The Canadian Offshore Operators Spill Research Association conducted marine oil spill R and D until the latter half of the 1980s. Between 1980 and 1984, they spent $5 million on R and D. Spending in recent years has declined to virtually zero. The Canadian Offshore Operators Spill Research Association has now been disbanded.

Industry, however, has recently called for more R and D into oil spills. Both the Canadian Petroleum Association and the Canadian Petroleum Products Institute have done so. The Environmental Studies Research Fund, ESRF, administered by COGLA, was financed through a levy based on a percentage of the value of leases awarded to companies for offshore research on oil and gas exploration. A substantial cutback has occurred here. In 1983 the ESRF was established and it spent $1.3 million on oil spill R and D in that year.

In 1984, the EFRF spent $1.3 million on oil and oil spill R and D. That spending declined to $73,575 in 1990, and for a period of three years, 1986, 1987 and 1988, funding was absolutely zero.

What about the universities? The Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council has supported spill research at Canadian universities. Its level of funding, however, in the words of the tanker safety panel is woefully inadequate. The panel states that this country, "must place greater emphasis on developing effective clean-up technologies and learning more about the environmental consequences of spills."

With respect to the green plan, the government's response to date is extremely disappointing. The Minister of Transport's preliminary response in November said nothing about increasing spill R and D. The green plan was a far cry from the sweeping recommendations on funding requirements outlined by the tanker safety panel. What is there has been stretched over six years instead of five years, by the finance minister's new budget.

Any delay in providing necessary research funding increases the risk to our environment. I, of course, have particular concern for the Arctic and its unique ecosystem. The Arctic is extremely vulnerable to oil spills. Lancaster Sound and the Beaufort Sea are perhaps the most vulnerable.

I would also like to mention the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska where there is pressure for oil and gas development. Canada must do everything in its power to prevent such development in this sensitive area, which is the calving ground of the Porcupine caribou herd.

Mr. Speaker, the ability to handle large spills offshore while tankers are in transit is non-existent throughout the Arctic. Research and development expenditure in oil spill countermeasures has been reduced dramatically since the Beaufort Sea panel released its report six years ago. Despite that panel's recommendation that funding be increased, we must see an increased commitment to oil spill R and D as a necessary investment in our future.

In conclusion, we cannot afford not to spend those dollars for the sake of our environment and for the generations to come.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this very important subject. In light of the remarks of the two previous speakers, I thought what I would do, inasmuch as my background allows me to, would be to talk in a general sense of what is involved and get some measure of the scope of what we are dealing with here. Perhaps then if time permits, I would give two or three examples to show the House some of the concerns I have in respect of specifics that may be addressed by either looking at the present budget or, if that is not possible, maybe in future years or in future allocations.

I do not want to attribute blame or to make comparisons here. Perhaps some other time we may want to do that. I am looking at the scope of what is involved here. The sheer scale of explorable nature today is beyond yesterday's wildest imagination. I want to give you some facts and figures; there is no other way to do it. I want to make a comparison of the small and the large and the short and the long to give you some indication of what sort of scale we are dealing with.

Scientists tell me that today we are probing phenomena that are as tiny as ten-15 of a centimetre. That, to me, is pretty small. It is one million billionth of a centimetre, in a universe where the edge is 1023 miles away. That is 100,000 billion billion. I cannot conceive of that but I am impressed by the numbers.

Equally, we are studying phenomena that has lived for such a short time that it occurs in 10-25 of a second. By contrast, our astronomers and cosmotologists tell us that the universe is some 20 billion years old. What a range.

I recall listening to a speech given a few years back by then President Reagan not long before his term was over. He spoke to the Empire Club in Toronto. He noted, when speaking on this same subject, that the industrial revolution increased productivity by a factor of 100, while the microchip has raised the database technology by a factor of one million. A single microchip today has the capacity of a million transistors. The transistor not too long ago was considered to be a breakthrough. It is estimated that in about 10 years' time it will have the capacity of a billion transistors.

Again, I am looking at the scope of what is involved here. No matter how this is looked at, there is no doubt that technological leadership has become a strategic factor in determining the economic performance of a country, region or, indeed, a province.

In this regard, I regret to tell you that from the statistics I have, Canada lags behind its industrial competitors, and as someone from the Atlantic region, we regretfully lag behind the other provinces on production and retention of human resources. On a per capita basis, we employ one-half the number of engineers and scientists that our competitors employ. That is not a very impressive thought. I look at it in my case. Of the scientific knowledge that exists in the world today, 90 per cent of it has been created since I left high school and it will double again before I become eligible for the old age pension.

Mr. Speaker, that means something to me, I am not sure if it means very much to you.

To give some practical examples of this, I spoke a few moments ago about how we lag behind. We are 15 years behind Europe in fishing technology.

I now want express some concerns. One concern I have is that the government seems to have eroded our premier research organization, the National Research Council. Just this morning I was listening to a commentary on the radio where great concern was being expressed that our expertise in basic research is being lost.

There is no question that anybody who knows anything about research—and I do not know a lot, but I know some—that while the bounds between basic research and applied research is always a very fine line there is an argument for one or the other. But like everything else, there are the fine bounds. There is no question that basic research has provided the inspiration and the direction for important improvements in the world.

I want to mention to the House three examples. The first is the development of radar, which was accredited for the Battle of Britain being won by the Allies in World War II. It was developed from basic research and the fact that someone noticed that large objects produced echoes from radio transmissions.

The second example is the Salk vaccine. The cure for poliomyelitis was developed from basic research on the tissue culture of a monkey's kidney cell and basic research in that area.

The example that will indicate the tireless efforts and the persistence of our researchers in the basic research area is the development of the chromosome theory. The chromosome theory took 67 years and, indeed, was developed by an obscure monk in Austria who was interested in garden peas and bred them in his monastery garden. This is an indication of what basic research can do. Obviously, that is a concern we should all have.

The next point I want to make is the concern I have with the cutting of transfer payments for post-secondary education and reduced over-all funding for vocational training. My hon. friend from Oxford quoted the Economic Council of Canada and I going to quote as well from a report of last year. They mentioned a number of important statistics, but their over-all concern is that we are not training our people properly to compete in the highly industrialized and competitive world around us. There are two things I want to quote from this report: "A relatively high secondary school drop-out rate of nearly 30 per cent means that more young people fall outside the formal education and training system than is the case for many of our competitors".

The examples are that only 72 per cent of Canadian 17-year olds participate in a formal education or training program compared with 87 per cent of Americans and 94 per cent of Japanese. That is a tremendous lag. I think, nationally, all parties would like to address that.

The second point that is made is: "By some international standards, the quality of high skill segment of the Canadian workforce is only mediocre, according to the 1989 competitiveness scoreboard. Canada ranks in the middle group with respect to managerial talent, research and development, personnel and skilled labour".

Everybody in this House is aware that we have the native talent to do more and to do better. We need to be seized with the necessity to do it. While we laud all the efforts that have been made so far, I think it is very difficult to say that there is not a lot more that can be done. The question once again, of course, is how much is enough. The indication and the motion speaks to the Prime Minister saying it was going to be doubled and I think we have fallen far short of that.

In summing up, I think a good way to end is to talk about the third concern I have. Very briefly, it is the idea of establishing Centres of Excellence. It is my understanding that the freeze for the main source of funding for research for the universities in Canada and the federal granting councils has caused cutbacks to the point that this whole idea may be jeopardized.

If I could be permitted a personal example here, I make reference to Memorial University in St. John's, Newfoundland which, since 1986 and 1987, has been pursuing a topic called Ocean Studies Task Force, looking at studies that can be done and put in place by the year 2000. I think anybody with a knowledge of Memorial University and its Centre for Cold Ocean Engineering, its marine laboratory, its marine biology programs and, indeed, all the programs that are centred in developing an excellence in the 17 separate areas of management in ocean studies, I think it is fair to say, whichever government, it seemed to have got off the ground very well in the mid-1980s. But it is certainly my understanding that in this particular case, while the potential is there, the desire is there, the reason is there, certainly the geography, the expertise and the academic excellence is there, it has come to a grinding halt with respect to the kind of funding that it is going to need to put this program together.

I am in favour of the motion, but I would encourage the Prime Minister and, indeed, this government to take cognizance of these kinds of things and to take the kind of action that would put Canadians, not just in selected areas but indeed in some of the areas that I mentioned in the forefront and to take advantage of the potential that we have.

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to point out that I will share my speaking time with my colleague the member for Richmond—Wolfe.

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be able to rise today on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount. When I look at it, this motion reminds me—and I think it is worth mentioning—of our memorable debate on free trade, during the 1988 election campaign, with what we knew then and we know even more today, about market globalization.

One the main arguments for promoting this very important issue, and we realize it today, was that Canada, the government of Canada, our government could support it and, thus, give our businesses the tools they needed to compete on the global market.

As it turns out, the opposition parties that were so strongly against free trade are now introducing a motion to criticize the government of Canada, not for a lack of interest for this field, but simply for not giving enough.

Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that the development of the scientific and technological capability of Canada is foremost in the priorities of the federal government.

In Canada, the national effort in the field of science and technology is led mostly by the federal government. Notwithstanding what the opposition parties are saying, the spending commitment to science and technology grew, increasing from 4.65 per cent of program expenditures in 1984 to 4.89 per cent this year, the highest percentage in ten years.

While, as a percentage of the gross national product, the government of Canada spent more on non-military research and development than the United States and Great Britain, he still spent less than France and Western Germany and about as much as Japan.

To encourage Canadian businesses and research facilities to exchange ideas, help raise funds and contribute to the development of products, Industry, Science and Technology Canada came up with a number of initiatives aimed at the creation of networks and partnerships. One of the most interesting is the Strategic Technologies Program, whose objective is to promote pre-competitive technology development and its diffusion in Canadian industry.

In the years to come, the success of an industry or business will depend on its ability to develop advanced technology and to apply certain essential technologies.

We want to ensure that our industries have access to those technologies.

Strategic technologies are generic. They can be applied by many industries and to many sectors of our economy. They affect the competitiveness of a broad range of industries.

Strategic technologies enable all industries to enhance their competitiveness. Even our traditional, resource-based industries such as forestry and agriculture use these technologies to remain competitive.

Strategic technologies reinforce each other. What is accomplished in one area of advanced technology may accelerate the development of other areas.

Industry, Science and Technology Canada developed its Strategic Technologies Program after an in-depth study and wide-ranging consultations with industry, universities and the provinces to determine which technologies were essential to Canada's competitiveness.

Following these consultations, three strategic technologies were selected for the program. They are: information technology, biotechnology and advanced industrial materials.

I will start with biotechnology. It involves genetic engineering, mass production of animal or vegetable cells, the production of monoclonal antibodies, and protein engineering. According to certain estimates, by 1995, medical drugs developed according to biotechnological procedures should represent over 40 per cent of the Canadian market in pharmaceutical products, worth $4 billion, Mr. Speaker. This percentage may well rise to 70 per cent by the year 2000.

Since the federal government created the national strategy for biotechnology six years ago, the number of Canadian businesses involved in biotechnology has risen from a mere handful to over 200 and is still growing.

Mr. Speaker, the total value of Canada's biotechnical research and development is currently estimated at more than $350 million, and over 1,800 private and public sector researchers are working in that field.

Thanks to the strategic technology program the Department of Industry, Science and Technology helps research companies and establishments use the existing infrastructure for research and development, particularly in biotechnology. Of course department officials plan for the future in light of previous achievements.

Mr. Speaker, the second of the three strategic technologies under this program, that is information technology, covers telecommunications, micro-electronics, intruments, guidance systems, the latest manufacturing technologies, and artificial intelligence.

Canada's industry gained wide recognition in that field by setting up teledetection and telecommunication systems never before seen anywhere in the world.

Data technology in Canada has become an industry which every year produces revenues of $30 billion and directly provides work for a quarter of a million Canadians.

Data technology also creates new businesses overnight, especially in the service sector where there are so many opportunities for technicians in telecopy, electronic publishing and geographical data systems.

The federal government has already taken certain initiatives to promote the development of information technology. For example, with respect to our innovaction strategy, we have set up a micro-electronic and systems development program with a budget of $60 million for developing micro-electronics and data processing systems.

The Strategic Technology Program provides other incentives to boost the growth of that vitally important sector. The government has earmarked—these are my concluding remarks, Mr. Speaker—$10 million for a university/industry consortium called PRECARN. This all-Canadian group supports the latest research and development jointly carried out in robotics and artificial intelligence. Such are some of the priorities of our government.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond Wolfe): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very pleased to take part in this debate on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount. All the more so since we all know that the economic competitiveness and future prosperity of Canada is a topic which deserves our full attention and which should be debated not only by members but by all Canadians as well. This debate gives me and my colleagues an opportunity to set the record straight with respect to this government's commitment to science and technology. Despite the odd myth that may have gain some currency, the fact is that one of our government priority is to build a strong and prosperous Canada for the 1990s and beyond.

Mr. Speaker, science and technology are our hole cards when it comes to strengthening Canada's economic competitiveness and financial prosperity. Research and development, particularly in the technical field, are growth mechanisms in a global economy where innovation and the dissimination of knowledge are of such vital importance.

I should like to emphasize a key initiative which clearly shows the approach of our government to science and technology. I am referring specifically to the Networks of Centres of Excellence Program, the key element of government strategy to promote long-term basic and applied research in Canada. It encourages researchers to minimize barriers between disciplines, ideas and institutions, and to combine their efforts with a view to enhancing industrial competitiveness on a national scale.

Mr. Speaker, researchers no longer work alone in their basements, away from everything and everyone, working very hard, without any kind of resources.

Centres of excellence networks are a new way to promote excellence in scientific research in Canada. With interlinked networks throughout Canada, they further the integration of the research community into the industry, universities and governments. No researcher could ever realize his full potential while working alone in a basement. Those times are over. We have to pool our energies and our skills to ensure a better future for our country. Our top Canadian researchers now have a unique opportunity to work together within a coordinated structure on long-term projects.

All in all, the centres of excellence serve the following purposes:

First, to improve Canada's performance in science and technology in order to contribute to long-term basic research.

Second, engineers and scientists trained under this Program will gain international stature. Being interlinked with other universities across Canada, participating scientists will be able to confront to international competition and to tackle modern scientific methods.

Third, it will allow new technical knowledge to be passed on to the industry.

Fourh, this Program will launch an era of cooperation and creation of networks between researchers working in various institutions and corporations across this country. But what will be the effects of these objectives?

This initiative, Mr. Speaker, will include the participation of more than 500 Canadian researchers from 35 universities and 37 large Canadian corporations channelled into 15 networks. Total grants from the Government of Canada—this government—will amount to $244 million. Through these networks, we will not only enhance research and development but ensure that our capacities in that regard will be applied towards social and economic goals. In the end, we will become more competitive and our fellow citizens will no doubt enjoy a better quality of life.

These networks were set up about a year ago. The network for marine resources development—and that could be of particular interest to our colleagues from the Maritimes and also from the Pacific—could offer new perspectives to the Canadian fishing industry and allow it to become more competitive.

There is another network which deals with pest control. That network could lead to increased productivity in agriculture and forestry. Again, that will be of interest to our colleagues from the Prairies, and particularly to producers from the area, whose crops are often threatened by such infestations.

I can also talk about another network that I find interesting. It deals with concrete and is centred at Sherbrooke University. Did you know that this network for research on concrete has benefitted from a $25 million investment thanks to a team of collaborators from Sherbrooke University, in the Eastern Townships, whose reputation is country-wide? This study on concrete, and on the molecular structure of concrete, will lead to discoveries that all of Canada will benefit from.

The advantage of this network is that it will involve the collaboration of seven universities for the general study on concrete, and of 14 other universities throughout the country for the molecular study. I could give you some names like the University of British Columbia, McGill University in Montreal, Laval University in Quebec, the universities of Ottawa, of Toronto and of Alberta. On top of that, many national companies in Canada will cooperate and contribute. Even in Eastern Quebec, one company in Matane will benefit from this cooperation between universities.

Mr. Speaker, in our day and age, the economy is based on knowledge and because of that, an unprecedented cooperation is needed in the science and technology sector, and this cooperation must involve industries, governments, and universities.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, it is not possible any more to stay each in his own house. We must share our skills and knowledge with our neighbours in order to get the most out of those resources. The centres of excellence network promotes cooperation and puts together skills everywhere in Canada. It will stimulate the acquisition of new knowledge and strategic technology transfers for a better future in Canada.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the speech the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe just made, like a true Quebecer, as we may call him in this House, particularly in the absence of the Bloc Québécois members. We do not see much of them here, but we are qualified to talk about what is going on in our universities.

I have a comment to make, Mr. Speaker, especially this year, on the 1991-1992 Estimates. Some things, like the CANMET mineral technology centre, are being patriated, thanks to members like Yvon Côté, from Richmond—Wolfe, Jean-Luc Joncas, Maurice Tremblay, who represent Quebec here, in Ottawa, and who champion, in their respective caucuses, the patriation of research centres.

Let us take a look at what there is for us in the Wilson Budget. There is a $15 million research and development project for Northern Quebec. But that is not all. There is also an alternate energy sources centre in Varennes, an $8 million project. That was unheard of under the Liberal government. What we are doing here, in Ottawa, is defending the interests of Quebec, in collaboration with the Quebec government. In the case of the CANMET project in Val-d'Or, for instance, we had the support of Mrs. Lise Bacon and the former Minister of Mines, Raymond Savoie, who helped us get a research laboratory in Quebec.

I would like to ask the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe, who is from such a beautiful region, this: Is it important for you to defend the interests of Quebecers in Ottawa? You gave certain facts, and so did I, but is that important or not?

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I quoted earlier a very specific example of the impact of the centres of excellence networks across Canada, which bring cooperation and have an enormous immediate impact on all of us. I mentioned the University of Sherbrooke.

So, there is a financial impact: $25 million to scientists in Sherbrooke. There is a moral impact, that is, the pride of having scientists who are willing and able to do research whose consequences will extend everywhere across Canada.

I know that in the case of concrete, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that Béton Provincial in Matane and Matapédia, for example, could benefit from this research on concrete and lead to an even better use and expertise in that field.

We were talking about Hibernia, which brings an international cooperation from France, particularly from Paris, but which could have been provided by Canadians. These centres of excellence are a welcome contribution from our government.

Of course, there is also the transfer of technology which will lead to the development of local businesses, because once that research has been done and is considered successful, it is quite evident that this local pride will bring investments and real business development.

Yes, it is important that we contribute.

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech by the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe. Naturally, there has been much talk about spin-offs in various areas.

Living in an area where there are many farmers and forests, he mentioned the importance of concrete in which the centre of excellence was involved in the Sherbrooke area. I know there are many such centres across the country in various fields.

I would like to know more precisely what each of us can expect from these centres, in our areas.

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter on which I would have to elaborate. Unfortunately since I only have one minute left, I would say that, beyond the moral impact I referred to in a previous answer, this is mainly going to allow for the development of specific local skills.

If a center has acquired some expertise in concrete, for instance imagine the message for young people in elementary or secondary schools. And imagine the effect it would have on academics or on students when choosing a career, when they realize how profitable the expertise of that university can be. So we will have new engineers, Mr. Speaker, and this is one of the immediate results that I can see.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to join in the debate this afternoon on the Liberal motion in front of us.

Much has been said today on the need for further research and development in Canada. When we do away with all the rhetoric that we have heard today, there is fundamental agreement among all political parties in this House that as a nation we must strengthen our ability to do research which is both basic and applied and to use the findings of our research in developing new services and new products.

If we are to survive in the type of competitive world we live in, we have to recognize and acknowledge that it is a world of very rapid changes where traditional trading patterns are being changed all the time, and that the only way to survive is through smart technology, smart trade strategies, smart economic strategies.

It requires a nation with a high degree of research and development, a high capacity for processing information, a capacity for being able to use what it has learned to implement and practise that knowledge.

It is not enough for us to do R and D and then not use that knowledge. It is not enough for us to have all the information at our fingertips, stored in computer data bases, and not be able to use that data to affect our behaviour or our trading strategies, et cetera, that would allow us a competitive edge in the world today.

We could talk a bit about the records of the present government. I would tend to think that most hon. members would agree that the Minister for Science, if he was not on public display but more in the privacy of a private conversation, over a beer or over a lunch, would admit that the record is not as great as he would have hoped it to be.

I am sure that some of our Liberal colleagues in a private situation would admit that programs like the scientific research fund, which Mr. Lalonde introduced in the dying days of the Liberal regime, was indeed a tremendous waste of public money and a waste of money that could and should have gone to proper research. I am sure my Liberal colleagues, in the privacy of a private conversation, would admit that more should and could have been done when they were in government those long decades.

However, it is not enough to acknowledge the need to do more in private. What becomes important is for us as an entity, as a Parliament together, to be able to affect the thinking and the priorities of the government so that it begins to recognize, not in a private way but in a public way, in a way that results in action, that if we are to survive as a trading nation we must spend more on research and development.

We have to recognize that an erosion is occurring in Canada, and let not political gamesmanship, pointing blame or defending oneself, and the huffing and the political puffing hide the fact that our universities are deteriorating.

A year ago I had a tour of some of our universities across this country: some in Alberta, some in Saskatchewan, some in Manitoba, some in Ontario. I talked to faculty and to students. In one university, students told me they have exactly 15 minutes to spend with a book because there is such a line-up behind them waiting for the same source book. Our libraries are badly underfunded and cannot keep up with the latest journals, magazines and books that are being published. Our Canadian students do not have access to the latest in their particular field of expertise.

At another university, I was told about their lab equipment that had not been properly replaced and upgraded since the early 1970s when there was a spurt of spending in R and D and in universities. Those students are using lab equipment that is at least a decade and in some cases two decades old. Those students do not have an opportunity to deal with the latest technology.

I hear stories of the difficulty of getting entrance into university, that more universities are having to set higher requirements. Just recently I noticed that the university in my home city, the University of Regina, is talking about establishing quotas in its different faculties. It does not have the space and the faculty to meet the demand that is out there for higher education.

Yet, the demographics will tell us that we are going to have a shortage in this country of trained people. We are going to need scientists, engineers and teachers. We are going to be having a shortage at some point in the future.

Historically we have made up the deficit by importing graduates out of Italy, Holland, Germany, England and the other European countries, but that is not possible any more. We cannot expect waves of scientists and trained people from Europe to come and fill the need that exists in Canada.

We see the sad situation arising. Here we have young Canadian men and women desiring post-secondary education. We know that down the road they are going to be needed, that we are going to have a shortage. Yet, somehow or other we are not able to bring together these two central facts and do something about it.

Recently I have had an opportunity to see some of the scientific sectors that exist in other countries. The one that impressed me the most was the one I saw in Taiwan where there is a tremendous combination of resources. There is a co-ordination of resources between the private and the public sectors not just in terms of dealing with the research and development of R and, D but also the marketing of it.

Is it not about time that we in North America began to realize that our traditional economic model, which is essentially one of competition, an adversarial model, is not going to make do in the 21st century? When we see economic giants such as Japan and Germany, we begin to realize that they have a different economic and social structure. They have one in which the private and public sectors co-operate very closely. Nowhere is that co-operation closer than in the area of research and development.

The public sector and the private sectors sit down and work together to target certain areas. Certain tax concessions, the raising of capital, and the focusing of the country's resources, whether through the public or private sectors, are brought together to bear on the goal.

We have seen both Germany and Japan become technological leaders. They have taken certain fields and developed expertise in those fields. Then with the co-ordination of the public and the private sector, and I should include the trade unions as well, they worked together to create for themselves high-tech industries that create employment, good employment with high paying jobs, and wealth for the country and that help the general good of the nation.

That is a model I think we have to seriously start looking at. The adversarial model between the public and the private sector and between different industries and between labour and business is one that in essence is self-destructive. Nowhere is it more self-destructive than in the area of research and development. A new attitude and new thinking are needed if we are to survive economically.

When we contrast the state of our universities and the state of R and D in this country with the state of the universities and R and D in countries like Japan and Germany, I think it becomes obvious and very plain what the difference is and why some succeed and others do not.

We also have a basic structural problem in this country when it comes to R and D. That was enunciated many years ago by the Lamontagne committee report on research and development. What it found was that—and I believe that paper was done in the early seventies—compared to other nations in the world our public expenditure on R and D at that time was a little bit more than what public expenditure was in most of the industrialized countries in the world. What they found significant was that the private R and D done was way below what was normally done in the other OECD countries. When they broke that down a little further, they discovered that Canadian owned businesses did quite well when it came to R and D and that it was the multinational firms that did so poorly when it came to R and D.

In some ways that is logical. It should not surprise us at all that a multinational firm generally does its research and development in its own country. Our economic structure is such that so much of our industry is foreign owned by multinationals which do little research in this country. That is what the Lamontagne committee report pin-pointed as a structural problem that we had.

When I heard earlier today some of the remarks from our Liberal colleagues about R and D, attacking the NDP for being anti-business, I chuckled. Many of the things that my colleague, our critic for science and research, was saying were things to be found in the Lamontagne report. The Lamontagne report of course was a Liberal report, but then perhaps Mr. Lamontagne was of the old school, of the old Liberal school of Walter Gordon and Mr. Kierans, the old school that died in the sixties, the old school that believed in Canadian economic nationalism.

It is no wonder that we see the evolution of the Liberal Party coming around to the point where when we say things that are not unusual, in fact things that Liberals like Eric Kierans and Mr. Lamontagne around that time were saying now are considered by the Liberals in the House as being anti-business, socialist, sloganeering, totally impractical and off the wall. So be it.

If we are going to deal seriously with the question of R and D in this country we have to be able to mobilize industry, the public sector and labour. I suggest that it is harder to mobilize industry when it is a multinational industry. Canadian industry which has some roots and loyalty to this country can work together in a common strategy to do the research and then do the development and the marketing. That becomes, of course, insurmountable when we are dealing with an economy where vast chunks of it is owned by foreigners through foreign multinationals.

I could stand here and recite statistics concerning the record of the present government. I think they have already been put on the record. I do not want to get into this game because really what we are doing on the floor of the House of Commons is posturing.

As I suggested before, I am certain that in a private discussion, my hon. friend from the Liberal Party and my friend the Minister for Science, sitting privately together without the television sets and the microphones and so forth, we would find, I am sure, 99 per cent agreement. It is a pity that basic agreement cannot be brought out here into the public forum, that we cannot take that agreement and really create programs that would begin to meet the R and D needs for Canada.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear the hon. member say that he was posturing in the House. That must be a rarity. I am surprised to hear him suggest that he would ever posture. I was unaware that someone as distinguished as he, who has run to be leader of his party, would have considered indulging in such a pastime.

I did listen with interest to his comments about the past policies of the party of which I have the honour to be a member. I was amused to hear him suggest that the New Democratic Party has picked up on the policies the Liberal party began to advocate 20 years ago, in fact, almost 30 years ago.

I have always suggested that the New Democratic Party has been slow to pick up good ideas, but I did not realize it took that long.

In that vein, I wonder if the hon. member could, perhaps, say that he agrees with our party, that research and development is not the sole focus of government activity, but in fact it involves all elements of society. Much more than government is involved in it. The Liberal Party policy that has been so ably set forth in the debate today, whereby all segments of our society must participate in the development of research projects in our country is, in fact, a very sensible policy, one that commends itself to the hon. gentleman and even to the members of his party who are less up to date in their thinking than he is, 30 years back though he may be.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, there certainly is a lot to respond to in the brief question of my friend.

First of all, my friend is new to Parliament. I think he is beginning to recognize the amount of posturing that even he does automatically. At some stage he might even become so self-aware that he begins to realize that what happens on the floor of the House of Commons is one reality that in many ways is surreal to the reality of the real world.

Perhaps when he begins to realize the surreality of this place, he will become a very effective member, when he will be able to differentiate between various realities.

When my hon. friend talks about old Liberal ideas, let us not forget that the NDP is called "the Liberal Party in a hurry" by some. When I talk about the economic nationalism that used to be advocated by the Liberals, it is something that we find to be still a valid idea. If we want to follow the Liberal course in terms of how to spend money and encourage private R and D, then what Mr. Lalonde brought forward with a scientific research tax credit, saw literally billions of dollars being wasted.

I wish I had my notes on some of the research projects that the Liberals were financing at that time. I believe there was one in which they were trying to raise cows so that cows could give chocolate milk.

I believe the Liberals were going to help finance that as part of their research and development projects.

If you could run and look at the list of what the Liberals were going to sponsor—and in fact they did—billions of dollars were lost to tax scams. That is the Liberal idea of how to encourage private R and D. Well, if that is the idea, forget it. Those folks are not ready for government tomorrow. They were not ready for government then; they are not ready for government today or tomorrow, and if that is still the thinking of the Liberal Party, they are not ready for government for the next decade to come.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for his quite helpful observations on science and technology policy. I wish my friend would not leave, because we have some words for him.

I do not think the debate here is about surrealism, quite frankly, and it may be a good deal less about posturing. I think it is about a little honesty, a little sincerity, a little seriousness, as representatives of the Canadian people.

We heard the hon. member moments ago talking about the Liberal science and technology policy of the past. I do not mind telling you, Mr. Speaker, and I know you are going to appreciate this, that the national rate of expenditures for science and technology was higher during the Diefenbaker years than it was during the Trudeau years.

When Mr. Trudeau came into office, the gross expenditure on research and development was 1.4 per cent of GDP. During the 1970s and almost throughout the 1970s it was up .9 per cent. So this party, this party which has been the firmest advocate of research and development has not a thing to learn. The Liberals could learn if they recognized the contribution they had made to the deindustrialization of Canada at the present. We are happy to see them joining the fight.

On the other hand, I just left a meeting of the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology where we sat mystified. My Liberal colleagues, whom I respect very much on that committee, heard the Minister for Science talking about an additional $1.5 billion that he had to spend, out of which there would be a number of programs launched, KAON and so on, and a number of things were somehow supposed to figure into this. I asked my colleagues where the $1.5 billion was? What is this, new money? They said, oh, no, that was the 5 per cent and the 3 per cent additions that were in the budget last year and this year.

What that means is that within the confines of a decreasing real dollar rate of expenditures for research and development, they are going to take money from already existing and short funding programs and do all of these new things. That was misleading. It was hypocritical because it communicates a bad, wrong, and unhelpful message to the people with respect to what should be done, as well as to what the government is doing.

I want to ask my hon. colleague if he thinks that so far either the Liberal Party or the Conservative Party have been essentially helpful in addressing this very desperate need of the Canadian economy.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague would agree that individually, members of both the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party see the importance of R and D and would like to see more R and D. However, the fact and the reality remains, that when the Liberals were in power their performance did not live up to what they publicly stated to be their goals.

Certainly the Conservative government does not live up to what even the Prime Minister has stated to be the goal. Indeed, we are slipping into a Third World stance. Of all of the OECD countries, we are one of the lowest in our expenditures on R and D as a percentage of our GDP.

In answer to my colleague, I must say honestly, no. The Liberal government and the Conservative government have not done the job which needs to be done.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the debate.

When I was reviewing the text of the opposition motion, I was struck by the fact that it failed to adequately capture the essence of the competitive technological challenge that we face.

This is a challenge which encompasses a wide range of pervasive issues, each of which is a vital element in the competitiveness equation. We are in the midst of a period of unprecedented scientific and technological change. These changes have touched every Canadian and virtually every aspect of our lives.

While research and development performance is clearly a key determinant for success, there are a number of underlying factors which we must first address. These are factors which will ultimately determine the success of any research and development effort.

One integral factor is public awareness of science and technology. It is clear that we face some rather formidable challenges in trying to build a strong science culture in this country. Changing the attitudes of a culture is a long-term process. It is an undertaking that requires the collective commitment of all sectors of our society: government at all levels, industry, organized labour, educators, parents, and our science and engineering societies and associations.

It is imperative that we make this commitment. To state it simply; if people do not properly understand what drives the changes they see happening around them, they will resist. After all, it is only human nature to do so.

The government has therefore placed the highest priority on fostering greater public awareness and understanding of science and technology. Our citizens, particularly our young people—

Mr. Milliken: Spending money on advertising.

Mr. Dorin: Yes, there is some advertising involved, and I am going to get to that in a moment.

Our citizens and young people must be made more aware of the integral role of scientific and technological development in our personal lives, our national economic well-being, and our international competitiveness.

We must convince more Canadians, first, that a scientifically and technologically literate workforce is a condition of continued or increasing national prosperity; and, second, that science and engineering represent very promising careers for their children. It is vital for us to get more Canadians involved in informed debate and decision-making involving the vital science and technology issues of the day. Clearly the task at hand is a formidable one.

The message concerning the need to promote enhanced public awareness was hammered home in a survey conducted last year on Canadian scientific literacy.

The findings of this first-ever survey of adult Canadians revealed an alarmingly low level of science literacy knowledge. If there was any good news to be found in the results, it was that Canadians often scored higher than other western nations. The results of the survey were rather sobering, however. For example, over half of the respondents did not know that the earliest humans came later than the dinosaurs; close to half did not know that it takes a year for the earth to go around the sun; close to two-thirds could not name a Canadian scientist; and over half could not name a single Canadian achievement in science.

I would be curious to see how members of Parliament would score if they took the test. And I don't mean this as a commentary on the intellectual capacity of any one members but rather on the fact that our low levels of scientific literacy appear to be quite pervasive. We have our work cut out for us in terms of heightening public awareness.

We are in the midst of a period in which our nation is depending on the talents of our scientists, our technicians, and our researchers to an unprecedented extent and numbers just are not there.

A major part of our problem is attitudes, attitudes passed along from one generation to the next. Changing attitudes begins with awareness, and this applies to everybody. We need to work with our schools and our educators in more actively pursuing a range of avenues which develop science and technology literacy and prepare students for careers in these fields. We must look at options such as co-operative work education and adopt school programs which bring schools and industry together in efforts to develop the workforce of the future.

It is obvious that parents, educators, employers, and governments must take creative and concrete action to break down the stereotypes which limit the career choices of both women and men. But government cannot do the job alone, nor should it be expected to. From a government perspective we realize that it is our responsibility to provide the leadership, the co-ordination, and the policy support needed to foster public awareness activities which involve industry, academia, and other key players.

I am proud to say that the government is committed to this leadership role. It is a strong commitment that can be traced through a number of initiatives we have launched. Hon. members have already heard or will be hearing about the Canada Scholarships Program, the Networks of Centres of Excellence and the initiatives of the Natural Sciences and Research Council. I would like to focus specifically on public awareness.

Three years ago, the government launched a national campaign to raise public awareness of the importance of science and technology to Canada's economic growth and to our quality of life. The campaign is designed to make Canadians, particularly youth, place more value on science and technology, to influence career choices, to make science and technology development an increasingly important part of public policy and to increase the level of national scientific literacy.

To date, the campaign has made significant progress towards achieving its long-term objectives. The campaign itself has developed to the point where it has become a social product for which there is a growing demand. The campaign has contributed to promoting the importance of Canadian scientific and technological development within the public issue agenda. It has begun to reverse the negative images that youth have about science, and has informed thousands of Canadians about our nation's scientific and technological achievements.

Perhaps more importantly, the science and technology public awareness campaign has helped leaders in the scientific community increase their effectiveness in communicating with the public and is both supported and catalysed provincial and territorial government action on public awareness in and outside the educational systems.

Allow me a moment to touch on some of the specific things we have done as part of the public awareness effort. We have the Science Culture Canada Program, which is supporting a wide range of projects from coast to coast, aimed at promoting greater public awareness of science and technology.

We launched a national advertising effort aimed at youth and we produced and distributed a range of public awareness materials. A travelling, interactive computer exhibit toured shopping malls across the country. We have worked with the provinces and territories on initiatives to increase the number of science and technology-related learning experiences in elementary school classrooms.

We are working with the provinces, the teachers and the school boards to strengthen the quality of science and technology education.

It is particularly important that we reach the students in grade six through nine. Surveys have shown this to be the key period during which attitudes are shaped. It is here that we win them over or we lose them for good.

A cornerstone of our public awareness effort is National Science and Technology Week, organized jointly with the provinces and the territories and scientific and engineering groups. Last October marked the first time we focused a national spotlight on science and technology, and by all accounts the week was a great success.

We had "The Magic of Chemistry" open house in St. John's; the University of Victoria hosted the Science Olympics, where teams of high school students competed in science problem-solving contests; Yukon College hosted hands-on scientific demonstrations by guest speakers from B.C. Science World; there was a high school science award ceremony in Jonquiere, Quebec; and, Winnipeg hosted the first National Congress of Young Sciences of Canada. These are just some examples. In all, there were over 600 events held, from coast to coast, and we expect an even bigger celebration for this October.

We want to use this occasion to give young people, in fact all Canadians, an opportunity to talk to scientists, to touch technology and to explore the new ideas being discovered every day. If we can do it for fitness, for theatre or for music, then surely we can do it as well for science and technology. It is an idea whose time is long overdue.

The government would like to extend the invitation to members on all sides of the House to get involved in National Science and Technology Week. There is a great deal we can all do in carrying the vital science and technology awareness messages to our constituencies.

I could not end without mentioning a particular science involvement in my own riding, the Edmonton Space and Science Centre. Just recently, I participated in a ceremony where the federal government committed $2 million towards that centre for the increased role that centre will be taking on as a science and learning centre in Edmonton for northern Alberta. I am happy to have that centre located squarely in the middle of my constituency.

I am pleased that I had this opportunity to outline the details of our government's significant and, indeed, unprecedented commitment to fostering the development of a science culture in Canada. It is important to note that all the policies and programs, all the grants and incentives in the world will be in vain if they are not coupled with a strong public awareness and education effort. The Government of Canada recognizes this reality and I am happy about the way that we have responded.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but say that the member who just spoke in this debate made a very interesting speech, but he avoided altogether the question and the motion which is the subject of the debate today. He started off by saying that he thought the motion was too narrowly framed in speaking of research and development, and then went on to speak about scientific literacy and scientific cultures throughout his whole speech.

I will acknowledge that the two go hand in hand, that there is a need to develop scientific culture in this country, but I find it astonishing that he did not refer to the Prime Minister's promise to double Canada's spending commitment to research and development. If the debate was too narrowly framed, his criticism should be directed to the Prime Minister, the leader of his party, who in a speech to the Montreal Chamber of Commerce seven years ago next week promised: "to double Canada's spending commitment to research and development within a first mandate".

I would like to remind him also that the Prime Minister wrote in his book Where I Stand that: "research and development and the resulting innovations are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country".

The Prime Minister asserted that if the percentage of our Gross National Product allocated to research and development were increased by just 1 per cent, it would generate an additional one million jobs in Canada and $20 billion in additional sales of manufactured products.

Of course we know what has happened since 1984. This government has abandoned the promise made by the Prime Minister, has cut support for research and development in practically every manner possible, and as a consequence Canada's collective output to research and development has gone down, rather than go up as the Prime Minister promised seven years ago.

I would like to ask the member to say a few words about research and development. If it was so important to the Prime Minister seven years ago, why is it not a priority of the member and of this government today? Why are the jobs that would result from increased R and D spending and why are the export sales that would result from increased R and D spending not a priority of the government?

How can this member stand by while other countries are spending twice on research and development as much as Canada does and are beating the pants off us in international competition? What suggestions has he got to see that Canadian industry will spend more or invest more on research and development?

I want to anticipate the kind of point the member would probably say. I am not suggesting that the Government of Canada should throw money at the problems. Far be it for me to suggest that the Government of Canada should throw money at a problem.

What I would like from that member is some kind of an idea of how we can stimulate Canadian businesses to invest in research and development and provide Canadians with the kind of jobs and sales that they deserve and which the Prime Minister promised he would give us seven years ago?

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member answered his own question in the final two or three sentences. That is simply that it is not the question of science and technology, as he stated. I acknowledge it is a very critical one for an industrialized country like ourselves if we want to maintain our standard of living and our living style. The fact is the equation is not simply how much money comes from the Consolidated Revenue Fund or from the taxpayers of Canada and how much money the government spends. Surely we have to look at the total industrial and scientific community of the country and we have to look not just to the government itself.

He mentioned the fact that we cannot solve the problems by throwing money at them. That is true. Perhaps I can give him two examples of things that this government did which had enormous results.

The first one is we put in place changes to the Patent Act. At the time it was called Bill C-22. I just met with somebody last week in my office from a major company which has put $100 million into research and development at the University of Alberta in Edmonton for research into pharmaceuticals and new drugs for the future. That is a $100 million investment at one university in Canada and it is directly attributable to the fact that we in the last Parliament passed that bill, I might add, fought tooth and nail by his party, his leader and by his supporters in the other place.

A second example is in northern Alberta. I will use this example because it is close to home. In northern Alberta we are going to see shortly the construction of a new forestry project. I talked with the head of the engineering firm involved with that project only last week. He was telling me that this is going to set the standard for forestry projects in the world because it will have a virtually zero emission of toxins and pollutants. He expects a lot of interest to be generated from around the world in the forestry industry by this plant which will be world class.

The Prime Minister said we needed to have increased research and development in this country, but he did not say that it had to be strictly a matter of the size of the cheque that the government would write. I think I have demonstrated through two or three examples just exactly the the kind of things we have done that are not necessarily calls upon the taxpayer.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am able to congratulate the member for Edmonton Northwest for his probably unsuccessful bootleg to the opposition motion put forward because let's face it the motion put forward is a brilliant motion when we really examine it.

The member for Saint-Henri—Westmount said:

> That this House condemn the Government for failing to honour the Prime Minister's promise to "double Canada's spending commitment to research and development."

We cannot stress enough just what the point is. The point as reported in the Gazette back on March 23, 1984, said that "Mulroney promised in Montreal that a government under his leadership would bring down interest rates and double Canada's spending commitment to research and development during its first mandate", double the spending commitment, I remind the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest, in case it did not click for the last four hours. The actually quote is, and this is incredible: "We believe this will create hundreds of thousands of new jobs and billions in new sales for Canada each year". He said that to the Chamber of Commerce.

An hon. member: If only they had doubled the money, we would have all those jobs today.

Mr. Keyes: Yes, as so articulately spelled out today in the House on a few occasions, not only during his remarks but also during his articulate pin-pointing questions to the members opposite. Contrary to the Prime Minister's promise, spending on research and development in Canada has actually gone down since the government took office and the spending commitment from close to 1.4 per cent of the gross domestic product to 1.3 per cent of the gross domestic product. That is incredible.

When did this take place? It took place probably during the most successful, resurgent years in the Canadian economy that we had seen—seven years of good fortune, of job development, of spending, of buying, of production, of jobs. And yet, down we go, to 1.3 per cent of the gross domestic product.

The member for Edmonton Northwest likes to talk about tests. The test for the member opposite is to stop with the optimistic promises for future commitments, because we have already had those. We have had these optimistic commitments to research and development for the last seven years. It is time to see his government put its money where the Prime Minister's mouth is.

Mr. Dorin: I will be very brief. It does not take anything more than a brief moment to reply. The essential message is that the Liberal Party has just demonstrated again and again and again the fact that in its mind the only way to measure commitment or anything else is by how much taxpayers' money you manage to spend.

There is no point in spending money foolishly, like the $2 billion boondoggle of the SRTC.

I demonstrated in my answer to an earlier question the kinds of things that we have done to encourage spending, not by the taxpayers but by other people—industries—into research and development, developing new products, new technologies that create jobs and will be exported throughout the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to stand here in this House today to discuss this important opposition motion.

Many of us I think can agree that research and development is the only way that we can possibly become leaders in the world, rather than be relegated to followers. It is that which permits us to find new knowledge and to apply that knowledge so that we can in fact be in the forefront in a number of areas, whether it be in the technological area or the social science and humanities.

I could talk about the promises that have been broken, but I think my colleagues have made the point several times and I won't do that, with one exception, because I find this most interesting. I want to quote from the Toronto Star an article dated January 13, 1991. It is entitled Closed Eyes on Research and Development:

> For years Prime Minister Brian Mulroney has spoken eloquently and often on the need for a national commitment to research and development. In 1982, even before he became Progressive Conservative leader, Mulroney vowed to double public and private sector spending on R and D.

Here is what he said:

> Either we go into the game and become important players in this major league or we become a nation that will, during its entire lifetime, play in the Junior B circuit.

He went on. In 1983 as opposition leader, he bemoaned the fact that Canada had lost—and I am quoting—"a generation because of the absence of commitment to science and technology".

What a glaring contradiction. At the end of 1984 we stood at 1.40 of gross domestic productivity. That is in terms of spending for research and development. It slipped, and it is almost 1.30 now.

People will say, and my hon. colleague said, "you measure everything with dollars". That is not the issue. The issue is that there was a promise made time and time again.

Mr. Keyes: That is another lie.

Mr. Duhamel: And that promise was not honoured. That is what is causing a whole lot of difficulty in this country, that kind of verbal commitment, without the follow-up, without the action. It is unfortunate.

Mr. Crawford: Shame.

Mr. Duhamel: It is easy for members to take examples of success and say: "We have built this. We have done that", but we have to look at the country and the over-all picture.

The over-all picture is not a good picture. It is simply not so. There is another technique that is being used by members of the opposition quite apart from saying that the Liberals did it or that you want to spend your way out of it. They use a number such as $40 million or $22 million. It does not really matter.

Of course, to a Canadian out there, that is a lot of money. We have to ask the other question. How much money is it in relationship of what has to be done and to what other countries are doing? If we look at those two questions, we find that it is totally inadequate.

[Translation]

I find it very distressing that the Prime Minister, even before he became Prime Minister, made this promise, and that later, when he should have done something, when the economic situation in Canada was still in pretty good shape—in fact it was in very good shape—he failed to support education.

[English]

We have to take a look at the cuts, the capping and all of that in the global context. Not in an unkind way, I say that whatever the government touches in the whole area related to education and research and development, it is not going well.

The government increases the number of immigrants that it brings to this country. Bravo. That is not a real problem. But, where are the support programs? Where are the language programs? It has messed that up.

Regarding the copyright law, teachers and professors have been waiting for three years and still nothing. If I, as a teacher or professor photocopy a page or so, I have to be in fear of breaking the law. Absolutely nothing has come forward.

What about the cuts to transfer payments and $100 million to training and retraining? What about the 3 per cent administrative fee on the student aid program? What about the 7 per cent goods and services tax on books and other learning materials? I could go on and on, but we have to look at it in the global context.

It is not only the capping of research and development funds. These other reductions and cuts also have a negative impact. That is really very unfortunate.

I want to make certain that we understand the importance of research and development, not only with respect to developments in technology, but with respect to social problems in this country and indeed in this world.

[Translation]

So many people think that when we talk about research and development, we are talking about technological progress. Of course that is also very important, but the social sector is even more so, since the most complex problems confronting our society today are social problems.

[English]

Let me just share with you what I think most members would agree are the greatest challenges facing our nation. They are not the technological challenges. Of course, we need to make progress there. We must and we will.

What are the major challenges facing this nation? The whole question of national unity and the whole question of poverty. Almost 5 million Canadians are poor. Most of them are women and 1 million of them are children. There are 1.8 million Canadians going to food banks, many of whom are children. There are 2 million people on welfare as we meet in this House today. There are over 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. There are 5 million to 7 million who are functionally illiterate and are costing the country a bit more than $10 billion a year.

It is really quite inappropriate that women in this country still do not have their fair share of some of the best paid positions and that they still earn roughly two thirds of what it is that men earn.

Research and development can play a role.

[Translation]

Research and development must show us what we can do to correct and resolve these major problems, these major challenges to our society and to our country.

[English]

Let me say very quickly what the Royal Society has recommended. It is an important organization. It has recommended an expansion in the funding of research, the social sciences and the humanities even at a time when many observers are worried that Canada may find it difficult to keep pace with fast moving and increasingly expensive fields of research in the natural sciences, engineering and medicine. That is what the Royal Society has said with respect to social sciences.

Some will know that there are tax credits for certain types of research, but not in the social sciences. People do not see an immediate pay-off, therefore there are not the kinds of investments. Yet it is the most underfunded of all and it is probably the most important of all in terms of national unity, in terms of correcting the social difficulties which we face on a daily basis as a nation.

If we look at the government's program in terms of centres of excellence, I believe, if my memory serves me correctly, there is one on aging and its impact on society. There are literally hundreds of problems that need to be studied, yet there is only one in the centres of excellence. I think that is a powerful statement in terms of what the government sees as its priority. It is misguided.

Those are not the most important challenges facing Canada today, that is where they have invested the funds. They are important and I do not want them to lose those funds, but they must be increased in the field of social sciences and humanities. We need some tax credits. We need some additional assistance so that we can come to grips.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think I have reached the end of my speech. In concluding, I would like to say that to me this is not a partisan issue. It is all about promises, promises, promises that were not kept. It is also a matter of priorities: priorities for the country, for you and me and the people we represent, for a strong, united and prosperous Canada.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments of the hon. member for Saint-Boniface. When he refers to the motion which states in part, and I quote: "—the Government for failing to honour the Prime Minister's promise to 'double Canada's spending commitment to research—", I am sorry but, in our part of the country, in Abitibi and in Quebec, the Prime Minister honoured his promise. Indeed, the increase in spending was two and even threefold. Let me tell you why. In the 1991-1992 Estimates—all hon. members received a copy at their office—you can read that a new mining center will be developed this year in the North, in Quebec, at a cost of $15 million, as a site for testing ideas resulting from the mining research and development program.

Never, in the past seven years, has the Liberal Party organization in Abitibi lent a helping hand on this issue. You say that this is not a partisan matter, but you were conspicuously absent everytime there was an important debate. Articles such as this one are published in newspapers, and I quote: "Our thanks to the government of Canada for opening in Val-d'Or a research laboratory specializing in comminution." These are the words of our people, people like Paul Giroux, a restaurant owner, Roger Roy, from Jean Coutu pharmacy, Brigitte Giroux, from Saint-Hubert BBQ, and Roger Gareau, from Gareau Automobiles, thanking the Canadian government for developing a project for the mining sector and for helping that sector. So, are you for that project aimed at helping the mining industry in Quebec, yes or no?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. I am very happy that the hon. member shared with me his views and these facts, and I really like him. But I still want to get some things straight. It is past time—as I said at the beginning of my speech—to point to some projects and figures and then try to prove something that does not exist. These projects exist. But let us look at the whole of Canada. If we look at Canada, I challenge you.

If I used any statistics that are incorrect, I am willing to do almost anything that you will ask me, dear colleague. But do not simply point to a project or a figure and then try to determine that everything works well. One other thing you have to be careful with: You said that in Quebec the spending commitment will be doubled, tripled ou quadrupled.

Mr. Saint-Julien: In Northern Quebec!

Mr. Duhamel: Perhaps, but some areas in Canada may have been cut, hit hard or crushed. That is what people are telling me, dear friend.

So, to summarize, I tell you that I welcome your comments. I welcome the goodwill with which you shared your views with me, but I assure you that your reality is perhaps accurate, but that mine is different, simply in that I try to think about the country as a whole, including Manitoba.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, in browsing through some of the notes, I noted that the Prime Minister complained seven years ago about the then Liberal record of percentage of GDP devoted to R and D. He was being a little cynical about it, but he said that it was 1.3 per cent of GDP. I looked at the notes from our critic today as to where the government is now in percentage of GDP applied to research and development, and it is still 1.3 per cent. We have come a long way in 28 years.

I would like to think that the process of research and development involves government, involves universities, and involves the private sector, the private sector being the clearing house. I want to comment as well that it is not simply expenditure of funds by government that is going to move this area ahead. It is actually inducements by government to the private sector to invest and spend funds. It is the over-all spending that we want to increase. We do not want it confined to government spending.

As we stand here today talking about this continuing 1.3 per cent and how we would all like to increase it, I note that we in this House have not been able to do very much about that, although we all want to.

I would like to ask my colleague whether he thinks that the social sciences which he has referred to might be able to make a contribution to the process of inducing a greater investment in R and D by all sectors of the economy.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. He has made a number of important points.

First, he has recognized the importance of social sciences. I believe that social sciences can play a meaningful role. They have been doing that, will continue to do that, and will improve on that. It is critically important that this happen. I have also indicated that there should be some tax credits for people to assist the social sciences. The member's point about getting the private sector more integrally involved in research and development is also well taken.

However, it is not just money; it is also an attitude. It is opening up our minds to the possibilities. It is recognizing that if we want to be up there as No. 1, as leaders as opposed to followers, research and development will do it for us, investment in the abilities of our people. Research and development is the key.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to share the following quote with the House in debating on this motion:

> Either we go into the game and become important players in this major league, or we become a nation that will, during its entire lifetime, play in the Junior B circuit.

That infamous statement was made by the right hon. Prime Minister in 1982 as his way of expressing his commitment to science and technology. At that time he did not have the reins of power in his hands, but he made it clear that he intended to place Canada, through a commitment to research and development, in the major leagues.

The game remains the same. The game is cutthroat where high-tech talent and innovation translate into dollars. It is a world where the undisputed leaders have a commitment to research and development. The game remains the same, but what has happened to the commitment of the Prime Minister and his party? They have had six years to take Canada to the major league, but we are becoming more junior every day.

As Official Opposition critic for national health and welfare, I will seize this opportunity to bring to this debate my perspective on how the government cuts are affecting health care, from lay-offs to the cancellation of research that may have shown us better and healthier lives. Unfortunately research is something that cannot be shelved now and taken out and dusted off when the economic climate is brighter.

Time does not stand still for technology. There are scientists in this country who have worked for years to gather the best people around them; specialized, talented people. I have recently heard of cases where researchers unable to realize funding from this government will have their excellent research teams disbanded. That will be a tragedy.

For instance, in the National Health Research and Development Program, estimated funding of $32 million was slashed to $28 million in the same year, in 1990. What does this mean? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what it means to people like Dr. Raisa Deber, a professor and researcher at the University of Toronto.

Because of the uncertainty of her funding, her two junior researchers may lose their jobs. The further implication of that is that we will be losing future talents as well. Their research was a study to better treat back pain, high blood pressure and other ailments through enhanced communication with patients—excellent research protocol that may not see the light of day. Dr. Jack Siemiatycki, professor at the Institute Armand Frappier of the University of Quebec, will also be forced to let go two of his team members unless he finds the funding NHRDP no longer provides. Dr. Siemiatycki was studying the link between asbestos and cancer. Only recently in this House we have been faced with the issue of this asbestos as a source of the problem.

Additional funding is not easy to procure, I submit. Canadian companies spend on average one-half of what is spent on research and development in other industrialized countries. The government has recently turned to Canadian corporations and pointed a finger, blaming business for lack of research and development. However, the blame ought to fall on this government because this government not only has reneged on its commitment; in fact I think it has reneged on research and development altogether.

While wishing for a high-tech economy fuelled by an educated work force that my colleague from St. Boniface has alluded to, the government pares away research funds and money for education. The government is living a catch-22, but it is the Canadian people who will be snared.

There is an apathy in the government. There is an apathy in the country. It is an apathy not shared by eight other leading industrialized countries. Canada spends only 1.3 per cent of its Gross National Product on research compared to about more than twice spent by the United States, Sweden, France, Japan and West Germany. It is no wonder Canada has fallen behind.

The National Health Research and Development Program is the main funding agency for research projects in applied health care. It is one of the most important sources of funds for researchers working for preventive medicine. Yet this agency is having its budget drained away.

Today, the climate for health care is turbulent. Transfer cuts and freezes place unprecedented pressures on provincial governments. Newfoundland's budget tried to cope by closing 360 acute care hospital beds. Nine hundred health care workers are being laid off. Quebec and Ontario, along with the western provinces are feeling the strain. Ontario spends one-third of its tax revenues on health care. Each person in this province makes on average 10 Ontario health insurance claims each year.

Recently we discussed the plight of medicare in our country. We were really saddened. Just yesterday I was discussing this issue with the member for Hamilton Mountain and the member for Mississauga East. We are really saddened. We are not seeing any future for medicare. While we recognize there is no question that the cost of health care is rising, there is no question solutions need to be found. Money needs to be found to keep medicare intact.

Yet the most promising solution, preventive medicine, is just research away.

We must learn how to prevent disease even more. We must learn how to make health care delivery more efficient.

The answer is not user fees or closing beds, as we seem to hear from the government side, and the answer definitely is not to slash the budget for research and development.

How does this government think we can defuse the problems of tomorrow unless we tackle them today? Right now, in this city, at the University of Ottawa Medical School, Dr. C. Y. Kang is developing a vaccine against the HIV virus which is known to cause AIDS. Dr. Kang's microbiology team has found a drug that stimulates immunity, the capacity for the human body to defend itself against the HIV virus and "it looks quite promising", to quote Dr. Kang. I hope, for the sake of the world, the prospect of finding funding is promising as well.

Dr. Kang will need at least $1 million to manufacture this drug properly for testing. What if the money is not available in Canada? Will doors in the United States open if Dr. Kang knocks?

Research and development are more than a means of ensuring economic prosperity; they can also be a protector. We all know the story of Banting and Best who helped discover insulin for us and, thereby, prevented a lot of misery and tragedy among patients with diabetes mellitus, patients with high blood sugar.

Through this discovery, Canadians and people around the world have been offered some respite from this illness. I believe Canadian scientists and researchers have much more to offer, if only they are allowed to pursue their talents in science.

Frequently I receive letters from people across Canada who suffer from myalgic encephalomyelitis, a type of disease that is known in layman's terms as chronic fatigue syndrome. The question is: What type of research is being done to prevent this disease? What is known about it, and how can they repair their health and lives? Maybe the government could have a better answer. I do not have the heart to tell these people that very little is being done in this country and, with the present government commitment to research and development, little will be done while this government is in power.

Let me end by echoing the sentiments of my colleague from Saint-Henri—Westmount in saying that this government should be condemned for failing to honour the Prime Minister's promise "to double Canada's spending commitment to research and development". I challenge the government to start investing in the future that it professes to support. If we invest in the well-being of Canadians, we will have a better Canada and a better country.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for his valuable contribution to this debate.

It is unfortunate that the Minister of National Health and Welfare chose not to intervene in this debate and respond to the comments of the member. He was referring to cuts in the budget of the National Health Research and Development Program which, as the member explained, provides funding for research to health promotion, disease prevention, health care delivery and preventive medicine.

I wondered if the member might just explain a little more what the distinction is between health care research or disease prevention and medical research, which is conducted by the MRC.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has one minute. I do not think he can do it, but go ahead.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, health care research and disease prevention encompass investigations and inquiries into all aspects of health as a tool to prevent disease. One aspect of that is perhaps to help discover a vaccine that can be funded by the Medical Research Council. Other sciences, the social sciences, the role of counselling, the role of the social workers and other health care workers are all legitimate aspects of health care delivery, and we would want to know their role in preventing disease.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

Adjournment Debate

BANKRUPTCY

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to follow up on my question of February 26, to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. He will know that this is no ordinary recession. Southern Ontario is being hit hard. Plants are closing down. Jobs are lost forever. It is a far cry from the temporary examples of the last recession in 1981-82.

It is a fact that only 24 per cent of the lay-offs in 1981-82 involved total or partial plant closings. But in 1990, these accounted for 64 per cent of the job cuts. I raised that issue in Question Period with the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. He basically stated that since this government had created so many jobs since 1984, there were more jobs to lose. That gives no comfort to my constituents.

For those who say that this recession is not as bad as the last one, they are dead wrong, or they have not been to southern Ontario, the economic engine of Ontario. Southwestern Ontario alone is responsible for 60 per cent of the province's gross domestic product of $250 billion.

Welfare rates in Kent county are up 400 per cent from 1981 levels. The city of Chatham has a 30 per cent unemployment rate in the automotive sector, and 38 per cent out of work in the transportation sector. These are dramatic figures, far worse than in the last recession.

For example, Motor Wheel Corporation in Chatham has been operating since I was a young child, with a labour force of over 600 strong. It is closing its doors permanently in May. Hunt-Wesson's canning plant in Tilbury made it through the last recession, doing business for over 25 years, but not this time. The company president says that the twin killers of high interest rates and the high dollar put them out of business. Now tomato farmers in my riding are left holding their baskets, with no one to sell to.

The recession is hitting hard. Dresden, with a population of 2,500 is seeing two of its major employers closing their doors, over 100 people out of work. Many of these people have worked at National Hardware, one of the firms, for over 30 years. Think of the ripple effect on the local economy. Ever since I can remember, Dresden always had about four or five farm implement dealers. Those small businessmen made it through the last recession, but not this time. Now there is no one left. Zero. This is no ordinary recession.

Agriculture is vitally important. Essex and Kent counties alone, grow and sell nearly half a billion dollars worth of agricultural produce. This recession is hitting us with a double whammy. While the government opposite merely says this is but a normal downturn in the economy, that by having a plant close down here and there, it somehow makes us more competitive.

About one-third of Chatham's workforce is in the auto parts industry, so it may follow that the city would suffer similar setbacks to other automotive towns, such as Oshawa and Windsor. But Chatham is smaller, with a population of only 42,000. When a plant lays off, the result devastates and disrupts the entire local economy.

Lay-offs have had a dramatic effect on the city. Real estate sales are down 50 per cent and southern Ontario merchants are not only suffering as a result of laid-off people spending less, they are also losing money to the American merchants, perhaps up to 40 per cent of their income.

Bankruptcies handled by just one office of Peat Marwick Thorne in Chatham are up 50 per cent from last year. This is no ordinary recession, some mere cycle in the economy.

I was interested in the comments of the Minister for International Trade in this week's issue of Maclean's. He says the auto parts industry is mostly unskilled, and that of course we will lose some plants and workers. But he offers no adjustment programs during the restructuring. He offers no alternatives. He says to the unemployed: "You are on your own." Instead, the government fails in its commitment to research and development, and cuts and freezes education and health care.

• (1805)

These are not the actions of a government that is committed to training our work force for the jobs of the future or assisting those workers currently laid off.

The recession is cutting deeper into the economic foundation of southern Ontario and this government turns a blind eye to it.

We are witnessing the terrible deindustrialization of Canada. We have lost 13 per cent of all manufacturing jobs since free trade. We have lost 20 per cent of our share of the world markets during the last five years. Our segment of the world export trade fell from 5 per cent to 4 per cent. As a result our current account balance has shifted from a $2.7 billion surplus in 1984 to a $16.7 billion deficit in 1989. Our trade balance with our major trading partner, the United States, has dropped $6 billion since 1984.

As our industrial sectors are being sacked and pillaged through free trade and a sad economy, the government has offered no adjustment programs, no answers, just more of the same. Canada is facing a serious long-term competitive crisis and it is no more apparent than in southwestern Ontario.

Southern Ontario, Canada's manufacturing heartland, is suffering from hardening of the arteries. As the winds of change blow away our economic structures and erode southern Ontario's foundation, the government is just standing back and watching. Any good farmer knows that you just do not stand back and watch your soil erode and blow away. You set up windbreaks.

Our manufacturing sector is the soil by which Canada's economy grows and prospers. The Tory government is letting it erode away.

Recession is not just a word in the dictionary. It affects your neighbour across the backyard fence, the farmer down the concession road, the local coffee shop where everyone gathers at six in the morning. It affects your kid's baseball or hockey coach. Recession hits families.

To conclude, this is no ordinary recession. I will be interested in knowing what the government plans are to tune up the economic engine of southern Ontario.

Welfare rates in Kent County are zooming. Burdened by the weight of the recession, some southwestern Ontario communities, including Chatham, are eligible for the first time in history for special provincial aid to pay for skyrocketing welfare costs.

I ask the government, on behalf of my constituents and southern Ontario, what policies are in place that will lend a helping hand to workers and their families?

What is this government doing while the recession is hitting us hard? How will you assist those 64 per cent of lay-off victims who will have no factory to return to after the recession is over?

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, allow me to praise your usual patience with our colleagues in this House for the length of their speeches.

The government recognizes that the Canadian economy is going through an adjustment period, which is creating problems for many Canadians. However, considering the growth rate experienced in the past years, the slowdown should not come as a surprise. This natural consequence of rapid growth is such that the demand in products and services exceeds the economic production capacity.

The strong expansion of the Canadian economy over the past seven years has exceeded our capacity limits, both on the labour and the product markets, creating destructive inflationary pressures which threatened to settle in the economy, making their elimination more difficult and expensive as years go by.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, the government has introduced and followed fiscal and economic policies to achieve a better balance between demand and production, and to reduce inflationary pressures. These policies will lower interest rates and bring back a more balanced and sustained growth. Moreover, the government has introduced structural policies improving the competitiveness of the Canadian economy on international markets and increasing our production capacity. For instance, the imposition of the tax on goods and services allowed the Canadian manufacturing sector to improve its competitiveness, thanks to the elimination of the federal sales tax that subjected that production to discrimination, as was generally acknowledged.

Those policies aimed at reducing inflation and improving competitiveness are particularly important to protect and increase jobs in the automobile sector in Canada because of stiffer international competition. Without a reduction in inflationary tensions in Canada, those jobs would be lost to a producer whose production costs are much lower.

Because of the policies adopted by this government, Canada has cornered an ever larger share of the North American market.

However, the North Americain automobile industry is deep in a cyclical recession after several years of unprecedented sales that flooded the market. That recession has been aggravated by the present weakness of the economy as a whole.

We recognize, Mr. Speaker, that those periods of economic adjustment are not easy and that some people are faced with very real problems. However, it is important for Canadians to realize that the changing economic situation helps to ease inflationary pressures that have increased business costs and prices and that have eroded competitiveness and could jeopardize the jobs of all Canadian workers.

Also, Mr. Speaker, there are encouraging signs showing that the automobile demand may raise. In January and February, automobile sales have increased by 16 per cent over the third quarter of 1990. Because the rates have fallen by over 400 percentage points—

HOUSING

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the Nielsen task force which this government established several years ago did a complete review of federal government spending on housing. Its report was very revealing.

Only a fraction of the government programs in place at that time helped those in real need. Only about 40 per cent of federally-assisted housing was directed to those in need, perhaps 32,000 households.

Our government has turned this around. The new directions in housing introduced in 1986 has resulted in all social housing dollars going to those in need. Programs today are now targeted to those households that are unable to afford adequate and decent housing.

In the last four years, this government has assisted some 75,000 low income households. That is an increase of about 230 per cent over previous programs. All told, this year $1.8 billion will be spent to assist nearly 640,000 households to meet their housing needs.

Through these subsidies, we are providing decent shelter and affordable rents. Over the lifetime of each dwelling it will provide a home to many households in their time of need. Surely these directions are the way to go.

When resources from government revenue must be carefully parcelled out, it must go to Canadians whose lives will be improved substantially. It should not be squandered on those whose personal resources are more than adequate to rent or purchase on the private market.

Studies have shown us that about 15 per cent of Canadians must rely on some form of government assistance to meet their shelter needs. I am talking about families, women with young children, the elderly, the handicapped who through no fault of their own do not have affordable homes. Many are paying 40, 50, 60 and maybe even 75 per cent of their income each month for rent and heat.

Yet there are glaring examples of well-to-do individuals who are living in housing projects that are massively subsidized by the federal government. These people are shutting out the homeless and low income Canadians from affordable housing. High income Canadians should not be taking advantage of funding intended for low and moderate income Canadians.

There is a housing co-operative in Edmonton which was given a $280,000 cash grant in 1977 when it was built. Under a special program it received a preferential mortgage rate of 8 per cent for 50 years. This means that each of the co-operative's 59 units receives a 1.5 per cent interest reduction grant of $42.83 per month.

There is an individual living in that co-op who is earning over $90,000 per year and tax-free allowances. This is completely unacceptable. This individual could easily find and afford a home to rent or buy in Edmonton. It is unconscionable that a member of this House should show so little regard for the poor of his own community. I know that there are desperate families in Edmonton who would be absolutely thrilled to have the opportunity to live in this government-assisted housing. There are at least 30 people on the waiting list to get into the Sundance Housing Co-operative in Edmonton where a member of this House resides.

Furthermore, recent statistics have come to light which make it very clear that the situation in Edmonton is not unique. There is a shocking number of people living in co-ops throughout the country who have incomes in excess of $60,000 per year, more than 12 per cent.

Many of the people living in federally subsidized housing co-ops can afford the carrying costs of a modest home. Many housing co-op projects are financed by 8 or 9 per cent mortgage money over 50 years.

Having such high income earners living in these federally assisted housing projects is an abuse of a program meant for low and medium-income Canadians. Effectively, it shuts out the homeless and needy who must have affordable housing.

I would like to return to the example of a member of this House abusing that program. The member lives in a five bedroom unit that he shares with three other adults and a teenager. The whole rent for that apartment is $622 and he is paying one fifth of that, plus a modest surcharge of $60 or $70 a month to offset some of the costs because he is in a higher category. This member should be paying market rent.

My question is: Will the minister or the parliamentary secretary and the government give consideration to either a policy of encouraging these high income Canadians who are abusing this program to move out of these co-op projects or, perhaps better yet, introducing a policy of charging the market rent so that the sum return to the community and to the government is such that we can build more units and subsidize low and moderate-income individuals.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the hon. member and his question which was directed a few weeks ago to the Minister of State for Housing.

The need for affordable housing, as he has said, is an ongoing concern and helping provide that housing is a priority of this government.

A full evaluation of the program was conducted last year. One aspect that was reviewed was the issue of high income Canadians living in co-operative housing supported by the federal government.

Last December, the minister announced that the federal government would continue with the co-operative housing program, but with some improvements. A system of income ceilings for eligibility to move into any future projects is being introduced. Once residency has been established, the household incomes will be reviewed annually.

For those households whose income goes beyond the ceiling limit, they will be surcharged. The minimum number of units in each co-operative project dedicated to households in need that benefit from rental assistance will be increased from 15 per cent to 30 per cent. Through the provinces' cost share, the Rent Supplement Program, now eight of the 10 provinces help fund up to 50 per cent of the household in each co-op.

The minister is encouraging the others to follow suit. The experimental indexed link to mortgage that has been used for the last five years has proven to be quite successful for financing co-operative housing. Efforts are under way to expand the pool of potential investors and to hopefully reduce interest costs even more.

The logical result of this change should be an increase in the number of units that can be produced each year for the same federal government investment.

I know the minister is working out the program details with the Co-operative Housing Federation. He wants to ensure that the program is as cost effective as possible while retaining a range of income. It is the responsible approach to providing affordable housing to thousands of low and moderate-income Canadians.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to expand on my concerns about the process that has been followed over a number of years not to ensure the environmental soundness of a project called the Rafferty-Alameda dam.

This has been a sorry history at every stage of ministers of the Crown putting their political concerns for friendly relations with certain premiers above the concerns of Canadians for their environment, for the protection of their water supply and for a number of other serious concerns about the ecosystems of Canada.

Time after time we have heard in this House statements from ministers that they want to see a full environmental assessment, but the actions have not matched those statements. This week we have had the Rawson Academy of Aquatic Sciences make a submission to the Environmental Assessment Panel reviewing a project that is, for all intents and purposes, well on its way to completion and therefore not even amenable to controls on how it is developed to bring those more in conformity with the best interests of protecting the environment.

As I look over the agreement that the Rawson academy analysed this week for the Environmental Assessment Panel, I think I see some of the problems as to why the ministers in this House have spoken positive words and taken very little action. This agreement signed in 1959 guarantees that the Government of Canada will expeditiously provide the Government of the United States of America with a minimum of a certain amount of flood storage. It is not as surprising as it might have been at the time, when we see the minister promising action and taking none.

We will recall that it took two court cases to order the Minister of the Environment to carry out an environmental assessment and that even then the actual establishing of that environmental assessment was delayed by up to eight months before it commenced. By that time, as we well know, there were suspicions about secret agreements behind closed doors, with the premier of Saskatchewan to give a nod and a wink and let the construction of the Rafferty Dam and the beginning of Alameda Dam proceed despite there being no environmental assessment.

We now know that Rafferty is virtually complete, that Alameda is well under way, and that no environmental assessment has been completed, so it is impossible to correct the design or construction of those dams to conform with the interests of the environment.

What was not quite so clear is that we are not even able to put environmental constraints on the operation of those dams. The environmental panel which we thought at least had the ability to recommend that the dams be operated in an environmentally positive way, or at least in a minimally damaging way, would not even have the ability to make those recommendations because the ability of the Government of Canada to control the operation is already seriously compromised by an agreement it entered into with the United States for the operation of the dam, by the operating agreement that is attached to that, and by a licence that has been issued which relates to the operation of the dam.

Two ministers this week have tried to assure the House that despite the analysis by the Rawson academy the control of water relating to these dams is under the jurisdiction of a 1959 intergovernmental agreement and under the control of the International Joint Commission. Nothing could be further from the truth because this agreement in fact modifies that 1959 agreement. The International Joint Commission has not even been advised that that agreement has been changed, nor has it been told that its mandate under it has changed. Even though it recommended that 1959 agreement for the apportioning of water between Saskatchewan and North Dakota, it was not consulted on amendments to it, nor will it be consulted on agreements still to be made as to the water quality.

Lest we question who this agreement is in the interest of, I would like to quote a few sections of it:

> —releases from the Canadian dams will be scheduled to coincide with the periods of beneficial use in North Dakota—may be delayed when the State of North Dakota determines and notifies Saskatchewan—

Saskatchewan shall deliver water "if North Dakota requests the delivery".

The International Joint Commission for many years has functioned to protect water quality and water distribution between Canada and the United States. It is not too late to bring that body into a review of this agreement, a review of the water quality standards which must be set before April 1 of this year, and to ensure that the International Joint Commission with all its expertise is in fact reviewing this agreement and is making recommendations so that it will operate in the best interests of Canada.

Piece by piece this country is giving away control over its own water. We are constructing dams with no national control over the ultimate and cumulative effect of those dam. We already have more water diversions in Canada than the United States and the U.S.S.R. combined, and we have no idea what the ecological effects of those diversions are.

It is not too late for the national government to take control of the most important national resource we have, and that is water. The government itself in its federal water policy had good words to say about the importance of the control of quantity and quality of water in Canadian hands. Where it has had the opportunity to exercise that control in case after case, it has failed to do so. It has failed to ensure that an environmental assessment is conducted to protect the quality and quantity of water for Canadians.

I urge the government to revise this agreement to make sure that it is doing what it should be doing for Canada.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite for Ottawa West has raised questions with respect to the latest development on the Rafferty–Alameda project in south eastern Saskatchewan.

As the Minister of the Environment indicated earlier, proceeding with additional construction of the Rafferty Dam and additional components such as the Alameda Dam and the interconnecting channel between Rafferty and Boundary Reservoirs would be in direct contravention of the Canada–Saskatchewan agreement which was designed to respect the integrity of the environmental assessment and review process.

In response to the hon. member's specific question as to whether contracts for the Alameda Dam were let or not, officials of the Department of the Environment have informed the minister that bids for a contract were in fact received, some land acquisition actions were initiated by the Saskatchewan government and technical review is now under way.

I sense that receiving the bids and land acquisitions by the province are clear statements of the province's intention to go ahead with the construction of the Alameda Dam, which were certainly not permitted by the agreement of January 26.

The latest field observation confirmed that there is limited construction activity on the Alameda site indicating some parts of the contracts were already let by the Saskatchewan government.

The Government of Saskatchewan must respect the Canada–Saskatchewan agreement which arose as a result of the Federal Court order of December 28, 1989. That order requires an environmental assessment by an independent panel according to the federal guidelines order for the environmental assessment and review process. In keeping with that, the Minister of the Environment appointed a panel on February 5, 1991 under the guidelines order in response to the court order.

Furthermore, as the minister indicated earlier, the province is proceeding with extended activities on the project beyond the scope that was agreed upon with the January agreement for which Canada offered financial assistance to the province. The concern that has been highlighted by the member is also shared by the minister. As a first step the Minister of the Environment has ordered that the payments to Saskatchewan be withheld until we are satisfied that the province is living up to the agreement.

As the hon. Minister of the Environment stated in the House on October 18, Environment Canada officials have been instructed to seek an injunction against the province on continued construction and land acquisition related to the Rafferty–Alameda project. The Minister of Justice has agreed to initiate such action immediately following denial of the government's request for an injunction by the provincial Justice McPharson on November 15, 1990. An appeal process is under way.

Our laws must be respected and it is the government's intention to see that it happens anywhere in this great country of ours, regardless of which province.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca) moved:

That this House calls upon the government to avoid a worsening of the social and economic hardship caused by the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement by withdrawing from the current trade negotiations between the United States, Mexico and Canada.

He said: Madam Speaker, I regret it was necessary for my party to move this particular motion, but along with that regret is the awareness that it is absolutely essential that we go on record again against the consequences and the very principle of the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement, with the addition of Canada potentially sitting at the table with Mexico.

It is important to give a quick overview of what has happened as a consequence of the free trade agreement, what has happened statistically, economically, and frankly, what has happened politically. This House lost a staunch ally in the argument against the free trade agreement when the former leader of the Liberal Party stepped down and was replaced by its present leader. The Liberal Party has now softened its opposition to the free trade agreement. It has vacated its role in serious questioning about the Mexico–Canada–U.S. connection.

Reading the minority report submitted by the Liberal member on the committee one sees the typical Liberal response as the party gets closer to power. Free trade with Mexico is necessary, but not necessarily free trade. I wanted to put that on the record at the outset to prick the conscience of the Official Opposition and make it understand it has a responsibility to participate in this House.

An hon. member: What nonsense.

Mr. Barrett: I know some think that party historically has no conscience. Perhaps the party could be seen that way, but I feel individual members are rankling in discomfort over the fact that they have been dragged into a very neutral position on this issue.

Now I will address my comments to the government. I do not expect the government to fall today on reflection of what I have to say, but if it was serious and really concerned about the Canadian people, it would admit in the face of overwhelming evidence that their economic policies—with the free trade agreement being the apple of its eye—are the cause and the reason for our suffering so much economic hardship in a Canadian–made recession in this country today.

I recall sitting in the committee when we had the good fortune of having the Minister for International Trade appear before it. During the questioning in the committee I, along with the member for Kitchener, asked the minister clearly: "Can the minister state specifically how many jobs have been created by the free trade agreement?" He could not name one specific job, but in his defence, in response to the member for Kitchener, he said: "Give it a year". That was early last spring. He has had the time but still has not documented one single job that has been created by the free trade agreement.

An hon. member: Another year.

Mr. Barrett: Another year, God save this country if we have another year in which we are allowed to follow the path of being totally taken into the United States orbit through this free trade agreement.

I recall that the Prime Minister made a statement immediately after taking office in 1984. He said, and I quote: "Give us 20 years and you will not recognize this country". This statement was incorrect, if not outright false. It has only taken from 1984 to 1991, seven years, for us to almost not recognize this country. The destruction of health care, the destruction of hospital insurance, the destruction of national institutions, all Liberal programs which were forced in minority governments by NDP or CCF minorities, social democratic policies that were accepted by Tories and Liberals as a means of sewing the fabric of this nation together. All of them have been at risk.

Furthermore, in other areas of a mixed economy that were developed by consensus in this country, we have seen a gradual erosion of the things that are necessary, VIA Rail, CBC, transfer payments, Petro-Canada; all long term. Every single instrument that we agreed to in a consensus with former Conservative governments and Liberal administrations, and with the support of the Canadian people, to develop an indigenous mixed economy that gave us some foundation for maintaining a Canadian identity.

What are the facts? One hundred and fifty-two thousand Canadian jobs have been lost. I want to refer specifically to what some of the proponents of the free trade agreement were telling this country in supporting the government's position: 152,000 jobs have been lost.

Mr. Crosbie: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barrett: I speak for myself and I wish the minister would speak for himself instead of for the President of the United States and for Carla Hills in the United States. Carla Hills tells the minister what tune to dance to. He is a very poor dancer but he makes an excellent try.

Mr. Mayer: What a windbag.

Mr. Barrett: That is no way to talk to the minister. I think it is shocking that the member behind the minister would call the minister a windbag. I think it is unparliamentary and I ask the member to withdraw it. I know they have internal cabinet problems but this is going too far.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A point of order, the hon. minister.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, I was referring to the hon. member who is speaking. If we unleash this kind of rhetoric on the prairies this summer, we would have the biggest wind and the biggest drought in the history of the prairies. Fortunately the wind is only going to be in the House.

Mr. Barrett: I do not know under what part of Beauchesne that point of order is, but if the member wishes to defend himself and his cruel attack on the minister in that manner, so be it. I would never call the minister a windbag. I let the evidence stand for itself.

I want to go further by saying that in the food and beverage industry we were told we were going to have 6,400 jobs created by 1998. After two years, in that industry alone, we have lost 30,000 jobs.

Forestry employment was projected to remain constant over 10 years. In only the first two years of free trade there has been a 15 per cent decline in the number of jobs, a total of 11,000 lost. The government projected that the wood industry would grow by 2,000 jobs. After two years there has been a loss of 32,000 jobs. This goes on and on and on and still there is no explanation from the minister or the government, to all Canadians, the specific jobs that he claims has been created.

Far be it for me to quote back the minister's words, but sometimes it is necessary. I do not do this to be mean or cruel or to hurt the minister's feelings.

Mr. Milliken: We would never suspect that.

Mr. Barrett: I know you would not suspect that, but it is necessary sometimes to refer to Hansard, as embarrassing as it may be, to remind the ministers of some of the statements they made.

The member for Kitchener kept on persisting, in a meeting with a committee, asking the minister to produce evidence of jobs. He said: "Have any of those jobs been made public today, i.e. the number of jobs and the new investment?" "No, sir" said Mr. Shannon. Mr. Crosbie: "I have not seen any." Mr. Reimer: "How soon do you think we might see some?" Mr. Shannon: "In my view, it is probably too soon to make much sense of what there is, as I indicated to you." I then said: "Well, if you cannot tell us a list of jobs that have been created, could you make a list of the jobs that have been lost?" Others have done that, very clearly.

Your own member, Mr. Reimer, a profound, thoughtful member from Kitchener, who I last understood was a Tory, was the one who was asking these questions, not me. To insult your own member is a problem. I can take it, but to have your own member being rebuffed this way is shocking and the Canadian people should understand this.

I want to refer to a specific statement made by a man who I have yet to meet. He was a cabinet minister in this House who, as I understand, ran afoul with some of the behaviour patterns that are expected to be normal for members of this Chamber and he came into disrepute. I refer, of course, to the hon. Sinclair Stevens. I want to refer to a statement that the former minister made since leaving politics. Remember, members, when an hon. minister makes a statement, we must take him at his word. It may put a lump in your throat, a loss of sub-electricity in the cell brains that you operate with, but you must take the statement.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens said, in early December: "Secret deal to boost the dollar. That part of the ingredient in the free trade agreement was to get the Canadian dollar up." He recounted a conversation he had with Mr. Baldrige, now departed. Of course, in speaking to Mr. Baldrige, Mr. Sinclair Stevens said that there was acknowledgement of a deal on the dollar. Mr. Baldrige is no longer alive and cannot recount his part of that conversation. The Minister of Finance has denied that any such deal took place and everybody has run from the issue. I asked the research department of the Library if we could get in touch with Mr. Baldrige and it is even outside of their ability to be able to do that.

But we have some other methods of contact around this issue beyond the use of a leftover Liberal ouija-board. What I want to refer to is the mysterious coincidence that exists about the date within which Mr. Stevens said this deal was made on the dollar, the time Mr. Stevens said Mr. Baldrige said the deal was on, and put that timeframe into what has happened to the Canadian dollar. An amazing coincidence.

In December of 1985, a conversation was confirmed to have taken place by one of the participants, Mr. Stevens. In early 1986 and up until the present time, the grasp on the value of the Canadian dollar goes up, up, up, up. There was a little spurt just before the last election when they got nervous. Maybe the Liberals would win. That faltered, and it is still going on.

There is no rational fiscal reason why the Canadian dollar should be so high, except that it logically fits to benefit the United States in this free trade agreement. This government has not used it as a fiscal instrument to protect us.

I could not talk to Mr. Baldrige; I talked to his staff. It is very easy to do. You phone to the United States. I want to thank the Speaker for allowing us to use the telephones. I phoned the people on the committee and, lo and behold, I spoke to Mr. Franklin C. Pfeiffer, Jr. of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade. He was very vague on the question, but he said he would send me a copy of the committee hearings. So I have here the hearings before the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade of the House of Representatives, 100th Congress, Second Session, February 9, 26, 29, March 1, 11, 25 in the year of Our Lord 1988.

Throughout all of these hearings, the U. S. Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Baker, was asked about the Canadian dollar being too low because as we enter a free trade agreement it would be an impediment. What could be done to get the Canadian dollar up? What is the government's policy on getting the Canadian dollar up?

I want to tell you of a strange phenomenon. I have marked four specific areas of this report where Mr. Baker was asked by members of the committee about the Canadian dollar, and in every single instance he said to the committee member: "Mr. Member, I will talk to you privately about this issue". In four instances in front of the committee, when he answered every single question, when it came to the Canadian dollar he said: "I will talk to you privately about this deal".

An hon. member: The deal is off.

An hon. member: Secret deals.

Mr. Barrett: Now, someone of a suspicious mind would say that if the government's former minister would lose her briefing papers—and I am very careful when I describe that, Madam Speaker, her briefing papers—when the government cannot produce its own documents as to its position, when Sinclair Stevens makes this serious allegation and it is brushed aside, and when it is raised in U.S. committees, they are told they will be given a private briefing by the U.S. Secretary of State, someone of a suspicious mind would say Sinclair Stevens knew what the hell he was talking about.

Since I have a very brief time, and that is tragic, I must now devote my time to the next step of the free trade agreement, expanding it to the Mexico connection.

This House had a committee set up under the able, capable, competent chairpersonship of the hon. member for Don Valley West. There was outstanding leadership on that committee, and profound thoughtfulness in setting up the meetings, but he was confined by a limited budget to having hearings only here in Ottawa. He was told too, and the rest of us on the committee were told that we should not worry, the government would not make a decision about participating in the Mexican talks until the committee did its work.

An hon. member: Don Valley West.

Mr. Barrett: Don Valley West. Well, Don Valley went west when it came to this government, given some support to the committee's chairman and the promise to the committee chairman.

An hon. member: It has gone south.

Mr. Barrett: Gone south is even more appropriate. One day before the committee was to start its hearings, the government announced that it was on the road toward getting going on the free trade talks.

During the course of the committee hearings, I frequently asked, politely, in deference to the skill of the committee chairman, for detailed reports done by this government before it entered on any such major undertaking on behalf of the Canadian people. We have seen not one single document produced by this government showing independent research evaluating the pros and cons of the Mexico—U.S. connection. There is a minor little paper from the Department of Science and Technology, but for a major undertaking by the Canadian government, no valid research has been tabled.

We were promised a labour studies project. It is still to be released, so the good work of that committee was for naught. We were being used as a bluff hand in a game in which the cards were already counted up. They are all in the United States hands.

One of the critical arguments we used in that debate and in this Chamber was: What is the impact of us competing in Mexico against low wages, no health or safety standards, poor environmental conditions and the minister's answer in this House? The the Prime Minister's answer is: Are we opposed to giving the opportunity for a Third World country to lift itself up?

I felt humbled by that devastating attack, but I kept it up. I thought someone in the government would have the sense and the responsibility to ask those questions before we embarked upon the free trade discussions.

Did anybody in this government ask? No. Was there an outcry from some of the backbenchers? No. Was there confusion from the Liberals? Yes. I want to refer to how the American politicians take their responsibility. Even though there is an impression left that somehow everything is on track down there, let me show how they go about these things.

I ask the minister in response if he will stand up and accuse the Americans of being anti-Third World. Here is a copy of a letter sent to the President of the United States dated March 7, 1991 signed by Mr. Lloyd Bentsen, chairman of the finance committee and Mr. Dan Rostenkowski, chairman of the ways and means, the Congress and the Senate. I will read one paragraph alone to make the point that is necessary: "A number of members of Congress have expressed concern about the proposed extension of fast track authority, particularly as it applies to the proposed free trade agreement with Mexico. They have identified a number of legitimate concerns that in our judgment should be addressed in a meaningful way before Congress considers the extension of a fast track authority. Specific concerns include the following: the disparity between the two countries in the adequacy and the enforcement of environmental standards; health and safety standards; and workers rights."

Here is the United States of America that is expounding the new world order that this government subscribes to, questioning what is going on in these areas in Mexico and this government has not uttered a peep about the very same questions.

The reality is that the Americans are deeply concerned, as we are, about the social issues, and also the wage and working conditions that would destroy job opportunities for Canadian workers, men and women, from coast to coast in this country.

I know I have only one minute left in such a short timeframe and such a catalogue of material. But let me tell you this, Madam Speaker. The New Democratic Party has catalogued the devastation of the free trade agreement. It has been consistent in its opposition to the free trade agreement. It is now consistent in us not participating in talks with Mexico and is the only party on record that says: "If we should gain power, we will give the six months' notice to abrogate the treaty because it has been a betrayal of Canadian working people".

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question.

During the course of his comments, which of course were very high in rhetoric and short in any real factual content, he claimed that 152,000 jobs had been lost as a result of the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

I have in my hands the document called CLC Today, December/January, 1991. It says that the CLC estimates that 226,000 jobs have been lost because of the free trade agreement, whereas the hon. gentleman is saying 152,000 jobs have been lost. This is a considerable difference: 74,000 jobs.

I am wondering why it is that the CLC are greater exaggerators even than the hon. gentleman.

I note in the document that the CLC gives us a whole list of what they say are the job losses: Albright and Wilson Americas, the phosphorus plant at Long Harbour, Newfoundland, 290 jobs gone. I happen to know, since it is in my district, that it had absolutely nothing to do with the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement. It had nothing to do with marketing. It had to do with the age and the technological capacity of that plant compared to other plants they have in the world. It had no connection to the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

CBC in Toronto, 500 jobs. What did that have to do with the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement? Broadcasting was not covered in the agreement at all, or crown corporations. Clearwater Fine Foods in Port Mouton, Nova Scotia, 150 jobs listed. That plant closed because of a scarcity of fish. Then they list National Sea Products in Canso. What did that have to do with the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement? That was because of a scarcity of fish. Molson–Carling across Canada, 1,400 jobs. Beer did not come under the free trade agreement at all. I can give you more examples. VIA Rail: what did VIA Rail have to do with the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement?

Is the member admitting that this CLC document is a piece of fiction, totally inaccurate, viciously ignorant, carelessly ignorant, a Maude Barlow kind of document, the product of a mind seized by fantasy? Does he agree that this is the case and therefore has reduced his estimate by 76,000 jobs compared to this tendentious piece of fiction from the CLC? "Season's Greetings" they say from the Tory government. I say that the CLC, Madam Carr, and the rest of them should apologize for trying to foist on the people of this country such a piece of fraudulent material as they have issued.

I am glad to see the hon. gentleman is correcting them today, and I hope he will come right out and say that the CLC in its fanatical opposition to the free trade agreement has gone too far in publishing such a document.

Does the hon. gentleman agree that at least 76,000 of those jobs are purely fictional?

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the minister for effectively deflecting the fact that he cannot produce one single job on the record, not the CLC, not Dave Barrett, but on the record showing that it has been created by the free trade agreement.

As to the document, I don't have to defend the CLC. I ask the minister to attack my figures. Furthermore, I have not brought in the business community's figures that it uses in support of this government: the Canadian Conference of Businessmen, or that other ragtag outfit, or the banks that shell out money for this government, the bank that has admitted that it has given money to this government because it is more to the specific policy. If you want to get in the trades on support, I will tell you this —and I say this proudly—that I would rather have the working men and women of Canada supporting my position than the right-wing business community of this country.

I want to repeat my question. Why is it that non-captives of the CLC—Mr. Bentsen, who was a vice-presidential candidate, and Mr. Rostenkowski—are moved to write to their President asking for guarantees while this government has even denied that such requests are necessary? Why is it that an American senator and American members of the House of Representatives have the courage to raise these questions, but when they are raised in this House they are attacked by that minister who views all criticism as a personal insult?

I have never attempted to insult the minister personally. His own record does that better than anything I can do. I have been a sympathetic friend of the minister. I have been waiting for him to come to his senses, but I think it is now beyond his ken. There is a call for that member to go back to Newfoundland and lead the Tory party. They are already in oblivion. What possible help could he give them in that course?

The questions are clearly focused; the questions are clearly stated.

This government has not produced research. It has not produced documents showing that all the warm bodies they have in bureaucracies have put their mind to this question, but they have spent $25 million on the Spicer commission, on airy-fairy searches for basic problems of this country which have more to do with economics than anything else.

The greatest threat to the province of Quebec is not the internal divisions in this Chamber, but the free trade agreement which will ultimately lead to the loss of its economic sovereignty. I challenge the members from Quebec and the rest of Canada to understand that the greatest threat to the survival of any potential nation—sovereign or member of a confederation—is the economic sovereignty they can determine within their own borders. When that is lost you do not have a country, and this country is becoming a lap poodle to the United States and is losing its great heritage as an independent sovereign nation with some control of its own economic destiny.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca on his witty speech in the House today. I agree it is a shame he did not get more time to speak to us this morning. I think he would be great on the Improv programs we see on U.S. TV or on the Johnny Carson Show. It is a relief to have someone who can start the morning with so much humour and wake up the Tories with the kind of comments he just made.

I admire his sense of humour, and I admire him for what he has done for the parliamentary channel. I am sure that this morning, everybody in Canada is saying: Let's get rid of the Spicer Commission and ask Barrett to tour the country and talk to us about Third World countries and Tories, and especially about the excellent programs introduced by the Liberal Party when it was in power.

I like the hon. member's sense of humour and I admire him for it. It is really too bad that his opposite number in this respect, the minister responsible for free trade agreements with the most powerful country in the world or one of the Third World countries— The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca never said which of the three was from the Third World. He missed an opportunity there!

So again, my congratulations, and it would be nice to hear some more from Mr. Barrett and enjoy his humour for the rest of the morning.

[English]

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I deliberately focused in seriousness on the government's position in response to questions in this House about the Third World. I was shocked, and still am, at the facetiousness with which the government answered those valid questions about the impact on our economy of having a low-wage partner in a free trade agreement.

I want to point out again that regardless of the party you belong to, it is imperative that we protect and defend those people who send us to this Chamber. It is not good enough to put ourselves in a position without asking serious questions about it. It is not good enough to place ourselves in a position of being at the mercy of a low-wage partner, particularly when the other partner is asking these questions and we are not. I am ashamed of the government.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure as always to have the opportunity to speak in this House, even though the motion before us is a silly and jejune motion. It calls upon the government to avoid a worsening of the social and economic hardship caused by the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. There has not been any social or economic hardship caused by that agreement.

• (1040)

It then goes on to say: "by withdrawing from the current trade negotiations between the United States, Mexico and Canada", when there are no current trade negotiations between the three. This is a matter which is before the U.S. Congress now to decide whether or not it will give fast track authority for such a negotiation. No negotiations are yet started.

I want to correct something the hon. member who introduced the motion said. He said he was trying to prick the conscience of the Official Opposition. Well, how can you prick what isn't there? To prick something you first have to find it. I have never noticed, and I do not think anyone else in this Chamber has ever noticed the Official Opposition having a conscience. He started out already in attempting to do the impossible.

Mr. Barrett: When I knew you, you were a Liberal.

Mr. Crosbie: That is why I happen to know they have no conscience. That is why I left them, to look for a party that had a conscience.

The motion is basically about free trade. I want to give a quotation from Thomas Paine in 1791. Two hundred years ago in The Rights of Man he said:

> The prosperity of any commercial nation is regulated by the prosperity of the rest. If they are poor, she cannot be rich, and her condition, be it what it may, is an index of the height of the commercial trade in other nations.

In other words, we are all dependent upon one another if we are to be prosperous in this world. That was recognized even 200 years ago. We cannot be prosperous if the people who surround us are poor.

That quotation alone completely knocks on its head the feeble attempts of the New Democratic Party to oppose a negotiation between the U.S., Canada and Mexico. We all know that Mexico is not as wealthy a nation as ours at the present time, but does that mean that we should, even in our own self-interest, refuse to trade with it, refuse to have anything to do with it because it suffers from lower wages at the moment than we do?

Is that the New Democratic Party philosophy, the party that used to be the party of support for the undeveloped countries of the world, for those who had been dispossessed, for those struggling to make their way up?

Now they are members of the party of the status quo, because they bob their heads whenever the organized labour movement of Canada tells them to bob their heads. They have deserted their principles. They no longer want to help the dispossessed, the poor of the world; they just want to help the fat cats in the Canadian Labour Congress to try to maintain a position where there must be walls of protection to keep them in their present status, and to hell with the rest of the world.

That is not the philosophy of our party. The NDP supports the status quo. We support change that is needed for the future together with the business community, which today are the revolutionaries. The revolutionaries of our society are the business and industrial people who realize that we have to compete with the world and change.

I would now like to give another quotation. I am raising this debate to too high a level for these hon. gentlemen to understand. Here is what T. B. Macaulay, the famous historian, said in 1824 in Mitford's History of Greece:

> Free trade, one of the greatest blessings which a government can confer on a people, is, in almost every country, unpopular.

That is what Macaulay observed in 1824, and it is correct. Any government that tries to lead a country into freer trade must know it is not a popular move to make, because it is a longer term move. It is something that is going to be good for the country in the longer term. The ignorant and those who do not want to see and those who are beholden and dependent upon certain selfish interests will oppose it and make it appear that any change in the status quo is going to somehow be damaging to the ordinary person. That is why it is not popular.

It only becomes popular when you stick to your guns and keep explaining what the benefits of free trade or freer trade are, which we intend to do. We have all kinds of independent opinion that supports what we have been doing.

For example, the national financial columnist, Diane Francis, said in Maclean's for November 12, 1990:

> The lingering debate over free trade is irrelevant, as is the battle against the goods and services tax. Opponents of both are practitioners of ostrich economics, the tendency of persons with a low economic IQ to simply stick their heads in the sand. The GST and free trade initiatives, whether bilateral, trilateral or multilateral, are essential policies in sync with the irreversible post-war trend towards a global economy.

She goes on to say:

> Free trade is profound historical trend which is as immutable as gravity. The debate of the 1990s is not whether free trade is a good idea or not: the debate should centre on how to adjust, how to improve strengths, cushion dislocations and find new niches.
> Canada is already so far along in this process of interdependence that our standard of living and future depend strictly upon how astute and non-protectionist we are. Up to one third of Canadian jobs are directly or indirectly dependent upon trade with other countries.

Then she points out that we collectively owe more than $230 billion offshore, giving us the dubious distinction of having one of the highest levels of foreign indebtedness per capita in the industrialized world, almost $9,000 per person. She says:

> Canada's challenge is to figure out how to earn more hard currency from foreigners and how to motivate workers to work harder. If not, our standard of living, already on the decline, will fall further in the 1990s. Of course, people do not want to hear such messages and would rather vote for politicians who espouse ostrich economics.

The largest ostrich of them all just spoke ahead of me. She concludes:

> The world hurtles towards one global economy, whether we like it or not.

The NDP is like King Canute telling the tide to stay out, defying the tide. King Canute Barrett sits there. The world is hurtling toward one global economy and poor little fat Dave saying: "No, no, no, we are not going to hurtle toward one global economy.» Here in Canada somehow we are going to keep things all together. We are going to depend on our own spavines in a market of 26 million people and we are going to protect ourselves into prosperity. Whereas, what would really happen is we would obliterate ourselves altogether.

The world hurtles toward one global economy whether the NDP likes or not. You are not even an infinitesimal speck on the beach with the tide rolling in over you.

That is what Diane Francis said. On January 14, 1991, Diane Francis said this in Maclean's as well:

> Critics of the free trade deal are intellectually dishonest. The facts show that Canadians have prospered under the agreement.

You will have to read the article. I do not have the time to read this whole article today. When we look at some impartial observer, that is the kind of report we get, not the fearmongering and fiction that the New Democratic Party imparts or the Liberal party spreads.

Part of the Liberal Party is inculcated by a bacillus, a bacilli that has come from the New Democratic Party. It controls your foreign policy section. It used to control your trade section. Now you have a trade critic who is fighting against this infection from the NDP, trying to adopt some sensible trade policy. There are even Liberals who have supported the U.S.—Canada—Mexico negotiations. Former leadership candidate, Sheila Copps, said that Canada has to protect its interests.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: "I am not sure that we should become a negotiating partner, but I think we should make sure we know what is going on". That member at least wants to know what is going on. She says: "If we are not anywhere near the table, clearly we are not going to be in a position to monitor that". This is a woman showing a modicum of common sense for the first time in her history.

Then metro Toronto MP Kaplan, we are sorry to hear he is not going to run in the next election. He did not have a chance anyway. He said: "Canada should try and get the largest role that we can in the talks to protect our interests".

They are in disagreement with the former honourable Mr. Axworthy. Perhaps he is still an honourable; hon. member Axworthy, now the foreign policy critic who turns faint when he hears anyone mention the word U.S. We are not even to mention the word U.S.

• (1050)

To come back to the main theme of my remarks, we can look at practically any independent study. Here is a study done by the C. D. Howe Institute, Competitiveness in the 1990s. What does it recommend?

It recommends the following:

> Recommendation 2: Canada should be a full and active participant in the U.S.-Mexico free trade negotiations.
> Recommendation 3: Canada should continue to press for the enhancement of secure access and bilateral trade negotiations with the United States under the FTA.

I do not have time to refer to more of its statements. These are independent research bodies, not long-winded labour politicians like poor Bob White, Shirley Carr and this crew who think that somehow they have got to kowtow to their followers and pretend that somehow Canada can protect itself and cut itself off from the rest of the world.

In The Gazette of Montreal for February 27: "Free trade agreement pays off for Canada", a report of a speech by Ambassador Derek Burney, who sets out—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: Oh, they laugh. Whenever they hear about facts they laugh in the NDP. They do not know how to deal with facts. Here is one of the facts that Derek Burney put forward:

> Fact number three is that Canada's trade performance is one bright spot in an otherwise sombre economic outlook. The OECD has pointed out that "Canada's strength in international trade has cushioned the country from a more debilitating recession. The free trade agreement, far from opening the floodgates to job-destroying U.S. imports, is presiding over a substantial increase in our trade surplus with the United States—$17.4 billion for 1990 as opposed to $14.2 billion in 1988. The value of total Canadian exports to the United States has increased nearly $8 billion, or 7.5 per cent, since 1988 to a total of $110.3 billion in 1990."

That just happens to be a fact. How could this be if Canada has been devastated and we have lost hundreds of thousands of jobs? How is it that we are exporting more to the United States of America than we ever did if we have lost hundreds of thousands of jobs due to this agreement?

They never deal with these facts. We never hear them deal with the facts. All we have is fiction from Shirley Carr, Bob White and the seven dwarfs, and all the rest of them. Somebody should deal with these facts:

> Fact number four is that the investment picture in Canada is even more impressive—we have moved from a net direct investment outflow of $7.3 billion in 1988 to a net inflow of almost $1 billion in the first three quarters of 1990—a remarkable turnaround—since the free trade agreement—

What creates jobs? Investment creates jobs. Instead of having an outflow of $7.3 billion as we had in 1988, losing jobs, we had a net inflow of $1 billion in 1990 helping to create jobs here in Canada. These are facts, but we never hear facts dealt with by the hon. personages opposite.

Then let us look at the Canada West Foundation report that just came out in February. This studies objectively the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Under conclusions it states:

> Contrary to prevailing perception—Canada has significantly expanded its exports of end products by a net increase of over $4.0 billion while imports of end products from the U.S. declined by $600 million.

Despite poor conditions economically there are increases in "exports of machinery, equipment, electronics, aerospace and others". We made our "gains in high-tech and capital-intensive industries rather than selling off our resources".

That is what the Canada West Foundation reported. It has no bias. It is not controlled by any political party. It is just doing a job for the west, an independent job, and those are some of the conclusions that it has come to.

If I had the time I could go through and show that conclusion after conclusion knocks the NDP on the head and the silly statements that it makes. The Maude Barlow party, any party that spouts the same nonsense as Maude Barlow, my God, should be ashamed of itself. It should go hide its head.

Looking at the Canada West Foundation report, the interesting things about these patterns, it states on page 7:

> —provincial-U.S. trade in the West and Atlantic regions and to a lesser extent in Quebec, has grown substantially higher than Ontario-U.S. trade which dominated Canada-U.S. trade in the post WWII period.

I do not have the time to read it all to you, but you have not got the patience to listen to it either.

The Royal Bank of Canada Econoscope, February 1991, concludes that the FTA has been very beneficial for Canada and that we should enter into a Canada—U.S.—Mexico free trade agreement.

Dr. Neufeld, an executive vice-president of the Royal Bank, made a speech in Washington to the National Economists Club and concluded after two years of the Canada-U.S. FTA that:

> Our own study of the functioning of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement released today finds that the current recession has little to do with the Agreement; that some sectors are benefiting from the Agreement; that the dispute settling mechanism has contributed to a more orderly review of trade disputes; that precise reasons for some plant closings in Canada and shifts to the U.S. are not clear; that there are areas where Canada and the U.S. must take action to improve the Agreement; but that major policy difficulties in Canada lie not with trade but with fiscal deficits, cost increases, interprovincial trade barriers, federal-provincial tax system disharmony, and low productivity. So I see nothing in the functioning of the Canada-U.S. FTA so far that would argue against further evolution in North American Free Trade.

These are the remarks of an outside observer, not a politician out to appeal to the prejudices and the emotions of people they should be better serving by giving them the facts and the truth.

On page 4 of the same speech:

> The North American free trade area would encompass a population of 360 million, which is larger than the European Community and three times as large as the Japanese domestic market. It would constitute combining the labour abundant and capital scarce region of Mexico with the technologically advanced industry and demographically aging population of Canada and the U.S. It is a strategic fit.

Read the serious material and see why we are doing it. We are not doing this because we think it is going to be instantly popular in Canada. We know we have a whole series of vicious people who do not care about the future of Canada who are going to be attacking this looking for short-term gain. Any person in this country who studies this objectively, knowledgeable people, commend the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. They recommend that we go on to negotiate a North American free trade agreement.

The hon. NDP member talked about jobs, jobs, jobs. I can give him examples of tens of thousands of jobs. Are you listening? No, you are not listening; you are gazing blankly into the space above your head.

Here is one example of jobs. "Windsor to get high-tech steel mill. International group, led by Dofasco Steel, plans a $240 million investment. One thousand new jobs by 1993." If you want jobs, brother, I will show you jobs. "Bayer to invest up to $165 million in Canada after a Polysar purchase". On and on it goes with examples of expansions and new investments in Canada.

I recommend the Royal Bank of Canada Econoscope study.

Diane Francis says: "Free trade gets a ringing endorsement and that is the Canada way". "Trade deal benefits Manitoba", a report says. Then we have an analysis of the Mexico negotiations by Fred Blaser in The Financial Post: "Canada will give as good as we get."

The experts know that we can compete with Mexico. The experts know that low wages do not determine whether you are competitive or not. They know it depends on science and technology. They know it depends on transportation systems and education systems and a whole set of other factors, not just wages which are less than 20 per cent of the cost of goods normally.

Because I do not have a huge amount of time left, here is another thing about jobs. Proctor and Gamble gives free trade thumbs up:

> We've become substantially more efficient in the last two years and clearly we now have more jobs in our Canadian plants than we would have had without the agreement.

After two years Mr. Dave Elliot, an executive at Proctor and Gamble, in the December 21, 1990 Evening Telegram, says: "We have become more efficient and clearly we now have more jobs in our Canadian plants than we would have had without the agreement".

Is the hon. member listening to that? Does anybody see the hon. member listening? Has he heard a word?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. minister. The time has expired.

It being 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

TELETHON ON BEHALF OF MR. ROBERT CORBEIL

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Madam Speaker, next Sunday I will be taking part in a telethon to help Mr. Robert Corbeil, a resident of the municipality of Mont-Rolland in my riding. After Mr. Corbeil became a quadraplegic as result of an unfortunate accident, residents of Mont-Rolland started a campaign to help Mr. Corbeil and his family.

Madam Speaker, today everybody in Laurentides knows about Mr. Corbeil's case. I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to all my constituents who have shown an incredible spirit of community and compassion by getting involved in various projects to help Mr. Corbeil. The telethon is one of those projects, and I urge all residents to give generously.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, the more we hear from farm organizations about the Farm Income Protection Act, the more we are being told that this legislation is not completely what farm groups were expecting and promised.

Farm leaders who thought they were being consulted expressed shock and disappointment that this legislation does not contain measures enshrining the producer's share of premiums, and there is no reference in the bill to the principle of equity for producers of different commodities in different regions of Canada.

We on this side of the House join the agrifood industry in Canada in calling upon the government to make crucial amendments to the bill to protect in the long run a vital sector of the Canadian economy, that of the agrifood industry.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, yesterday in the Journal de Montréal, we read: Blais:

> According to Pierre Blais,
> Edmonston has been engaging in misleading advertising.
> It is false to say that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs supports corporations at the expense of consumers.

According to the newspaper:

> The member for Bellechasse wanted to remind Mr. Edmonston, the NDP consumer critic, that he often asks CCC to intervene in matters that are not under the department's jurisdiction. He mentioned gas prices and explained that setting gas prices was not the responsibility of CCC. Furthermore, hidden guarantees for automobiles were a provincial, not a federal responsibility.

Madam Speaker, the article goes on to say:

> The Minister explained that in many consumer areas, responsibility was shared by both levels of government, but considering the present constitutional context, the provinces would not look kindly on the federal government trespassing in an area for which they had responsibility.

This is a clear message to the NDP.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, once again on behalf of Atlantic Canadians, especially Newfoundlanders, I want to register deep concern and outright protest over the destructive overfishing by the European Community vessels.

Figures just released show that for 1990, European Community vessels are estimated to have caught 76,000 tonnes of groundfish stocks. This is five times over the quota of 15,377 tonnes set by the members of North Atlantic Fisheries Organization.

In addition, despite a NAPO moratorium on the harvesting of northern cod, the European Community set a unilateral quota of 32,000 tonnes. It is clear that in 1990, as they have in the past six years, foreign vessels have disregarded the quotas they set for themselves, and more importantly, they are getting away with it.

The people in the fishing industry are fed up with statement after statement. It is imperative that this government develop a system with teeth to end the overfishing and to protect the livelihoods of fisherpersons in the Atlantic region.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, a comprehensive child care plan was the promise of the Tories on the campaign trail in 1984 and again in 1988.

Child care groups across this country anticipated, after almost seven years, that this government would be announcing child care initiatives in this budget. Nothing. There is no new money for child care, in spite of a promise in the 1984 election, in spite of a promise in the 1988 election and in spite of a number of promises in this House by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in response to my questions.

He said that in the life of this Parliament we would have child care. The same minister said that we should look at child care as an economic and a social instrument.

What did Canadian families get? They got a response from the Minister of Health and Welfare saying that the money would have to come from a combination of federal financial reserves and reallocation of other program commitments.

Is this the government's commitment to affordable, accessible child care? Is this what working families can expect; we will pay for child care with money we steal from other social programs? Some promise.

INTERNATIONAL CONSUMERS' RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, March 15 has been declared International Consumers' Rights Day, under the theme: protect consumer rights.

Founded in 1960 by five groups from the United States, Great Britain, Australia, Belgium and the Netherlands, today the International Organization of Consumers Unions has 181 member organizations in 64 countries, on all continents. The organization tries to find solutions to problems, international in scope, relating to consumer products such as pharmaceuticals, pesticides and tobacco.

The message of the International Organization of Consumers Unions is especially important for developing countries and countries in Eastern Europe that are now setting up market economies in which consumers have a major role to play.

In Canada, Madam Speaker, consumers are protected by framework legislation, and especially by a market that is sensitive to consumer needs.

1848 REVOLUTION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Hungarian, translated as follows:]

As a proud Canadian by birth, of Hungarian ancestry, I wish to bring to the attention of this House the very special significance of today to Hungarians around the world.

In 1848, Europe was in upheaval. It was the year of Revolution. The absolute monarchies were decaying and freedom and liberty were attempting to break free of the chains of tyranny. On this day, in that year, the Hungarian people announced their revolt from the absolutism of the Hapsburg monarchy centred in Vienna. This was a bold act. It lead to short-lived freedom, to be followed by a generation of repression by the last vestiges of absolutism.

But, the spirit born on March 15, 1848, produced the Compromise of 1867, which established the Dual Monarchy, which provided a workable arrangement between Austria and Hungary for 50 years. And the same spirit, 141 years later, ignited the flame of liberty in 1989, resulting in a free and independent Hungary at last.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I stand here today to address the issue of the Reform Party and their agricultural policy, or rather their lack thereof.

My concern is that Mr. Manning and his splinter reformers have not the slightest idea of the complexities of the agrifood industry. Mr. Manning admits he is a management consultant from Edmonton with no connection to the soil.

Uncertain about the complexities of the farm situation, Mr. Manning acknowledges that his agricultural ideas might not work. Mr. Manning has refused three invitations to appear before the finance committee and perhaps if he were to receive an invitation to appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture, he likely would refuse that invitation as well.

What are his ideas? Nobody, including Mr. Manning, knows. If Mr. Manning and the Reform Party hope to be a credible force in the next federal election, someone had better come up with a solid agricultural policy, or any policy for that matter, one that the agrifood producers can look at and closely evaluate on its merits or lack thereof.

Therefore, I ask: where is your agriculture policy, Mr. Manning? Where is the wheat? Mr. Manning, where is the beef?

FOREIGN AID

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance is making the world's poor shoulder the burden of his economic mismanagement.

After cuts in 1989 and a 5 per cent cap in 1990, the minister decided in the February budget to reduce the cap on overseas development assistance, to 3 per cent in 1992–93 and following years. Although this will save Canada $262 million next year alone, the results for the Third World will be harsh.

In its recent review of member's foreign aid programs, the Organization of Economic Co–operation and Development expressed, "regret" at the "significant decline in Canadian overseas development assistance". The OECD report concluded that: "Canada's real commitment to its announced aid target must be in question."

Tory times are not only hard times for Canadians, they are also hard times for the poor and impoverished of this world who look to Canada for her humanitarian help and leadership. I urge the minister to read the OECD report and significantly increase, not cap, Canada's ODA.

BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, Canadians are fascinated by the new Crow rate. The Governor of the Bank of Canada preaches wage restraint as a miracle cure to fight inflation, but in practice he accepts yet another generous salary increase from the Conservative government on the day before wages are frozen for secretaries, clerks, and other federal employees.

Crow's salary has increased 69 per cent over five years. Crow says high salaries at the bank are necessary to retain staff. Then why is it that Crow's counterpart in the U.S. gets paid $100,000 less than Governor Crow, and the U.S. chairman is doing a much better job of earning his salary too. Unemployment in the U.S. is just 6.5 per cent, compared to the 10.2 per cent which Wilson and Crow have forced on Canadians. The U.S. federal bank rate is 4 percentage points lower than in Canada.

Canadians can neither afford the hypocrisy nor the destructive economic policies of this disastrous duo, Wilson and Crow.

Madam Speaker, the Governor's pay rate is one Crow benefit that Canadians would be happy to see cut.

POTATO INDUSTRY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, the outbreak of the PVY–N potato virus has caused much concern in Atlantic Canada.

The federal and provincial governments and the Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick potato boards have just announced the implementation of an eradication plan that will eliminate PVY–N and ensure that the normal trade patterns can be resumed.

In addition, Agriculture Canada has begun negotiations with the United States and has already succeeded in reducing U.S. import restrictions.

Madam Speaker, as I have indicated to the House in the past, the Canadian agricultural industry depends upon the export of top quality crops not only to the United States but to the world.

By having the various levels of government and industry work together, we can ensure the eradication of this virus and the continued success of Canadian agriculture.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Madam Speaker, Montreal—said the late Jean Marchand—is the motor of Quebec's economy. Montreal, my city, is crying our for help because of the disastrous impact of unemployment. Montreal has broken the gloomy record set by St. John's, Newfoundland, the unemployment champion. According to an article that appeared in La Presse on Thursday, March 14, the fact that 180,000 workers are unemployed does not seem to impress the minister responsible for Montreal and especially for East Montreal. The minister keeps recalling the situation under the Liberals, but he should realize that the Liberals were judged by the Canadian people in 1984 and 1988. The people of Montreal don't want to know what the Liberals did or did not do but what the Minister of Labour, the minister responsible for Montreal and especially for East Montreal, intends to ask the government in the way of emergency measures.

MEMBER FOR DUVERNAY

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, last night on The Journal the member for Duvernay made a statement in relation to our aboriginal people that we in the New Democratic Party, and I am sure most Canadians, find offensive.

The statement was both racist and bigoted. When this type of statement is made by any Canadian it must be challenged. When it is made by a member of Parliament is it unforgivable. At a time when Canadian national unity is at stake and there is a need to promote greater understanding and tolerance, this type of statement is particularly regrettable.

We would call upon the member to immediately apologize to aboriginal peoples and to all Canadians. We call upon the government to dissociate itself from this member and his statement.

ECONOMY RECOVERY

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint–Jean): Madam Speaker, on February 26 this year, the Minister of Finance brought down his budget for 1991–92. The aim of this Budget is first of all to control inflation and to achieve economic recovery. These measures are necessary to stabilize prices, which will have a positive impact on economic recovery. The measures to control wage settlements in our latest Budget are intended as an example to be followed by all levels of government and the private sector. These measures will make it possible to bring interest rates down even further, to a level compatible with genuine economic recovery, and will improve the standard of living of all Canadians.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

[English]

On February 15, 1990, the House of Commons of the Parliament of Canada unanimously passed the following motion:

> That this House reaffirm its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada, as reflected by this House in the Constitution Amendment, 1987 and the Official Languages Act, 1988.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister under whose authority were unelected officials meeting behind closed doors last week at Meech Lake to discuss possible changes to the Official Languages Act?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, many people were in attendance at the meeting to which the hon. Acting Leader of the Opposition refers, including a number of academics, who made a number of suggestions concerning the future of this country. Obviously, the government is willing to listen to as many suggestions as possible. That is why we have the Spicer commission. We will listen to the Beaudoin-Edwards committee. We will listen to recommendations or suggestions that may come from members of this House.

I would like to tell my hon. friend that our commitment to the Official Languages Act is full and complete and total.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my second question is for the same minister. On February 15, 1990, the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "That this House reaffirm its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada, as reflected by this House in the Constitution Amendment, 1987 and the Official Languages Act, 1988."

I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Last week, under what authority did he put on the table one of the basic issues in Canada, namely our bilingual character, one of the fundamental traits of our country? And under what authority did non-elected public servants put that question on the table?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): First, Madam Speaker, I want to tell my hon. friend that the Government of Canada did not put anything on the table during that Meech Lake meeting. There have been consultations with various groups, including academics, and certain suggestions were made. Naturally the Government of Canada is quite prepared to listen carefully to all suggestions, be they from academics, from the various commissions struck by the federal and provincial governments, or from members of this House. But I should like to say to my colleague that at any time the Government of Canada——is fully committed to the Official Languages Act.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, there is a fundamental contradiction in what the Acting Prime Minister is saying today. On the one hand he is restating the government's support for the Official Languages Act, and on the other hand he says that he is prepared to listen to any particular issue. This is another example—

Mr. McDermid: What's the matter with that?

Ms. Copps: —of where the closed-door process at Meech Lake is not going to work.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister state today that there is a fundamental characteristic of this country, and that fundamental characteristic includes our bilingual nature and in particular the protection of language minorities wherever they live in Canada? This item is not negotiable and it should not be put on the table behind closed doors at Meech Lake.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as has been made abundantly clear, that question was not put on the table by the government. It is not an open question for this government. The commitment of this government to official bilingualism is clear, constant, and continues.

Let me ask the Acting Leader of the Opposition if she would provide the House of Commons with a list of those questions on which she believes it is improper for Canadians to express their views.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

In the Green Plan, the minister stated, and I quote: "—the federal government has required environmental impact assessments for all proposals coming before the Cabinet for decision. A statement of the environmental implications of new policies and programs will be made public at the time that the Cabinet initiative is announced".

Last week, in response to a question on free trade with Mexico, his colleague the Minister for International Trade rejected the Green Plan flatly when he said that he was not bound by that clause.

Here is my question: Does the Minister of the Environment agree with his colleague?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the policy is clear. What was stated in the Green Plan and approved by the Cabinet is that every document submitted to the Cabinet had to contain a section dealing with the environmental implications of the proposed decision.

This policy was implemented and will be enforced. As far as the requirements set as a result of this decision are concerned, we were to release the information contained in that section, or a summary of it, to the Standing Committee of the House on the Environment.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, let us be very clear that the minister has contradicted his colleague.

The Minister for International Trade has issued a direct challenge to this minister. Last week, the Minister for International Trade stated that the environmental consequences related to trade should not be subject for negotiation within the context of the Mexican free trade agreement.

Two days ago, Mr. William Riley, Director of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, stated the contrary. He stated that we should have separate environmental agreements on some matters, yes. But he went on to say that where the environment and trade impact on each other, he accepted the linkage of the two within the Mexican free trade agreement. That is only common sense.

Which side is the Minister of the Environment on, that of common sense or that of the Minister for International Trade?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, there is no dichotomy because common sense and the Minister for International Trade are one and the same thing.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. gentleman certainly has not quoted me accurately. I have said that the U.S.–Canada–Mexico negotiation on a free trade agreement is a trade negotiation.

If there are concerns about environmental matters, then they can be dealt with in a parallel negotiation. They will not likely be dealt with in a trade negotiation. This is the same position as Mrs. Hills has taken in the United States.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Use some common sense.

Mr. Crosbie: They ask questions, and then you hear this mumbling and muttering while you are trying to respond, Madam Speaker. I am a person of some shyness, and this frightens me.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, just as we did in the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement, we negotiated an environmental agreement, signed just two days ago.

If it is necessary and if it looks like there is a lot of interest, we will negotiate on a parallel track with respect to the environment.

By the way, we already have an environmental agreement with Mexico that was signed by the Prime Minister a year ago. We are working with Mexico on the environmental issues.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This is a supplementary to the question of the hon. leader of the opposition.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs tells us that he and his government support this country's Official Languages Act. Considering that a representative of his party approached our party with a proposition to abolish the parliamentary committee on official languages, can the minister explain why, if he supports official languages in this country, we have a proposition by the government of Canada to abolish the parliamentary committee on official languages?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am not personally aware of my colleague making the representations the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville alleges were made. However, I can assure him of our full, complete and total support to the Official Languages Act.

I want to thank him and his party for supporting the motion we introduced in this House on February 15, 1990.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, another question in terms of national unity in this country that is very, very important, and this again goes to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Acting Prime Minister. Last June, about 10 days before the Meech Lake Accord collapsed, the Prime Minister made a proposal to aboriginal people of this country, and included about six points, including the establishment of a royal commission on aboriginal rights and a greater definition of the treaty rights of aboriginal people.

Also, a comment was made last night by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue, and I quote, "It's like the Indians, they do not respect our laws, they do not respect the Constitution, but they want to have the money".

In light of that comment by the member for Duvernay, will the minister first of all dissociate the government from that comment about Indian people and second, would it now move to implement the promises made to aboriginal people in the middle of June of last year?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question of the statement carried on The Journal, a statement by our colleague from Duvernay, the hon. member will know that the member issued a statement this morning and I will quote, if I might, Madam Speaker, a brief reference from that.

[Translation]

"The hon. member explained that he was thinking of the behaviour of certain warriors during the crisis at Oka last summer when he said those words."

[English]

It was consequently, Madam Speaker, a statement, as I understand it, more limited than is suggested by the hon. member.

An hon. member: Look at the transcript.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I will nonetheless take a look at the whole transcript. The hon. member suggests we take a look. She has been on The Journal and she will know that sometimes not each of her priceless words is recorded on the television program. We will look at the transcript and see if any further action remains to be taken.

With respect to consultations with the aboriginal people, of course it is the intention of the government to find appropriate and effective ways in which those consultations can proceed.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I want to pursue this point with the Acting Prime Minister.

Last June the Prime Minister made a commitment to doing six different items for the aboriginal people, including a better definition of treaty rights to be enshrined in the Constitution; a recognition of aboriginal people as a fundamental characteristic of this country; and most important, the establishment of a fully fledged royal commission on aboriginal rights of the stature of the commission on bilingualism many, many years ago.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether or not he thinks that the proper way to start this important round of constitutional studies we are about to enter into would be to fulfil these promises made to the aboriginal people, the first nations of this country. Is that not the proper way to begin this very, very important round of constitutional talks that are so vital to all the people of this country? Is that not the proper signal to send?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has, I am sure, been following some of the questions of his leader in the House. He will know that she has referred, among other things, to the interest expressed again most recently by aboriginal leaders to be involved in discussions. She referred, I believe yesterday in the House of Commons, to a letter sent by the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, a letter of which she had a copy but which had not, at that time, been received or seen by the Prime Minister.

I now have a copy of that letter and we naturally are going to be responding to that letter in a way that encourages the fullest possible involvement of aboriginal people, including aboriginal leaders in discussions of Canada's Constitution.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I address my question to the Acting Prime Minister. The finance minister's home town of Toronto is not, as the government perceives, the fat-cat city, but rather a tale of two cities with a chronic unemployment undercurrent.

• (1130)

Given that Toronto unemployment is reaching double digits in which 194,000 people were unemployed in February, up 25,000 from January and that since 1989, 75,000 jobs were lost in Toronto, more than half in the manufacturing sector, will the Acting Prime Minister acknowledge the devastating impact that government policies have had on the Toronto economy and when will the government provide the federal leadership necessary to kick-start an indispensable engine of the Canadian economy?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the city of Toronto and surrounding areas commonly referred to as the Golden Horseshoe, probably saw unprecedented growth in the period 1984 up to early 1990. Jobs were plentiful. The unemployment rate was very, very low. During this period of time, unemployment has risen, but it is still the lowest unemployment rate in this country.

From reports coming out of Toronto, we are seeing some turns in the economy which we expected. It is still not what we would like it to be and we probably will not come out of it until the summer. But I can say that with housing sales having doubled over the last month, there is activity again in Toronto, especially with first-time home buyers, I am informed. Interest rates have dropped over 4 per cent. They dropped again slightly yesterday, continuing their downward trend. We feel very confident that Toronto and in fact all regions of this country will benefit from the activities and the policies of this government.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, the only turns happening in Toronto are going downward. Again, I go back to the Acting Prime Minister.

The true tale of Toronto is that there are 123,000 people on the welfare rolls. The Toronto housing and construction industries are in a nosedive. Nine hundred Toronto businesses went bankrupt last month and 110,000 Torontonians feed themselves thanks to the the good graces of the 200 food banks operating in that city.

Why is the government's federal budget so void of employment initiatives that are so desperately needed by real Canadians facing real problems? When are we going to put Canadians back to work?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): I take a look at some of the headlines coming out of Toronto: "Resales Boom", "Relief as Toronto home sales double". Economic activity is starting to come back in the Toronto area. These are from Toronto papers. I understand the concern of the hon. member.

We are concerned about the unemployed as well. But we remember very well a previous government that tried to throw money at problems and did not solve any problems. It did not solve the problem in any way, shape or form.

What this government wants is the economy back on track, permanent full-time jobs, not part-time jobs with money thrown at them because that does not solve the problem. The problems can be solved by sticking to the proposals brought forward by the Minister of Finance in his very well accepted budget of February.

Our economy will be back moving again early in the summer and by 1992 the hon. member will up singing the praises of this government and the economy in Toronto.

POVERTY

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health or, perhaps, to whom it may concern.

Financial analysts estimate that $5 billion invested in better day care, before and after school programs, and in higher incomes and more community support for single parents will result in 187,000 children remaining in school and receiving adequate education.

Does the minister not think this $5 billion is a worth-while investment for Canada?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is, of course, concerned with the poverty rate and the children in Canada. That is why since we have come into office over 300,000 children who were under the poverty line before are not any longer. So we have made progress.

With regard to the second part of the question which refers to children staying in school and the amounts of money that we put into those programs, I suggest to my hon. friend that he take a look at one of our recent initiatives which was the Stay In School initiative, whereby the federal government will provide over the next four years an amount of $300 million to try to decrease the horrible drop-out rate of children, especially poor children, in this country.

We are proud of the initiatives of this government and I am very proud of the initiatives of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is not enough. There is a great deal of difference between $300 million and $5 billion.

My supplementary is for the same minister. The Senate's recent report Children In Poverty—Toward a Better Future states that those 187,000 Canadians would contribute $23 billion to the Canadian economy over 20 years. That means an additional $7 billion plus income taxes and over $1 billion in sales taxes.

Given those numbers, why does the minister persist in relegating Canadian families to the tragic cycle of poverty? Why continue to cut programs that generate wealth and opportunities?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I would like to refer my hon. friend to one statistic which I think is very meaningful; that is the total of our three main transfer payments to the provinces—the EPF, equalization payments and the CAP program.

When we came into office in 1984, the amount was $22 billion. I would like to tell my hon. friend that now the federal government is transferring to the provinces over $36 billion this year. That is an increase of approximately 6.9 annually per cent since we have been in office. So the increase in transfer payments has been much higher to the provinces than the increase in the budget of the federal government.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister who will recall a few months ago that the Prime Minister announced a war on drugs and asked the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to play a critical in drug enforcement in Canada. He also will know that the RCMP is one of Canada's most famous symbols, both nationally and internationally.

I would also say to my hon. friend that the RCMP is one of the institutions that unifies Canada at this very, very difficult moment.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is this: In 16 days the federal government will abandon its traditional role of support for the RCMP in terms of cutting back on the amount of money it provides for its support.

Can the Acting Prime Minister explain why, at this very critical moment in our history, the federal government would be abandoning its support for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I think all of us here will agree with part of what my hon. friend has said; the importance and the good reputation of the RCMP, the famous reputation of the RCMP.

There is no intention whatsoever by this government to cut back RCMP services throughout the provinces, territories and municipalities where they have been serving so well and will continue to serve.

There is one reality on the other hand that has to be taken into consideration, and that is the cost of the RCMP to serve in those provinces, territories or municipalities; and that is under a contract that was signed 10 years ago to which there are some adjustments that are necessary. That is what we have been trying to do.

We made an offer in September 1989 to start discussions to renew, not abandon, the contracts. I am available to meet with my counterparts whenever they are available between now and March 31, to not only make sure that the RCMP continues but to settle the terms that are agreeable to every party. We have indicated that we are prepared to phase in some of those costs as of the first of April.

• (1140)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is clear that the federal government found $600 million to provide protection for Kuwaiti citizens. I do not think it unreasonable to expect the federal government to come up with adequate funding to provide security and safety to Canadian citizens, wherever they may live.

My supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister who comes from western Canada where the impact will be greatest and where in fact millions and millions of dollars will be added to the local taxpayers in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia.

Does he and his colleagues support at this very critical time loading up the local taxpayers with additional policing costs and as a result requiring many local municipalities to look to their own policing options and perhaps beginning the demise of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in western Canada?

Does he and his colleagues support this abandoning of the RCMP in terms of funding at this very critical moment in Canadian history?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I think it is very important. My hon. colleague should be a little bit less partisan on this issue, because what is occurring is that there are services provided to eight provinces, two territories, and I believe 190 municipalities across the land, except in Quebec and Ontario.

The contract was signed in 1981 for a 10–year period provided that in 1990, at the date we are right now, the split between the provinces and the federal government would be 70 per cent supported by the provinces and 30 per cent paid by the Government of Canada and all taxpayers across the country.

We are not charging 100 per cent of the service. We are now charging 70 per cent of the service, and we are looking at a very modest increase of 5 per cent for the next 10 years.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The very day after the budget's vicious ultimatum to public sector workers to sacrifice their income or sacrifice their co–workers, a secret letter to deputy ministers was telling them to push managers down the line and push the lowest paid workers out the door.

Is it not time the government told Canadians how much it is costing them to contract out the jobs of the Public Service? Is it not time it revealed how it is damaging service to the unemployed, to veterans, and to the elderly? Is it not time to admit that all this pain and suffering has not done one iota to cut the deficit?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is inaccurate in her accusations of somehow conspiracy occurring. It is not surprising that deputy ministers communicate with each other both orally and in written form. She chooses to call them secret as if some conspiracy is involved. I humbly suggest that when she talks to her staff she does not issue the transcript to the rest of the world.

The reality is as the budget indicated. The Government of Canada, as its contribution to the necessary fight to bring expenditures at the public level under control so that we do not continue to borrow and borrow and leave our children with this horrendous debt which will surely hobble them in whatever they might try to do in the future, placed an over-all freeze on O and M expenditures for government and within that context the wage increases will be kept to 3 per cent.

Most of the country considers that a reasonable request, given the fiscal regime the government is faced with.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. This is not an exercise to reduce the Public Service or the deficit. It is an exercise in reducing services to the public. It is now quite obvious that this government has no intention of revitalizing the Public Service. Its secret plan is to destroy the Public Service, another institution that is vital to Canadian unity.

In the circumstances, how can the minister expect his officials to collaborate with Public Service 2000 Plan, the subject of a number of meetings being held today? And how can he expect them to provide an efficient and quality service when all his officials have been the target of vicious and arbitrary attacks, for purely political reasons?

Mr. Prud'homme: Good question.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's wild hyperbole about destruction of the public service, denying of services and so on are absurd, and she knows it.

It would be a lot more helpful to the public of Canada who are paying the salaries of the public servants and to public servants themselves, if in fact we would reduce the level of hyperbole, talk about the real problems in real language and not for the benefit of television cameras with all of these wild exaggerations.

Public Service 2000 is a regime that we firmly believe will result in a more motivated, happier Public Service and better service to the public. That is why that change is being looked at.

In terms of the other accusations, I think I answered them in my response to her first question.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

On Wednesday, the Federal Court upheld the James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement as a federal law and said that the environmental assessment of the Great Whale River project is primarily a federal matter.

I will quote briefly from that judgment: "There is no doubt in my mind that Parliament intended the agreement to operate as a substantive enactment, as if the agreement had become part of the statute. Parliament appears unequivocal as to its intention and purpose".

Would the federal government, which has constitutional responsibility over the aboriginal people, agree now to follow the environmental provisions of the 1975 James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as my colleague certainly knows, we are presently at the federal level doing a study through the Department of Fisheries and Oceans of the infrastructure proposals made for that project. That study is near completion. We have had public input, and I will be receiving from my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, recommendations as to the next steps to follow.

We have also entered into an agreement with Quebec to have a joint review of the over-all Grande-Baleine project. We are at the point now where we are negotiating or discussing with the Cree and the Inuit to determine an appropriate chairperson for that very important panel which is composed of four committees.

We are certainly moving well along the road of fulfilling our obligations to native people and to all Canadians in terms of ensuring that the process is followed.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

I will briefly quote something from The Gazette of Montreal which says: "Quebec's most important Inuit organization says Hydro Quebec impact study on Great Whale roads and airports is fatally flawed".

Will this government agree that it has full jurisdiction to ensure that not a shovel hits the ground on the infrastructure until a federal public impact study has been completed on the over-all project?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I am not to comment on Hydro Quebec's own impact studies.

As I mentioned earlier, we are doing our own federal impact studies on the infrastructure. What is at stake here is very important. What is at stake here is a process that has to be respected in terms of the environmental impact of everything that is being proposed in that region of the country.

It is a massive project and the environmental impacts have to be evaluated. They have to be evaluated because what we are trying to do here, under the theme of sustainable development, is ensure that we preserve the environment for generations to come. That is the commitment of this government and that is exactly what we are about to do.

WAGE INCREASES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I also have a question for the government. It relates to a matter that the government House leader answered earlier in Question Period.

On February 25, 26, and 27, this government managed to deliver three contradictory and different messages with regard to its economic plan.

• (1150)

On the 25th, it secretly increases the salaries of top level public servants and management of the Bank of Canada in this country.

On the 26th, in the budget, the finance minister calls on those who make much less to restrict their salary increases to 3 per cent and says that for every 1 per cent increase there could be the loss of 2,000 jobs in the Public Service.

On the day after that, the Secretary of the Treasury Board, Ian Clark, says that it will be done through attrition, not through job loss.

Why is it that this government cannot keep the same economic message for three days in a row?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member first off raises again the question which was answered by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, in terms of the 4.2 per cent.

As he knows, those are the salaries for Governor in Council appointees for which the government seeks the opinion of a private sector advisory board established by the previous government many years ago. It recommended a 6 per cent increase for 1990, last year. The government said no.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: I wonder if the member could ask his colleague behind him if she would calm down and I will try to answer. The government said 4.2 per cent, but that was for 1990. I repeat, last year, 1990.

On February 25, in the budget, the Minister of Finance indicated that there would be a 3 per cent ceiling on salary increases and a freeze on O and M. It translates that if everybody gets 3 per cent, the drop in the operations and maintenance budget of government would probably provide for about 6,000 fewer jobs.

The Secretary of the Treasury Board said: "However annually there is about a 12,000 turnover in the Public Service, therefore it is not likely, even if everybody received the maximum of 3 per cent, that there would be 6,000 layoffs. In fact probably any positions that are lost would be accommodated through attrition."

Those are absolutely consistent, and I am sure even the NDP can understand that.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I think it is obvious that if the government checked on the pay increases of other public servants and they had an independent judgment, they would also be getting more than 3 per cent or 4 per cent.

The problem with this government is that those people who give advice to the government made sure their pay increases were made the day before the budget. Those people who knew what was in the budget also had letters written, to be delivered the day after the budget, which contradicted the message that the Minister of Finance was giving to this nation.

Why did the government deliberately mislead the Canadian people in terms of what it wanted to do? Why did it deliberately leave a different message with—

Some hon. members: Withdraw.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I am uncertain of what has been said because of his distance from the Chair. I will allow the hon. minister to answer.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, if you check the "blues" you will find that he accused the government of deliberately misleading, which is out of order, and I would request that he withdraw that comment.

I realize it is not in the interest of the New Democratic Party to understand that which is clearly understandable. In terms of from February 25 forward, both those who advise the government from within the Public Service and those who advise the government from the House of Commons will not receive salary increases greater than 3 per cent. Everything is consistent in terms of from the budget forward.

The hon. member keeps talking about what happened in respect of last year and intermixing that with what will happen in terms of February 25 forward. That seems to be typical of NDP thinking.

CHINESE CANADIANS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, the government knows that 81,000 Chinese Canadians paid more than $23 million in head tax to be in Canada and then lived for 24 years with a total ban on immigration of other Chinese, including their families.

Over three years ago, the minister responsible promised Chinese Canadians that he would take to cabinet the question of redress for 62 years of legislated racism against Chinese Canadians. When would the government deliver on its promise?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I would like to take the question under consideration.

I would be happy to report to my hon. friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, maybe the minister can take this with him to the minister responsible.

We on this side of the House have repeatedly called on the government to set up an all-party committee to study and to consult with the Chinese community on this issue in order to resolve this matter.

Over the weekend, the Chinese Canadian community will be meeting in Toronto. I am asking the minister to tell Canadians whether he has any good news to report to them over this weekend on this issue so we can solve it once and for all.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I will certainly take my friend's comments as a representation to the minister.

I know that he refers to a substantial number of years. In closing, I would just like to remind him that the Liberals were in office for a long time during that period.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I would like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister today.

The decision of the minister of fisheries last December to cut the offshore share of the cod quota in 4T-Vn has directly threatened the viability of Richmond Fisheries and the livelihood of hundreds of families on Isle Madame.

Today Richmond Fisheries announced that it was tying up two of its four trawlers, throwing 26 trawlermen out of work. This decision is directly linked to recent offshore quota cuts, including the minister's December decision.

Will the minister of fisheries, today, restore Richmond Fisheries' traditional share before further job losses occur?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the decision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Government of Canada on the allocation of quota is based on the long-term interests of all fishermen and those who depend on the fish, whether they be plant workers or people related to them.

The decisions are based on scientific advice and consultation with industry which ensures down the road that we have fish for as many people as possible and in as a sustainable way as possible, with maximum incomes.

The effects on Richmond Fisheries and so many others are unfortunate, but they are in the long-term interest of all those who depend on the fishery. That is why this government put in a $584 million program to try to ameliorate the effects on individuals and on communities.

I know my hon. friend is aware of this. Many of his constituents have benefited from this very substantial, well thought out and progressive program.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his response except that it misses the point.

The point is that the quota cut for 4T-Vn cod in the winter fishery was carried out in violation of principle X of the fisheries management plan and was carried out without consultation last December. In fact it does not appear to be supported by the scientific evidence which the parliamentary secretary cites.

If that quota cut is pursued, it will directly threaten the livelihood of at least 375 workers and trawlermen at Petit de Grat, at Richmond Fisheries. It is that decision which we are asking the minister to reconsider.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, may I suggest that I did not miss the question, but my colleague may have missed the answer.

As he well knows, the management of any fishery is complicated. I would not suggest to him that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is a place to have to work if one likes the easy life.

Obviously there is a series of conflicting interests within the fishery: types of gear, the nature of different species approaches and that sort of thing.

The minister of fisheries must balance that, and some of those decisions are very difficult. Some hurt but they are in the long-term interest of as many people as possible, taking into account the conflicting interests.

• (1200)

Unfortunately, as some people are hurt by the fishery, it is the intention of this government to make sure that in the long term that pays off for as many people as possible.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

The Liberal government of Newfoundland is decimating the health care system of that province. It is closing 360 acute care hospital beds, including closure of acute care treatment at Port aux Basques. They are now denying a large number of Newfoundland residents basic medical care. The government opposite has repeatedly said it will enforce the Canada Health Act. The Canada Health Act states that the health care insurance plan of a province must provide health services on uniform conditions.

Will this government finally commit itself to enforcing the Canada Health Act and inform Newfoundland that it will not accept this basic cut to health care?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, with reference to that question, the Government of Canada in the fiscal year starting April 1 is transferring to the Government of Newfoundland in excess of $1,400,000,000 for purposes of the Established Programs Financing, tax equalization, and our share of the Canada Assistance Plan. The Government of Newfoundland and Labrador is responsible for the administration of the provincial health system. It is getting substantial assistance from the Government of Canada; in excess of 45 per cent of all of the revenue of the Government of Newfoundland has been transferred to it by the Government of Canada.

The Government of Newfoundland is responsible for administering the health system. It has been given funds to do that, and it will have to accept the responsibility for the decisions it is making in connection with that health care system, which is getting very generous assistance from the Government of Canada.

DESIGNATION OF ALLOTTED DAY

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would like to formally designate Monday as an allotted day for supply.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): While I am on my feet, I would like to remind the Chair that the hon. member for Churchill did say that the government "deliberately" misled the House of Commons and Canada. That is contrary to the rules of this House, and I would ask the hon. member for Churchill to stand up and withdraw those remarks.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I do not believe what I said contradicts the rules of the House of Commons. My understanding—and I have checked the rules before in this regard—is that if I had referred to a specific minister, that would be the case. However, if after we have had a chance to review the case the rules do indicate differently, I would withdraw.

Certainly with regard to the government's intention, I maintain the words that I used earlier.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, it is unfortunate that these not really constraining rules, which guide us in terms of decorum and mature behaviour, are deemed not to apply to the member for Churchill. It is regrettable that he should assume that only by stretching the rules, breaking the rules, can he make his point. If he would rely on logic and moderate tones, perhaps he would better serve his constituents and the rest of this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, at the precise moment the hon. member was speaking, I had taken off the hearing aid which allows us to hear better in the House. I do not know for sure whether or not the hon. member said "deliberately", which would be against the rules of the House.

I will ask the House to allow me to check the "blues", which I am sure the hon. member for Churchill will do as well. Should it be that he is out of order, I am sure the hon. member will do the honourable thing and will apologize.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I will take your advice under consideration and will look at the "blues" myself and check the precedents. However, I regret the fact that the government House leader went on in the second round to attack me personally. Before he attacks the other members of the House, he should remember that he was one of those members who actually physically charged the Chair in the past.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the wise thing to do on this nice Friday afternoon is to go with Tabling of Documents.

MIDDLE EAST

KUWAIT CRISIS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, may I begin by expressing to my colleagues who are critics for other parties in this House my regret that there was a brief delay in my transmitting a copy to them of the statement I intend to make. As members of the House will know, this has been a long week and I apologize to them for the 10 or 15 minute delay in delivering that statement.

Over the last seven and a half months, the Kuwait crisis has riveted our attention and engaged much of our debate.

Today Kuwait is again a free country, though deeply scarred by its ordeal.

I visited free Kuwait five days ago. I raised over the Canadian Embassy there, the flag our diplomats so reluctantly took down when they were forced by lack of food and water to leave on October 19.

I wish now to report to the House on that trip which began, quite deliberately, with a call on the Secretary–General of the United Nations in New York and which took me to Jordan, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Iran as well as Kuwait and the United States. I met with leaders of those countries and with the foreign ministers of Egypt and of Italy, and with leading Palestinians from the Occupied Territories.

In Jordan, I visited the headquarters of United Nations agencies working with the casualties and the consequences of the conflict. The Canadian government is contributing to many of their activities, but I want to draw the attention of the House and of Canadians to the United Nations Children's Fund operated by UNICEF for humanitarian assistance for the children who are victims of the conflict. The government has contributed an additional $550,000 to that fund and I hope individual Canadians might make their own contribution to that special Gulf Disaster Relief Appeal, organized by UNICEF Canada to provide medical and humanitarian assistance to mothers and children suffering the effects of that conflict.

My colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and the Chief of the Defence Staff, also visited Bahrain, Qatar, and the field hospital at Aljubayl, to express the gratitude of Canada to our troops and to the countries which hosted them.

My purpose was to look beyond the liberation of Kuwait to the issues this crisis has underscored. The fundamental problems remain, but there are now new possibilities which need to be nurtured.

My interest, as the foreign minister of Canada, was everywhere understood and welcomed. As a member of the coalition of countries who, through the United Nations, came to the aid of Kuwait, Canada's commitment to the liberation of Kuwait was clear.

But Canada also represents a lifetime of commitment to the United Nations. My primary mission was to try to ensure that that the sort of world consensus which emerged to free Kuwait be further mobilized to prevent such aggression in the future, and to strengthen the chances of enduring peace and security. That is the first lesson of this crisis.

There are other lessons. As the Prime Minister said on February 18, one such lesson is that reckless transfers of arms must come to an end. Canada's commitment and record on arms control entitle us to place this item high on the world's agenda. I reviewed with leaders of other countries of some of our proposals to reduce the flow and risk of arms.

Progress, of course, will be slow, but everyone I met in the immediate aftermath of a decade of conflict in the gulf acknowledged the need to address this problem, and to do so practically and persistently. The House should know that in some gulf countries the immediate reflex may be to buy new arms to deal with threats they believe will continue. That underlines the need for countries like Canada to advance proposals like those the Prime Minister has set forth.

But for real peace and security to emerge and for arms transfers to diminish, the underlying causes of tension have to be resolved. These tensions, many of which relate to enduring disputes between Israel and her neighbours, were a major topic of my discussions.

Madam Speaker, no one in the Middle East has forgotten a single moment of history, and there is a lot of history to overcome. There is now, however, an opportunity—now, but not for long. The world must not lose that opportunity.

Many of us have said that the recent events have changed the Middle East forever. Canada's purpose has been to make those changes for the better—to strengthen the United Nations, to increase the control of arms and to reduce the risk of war, and to resolve the tensions at the root of insecurity in the Middle East.

I congratulated Mr. Perez de Cuellar, on behalf of the people of Canada, for his resolution during this crisis. He thanked Canada for our support, and believed that Canada had set an example for other states by our determination to settle this crisis through the United Nations. He informed me that the United Nations is poised to police the separation of forces, once an official request is received from the Government of Kuwait.

He also urged us to try to heal some of the wounds of this crisis by helping leaders with whom Canada has close ties—such as King Hussein of Jordan. He was concerned about the Palestinians whose leadership had been so criticized, but whose right represent a continuing challenge to the reputation for fairness and effectiveness of the United Nations. Indeed, this issue dominated many of my subsequent discussions.

On my way to the region, I also met with Secretary of State Baker, just before he embarked on his own tour. He shared our view that there is a psychological moment of opportunity to be seized on the agenda for arms control. His immediate concerns were with the arrangements for regional security which would enable the United States to withdraw its ground forces from the theatre and bring the troops home.

Even as we spoke, of course, the Foreign Ministers of the Gulf Co-operation Council were meeting in Damascus with the Foreign Ministers of Syria and Egypt to reach agreement on the stationing of Syrian and Egyptian ground forces in Kuwait, to replace Coalition ground forces, once a definitive ceasefire with Iraq was arranged.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I believed that my trip to the area should begin with the government of Kuwait. The Emir of Kuwait was still in Taif, in Saudi Arabia, where he had spent the occupation. His appreciation for Canada's contribution to the liberation of Kuwait was heartfelt. The Emir was deeply concerned at the damage to his people and to his state. Plans are already beginning for the massive reconstruction of Kuwait and I welcomed the clear assurances that the expertise of Canadian companies will enjoy opportunities commensurate with the important role Canada played in liberating Kuwait.

The senseless damage to Kuwait must be seen to be believed. Across the limitless desert landscape burn innumerable fires, each set deliberately with powerful charges of high explosives. Downtown, on the waterfront, are burned-out building after building, looted store after store, museums, homes, things of value or merit, trashed. This was not war damage; this city was put to the torch in the last 48 hours of occupation.

For the Kuwaitis, the ending of sanctions against Iraq is therefore a major problem. Should oil exports again earn revenues for Iraq when Kuwait remains crippled? On the other hand, Iraq itself is badly damaged and needs to finance its own recovery. One idea being explored by countries of the region is the dedication of a proportion of Iraq's oil revenues to repair the damage Saddam Hussein has done.

Much will depend on what kind of regime survives in Iraq. Saddam Hussein is now being challenged by his own people. But through the force of arms and oppression he can cling to power. As long as he does, the countries of the region will be wary of his designs and will want continued sanctions on anything enabling him to rebuild his armies.

In Kuwait, there is a mood calling for change in the way the country governs itself. The government says it is anxious to open up the regime, to institute more democracy. I encouraged that development and urged that particular care be taken to allow the reintegration of Palestinian residents of Kuwait, many of whom, most of whom, were intensely loyal to Kuwait.

Almost everyone with whom I met indicated that the Palestinian problem is the key issue to be resolved in the region. The answer will have to be found in greater security for all states of the area. The issue has three essential elements which all must be respected. They are the security of the state of Israel, the rights of the Palestinians and territory.

Sequence and relationship—which goes first, and what is tied to what—could consume thought, discussion and negotiation for years. Meanwhile, were that to occur, the despair of the refugee camps would find more radical expression and the arms race would go on.

I sought in my discussions in Jordan, in Syria, in Israel, and in the home of a leading Palestinian, Faisal Husseini, to promote appreciation of the need to build confidence in the collective ability of states and peoples to live together in acceptance and security. Eventually, a healthier state of mind can be built. There is not a lot of time. The countries and peoples concerned could make gestures, take initiatives, not of a kind which bear upon their fundamental security interests, but which build up a habit of working together. That is the message I left with all those with whom I met.

Could not Lebanon be the theatre of such co-operative action to further strengthen the authority of the government of Lebanon?

Could some progress be made among the states and parties on water projects?

Can peoples see their welfare in terms of a shared and more harmonious future, instead of a bitterly divided past?

Madam Speaker, it is not clear that they can. But that is the best way to build trust.

Much time in this discussion is devoted to technique, to whether it should be an international conference, at the United Nations or not at the United Nations, or whether it should be separate bilateral negotiations, and whether discussion between the Palestinians and the Israelis should be part of that or separate, and, in any case, who should represent the Palestinians, and so on.

On that last point, Canada can only agree with the Secretary-General of the United Nations; the Palestinians should be represented by the organizations or representatives they choose. Our distaste for the support for Saddam Hussein by the leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization should not disqualify Palestinians from coming to their conclusions on what we have always said was fundamental; their right to choose their own leadership in the search for realization of their legitimate rights.

As I said in Jerusalem to the Prime Minister of Israel, we are among the closest friends of that country.

• (1220)

Canada will not let Israel be put at risk. As the Prime Minister of Canada said on February 8, and as President Bush said a week ago, there is no security in geography.

I also went to Iran. My meeting with President Rafsanjani was productive. Of course, we discussed problems—human rights and hostages for example. But we did so in a way which gave me hope that Canada can work well with Iran.

These countries are all neighbours of Iraq. They are not disinterested in the outcome of the current uprising there. Indeed, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Iran have brought together in Lebanon the leaders of the various groups representing the masses of people wishing to be done with Saddam Hussein's tyranny, not just the Shiite majority in the south, not just the Kurdish minority in the north, but others as well. We have always said that the future of Iraq is up to the Iraqis. I encouraged other states in the region not to intervene.

I have been encouraged by all the leaders I spoke with. They want a durable peace in the region. They are however not yet ready to move beyond the liberation of Kuwait to address the age-old problems on which they have been so long divided, except with wariness and with distrust. But move they must. Or the arms race will spiral, and the United Nations will lose the lustre of its concerted action to liberate Kuwait. That would be our common loss.

By its nature, this is an interim report to the House, and I will be coming back to the standing committee as early as next week.

My conversations last week gave me a more direct understanding of attitudes in a region whose conflicts are deep and dangerous. They reinforced Canada's ability to play a constructive role in calming those conflicts and in using the end of a war to begin a real peace. I know that all members of this House share our commitment to that goal.

As our ships head home from the gulf, proud of our contribution to one victory, we are seeking now to address the sources of that conflict. Last July no one foresaw the invasion of Kuwait; no one foresaw the unprecedented response of the United Nations. We cannot foresee the developments of the next several months except to say that they offer a real chance to resolve the most intractable conflict the world knows, and it is in Canada's interest to make the most of that opportunity.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs for his statement on the Persian Gulf crisis and the search for peace, and indeed the role that Canada has played. I found it very interesting as I am sure all members of the House did.

On behalf of the Liberal caucus, I would like to respond to the hon. minister's statement.

[Translation]

Like all Canadians, the Liberal caucus is happy and relieved that the war in the Persian Gulf ended so quickly. The primary objective of the United Nations, supported by all Canadians to expel Iraqi forces from Kuwait and restore this country's sovereignty was achieved.

[English]

The Liberal caucus commends all members of the Canadian Armed Forces, especially those stationed in the gulf region, for their professionalism and their dedication in carrying out their duties. I also want to register our sincere gratitude to the members of their families for their understanding, their dedication, and indeed their steadfast support in these difficult times. We are all thankful that no Canadian lives were lost.

The end of the war marks only the beginning of a much more difficult challenge facing the international community, the challenge of reconstruction, development and stabilization in the Middle East, as the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs has just explained.

The destructive impact of war has been very severe. The economies of Iraq and Kuwait have been virtually destroyed. Those of other states in the region such as Jordan and Egypt have been significantly hurt. Scud missile attacks on Israel destroyed hundreds of housing units. The waters and coastlines of the Persian Gulf are blackened by oil, and the skies over Kuwait and surrounding lands have been darkened by hundreds of oil well fires. Thousands of civilians are homeless and sick; the danger of epidemics is very real. The situation is desperate.

Estimates of the cost of all the necessary reconstruction, environmental cleanup and humanitarian assistance in the region range well into the hundreds of billions of dollars.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the war also had a negative impact on many, mostly Third World countries that were not belligerents but suffered as a result of rising oil prices and dwindling export markets.

[English]

Moreover, some of the root causes of tension in the region still must be addressed. These include the lack of adequate regional security arrangements, continuing economic and wealth disparities between the various states, problems of democratization and human rights, religious fundamentalism and territorial claims and disputes affecting states and people such as Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Israel and the Palestinians.

The impact of the war on the United Nations must also be carefully considered. The members of the coalition, including Canada, have lauded the United Nations for demonstrating the capacity to act on behalf of the international community to halt aggression. We speak of the new world order.

The Liberal caucus agrees there is potential for an important new status for the United Nations, but we are convinced that this requires the United Nations and its agencies to be actively and centrally involved in the search for peace in the Middle East.

The Liberal caucus has always supported the collective security provisions of the United Nations charter. We have always accepted that the use of force to uphold the United Nations principles may be necessary, but as a last resort.

That being said, we recognize that there have been valid concerns expressed about the potentially negative impact on the United Nations, and I say the potentially negative impact on the United Nations, of its willingness to endorse war before other options to resolve the gulf crisis had clearly proven inadequate.

There are valid concerns about the relegation of the Security Council to the sidelines once war had started. There are also valid concerns that the five permanent members of the Security Council, who agreed on the issue, may well be disposed to disagree on other issues of international peace and security which might prevent the Security Council from playing a role in the future.

We believe that Canada must be vigorous in ensuring that these concerns are addressed.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I would now like to address the search for peace and Canada's role in this respect. The Liberal caucus feels that Canadians should urge their government to play an active role in meeting reconstruction needs in the short term and seeking peace in the long term, in the Near and Middle East. They should also urge the government to encourage the UN to act consistently and consider restructuring the UN to that end.

[English]

The government has laid out some preliminary thoughts on this role. The minister has just expanded on these interesting thoughts in the context of his trip to the Middle East. I am sure it must have been a very tiring experience.

• (1230)

I must commend the minister on looking so fresh after what must have been an exhausting experience for him. We welcome him back to the House.

An hon. member: Bravo.

Mr. Mifflin: We particularly support the government's interest in humanitarian and other economic assistance, economic cleanup assistance and controls over arms sales to the region.

We note, however, that the visit of President Bush this week to Ottawa, which displayed its undeniable successes, has clearly illustrated the sharp differences of opinion between the Government of Canada and the United States over the issue of controlling conventional arms transfers.

It is sobering to know that since 1961, $1.6 trillion has been spent on arms in the Middle East. As well, I note that the Canadian Centre for Arms Control and Disarmament recently estimated that the United States plans to sell weapons totalling $25 billion to the Middle East this year.

We urge the government to continue pushing hard on this issue. I note that the standing committee of the House on national defence and veterans affairs is studying this assiduously. We are hoping to come up with some suggestions on a non-partisan basis to the government, which may be able to present some rational and practical achievable ideas in this very difficult and hard to grasp issue which is so key to the downstream happenings in this area of conflict.

I recommend to the Secretary of State for of External Affairs that he undertake a special diplomatic effort to seek out support for reviving the idea of conventional arms transfer talks, first attempted in the late 1970s by the Carter administration.

Liberals believe further aspects of Canada's contribution to building a durable peace in the Middle East should be considered. The following is a series of possible initiatives that we offer and urge the government to support and promote. There are six of them.

First, the promotion of an important role for the United Nations and its member agencies in providing economic aid. The current scramble for reconstruction contracts in Kuwait has not yet been matched by a serious commitment to provide comprehensive aid to the countries of the gulf region hardest hit by the war.

Although a second Marshall Plan of sorts has been suggested by the Government of Canada among others, it would appear that little else is yet being done to co-ordinate an effective aid program that addresses not only reconstruction needs, but also those relating to health and disease prevention, environmental cleanup, food distribution, temporary shelter, management of refugees and some of the other needs.

One means of dealing with these myriad needs is to involve the United Nations and its member agencies which have responsibilities in various agencies requiring assistance. Such agencies include, among others, the World Health Organization, UNICEF, the United Nations Development Program, the United Nations Environment Program, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the United Nations Disaster Relief Organization and the Food and Agricultural Organization.

An active role by the United Nations and those agencies could help to promote the United Nations legitimacy in the region.

The Liberal caucus urges the government to actively promote an initiative by the United Nations Secretary-General to increase the United Nations involvement in relief efforts for the peoples of the gulf region, stressing humanitarian aid and long-term economic aid. Canada could lead by example, earmarking specific funds it intended to contribute to the United Nations for this purpose.

Second, we would like to assist the Third World nations negatively affected by the gulf war. As we have heard this morning, many Third World economies have been severely hurt by higher oil prices and reduced exports due to the crisis in the gulf.

The Liberal caucus believes Canada could play an important role in mitigating this impact through efforts to encourage special assistance in various forms such as increased import quotas, debt relief, reduction measures and new financing.

The government's decision to cut back official development assistance once again in the 1991 budget unfortunately sends the wrong signal at the worst time.

The third initiative relates to peacekeeping and verification. I don't think anybody can deny that our participation in the war limits to some extent our involvement in a peacekeeping operation. We do have experience and we should draw upon that to assist in the organization of such an operation and in the larger task of maintaining the peace.

In our minds, there are two major needs to be met. The first is to provide a framework for conducting an interim border patrol pending the operation of the development of a more permanent regional security arrangement. The second is to develop mechanisms for verifying and monitoring possible agreements on controls over arms transfers and other security arrangements.

The Liberal caucus urges the government to promote a central role for the United Nations in contributing ideas, expertise and co-operation to meeting these needs. We could propose a scheme similar to that used at the time of the Korean War when the Security Council appointed a committee to plan and promote peacemaking and peacekeeping mechanisms.

Next there are confidence and security building measures. "A journey of a thousand miles must begin with a single step." This is an age-old statement and it has stood the test of time. There is a need to begin slowly building the foundations upon which new political and economic structures can be erected in the Middle East to bring a durable peace in the region. The Liberal caucus believes that Canada could encourage the creation or development of some of these building blocks.

For example, Canada should encourage the states in the region to consider increasing areas of mutual trade. Steps could be taken to encourage moderation and compromise among the countries of the region in the interests of seeking a durable peace. The government should encourage key Arab states to engage Israel in peace negotiations, leading to an end of their formal state of hostilities with that state and an end to the Arab boycott. They could also be asked to affirm Israel's rightful place as a member of the United Nations and support a repeal of the United Nations General Assembly resolution equating Zionism with racism.

The government could also encourage Israel to resume efforts to set up a peace process with Palestinians in the occupied territories as the first step toward achievement of a peace settlement which accords recognition to legitimate Palestinian political rights. We agree with the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs that this is a fine requirement.

The fifth initiative involves arms control and arms reductions, to which I spoke earlier. Security, especially for the heavily armed countries of the Middle East, cannot be achieved overnight or through a single event. The Mulroney government's call for a world summit on armaments, while laudable, is no substitute for real steps, however small, that are designed to reduce the likelihood of a military conflict. In fact, they should complement each other.

The Liberal caucus therefore believes that Canada should promote a series of specific arms control and arms reduction initiatives in pursuit of this goal. We should push for a rapid conclusion of a convention on chemical weapons and the strengthening of existing conventions on the use of weapons in war, both conventional and mass destruction. Effort should be put into restricting and prohibiting the transfer of these weapons and their components. Indeed, supplier nations, which include most prominently the five permanent members of the UN Security Council, should themselves be encouraged to tighten their export controls and to allow public disclosure of their military exports.

Canada must also place special emphasis on encouraging countries of the Middle East who have not signed the non-proliferation treaty to do so.

Finally the sixth initiative: a review of the security provisions of the United Nations charter. We all know that the charter is over 45 years old and the world has changed significantly. The use of peace and security provisions of the charter during the gulf crisis has been lauded, but legitimate questions were raised about their proper interpretation.

• (1240)

If the United Nations is to emerge as the chief custodian of a new world order and if chapter VII of the UN charter is to play a new and stronger role in enforcing decisions of the UN Security Council, as is our hope, we must ensure that the UN's mandate is fully understood and accepted.

The Liberal caucus therefore believes that it would be of great service to the community of nations if the Secretary-General were to initiate a comprehensive review of the necessary steps provided for conflict resolution under the charter to ensure their effective and consistent application.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As time has gone by, I have to seek unanimous consent of the House for the hon. member to continue. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Mifflin: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I would like to thank my colleagues, especially the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. I do apologize but it is a very important subject. Again I thank my colleagues for their indulgence.

We note in this regard that the United Nations charter provides in chapter VI for a procedure under the authority of the Security Council to settle disputes before aggression occurs.

To our knowledge no attempt was made by the Security Council, which included Canada at the time, to address the Iraq-Kuwait border and oil dispute in the weeks and months before Iraq invaded Kuwait. Indeed, the record shows that Iraq began making threatening military gestures toward Kuwait several weeks before invading, yet no state saw fit to ask the Security Council to consider chapter VI action. This lack of foresight should not be repeated.

By way of conclusion, the Liberal caucus, in putting forward the six points to the government, is convinced that if the United Nations is to emerge as a leading player in the management of international peace and security, it must be vigorous in promoting its role as an active participant in both the short and long term peace process in the Middle East. There is a window of opportunity there, and we should use it. Canada's position should be one of making every effort to sustain the United Nations in that enterprise.

We should therefore encourage the long-term changes the United Nations requires to become the agent of choice of the world community to lead the process of constructing and maintaining this new world order.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the House for the opportunity of commenting on the minister's remarks.

I want to say that I was taken aback at the modesty of the minister apologizing to the House for delaying his comments being made available to us 15 minutes late. I think the House owes the minister a vote of appreciation for so quickly coming back to the House after his arduous journey and presenting this report. It is a compliment to his commitment to the parliamentary system that in spite of the journeys he has been taking he saw fit to come to the House as quickly as possible and present us with this report. He should be commended for that.

I suppose we all do a great deal of thinking about these issues. We are free to decide the world's problems in the security of this wonderful country of Canada. However they are complex problems, and made even more complex by some of the actions we take when we think we are trying to solve them.

The minister has been profoundly open in expressing his opinions about what he perceives Canada's role could be, as a minister responsible to the Crown should be, and should be commended for that. I feel a sense of pride as a western Canadian, understanding that my colleague from Alberta also represents that region and that he plays an important part regionally in this government.

Having said the complimentary things, I must address myself now to the content. We have picked some strange partners in the region. While I listened intently to the comments of the minister, I am compelled to reflect essentially on one of his comments, and that was: "no one should forget history". But the question is: Have we learned from it?

Throughout the process of the coalition, and we are talking about results now, it is well-known that my party would have rather had a longer time with the sanctions. That argument is over, and gracefully it has been accepted as over I think in some elements of the United States as well here in Canada. Now we live with the consequences, and the question of learning with history as it is in front of us.

I put to the minister that we inherited an awful lot of baggage with President Assad of Syria. President Assad of Syria, who we picked up as an ally of necessity during this current crisis, does not come to the table with the kind of background that gives me or my party confidence that in the long run he might not even be a greater problem than Saddam Hussein.

Without giving a catalogue to the House of that particular leader's background, suffice it to say the nation that sacrificed most in terms of materiel and political prestige in this experience was the United States of America. It must be said that the United States of America has been the best friend of this country and we in turn are their best friend, but that gives us the right, too, to tell our best friends when we think they have bad breath.

One of the things that worries me about the United States of America and launching us into a compelling alliance in this experience is the fact that it has now embraced President Assad, the very same person who is directly responsible for the murder of those 200 U.S. marines in Lebanon. This must be said. I am not the minister. I do not have to be the diplomat but it must be said. We are dealing here with a very dangerous person who runs an autocratic government and who has demonstrated in the past that he has even a worse capacity than Saddam Hussein to deal with opponents and with enemies real or perceived. That alliance, because of his participation, is fraught with dangers.

I do not say this exclusively in terms of the United States, but I also say it as it relates to member states in the region, including perceived opponents such as Iran, which has gone through some amazing transformations in our public relations evaluation of who it is and what it is over the last six months. It is going to be difficult, but it will be necessary to confront some of those partners we allied ourselves to with the very serious problems we have in accepting their backgrounds.

I do not know how a diplomat says to Assad: "We know who you are, where you came from, and we do not want to see that around any more". But that in effect is what I hope is said.

Second, I want to deal with the particular role of Jordan. I was particularly appreciative of the comments of the minister about not making a fast judgment on Jordan. I think that is essential, and I commend the minister for that.

I said on January 17, in my brief comments on the regional scene, that we should not rush to judge Jordan, that we will have a difference of opinion of where Jordan comes down in reality or in perception. The fact is Jordan must be a major player in the region and King Hussein must have the support of western nations in the fragile situation that he is in. We should not make judgments about a political response to populace clamouring on the street but understand that we have a role to play in maintaining that state as it is and as it evolves. It is not perfect.

The Saudis as well need to be gently nudged by a country such as ours—and our Prime Minister correctly suggested that the Saudis be allies of ours—that the fight was for human rights and against human rights violations by Iraq. The Saudis are also not very clean in terms of the same catalogue of definition that the Prime Minister used, that is Amnesty International, when he spoke to this House. The Saudis also have not a very good record with Amnesty International.

Dealing with Kuwait itself, if we pick up this morning's paper we discover that everything we said in terms of our definition of liberating a sovereign nation comes to a question about what we liberated in terms of loss of matériel and life and the consequences of that loss.

I will just use this one headline to illustrate my point from today's edition of The Globe and Mail: "Kuwaiti women struggle to tear off traditional chains". I would ask that the minister consider, on reflection, some subtle message perhaps to the Kuwaitis to understand that there were women in the Armed Forces who served in this country, there were women in that theatre who were prepared, on behalf of this country's commitment to the liberation of Kuwait, to risk their lives. I do not think it serves the long-term interests of women's commitment, equal with men, to risk their lives in a fight by the government and others for the liberation of a sovereign nation, to find out that they liberated an archaic system that does not recognize the rights of women. Just as an aside, also no votes for women.

I want to deal now with the arms issue. None of these things are said, by the way, as any criticism of the minister, and I mean that sincerely. I have the liberty of speaking on behalf of a third party which gives a lot of licence beyond the boundaries of diplomacy, and I recognize that.

I am impressed by the position taken by the government against the arms race, but I must reflect—and I do not mean this maliciously but sadly—on some of the facetious responses given to my colleagues by government members, not this minister, when questioned about ARMX and ARMX's role here in Canada. I would ask the government to reflect on that debate, quietly go through Hansard and look at that exchange. The worst predictions of that debate came true. I wish that had not happened.

The minister is to be commended for taking a strong position. My Liberal colleague clearly stated that the position is of course focused on powerful political entities, and that is that the big five in the Security Council who have been the big sellers. It is tough for an independent country like Canada to walk up to the big boys and say "knock it off".

This is more than an abstract problem. Here are some of the realities we have to deal with. During the last 15 years the Middle East has taken about one-third of all arms traded globally. Thirty nations, including Canada, sold Saddam Hussein more than $50 billion worth of weapons before he attacked Kuwait. Arab nations together have spent more than $150 billion on importing arms over the last 12 years, yet not one of these countries is confident of its security.

Just reflect on what that $150 billion could have done for Third World countries, for the hungry children that the minister properly addressed some of his comments to. Just reflect on what that money could have done.

After recently receiving $3 billion from the gulf oil states and the U.S. for its assistance in pushing Saddam Hussein from Kuwait, Syria has ordered $1 billion worth of Scuds from North Korea, all of which will be able to hit Israel. It is a serious problem.

I conclude by reading this one paragraph: "The Bush administration has backed away from earlier demands that conventional arms control be a major objective for the post-war Middle East. Washington now plans to sell $25 billion of arms to the Middle East in 1991 alone. About 67 per cent of all U.S. weapons being sold in 1991 by the United States will go to the Middle East."

That is absolute madness. If I may express an opinion to our colleagues south of the border, that is an insult to the dead who sacrificed their lives for the freedom of Kuwait, only to find that some impelling economic reasons may be putting the U.S. government in the position of rearming the very same regions.

Having said that, I wish to address myself to the chronic problem of the State of Israel and its neighbours. I am blessed with the same amount of ignorance of the nuances of trying to find an answer to that problem.

I do not have any more knowledge or any less than any other observer, but it seems to me—and I feel strongly about it—that it should be stated, if not evident, that Israel must look to some form of negotiations to deal with its internal and external security. It must expect and can demand the same international commitment that brought together 16 diverse nations to protect the integrity of the boundaries of Kuwait. It must ask for the same commitment from international communities to protect its sovereign boundaries as well.

Until that commitment is given fully, openly, and honestly to the State of Israel by all the players, negotiations that will reach a conclusion will not be possible.

While we get hung up on the nuances of who is to be at the table, while we walk on eggs concerned about expressing opinions of who should or should not be there, the basic reassurance that must be given to force an international debate around "where to from here" is a statement that the very commitment given by those 16 nations to protect the sovereign integrity of the borders of Kuwait must be given to protect the sovereign integrity of the borders of Israel, which were established by the United Nations the first time in history.

Having said that, I believe there will be a harvest of damage done to the western nations by the war, based on propaganda that we are not in control of. My colleague from the Liberal Party mentioned, in a very astute, brief comment, that we may have damaged our role as Canadians but still can give advice and peacekeeping.

Unfortunately I believe we have placed ourselves, through this experience, in the position of being lumped in with the rest of the western nations and of being viewed, frankly, as attempting to impose western hegemony on the region.

I hope that every effort is made by this government, and I think the minister has done it with his visit, not only to confirm the alliance but to set a distinct and separate pattern defining Canada. The minister is to be congratulated for taking this unilateral drive himself.

To separate Canada further, I would ask that this government propose a unilateral ban on the sale of arms from Canada as a demonstration backing up its position against the arms sale. A ban by Canada would be a powerful signal that we mean what we say.

My time is up and I would like to conclude with a comment concerning my constituents in the Esquimalt naval base and the other military forces there. It is on record that I did not want to see this war take place. It is also on record in my speech that once the decision was made I hoped for a quick dispatch and early return. They have done us proud again. I do not like the circumstances they were placed in, but they have done us proud again. Every Canadian must feel a bit better today that we have an independent armed force that is attached directly to a parliamentary government. I thank those families and I thank those men and women who served us.

I say in conclusion I hope, like in most other wars, their service has not been in vain.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, I wondered if I might seek the consent of the House to put two brief questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, I am always anxious to answer questions, but I am respectful of the traditions of the House. There is a practice with regard to statements. I think, if we departed from it in this instance, the pressures would be great to do that in the future.

I will be appearing before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade on Thursday next, and I will be pleased to deal with questions then.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—FREE TRADE NEGOCIATIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Barrett (p. 18509).

Madam Deputy Speaker: We shall now proceed with questions and comments following the speech by the Minister for International trade.

I would like to take this opportunity to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended today by 55 minutes, beginning at 3 p.m.

[English]

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): I listened very closely to the minister of trade, as punishing as that may be. I thought I would address myself specifically to some of the comments he made.

The minister chose to use a columnist as the source of all of his rationale for supporting the free trade agreement. I do not know if that columnist has ever met a payroll or not, but I have chosen to respond by dealing with some of the business community that he claims are supporting the free trade agreement. I will read some of the quotes.

Mr. Milliken: Let us hear them now.

Mr. Barrett: No. Well, I know you are anxiously awaiting those comments. As a matter of fact, you leapt your feet, hoping that I would be given the floor to answer your concerns. And by the grace of goodness, I was.

I want to bring to the minister's attention a statement by Patrick Lavelle, the vice-president for Canadian auto parts maker, Magna International. He is not a columnist. He does not belong to the CLC. Why those gratuitous attacks on individually named people has a place in this debate, I do not know, but if that is what you choose to do, that is your decision.

I quote: "The government is becoming involved in the U.S.-Mexico negotiations for no pressing economic reason, and with no idea of what it hopes to achieve" said Patrick Lavelle, a vice-president for Canadian auto parts maker, Magna International.

That was at a conference on free trade and the possibility of talks with Mexico. He goes on, and I will read one more paragraph: "'I am tired of Canadian politicians and members of the business community taking risks with the Canadian economy without knowing what they are doing and why', he told the forum on the implications of trade talks for Canada". That is not Shirley Carr. That is not Bob White. That is not the CLC.

Will the minister get up and personally attack this member of the business community for expressing an opinion that is contrary to his and the government's, or does he reserve his personal comments only for opposition members who could be defined as being identified with the trade union movement. These are specious comments attacking personalities instead of dealing with substance.

The next comment I wish to make in this brief time is to deal with the minister's comments about the Royal Bank and using the Royal Bank's latest report as an authority. Can you imagine the government reduced to asking one of the Big Five to be its authority? I want to expose for the minister that not only does the bank overcharge on its credit cards, but it also talks with a forked tongue with some time in between.

Mr. Milliken: No.

Mr. Barrett: Yes. And I want to bring this to the attention of the minister so that he will not be misled again, because one must pity the minister when he picks a source that he does not have enough research on.

Mr. Milliken: We all pity the minister.

Mr. Barrett: Yes. The bank said in the January 1988 statement endorsing the free trade agreement that "this agreement will serve to improve the allocation of resources, increase the number and quality of jobs, and help in controlling inflation. As a consequence, consumers will benefit, employees will benefit, and employers will benefit." That was in January 1988.

Now I come to the report the minister quotes from. In February 1991, two and a half years later, the review said that "it is useful to remember that none of the serious impact studies of the FTA ever projected dramatic job gains or losses from that agreement".

The bank is talking hogwash. Before the agreement shows any evidence, it says there are going to be great results. After two and a half years, when no results are evident, it says that no one said that there were going to be great results. Come on, Mr. Minister, you've got to find a heck of a lot better source than that. And I have been sticking strictly to business quotes.

I have just a couple more things.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I point out to the hon. member that as we are in the ten minutes of questions and comments. Five minutes have gone by, he may want to allow the minister the rest of the time to answer.

Mr. Barrett: That's why I am winding up. As a last comment—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will please wind up.

Mr. Barrett: —take a full vote and also read the great pamphlet of 200 years ago called "Common Sense".

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, nobody wants to cut off the hon. member because it helps us. The longer he talks, the more it helps us across the country.

It was not only a columnist I cited; it was the Royal Bank, the Canada West Foundation, and a number of other impartial sources. Then the hon. member got up and cited Mr. Patrick Lavelle, a partisan Liberal, and neglects to mention that the Association of Auto Parts Manufacturers has given their strong support to U.S.–Canada–Mexico free trade negotiations. The association that he cites is on the record supporting the proposed U.S.–Canada–Mexico negotiations.

The hon. gentleman mentioned research. It is time for his party to do a little research into the labour situation in Mexico. We have heard a lot of comment from them with respect to the terrible competition that we are going to have from Mexico because of their lower wages and unwarranted attacks of the labour framework and legislation, and environmental allegations in connection with the environment.

I point out to the House that if the hon. members opposite would do some research, they would see that of 140 international instruments on the environment, Mexico has ratified 27. It has adhered to the 1985 Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer and the 1987 Montreal protocol on substances that deplete the ozone layer. They passed extensive domestic legislation and environmental standards. They still have difficulties in implementation and enforcement because of their financial limitations. They are a developing country with a large foreign debt.

I point out that during his official visit to Mexico last year the Prime Minister signed an environmental co–operation agreement between Canada and Mexico and we are implementing several small scale but useful bilateral economic co–operation projects in Mexico.

With respect to labour conditions—I hope this will be of interest to the hon. gentleman who has obviously done no research into this situation—Mexico has ratified 61 of more than 170 International Labour Organization conventions, including eight of what are known as the 11 core conventions, for example, freedom of association, abolition of forced labour, equal remuneration, and non–discrimination.

This compares to the United States which has ratified only seven of these ILO conventions, none of them core, and Canada which has adhered to 26, four of which are core. Mexico actually has a better record than either the United States or Canada in adhering to international conventions dealing with labour matters. One has to wonder about all these attacks on Mexico and unjustified aspersions with reference to the labour situation in Mexico.

In addition, the 1969 Inter–American Convention on Human Rights contains a basic freedom of association provision. That instrument was ratified by Mexico. It has not been ratified by the United States, nor has it been ratified by Canada, so when we start to examine the actual situation in Mexico with respect to legislation and the adherence to international conventions, both with respect to the environment and to labour matters, Mexico actually has quite a fair record. They doubtless have difficulties in implementation because of its economic situation, because of the fact it is undeveloped, and its rapidly increasing population, now 85 million people. Mexico is trying to pull itself up by its bootstraps.

The same thing applies to the criticism of the so–called Maquiladora areas which, in the eyes of the hon. personages opposite, are supposed to be very retrograde.

In the opinion of Mexicans it is far better to obtain entry level jobs which give them some income, experience, and hope for the future than to have no jobs at all. The position of the hon. members of the New Democratic Party is that in Mexico they should not be allowed to have jobs at all. They should not have Maquiladora programs and the like. They should not be allowed to initiate programs to give themselves some hope.

Does the hon. gentleman want to ask a question?

Mr. Milliken: No, it's too late, but we want you to stop.

Mr. Crosbie: Is it too late? Well, I was just trying to answer the hon. member for the New Democratic Party.

In short, there are many reasons for us to enter into this negotiation. I am glad to have the support of the Official Opposition, at least we think we have their support, but one can never tell whether the Official Opposition supports something or does not support it. Their mugs are always on one side, their wumps are on the other. Now the wump side of the Liberal Party wants to speak and I am quite prepared to sit down.

We are going to hear some tortured arguments now. Let us see if we can all figure out what side the Liberals are on with reference to a U.S.–Canada–Mexico free trade agreement.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on the motion put forward by the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca which reads:

> That this House calls upon the government to avoid a worsening of the social and economic hardship caused by the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement by withdrawing from the current trade negotiations between the United States, Mexico and Canada.

Even a year ago today few of us would have predicted that we would be in this House discussing a trilateral trade deal with Mexico. This is an issue that has come upon us very quickly but its seriousness demands that we examine our options fully. While time constraints mean that we must react quickly, we must be careful not to over–react, careful not to react with knee–jerk divisiveness.

Given that the motion before us provides an opportunity to examine the issue of a North American free trade agreement, I welcome its introduction into the House. However, I find the substance of the motion presents great difficulty.

The motion speaks of the worsening of the social and economic hardship caused by the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. I agree. The motion then goes on to prescribe a recipe to avoid the worsening of our social and economic ills, that we withdraw from this current trilateral trade negotiation.

The motion before us, given the reality of today, however harsh given the six years of Tory rule, I believe is a flight into fantasy.

We can rightfully say that if we were in power we would not have the trade agreement we have now. We would not have signed a deal that gave away so much and brought so little. We would not have stacked the deck against Canadians, and then proceeded to strip away our ability to become better trained, better equipped, more competitive with soaring interest rates, retraining cuts, education cuts, R and D cuts, and science and technology cuts. We would not have been in the jam we are in today.

We can all indulge in "what if" in this House until we are blue in the face and until the last Canadian has stopped listening. The fact of the matter is that we are not the ruling party. The economic mismanagement that the ruling party has brought us is real and demands our attention here in the House. It will not be resolved by talking about "what if" and withdrawing from reality.

The fact of the matter is Canada is at the table. Whether we like it or not, we are stuck with this Minister for International Trade and this Prime Minister who sold out Canadians under the Canada–U.S. free trade deal. Whether we like it or not, we are stuck with this government for at least the next year and a half.

The Liberal Party has called for an election, because we feel Canadians need a new direction. The fact of the matter is that we are stuck with this government, and it is the members opposite who will be responsible for forwarding Canada's position in these negotiations. Those negotiations will go on.

Given that reality, it seems quite logical and in the best interests of all Canadians not to waste valuable time in the House of Commons on a flight into fantasy.

We need to talk about what these negotiations really mean. What are Canada's negotiating options? Who are the potential winners and losers? What should be on the table, and what must not be on the table? How do these negotiations fit into Canada's trading plans for the future?

What is really unfortunate is that neither the NDP nor the Conservative Party seem willing in this House today to deal with these very important questions. On one hand, we have the NDP saying: "No, without question. Don't even consider it." On the other hand, we have the Conservative Party saying: "Yes, without question. No study, no strategy. Just get a deal."

I consider both of these positions to be highly irresponsible. Both parties have allowed their worn ideologies and specific constituencies to push them into dead ends. The NDP says that it is against trade talks. What is it for? How does it propose to protect Canada's interests in this harsh world of today. Is its answer to shut our eyes, to cover our ears, to pretend that it is not happening? What is its alternative?

We in the Liberal Party, have always believed in freer trade, in multilateral trade. The Liberal Party believes that the Conservative government should have attempted to expand Canada's trade in the western hemisphere on a multilateral basis rather than, as it has done, on a piecemeal basis.

The world is moving towards trading blocs, whether we like it or not. The Conservative government has been slow to realize this reality and therefore has shown no vision with respect to Canada's trade in the western hemisphere. As a result, Canada has not been the master of its own timetable.

Canada's trade must be expanded in the western hemisphere on a multilateral and comprehensive basis rather than on a haphazard and piecemeal basis.

Our Conservative colleagues, who seem caught between the pages of their first year economics textbook, are blind to the economic and social hardships they have brought this country. Their trade vision for our country ended with the signing of the free trade agreement, and they seem dejected by the fact that Canada is no longer the apple of the American eye, and that the U.S. wants to disturb our cosy little bilateral relationship. It is becoming increasingly clear that the Conservatives have been overtaken by reality. Even the Conservative dominated Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade stated in its recent report on this deal: "We are frankly amazed by the lack of detailed economic analysis of the costs and benefits of a North American free trade deal."

• (1320)

Canadians need answers. I represent a riding that has been hit hard by recent plant closings, small business bankruptcies and many lay-offs, a riding that could very well be vulnerable to a North American free trade agreement. What my constituents are saying to me is that they are extremely concerned about these job losses and they are concerned about their future. They know that the Canadian government has mishandled the Canadian economy and they feel that the free trade agreement is hurting, rather than helping. They hear that our ills are for the good of economic restructuring, whatever that means, but they question whether it really has to happen this way.

Now they hear that Canada is involving itself in a new deal with Mexico. They are concerned about having to compete with a country that has lower wages, lower social and environmental standards. There were many concerns voiced by groups appearing before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade on both sides of this issue.

The people, like the people in Haldimand—Norfolk, want to know what is going on. Does this government have a plan? If it does, what is that plan? They want to know how is it that the international trade minister can one day announce that Canada will participate and that the free trade agreement will not be touched by any trilateral agreement and the next day change his mind and say that changes may have to be made to the free trade agreement.

This Conservative intransigence on this issue could have devastating repercussions for not only my riding, but for ridings all across Canada. This government gave away many things to secure a free trade agreement. Our country made major concessions to gain "preferential treatment in the U.S. market". Surely if the Americans turn around and try to cut another deal with another country, we stand to lose the very thing that this government was willing so well to give up, that special relationship, that preferential access.

You might think that a reasonable Canadian government would go to the table and say: "Look, we have problems with the free trade agreement and we are losing preferential access. We supposedly had a bilateral deal. Let's correct the errors we made". But to do so this government will have to come to terms with the errors that it made in negotiating the free trade agreement, because until it does, the Canadian public will continue to have no confidence in this government's ability to protect Canadian interests in any trilateral negotiations.

Canadians have learned from this government's bungling of the free trade negotiations, they have learned from this government's refusal to make good on its election promise of adjustment assistance for those workers who have been thrown out of their jobs because of the free trade deal. Canadians have learned from this government's mistaken pursuit of economic policies that have only served to hinder Canadians' ability to compete. They have learned from this government's failure to institute necessary educational and training programs and to make Canadians more productive. They have learned from this government's stubborn adherence to the high interest rate policy, high dollar policy, which has crippled Canadian businesses in the face of increasing competition from the United States. Canadians have learned from the mistakes of this government.

The question is: can this government learn from the unnecessary hardship it has brought upon Canadians?

The Liberal Party believes, given Canada's participation in the current trilateral negotiations, the Canadian government must use these talks to correct the mistakes it made during the initial free trade discussions with the United States. It must understand that free trade does not have to mean the lowest common denominator in wages and environmental standards. It must take control of our country's trade agenda, actively pursue our interests, not cower behind American initiatives or those threats from large multinational corporations. It must take this opportunity to reopen the existing Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement and in doing so, it must consult Canadians and make explicit goals it seeks in these negotiations so that Canadians can decide if these goals really reflect Canadian national interests.

It must seek to promote multilateral trading relations and mitigate the unsatisfactory nature of this current free trade agreement.

It must negotiate an agreement which could be expanded to cover Canada's trading partners throughout the western hemisphere.

It must outline comprehensive adjustment programs for Canadian labour and industry to be undertaken prior to the conclusion of an agreement.

It must guarantee the protection of Canada's social, cultural and regional development programs and make explicit statements of Canada's minimal position prior to subsidy negotiations.

It must make it explicit in the provisions of any trilateral deal the protection of environmental and social standards, including labour standards.

The Liberal Party intends to hold this government accountable for these goals in the current negotiations.

The Liberal Party has never been opposed to the concept of freer trade. That is why the Liberal Party has launched a western hemispheric initiative, intended to promote liberalized trade and address concerns such as human rights and the environment.

If Canada is to prosper in this new decade, it will require political leadership that is imaginative, creative, flexible and innovative, all qualities in a dangerously short supply with this present government.

I do not have to remind this House that Canada is a trading nation and a strong trading nation. Our ability to enjoy a decent quality of life in the nineties will be directly dependent on how successful we are in marketing our competitive products around the world. Those of us who have lived our lives in southwestern Ontario, the bread-basket of Canada, are acutely aware of the fact that in order for an economy to be competitive it must be productive.

Under the Conservative rule, Canada has been steadily falling behind all of its major competitors in productivity growth. The only major industrialized country that has experienced a lower rate of productivity growth than ours is the United States. Our productivity performance and our ability to maintain decent standards of living are inextricably linked.

The free trade agreement is a flawed strategy. The Conservatives have linked our fortunes to the only advanced industrial country with even lower rates of growth in productivity than ourselves and investment in infrastructure and standard of living much lower than our own.

We must articulate and implement a trade policy that links us to the emerging markets of the future.

Canada and the United States have also placed second last and last respectively in the rate of growth of income per person. Little wonder that Canadians are upset.

Canadians will not be productive or competitive with punishing interest rates and an artificially high dollar.

Canada's real interest rates are almost twice as high as the U.S. rates. This means that it costs a business in Simcoe, in my riding, roughly twice as much to borrow money as it does someone in Buffalo. These rates are stifling investment in new plants and equipment and they are also keeping our Canadian dollar artificially high, making it increasingly difficult for our exporters to compete. Ontario manufacturers are particularly hard hit by our unrealistically high dollar.

Rates have climbed to the point where ordinary Canadians have stopped spending. Our businesses are refusing to invest in new plants and equipment. By choking off badly needed investment, we prevent our industries from achieving the productivity gains needed to stay competitive.

A trade deal with the U.S. and Mexico is not the panacea the government would have us believe. Canada will not be productive if we continue to fall behind technologically. By any number of statistical measures, our technological competitiveness in the world has dropped sharply under this government. In order to be technologically competitive, Canadians will have to be creative in the way we finance, develop, and use technology.

The Tories have watched the pool of start up capital for high technology in Canada dry up and have done nothing about it. Our government should be playing leadership roles in helping shift private sector financing out of mergers and acquisitions and into our industries of the future.

• (1330)

The biggest single generator of research and development in this country is in fact the federal government itself. Its laboratories are stocked full of world-class scientists doing outstanding work. Much of this research could be transformed into products and processes that would form the basis of new job-creating, profit-making businesses that could compete in this new emerging economy.

What we do not do is provide our government scientists with the private sector based expertise and the financial incentives that they need to turn their discoveries into businesses. Our best government scientists need support from our partners in the private sector, not lay-off notices from the Conservatives.

Canadians will not be competitive if one-quarter of our population cannot read or write. A society that has a large and growing percentage of its population at the margins of economic life due to an inability to communicate effectively is not only an unjust society, it is a society with a limited economic future.

Canadians will not be competitive if our environmental and competition policies are weak and ineffectual. The Conservatives have encouraged our economy to become more concentrated, but not more competitive. In doing so, they jeopardize Canada's competitive future, as our economy gets concentrated in fewer and fewer hands.

Canada needs a dynamic, fiercely competitive, private sector capable of taking on all newcomers. Canadians will not be able to compete if we depend on the free trade agreement to secure our place in world markets.

It is probably true that, to a large extent, the world is solidifying into a number of large regional trading blocks. One way or another, we will continue to share a close trade relationship with our neighbour to the south and with Mexico, but it would be a grave mistake to believe as the Conservatives do that a Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement or a Canada-Mexico free trade agreement secures our trading future. It would be a graver mistake, as the NDP believe, for Canada to stay isolationist. We cannot be an island among ourselves.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, first I want to start by congratulating the hon. member on a presentation very, very well done.

I was particularly interested in some of the comments he made about the state of our economic situation in Canada and relating it to the area of research and development in the area of education.

I just want to stress the importance of that statement, especially when we have right now in Canada over 30 per cent of our youth who are trying to finish high school and cannot, for whatever reason. They drop out before they reach the age of 18.

My colleague also indicated the rate of illiteracy at 25 per cent. I would like to add to that. The latest statistic by Statistics Canada has indicated that over 38 per cent of the Canadian population are in fact functionally illiterate when it comes to literacy as we know it.

By the year 2000, we will see that there is going to be more and more demand for service-based industries. In other words, we are going to see a work force that has to be highly educated. We will need the work force to have at least a high school level of education and, in some cases, even university level education.

What we have seen over the past decade and will be seeing in the next decade more and more is our industry fading away and our service sector increasing. If you compare that to Japan, it is very sad because the reverse is true. In Japan, for example, they have approximately 10 times more engineers and scientists as we have in Canada, while we have 20 times more lawyers than they have in Japan. That will give us a clear indication of where we are and where our competitors are at.

In my view there is one thing which is lacking in this whole debate. I listened to the Minister for International Trade's presentation and I did not see him putting a lot of emphasis on investment in our human resources. In my view, if we are to be internationally compatible and if we are to be at the leading edge in terms of trade and technology, we have to start investing in our human resources. That is something which we are not seeing enough of or in which we are not seeing this government take leadership.

The latest budget is a clear indication of the failure of the government to deal with this issue when it has cut transfer payments to post-secondary education, when it has cut transfer payments to the provinces in many other areas such as health care and education. In my view, if we are really to deal with the issue of trade and technology, we have start moving from strength to strength rather than moving from weakness to weakness.

I would like in closing to again congratulate the hon. member and ask him if he can elaborate a little further on the research and development and talk a little bit about the record of the government on this issue, since it promised in 1984 to double the rate of investment in research and development and so far we have not seen anything of that.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I will just take half a second to thank my hon. friend for the question because I want to give my colleagues in the NDP an opportunity to ask me a question on that. I think I brought out in my speech the problems with a government that does not put enough emphasis on R and D and a government that puts more emphasis on these trading agreements to promote Canada's future. I do not think that is the direction. As I outlined, I hope that the proposals that the Liberal Party has put forward on this issue will be addressed by the government.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I would ask a number of questions of the hon. member particularly concerning the position of the Liberal Party with regard to free trade. There seems to have been a dramatic reversal that has taken place within the Liberal Party since the change of leadership.

The former leader, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, said that the fight against free trade was the fight of his life. Now, I think what they have as far as the Liberals are concerned is the flight of their life. They are fleeing from the position of the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. All of a sudden we have them no longer talking about "if they came to power", which they will not do, that they are going to cancel the free trade deal. They are now starting to talk about "We have to make one, two or three little changes to the free trade deal".

The Liberals have started to back away. All of a sudden the corporations which have been financing the Tories are starting to find that the Tories have driven the economy into rack and ruin, so they are now looking around for somebody else that they can use as lackeys and of course there is always the Liberals. They have known that for years, so they say: "We will finance them". Of course, they say: "If we are going to support and finance you, you have got to have some understanding. The multinationals are telling you that we have got to be protected. We do not want anybody tinkering around too much with that free trade deal because it has been very beneficial for us. We can move our capital down to the States, we can move it into cheaper wage zones, we can move it down to Mexico. We can maximize our profits. We do not really care if it hurts the Canadian worker. We do not care if there is a harmonization with the United States".

All of a sudden the Liberal Party is now backing away from its very hard fought claims that it was utterly opposed to anything like the free trade deal, that it would scrap the free trade deal, that it would cancel the free trade deal. That is not what it is now saying.

The Liberals are now saying: "We will take a look at it and tinker". Now, all of a sudden when it comes to the Mexican free trade deal they are starting to say: "Maybe we should be at the negotiating table. Maybe we should sit down and look at the benefits of a free trade deal with Mexico. Let us get involved".

Can the member explain why the fight of their life has become the flight of their life?

• (1340)

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, quite frankly we would not have been in the position we are today with free trade had the NDP not faltered during the last election. Had the NDP not questioned whether or not this was really the fight of its life, we would not have had free trade today. There would not have been that many Conservative members over there had the NDP not had a position.

I want to tell the hon. member what Canadians are saying out there today. What they are saying is that they do not want political parties just to oppose. What Canadians are saying is that they want a party to show a position. That is exactly what I have outlined in this House today: the position of the Liberal Party with regard to trade and how we will move forward.

The Conservative Party that is being handled by the CEOs is saying: "Look, we want to be involved in North America, an island upon itself, trade with North America".

The NDP is saying: "Look, we want to be an island upon ourselves in Canada". What the Liberal Party is doing is moving out, moving forward, into the multilateral field, as did former Prime Ministers Pierre Trudeau and Lester B. Pearson who moved Canada forward into the world arena.

I want to tell the NDP that it will not continue by coming out and consistently attacking, attacking, attacking, without bringing forward any alternatives. I listened to the hon. member who put forward the motion today. The hon. member took two minutes out of a twenty-minute speech to talk about Mexico. The rest of the time he lambasted the free trade agreement.

Unfortunately the reality of the situation is that we have free trade. We would not have had it, had we become the government, but unfortunately that is the case and unfortunately they are the government and they are going to be there for the next year and a half.

What Canadians are telling us to do as opposition members, as people representing our constituencies in this House, is to outline our alternatives for them, where we want to see this country go when we become the government.

I challenge my friends in the NDP to do the same: to stay away from just representing the unions, to represent all Canadians and to put forward the views of all Canadians on this matter. I have done it. My party has done it. I challenge my friends in the NDP to do the same.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you on your temporary promotion to the Chair. I have quite enjoyed today's debate with the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and even the Minister for International Trade. Although his message is one of total lack of content, we do appreciate the humour.

Also we are appreciative that we have today the final, definitive Liberal stand this week on free trade and the Mexico round of free trade. I am glad that this has been spelled out and will remain the Liberal policy at least until Monday.

It is a great privilege to second this motion, and may I say that the NDP speaks as one voice. There is no divisiveness in our party with regard to the Mexico—United States—Canada free trade agreement. We have been consistent and we have spoken with one voice.

The member for Haldimand—Norfolk suggested that the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca did not speak about Mexico, so I indeed want to address his concerns. We had already devised this situation that the member previous would speak about the free trade agreement and I would try to speak somewhat about Mexico.

I want to spend a few moments on the Mexican government, which we believe was elected fraudulently. It has no mandate from the Mexican people to enter into any kind of trade agreement. There was no understanding by the Mexican people of what is happening to them. I think it is widely accepted that basically Mexico masquerades as a democracy, but it is indeed a dictatorship. There are human rights violations. People who oppose the government are harassed, even killed. There is economic liberalization but there is not political liberalization.

It was suggested to me just yesterday, in speaking to a professor from a Mexican university, that electoral reform has actually worsened. It was suggested that even if in the next national election the ruling party achieved only 35 per cent of the electorate's vote, it would still maintain control of over 50 per cent of the Parliament of Mexico. That is not acceptable.

It was also suggested to us that the only advantage that Mexico has to provide the industries of the rest of North America is a low wage advantage. The business community in Mexico is, I am told, arrogant. It suggests that the lifestyle of the ordinary Mexican should not be tampered with: "They like that lifestyle, they enjoy it, so don't make us any better off. Let me sit around pool and drive my Mercedes, but let those people enjoy the Maquiladora life". It is a wonderful life, Mr. Speaker.

As far as the elections go, the member for Trinity—Spadina is trying to monitor municipal elections in Mexico and Mexico says: "No, our law doesn't allow any monitoring of elections in Mexico. It would not be appropriate". The member for Trinity—Spadina is not a threatening man. We would think that the Mexicans would greet him with open arms and say: "By all means look at these honest elections that we have." But the fact is that the elections have been held in various provinces of Mexico and the opposition party has won elections but not been able to control the municipal councils.

What is it like in Maquiladora? No one has really addressed that. They ask: "What have you got against Mexicans, you New Democrats?" We ask the government: "What have you got against Mexicans?" I throw it back to the government.

I think it is only appropriate to tell a contemporary story—the Maquiladora has been in existence for several years now, I think eight to ten years—about life in the low wage boom towns of Mexico. At five o'clock on a December morning in a two-room shack adjacent to a strip of American owned factories, seven young Mexicans rise to go to work. What do they live in? The shack was built by the family from materials discarded by nearby factories. Wooden pallets become the frame and roof. Cardboard boxes used to ship garage door opener parts to Mexico are now the family's interior walls. Looming right beside the fortress is the actual garage door opener factory; it is the Chamberlain Group from Chicago.

The president says: "We are the cost leaders in our industry". We are not surprised that they are the cost leaders. He goes on to talk about it but does not account for the hundreds of toxic chemical drums discarded by the factories and reused for drinking water by families who cannot read the warnings printed in English. That is what it is like in the Maquiladora.

What does the one American corporate individual say? "I don't see the role of corporate America as being philanthropists about the world. They came down here to benefit themselves and secondarily to benefit Mexico through these jobs".

What do the families say? "People come with the illusion of making money, not to become rich but to make some money. But they cannot live on their salary and there is no house for them to live in. You see that a lot of people get disillusioned and leave".

How many of them leave? If there is going to be such excellent jobs for Mexicans, why would they leave to the tune of a 61 per cent turnover every six months and a 77 per cent turnover in these industries over the course of one year? Is that really the good life? They will move on to another industry for a matter of a few cents per hour, which will augment perhaps their 80-cent an hour wage. That is what it is really like in Maquiladora.

• (1350)

Mexico is going to be forced to negotiate a deal from a position of weakness. There is unrest in the country. It is debt ridden. There is pollution beyond our comprehension. We believe it has a corrupt government. We say that the unions are in collaboration with the government; they are not there for the benefit of the workers. The incomes of ordinary Mexicans have gone down 50 per cent in the last four years.

There is an old Mexican saying: "It is too bad for Mexico that we are so far from God but so close to the United States."

The Prime Minister went down to Mexico and said that the Canadian free trade agreement created 250,000 jobs. He is not saying that in Canada, but he is saying it down there. It is a case of misinformation.

As far as the environmental laws that the Minister for International Trade cited, they do have the toughest environmental laws in the world, but there is no money, there is no personnel, and there are no teeth in the implementation of those environmental laws. They can write all the laws they want, but if they do not enforced they are in fact not laws whatsoever.

What do environmentalists say as opposed to the Americans? The Americans have already said that there cannot be environmental discussions with this agreement, that it is impossible, that it will drive people away. Environmentalists make a very valid point. Fixing environmental problems now in a trade agreement is a lot cheaper than fixing those problems in the future. We know from our own history that when we try to repair the damage it is more costly and sometimes the will is not there.

The promises of free trade, I remember well, and I am sure all members remember them in their constituency during the campaign. I still have a clipping here: "Speak out. Up to 1,500 jobs in jeopardy in downtown Sault Ste. Marie." "With free trade we are going to have more jobs in industry. We are going to have more jobs in secondary industry. We are going to have more jobs in stores and shopping malls".

What the Conservatives did not say is that they would be in Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, in the United States. One of the the major reasons their jobs are in jeopardy is this agreement that we have been in for a couple of years. There is ever more danger of entering into another agreement. These promises turned out to be absolutely false.

With respect to adjustment programs for workers, the Prime Minister said that with the free trade agreement the government would provide the finest adjustment programs in the world. We now know that there were none. It commissioned the de Grandpré report called Adjusting to Win. Well, we lost and there were no adjustments. What good recommendations were in it, I do not believe were followed.

Access to the American market through the free trade agreement was the carrot. The steel industry in Canada said: "This is what we want. We will have access and, if they harass us, we will bring it to the panel dispute and everything will be solved". Recent history proves that to be also false.

It is nigh on impossible—and I know the member for Burlington will agree with me—to win a ruling when the language of these panels, with American law, suggests that relief should not be delayed if sufficient evidence exists for concluding that the threat of injury is real and injury is imminent. It says: "There may not be any definite, distinct problem right now, but just in case there might be in the future, we are going to bring a countervail duty against you".

All the rulings read the same. They are against us. What would Mexico hope to gain as far as access to the American market is concerned?

Here is a letter that was put on the door of an industry, Bovie Manufacturing in Lindsay, Ontario:

> Your strike vote last night means that as soon as you go out, the Mexicans will get your jobs immediately.
> You also lose 8-10 weeks more wages as you cannot apply for UI while on strike.
> In order to apply for UI you must inform us by registered mail that you quit our employ, then wait a further 6-8 weeks before your claim starts.
> However, if you work until the end of our coverall and lab coat contract, which will be approximately the end of April, and we lay you off, the waiting time is only two weeks.

Remember, if you strike, there will be no job for you to come back to.

Mr. Milliken: That was a couple of years ago.

Mr. Butland: I do not believe so. This is a very recent edition. June 1989.

Mr. Milliken: Yes. It is not new.

Mr. Butland: It is relatively new. As far as Liberals go, that is recent research.

I want to talk about a case in point—there is nothing like an actual scenario—of a consideration by an American firm in Buffalo called Trico which makes windshield wipers. The president of the firm said: "We are not being profitable enough and perhaps we have to look at Mexico. Let's go down to Mexico and take advantage of the low wages there. Perhaps the company will be more profitable".

Naturally, the people in Buffalo got quite upset. They said: "We have already lost all sorts of industry. Please, Trico, don't leave us." Then the president said: "Let's have some studies. I will co-operate with any studies that you can come up with. Let's take a look at whether or not I can be competitive here in Buffalo".

The studies went on, but the decision was already made. Indeed he was going to Mexico. He had a twin city operation between Texas and Mexico. Off they went to Mexico.

The suggestion was that it was making windshield wipers there and the only consideration was the low wages. The studies proved that when it should have been thinking of capital investment to make its wiper systems technologically superior and in the long run cheaper to produce than those of its competitors, it chose the easy way out by relying on cheap labour both for assembly and fabrication to resolve its problems.

A quick fix sometimes will be the choice. Assembling for Development is perhaps the most recent book written on the Maquiladora experiment. It is no longer an experiment because I believe there are 500,000 Mexicans employed in that border area. Very soon it will not be a border Maquiladora, but it will spread to all of Mexico with the displacement of one million to one and a half million Mexican peasant farmers who have known no other lifestyle.

Will they be retrained? Certainly not because Mexico cannot afford that. So off they will go to the nearest Maquiladora. What kind of life will that be?

The whole game has changed. There are more and more pressures upon Canada from multinational corporations that say: "We cannot afford our elaborate social welfare system. Something has to give". That is one area where I think the multinationals are saying: "That is where Canadians should give". We do not want to accept that.

I want to quote someone who should have been the president-elect of Mexico and who hopefully will be the next president of Mexico, Mr. Cardenas, from a speech in New York in February 1991. We identify very closely with what this gentleman said: "It is absolutely inadmissible that an international division of labour between the three countries assigns Mexico the role of a permanent supplier of cheap labour. Raising Mexican wage levels and working conditions in the general direction of American or Canadian standards instead of systematically lowering our salaries and incomes to attract reluctant investors is a paramount reason for pursuing new forms of economic integration".

I want to talk about a social charter, which I think this party endorses and espouses and, I think, Mr. Cardenas espouses. We see no problem with this at all; that any agreement, should there ever be one, should address this. We know full well that it will not be addressed under the aegis of the American trade negotiators or by the Canadian side as well.

The existing disparities among the three economies imply that a substantive, central objective of these negotiations should be the gradual but decisive standardization of trade related norms. First and foremost among these must be a social charter ensuring that workers in the three countries enjoy the same real—not merely on paper—work site conditions, collective bargaining rights, legal framework and occupational safety and health standards in order to avoid the exploitation of Mexicans and present unfair competition to their American and Canadian counterparts. Wages cannot be decreed into uniformity, but the conditions under which they are established and the framework in which labour and management relations take place can be harmonized. The concept is, let us not bring down our standards, let us raise the Mexican standards. I do not think anyone should have a problem with that.

I know the government always gets very hostile when we bring up plant closures in this country, but I have a veritable litany. I quite agree that many of them, perhaps, are not directly related to free trade, but at least we provide a list. The government maintains that it has created an endless number of jobs but it has never provided a definitive list.

After two years, we still have not measured or made an attempt to measure, the success or lack of success of the agreement with the United States. I understand there was a model for measurement put together by Informetrica. I do not believe it has been acted on and, if it has been, certainly I do not think the results have been tabled.

With that, I believe I am just about out of time. To end, workers cannot be the sacrificial lambs on the altar of a North American free trade agreement. The adjustments we had under free trade with the United States were dramatic and we believe that they will be even more dramatic when we have a trilateral trade agreement among the three countries.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I would like my hon. friend to comment on one of my concerns in this whole question of the social security network in Canada.

During the negotiations concerning the free trade deal, the Tories kept maintaining that there would be no threat to our social security system, that there would be no harmonization with the American system and that there would be no levelling of it.

Since the introduction of free trade, we have had a clawback of old age pensions, a clawback of family allowances and we have had repeated attacks on our national social security programs. The accumulative effect of cutbacks in federal transfer payments for post-secondary education now amount to just under $5,000 per student, some of which were started by the Liberal government, of course, in 1981-82.

In the health care system, the accumulated effect of the cutbacks now account for $29 billion. What is happening, of course, is that our health care and post-secondary education systems are eroding.

All we have to do is listen to the anguish of the people of Newfoundland this week, when they realized that basic health care is no longer going to be a reality in that province, with the closure of 360 acute care beds and the firing of 300 nurses. This government maintained that there would be no impact. With the free trade deal, there was no understanding that we would have to harmonize, that we would have to bring our social services and social security network down to the level of those of the United States. But it is happening.

My fear is that all of a sudden we will be told that now we have to harmonize with Mexico. There is no post-secondary education, there is not even public school education in large parts of Mexico. There are not even basic sanitary services available in health care. There is not even basic physician services available to much of the population.

I would like the hon. member to comment on what he feels would be the impact of getting involved in an attempt to harmonize our social service programs with those of Mexico.

An hon. member: Madam Speaker, can we try the rule of relevance?

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the very concise and insightful question of my hon. colleague.

As far as the social security programs in this country are concerned, of course, let us remember that the free trade agreement was going to enhance the programs, not diminish them Remember the old story: "I would never lie to my mother". I always said: "Well, you did not lie to her, but you gave her an awful kick". Old age security has, indeed, as a result of the clawback, been reduced.

The member is up on his statistics and I guess the proof is there.

The member across says it is the old sparrow trick. Everything is unrelated. Well, the fact remains that social programs are under attack and we ask if that is purely coincidental? I doubt it very much. It is just too fortuitous to be credible.

The member from Souris points out quite definitively and statistically what is happening to this country. Rather than asking me the question—perhaps, I might be biased, but I doubt it—the member should ask a Canadian on the street whether he thinks the social programs in this country are under siege. I am sure that he or she would answer in the positive.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I thought I could not be amazed any more about the inaccuracies that would be used about the free trade debate, but this last exchange between the two hon. gentlemen from the New Democratic Party has convinced me that there is no depth beyond which some people will go to try to link anything—anything, to the free trade agreement.

In that last exchange there was not even a shred of an attempt to make the linkage between the demise in government's funding of services in tough economic times and the free trade agreement—not even a shred of an attempt to link them logically. There was simply the bald assertion that because there has been constraint in government funding it is ipso facto a consequence of the free trade agreement. Just simply stated. They do not even bother any more making these outrageous claims in this House, which have the effect of scaring folks improperly. They make those claims now and do not even bother, according to the New Democratic Party, with even attempting to make it look logical. They just say it.

That is one of the most irresponsible things I have ever heard said in this place and I have heard many.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Bosley: In a sense, I guess it should not surprise me that my good friends in the New Democratic Party, and I certainly count the member from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca among them, continue this battle.

• (1410)

Let us be under no illusions about what the purposes are here. The motion before us talks specifically about, if I could quote it: "a worsening of the social and economic hardship caused by the Canada-United States free trade agreement." I will come back to that, but I want to point out only to begin with that we should be under no illusions that it is the specific agreement the New Democratic Party is opposed to. It is not. It is consistently, and on the record, opposed to any form of free trade with anybody.

It will now claim the proof that that is not true is that they are supporters of the managed free trade agreement known as the auto pact. Those of us who have been through this debate long enough—I had hoped we were not going to have to go through it many more times—will remember that the chief opponent alongside my own party at the time, which I regret, was the New Democratic Party. It claimed at the time the job losses that would occur as a consequence of this managed trade pact were going to destroy the auto industry in Canada, and we could not afford to have that.

What is now said by the members of the New Democratic Party is that they are for that kind of pact. In fact, they tried to argue in the free trade debate that it was the auto pact, which they now claim to support, which would be hurt most by the free trade agreement. That is on the record.

I suggest, therefore, that the record before us, because the New Democratic Party knows it would be impossible to have any face in this country by arguing, in a country where 50 per cent of the private sector income is based upon trade, and that therefore the jobs and well-being of a very large number of Canadians, directly or indirectly, more than one-third or 40 per cent of Canadians, are dependent on trading relationships. In fact, it is our trading relationships that make us the most money of all activities in this country and therefore produce the taxes to pay for things.

It would be impossible to stand before a Canadian audience and say the whole truth about the New Democratic Party's position on trade, which is that it is isolationist and has absolutely no interest in liberalizing trade. Therefore, it says it is against specific arrangements such as the current free trade agreement or the proposal with regard to Mexico. I have yet to hear the New Democratic Party say it is for any form of current proposed trading relationship except the GATT. It now says it is for the GATT.

I assume it knows what people are talking about. Wanting to get out of free trade arrangements probably will not come via the GATT, which is why it is for it. It is in effect saying that if we were to get success at the GATT, which is fondly to be hoped because it would solve this problem of having all these bilateral relationships, we would be getting through the GATT with Mexico and the United States precisely what it is the government is talking about negotiating with Mexico and the United States. And it is that which the New Democratic Party says it is opposed to in this resolution.

Some day, somewhere, and maybe here is a good time, those who claim to make this case on behalf of the New Democratic Party, ought at least once explain why if you get it through Geneva it is okay, but if you get it through Ottawa it is not. It is illogical to maintain these two positions externally.

I assume the New Democratic Party is saying that, in effect, because it knows the GATT is not going to deliver in time, given the regional blocks that are being developed by people who are tired of waiting for the GATT to deliver, it feels safe in saying it can support the GATT process. It will argue that all these developments externally in the world, whether it is in the Pacific Rim or the new Europe, ought to be opposed. After all, trade liberalization is faster than the GATT proposal, and after all, we have to be for only the GATT because that is slow.

Those people who have to deal in real policy in the real world know better. That is precisely why people who look forward and who understand the importance of trade to this country have devoted so much of their time in the last few years trying to make sure we have more and more access to a larger and larger market. The corollary of that is we must be prepared to open our market to the competitively produced goods of the people with whom we wish to trade.

I was taught in college—unfortunately too long ago—that that is a fundamental principle of the development of the economy of the world and of good political relationships in the world. What a man like Richard Nixon once wrote—bless his heart, in a different context—in the New York Times was a policy of trade through détente and détente through trade; that ultimately when we built the multilateral trading relationships that this kind of a motion is about and would oppose, we are doing more than simply trading goods. We are indeed finding ways to talk through trade, to try to say to people who have environmental problems, please do something about it and people who have labour problems and standards problems, please we want to help you fix it.

Let me say it to the hon. member this way. If he will not accept the advantages or he does not accept the virtues of a free trade relationship with Mexico, who does he accept it with? In other words, the New Democratic Party said we could not have a relationship with the United States because it is bigger, tougher, better and stronger. Well, we cannot have it with Mexico because it is poorer and weaker. Who can we have it with in the mind of the New Democratic Party? It has yet to say one country that it would negotiate any form of trading relationship with.

Is it India? Is it the countries of the Third World which ultimately need the support of the north, says the New Democratic Party and say some members of my party? The best way we can help those countries expand and develop their economies, have the resources with which to upgrade the standards, and get rid of things like child labour in India, is to be able to sell more goods to the industrialized world. Or is it the case that members of the New Democratic Party are so isolationist, so protectionist, so hidebound in the thinking of the fifties, and so devoted to their relationship with big labour, that what they want to say is: "We will help Indian and Mexico and the countries of the Third World by sending them grants, aid and NGO support, but we will continue not to have free trading relationships with them until they get up to our moral standard".

If that is what the NDP is saying, then I say shame on it, because that is an extraordinary thing to be saying to the people it claims, externally from this country, to want to help. Surely it ought to know that the best way we can produce assistance to those that we want to help and to our own selves is to recognize that what built the quality of this nation was its capacity to pay for its goods, its services and its government programs on the basis that we have always been an extroverted, outward looking trading nation. That is where we got the wealth to pay for this place and the places like this and everything that comes from it. That is what those countries want to do.

I say to the hon. member, even if he were right that the GATT was the process that was going to work, why is it that it is wrong to do bilaterally what you are trying to do multilaterally? Is it not better and is it not smarter to recognize that we are encouraging the process of international liberalization by trade liberalization. That message somehow seems to have been lost.

Instead we get quite strange suggestions. Mexico's labour policies are not good enough. It has environmental problems. All true. The dispute settlement mechanism, according to the previous member, is not producing any good results. My gosh, say that to the people who just won the pork dispute.

Mr. Butland: They didn't win it yet.

Mr. Bosley: Oh, yes they did, in their minds. The hon. member's issue is dead simple.

Mr. Butland: There is still one leg left.

Mr. Bosley: The hon. member would simply have us sit back here, sit behind protectionist walls and in that way we would not have any trade disputes, would we, because we would not be trading with anybody.

He then quotes somebody concerned about moving a plant to Mexico in June 1989 and blames that on the Canada–Mexico free trade negotiations, which have not begun. It is a little tricky to make the leap of logic. There is nothing that the member will not do. He talks about the change in the social costs that Mr. Cardenas talked about. Absolutely right. If you read Mr. Cardenas carefully, what he says is we need economic integration with the rest of North America in order to find some way to do it. The hon. member is now saying: "But not this one".

I say to the hon. member, if he seriously believes that he wants environmental agreements parallel to this trading agreement and he wants labour mobility agreements parallel to this trading agreement and he wants workers' standards agreements parallel to this agreement, he wants the European model, say some members of this party, then ask for it.

If the NDP will stand up and say it is for a common market, then I will say to them, good, I agree with you. I am saying it. I want it. But the NDP whenever asked have said: "We don't want that either". So what does the NDP want? It wants only to say no.

Well, that is not good enough. There is ultimately a way that we can help ourselves and help others, and that is by recognizing that the long-term solution is in economics. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca loves to talk about something called sovereign economies. There is no such thing. Capital, money, those things move beyond and around borders. You cannot protect yourself into economic development. It is not possible to do it. All that happens is that your competitors liberalize because they realize it is to their advantage and they pass you by. We are now happily a member of the G–7 because of our current status and our current standing in economic terms.

It is not going to be very long from now where, because we are—for reasons they may not recognize, and it is not the free trade agreement but other factors such as the policies that have been adopted, particularly by provincial governments, in the last little while. I tremble to think what is going to happen in my province when the new budget comes down from the hon. member's party. The deficit is projected to be $10 billion in Ontario and I tremble to think what is going to happen, because of the policies that are driving businesses out of Ontario. It is not the free trade agreement as the hon. member will find if he asks anyone who is leaving.

Those policies of simply spending faster than we have income to tax, putting all the load on business at a time when business is trying to get out of the slump, all of that is not going to do anything but cause damage.

Hon. members like to quote figures about the free trade agreement or somehow claim that we made claims that there would be a massive economic development as a result of the free trade agreement. I remember the debate and specifically the information we handed out in the election. It said, if you go back and look at it, there would be 125,000 new jobs over 10 years. I remember that statement. That is what it said. I remember making the speeches. In fact the hon. member will remember, but he is now going around handing out quotes—as all members do—from what the CLC says on job losses as a result of the free trade agreement, or says: "What happened to the Informetrica study", or "What happened to the de Grandpré report".

What the de Grandpré report said and what Informetrica said is that it is awfully difficult, and I accept it both ways, to tell whether a job has been lost or gained because of the free trade agreement or some other effect.

People—sensible folks—say they cannot tell whether the plant in their part of the world has just expanded because it has an advantage due to free trade, or the plant in the riding of the hon. member for Burlington has just expanded because of free trade. Whether that is a fact, it may be what they think is the case. It may not be the whole case.

Then, go to the economists and ask how these things are measured. They will say that normally they must be measured in quantum. So you will find something like this. Here is the report of the Canada West Foundation. If we had produced this the hon. members opposite would have said they do not trust it because the government has produced it or the Conservatives produced it, but somebody else produced it. What does it say? I quote: "Contrary to prevailing perception under FTA Canada has significantly expanded its exports of end products by a net increase of over $4 billion while imports or exports from the U.S. have declined by $600 million".

What does that mean? It means in economic terms that we are better off than we would have been had we not had the free trade agreement. No one in his right mind is going to deny that we have lost jobs in the last year or that there has not been a recession. It is there. It is a fact.

What the economists are saying when they do the analysis is if we had not had the free trade agreement, and this will come as a great shock to the hon. member, we would have had an even greater loss of jobs. That is exactly what the economists are saying. They are saying that measuring the impact of the free trade agreement separate from its context, to say just what the free trade agreement has done, and that can only be measured in terms of relative exports and imports, what has happened is that we have improved our case in North America on the export-import side.

Is that a piece of evidence that should matter to the hon. member? It should if we go back to the premise that we started with, that because we are a trading nation, because we are so dependent upon trade, the long-term financial well-being of this country is dependent upon not only increasing trade but increasing trade in end product.

We cannot, and I am sure the hon. member would agree, go on forever basing our wealth and our standard of living on exporting resources. That is not something we want to do. Nor can we have any confidence in our future if we want to rely on low tech manufacturing.

Whether the hon. member likes it or not, what was going on before any of these agreements were signed was that people were taking some of the companies out of this country to places where the same product could be made in world terms or in global market terms, competitively. Not having an agreement is not going to change that. That is going to exist. It is, therefore, a government's responsibility, a policy-maker's responsibility, to say: "How can we try to get access to the new markets that are going to be created, with new wealth and new incomes, where those jobs are going to be and those products are going to be made?"

In other words, are we better off recognizing that having a free trading relationship with more countries—and I am fully happy to say to the member, not just Mexico, but hopefully the Central American countries and the whole hemisphere, if we are successful—to have tariff-free trading relationships, barrier-free trading relationships, with those countries, recognizing that that they do have low wages with which to try and do things for the moment.

We are better off, if we build the relationships that allow us to sell what we know to them, which is going to be higher technologies, communications, value added commercial technologies, that they can use, on top of what they have got. In other words, it is this simple.

The hon. member says he wants to focus his energies on making the Canadian pie closed. He wants no one to be able to sell against his constituents, in competition with people who work in his riding, until he is satisfied that their labour practises or their environmental practises are good enough. The consequence of that is, when that gets around, people will start to say you cannot sell to us if we cannot sell to you. That is what free trading relationships mean.

Canada is one of the countries that until recently, vis-à-vis its main competitor, the United States, had higher tariffs, not lower ones. What will happen when that is perceived is that we will lose market share, we will lose the capacity to sell. Or, the other way to say it to him is, as there are more auto parts manufacturers and plants and Maquiladora expands its process in Mexico and goes further, it will be tougher for Canadians to make products here and sell them into the U.S. because there will be Mexican competition for that export market, not for the domestic market here. That is not the threat. We want to get access to the success that is going to happen in Mexico in order to be able to sell a product, in order to be able to do business in a growing pie.

That is the reason for free trading relationships. There is no other way get access to the new economies and the new wealth that is coming.

Yes, there are adjustments that have to be made to face that. As we get out of the recession, hopefully there will be more money for more training and more re-training, and we can persuade business to do more of that. All of those things are true.

It is simply illogical, and certainly fundamentally unsound economics, to think that a country that depends for a third of its standard of living on trade can have any other policy than trade expansionism and trade liberalization.

I say to people on the other side whom I know with the best intentions in the world are focused on those who may be negatively effected, dislocated, fired, or lose their jobs, that is important, but it is not the big picture.

The big picture, if those people are going to lose their jobs because they are uncompetitive, if I am going to lose my job because I am uncompetitive in political terms—and maybe that is what is going to happen—then that is going to happen. You are not going to stop that job loss by not having a free trading agreement.

Mr. Bellemare: What about unfair competition?

Mr. Bosley: Someone shouted out "what about unfair competition?" What you do with a free trading agreement or with GATT solutions, if we can get them into this kind of an agreement, is build into it, as we have, the right to use the disputes settlement mechanism to deal with questions of unfair trading practises, and make sure that you have the right to challenge laws that are passed in your competitor's country to protect unfair trading practises.

• (1430)

Mr. Bellemare: Who are the arbiters?

Mr. Bosley: The arbiters are the bi-national panels that are composed between the countries. Members want to say it cannot be done. It is being done. The free trade agreement, contrary to what members opposite think, is producing net jobs in this country and is producing dispute settlements that are so much faster and so much better that our business community has never seen anything like it. That is exactly what they will tell you.

Finally, that is the wave of the future. You can ride it or you can close your eyes to it, which is what I suggest all members opposite are doing.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I would just like to make a couple of comments to the member across the floor.

I had a discussion as recently as this morning with a major food processor in the province of Ontario who stated that the food processing industry in Ontario is haemorrhaging. It is past bleeding, it is haemorrhaging. The product that is being offered here—yes it is being offered here—is being delivered here at a lower cost. I know my colleague's answer back will be "we must be competitive".

My question is, what do you say to these producers of food products out there? What are they going to do? What protection are we, as a Parliament in Ottawa, going to give them? What answers are we going to give to them? What do we give to them as a suggestion or offer of what they do to make a livelihood down the road? What are we going to say to them? The government offered training programs after the last free trade agreement which it has not delivered. Where are they? What are we going to say to these people?

The member's comments a minute ago were: "Oh, yes, you have lost your job because you are non-competitive." Are you just going to say to these people: "I'm sorry"? Are you suggesting that they move south of the border or move to Mexico and work there? What are we going to do with them?

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, there is now something over $3 billion in the pot for training programs. That is why we did it.

What the hon. member likes to forget is that when we attempted to move some funds from the unemployment insurance fund into the training side of the ledger so that it could be used for other things—ah, the hon. members do not go back on that, in other words, when they opposed more money for training. They now like to say "where is the money for training".

The hon. member is fully capable of reading the de Grandpré report which we commissioned, at great expense, to say if we need any specific new programs to deal with the free trade adjustment process. The hon. member knows full well what it said. It said you cannot make the distinction, therefore you cannot, in fairness, say that a person who loses his job for technological change or a person who loses his job because of the free trade agreement has a right to be treated any differently in fact or in law. If we did it, the hon. member would be the first to say: "You have no right to make such a discriminatory practice in the spending of money to assist someone who has lost his or her job".

What the government promised was for the de Grandpré commission to tell us if we needed new adjustment programs on top of the existing system. The de Grandpré commission said: "You do not. You have got the guts of a good system for everybody who loses their jobs and you need to work with that." So, that is what we did.

In other words, the hon. member is right, people who are in industries where retraining is needed have every right to come to the provincial and federal governments and say: "What can you do to help us". We have obligations to help and we believe we are meeting them.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I have so many reactions to the hon. member's speech I am not sure where to start, so they will be random comments.

Anybody who would quote Richard Nixon and Diane Francis in the same paragraph is really reaching for people to endorse what they believe in, because that is apparently the opposite end of the spectrums or the opposite end of walks of life. But, whatever, when you are desperate you will quote just about anybody.

The member talked about us being illogical. I have been on a few committees with this gentleman as the chairman. I think he is a very reasonable man, but the problem is that the government has these ideological blinders on and it cannot react in any other way.

The only thing that I can absolutely and positively refute is his indication that the dispute panels are very successful. They fast track the decisions.

He cited the pork ruling. Of course, we have not finished with the pork ruling yet. The Americans had one last kick at it. They said: "There is some sort of extraordinary appeal that we can make." They have not given up. When they lose, we lose.

The panel dispute mechanism is not working, and I am sure the member knows that.

Mr. Bosley: It is working.

Mr. Butland: It is not working.

As far as the New Democrats being protectionists and isolationists, we suggest that we go out there and negotiate deals from our strength. We should be the initiators, and not tie ourselves to the Americans. We are tied in with them, and we are losing.

They are going to grab our hand and say: "Let's go over here. We know what is good for you." Ask the people again. They know what is good for them. They say: "No. We will not accept what you did negotiate, and we are not prepared to accept what you are going to negotiate for us because we have lost control of our destiny." I know you do not want to hear it, Madam Speaker, but we are losing control of our sovereignty.

Canadians believe that because they see it happening each and every day. The member says: "We did not say this. We said this." I guess there was a varied story during the campaign because I know in my riding the member indicated to me that there were going to be thousands of jobs created in my riding, let alone across Canada.

The bottom line is we are suffering. We are in a recession. If it is not totally related to free trade, certainly the high Canadian dollar and interest rates going along with free trade are part and parcel of the Canadian problem.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, yes, there is a great gulf between the member and myself.

He cannot find a single economist and analyst of what has happened in the last 18 months who does not say that the free trade agreement has restrained the negative effect of the recession on this country. Every independent analysis says that.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bosley: The hon. member laughs. The same folks who say that health care is not being funded because of free trade say that every single job loss is because of free trade.

I say to them that it is factually untrue. Everybody who is in the world of analysis of this stuff knows it. The reason some Canadians are afraid of the free trade agreement is that members opposite keep telling them what is, in my view, factually untrue. They are saying that it is the free trade agreement that is causing the job losses.

It is not the free trade agreement that is causing the job losses. If there is a recession going on in the country because your spending policy is particularly provincial or too high and if you have governments spending beyond their means in this country and you drive interest rates up to the point where they are higher than they should be—

Mr. Butland: Check your 1988 election promises.

Mr. Bosley: Here they go. Here they go, again. Madam Speaker, you can't tell a socialist anything anymore in this House.

Mr. Butland: Sure you can.

Mr. Bosley: No, I can't. There is no point. When a wall is made of concrete, that is what it is made of.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to be able to participate in a debate on Mexico-U.S.-Canada free trade.

This is clearly an issue that, like the free trade debate we were through two years ago with respect to the U.S. agreement, will be of considerable importance over the next period of time as we watch the government embark on these very important negotiations.

I am also happy to be part of a party that has come up with a very sensible forward-looking policy on free trade that acknowledges the existence of a situation that we fought valiantly against throughout the election.

Mr. Butland: Valiantly?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie is getting overwrought. He thinks our policy changes week by week, but in fact as he will discover in the documents I am about to quote our policy has been consistent in this matter for many months now, certainly for more than a month. The quotation I am about to get is very up-to-date and very sensible. I will come to that in a minute, if he can control himself.

• (1440)

I want to deal first with the comments that were made on the motion of the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca that we are debating today. After all, he is the one who started the debate and moved the motion that condemns the Canadian government's involvement in these discussions. I can understand why.

The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, in a vigorous speech this morning, went on at considerable length.

Mr. Butland: An excellent speech.

Mr. Milliken: I would not say that it was excellent but he certainly got going, talking about how the Liberal Party had lost the voice when the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra left as leader of this party. After all, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra led the fight against the U.S.—Canada Free Trade Agreement in the 1988 election campaign, and extremely well he did too.

The amazing thing was that the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca tried to pretend that the Liberal Party had lost its direction since the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra left the leadership. I want to assure the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca that is simply not so. Of all the people to complain about it, he should be among the last. With great respect, anyone from the New Democratic Party should be the last to complain about a lack of direction in the Liberal Party with respect to free trade, because it was the members of the New Democratic Party, particularly their former leader, honest Ed Broadbent, who attacked the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra throughout the campaign. He questioned his credibility, accused him of being dishonest with the people of Canada, accused him of not being true to his view that the free trade agreement was bad for Canada.

I can remember Mr. Broadbent accusing the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra of changing his mind when he took office. He said: "When the Liberals take office they will pretend they never made a promise to tear up the free trade deal. He does not really mean it". That is what the leader of the New Democratic Party said, and the leader of the New Democratic Party joined ranks with his friend the Prime Minister of Canada and attacked the integrity of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra in a way that can only be described as despicable. It was a shocking disgrace.

If there is any evidence lacking of that little pact between the Prime Minister and Mr. Broadbent, we can only look at Mr. Broadbent's nose in the trough today, at the job he has been given by the Prime Minister, his $120,000 a year salary and the concomitant pension. He is doing very well, thank you.

I think it is one of the most disgraceful political episodes we have had in this country, when the Prime Minister and the former leader of the New Democratic Party joined ranks and attacked the member for Vancouver Quadra and said that what he said was not true. They attacked his credibility throughout the election campaign and undermined it. In the result they were successful in keeping their own fortunes high enough to ensure a defeat of the Liberal Party at the polls and the victory of a government that was pledged to bring the free trade agreement into effect, and that is exactly what they did.

Hon. members on my left sat here in the House with me in December 1988, voting against this agreement, knowing that their leader had helped to undermine the credibility of the principal champion of the fight against free trade, namely the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, and assuring a Conservative victory that brought us this dreadful agreement that has cost Canadians so many jobs, as we heard this morning.

For the hon. member from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca to stand here and rant and rave as he did about Liberal hypocrisy was just a bit much. It is a shame he is not here to defend himself on these outrageous comments, because really it was an absolutely shocking performance.

An hon. member: It is a shame that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra is not here.

Mr. Milliken: It is too bad the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra is not here, or he would have things to say on this particular debate as well.

An hon. member: I will bet he could.

Mr. Milliken: I want to turn to the Minister for International Trade who got up and huffed and puffed about the comments made by the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. To describe his speech as a lot of huff and puff is perhaps kind and probably the only thing one could say about it. As the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie pointed out, it was long on humour but short on facts.

In listening to the minister, one has to wonder exactly what it is he is proposing to do in these talks with Mexico and the United States concerning free trade. That is the concern we in this party have about the whole approach the government is taking to this agreement.

What is its approach? We have never been told. We certainly got no enlightenment this morning from the Minister for International Trade who participated in the debate. One would have thought that instead of reading from Maclean's magazine, Royal Bank projections and economic reports, he might have got down to some facts and told us what the government's position is in these negotiations. We did not get any of that at all.

The minister quoted Diane Francis as though she was some expert who knew everything about the effects of the old free trade agreement. He told us nothing about Canada's proposals in this new round of negotiations in which we are about to take part.

I must say that Diane Francis may be an expert. I do not know her qualifications in this field, but when I read her articles I have doubts that she knows what she is talking about on the subject of free trade. She seems to think that none of the job losses that have occurred in Canada over the last two years are the result of free trade. Yet the Prime Minister himself throughout the election campaign in 1988 assured us that once this deal was approved there were going to be hundreds of thousands of jobs created for Canadians; it was going to become a period of uninterrupted prosperity and increasing wealth for Canadians.

We all know that we are now in the worst recession we have had in the last decade, since the early 1980s. We know unemployment has gone to its highest level since the government took office in 1984. We know that interest rates have gone way back up and recently down because of the government's ham-fisted policies of mucking up the Canadian economy. Hundreds of thousands of jobs have been lost, not created. We have unemployment of 1.4 million people in Canada today.

All this, we are told, is not the fault of the free trade agreement. This is just a recession or something that is apparently caused by external forces, according to the government. Of course we know differently. We know that the government's policies have caused this recession: the high interest rate policy, the tight money policy, the overspending policy of the government in its management of the fiscal affairs of the country. I could go on and on.

The government itself has to accept responsibility for the economic mess we are in, yet it does not want to blame it on the free trade agreement. It has at least managed to avoid that because it would be so contradictory to what it was saying throughout the campaign in 1988.

I cannot help but believe that many of the jobs are lost as a result of the free trade deal. I can point to examples in my own riding of factories that have closed down and moved to the United States.

Hon. members can say it was not because of the free trade deal. That is what we always hear from the minister and people like the hon. member for Don Valley West. They say that there is no evidence that ties it to the free trade deal. I have evidence. When the president of the company says that with free trade there is no advantage to staying in Canada and that he is closing down and moving south, and moves, and all the people are laid off, what more evidence do we need?

Hon. members opposite persist in denying that there is any evidence that free trade has hurt Canada. I say that there is evidence that it has hurt Canada. There is very little evidence that it has helped Canada. Their own policies may be solely responsible for the recession, but they are not admitting that. So what else is responsible? I suggest the free trade agreement has not brought the promised bonanza to Canada but in fact has helped make this recession worse.

It was obvious to everyone when the deal was negotiated that there would be certain businesses and industries that would close down in Canada as a result of free trade. Those are closing lock, stock and barrel, and we are losing jobs in Canada as a direct result of this agreement.

Unfortunately the minister will not stand up and admit that fact in the House. He will not give us figures, and his department does not even prepare them. They do not even look at the facts and attempt to give Canadians a fair, balanced and honest picture of what this deal has done for this country.

Surely before we embark on another round of negotiations with someone else, we should have some figures on this, some authoritative figures, not Diane Francis' quotations in Maclean's magazine. Let us get some facts on it. I would ask the minister to produce some hard figures from myriad experts he has working in his department who now probably are being pulled off this kind of work to deal with the situation, with the Mexico talks.

I would like to quote an authority on this. I refer to a member of this House, a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, the member for Etobicoke North, who is well-known for his extensive views and writing on free trade. I have some words from him now. He expresses the fear—

• (1450)

Mr. Karpoff: He is well-known for supporting the GST.

Mr. Sobeski: He supported the GST.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member wants me to speak about the birds and the bees. I am sticking to the Mexico—Canada free trade agreement.

An hon. member: We want something different.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member is a well-known authority. He has expressed his concern about the government's ability to negotiate for this country, a concern that many of us have felt for years. We have the record of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, which was so badly bungled by the government. Then we have the record of Meech Lake, which was botched and botched again by this government. It is understandable that Canadians are nervous when they hear that this government is going to go out and negotiate another deal.

Mr. Mifflin: To say the least.

Mr. Milliken: "To say the least", as my hon. colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception says.

The hon. member for Etobicoke North, who is the trade critic for this party, expressed his grave concern as follows:

> —the same government that so mishandled United States—Canada free trade is now embarking on the negotiation of free trade among the United States, Canada and Mexico. Canadians have no > confidence in the Mulroney Government's ability to protect Canadian interests given its failure to promote Canada's interests during the United States—Canada free trade negotiations.

Truer words were never spoken.

I go on to quote the hon. member:

> The lesson that Canadians learned from those negotiations is that the Government's promises of adjustment assistance are empty promises. Nor has this Government instituted the necessary educational and retraining programs to assist Canadians to be more competitive. Worse still, its high interest rate, high dollar monetary policy has crippled Canadian business in the face of increased competition from the United States.

Those are words that I suggest are far more relevant to the debate today than the quotations from Diane Francis in Maclean's magazine the minister cited in support of his arguments. I urge the minister to read the hon. member for Etobicoke North's statements on this subject. I could go on quoting him at great length, but he is not the only one who is concerned about the government's ability to negotiate.

Let me read from one of the supporters of free trade who has given us the benefit of his views. It is reported in today's edition of Le Devoir.

[Translation]

The article is in French and reports what the vice-president of Samson, Bélair, Deloitte and Touche International had to say. The vice-president of the firm, Mr. Pierre S. Pettigrew, indicated his concern about the ability of this government to negotiate an agreement with Mexico. This is what the author of the article, Michel Van de Walle of Canadian Press, reported, and I quote:

> A supporter of free trade, Mr. Pettigrew was very critical of the way the Mulroney government conducted negotiations with the United States. He said that negotiations were very unsatisfactory in the furniture sector, for instance. Canada had agreed to reduce its tariffs at the same rate as the Americans. That was crazy. Our tariffs were twice as high as the U.S. tariffs. This meant that we had to reduce a tariff of 16 per cent over five years, while the U.S. tariff was 5 per cent to start with. It shows a total lack of respect for our industry.

[English]

Canadians from every walk of life, supporters or not of the free trade agreement, are concerned about this government's ability to negotiate a fair and reasonable agreement that protects Canada's interests. Yet the government has indicated that it is marching off to negotiate this deal.

We in the Liberal Party are very concerned that we are not getting from the government a clear statement of its intentions. We call on the government today, under the guise of this motion moved by the member of the New Democratic Party, to come clean and tell Canadians what goals we can expect from these talks. What are the national objectives we should have in going into these discussions? What benefits does the government see as coming from these talks for Canadians? Are Canadians supportive of the government initiative in participation in the talks?

Surely we cannot decide whether it is a good thing or a bad thing for Canada unless we have some statement from the government of what we expect to get. There has been no statement forthcoming. We are simply told free trade is good, that the freer trade is the better off we are all going to be.

Canadians do not swallow that line. They should not have to swallow it. They should be given some facts and figures to back this up. We should be told, for example, what things we are likely to be able to purchase from Mexico at a lower rate after the agreement than what we can purchase today.

We should be told by our government what kinds of things we can reasonably expect to export to Mexico if its tariff barriers come down. Yet not a scintilla of evidence has been put before this House to give us some indication of what benefits or otherwise might result from a free trade agreement with that country.

Mr. Mifflin: It is because they don't know.

Mr. Milliken: It may be because they don't know. If they don't know, surely they should find out before they start participating.

Mr. Mifflin: It didn't stop them before.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception says it did not stop them before. He is quite right. They got into the talks with the United States as a means of finding some way out of the fact that they had done nothing in this country for four years in government and needed something to go the electorate with in 1988.

Mr. Dorin: What was the result?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest asks: "What was the result?" As I said at the outset of my remarks, had he been paying close attention, the result would have been different had the efforts of the member for Vancouver Quadra not been so effectively undermined by the then leader of the New Democratic Party.

The second objective the Liberal Party promotes is that we should be seeking multilateral trading relations with other countries to get us out of the very unsatisfactory bilateral trade relations that we have with the United States at this time.

Third, we believe that we should negotiate an agreement that could be extended to include other countries in the western hemisphere and possibly in Europe and on the Pacific Rim.

As a party we have always supported the concept of free trade. What we have not supported is the particular deal that this government produced which—and I do not want to go into all that again—included much more than free trade. It covered far more than trade. It included a sale of Canada's resources and the restructuring of Canada's economy to one of dependence.

Fourth, we would ask the government to outline adjustment programs for Canadian labour and for Canadian industry that will be put in place before the agreement comes into force. We were promised, during the 1988 election campaign, adjustment programs for Canadian workers and for Canadian industry after the free trade agreement became law. There have been no adjustment programs. In fact, as we have said for months in the House, there have been cuts in what programs there were in place before that might have served as adjustment programs.

There have been no new ones created. In fact the government has completely failed in delivering on that promise. It has broken its to Canadians and it has done worse than that, it has cut back on the programs that were in existence.

Fifth and finally, we would ask for some guarantee from the government that Canada's social, cultural and regional development programs will remain in place following this deal. No such undertaking was given in respect of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. We have watched this government slash and cut away at those things in Canada.

We do not have the protection in place as a result of that agreement for Canadian cultural industries that we feel are important. We hope that in considering the negotiations today we will have those programs put in place so that when the new agreement, if any, is worked out with Mexico and the United States we will have protection for Canada's cultural industries.

Those are the points that we as a party are putting forward. We believe they are positive. We believe Canada should be involved in these talks. We support that part of the initiative. However we ask that these safeguards be put in place so that Canadians are not pillaged by their government the way they were in 1988.

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint–Jean): Madam Speaker, at the beginning of his speech, the hon. member said that he could not judge the expertise of Diane Francis, but I simply would like to read a short paragraph from the article. Ms. Francis said: "The facts show that Canada has prospered under free trade. For the month in which free trade came into force, January 1989, Statistics Canada reported 12,436,000 jobs in this country. In November, November 1990, the most recent date for which figures are available, there were 12,497,000 jobs, a net gain of 63,000 jobs in this country".

In another paragraph she mentioned: "Free trade has been and still is a good economic policy". Perhaps, but her reasoning is as follows: "Because it ensures access to the best markets in the world and forces Canada to become more efficient".

Madam Speaker, although the hon. member says he doesn't know Ms. Francis, I would like to hear his response to this: Between December 1989, when free trade came into force, until November 1, 1990, a net surplus of 63,000 jobs was created in this country. Although I hope he will not confuse a recession with a free trade agreement that gives us access to the best markets in the world, I would like to hear the hon. member's response, to be able to judge his comments on what Ms. Francis said.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, it isn't easy to answer the hon. member's question as stated, because he quoted figures indicating the number of Canadians on the labour market for two months only: January 1989 and November 1990. The problem is this: During that period, people immigrated to Canada. We admitted more than 250,000 people from other countries during that period. The hon. member referred to an increase of 60,000 in the number of people with jobs. Sixty thousand is not much, considering that 250,000 new arrivals came to this country. It is not the same thing. According to the Prime Minister, free trade was supposed to create several thousand jobs, 125,000 jobs in this country. Where are those jobs? And what does 63,000 represent? It is not enough, and I am sure the hon. member will agree.

I have another quote, Madam Speaker, by my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke North, which might be of interest to the hon. member for Saint-Jean. He said, and I quote:

> The Mulroney government allows the priorities of Mexico and the United States to take precedence. That is not the position Canada should have taken. We should have aimed at a global and multilateral expansion of our economy in the western hemisphere, instead of a slow trickle.

That is a very important point. I hope the hon. member for Saint-Jean will be able to inform the Tory caucus of the excellent ideas put forward by the hon. member for Etobicoke North.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): I listened to the member for Kingston and the Islands very carefully, and a lot of what he said today kind of re-fought the last election campaign. He indicated that the party he represents in this House was the major opposition to the trade deal with the United States.

It seems to me that what we are hearing today from the Liberal members in this House is that they are speaking on both sides of this issue. It is getting increasingly difficult to make any sense out of what they are saying.

I want to ask the member if he would give us a straightforward answer on just exactly where his party stands today on the trade deal with the United States, on an expanded trade deal including Mexico and the conditions in Mexico, which he seems to be somewhat aware of.

He talked about the previous leader of his party and that it was the fight of his life for the member from Vancouver Quadra. I want the member to understand that the fight is still going on. Many of us are still fighting the fight of someone else's life, and I wonder where the member from Vancouver Quadra is on this issue and why is he not continuing the fight of his life.

Mr. Milliken: Why the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby would ask me what the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra is saying or what he thinks on this issue is beyond me. I have not asked him. I would have thought that as a near neighbour she might pop into Vancouver one of these days and ask him herself.

I can tell the hon. member though, that if she has any trouble believing my facts with respect to the election campaign—and she seems to be a little incredulous—I urge her to read Rick Salutin's book. I have been reading it now for some weeks. He is not a particular supporter of this party. I read it at bedtime and I find it a very fine thing to help me get to sleep.

The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby might profit from reading this book. It certainly describes the woefully inadequate attitude of her party and its leadership in the fight against free trade during the 1988 election campaign, and their attempts to discredit the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, whose view she is so interested in today.

I urge her to write to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra if she wishes to have the benefit of his opinions, and get them.

Now let me turn to the second part of her question because she seemed not to understand the Liberal position. I thought she was listening to my speech and I am sure she listened to the speech of the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk, who made an excellent presentation and presented the views of this party with clarity and precision.

I tried to be equally clear. I said during my speech that we support the government's initiative in participating in these talks because we recognize that Canada cannot afford to let this government—or, frankly, I would prefer this government were not doing the talks because we realize the risks there are in having it do it—but, unfortunately, it is the Government of Canada so somebody has to be at that negotiating table. We should not leave this to the United States and to Mexico to do on their own; we need to be involved in the talks.

I have just given a five-point outline of things we believe this government should do before it gets involved. That is, come forward with the pros and the cons; tell Canadians the advantages and disadvantages of free trade with Mexico; tell us about its objectives in going into these discussions; guarantee the protection of Canada's social programs; outline comprehensive adjustment programs for Canadian labour and industry before we get the agreement into force, and tell us what those are going to be in advance; and, finally, negotiate an agreement that will allow more countries than the three of us to be involved in a free trade economic zone.

Those are the objectives I believe the government should pursue in this matter. That is the position of this party. I think it is perfectly clear. I hope the hon. member does not need me to put it in writing. If so, I will underline the relevant portions of my speech in Hansard on Monday and send it to her.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, on February 5 the Prime Minister, along with Presidents Bush and Salinas, made an historic announcement, that our three countries would negotiate a North American free trade agreement.

This announcement set in train a process that will help to build and enrich our three countries.

• (1510)

It is not a perfect agreement, but an excellent agreement and one that is working to the mutual benefit of both Canada and the United States. As its benefits become clear to Canadians, it will be seen by all sides to be a far-sighted agreement.

February 5 is a particularly important day to me. It is my birthday, so having an analysis on that day means something special to me, especially at my advanced age.

I want to try to take a little different tack on this debate because it is back and forth—you said this and I said that, who said something in the election? I want to put another slant on it, if I can.

The Gross National Product of United States of America is $5 trillion. That is double the Gross National Product of Japan and 25 per cent of the Gross National Product of the developed world.

What we have done with the free trade agreement is open a $5 trillion market to Canadian business. Over a period of 10 years, it will become tariff free.

It is all very well for academics and others who have never had a callus on their hands to stand in this place and debate matters of trade, international affairs and so forth, but I do not know if any of them have really operated a business or been responsible for the development or expansion of a business, or had to go out of the country to find customers because of our small population.

We have some excellent industries in Canada, and some of them have developed some substantial markets overseas. I notice that Mexico is our second largest customer for steel. We ship steel bar into Mexico. Mexico makes it into springs and ship it back into Brampton where we make automobiles. We sell the bulk of the tin plate that is used in the canning industry in Mexico, so we have a stake in that market already.

Aside from that, the argument here today seems to revolve around numbers. Who are the winners? Who are the losers? The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands looks upon the free trade agreement as some sort of balance. We did not gain any jobs, all we have done is lose jobs. He speaks of the jobs that have gone out of his constituency.

It is important to realize that this agreement is two years old. There are adjustments going on, and I will give you a perfect example.

A gentleman who happened to be the president of Toledo Scales called my office one morning and he said: "I have good news and bad news." I said: "Give me the bad news first, and I can end up with the good news." He said: "I have a plant in Windsor that we opened in 1890. We make scales, and I am going to close that plant down."

I said: "What is the good news?" He said: "I have more bad news," and I said: "What is that?" He said: "I have a head office in Mississauga, and I am going to close that down." I asked him whether there could be any good news after that. He said: "Oh yes, we are going to open a state of the art plant in Burlington,"—my constituency—"where we will combine our manufacturing and our head office in one operation. We will be world competitive. We will even be able to compete with the Japanese."

That is the type of adjustment that is going on in this country, and people do not realize it. When you sign a free trade agreement, you cannot turn things around that fast. People have to make decisions. Humans are involved.

In the case of Toledo Scales, it looked at the age of the people involved in the industry and said: "The bulk of them went on retirement." They had been there for years. It was one of those kinds of companies.

The person running an industry look at himself and asks: "What am I going to do? Am I going to stay in the domestic market? Am I going to stay in the Canadian market? Am I going to find a niche in the American market? Am I going to go North American? Am I going to go global?" Those are the decisions that a businessman has to make.

Depending on what decision he makes, he says: "I need more capital. I need more plant space. I need some more productive machinery," or, "I am going to sell this business because I am at an age when I do not want to go into the expansionist phase."

Those are decisions he has to make. The only connection to free trade is that the government has opened up this tremendous $5 trillion market and the man has an option he never had before. He has to decide just where he is going to go and how he is going to do it.

In Windsor, Dofasco, NKK of Japan, National Steel of the United States have put together a new plant to galvanize sheet steel on one side and supply it to the stamping industry that feeds the automobile industry. In other words, the galvanizing is to eliminate the rusting out of automobiles. That is being put together right now. The factory is being built and the machinery will be coming in. It is going to hire about 1,000 people. The 300 odd people left Toledo Scale, and now there will be 1,000 in place of 300, so it balances out that way.

I will give hon. members some investment dollar figures so they will get an idea.

I mentioned that DND Galvanizing has chosen Windsor as its location, that is the Dofasco, NKK, National Steel $240 million rolling mill. And as I said, they will be doing the galvanizing operation and selling the product to the automotive industry.

Polysar Rubber Corporation, recently acquired by the German firm Bayer AG, plans to invest about $120 million over the next three years and spend $15 million on R and D in Canada per year.

B.F. Goodrich Canada Inc. will double its PVC polymerization capacity at its Niagara Falls plant, providing an example of recent rationalization for the North American market.

Inco plans to spend $287 million in Thompson to develop a new mine and to expand an existing one, involving 100 construction jobs and 100 other new jobs in the area.

Kruger will invest $115 million in a de-inking plant at its Bromptonville, Quebec newsprint mill to source at least half the old newspaper plant in Quebec.

Pound-Maker Ethanol Canadian Ltd. will invest $12.7 million to establish a 10 million litre per year fuel-grade ethanol plant in Lanigan, Saskatchewan, which will be Canada's first integrated ethanol and feedmill capacity.

Shell, Husky and several other firms will construct a $825 million natural gas, sulphur and chemical project in west central Alberta.

Canadian National Railways will spend $15 million to build 50, "five-pack" rail cars at its Transcona car shop. Each car has five platforms and can carry as many as 10 containers. This is to be used in cross-border trade.

Dominion Textile will spend $5.5 million to modernize its Magog, Quebec industrial fabrics plant.

Inglis was selected by its parent company Whirlpool to produce trash compactors for the North American market at its Cambridge, Ontario facility and has invested more than $3 million in production changes to accommodate the operation.

Norsk Hydro Canada will spend $7 million to build a plant to convert magnesium scrap into high-purity alloys at its Becancour, Quebec plant.

Northern Telecom is spending $6 million at its Lachine, Quebec plant to double the manufacturing area for telephone switches.

One of the concerns of the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was that he thought Taco Bell was going to take over Northern Telecom. I can tell him that is not going to happen.

California based Hughes Aircraft Company has acquired Ernst Leitz Limited of Midland, Ontario and will move the optical technology work currently done in Des Plaines, Illinois to Midland.

Harris Farinon Canada, a U.S. owned Dorval-based manufacturer of telecommunications equipment, has undertaken a $21 million research and development and expansion program based on an expanded world product mandate in microwave radio and fibre optic products. Bell Helicopter is spending over $50 million to develop and produce its fifth helicopter model in Mirabel, Quebec. Camco of Montreal, Canada's largest appliance maker has invested $45 million in its plant in the past two years and has increased its exports to the U.S. as the main supplier of dryers and dishwashers to its American parent. Amdahl Canada increased its R and D budget to develop a new software product for world-wide distribution.

It is staggering what has been done. Yet members stand here and say we are losing business. Businesses are leaving the country and going to the United States. H. H. Robertson, a leading North American producer of pre-engineered building systems, is investing $1 million to automate its Hamilton plant in order to increase North American competitiveness.

Let me just stop there and tell you something else about our steel industry that just developed within the last few days. Stelco, through its subsidiary Stel-Tek, and Dofasco, Hatch Associates and Ernst Young, formed a consortium called the Canadian Consortium. They competed against two British firms, a German firm, a French firm and an American firm to supply a project being financed by the World Bank to restructure the total steel industry of Poland. That is a tremendous feather in the cap and it says something about the expertise of the people in our steel industry. They were chosen above all the others because we have a technically advanced steel industry and our expertise, according to the World Bank and the Polish officials whom I spoke to, outperforms and are farther ahead than any of the other competitors. We have just recently been involved in that and saw that that one went through.

Formica of Canada Ltd., a maker of decorative laminates, is investing $2 million to upgrade its plant in St-Jean-Sur Richelieu, Quebec. GTE Sylvania announced the closing of a lighting fixture plant in the U.S. and the relocation of activity to a more efficient plant in Mississauga. Christie Brown and Co. has invested $90 million over the past three years and increased exports to its U.S. parent. Dupont Canada has authorized capital spending of $150 million in 1989 and $160 million in 1990, up 80 per cent from previous years and has doubled exports to the U.S. to $40 million. Dow Chemical has spent $800 million in a new ethylene-based petrochemical plant in Fort Saskatchewan, Alberta. Part of that decision was tariff reduction under the FTA.

Again, in my own constituency I have Voortman's Cookies. I hope everyone eats Voortman's Cookies. I will give them a free advertisement here. You can buy Voortman's Cookies right down to Florida now. They had purchased land in the United States. If the free trade agreement had not gone through, they were going to jump across the border, they had developed such an American business. The fact is they bought more land adjacent to their plant. They put an addition on there, bought additional machinery. They are now exporting 60 per cent of their production into the United States. They have now opened a plant in California because that is too far to ship cookies. It would arrive as flour when it got there.

This movement and adjustment in industry is going on and will continue to go on as markets develop, as products develop, as people see their way clear.

The investment in the pharmaceutical industry in Canada in the last few years, since we passed Bill C-22, is tremendous. The amount of R and D they are doing in this country increased. In spite of the week after week after week of hearing the NDP rise and say pharmaceutical products are going to go off the clock, that senior citizens are going to be dying because they could not get certain products, et cetera, and hearing petition after petition after petition, the reports show that pharmaceutical products have not risen as high as the inflation in the country. All you have to do is read the report from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Abbott Laboratories of Montreal announced in April of this year that it will invest $10 million to modernize its 44-year old manufacturing facilities. Xerox of Canada has expanded its toner manufacturing facility in Oakville and has made further investments in Toronto.

My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, and I were just informed the other day that Boeing of Seattle has just awarded a $500 million contract to a company in Oakville that will be making the landing gear for its new range of passenger-carrying aircraft. This is a half a billion dollar order to a little company in Oakville. We are picking up a little bit along the way.

Kodak of Canada announced that Canadian manufactured microfilm will be processed and converted before it is exported to the United States, adding 75 new jobs. Stelco is investing $60 million in a new pipe-making mill in Welland. Rolland Canada, Canada's second largest fine paper producer, is restructuring its manufacturing and distribution operations, including converting the Montreal mill to produce specialty industrial products.

Proctor and Gamble of Canada made a number of investments in its Canadian operations to take advantage of the FTA. I think the Minister for International Trade read more detail on that. It has now designated Canada as its source for a number of personal hygiene products for Canada.

Freightliner of Canada, a truck manufacturer, is planning to build a production facility near St. Thomas.

Those are just a few. There are more than going on every day.

When I talked about Freightliner, it caused me to stop for a moment because Freightliner is owned by Mercedes Benz, and that opens up another door of how the automotive industry is globalized.

Mack Truck is owned by Renault of France. General Motors no longer produces trucks on its own. It made a deal with Volvo and Volvo produces trucks and buses for General Motors. Volvo bought out White Motor Company. Ford Motor Company brings cars from Korea, Japan, Taiwan and Mexico. It brings in diesel trucks from Brazil, the 7000 series. Ford and Volkswagon have just got involved in a joint venture production in Brazil.

I mention these things to show how the automobile industry, as a typical example, is very globalized. General Motors produces automobiles and trucks and purchases some from Japan, Korea and Europe. Chrysler has cars made in Korea, Japan, Thailand and Mexico. It just goes on and on. That is the way trade is moving and developing as a result of GATT and the globalization of industries in general.

I am not disturbed about the Mexico–Canada–U.S. suggested trade link. To me, it is an opportunity for us to look at a larger market again. I think it would be foolish if we were not there.

I agree with my friend from Kingston and the Islands that it would be foolhardy for Canada to sit on the sidelines and allow a negotiation to go on between the Mexicans and the Americans involving trade and not be there to see what is going on.

I support the initiative announced on February 5, my birthday, by the Prime Minister, President Bush and President Salinas of Mexico. I believe it will be an historic event when this comes across.

• (1530)

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I would first like to commend the member of Parliament for Haldimand—Norfolk, who has been leading the response on behalf of the Liberal Party and the Liberal caucus in his capacity as a critic in the area of international trade.

I am also pleased to be given the opportunity to debate an opposition day motion put forward by the New Democratic Party, our friends to our left. I am wondering, however, how valuable it is to have a motion that basically fantasizes where the New Democratic Party would like the government to be. We can always get involved in a debate on whether the government should or should not take a seat at the trade talks between Mexico and the United States. However, I think they are a bit late on that, very similar to the last election, Madam Speaker, as you no doubt will recall as you were in the trenches fighting for your re-election. We recall the hesitation in which the New Democratic Party fought that particular campaign. Among the multitude of issues in that federal election obviously the one major issue that dominated all other issues was whether the Canadian government ought to pursue a free trade arrangement with the United States.

At the opening press conference the former Leader of the New Democratic Party did not even mention the two words "free trade". We all know what happened to the New Democratic Party during that campaign. Obviously we were not successful, as evidenced by where we are sitting, however let it be said that when we objected to the agreement that was signed between our two countries we said it loudly, forcefully, clearly, and we put it squarely to Canadians. It was not a case of: "Well, we are not sure, perhaps we will talk about child care as well, maybe we will talk about this or that."

The New Democratic Party, following the last election, had a post-mortem review and the party was found to be wanting in many of the New Democratic Party's natural constituencies.

We do not need a lecture on where the party stands or stood. I think Canadians were testimony to the type of temperament that the New Democratic Party lent to the free trade debate in 1988. Now it comes with an opposition day motion. Perhaps there is great intent, perhaps there is genuine intent, but there is a lot of academic intent as well. The debate should not be "should they or should they not be" because Canadians are expecting their politicians to be discussing not flights of fantasy but flights of reality.

Whether we like it or not this government has made the decision to place itself at the table. Rather than engage Canadians in what could have been or perhaps even what should have been, I think Canadians want to be engaged in: "Okay, now that we are at the table New Democratic Party, Liberal Party, Conservative Party, what is it that Canada should be saying from its seat? What is it that Canada should be saying to the Americans and to the Mexicans who will be negotiating around that long table?" That is worth debate in this Chamber.

I would like to correct a few things, because during the course of the debate we have heard members from various sides say: "You're not in favour of freer trade". "You didn't want to go to the table". "You wanted to go under the table". The NDP say that I want to pull the chair out.

The party of which I am very proud to be a member historically has been a party that has always favoured freer trade. If there were times in our history when political parties were very much opposed to opening the road of trade between the countries of the world community, it was clearly the Conservative Party. History does not lie. Therefore, our party has always found itself trying to reform, to open, and to liberalize, in the best sense of the word, trade. We regard trade to a certain degree as the lifeblood of this country, as an encouragement to stimulate the economy and jobs.

Where we distinguish ourselves from our hon. friends on the other side is the type of agreement that we would want to enter into with the United States of America or with another country. Therefore, the distinguishing feature should not be that this party was against freer trade but that this party fought with no apologies in 1988, led admirably by our former leader, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, for a very different kind of agreement. The type of agreement they had put their signature to was an agreement that we hoped would not materialize. Unfortunately, as we look across the land we see that our prognosis was correct, as we try to see, in the aftermath of free trade, where the success stories are.

The members on the other side pointed to "All the Fallen Sparrows", that was a quote used by one of my colleagues. Listening to the hon. member who spoke before me, the member for Burlington, when he referred to some factory making cookies, you would figure that every cookie that gets baked is because of free trade. That is an argument we should discount pretty readily. Therefore, we ought to be taking a look at what the adjustment has been after the trade agreement that was signed by the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States.

I am hard pressed to see where the success stories have been. I am hard pressed to believe that it has helped us more than it has hurt us. I see, in my own backyard in Toronto, that not every job that is lost can be blamed on or pinned simply on the free trade agreement. I have talked to many businessmen, I have had calluses on my hands when I worked in construction putting myself through university, I am also the son of a Canadian who owns a small business himself. I am able to meet, as I have, with business interests in my community and outside my community of York West, and I am trying with those Canadians to see how free trade has encouraged a greater number of jobs, encouraged greater expansion of our industry. It has done the opposite in the grand scheme, whether in the case of energy, in the case of manufacturing, in the case of furniture, or in the case of many industries that I have in my own industrial parkland in York West. It was supposed to be a bonanza, it was supposed to be a Messiah for the creation of thousands upon thousands of jobs, for the American firms to come here and build their factories. Instead, what we have become is a warehouse economy.

The Americans do not have to come to our country and build factories to produce products and therefore create jobs; they are not doing that. What are they doing in some of their industries? What they are doing in the States where they have their plants is augmenting their production by a number of hours, they produce incredible quantities of those goods, then they ship them to Canada where they rent a warehouse and we become truck drivers. We become distributors of products under that free trade regime. Where are the job spin-offs in Canada? Certainly not in the truck industry. They are being produced in the States, where they are augmenting the number of hours and production lines to meet the Canadian market.

Where is the research and development in driving trucks and in setting up warehouses? There is none. Where is the wealth creation that we spoke about, that we were promised? Instead, those industries that cannot compete with the Americans, which cannot possibly compete with the economies of scale, flowing against logic, are going out of business. They are beginning to downsize. They are beginning to consider going south of the border. That is a reality that has been born in the advent of the so-called free trade Messiah between our two countries.

Who speaks for the workers 45, 50, 55 years of age when a plant closes because it says it cannot compete any longer? What does the hon. member for Burlington and other members of Parliament who face such people in their constituencies tell the person who is 55 and has worked 30 years in a plant which all of a sudden gets shut down? No one wants to invest in a 55-year-old, or not readily so, despite a wealth of experience.

That 55-year old Canadian still may have a mortgage to pay, still may have kids going through university, still may be required to work another five, to seven, to ten years to make ends meet. What do we tell a worker after this Prime Minister promised the country during the last election that he and his government would deliver the best transition programs the world has ever known?

An hon. member: Another broken promise.

Mr. Marchi: It is not only a broken promise, but it is absolutely unacceptable and irresponsible to say those things without fulfilling those promises. Men and women who are displaced at least had a hope that if things were going to go wrong in the free trade agreement, if there were firms and industries and sectors of our economy that were not going to be able to compete as well or as strong with the Americans, at least had a glimmer of hope that there would somehow be some catch, some adjustment program, some capacity to take them and say: "Look, under the free trade agreement your business or sector did not have the technology, did not have the manpower, did not have the know-all to compete. That firm or sector is going to fall, but we are going to take you and employ you in this other industry".

On the one hand, we do not have the economic wealth being generated that was promised. On the other hand, we have unemployed workers across this country who are hurting and hurting badly.

It is also not solely free trade. It is a comprehensive situation facing the Canadian economy and the Canadian worker in that Canadian economy. We could combine the advent of free trade that has hurt us more than it has helped us. One of the reasons I question our friends in the New Democratic Party so that perhaps there are two options to that table with Mexico. Their option is not to be there, even though the government said it will be, but the other option if we are there is to stop the misery that they speak of in their motion which says:

> This House calls upon the government to avoid a worsening of the social and economic hardship—

My preferred option is to give the Government of Canada a set of marching orders to utilize at that table, to reopen the existing agreement between the United States and Canada, and to say to our friends on the government benches that we are hurting and we are hurting badly in these sectors; that now they have a golden opportunity, as our trade critic has said, to reopen the deal and revisit energy, for instance.

Who in their right mind would treat Americans as Canadians in times of energy crisis? Show me one country that has agreements of that magnitude in terms of energy self-sufficiency, and I will sit down in my place. There is not one country that would give away its energy to another country and treat it as it would its own citizens and its own economy.

I find it completely irresponsible for a Canadian government to treat American sources as its own nationals. That is a giveaway. However, what I am suggesting is perhaps we can convince them to reopen them. How do we reopen it if we are not at the table? How do we revisit something if no one is talking, no one is debating, and no one is negotiating? How would they suggest that the misery stop, if we don't try to ask this government to use the occasion to tell the Americans that on a number of fronts we would like to cross the t's and dot the i's in a very different way?

When the question of the free trade agreement is put together, we also have to add to the equation of our economy the question of high interest rates, the question of our high Canadian dollar, the question that we are now going through a very bad recession that makes the 1981–82 period virtually a cakewalk with whomever we speak to. The real cost of interest rates now are higher costs. The difference between American interest rates and Canadian interest rates in 1982 was negligible; right now there is a differential.

In 1981 and 1982 Canadians were still working. Ask people in the construction industry, ask people in our trades industry, ask people in the housing market, ask whomever you wish, wherever they are, a very simple question, whether this recession is worse than the one in 1981–82 which happened to be an international one, unlike this "made–in–Canada" recession, especially by Tories.

Mr. Sobeski: Tell that to first–time buyers who are finally getting into the Toronto market.

Mr. Marchi: It is nice to have the members opposite awake finally. It took us six hours but they are finally awake.

The final variable, or another one, is also the question of the tax structure in this country, the question of the GST. When we begin to put all those variables together, is it any wonder that we are in a recession? Is it any wonder that the economy slowly but surely and gradually and consistently is being strangled?

To make matters worse, we just came off the heels of a budget some three weeks ago. Did the budget offer inspiration? Did the budget offer some employment stimulus? Did the budget try to inspire a nation out of the pit of recession into which it was placed by this government?

The Minister of Finance always gets up and says: "Oh, boy, when those Liberals were in government during 1981–82 they threw money at their problems".

Mr. Milliken: We had good government then.

Mr. Marchi: We did not throw money at our problems. The government of 1981–82 recognized that we were living through an international recession. Rather than do nothing, as this government advocates in its budget, the government of the time created labour intensive and capital works programs.

Why? Because it tried to assist its citizens to survive and live through the recession of 1981–82. Then we had unprecedented growth in 1984–85–86–87.

What does the government do in its recession that it got us into? The responsibility of a government is to say: "If we have to spend a few dollars to help Canadians get back to work, if we can inject some inspiration into the economy, if we can kick–start the engine, then we are a government that is showing leadership".

Where is the leadership of a government that throws the country into a recession and then pulls a Pontius Pilate and says: "We can't spend. If you are hurting we feel bad, but we can't do anything about it"?

Canadians deserve better. Canadians would want us to try to inject the economy with some stimulus, because if we are stimulated as an economy then the revenues come back. If no one is working, if plants are closing two to three weeks at a time, if they are downsizing, if Canadians are walking the streets unemployed and we are paying UIC, when will we come out of our recession? When will we put Canadians back to work? When are factories going to hum again? When are we going to get the 24–hour cycles again in factories?

We won't, as long as this government persists in taking the stand of simply backing off the problems rather than trying to help Canadians survive the dark times.

Yes, there will be good times again. We need to recognize that. There are cycles, but let us help Canadians during the down cycles and then reap the fruits of their labour during the good cycles.

I would love to go on a little further. I seek unanimous consent. If I do not receive it, it has been a pleasure and I will see you next week.

• (1550)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Are there questions or comments?

The hon. member was seeking consent to continue, but I see there are some members rising on question and comment.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, just a very quick question.

The hon. member referred to a budget three weeks ago that he thought was extremely regressive. Last week, we saw the province of Newfoundland and its Liberal premier come out with a budget that seemed to follow the same types of spending controls as exhibited by the finance minister. I would like the hon. member to explain to me how that Liberal government's budget is going to turn things around when he also seems to recognize that there is a tremendous debt burden.

Would the hon. member please explain to Canadians why Premier Wells, a hero across Canada, is taking a tough stand just like this federal government.

Mr. Marchi: Madam Speaker, first, let me say two things.

Premier Wells, in his own riding, is much more popular than the Prime Minister. Second, if the gentleman was somewhat more honest, he would have also told Canadians that the budget of Newfoundland came after a federal budget that basically slashed and passed on the deficit reduction to the provinces.

We were not surprised. We said, on the night of the budget, through our finance critic, Mr. Gray, the hon. member for Windsor West, through our Deputy Leader, Ms. Copps, the hon. member for Hamilton East, and through subsequent speakers, that when the government talks in the federal budget about deficit reduction, when it talks about the medicare system and the cutbacks that it would be pushing the problem to the top.

Mr. Attewell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member called my hon. friend here dishonest. I would like him to withdraw that remark.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Of course, I will give the hon. member for York West the opportunity to explain or withdraw.

I would also bring to his attention, if I may, that he has been in the House at least as long as I have been in the House. He knows that members do not refer to their colleagues by their names, but by the name of their ridings. Giving the name of their ridings after does not make the first line correct.

Mr. Marchi: You are absolutely right, Madam Speaker, I should know better.

In terms of my use of the word "dishonest" I did not mean it against the hon. member at all. I withdraw that word completely and without any problem.

What I tried to point out is that the question of the Newfoundland budget was not an initiation but a response to the economic tightrope that was left after the government in Ottawa presented its budget which pushed deficit reduction on to the provinces and which cut the amounts of moneys with which provincial governments can administer their health and higher education systems.

I predict that the Government of Newfoundland will not be the only provincial government across the land to do this. That is part of the problem. We are going to see a domino effect as a result of the federal Government of Canada that has been sending the wrong signals and imposing the wrong commitments. The provincial governments will have to take care of their provincial treasuries and respond accordingly.

That is where the lack of leadership comes from. That is why it is important for a federal government to have a breadth of vision of the country it represents and leads. It has to have a sense that governments such as the Government of Newfoundland, given the difficult economic straits that it finds itself in, that every action in this place has a reaction elsewhere.

I am suggesting to the hon. member that the actions of provincial governments, be they Newfoundland or Manitoba or in other provincial capitals, when they present their budgets have the seed planted in this federal budget.

That is why we have been waging this debate in this Chamber, to try to bring the government to its senses, change its budget and do things that are going to kick–start the economy rather than continue this recession.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—FARM INCOMES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

That this House call upon the Government to take immediate action to deal with drastically reduced farm incomes resulting from the 1990–91 crop year and to make required assistance available in time for spring planting to ensure viable returns for grains, oilseeds and horticultural producers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion before the House today calls to the attention of the government the drastic and urgent need for emergency farm assistance this spring. It calls upon the government to provide this assistance in time for the planting season. This assistance should not only be clarified and made concrete, but should be provided to farmers in time for the planting season. We would suggest at least by the middle of next month.

It would be hard to over-emphasize the need for this assistance for the 1990–91 crop years. Clearly, I do not think anybody can remember the price of grains and oilseeds at a lower level than they are in the current crop year. Clearly, this results from a number of factors, mainly the world grain price war between the United States and the European Economic Community. Prices have been below $100 a tonne in many months of this crop year.

In fact, the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board pointed out one sale of United States wheat subject to a subsidy program there, the export enhancement program, where the wheat was actually sold for around $70 a tonne. If you remove the transportation costs, the actual value of the shipment dropped to something like $35 a tonne.

Clearly, this crop year has seen the lowest prices in real terms since the 1930s, perhaps ever. Those amounts of payment are clearly inadequate. As a result of this, the government's cutback and its support programs for the 1991 calendar year, total net farm incomes are projected to drop by 54 per cent.

In some provinces, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, that drops the total net farm income to below zero. There is no net farm income. Other provinces like New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Ontario have a very serious reduction in total net farm income, down by percentages in the upper teens. In the case of Ontario, it is around 20 per cent. Clearly, this is the most difficult year as far as cash flow that many producers have ever faced. The executive director of the Ontario Corn Producers Association projected that its incomes would be lower than at any time in the 1980s. That takes in all of those extremely low years of the late 1980s.

In fact, representatives of the Ontario Corn Producers told the agriculture committee just last week that farm incomes would be something below $200 million for the grains and oilseeds in the province of Ontario below what they would project or hope would be the portion provided by government if GRIP is implemented in the coming year.

The impact goes far beyond just grains and oilseeds. It affects the whole range of agriculture commodities, but especially horticulture crops. The chairman of the Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers' Association last week told the agriculture committee that it is in the most desperate situation that he can recall in the 35 years that he has been a fruit and vegetable producer.

He has described the need as something like $70 million of emergency or bridging assistance before some more permanent kind of program of assistance such as GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, is put in place. He says that it is absolutely essential that that bridging assistance be provided this spring, before the growing and the planting season.

That was the report from only one producer. It does not take into account the tremendous problems that our potato producers in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick are facing with the virus problem there. We are told by my colleague that the need for assistance there may be of the order of $25 million.

Prairie Pools has called for assistance in the order of $1 billion in the Canadian Wheat Board area. The Third Line of Defence Committee, which the minister appointed several months ago, has been reported to say that the need is in the order of $1.2 billion as an upper figure.

The important thing to remember here is that not only are we facing a drastic world situation for grains and oilseeds prices, but we are also facing a drastic cutback in government support programs.

Figures released by the government in December show that projections for government support programs, compared with 1988, dropped by $1.8 billion.

More recent figures show a reduction in support programs, between 1989 and 1991, of $1.6 billion. We have coming together here a terrible market situation and a government policy which has reduced those support programs which are necessary if agriculture is going to survive in the current world subsidized global grain warfare which has been going on for the past five or six years.

Why the government has chosen to reduce those support programs during the last two or three years is not clear, but it certainly is causing tremendous hardship. Figures like a 54 per cent reduction in net farm income—in some provinces 100 per cent total net farm income reduction—are only cold statistics; they do not speak of the tragedy of young farmers losing their land, of family breakups, of all kinds of difficulties that are faced in the rural community. Clearly, producers who five years ago were in a very healthy or reasonably successful position are facing difficult times now.

It almost seems like the government's plan was to reduce these support programs from those that were available in 1987, 1988 and 1989 in order to create this crisis, to bring in its GRIP and NISA programs, to bring pressure on the producers. Many producers believe that a world trade war in agriculture commodity is the responsibility of the federal government. In the United States the federal government assumes the responsibility for most its support program. In any event, whatever the game plan of the government in this regard, the resulting GRIP program that the government has proposed for the 1991–92 crop year will see the provincial governments putting up something like 60 per cent of the premiums for those programs. We have been inundated with talk of the GRIP and the NISA program across the country, but in fact GRIP—and probably NISA, with the exception of Saskatchewan—will not help out in the 1990–91 crop year. In this crop year we will see very low returns.

The crisis is now; the assistance needed is now. If farmers are to know where they are at and what their future is going to hold, they need the government to give a commitment as to the funding it is going to provide, clearly identify what basis that funding is going to be on, and make the payments before the crop season starts. The GRIP is designed for a payout in the fall of 1992. There may be interim payments later this fall and there may be interim payments next spring. We don't know about that. Clearly for the planting season, it is essential that this plan be put before the producers this spring.

When we talk about GRIP we see some provinces, like Saskatchewan, facing tremendous contributions for a province that is predominantly agriculture, with a very small non-agriculture society to pay the benefits. The question is: Can the cost to that government and to those producers be sustained over the long haul, a cost that has been estimated at something like half a billion dollars per year?

When the Minister of Finance presented his budget, he talked about $1.3 billion of assistance for agriculture. If that amount were provided immediately on a basis on which farmers would be able to calculate what assistance they were going to receive before the planting season this year, I am sure that everybody would think that was a very fair and equitable proposition.

However, the Minister of Agriculture has put out a press release stating that the $1.3 billion could be used for a number of things. It might be used for federal government premiums for the GRIP and NISA. It might be used for the deficit and the Canadian Wheat Board initial payment. It might be used for the debt in the Western Grain Stabilization Fund.

All those things do not put new money into farmers' hands this spring. What farmers need is an emergency payment or pay-out, assistance now which will provide seed, fertilizer, diesel fuel, equipment repairs, help and so on, in time for the growing season this spring.

Clearly the Canadian Wheat Board account has been variously portrayed, that it will have a deficit of $750 million or a billion dollars. The federal government's share of the GRIP and NISA premiums are large amounts as well. In the Western Grain Stabilization Fund we do not know what the deficit is. We are told that it might be several hundred million dollars. If the $1.3 billion which the Minister of Finance announced in his budget is an interim payment under the western grain stabilization fund, of course that would be immediate help, provided it was made this spring.

What we are saying is that the program should be spelled out clearly, that we should not have this shell game going where there are three or four possibilities where the funds might be used, the funds mentioned in the minister's budget but not spelling out exactly how much funding is going to be made available in the current crop year in time for the planting and seeding period.

We say to the government that it should give up on that shell game. It should make it clear exactly what assistance is going to be made available. Paying off the deficit in the Western Grain Stabilization Fund or the Wheat Board account is of interest and concern to parliamentarians and to farmers, but what farmers want to know this spring is: Are they going to survive? Are they going to be able to put a crop in the ground? Are they going to get assistance on the same basis as they did in 1987, 1988 and 1989, in those years when they were facing similar deficits and similar losses of benefits from the marketplace itself.

We call on the government to provide this assistance to end the uncertainty as to whether or not there is going to be assistance, how much, and how it is going to played.

Last year the government announced some interim support. I believe it was in the order of $500 million. It called on the provincial governments to come forward and match that amount of money.

The battle raged on for two months. It was not until the end of May that there was actually some kind of an agreement. It was not until late August or some time in September when many of those payments were made, and they were relatively small payments proportionately.

Surely we do not have to go through that spectacle again this year. Surely the Minister of Agriculture can announce what the support is going to be and make it in a timely way, where it will do some good and there will not be this long game of procrastination or the long battles with the provincial governments as to whether or not they are going to match the funds, many of which would be hard put to match, especially for a province like Saskatchewan. They are already facing a premium in the new crop year of something like $160 million for GRIP. They would be hard put to match the special interim assistance that is needed for the existing crop year, 1990-1991.

We are saying that the time has come for the government to provide this assistance. It is needed now. There is no question that we have the worst situation as far as total net farm income this year, 1990, is concerned. The crisis itself has been partly created by the government drastically reducing its support programs between 1989 and 1991, the last two years. It is even lower than those previous years. It is time that provincial governments are facing the off-loading by the federal government because GRIP will require them to put up a sizeable support amount of funds to pay their share of the premiums, as will producers.

We do not think that any assistance is being provided. Many groups made the point before the agriculture committee that emergency assistance for the 1990-1991 crop year should not be coerced by signing up for GRIP.

There is going to be enough coercion because the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds has announced that he is not going to give the initial price until late July or toward the end of the crop year. Producers will not have the knowledge they usually have early in the spring as to what the initial price will be. There will certainly be enough coercion there. We do not think that assistance should be tied to GRIP, as many producers have already requested and suggested.

We believe that there needs to be equal support for the horticulture industry. I mentioned earlier the requirement of Ontario fruit and vegetable producers who said that their shortfall is in the order of $70 million. The assistance required in the P.E.I. and New Brunswick areas for their difficulties has already been spelled out as well.

We think it is time that the government made a firm decision, announced it; not blame the province but just come clean and tell farmers how much the assistance will be, on what basis, and make it available in time for the planting season so it can do the most good when it is needed.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in the debate on the motion sponsored by the opposition that deals essentially with the farm income problem and calls upon the federal government to provide assistance to help the grain and oilseeds and horticultural sectors.

I must say I welcome the motion, but I question the timeliness because it comes precisely at a time when we are dealing with one of the most comprehensive income measures in 50 years. To back that up, I am going to quote some individuals who have been quoted in this place before, the five economists who have taken issue with certain parts of the GRIP and NISA proposals: Messrs. Gray, Weisensel, Rosaasen, Furtan, and Kraft. They said in a document that they presented: "The proposed GRIP and NISA programs represent the most significant Canadian agricultural legislation in the last 50 years". They indicate that it makes it the largest agricultural program ever. They go on to say that it represents a number of significant improvements over similar income support programs implemented in the past. They go on to cite that it includes payments on farm-fed grains and, second, that there is not a requirement to sell grain within a particular crop year to be eligible for a pay-out. The range of eligible crops has been expanded. The payments are more predictable and a 15 year average of prices provides more support during periods of low prices when compared to a five-year average of prices.

While they have some reservations, the over-all scope and comprehensiveness of the program is very valid and most acceptable. "GRIP", they go on to say, "has been designed to provide income support for agriculture producers across Canada in response to unprecedented low incomes in the agriculture sector".

We are dealing with it at a time when the very issue the hon. member raised is being dealt with in a very comprehensive fashion. After a series of ad hoc responses, which members on all sides of the House criticized and indeed the industry criticized, it is time now to come forth with some policy framework that provides a future for agriculture and provides some kind of an income safety net which producers can rely upon before the fact rather than after the fact.

The fact that huge amounts of money have been paid in ad hoc assistance, we still have a problem. It does speak to the requirement of having a comprehensive approach to this series of problems. That is what the farmers want and that is what industry wants. I think that is the kind of signal we must send to the international community, that we are going to continue to stand by our farmers, and that is what the safety net legislation is all about.

I am disappointed that I heard nothing new from the Liberal side. It is the same old litany and the same old rhetoric: just send money. There was nothing new. It is basically a collection of all the requests that have been made by various members in the community. There is nothing there, there is absolutely nothing there.

Let us look at the farm income picture, not to suggest for one minute that we are not going through difficulties, and put the whole thing into perspective. It is a problem that is multifaceted in nature. If we were to look at the 1980s, the last half of the 1980s showed that realized net income on average rose by 39 per cent, from an average in the first half of the 1980s of $3.1 billion realized net income to $4.2 billion realized net income. That is a 39 per cent increase in the period 1981-85 to 1985-89.

Western Canada in the last half of the 1980s experienced an 30 per cent increase over the first half, with the average realized net income rising from $1.6 billion to $2 billion. In eastern Canada there was a 47 per cent increase in realized net income in the last half of the 1980s versus the first half of the 1980s. Again, those figures were $1.5 billion versus $2.9 billion.

It is true, as the hon. member pointed out, that in 1990 we experienced a drop to around $3 billion, approximately a 25 per cent drop in realized net income. In 1991 we are projecting a further reduction. It is in anticipation of this very fact that the safety net programs were in fact designed, were brought into being and were brought before this House in a timely fashion so that we could deal with this issue not only in the short term, but indeed in the medium and long terms.

The effect of this program will reduce the shortfall by something in the order of $2.5 billion to $3 billion. It is a program designed to help producers to help themselves by providing some predictability, by providing some level of income assurance on an acreage basis, and by providing some security and stability over the long haul.

The important feature is that it has to be looked at as a package, GRIP and NISA together. The Net Income Stabilization Account will provide that long-term stability and security. I am concerned about the fact that we have become too preoccupied with one component of the program. If we go back and look at the recommendations of the task force on safety nets, we find that it was developed as a package. I hope hon. members will recognize the importance of speaking to this issue as a package, because the two are complementary to each other.

Simply put, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program is really a management tool that allows producers to use it in part of the management of their farms. It provides a shield and a safety net from the uncertainty and the disaster that have affected particularly in grains and oilseeds and that have become all too common in the past five or six years.

This government, this Prime Minister, this Minister of Finance, my predecessor, the former Minister of Agriculture, and myself have stood by farmers in the past and we are going to continue to do it in the future. There can be no doubt about that.

The bill before us is one of the most comprehensive farm income measures that has ever been introduced in the House. It is living testimony to that fact. We are going to attempt to continue, as best we can, to shield farmers from the difficulties and misfortunes caused by circumstances beyond their control.

Mr. Milliken: Created by this government.

Mr. Cardiff: Never.

Mr. Mazankowski: In terms of direct program payments in support of agriculture in the period from 1981 to 1985, let us look at the Liberal record. In the period 1981 to 1985 the average direct program payments in support of agriculture was $921 million per year. The 1986 to 1989 average was $2.7 billion, a threefold increase.

That speaks volumes about the priority, about the compassion, about the concern for the agricultural industry. That they did not need any help when they were paying 24 per cent interest rates as a result members associated with the government in 1980 to 1984 is nonsense. The problems we have in terms of debt and the level of debt is still a carryover from the good old days of 24 per cent interest rates, the 1981 to 1984 period.

In the period from 1986 to 1990 the revenue from the marketplace in agriculture accounted for only 20 per cent to 25 per cent of the realized net income. Eighty per cent of it came from governments, federal and provincial, and 80 per cent of that came from the federal government. In western Canada, particularly Saskatchewan and Manitoba, about 90 per cent of government support came from the federal government.

If we take all the support, direct and indirect programs, in 1987-88 federal and provincial support of agriculture across the country was $8.1 billion. In 1988-89 it was $7.5 billion and in 1989-90 it was $6 billion. As a matter of fact, in the last five years, 1985-86 to 1989-90, some $22.6 billion worth of federal government support was provided to agriculture and an additional $10 billion was provided by the provinces.

In the grains and oilseeds sector during that same period of time, $13.7 billion was provided in federal support. If we were to look at it another way, on per farm basis, if we take the average farmer in Saskatchewan for the period 1987-88-89, it worked out to $20,000 per farmer.

Mr. Milliken: They didn't need any help in 1981 to 1985. They were doing that well.

Mr. Mazankowski: In 1982 it was $2,600 from the Liberal guys, and in 1983 it was $3,200 from the Liberals.

Mr. Ferguson: We had $7 wheat, Don.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, $7 wheat for a few. How much $7 could you sell in the international marketplace today? You know you couldn't.

Let us look at Quebec in 1987–88–89, the same period. On a per farm basis, the level of direct program support from the federal government works out to $14,000 per farm. What was it in 1982–83? It was $7,000 per farm. What misery, what cheapskates.

• (1340)

Mr. Speaker, no compassion, no care. Let them sink or swim. That was their approach.

In spite of this massive infusion of support, we still have a problem. It needs a more comprehensive approach and we need to address some of the structural problems that exist. We must spend wiser. We do have fiscal constraints, and we must adjust to some of the realities that exist. Above all, we must provide an appropriate policy framework within which farmers can plan, knowing there is a program in place, knowing there is a long-term policy in place, knowing there is a national perspective on the issue.

The multi-faceted problems we face require multi-faceted solutions. The many forces at play have been recognized under the agriculture policy review process. We have to identify them and respond appropriately, and we have, through a partnership process which I think has worked very well.

We recognize there are changing market demands. We recognize there are changes in trading patterns; changes in technology; new emphasis placed on food safety; different emphasis placed on the environment; political and economic reforms occurring throughout the world; military wars. All of these things recognize the importance of agriculture in the international marketplace. Fifty per cent of our farm income is extracted from the international marketplace. We recognize that we have to make the necessary changes. It requires a timely response in an appropriate fashion.

That is why we launched the agriculture policy review and the 11 task forces that have been at work. We are now implementing a number of the recommendations. One of those is the GRIP–NISA safety net proposal. I am not going to go into detail today, because the issue is before the House and I will be appearing before a committee this afternoon. However, I would re-emphasize the importance of this package as a program that will provide stability, predictability, bankability and some confidence for the future.

It is a national program and it is our hope that it will cover a broad range of commodities. Horticulture has been mentioned. It would be our hope that horticulture would be incorporated into this program as soon as we possibly can. There is nothing to prevent the program NISA being implemented, provided the provinces can see fit to become a party to it.

There has been a suggestion that forage should be included in 1991–92. It is very difficult to incorporate it in the transitional year, but it is our intention to ensure that it will be incorporated into the permanent program, hopefully starting in 1992–93. To the extent that we can accommodate the forage industry, either through a third line or through some add-ons that might make it appropriate for the forage industry, to ensure that there is some semblance of equity in it, we will certainly try to do that.

The potato issue is one that we are deeply concerned about. The eradication program has been outlined, in co-operation with the producers and the provincial government. We are now working on an appropriate compensation program, and that we will be in a position to announce it in due course.

I know hon. members across the way have expressed some concerns and raised some issues with regard to the legislation currently before the House. I will be in committee this afternoon. I will be addressing a number of those areas and indicating some measure of flexibility in terms of trying to accommodate some of the concerns of the members opposite.

To repeat again, this program is fundamental. It is a fundamental building block to restoring strength and vibrance to the industry. Without long-term objectives, we cannot achieve the long-term stability Canadian farmers so desperately need.

We recognize that while GRIP and NISA are good programs for the future, they will not solve all our problems. We have never suggested they would. We have suggested they were a comprehensive approach to developing a framework that would help producers manage more effectively, and provide some stability and security for the future. We also recognize that some bridging assistance will be required until the programs produce the intended results. We have set up a third line defence committee.

The hon. member suggests we should announce our programs right now. We have been getting some criticism from the people we are consulting over the fact that we are rushing into this without giving them a full opportunity to develop options and suggestions.

We have set up a committee of some 41 people, 19 of whom are farmers. Others represent the trade, the provinces and the federal government. On March 1 and 2 in Regina, at our federal–provincial meeting, we did establish a set of principles and guidelines that would govern us in the developing of the third line of defence, (a) that the program be multi–faceted reflecting the multi–faceted nature of the problems; (b) that it be built on the objective of the new safety net program and be linked as far as possible to participation of the new safety nets; (c) that it be directed at providing a transition from income levels attained during the pre–GRIP–NISA period based on those expected with the GRIP–NISA period; (d) that it be tied to longer term adjustment measures; (e) that it be announced as soon as possible in 1991; (f) that to the greatest extent possible delivered through the GRIP–NISA delivery programs; (g) that there we should respect the need for equity among producers, commodities and the provinces; and (h) that it be funded by the federal government, conditional upon industry and provincial government commitment to address the long–term structural needs.

The committee I referred to has produced a number of options and suggestions which we are now looking at. I will be meeting with farm leaders on March 20 here in Ottawa to further flesh out some of the thoughts and ideas with respect to this.

Our objective is to tie this into the longer term program we are putting in place under GRIP and NISA and also a longer term measure of adjustment necessary to deal with some of the forces of change that are being thrust upon us. It is not a matter of just simply tiding us over until tomorrow, it is a matter of providing something that will carry us into the future. We expect that by mid–April we will be in a position to announce something concrete.

Mr. Speaker, 1990 was the year of examination and analysis; 1991 is the year for implementation and action. In addition to the launching of the safety nets, which was a priority under the agriculture policy review, we have a number of things that we must do based upon the recommendations that have been flowing from the 11 task forces. They range all the way from strengthening the management capability of our industry and improvements in long–term financing, reduction of production costs; looking at new ways to provide adjustment support when necessary—here we are looking at enhancing the Canadian rural transition program—broadening our agricultural base through diversification and value added; maximizing our trade opportunities; aggressively challenging unfair trade practices; strengthening our regions and rural communities; strengthening our processing sector; taking steps to enhance the industry's competitiveness; and freeing up the system by reforming regulations that have created barriers to competitiveness.

These approaches are all doable in a very comprehensive way because we have had that very major internal examination of our industry. We have had the kind of recommendations brought forward that are non–partisan, and are in the interests of the total industry. We are committed to that process. We are committed to acting upon those recommendations, to give real meaning to the process of the agriculture policy review.

I invited all hon. members to participate in the process, as they have. I must say that over the period of my being Minister of Agriculture I have always found them somewhat partisan but always constructive.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say to the Minister of Agriculture that he seems to have great respect and support in cabinet. Over the years it has been unmistakable that he has always managed to get the substantial funds necessary for the farming community of this country.

• (1350)

He started off his comments by saying that we on this side of the House were not looking for creative solutions, that we were not looking at a new policy framework and that we were not looking for safety nets. I wanted to ask the minister a very specific question.

In 1989 the general conference of the Agricultural Institute of Canada adopted two resolutions relating to water and the free trade agreement. I am sure the minister is well aware of that institute's concerns. I was wondering what his views were in us making sure that water was, in fact, exempt from the free trade agreement and that maybe it could be used as one of these safety nets he talks about for future negotiation for the agricultural community of this country. I wonder if the minister could comment on that.

Mr. Mazankowski: Of course, I will comment on it. I do not know what the hon. member is fishing for. He knows the policy of this government.

The export of water in the massive quantities he is referring to is excluded under the provisions of the free trade agreement. There is nothing wrong with selling bottled water. I hope we sell a lot more of it. There is provision for that as a commodity, but there is certainly no provision for the export of water under the free trade agreement.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated that the government will do something about the bridging requirements for farms for this spring.

In his speech of March 1 and again today, the minister said that those bridging requirements would be tied to enrolment in GRIP and NISA. Is he implying by that statement that farmers who do not sign up in GRIP or NISA cannot expect any help in the bridging period?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the guidelines that were developed were couched in terms that would hopefully lead to the enrolment of more rather than fewer people in the GRIP and NISA concept.

For the benefit of the hon. member, I will reread the principle to which I think he is referring. One of the criteria is to:

> b) build on the objective of the new safety net program and be linked, as far as possible, to participation in the new safety nets;

With respect to delivery, "to the greatest extent possible," programs should be, "delivered through GRIP-NISA delivery systems". That is not only a set of principles which I think we can live with, but the provinces have endorsed those principles. I am pleased to note that many of the farm organizations which have commented on those principles have also supported them.

It is very difficult when we are trying to develop the basic three lines of defence. The first is the management and operational capabilities of the producer himself, and the responsibility that he or she must take in that regard. Second, the safety net programs which are funded through a sharing arrangement between the federal-provincial and producer communities. The third line of defence effectively kicks in when the first and second do not apply, and when there are unforeseen disasters or problems that are not envisioned or covered by the first two lines of defence. Obviously, if some people believe that the third line of defence is going to be a substitute for the second line of defence, we are going to be back to square one.

I think the hon. member would agree that what we need is a longer term solution to provide the kind of stability and security we need, and hopefully to re-establish the kind of confidence the hon. member and I both want to see in the agriculture community.

Mr. Hovdebo: I want to explore the same point a little further.

I can see acceptance of the fact that the GRIP and NISA are the first or second line of defence, but the implication in the speech on March 2 was that if a farmer did not have GRIP then he should not expect any help, even if by not taking GRIP he gave up the opportunity for a certain level of support.

However, what we are talking about here is the bridging period. There may not be any payment from GRIP at the end of the year if the prices are high enough, but the bridging period is here and the need is here for that period of time. Any suggestion that if a farmer does not enrol in GRIP he will not get any assistance for the bridging period eliminates all of the voluntary factor in the particular programs, because they are both considered voluntary. They do not become voluntary if we say: "No money for you for last year if you don't enrol in it this year."

Mr. Mazankowski: I could pose the question to the hon. member: What would you do next year if we ended up in the same situation, where a person was not enrolled and he again found himself in difficult circumstances, and a good portion of the rest of the producer community became involved in the GRIP and NISA program and found protection? Would the hon. member expect the federal government to come out with another line of defence just to meet the needs of that individual?

That is the balance we have to weigh. We are not attempting compulsion here. What we are trying to do is invite farmers to become part of the solution. We are giving them a mechanism to help themselves. Every time a producer signs up for the program, the federal government is picking up 41-2/3 per cent of the premium and the province is picking up 25 per cent of the premium. The producer is buying 100 cents on the dollar insurance for 33-1/3 cents. It seems to me that it is a pretty good deal.

If we are going to have the kind of stability over the long term, if we are going to have the kinds of management tools that will allow producers to become more self-reliant, that will allow them to make their decisions in advance rather than put their crop in and hope for the best and maybe the federal or provincial government will come to the rescue, it is important to have these kinds of instruments in advance so they can be used as a management tool, as well as the farmer's own expertise and wisdom in terms of the operation of his farm unit.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to say a few words on this resolution.

The resolution asks for immediate action on the part of the government to ensure that funds are in place for planting this year. That is exactly the question I was asking the minister just a few minutes ago in the sense that if this fund is dependent on enrolment, we only have a couple of weeks or a month until the actual seeding begins.

As the minister suggests, if this is to be a tool for survival in farming, then there are a lot of decisions to be made relative to enrolment in the gross revenue fund. If the farmer cannot be sure that he is going to have money to plant this year, there does not seem to be any value in enrolling in GRIP if he is not going to put any seed in the ground. He is obviously not going to be one of the farmers taking his crop off this year.

What I have been asking is: What kind of assurance can we have from the GRIP or NISA, or from the government outside of GRIP or NISA, that there is going to be something in place this spring?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the citizens' forum is an experiment in the public consultation process in Canada. It is an honest attempt, whether perfect or otherwise, to respond to widespread public demand for broader and more open public participation in the process of constitutional reform in Canada.

Along with other vehicles, such as the Edwards—Beaudoin committee and various provincial task forces, the citizens' forum is trying to do a job to help make Canada work.

Those who seek to destroy the forum and with it the government that established it, without themselves offering constructive, implementable alternatives may in fact be contributing not just to the demise of the citizens' forum but to the demise of Canada.

The future strength and survival of Canada and the quest for unity are legitimate topics for differences of opinion among Canadians. They are not appropriate subjects for partisan politics.

In 1864 a great Liberal leader, George Brown, abandoned partisanship to make Canada work. It is time the opposition in this House did the same.

WORLD FIGURE SKATING CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, last week Canada watched as the best figure skaters in the world competed in what has been recognized as the most challenging and artistically pleasing championship ever.

All Canadian competitors deserve to be commended. We also salute the new women's champion. Although an American, Kristi Yamaguchi trained in Alberta.

The men's final saw unprecedented prestige for Canadians as three men excelled. Michael Slipchuk was seventh, Elvis Stojko was sixth, and once again we are pleased to congratulate the world champion, the first Canadian to win three consecutive world championships.

Caroline, Alberta, is not where you would expect a world champion in figure skating to come from. It is a pretty small town, but its pride is as big as the Rockies and I join them in congratulating three time World Figure Skating Champion, the pride of Caroline, their favourite son, Mr. Kurt Browning.

LANGUAGE TRAINING

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday I had the opportunity to attend a rally at Tech Voc High School in Winnipeg, which was attended by thousands of new Canadians who were protesting the cutbacks in funding for English as a second language training in Winnipeg.

They are particularly concerned about funding for the ESL program that has been put on for years by Winnipeg School Division No. 1, that the funding be fully restored and the services which that program has provided to new Canadians continue into the future.

They ask the federal government and particularly the minister of immigration, to reconsider the decision to reorganize the ESL training in the way the minister appears to be doing.

There were members of the government present there, along with the hon. member for Winnipeg South, who made some commitments, but they were vague. We hope that in the very near future the government will take an opportunity to say that it has changed its mind and that it intends to fully restore the funding for English as a second language training in Winnipeg School Division No. 1.

RED CROSS MONTH

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the tradition of dedicating March as Red Cross month dates back to 1943. In designating this month, the Red Cross Society in Canada is able to focus its public education campaign to remind people about the very worth-while and necessary work undertaken by the Red Cross, its dependence upon volunteer support and its reliance on the generosity of the public in maintaining services.

Last year alone, an estimated 4 million Canadians benefited from emergency response, health, safety and community programs provided by the Canadian Red Cross. As well, Canadian funds went to relief operations in more than 66 countries including funds to help refugees in the Persian Gulf, and victims of famine in the Horn of Africa.

It should also be noted that the Canadian International Development Agency, through its International Humanitarian Assistance Program, will contribute $1.4 million to the Red Cross for use in Kuwait and Iraq for basic health care needs and water purification equipment.

The Red Cross has as its purpose the alleviation of human suffering. When help is needed in Canada and around the world, the Red Cross responds.

Let us salute the Red Cross, a truly humanitarian international organization.

VOLUNTEER ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, there are many volunteer organizations in this country dedicated to improving the living conditions of the disabled.

I would like to take this opportunity to draw your attention to the work of one organization in my riding that has worked with tremendous dedication to this cause ever since "La rose bleue" was founded, which was ten years ago last weekend. During that time, the organization has worked very hard, day after day, to promote the cause of the disabled through fund-raising, public awareness campaigns and other means.

I want to take this opportunity to commend the dedication throughout those ten years of the president, Jocelyne Demany, who is herself disabled and the heart and soul of this organization.

Her perseverance, typical of many others in her situation, in defending the rights and interests of the disabled was rewarded in the latest federal Budget, because, Mr. Speaker, this government listens and has taken concrete and positive measures to help the disabled.

I urge them to keep up the good work, because that is how we can bring about change to make this a more just society.

MEMBER FOR LAVAL–EST

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to condemn the remarks made by the hon. member from Duvernay on CBC's The Journal last week about aboriginal people.

The member's statement has impugned aboriginal people in this country. His explanatory press release of last week does not repair the damage which has been done. Behind his discriminatory and inflammatory comments is an attitude prejudicial to the aboriginal people.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate very much, especially on a subject like this, to interrupt the hon. member. There is a rule that Members' Statements ought not to be used as a personal attack on another member. I understand the hon. member is going to raise this matter later on in the House and that probably would be the place to deal with it. I very much regret, but I am bound by the rules just as all hon. members are. I am sure that if the hon. member wishes to raise this issue further he will have an opportunity to do so.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, today I speak of a memorandum from the Emergency Operations Unit of the Canadian Coast Guard to its personnel sections.

The memo states:

> Due to the present Federal Government Budget restraints, we may be forced to operate under present student wage employment programs.

This program is a seasonal rescue program. They work in six separate maritime locations during tourist season.

This program affixes hourly rates of pay to levels of education. For example, a third year community college student in his last year is eligible to only make the equivalent wage scale of a first year university student.

What type of message does this send to the Canadian trades people, the very people who make the country work? A third year community college student warrants only the same wage scale as a first year university student?

This is what the federal government is doing. It is offending and humiliating three–quarters of its population and widening the gap between the rich and the poor.

TRIBUTE TO ISABELLE AND PAUL DUCHESNAY

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I want to extend my warmest congratulations to Paul and Isabelle Duchesnay, who won the world figure skating championship dance title. These gold medal winners who skated for France are citizens of Quebec and residents of my riding.

I want to congratulate them on their performance in Munich, and I thank them for showing us that we Quebeckers have what it takes to achieve excellence. And what it takes is perseverance and confidence in our abilities.

We often hear about Francophones being disadvantaged in Canadian amateur sport. The Duchesnay's are a case in point. They would have liked to skate for the Canadian team, but according to the coaches they were not good enough. However, their courage, determination and talent showed that they were right and that those who did not believe in them were wrong.

This is one more example that proves we Quebeckers are different. This is one more instance of Canadian federalism stifling our identity and preventing us from developing as we should. This proves once again that sovereignty is in the best interests of Quebec.

Bravo, Isabelle and Paul!

TOURISM

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the results of a recent study should bring smiles to the faces of business operators in the tourist industry. According to Sharon Pond of The Saint John Telegraph Journal, reporting on the study "Price, Value and Perception" conducted by Coopers and Lybrand, visitors from the U.S., Britain, France, Germany and Japan say that they like coming to Canada and do not foresee the country as being too expensive for a holiday.

Debra Beck, Director of Communications for TIAC, the industry's spokesperson, said that this week the results are contained in several huge volumes that will take some time to digest by all of the groups concerned, but she called the highlights of the report very interesting and very positive.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, some have said that this government never thinks of the unemployed, that it does not care about double-digit unemployment in Canada, that it claws back at the benefits that are due to the unemployed.

Some have said that this government does not care about the civil servants who will have to work in the unemployed centres and look face to face with the unemployed of this nation.

None of that is true. The government does think of the unemployed. I was witness to that from yesterday's Ottawa Citizen, a quote from "Government Business Opportunities" that the government is putting out a tender for a crowd control system. It is calling for tenders on the ropes and posts necessary to bring order to big line-ups.

It is true. The poor and the unemployed will have something to hang on to. It will be a rope at an unemployment centre. I am not convinced that it was a really good idea for them to supply the people who are out of work in this country with ropes and posts, but time will tell. Time will tell.

GROSS REVENUE INSURANCE PLAN

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, during recent days I met with many farmers in the riding of Macleod. Of course, right now many questions are being asked about the new GRIP program or the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan.

GRIP was designed to protect grain and oilseed producers from shortfalls in revenue, caused by either poor yields or low prices. GRIP is designed to provide protection in an effective, predictable way by basing coverage on individual circumstances.

The program does not mask long-term market trends. Rather, it provides farmers with a buffer against sudden and drastic price changes. It is a welcome long-term response to the needs of farmers. I will continue to work to ensure that this program meets the specific needs of farmers in southwestern Alberta and other parts of Canada.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, there is a crisis in the agriculture industry today and Canadians do not know about it.

Canadians do not realize that the year 1991 represents a turning point in the Canadian food industry.

The success or failure of this crop year will determine whether or not Canada will have a secure future in agriculture.

Statistics show that there will be a minus 54.5 per cent change in total net farm income in 1991. What industry can sustain such a loss and remain in business?

Yet Canadians demand cheap, environmentally friendly, attractively packaged food on their grocery shelves.

We cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. We cannot have cheap food and profitable farms without assistance from the taxpayer.

We as a nation must realize that unless our farmers survive, we will be dangerously dependent on foreign food supplies. Whether it is the grain industry in the west, the horticulture industry in Ontario, the dairy industry in Quebec, or the potato industry in P.E.I., our food producers have to survive.

Immediate assistance must be made available now if our food industry is to survive into the future.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, multilateral trade negotiations on agriculture will soon resume in Brussels, as part of GATT.

We hope the European Community will want to start serious negotiations on questions affecting agriculture. The Canadian government is convinced, however, that GATT member countries are determined to resolve their differences.

Canadian farmers need improved trade regulations that apply across the board. We must achieve the following objectives: reduce substantially the subsidies that distort world markets; facilitate access to international markets; and verify and reinforce article XI of GATT, in accordance with the proposal made in March by Canadian and Quebec farmers, including minimum levels for access to the Canadian market, in accordance with international obligations.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that we Canadians must defend our position which demands better safeguards for our supply management system. We have made sacrifices, we are disciplined, we have acquired some very valid structures, and we want to keep them.

As far as article XI of GATT is concerned, Canada has so far been able to rally a number of countries to its official position, which is to clarify and strengthen this article.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as another spring approaches, supporters of Canada's only inland sea port at Churchill are again gearing up for a fight to ensure that a fair share of prairie grain is shipped to our overseas customers through this port.

With the government's dismal lack of financial and moral support and its willingness to encourage rail-line abandonment in the west, it is a wonder how the port has survived. Churchill has tremendous potential as a transportation staging point for shipping goods to Canada's northern communities. Churchill has a role to play in not only maintaining the north, but also in developing it further. Yet last year the government's air terminal was almost forced to close down completely due to neglect, resulting in it being declared a fire hazard.

Many remember the rocket range in Churchill. The National Research Council's site has had a growing interest in the science sector. We have a government report that indicates that with a reasonable marketing strategy, the range could make a profit. But we need a government that is willing to invest in our north.

I call upon the government to start paying attention to what is happening in Canada's north. The community of Churchill is but one example of how hard it is to struggle with resources but without a government with a vision. How many more Churchills are out there in Canada's north?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Over the weekend unemployed Canadians were shocked to see government ads in newspapers from coast to coast to coast, distributing an eight-page brochure saying how great the budget is.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, why is the government spending millions on propaganda to promote a budget at a time when it says it does not have a cent for people lined up at food banks and when it is actually cutting back on funds for the unemployed?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance in February was a recovery budget designed to get people back to work, designed to get the economy of this country going again.

One of the things that has been made loud and clear to us, as parliamentarians, all of us, is that the public needs more information on what the government is trying to accomplish. That has been shown time and time again.

We hear that in our constituency offices. We need more information.

The government has found that the best way to communicate and the most inexpensive way to communicate with the Canadian public is through the tabloids. I believe that if the hon. member takes time to read it, she will find it to be a very objective piece. I hope that all the citizens of Canada take that opportunity because it is a very important piece of communication with the Canadian public.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think unemployed Canadians across the country are indignant about this waste of money, and I would like to direct my question more specifically to the minister responsible for economic policy in Montreal.

Since the government spent $1.5 million on publicizing a budget that has cut funds for the unemployed by $100 million, does the minister responsible for economic policy in the Montreal region agree with the fact that money spent on this advertising campaign was wasted?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I don't think it is a waste of money, quite the contrary. As my colleague just mentioned, this is very important information that is intended to help Canadians understand the situation the government has to deal with.

As far as the Montreal region is concerned, if the hon. member is interested, I could make a list of all government investment in the Montreal region over the past years, to raise the economy to a level more acceptable than it was when the Liberals were defeated in 1984.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, not only is this advertising campaign a complete waste of money, it is also factually wrong. If the minister is so concerned about informing the public, why does this ad not mention that there is a $100 million cut in spending on job creation programs? Why does the ad not mention that there is a $1 billion cut in cash transfers for medicare? Why does the ad not mention that the government is completely withdrawing from unemployment insurance benefits?

In fact, if the budget is so good, why do taxpayers have to foot a bill in excess of $1 million to try to sell it from coast to coast to coast?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of selling the budget. The budget has sold itself and has been well received right across Canada.

Second, in research that has been done, 76 per cent of Canadians that have been polled say that this is the most effective way to communicate with the Canadian public.

• (1420)

Third, it is costing 15 cents per household to communicate with the Canadian people. I think that is money very well spent.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this 15 cent per household adds up to more than $1.5 million to distribute what is essentially Conservative propaganda which should be paid for by the Conservative Party and not by the taxpayer.

The ad asserts that the budget itself brings about "direct program spending increases to the unemployed and the elderly".

The minister must know that this is not true and the program spending increases are a result not of the budget but of legislation passed by this House years before the budget.

Why will the minister not admit that the ad is factually wrong and misleading? Why will he not withdraw the ad and the accompanying brochures and apologize to Canadians while he is doing it?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, if anybody should apologize to the Canadian public, it is the hon. member who said that he would resign if interest rates go up and he did not resign his seat at all. How can he stand there and make those claims?

I might say that there is an increase of some $1.6 billion going to senior citizens in 1991–92 and some $3 billion more going to unemployment insurance. Factually there is more money going to those people who need help in these tough times. That is factual. That is not misleading at all.

May I also say there is information in the mailer that has gone out regarding the streamlining of government management, the transfers to provinces which have not been cut. There are increases to the provinces that are going next year. There are tough new measures on expenditure control plans. There is controlling spending by law.

Which ones does the hon. member object to? Which ones is he going to fight? Why is he not in favour of better control over government finances? He was in the government that threw it away.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, not only is the government's ad false and misleading when it comes to the elderly and the unemployed, it also says: "The government will channel all GST and privatization revenues to a debt servicing and reduction fund".

This cannot be true, because the government's own budget document says on page 78 that "only any above projected revenues from the GST will make a contribution to deficit reduction".

Why has the government printed something in its pamphlet and brochure which is contradicted by its own budget document? Does this mean that the Minister of Finance and his colleague are in the running for the Governor General's award for fiction?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): A flash of humour. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about the mailer going out and costing $1.5 million. I can tell the hon. member that the Liberals holding up unemployment insurance and the GST legislation in the Senate cost millions and millions of dollars; a waste of the taxpayers' money, a waste of the taxpayers' money.

I can tell the hon. member that the information here is accurate. It is clear. If people want further information there are telephone numbers to call. The Canadian people have requested that information.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Of whom?

Mr. McDermid: I find it rather amazing that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra says I am history.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): He never said a word.

Oral Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

This week Canadians received this very costly eight-page pamphlet justifying the failed economic policies of this government. At the same time we learned that the government is advertising for crowd control measures which it wishes to put in at unemployment insurance offices.

This weekend we saw thousands of unemployed Canadians in Toronto saying: "We don't want unemployment insurance; we want jobs".

I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister: When is this government going to respond with a real employment program for Canadians instead of dismantling the Canadian economy? If this government wants to communicate effectively with Canadians, it should get Canadians working.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that she is the one who delayed for a long time Bill C-21 which put 500 million more dollars into training this year.

I think it is time that the NDP woke up and smelled the coffee about what the future is in this country. This budget is a plan for economic recovery for Canada, as my hon. colleague has said. We have learned and learned and learned, time and time again under the brain dead former government and the NDP, that make work projects do not help workers.

What helps workers is training. What helps workers is education. What helps workers is growth in the economy. What helps workers is lower interest rates. What helps workers is lower deficits. I would think the hon. member should have learned that by now.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canadians who are looking for a job, looking for some hope would wonder then why this government chose to cut $100 million from the Canada Jobs Strategy and chose to cut back on transfers for post-secondary education to get the Canadian population trained.

What we see the government saying in this pamphlet is that the debt is causing many of the problems we have today. The debt is important, but what we hear the government saying is that Canadians should share the burden. Instead it is the Canadian unemployed who are carrying the burden all by themselves.

There are reports of a recent Statistics Canada study which says that 44 per cent of the Canadian debt is caused directly by tax loopholes and letting the wealthy not pay their fair share in taxes.

When is the government going to stop those tax loopholes for corporations and make the wealthy pay their fair share, instead of blaming the victims and the unemployed for the state of this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, that last statement is just not accurate at all. We are not blaming the unemployed and the poor of this country at all for the situation that we find ourselves in, and she knows that. That is a very unfair but typical statement from the hon. member.

I want to remind the hon. member that the Minister of Finance over the last number of years has removed a lot of the tax loopholes. Corporations are now paying their fair share. Banks are paying income tax for the first time.

My hon. friend talks about capital gains. He does not believe in investment in this country. It is the farmer who has the capital gains and the small business people have the capital gains. He proposes that he is a great supporter of the farmers and small business, yet he wants to wipe out the exemption for capital gains for those people. What facetiousness.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this government keeps repeating the economy is already on the road to recovery and that with a little patience it will get there.

Mr. Speaker, people throughout the country know that is not true. It isn't like the situation in 1982, because most of the jobs that have been lost are gone forever.

What will this government do to help all those people who can't find work because there is no work?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, some jobs have been lost permanently through increased productivity, with new equipment, and so on.

However when the economy grows, so does the manufacturing base. We have seen the manufacturing base in this country grow since 1984 by 9.5 per cent, and that will continue. New industries will come and new permanent jobs will be created.

The hon. member says that this government is saying that the economy is back in full swing. We have not said that at all. What we have said is that there are signs of recovery starting, that it is going to take until the middle of this year before we can experience very good signs of recovery, and that we will be back in full swing in 1992.

That is what the Minister of Finance said in his budget, and that is what this government is saying.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture.

The Deputy Prime Minister knows that total net farm incomes are slated to drop by 54 per cent this year. In provinces like Saskatchewan and Manitoba there will be zero net farm income. This will be caused by world grain prices being very low in the 1990–91 crop year and by the cutbacks in government programs.

I wonder if the minister can tell the House and Canadian farmers today if there will be an emergency assistance program this spring to assist those producers. I ask him if he will spell out the details. Will the minister say when that financial assistance will be made available to those producers?

I ask this especially because the Minister of Finance seemed to suggest late last week in Saskatchewan that there would be no more assistance. I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture can clarify the situation for our farmers.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the House is currently considering the Farm Income Protection Act, a very important and comprehensive piece of legislation that will provide security, predictability and some stability for the agricultural industry, particularly the grains and oilseeds sector because it is primarily designed around that and that has been the priority of the safety net task force.

I am sure the hon. member is aware as well that since the low prices of January 1991 there has been some strengthening in world wheat prices of $10 to $12 per tonne, and that is clearly welcome.

We recognize that while the 1991 transitional Gross Revenue Insurance Program and Net Income Stabilization Account will not have an immediate effect upon producers' incomes. We recognize that the process of a transition or a bridging program is being defined by a third line of defence committee comprised of some 41 people, 19 producers and representatives of the federal-provincial governments.

At the present time we are designing a program that will meet the multifaceted nature of the requirements. I will be meeting with farm leaders on March 20, later this week, to develop further options in that regard.

I assure the hon. member that we are seized with this issue in a very serious vein. We hope we will be in a position to make some indication to the producers prior to mid-April.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I asked that question because last year the government announced a program at the end of March, did not give the criteria until the end of May and did not give the cheques until early in September. I hope that will not be repeated, and I hope the minister can give that assurance.

In view of the presentation made by Ontario horticultural producers last week that their industry needs a $70 million bridging assistance program before a long-term program comes into effect some time next year, can the minister give some assurance that short-term assistance will be provided to horticultural producers right across Canada, not just in Ontario but in P.E.I and other provinces, which are facing a very serious shortfall in their net farm income this year as well?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, the problem at hand is multifaceted.

Clearly the horticultural sector is one that is experiencing some difficulties. That as well will be taken into consideration by the third line safety committee.

Mr. Foster: When?

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member says: "When?" He just criticized us for announcing the program without the criteria.

We have established the criteria. We have the producers and the two levels of government sitting down with the industry trying to devise a program that will meet the need.

As the hon. member suggested, we are going to take a little more time this year to see that it is done right. Hopefully the hon. member will be on board and support it when we announce such a program, rather than pooh-poohing $500 million which was announced a year ago when he said it was insufficient.

In a period of tight fiscal restraint, we obviously have to spend our money wisely and we have to devise the kinds of programs that will be effective. That is precisely what we are doing.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Today, under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, dairy producers receive a subsidy of $6.04 per hectolitre. Is the minister prepared to commit his government today to providing a federal contribution that is at least that high under the new Farm Income Protection Act?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, unlike the Liberal Party when it was in government and provided a one-year dairy policy, we have put in place a five-year policy. When that policy expires, it will be reviewed in consultation with the industry and the provinces, as is customary by this government.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is not the Liberal government that cut back in the area of dairy support; it is the Conservative government across the way.

[Translation]

I have a supplementary for the same minister.

Last week, horticultural producers in Canada said that before the Farm Income Protection Act is passed, at least $70 million in assistance would have to be paid in a given province for the industry to survive, pending implementation of the minister's new program.

The minister said earlier that there would be a bridging program, pending the new legislation. Could he inform the House today when this program will be implemented and when Canadian horticultural producers can expect to receive their cheques?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before the horticultural producers can expect cheques, they have to become a party to the program. Those discussions are still going on, and there is some concern about whether in fact the horticultural industry will become members.

Mr. Boudria: Bridge financing.

Mr. Mazankowski: Before there can be bridge financing, there has to be a commitment to engage in the GRIP and NISA programs. Those discussions are ongoing right now. If the hon. member would like to get an update on the whole process, I would be glad to send him, in chronological form, just where we are at in terms of our discussions with the horticultural industry.

MEMBER FOR TRINITY—SPADINA

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

It concerns a colleague of mine and a member of this House, the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina, who went as a member of this House to observe elections in Mexico and has now had his visa cancelled because of the Mexican government's view, probably, that he was against the free trade agreement and the fraud in that election.

What does the minister intend to do about this incident? Will he tell members of the House whether or not he is prepared to protect the members of this House?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to hearing from our colleague when he returns.

The hon. member knows that Mexico has a right to revoke visas which it thinks are used for purposes other than the purpose for which they were granted, just as Canada does. When our colleague in the House sought a visa, he did not indicate to Mexican authorities the purpose for which he was planning to make use of that visa. He is still in Mexico. He is there with a tourist visa. He is allowed to stay in the country so long as he respects the term of the visa.

That is the kind of treatment that Canada would apply to people from other countries coming here to whom visas apply. Surely we should not complain if that same kind of treatment is accorded to Canadians who go to countries regarding which visas are required of Canadians.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I regret the embarrassment to the minister, but somebody has misinformed him and should be made aware of the fact that on March 4, this year, the member concerned sent, with a copy to his department, a letter to the Mexican ambassador stating as follows: "I am writing to request a visit to Mexico from March 12th to March 19th as part of a delegation to monitor elections in Morelos State. I will be visiting at the invitation of the PRD."

This is why the Government of Mexico gave him the visa, contrary to what the minister says.

I ask the minister to make a commitment to this House to come back and tell us who misinformed the minister. Second, what will the minister do to protect an MP who said clearly what he intended to go there for in the first place?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look at that, but let me make a larger point to the House. If it turns out—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The little point first and then the larger point.

• (1440)

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I am glad that the former Leader of the Opposition, the former Prime Minister is back in the House advising us of little points. I welcome him back.

If I was misinformed in my answer, I will certainly advise the House of that fact.

There is the other point I want to make. One of the important developments now in the world is that there is an an increasing willingness on the part of countries whose democratic systems Canadians have criticized, to invite election observers in. Canadians are responding formally to that kind of request.

When we have instances where individual members of Parliament go on their own and undertake the kind of activity in which unfortunately two members of this House have been involved in the last week, that can raise serious questions about the effectiveness and the willingness of Canada to take part in what most of us regard as a very welcome new development in countries whose regimes we have criticized being prepared to invite in observers to oversee their electoral processes. We would not want to see that kind of willingness on the part of—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move on. The hon. member for York West.

AIR TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the transport minister, I address my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the upcoming negotiations with the United States on the new open skies treaty.

The Deputy Prime Minister is well aware that the Canadian parliamentary committee which examined the open skies question unanimously rejected the inclusion of cabotage for American air carriers, namely the ability for American airlines to freely and fully cover the Canadian airspace and in between points.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this question. Why did the Minister of Transport last month give a major speech in Washington encouraging a new treaty, including full cabotage rights? Will the Deputy Prime Minister now give the government's assurance that the Canadian negotiators will not accept, under any circumstances, the granting of cabotage rights to American air carriers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that negotiations on open skies have not yet begun, so we cannot have violated the principle of the committee's observation concerning cabotage. The committee stated in its report that it did not want to tie the negotiators' hands. Am I to understand now that the hon. member is asking me to do so?

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is again to the Deputy Prime Minister who also was a Minister of Transport at one point. The minister knows that the Canadian air industry is already hurting badly; that thousands of jobs have been lost; that the market is in the hands of duopoly; and that Canadians and our regions are paying a price. We should not make it any worse.

Given that the option of allowing the giant American carriers to operate freely throughout Canada would mean the death knell for our Canadian industry because we simply cannot compete on an even scale, why will the Deputy Prime Minister not say no to any deal that would include cabotage rights for American carriers? Before going into negotiations, why will he not make cabotage a bottom line for the Canadian interests?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has given the assurance, as was reported in the media, that we have no intention of signing a new agreement that does not ensure the continued viability of the Canadian air transport industry.

Cabotage, as my hon. friend should know, is a market entry tool just like seats and gates and he should not get off his rocker until we negotiate the two agreements.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Deputy Prime Minister, the former Minister of Transport. Given that the quality of air service in the regions has deteriorated due to this government's agenda to privatize, and that jet service has been lost in many regional centres, does the Deputy Prime Minister really believe that American carriers will give a hoot about serving Canadians living Dryden, Sydney, Timmins, Stephenville, Val d'Or, just to name a few.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member certainly knows that the safety record in Canada is one of the best in the world. A prime concern of the Minister of Transport and the Department of Transport has been to maintain that safety. We will continue to do so under any circumstances.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): An artful dodge, but we are not talking about safety. We are talking about cabotage rights, the only bargaining chip the Minister of Transport has when he goes to bargain with the Americans, for gates and for routes. That is the only chip he has—cabotage in Canada.

"All aboard", says the minister of privatization. This whole issue smacks of what happened during the VIA Rail debates. What the minister is now telling Canadians and regional air travellers is that no matter what the cost, they are going to use it or they are going to lose it.

Witness again the government's claw of cost recovery. The regions have already lost their post offices. The regions have already lost their train services and are going to lose their air service.

The question is very simple. Why is the Deputy Prime Minister abandoning the regions of Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport and this government have no intention of abandoning the prosperity of any of the regions of Canada. We are entering into this open skies discussion to make sure that the prosperity of Canada is insured. Of course, I understand that the hon. member would not want to tie our hands before we start discussions.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

He will know that the Minister of National Revenue held a press conference in Vancouver an hour and a half ago, indicating a new government pilot project, where for a $10 pass, Canadians will be able to travel to the United States, do their shopping and come back across the border without having to stop at customs.

Recognizing the plight of small business and retailers generally in the border areas with the United States, the tremendous loss of business as consumers take advantage of bargains in the U.S., will the Deputy Prime Minister explain how this fast lane back into Canada without stopping at customs at all is going to assist small business and retailers in Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is really quite simple.

We have thousands and thousands of tourists from the United States who want to come to Canada. As a matter of fact, recent research that has just been tabled indicates twice as many Americans plan to come to Canada in the next two years than even the most optimistic Canadian tourist operator thought existed. As a result of that, we are putting in place a system whereby it is easier for American tourists to get into Canada. I think it is a pretty good idea.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I can only emphasize that this is a pilot project, so presumably the government is testing this for all the border crossings in Canada.

May I suggest that rather than facilitate Canadians shopping in the United States, would it not be more appropriate for the government to reduce the GST, reduce the interest rates and reduce the high cost of the Canadian dollar. In other words, make it more attractive to Canadians to shop in Canada as opposed to finding ways and means to facilitate Canadians shopping in the United States of America.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has the whole problem in reverse, which is frequently the case for the NDP.

Mr. McDermid: Right on.

Mr. Hockin: The problem is, as Canadian retailers, restauranteurs, hotel owners, resort owners, how do we get Americans to come to Canada? We did two things. We said we would rebate them the GST on accommodation and the things they wanted to buy and now we are making it easier for them to get into the country.

SCIENCE

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Last Thursday, the Minister of Finance acknowledged he had been unable to persuade his cabinet colleagues to provide adequate financing for training young researchers in natural sciences and engineering. The question is this: If the government is unable to take the lead, how can we convince young people to pursue a career in science?

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister for Science, who is not here today, I have to remind the hon. member that we have 2,000 students a year in the Canada Scholarships Program, one-half of them female. A large number of them are going into the sciences as a result of that program. That is a new program started by our government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hockin: So that this pool of young people will have attractive, vital scientific opportunities, we have given $240 million to the Networks and Centres of Excellence Program. That is a new project under our government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hockin: For young people wanting to go into science I remind them of not just those two things, but this government has increased spending from $4.1 billion in 1984-1985 to an estimated $5.5 billion in 1990-1991. This is a real increase of 8 per cent. This government puts S and T above just about any of its priorities.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): If that is the case, perhaps the minister can explain how it is his colleague admitted that funding for the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council has declined. It has gone down as a percentage of our Gross National Product since his government took office. His colleague admitted it last week in committee. He admitted himself that he has not been able to obtain enough funding from his cabinet colleagues.

My question to the minister is the following. Will the government at long last commit to providing the urgently needed funding for university research and the training of the next generation of young scientists across Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, in the last six years, until the middle of last year, the Canadian Gross National Product has been growing at record rates. Because of that, government spending has also had to be trimmed back in order to make sure it did not have an inflationary impact to this tremendous growth of the Canadian economy.

The numbers that I quoted have the NRC being increased 5 per cent in this coming fiscal year which is far better than the average spending for government increase across the board.

HEALTH

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. An American woman has been awarded $4.5 million by a U.S. court as a result of cancer caused by the foam of a Meme breast implant. This court has obviously decided there is reasonable doubt about the safety of the Meme. In addition, Laval University scientists have also released a study showing this foam to be carcinogenic.

Canadian women demand that the minister pull this device from the Canadian market immediately.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I assume that there is a question—

Mr. Speaker: There is not a question but there certainly is an issue. If the hon. minister would like to respond he has the floor.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I assume that the question was: "Is the government prepared to withdraw the Meme from the market in Canada?"

As the hon. member will be well aware, studies have been done in Canada which indicate no threat to the health of women who use the Meme. We are continuing to follow research that is being done in the United States and to ask for further information about breast implants in Canada.

Should we come into possession of any information suggesting a threat to women's health as a result of breast implants, we would obviously take appropriate action.

I should mention with regard to the Laval studies that, as the hon. member knows, we have attempted to replicate similar studies at the University of Ottawa to determine whether or not toxic agents are released under conditions found in the body, and at body temperature. Mr. Speaker, such experiments could not be replicated.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

It seems odd that the U.S. food and drug administration is taking steps to protect women and yet this government is not prepared to do so. The U.S. has already implemented new regulations and the minister responsible for health and welfare has done nothing.

Is the minister more concerned with protecting a U.S. company than he is with protecting Canadian women?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Of course not, Mr. Speaker. The assertions made by the hon. member are simply false.

First of all, what is happening in the United States is they are examining all breast implants, not just the Meme. We will, in turn, be getting that information from the Americans, and looking closely at anything that comes forward. We will also be looking at the decision of the court in New York city as well.

In addition to that, we have taken independent action in Canada to seek information. We will take any action that is necessary to protect the health of Canadian women. That is the commitment we make and it is one that we have kept.

I have also offered to the hon. member and to all other hon. members in the House that if they would like a full briefing on the subject by the scientists in my department, we would be pleased to make arrangements for that.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the Fraser River in British Columbia is under considerable pressure from pulp mill pollution, agricultural run-off and the Alcan project. The river will die unless action is taken soon.

In the Green Plan, the Minister of the Environment committed the government to a Fraser River Basin Action Plan. He also promised to double the fish population of the river.

My question is to the minister. Can he confirm news reports that he cancelled an announcement concerning the Fraser River on Friday? Why the delay? When will he make an announcement supporting a complete management plan for the Fraser River?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to reconfirm today the government's intention to move ahead with the clean-up of the Fraser River. An announcement had been initially scheduled for last Friday. It was not delayed; it was postponed because there were further consultations to be had. Those consultations will be ongoing this week and I hope to have the announcement ready very shortly.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister of small business and tourism.

I wonder if the minister would like to come down to Windsor and explain to the people of Windsor this idea he has to increase the number of Canadians who are shopping in the United States, how making it easier for Canadians to shop in the United States is going to help the one-third of the downtown retailers who have closed their stores and how it is going to help the people of Windsor who have seen $150 million in retail purchases go to the United States. I want him to explain to Windsorites how this cockamamie idea of increasing Canadian shopping is going to help Windsor businesses or businesses in other border cities in this country.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. members knows I would very much like to come to Windsor at any time. He is also criticizing the report from the Windsor Chamber of Commerce which was brought to Ottawa last week and which argued for the very thing that he is arguing against.

The Chamber of Commerce in Windsor wants more business for Windsor. It wants better flow through the tunnel and better flow over the Ambassador Bridge. The way to do that is to have a quick method and an extra lane and that is what they recommended.

MONTREAL'S ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Montreal region. Not long ago, we heard that Montreal is the unemployment capital of Canada. Last week, we were told that in January alone, retail sales dropped by 20 per cent in Montreal. Could the minister, who is responsible for the Montreal region in cabinet, put pressure on the Finance Minister to introduce measures to put Montreal's economy back on track and provide jobs for 250,000 unemployed workers in that city?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Saint-Léonard for his question, which shows his abiding interest in the Montreal region and especially in East Montreal.

I would like to take this opportunity to inform the hon. member that the government did not wait until the last few weeks to take some very concrete measures to improve the economic climate of Montreal Island. We have invested millions and millions of dollars in the Montreal economy in the past two years.

In particular, we developed a measure called Bill C-21 to get more money to the unemployed and help them adjust to the new technology jobs that are being created, and it is too bad the legislation could not have been implemented sooner, because of the Liberal senators who blocked the bill for so long in the Senate.

Point of Order

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for a supplementary, but a very short one, please.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister says millions of dollars were invested, but I may remind him that in Montreal unemployment rose from 10 per cent to nearly 15 per cent in one year. It is time to act. When will the government introduce policies to deal with this very distressing situation in Montreal?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, it seems the hon. member for Saint-Léonard doesn't realize that before creating jobs, and especially with the new technology we have nowadays, we must ensure that people are properly trained to use that new technology. We have been repeating this in the House fore twelve months, Mr. Speaker, to urge the hon. member to ensure that his colleagues in the Senate would adopt Bill C-21 so that we would have the requisite funding. We have it now, and we are on the job, Mr. Speaker.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In answer to my colleague for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, I was wrong in an answer I gave him. I should make it clear that I was wrong because I misread a briefing note prepared for me by officials. Our colleague for Trinity—Spadina did in fact specify the purpose of his application for a visa to Mexico. The Mexicans issued the visa on March 6. That is surprising because the Mexican Constitution prohibits any participation by foreigners in the Mexican electoral process. On March 15 the Government of Mexico sent a diplomatic note to Canada saying it had made an error. The Canadian Embassy advised our colleague for Trinity—Spadina, indicating that he was nonetheless able to stay in Mexico on a tourist visa so long as he did not violate the Mexican Constitution and take part in the electoral process.

As I said, we will look at the matter. I apologize to the House for inadvertently misleading members, and I will report to the House if there is further action we should take, although I should indicate that it is not surprising, even if it was late in doing it, that Mexico should follow a policy that adheres to the letter and the spirit of its Constitution.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I want to thank the minister for correcting the information given to this House. But it still begs the question; the question that I raised was the fact that there was an invitation by an official opposition party, clearly stated in the letter. Furthermore, it went through your department, Mr. Minister. Someone in your department should have been aware of this as well.

Mr. Speaker: I am not going to cut off the exchange as it is an important matter. However, I would ask hon. members to put their questions through the Chair.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Chair.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Point of order.

Mr. Speaker, during question period I inadvertently named the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra for heckling. It was not him, and I apologize to the right hon. gentleman.

WITHDRAWAL OF COMMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, while we are on a run, on Friday, March 15, 1991 I rose in the House during Question Period on questions regarding the budget and letters that had been sent by the Secretary of the Treasury Board the day after the budget. I said that the government deliberately misled the House. That may not go against the strict rules of the House but for the peace, order and good government of this House, I withdraw those remarks.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to designate tomorrow an allotted day.

QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order respecting Question Period. At least three different questioners from the Liberal Party, the hon. member for York West, the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount, prefaced their questions with "in the absence of this minister", and "in the absence of that minister".

As you know, Mr. Speaker, it is against our practices and rules to indicate the presence or absence of any member. By continuing this practice, which admittedly has been widely used, they are in essence doing that and if it is going to be a quid pro quo situation, then presumably that is to invite members from this side to stand up and acknowledge who is not present on the other side. I do not think that would contribute to what Question Period is all about.

I would also like to express concern about a situation I also feel is inappropriate, given the strictures in Beauchesne as to what Question Period is supposed to be. Questions by the hon. members for York West and Hamilton West were directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in his role as a former Minister of Transport. I think there are submissions by your predecessors in Beauchesne which make it clear that questions in terms of former capacities are out of order.

I see the new member, newly elected and not aware of past practices, is chuckling over there. Perhaps he would learn a little bit.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The hon. government House leader has risen on a question of order with respect to the way we conduct our Question Period. It is not the first time this matter has been raised in the last very recent interval. I think hon. members would want to extend the same courtesy to the hon. minister that have been extended to other members when the matter has been raised.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I believe it also not to be in keeping with the strictures of Beauchesne to insist, as did the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for York West, that this must be answered by the Deputy Prime Minister.

Again, Beauchesne makes it very clear that the purpose of Question Period is for all members of the House, opposition members, and backbenchers, to have an opportunity to seek information from the Chair. I agree that we have separated a long way from that in recent years.

In view of comments by yourself the other day in terms of decorum in the House and what should be appropriate in this House of Commons, in view of comments by the House leader of the Liberal Party last week in terms of his concern about the number of people who have an opportunity to rise for questions, I would like to bring to the Chair my concern about Question Period and the way questions are being answered. I would refer again to Beauchesne. May I humbly suggest that all of our goals as responsible parliamentarians interested in pursuing the public interest in a way that does not bring disfavour and disgrace on all of us by way of the antics in here might in fact be well served if we agreed again to honour these practices, have the Chair enforce them, or, if not, to then agree to look at them, see which we do agree to, and again ask the Chair to enforce them.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat humorous to have the government House leader stand in his place and lecture members of the opposition with respect to decorum and ways in which we pose questions to government ministers.

I do want to thank the hon. member opposite for allotting tomorrow a supply day. There will be no real discussion with regard to House leaders on that matter, but I want to thank him for his co-operation on that.

• (1510)

With regard to Question Period, the points that have been raised by myself and others in this party on previous occasions had to do primarily with the time both of the question and of the response.

I want to tell the Chair and all members of this House that we have complete confidence in the Chair. We do not wish to lecture the Chair in any way in terms of the rulings of Beauchesne. It is rather somewhat unique that the government House leader would want to quote—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can assist. I did not take anything that the hon. House leader said as a lecture to the Chair.

There has been discussion going on back and forth now for a while. I think the discussion is sincerely meant to try to handle the affairs in this place as well as we possibly can. I do not take these comments, whether they come from either side, as a lecture to the Chair.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we certainly appreciate your interventions.

However, those of us on this side of the House would conclude that the government House leader is once again transcending the bounds that we believe to be appropriate and fitting in the circumstances by lecturing members of the Opposition as to what is precisely in Beauchesne and what is not in Beauchesne.

From time to time, we have deviated from Beauchesne as government members have deviated from Beauchesne from time to time.

If the minister's comments are made in the light of trying to perfect some of the discrepancies which occur in Question Period, fine, if that is the light in which they are given, but I would hope that the minister would take under active consideration the point of the matter that ministers of the Crown repeatedly and regularly stand in their places and give long, verbose answers to questions which we believe are succinct and to the point.

I would hope that the hon. member opposite would give active consideration to that. I know that the Chair will give active consideration to that because Mr. Speaker has instructed the Clerk to gather information for us that we may want to use and discuss at future House leaders' meetings on that particular point.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order I would hope that the government House leader will stand again in his place, perhaps tomorrow after he has reviewed Hansard, to issue a retraction. This member for Hamilton West did not refer in his remarks, as the minister said I did, to the absence of the Minister of Transport.

In fact, I directed a question to the Deputy Prime Minister, who was once Minister of Transport. I apologize if I was to lend any credibility to the Deputy Prime Minister as well as his official duties as the Deputy Prime Minister to also be a knowledgeable gentleman on the facts as they pertain to transport.

I would hope that correction is forthcoming. If I have made any incorrect statement in the House, to my own defence I would only say that as a new member, and having heard the line of questioning for the past two years, I would only assume that that was the correct procedure.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to rise on this point order.

Just a few minutes ago, I got up and withdrew my comments of Friday. I did not think I had broken the rules, but I recognized that the nature of what I had said had upset some members of the House. I think I also upset the person in charge of the mikes too, since they keep going off and on.

Mr. Speaker: Let's see if we can get started all over again.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I believe I am speaking to the House.

I have had many occasions when I have not been allowed to speak in the House, but this is one of the more unusual occurrences in which this is happening.

Mr. Speaker: Don't push it too far.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, what is happening in the House right now with regard to the mikes actually illustrates what I was trying to say in the House, that the government House leader is correct in some ways in saying that we should not be referring to the absence of ministers or any other members of the House. However, I think the nature of the questions that are asked quite often is not referring to the absence of a minister in a derogatory sense, but is referring or trying to explain to the House why a question is being deferred to another minister.

I recognize that any member of the cabinet can get up and answer a question and that there are ministers designated from time to time to answer questions in the absence of another minister. However, sometimes it makes sense if the person asking the question gets up and says: "In the absence of the Minister of the Environment, I am asking my questions of the minister of energy". There might be a very logical reason for doing that.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, as we do quite often, recognizing that we do have rules of the House, that sometimes it makes a lot more sense for common sense to prevail and that in the case quite often when members get up, make reference to the absence of a member or a minister that it really assists the House and certainly assists those people who are watching in the public.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, let me first respond to the member for Hamilton West who indicates that he did not state: "In the absence of the Minister of Transport", he may well be right. If I inferred otherwise, I apologize to him.

In terms of his other comments, he made perhaps a very relevant point in commenting that as a relatively new member he is following the examples set. I understand that and it is quite appropriate. I guess my point is that in a variety of ways, through things happening and being duplicated and triplicated and becoming the norm, we have established practices which are being criticized by our own members in terms of the opportunity to ask questions and to respond, and by those who watch in terms of the relevance to the governing of Canada of some of the actions that occur.

In the context of the question raised the other day by the House leader of the Liberal Party as to the question of time, I rose then, and I just repeat today and raised examples today of wherein it may well be appropriate for us to re-examine the definitions of what Question Period is, as stated in Beauchesne, or with those things that are no longer relevant and adopt and enforce those which would be appropriate to what we want to see.

Again, the member for Churchill is still here, I would comment with regard to what he suggested, that sometimes it might be appropriate to ask a question "in the absence of", the difficulty is in terms of what it does for the minister who is not there. It says to everybody who is watching: "The minister is not in his seat. He is not in Ottawa." The question, in order to protect the reputation, if you will, to establish that he or she is bona fide involved in government business, presumably invites a session where somebody stands up and says: "While the Minister of the Environment is currently touring the Fraser Valley", and so on and so forth, and to go through that exercise.

My understanding is that is why Beauchesne, and based on previous Speakers' rulings, indicates it is inappropriate to raise the question of the absence of ministers from the House. All I am asking is that until we change that rule, let us enforce. it.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat perplexed by the comments of the government House leader today. It has been the practice of this House for some time to put a question in the fashion that he objects to today, to say that in the absence of such and such a minister, I put my question to the Prime Minister or to the Deputy Prime Minister or whatever. I have never heard anyone object to this. Indeed, this formulation is intended to assist cabinet. We know very well that ministers are given the task of responding for other ministers. To me, it has always been the common sense way of drawing attention to the responsibility and getting the attention of perhaps the cabinet minister who had been asked to respond for another.

I really do not know what alternative there would be. I would seek your suggestion, Mr. Speaker, or the advice of the government House leader in this regard. Perhaps one would say my question relates to science and I bring it to the attention of cabinet in the hope that there is someone who is qualified to answer. Maybe he would prefer that.

I think you would agree, Mr. Speaker, that it might be a bit longer and it might take up more time in Question Period to put questions in that fashion.

Again, I really wonder what is behind this. Why did the government House leader raise it in this fashion? Perhaps he has a legitimate point. It seems to me that this kind of matter ought not to be raised without warning on the floor of the House of Commons. These are the kinds of questions where there are other fora for consideration of matters of this nature.

I ask the government House leader perhaps to reconsider his manner of dealing with questions like this.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can be of assistance. When some of us who are in this Chamber first came here, including the government House leader, myself and others who are here—it is getting to be a long time ago—and something happened during Question Period with which another member umbrage, Question Period could be interrupted with a point of order. That was eventually done away with by agreement of all hon. members in order to get on with Question Period.

I am as aware as anybody else in this place that from time to time there are complaints about Question Period, or at least suggestions for its improvement. It comes not only from both sides of the House, but it also comes from the country.

The hon. government House leader has raised a matter and I think the appropriate thing to do is to go back a few days. I certainly appreciate the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount and the very cordial and courteous way in which he has approached this matter. I think it would be helpful if there were some discussions about some of these matters. Certainly I do not think it is appropriate for me today to lay down any dictates. If hon. members want to go back into the past, there were some very clear statements made by past Speakers as to exactly how Question Period should be conducted. Those statements gave a certain degree of constraint on both questions and answers. If the House wishes to come to me and suggest that we make some adjustments to our present practices, as I said the other day, I would certainly be prepared to listen.

I do want to remind hon. members that once upon a time the practice was that if there was a complaint it was taken up in the middle of Question Period. We decided that it ought not to be done at that time. The hon. House leader has raised it subsequent to Question Period, as is the right of all hon. members and he of course has the right to do.

I would hope that we could have some discussions. I think there is a genuine feeling in the House that Question Period is perhaps a unique institution of our country and a very important one but that we want to make it as effective and as fair as we possibly can. I will look forward to hearing from hon. members in this regard.

PRIVILEGE

CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT MADE ON THE JOURNAL

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in the House to clarify a statement I made on March 14 on the CBC program The Journal. I apologize for the fact that part of what was broadcast last Thursday may have given a wrong impression of my opinion of native people. I am very sorry if my comments gave the impression that I was referring to native people as a whole. I can assure the House that such was not the case, because what I had in mind was the behaviour of certain warriors during the crisis at Oka last summer, a crisis that left its mark on us all.

I may add that these remarks were made in the context of a conference meeting with a group of social agencies. The meeting was about federalism and Canadian unity. The agencies had an opportunity to talk about the past and about their concerns for the future. It was an open, friendly and public discussion, the kind I regularly have with my constituents and certain business groups.

I want to emphasize that I never expressed any threats of any kind towards any group whatsoever.

And how could I, Mr. Speaker, since these people are important members of my community. Many of them, with whom I have worked for many years, I consider as my friends, because their efforts have helped me to improve the social conditions in my riding.

Mr. Speaker, this array of opinions expressed by 19 groups—not 190, a figure that was referred to out of context in the House and outside the House—may have set the rumour mill going in Ottawa, but we should not judge these opinions out of context. They should be judged in a context that leaves no room for any misunderstanding.

I only went so far as to mention or point out that curiously, some anti-federal groups have no compunction about cashing cheques from the federal government and wearing a "Participation Québec" badge. Those are facts, facts that can be checked and were checked.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I can give this House the assurance that I am still determined to defend the cause of a united Canada with a strong Quebec, and my efforts will continue, with due respect for all ethnic groups and all persons concerned, and especially for all Quebeckers.

MEMBER FOR LAVAL-EST

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of privilege for which I have given notice.

I would like to quote from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition, citation 27, which reads:

> A genuine question of privilege is a most serious matter and should be taken seriously by the House.

I take this matter very seriously. It pertains to the comments just made by the hon. member for Laval-Est, in which I heard no apology to the aboriginal people of Canada.

I would like to quote from the transcript of the comments of the hon. member, which reads:

> It's like the Indians. They don't like our laws, they don't respect this, they don't respect the Constitution, but they want to have the money.

This matter deals with remarks about aboriginal people made by the hon. member last Thursday, March 14, on CBC's The Journal. I respectfully submit that my privilege as a member of Parliament has been breached and that a contempt of Parliament has thus occurred. The hon. member's statements reflect on the House as a whole and reflect on individual members thereof, namely the aboriginal members of this House.

According to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition, at page 11, parliamentary privilege is enjoyed by individual members and by each House for the protection of its members and the vindication of its own authority and dignity.

I submit that the hon. member's statements impinge on my ability and that of the other aboriginal MPs in this House to do their jobs properly. We have been misrepresented, and these remarks are derogatory not only to us but to the dignity of the entire House of Commons.

Mr. Joseph Maingot, in Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, stated at page 213:

> There are actions which, while not directly in a physical way obstructing the House of Commons or the member, nevertheless obstruct the House in the performance of its functions by diminishing the respect due it.

I respectfully submit that respect for this House has been diminished in two ways by the comments of the hon. member for Laval–Est. Again I refer to the transcripts of The Journal, and I would like to table this with the Clerk.

First, the member's comments were racially based and discriminatory against aboriginal people in Canada. The elimination of racism and prejudice—

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: Not to take anything away from the issue, whatever the member's complaint is, an hon. member has got up and said that under no circumstances did he mean it to be a slight against any of the people of Canada.

Second, I have to apply the rules in this as I would have to apply them in any other case. It is very difficult for me, despite the complaint the hon. member may have, to see how this in any way impinges upon his ability to do his duty as a member of Parliament in this House or anybody else's ability to do their duty.

What we have here clearly is a remark. The hon. member has stood in his place and we have to accept in this place the hon. member's word that he was not referring to all of the aboriginal peoples of our country. He was referring to a specific thing and he has made it very clear. I certainly have accepted what he said as making it very clear that he is not insulting nor is he casting aspersions on any group of Canadians, and certainly not aboriginal Canadians.

I have to say to the hon. member that the complaint is made. I see the hon. member for Shefford wants to rise on this matter. It will have to be a very pertinent statement indeed because I am in the midst of saying that there may be a complaint here. If there was, it has been met by an hon. member on the other side and it is not a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Shefford, very briefly. I am bowing of course to the fact that he is a senior member here.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I think that if you look at the comments made by the hon. member for Laval–Est, you will realize that he withdrew his insulting remarks about certain native people but did not withdraw all comments that were specifically directed to sovereigntists, a group to which I belong. In his comments, he said they did not respect the Constitution—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: He may or he may not have. This place is an adversary forum and we all know that. There are going to be lots of things said that are political. We once had a member here, a gentleman in whom I hold very high regard, who said: "The trouble with this place is it is getting too political". It is a political place, but as far as I am concerned the hon. member, if there were any question of privilege, has made it clear there is not. I do not think there was a question of privilege in the first place. That does not mean that there might not have been a complaint.

The hon. member has certainly got up and, to my satisfaction, has said that he did not mean an insult and if that is the way it appeared he clearly did not want it to be so.

The fact that we have arguments about different people's political positions in the country is something which takes place here at all times. That is the end of the issue.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I informed you of my intention to review Hansard and, if necessary, raise a point of privilege arising from Question Period.

In my view, members must be vigilant when replies stray into derogatory personal remarks and away from the substance of the issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: We do respect the Constitution, but he fails to see that.

Members of the Parti Quebecois are citizens who pay taxes like anybody else.

[English]

Mrs. Catterall: It is very difficult to understand that I do have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

If I may go back to my previous question and ask my colleagues to be somewhat more polite, in my view members must be vigilant when replies from ministers stray into derogatory personal remarks and away from the substance, as the government House leader did on Friday. Such remarks diminish the House and diminish the member.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. What exactly were the remarks and in what way is it a question of privilege?

There is a big difference between complaining about something and having a question of privilege. The essence of privilege which goes back hundreds of years is: Has somebody done something that makes it impossible or makes it less likely or less able for an individual member to carry on his or her duties as a member of Parliament to speak freely? That is what privilege is.

Hon. members may complain about all kinds of things that we say about each other in this place. It is not necessarily privilege. I would ask the hon. member to tell me just exactly what was said and why it is a question of privilege.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, in fact having reviewed Hansard I may find some unwarranted insults and something that peaked my umbrage, but no specific breach of privilege and I therefore withdraw my request to you.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate very much the hon. member's comments. Perhaps it will help us all.

There are other places and other ways to carry on the debate. I want to say to the hon. member my very sincere thanks for helping the Chair. I appreciate it.

CANADIAN GRAINS COMMISSION

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the annual report of the Canadian Grains Commission for the crop year ending July 31, 1990 and the fiscal year ending March 31, 1990.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 32(5), this report is referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

PETITIONS

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several hundred residents from my riding and adjacent ridings, in which they point out that 85 per cent of visa and immigration activities in New Delhi take place from people living in the Punjab, that the Canadian consular service in New Delhi is now overly burdened, and that it is difficult for the people travelling from the Punjab because they must travel for three days into a city that is often dangerous for people from the Punjab to be in.

The petitioners ask that the Canadian government open a new Canadian consulate and immigration office in the Punjab to provide the level of service required for immigration, visitors' visas and related services.

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a number of petitions.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, a number of rural Canadians is disturbed at the deterioration of the quality of life in rural areas.

These petitions are signed by a large number of constituents and people from rural areas. They call upon Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life by immediately implementing new economic and social policies to enable rural Canadians to continue to work and live in their communities while still being able to provide a decent quality of life for their families.

The petitioners call upon us to take some action in that form.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of other petitions to present, one which may be a little late in arriving but which calls upon the government to deal with the privatization of Petro-Canada so that Petro-Canada can remain a Crown corporation, acting in the best interests of all Canadians.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of people from Saskatoon and surrounding communities.

They call upon Parliament to urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the CBC so that it can fulfil its mandate and its role as the heartbeat of Canada and to re-examine its priorities in terms of decreasing funding for Canadian institutions and its insistence on privatization. All of these have an impact on the quality of life in rural Canada.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by many constituents of my riding of Northumberland.

The petitioners state that whereas the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child sets the standard of protection and care to children far superior to anything we know and experience in Canada and countries world-wide, and whereas the convention will address the basic health, nutritional, social and economic problems that are the cause of much child suffering throughout the world, my constituents want to encourage the federal government to speedily review its legislation and policies in order to achieve consistency in our policies here with the UN convention and to ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child as soon as possible.

THE SENATE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two petitions. The first is signed by many constituents of my riding and relates to the Senate.

The petition indicates the very clear purpose under which my constituents believe the Senate was established in 1867 and the valuable purpose that it then served. It goes on to indicate that they do not believe that purpose is being served today and they therefore call upon the Parliament of Canada to abolish the Senate outright.

FOOD AND DRUG REGULATIONS

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the second petition presented under Standing Order 36 is signed by many constituents of the greater Toronto area and deals with allergy information.

Many people in Canada suffer from allergies. They are concerned that restaurants and food packages are not required to disclose all of the contents of food. Therefore the petitioners have requested that the Parliament of Canada enact legislation amending food and drug regulations to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in prepackaged foods in place of the general classifications now permitted. They further request that restaurants and food retailers be required to provide on demand to customers a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

Both these are respectfully submitted.

Mr. Leonard Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): As indicated in Part III of the 1991-92 Estimates for the Privy Council office, the total forecasted costs are as follows:

a)	Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation	$ 23,100,000
b)	Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies	$ 24,700,000
c)	Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing	$ 19,900,000

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—FARM INCOMES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Foster (p. 18577).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate at 2 p.m. the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt had the floor. He has 18 minutes left.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is one calling on the government to take action regarding the lack of income for this particular year. It puts before this House the problem of funding for the seeding of the crop in this particular year.

It is a laudable motion, something that we would support. However, if one looks at the record of the government, one also has to think that maybe it is a motion that is a little bit futile. Last year when this government promised that we would have a certain amount of assistance by spring work, many of us were still waiting for it when we harvested the crop that it was supposed to help seed.

The minister, in answering a question just before Question Period, when he made his presentation to this House, also indicated that there was likely to be a considerable hold-up, because he attached all of the bridging funding to the GRIP and NISA programs. Therefore, it is a little difficult to believe that this government is going to do anything for the farmers in time for them to be able to use the assistance for the planting of crops this year.

This government has made it clear that what it intends to do as far as agriculture is concerned is to commit the industry to a market system, a trading system, and a financial system which makes it unlikely the first two of these three systems will allow the farmers enough income so that they can make a living comparable to most other parts of the economy.

The Minister of Agriculture and the government generally make a great song and dance about the fact that we must be competitive, we must fit ourselves into the market system. They make a great song and dance about getting away from direct support to the farmer. Their theme has been to put in place a safety net which would guarantee the farmers enough return for them to survive in farming.

Mr. Speaker, it all sounds very good, and it may even help somebody. But the government, for all its great propaganda about how it has always come to the aid of the farmer and how it will do so in the future—and we heard that again during Question Period today—it has not improved the position of the farmer relative to income in the last six years.

If you were to look at the structure of the income of farmers in today's dollars, you would find that it has gone down considerably—the income has gone down considerably—even with the increase in aid that the government has given them. I am sure you would find it very difficult to find a farmer who would say they are better off today than they were six years ago. I am sure if you went out and asked, that you would have no one volunteer that they are in a better position now than they were six years ago. Certainly, there is no one in the industry who would indicate that is the position they would take.

During the last six years, this government has dispersed among farmers a considerable amount of help in the form of debt review boards, has written off the deficit for the Western Grain Stabilization, and has also expended the amount of money it has given in direct assistance.

But, after all that, we find an industry that is much worse off than it was six years ago.

So, Mr. Speaker, we come to the position that we find ourselves in today. We look at last year's income and we find that it was considerably less than the cost of production. In other words, a large portion of the farmers who were in the industry last year did not make as much as they spent. Even after the government assistance was in place, they did not make as much as they spent. It is predicted that the 1991–1992 crop year will also produce less income than it did last year. The GRIP and NISA plans are supposed to take that up, but the GRIP and NISA plans do not come into effect until the end of this year.

• (1550)

Most industries, if they had that kind of return for several years for their efforts would have curled up and quit. The farmers are a different breed. They go on producing. They hope that society recognizes they are contributing something of considerable value and will, therefore, make sure that they can survive.

I suppose, to a certain extent, we have done this. However, there are far fewer farmers now than there were a few years ago. The quality of life in the farm communities is lowering considerably each year.

As I said, society should recognize that farmers contribute considerably to the community. They produce much of the food we eat. There is good reason to believe society would do this. Besides the fact they are producing a considerable amount of the food eaten in Canada, the agricultural industry contributes what we call—I cannot quite come up with the word—but for every dollar paid to the farmer, there is about $7 generated within the general economy. Multiplier is the word I was looking for. This multiplier factor should be recognized by society as a good reason to keep the farmers on the land producing food.

Every farm job kept in place produces quite a large number of other jobs. I can give some examples. These are not direct multipliers, but they give some indication of the effect the farm community has on industry in Canada.

For instance, bread is usually the main product we think of from the farm community. A grain producer gets about 4 cents for the wheat used in a loaf of bread that costs anywhere from $1 to $1.50. That gives a multiplier of something around 33.

A farmer gets 1 cent for the barley used to make a $2 bottle of beer.

Cooking oil, from canola—which is one of the healthiest cooking oils on the market—the farmer gets 60 cents for the canola used in a litre of canola oil which will sell at something over $2.

Even something as simple as sugar cookies, the farmer gets 2 cents for the wheat used in cookies and those cookies are usually worth about $3.

Rye whisky produces a considerable amount of income for the government; it is more often called Canadian whisky in this part of the country. The farmers get 1 cent for the rye that is used in a 40 ounce bottle of whiskey. Most of that multiplier, if you wish, is paid as taxation to the government.

I grant that these multipliers I have mentioned here are not direct, because other products are used in the making of making of the products sold. Consequently, there is not a direct relationship.

It gives us an indication of the impact agriculture has on other industries. For instance, the oats that are used in a $4.88 package of oat bran flakes will only bring the farmer about a cent and a half. Society should recognize that we owe a lot to the farmer in other jobs and in other activity in the community.

To a great extent, the point that is being made here by most of us who are part of the agricultural industry is that agricultural production is important. If we do not pay enough for the product for the farmer to survive, it means that we are reducing the effectiveness of the economy to some extent.

As long as the farmer keeps producing, the rest of the industry can survive. We cannot expect farmers to go on indefinitely producing at a loss. Consequently, eventually we will be looking to other countries for the products that we now buy at home.

If we think of a multiplier factor of seven times for every dollar paid to a farmer, we recognize that agriculture has a major impact upon the economy of the country. Also, it is one of the major suppliers of foreign currency to our government.

The government tells us that it has been helping the farmers with special programs and in other ways for many years. We will grant that it has, but its plan was not to help the industry. It has not helped the industry, because the industry is still going downhill.

For example, during 1989-90, even with government help, the farmers did not recover all of their costs. In 1990-91, unless the government gives them some direct help, the amount of income will be less than it was last year. What they need now are contributions directly, which will give them enough cash so that they can plant their crops this spring.

When the Minister of Agriculture spoke a little while ago in answer to a question we put to him, he said that the government will do something when it is able to do so and when it has enough involvement in the GRIP and NISA plan.

On several occasions over the last year, farm organizations had pressed the Minister of Agriculture to make a statement on whether or not he was going to assist the farmers in bridging the gap between last year's shortfall in income and the establishment of the GRIP and NISA programs. It was well known for some time that that gap in income was going to be there. The farmers have been asking the minister and the Government of Canada what they intended to do about this gap. Again, that is what is being asked today in this motion.

The minister stated: "Leave it until after we have solved the safety net problem." That might have been some relief to somebody, but it did not assure anybody that they were going to get any funds.

The minister also stated: "We have always helped the farmers when they needed it. We will do so in the future." He made that statement again today, and again there was no commitment to funds for the bridging process.

• (1600)

Later on he said that any answer to this question would be correlated with the GRIP or the NISA program. In the process of making that statement, he indicated to us that he was making it dependent upon the GRIP or the NISA program. In fact he almost threatened—and he did not renege from that position when I asked him the question today—that if people do not join GRIP, they cannot expect to have any assistance. The assistance required is for this year. GRIP is going to pay for next year. It is very unusual or very disturbing to find the government saying that if you do not sign up for GRIP and NISA, which will do you for next year, it will not pay you anything this year.

The first ministers have announced that the GRIP and NISA papers will be complete for the spring work. They also said that if the farmer needs help, the government will pay it. I am sure that John Wise, who promised these GRIP and NISA programs back in 1985—not in those particular words—must be breathing a little easier, because after all this time we have them in place. However, there is nothing in the programs that deals with the basic fact that money will be there when they need it this spring.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague's speech on the motion today. I could not help but reflect that over the years that I have had the privilege of sitting in this House, we have experienced and participated in many debates with respect to problems within the Canadian farming community. Almost all of these problems revolve around scarcity of money, lack of funds, lack of income, or incomes that are falling and have been falling over a period of many years.

Today a way of life that at one time, and indeed historically in our country, had a great deal of built-in security based almost entirely on one's ability to work or determination to work has changed to a way of life that is pretty much on the fringe, materially speaking. Farming today is almost a way of life to be avoided. It is very sad and tragic that one of the great pillars of Canadian society, the rural way of life, and farmers in general, is in such an unstable situation and that young people, by and large, born on farms today do not want to continue farming. I should not say they do not want to continue farming; they fear going into farming because of this lack of security and this inability to live a reasonably secure life based on one's determination and ability to work.

In what way or ways would a New Democratic Party government in Ottawa be different in its approach to assisting farmers, both individually and through their organizations, in respect of these various funding programs that we have debated from time to time in this Chamber? We have seen both Liberal programs and Conservative programs and though they have had the immediate stop-gap effect of preventing ultimate disaster on the farm front, they have not in terms of long-term solutions amounted to very much.

In what way or ways would our party's farm policy differ basically from that of the Liberals and the Conservatives?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I agree that there has been a lack of long-term programming. I give credit to this government for suggesting the GRIP, a program which suggests that there may be long-term assistance in place.

The shortcoming of the GRIP program which is placed before this House is that there is not written into it any cost of production. It will only supply the needs of the farmer as long as the moving average of 15 years is higher than the cost of production. There is no guarantee that is going to happen; in fact, it looks as if within two or three years that moving average will be lower than that.

We have a program that we have had as a policy for a good number of years very similar to this, except that the basis of it is the cost of production. For a minimum amount produced by each farmer, a certain portion of his crop, he would be assured the cost of production. Beyond that he would have to depend on the market. Only his insurance would allow him to survive, or to be sure he was going to get some return beyond that, if there was a drought or a bad year.

I suppose one could say that the program we would put in place is not that much different than the GRIP, except that it would have built into it a cost of production, and would have a cap which would not allow a situation as they have in the United States where 85 per cent of the funding from these kinds of programs goes to approximately 10 per cent of the farmers. That kind of a program has a tendency to eliminate more farmers than the number it assists.

The approach that we have been suggesting for many years, and which we hoped John Wise would suggest back in 1985—because we had talked it over with him on many occasions—would establish a program that would allow a return to the farmer at a cost of production level for a certain portion of his crop. He would always be sure that he was going to get some return.

This program does not do that. GRIP does not do that.

NISA under the government is really only a glorified savings plan, and again is only there for the farmers who have extra money. It is so glorified, in fact, that I have had farmers come to me and say: "You know, I think I am going to borrow some money and put it into this NISA plan, because the return on it is better than what it would cost me to borrow the money". That in itself is a discredit to the reason for the plan being put in place.

Basically our plan would not be too much different. But it would assure a return to the farmer based on his cost of production and would assure that some farmers were not able to take advantage of it more than others.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment to my hon. friend from Saskatoon—Humboldt and perhaps pose a question.

Let me say first that I appreciate his recognition of the fact that there has been some considerable magnitude in the dimension of support to Canadian agriculture by this government, and that he does see elements of merit in the long-term safety net programs which are presently in front of the agriculture committee even as we speak, and soon hopefully back in front of this House.

I want to ask the hon. member a couple of questions relating to the idea of a cost of production formula, and also the idea of some form of support being based on, I gather, the first x number of bushels of production.

In the latter case, I am wondering how he would ensure that there would not be such a proliferation of permit books that in fact all of the production would be qualifying for the additional support that he envisions. I am also wondering how he could apply a cost of production formula into an area like the production of wheat where we are dependent on export for probably 82 per cent or 83 per cent of all of the production in Canada. How is it possible to apply a cost of production and recover that from an international market where, because of factors that lie beyond our borders, there simply is not the return at the present time?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the proliferation of permit books or quota books is a concern that this government is having right now and will have with the program it has put before us.

I would first point to the U.S. programs of conservation where they have managed, very successfully, to control the number of acres. Now they have not managed to control the production particularly well but they have managed to control the number of acres that a particular farm seeds and puts on the market.

We have discussed the questions that he talks about on many occasions. We have felt that it was a minor concern, but the situation where one unit produces or farms 100,000 acres and gets the cost of production for all of that would not happen. That is the main concern for what may happen under the GRIP program.

The second question that he asks is the extent to which the program can be dependent upon. We feel that its greatest weakness is the fact that it is bound to go below the cost of production within two years unless the price of grain goes up. What you do by putting in place a market controlled level is guarantee that within a certain number of years the price that the farmer gets for his grain will be lower than the cost of production. It will not make any difference how well you farm or how good you are at it. You will still lose money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex—Agriculture; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Softwood Lumber; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Resuming debate.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to continue the debate this afternoon on the Liberal opposition day resolution. To refresh the memories of those here, it reads as follows:

> That this House call upon the Government to take immediate action to deal with drastically reduced farm incomes resulting from the 1990-91 crop year and to make required assistance available in time for spring planting to ensure viable returns for grains, oilseeds and horticultural producers.

It is my pleasure, as I said, to speak to this issue, an agricultural emergency that exists in our country at this time. As others have said, although we have dealt in this House many times over the years with issues of agriculture, we always seem to have an agricultural industry that is in a state of emergency. The state of emergency derives, I believe, from many factors, but one of the major factors for the emergency that exists today is the lack of understanding on the part of the Canadian public in general to the importance of agriculture as a part of our Canadian economy.

Agriculture in Canada today is a $43 billion industry. Since 1988, it has declined from about a $50 billion industry. At the base of that $43 billion industry today, the basic pillar is comprised of our farmers across this country. It is my regret and the regret of many of us who are concerned about agriculture in this country that the number of farmers is declining rapidly and drastically. Western farmers across our prairies had not too bad a year last year only because of good growing conditions and a good crop yield as a result of that.

As we know, before last year they suffered very severely from drought. It is not to say that this past year, for being a better year, has brought them out of the serious financial crisis that they experienced the previous years. They are still suffering from that and they still need considerable assistance in order to survive. The fact is that many have gone bankrupt and many are on the verge of bankruptcy.

I have heard from colleagues in my own caucus, colleagues who represent the ridings of Essex—Kent and Haldimand—Norfolk, as well as ridings in southwestern Ontario who are experiencing severe agricultural problems at this time. Farmers are giving up because they have lost crops and the prices for their commodities have dropped considerably. They do not have the funds to produce crops this year; vegetable growers to get seed into the ground and fruit producers to get the spray on their fruit and other crops that they might have.

We are in serious trouble across this country. We have heard of the potato farmers in Prince Edward Island as well as other horticultural producers in the east part of our country. They all are crying and begging for assistance.

This government has tried in different ways to address the needs of farmers across this country. At the present time, with spring planting coming on, particularly for horticultural producers, there is a gap. There is an emergency need, a crisis at this time, for our government to address this issue and to allow our horticultural producers to get on stream to get their crops yielding for this current year.

Within the last couple of weeks we started a debate on Bill C-98, the Farm Income Protection Act, a comprehensive act which includes insurance programs, income security programs like GRIP and NISA. I think, as I sit here as a non-agricultural expert, one of the reasons perhaps that the Canadian public does not seem to understand and stand behind agricultural producers, our farmers in this country, is that we use terminology which is really unknown to most Canadians.

As I speak today, I will try to avoid using terms like GRIP and NISA, but simply to explain that, as I said before, these are income security programs, insurance programs meant to help and assist with income security for farmers across this country. Those programs are very important.

I stood here last week and applauded the minister for the method that he used in bringing the bill forward in the House. He combined farmers and provincial and federal government officials in the discussions out of which came the proposed Farm Income Protection Act, that we will presumably be voting upon within the next week or so.

The Farm Income Protection Act, although it might have many points of great merit within it, does not provide the type of assistance which horticultural producers in this country require at this time. There are 20,000 horticultural producers, producers of vegetables and fruit, in this country. Half of those producers, 10,000 of them, reside in Ontario.

Last week, as has been mentioned here in the House before, the Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers' Association appeared before the Standing Committee on Agriculture and outlined the problems that their industry is facing at this time. They indicated that the Ontario producers alone require $700 million this year in order to produce their crops for this year.

They do not see how they can be assisted at this time by the Farm Income Protection Act that is before the House right now. It is an act which provides for insurance and income security programs for the year 1991-1992. They want to be assured, as well as the grains and oilseeds producers who will benefit from that program, that if they receive any income support this year or insurance coverage this year it will not be seen as a prepayment for the 1991-1992 crop year, because we are talking about the needs of the previous year and we cannot be continually playing catch-up.

On the other hand, producers do not like the ad hoc programs that are constantly being put in place and have had to be put in place to help them. At this point there seems to be no other possible, but yet there is one more ad hoc program for this year, particularly for horticultural producers who have such great need.

From what I can understand, one of the problems with the producers is that under one section of the Agriculture Income Protection Act the GRIP is fairly easily defined for grains and oilseed producers, but it is much more difficult to define for our horticultural industry. Our fruit and vegetables growers produce over 100 different crops and each crop has different parameters. They must work out a separate type of program of insurance and income security. They have not even yet determined what the premiums would be for the various crops that might be covered under that program.

We heard from the minister today—and it would be of concern to the horticultural producers—that they may receive nothing this year in emergency assistance unless they become part of the GRIP program now for 1991–1992. Even if horticultural producers have the funding in hand to pay a premium, they do not know how that program will benefit them and the crops they produce. There are definitely problems and deficits in the legislation as it stands at this time, particularly for horticultural producers.

On the weekend I was reading the newspaper put out by the Ontario fruit and vegetable producers called The Grower. It had an article which referred to our agriculture minister's video speech to the B.C. Fruit Growers Association last month via satellite. We heard different members talk in the House today about a third line of defence committee, but for the average Canadian citizen I am afraid again that this would just be so much Greek and they would not really understand what that was referring to. I did not understand completely what it was referring to until I read this very good article in this agricultural newspaper.

It mentioned the first line of defence, which our minister referred to today, the second line of defence and the third line of defence. Our horticultural producers are saying that they need assistance from the third line of defence committee immediately in order that they can work this spring.

Just to explain to the Canadian public who may be tuned in to the House of Commons today, the first line of defence refers specifically to what is possible for producers themselves to do for themselves to promote their own self-sufficiency, and programs the Canadian and provincial governments can become involved in as well to help support our farmers across this country to become more self-sufficient. It looks toward farmers being as efficient as they possibly can be in production. Certainly it has been seen in past years that farmers have indeed become much more efficient in their production methods than was perhaps previously the case.

However, in line with the first line of defence there are responsibilities the government must take as well. One of the most important ones in this era of free trade with the United States is for our government to help our Canadian farmers to be able to compete in the international markets on a level playing field.

Last week, when horticultural producers came before the Standing Committee on Agriculture, they outlined some of the problems they experience that cause them not to be able to compete fairly with American farmers. For example, we cannot get registered in Canada certain chemicals used on fruit to help the preservation and quality of crops that are grown in United States but are imported into this country.

In the United States they have a spray that deals with a disease called the pear psylla. This spray has not been registered here and cannot be used by Canadian pear producers. We are in serious condition of losing pear production in this country because this fact alone is causing our pear farmers not to be able to compete.

I come from a region that is famous for its apple production. I invite members and the Canadian public to come to the great riding of Northumberland to experience our delicious apples in the fall. Apple producers in Northumberland have come to me and have spoken of their problem of not being able to acquire in Canada registered chemicals that are available in the United States. This therefore lowers the quality, the saleability and the pricing. It is a detriment to them when it comes to selling their product in Canada, to say nothing of trying to export and sell their product abroad. It must be remembered that although we have a $43 billion agrifood industry in Canada, we export about 25 per cent of that agrifood production. That in itself accounts for about one-third of Canada's trade balance.

We are not talking about a minor economic sector in our economy. In fact the food industry from farm to supermarket is one of Canada's largest economic sectors. The sector, the bottom tier of which is our farming community, includes many other workers in the agrifood industry as has been mentioned before. It would include our transportation of food sector, the producer sector, the marketing sector, the advertising sector, and the sales and supermarkets of which we are all aware.

For $1 of produce at the farm gate there is an additional $7 brought into the Canadian economy as a result of that $1 of farm production in this country. The importance of farmers to the economy of this country simply cannot be underestimated.

Many Canadians do not really understand the importance of agriculture in this country and the fact that there are so many farmers who are going out of business and experiencing bankruptcy in these days. Statistics were referred to earlier here today, that Agriculture Canada predicts the total net farm income in Canada will drop by 54.5 per cent this year as compared with last year, and that only three provinces in this country will have a positive net farm income in 1991. Saskatchewan and Manitoba will have the most difficult time. well. Ontario and Quebec will also have very difficult times.

From my point of view it is very difficult to start comparing sectors in the farming economies that are experiencing rougher or tougher times than another. If a farmer cannot make it, the situation is critical. It is of great concern to me that in my own riding of Northumberland I have seen several farmers in the last few years go out of business. These are farmers who have good university education. Some of them are fortunate enough to have come home from university to land that was held by their family for generations. With good equipment, with all of these resources in hand —and I know these people to be excellent business people—they are unable to make their farms economically viable and have had to leave their farms.

Much earlier in my life I came from the Burlington region. I watched that region of our country get gobbled up as farm land was sold by farmers who found it more economically feasible to sell their land to developers. I personally never want to see that happen to other areas of our country, but unfortunately I do continue to see it happen. It is something that we must stop as quickly as possible.

The agricultural industry in Canada faces many challenges, not least of which is the challenge of international trade. Canada does subsidize its food industry, but it is not recognized by the Canadian public that in fact we pay very little for our food in comparison to its actual costs. But as we subsidize our industry we are competing with the U.S. and European countries that subsidize even more heavily. It is very hard for Canadian farmers to receive less; it is impossible for Canadian farmers to receive less for their production than they do nowadays.

I know this government is aware of the difficulties and is trying to deal with international trade issues, but we cannot stop. We must continue to do everything possible to try to support and help our agricultural food industry.

We laugh when we hear children being told or coming forward with the understanding that the stork brings babies. I very much get the impression that many citizens in Canada do not think beyond the supermarket when it comes to thinking of where food comes from, what the source of their food is.

Canadians must regard the crisis we have in the agricultural industry in our country at this time as their crisis and something that we all together must understand and try to do something about.

I have had the good fortune of browsing through a book called Farming the System by Mr. Barry K. Wilson, which gives a very good review of how politicians and producers shape Canadian agricultural policy. It is something I would recommend to all Canadian citizens to read in order to understand more about the agricultural industry in this country and what we can all do to help to improve the policies that we have in support of our farmers. They need our help. They need our understanding.

Politicians are going to be able to respond in a better way if all Canadian citizens become better informed and let politicians, decision makers, legislation makers, know that they understand the needs of the agricultural industry in this country and the enormous importance of agriculture to the economy and security of this country.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to pick up on a comment that the hon. member for Northumberland just made. I think she quite properly raised the matter that there is a lack of understanding or a gulf between urban dwellers and farm people or producers today.

She used the analogy of the stork bringing babies. Indeed I think when a lot of people go to the supermarket they do not realize that the food and the produce on the shelves come in fact from real live people, most of them Canadian.

If anything, there is a widening of this gulf, a heightened lack of understanding on the part of many Canadians as to exactly where their food does come from. In fact we in Canada enjoy the second lowest cost of food in the world. It is clear that some of the reason for that is the return that Canadian producers receive.

It has always troubled me that every program which the government announces on behalf of agriculture, whether it is crop insurance payments or WGSA payments or even the Canadian Wheat Board final payment, which in fact is entirely the producer's own money, is given a great headline in the media with a suggestion that it is another handout to the farm community. That in turn is seen by urban residents in a negative way.

That is why I rather like the concept of moving to these long-term safety net programs, GRIP and NISA, which are in fact in front of the House now and are moving forward. I wonder if the hon. member for Northumberland would agree with me that those programs will be a step in the right direction not only for their content, but also by lessening the dependence that we have had on ad hoc programs and all of the negative publicity that seems to come with each one. I wonder if the hon. member would agree that to the extent these programs will replace ad hockery and to the extent that they are permanently in place they will reduce the need for ad hoc programs and thereby reduce the kind of publicity which seems to widen the understanding between rural and urban areas.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, yes, I would agree. Earlier I was talking about the different lines of defence, the jargon used currently around the House. I talked about the first line of defence and the second line of defence being the Farm Income Protection Act, that type of long-term program which I do think is important. I think we have to keep reviewing that type of program, which I understand the minister is prepared to do to make sure that it really does address the changing and emerging needs of the farming community.

What I did not mention was the third line of defence, which is also part of the total farm strategy. The quotes from this paper are saying: "Where the first and second lines of defence do not fully deal with an income problem, the third line of defence would then come into play, the minister explained. This would involve emergency assistance or transitional assistance and it may include input cost". This is the type of program that the horticultural producers in this country today are asking for and are very concerned about.

Although we need solid, long-term programs of assistance, I think that we always are going to require this third line of defence. When the minister meets with the third line of defence committee in the coming couple of weeks, I hope that he will address this urgent need particularly of horticultural producers at this time and understand their needs. They cannot at this time become enrolled in GRIP because of the uncertainty of what that means to the horticultural producers, but in order for them to be able to enrol eventually in that program they need emergency assistance today, which is the third line of defence.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland, spoke about sprays and chemicals that are used on produce to make it last longer while it is being shipped into Canada. Of course, these usually hit our markets at a time when a lot of our own fresh produce is coming on the market or even during the winter months when some of our greenhouse crops are being harvested.

I am very concerned about this same issue because even though some of these chemicals may be banned in Canada, they are used in other countries. Therefore, we do not allow any tolerance for these chemicals on our domestically produced food, but there is a tolerance allowed on imported food, which naturally gives them a competitive advantage coming on to our markets.

I am just wondering if my colleague would like to comment on this and if she thinks the use of these chemicals should be banned. Should we bring in regulations where all foods, both domestic and imported, should have the chemical content, pesticide, herbicide and so on, listed when they are put on sale in the supermarkets so that the Canadian consumer knows exactly what she is buying?

• (1640)

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I believe that my colleague brings up a very good point. When I was speaking to that particular issue and the role of government, I was talking again about the first line of defence and the need for our producers to have a level playing field. At the same time as we want to have a level playing field, we have Canadian standards of health and acceptability with regard to chemicals.

Some chemicals that may be acceptable by American standards are not necessarily acceptable by Canadian standards. There is an urgent need for the government to act quickly to determine which of the chemicals are used on products in the United States that are imported into Canada are acceptable for consumption in Canada and which ones are not. If chemicals used on products imported into this country from the United States are acceptable, then they must be immediately registered in Canada so that Canadian farmers have equal access and equal opportunity to use them.

I have had complaints, as well, from organic farmers who try not to use chemicals. They use more natural substances. Who knows, maybe they are as toxic as regular chemicals. I cannot be the judge of that. But many people have spoken to me about this serious problem. So it is to have a level playing field, but a level playing field based upon Canadian standards of health and well being.

I also think it is important for all of our food products, whether they are imported or not, whether they are sprayed natural products or processed products, should be well marked in stores what chemicals are used so that consumers know what they are ingesting.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate, actually against the motion put by the opposition and, of course, in support of the government's agricultural record. I will try to do so from the perspective of a member who represents an area of some 25,000 square miles in southwestern and south central Saskatchewan, which is very dependent upon agriculture, especially, the grains sector and particularly the production and export of wheat.

There is no question that Canadian farmers and, especially at this time, the grains and oilseed producers are faced with unprecedented circumstances. There has been enormous pressure to change and to adapt and that, in fact, is happening. We continue to support the farm community as we have always done, to help them meet their challenges at home and in the international marketplace.

There are three particular ways in which the government can assist the grains and oilseeds sector. The first is on the international level, where through the negotiations in GATT and with the Cairns group and with other nations, we try to bring about, if not an end, at least a lessening of the harmful subsidies which have so drastically affected the international price which our producers depend upon.

The second area is in regard to domestic agriculture. We must try to retain those things that were good out of the old agricultural programs and try to repair those deficiencies through innovations such as the GRIP and NISA programs which have developed a new generation of green sector safety nets, developed by the grain safety net committee.

The third area we should be addressing is that of diversification. When I say diversification, I mean within agriculture and, indeed, outside. Agricultural diversification is good, but it is obviously not possible to shift some 600 miles of prairie for which the highest and best use appears to be wheat production, into something else. It is just not feasible and not practical.

Progress is being made through Western Economic Diversification to diversify in a non-agricultural sense. We are trying to support and enable enterprises that have new products, new ideas, new technology, new markets, a possibility of import replacement to flourish on the prairies so that it will be possible to have plants, factories and initiatives which will employ prairie people in areas and occupations and walks of life that are not so dependent upon agriculture, as is the case at the present time.

Since the mid-1980s the federal government has provided an unprecedented level of income support to the grain and oilseeds sector, about $12 billion in direct assistance. This support has been delivered through record high pay-outs under existing programs such as the WGSA, that is the western grain stabilization program and through special programs that responded to unexpected emergencies.

Long-term programs like western grain stabilization were put in place to provide stability to producers and it has served that purpose well. However, it was never intended to deal with the kind of emergencies the industry faced during the late eighties and today. One obvious flaw was that the triggering mechanism was for the entire Canadian Wheat Board area rather than for specific areas. Another flaw was the five-year rolling average of income, which is fine when there is a quantum shift from one year to the next, but is not much good when the prices drop consistently and over a five-year period show very little change.

The problem is that farmers could no longer rely on these programs for predictable support. They indicated they needed a more effective and predictable safety net program, and that is why the legislation enabling GRIP and NISA, the Farm Income Protection Act, is now before this House. It is hoped that these programs, which were recommended to the government by the Grain Safety Net Committee composed in the majority of producers, will answer some of the problems.

The difficulty we find ourselves in, all Canadians and the grain producers in particular, is the trade subsidy war, the grain export subsidy war which has developed through the mid-eighties and late eighties between the European Economic Community and the United States. The Europeans, since the sixties, have been heavily subsidizing the production and eventually the over-production of product, including grain. They have embarked upon programs to subsidize the further export of their excess production.

The United States suffered a diminution of its share of the market for a number of years as a result of the European activities and eventually the Americans took the gloves off and got into the subsidy battle as well. Unfortunately, Canadian producers have been caught in the cross-fire. It has been particularly difficult because, as we all know, the European Economic Community has some 330 million people, the United States some 250 million people. We in Canada have 27 million people.

On the other side of the coin, the Europeans are able, because of that population, to consume by far the greater part of their production, so they are exporting—or perhaps I should say dumping on the world market—perhaps 15 per cent of their production.

The United States is in a somewhat similar position, and I am guessing at this point because I have forgotten the numbers, but I suspect that they export well under one-half of their production.

Canadians remain exposed to the tune of about 83 per cent, to export. We consume, as humans, about 7 per cent of our wheat production. Livestock take up perhaps another 9 per cent or 10 per cent. The remainder has to be exported, and that is where our producers are very much at risk.

This subsidy war is being very much fought with a double-edged sword. The big powers, the Europeans and the Americans, have the population to be able to chew up a lot of their production and at the same time they have the population base and the tax base to be able to afford the kind of massive export subsidies that they are affording their producers. So it is a very difficult situation. As a result, international grain prices have dropped dramatically through the eighties to the point now where, as we speak, as a result of some recent sales, it appears that the international price—if one can call it that—is in the area of $1.50 to $1.75 per bushel of wheat. Clearly, Canadian producers face a major problem. This is something that has been building for some time.

This has not gone unanswered. We, of course, recall the Canadian Special Grains Program in 1986, under which $1 billion was paid out to Canadian producers in addition to the regular government programs. The following year another $1.1 billion was paid out through that program.

Prices did recover somewhat in 1988 so that there was no need to extend the Special Grains Program, but just when we thought we could see some light at the end of the tunnel another crisis arose. In 1988 we had a drought which caused difficulty and suffering to many parts of Canada. The prairies, parts of southern Ontario and Quebec suffered the most severe drought since the 1930s. Crop losses were significant in many areas. Again this government responded with the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program which injected some $850 million into the farm economy. In addition, there was a Livestock Drought Assistance Program and a Green Feed Program in western Canada which put out another almost $150 million.

As I indicated earlier, Canada cannot hope to match the treasuries of the United States and Europe but, at the same time, we cannot allow farmers to fend for themselves because farming is a very productive sector. Canadian grain farmers are among the most productive, competitive and, indeed, low-cost producers in the world. If they were ever able to achieve the famous level playing field, they would do quite well without any government assistance. All of us in this House, all Canadian taxpayers and all Canadian producers would be very pleased with that but, unfortunately, it is somewhat like Saddam Hussein, it is not possible to wish him away and it is not possible to wish away these harmful international subsidies at the present time.

Last year this government put forward some $500 million in a special income assistance program. Last fall it announced the Cash Flow Enhancement Program which gave farmers access to advances on their farm storage production interest free. This resulted in about $1.5 billion of cash flow being available.

In addition to these programs, the government, through the Farm Debt Review Process, has assisted a number of farmers in resolving difficulties with their creditors. The Farm Credit Corporation has, through various measures, written off enormous amounts of money. There is the Equity Building Program which is assisting a number of Farm Credit Corporation clients who are experiencing difficulty in an attempt to enable them to build up some equity and to re-establish their farming operations. The other side of it, the Canadian Rural Transition Program, has provided income training and assistance to more than 3,500 farm families.

There is another item, a not inconsiderable item, which was perhaps missed in the middle of the GST debate. The implementation of the goods and services tax will relieve the farm community of some $250 million in sales tax on the purchase of their production inputs; a fairly considerable advantage.

There remains a long list of government initiatives towards the grains and oilseeds sector and, indeed, towards other aspects of agriculture, but I am particularly addressing my remarks today to the grains and oilseeds sector. In fact, during the late 1980s federal and provincial governments contributed significantly to farm income. Direct program payments in fact accounted for 84 per cent of realized net farm income from 1986 to 1989. They more than doubled from an annual average of $1.5 billion during the first half of the 1980s to $3.6 billion for the latter half of that decade. In the prairie provinces where, of course, grain and oilseed production dominates agriculture, the federal share of support averages 86 per cent.

These various ad hoc programs I have outlined were certainly needed, but they show that there were gaps in the safety net program which made it impossible for farmers to be able to predict their incomes. Farmers need some predictability to be able to remain efficient and competitive. That was one of the reasons why, back in 1989, the Minister of Agriculture and this government launched the most comprehensive review of agrifood policies and programs ever undertaken in the history of Canadian agriculture, and did so, I might add, in partnership with the provinces and with the various participants in the agrifood industry.

Through this policy review, the government has attempted to move away from inefficient ad hoc assistance toward a more comprehensive support structure that is fair, cost-efficient and predictable.

For over a year, federal and provincial governments and representatives of the industry have been working in partnership toward this goal. Together there has been undertaken an historic review of agricultural policies and programs. Through the 11 task forces created under the review many Canadians have worked very hard at putting aside their differences to develop solutions for the good of the agricultural industry.

Nowhere, Mr. Speaker, was this more evident than through the work of the grain and oilseeds safety net committee. This federal-provincial-industry committee was established in the early part of 1990 and had something in the order of 34 members of whom 19 were actual hands on farmers, hands on producers. They were able to bring forward a series of recommendations which have resulted in the farm income protection plan legislation which is in front of the House right now, as I mentioned, and indeed the Minister of Agriculture is in front of the agricultural committee right now dealing with aspects of that bill.

GRIP and NISA were developed from the ground up by farmers working with government. Together they have developed a program which provides farmers with predictable support.

At the agrifood policy conference a couple of years ago, farmers indicated that they wanted new safety net programs that would be targeted more effectively to their own individual situations, to their individual operations. They wanted government to take a whole farm approach, they want a predictable support, and these new programs I believe meet these criteria.

The Gross Revenue Insurance Plan and the Net Income Stabilization Account will deal more effectively than any previous programs with the market and production instabilities that farmers have to deal with. The government has put the development of these programs on a fast track because we know that farmers cannot wait, farmers are asking for a new program and the government has responded by creating the environment in which these new programs can be developed.

Mr. Speaker, under current market conditions we anticipate GRIP to pay out approximately $2.7 billion in 1991–92. The establishment of this program will, therefore, ensure a secure underpinning for the future of the grain and oilseeds sector.

GRIP is a reality, Mr. Speaker. Most provinces have agreed to participate and the federal and provincial ministers of agriculture recently agreed on the formula to establish premium rates. It is a very important program, an insurance program whereby the federal government, the provinces and the individual producers contribute toward the premium. It is individualized, it is based on the production of the individual, not of others.

The second component of the safety net program is the Net Income Stabilization Account, or NISA, a cash stabilization account under which farmers are able to contribute up to 2 per cent of their net eligible sales and will receive matching funds from governments whenever the program formula triggers a withdrawal from the fund. It is important to stress here, Mr. Speaker, that each individual producer in the country will have his or her individual NISA account. The individual will control his or her destiny.

We also recognize that GRIP and NISA will not solve all our programs. It is quite clear that no one is going to get rich on these programs. I believe that what they represent today is an important survival mechanism in the face of an extremely difficult world situation.

• (1700)

A government industry committee was established in February to study options to the grains and oilseeds sector. They build on the objectives of GRIP and NISA and deal with issues such as income shortfall, debt burdens, restructuring, land use, the need for adjustment diversification and so on.

The first line of defence is the farmer's responsibility to manage risk as has been stated before in this debate. Stabilization and safety net programs like GRIP and NISA form the second line of defence. There will be no effective third line of defence without a strong second line in place. That is where the third line involves all of us; federal and provincial governments, and producers alike working together to put in place some solutions that will ensure long-term viability.

That means exploring a series of options that will allow us to deal with long-term difficulties in a planned an organized way.

In the recent budget, the government committed an additional $1.3 billion as further proof that we continue to stand by agriculture. This money will be used in part to finance new and ongoing stabilization programs. Some of this money will have to be used to deal with the anticipated deficit in the wheat pool of the Canadian Wheat Board this crop year.

Some of the money will be set aside for special assistance because GRIP and NISA will not pay out until next year. The grains and oilseeds committee, and indeed the horticulture committee are developing options for delivering special assistance. These options will in fact be discussed with farm leaders when the Minister of Agriculture meets with them on Tuesday, two days from now.

An announcement on how special assistance will be delivered is to be made before spring seeding.

In conclusion, I want to stress again that this government has always delivered in terms of support for agriculture. When the farmers need us, we are there. We have responded in the past when they needed assistance, and we are going to continue to do so.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I could not help but notice the member's comment that this government has always delivered in terms of support.

I have a question. I should perhaps go back a little bit. In the summer of 1984 the Minister of Agriculture at the time made a statement that the government was going to seriously support and put in place a program for the development of ethanol blended fuels in Canada. In fact, some research is being done on it at that time.

On August 2, 1984, because we were into a campaign, there was a statement that came from the Progressive Conservative Party that there was a real opportunity for fuel alcohol to be used in Canada as an alternative octane booster in gasoline. The Progressive Conservative Party said that a Progressive Conservative government would set up a special program to encourage the use of alcohol as a lead substitute for octane boosting.

Of course, a few days later, Dr. Gary Gurbin, a former member of this House said: "We would seriously consider mandating the change for environmentally damaging additives to more environmentally acceptable alternatives through federally owned and controlled Crown corporations".

The key is that it is becoming increasingly clear that we have environmental problems that are caused by and as a result of additives in gasoline. We also have great potential in other substances, including both ethanol and methanol.

Of course, on December 2, 1985, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture said: "I support the development of ethanol produced from agricultural resources and forestry products to replace lead as an octane booster for gasoline." He went on.

In May 1986 the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources reported to this House. The committee recommended the use of methanol and ethanol as blending agents in Canadian gasoline. It recommended that the federal government move more extensively toward research, development and demonstration required to introduce alcohol and gasoline blends on a broader basis and that the federal government co-operate with the provincial governments and industry to establish guidelines and standards for ethanol based fuels.

Does it not make a lot of sense with the low price of grain in the world today to divert a lot of that grain into renewable fuels that are environmentally friendly by the government's own admissions, going back those years, to utilize that grain in Canada in a way that would improve not only the environment but the income to the farmers. It would provide a high protein based livestock feed for the Canadian livestock producers and give them a step up on a lot of the competition. If it was not used for livestock feed, this product could be dried and used as a flour for the manufacture of bread, cookies or biscuits. This particular product is exceptionally well suited for the starving people in Third World countries.

I cannot understand why the government is delaying on this matter. Recent cost studies show that ethanol can be produced for 27 cents a litre. A Canadian company made that statement. Also, in the United States the most economical process can produce it for 38 cents a gallon, with the average price being 47 cents.

I would like to have the comments of the previous speaker as to why the government is delaying on this issue when it can create a market for between 5 million and 8 million bushels of Canadian produced grain in this country.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia: Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex for what I perceive to be a constructive suggestion. I find it very refreshing and that is why I commend him. Frankly, to this moment I have been rather disappointed by the lack and indeed the almost complete absence of any constructive and concrete suggestions on the part of the opposition. They bring forward a motion, but not much in the way of suggestion, just the usual form of criticism. If I may say, it is sometimes a little hard to swallow, given that the motion emanates from a party whose only legacy to prairie agriculture and western agriculture over the 16-year period from 1968 to 1984 was the LIFT program and the imposition of the capital gains tax.

Perhaps I should add a legacy in the form of approximately a $207 billion national debt as of March 31, 1985, the interest burden of which is the single most significant constraining factor on any government today to be able to respond adequately to the needs of sectors of the country, be it agriculture or others.

In any event, I do appreciate the hon. member's interest in ethanol. Indeed, while I am far from being an expert, I understand that in fact there have been several initiatives taken under the Western Diversification initiative. I am certainly going to check that out and I will be in touch with the hon. member.

It is important, because his suggestion ties in with one of the three measures I outlined in my remarks that could certainly assist western agriculture, and that was diversification. Diversification within agriculture itself, but also diversification on the prairies but outside of agriculture.

If I may cite an example within my home town of Swift Current which, as an aside, was cited last week by one of the national magazines as one of the 10 most desirable places in the country in which to live. I guess it is that way because, as the magazine indicated, the community spirit and the fairly low cost of housing, low taxes and easy access to a number of amenities.

The one thing we lack in a prairie city which is so dependent on agriculture is a payroll base, a job base. That is where Western Diversification has been helpful. Through Western Diversification and some help from the provincial government, but especially through the initiative of some innovative people, there has been establish an operation impact packaging which will take waste paper and recycle it into environmentally friendly degradable trays for the display of produce. The result is that there will be 135 jobs commencing this summer in this manufacturing plant, absolutely and totally unrelated to agriculture.

In addition, there has already been a spin-off company formed which will employ another 15 constituents in the manufacturing of a coating which will go on the product made by the impact packaging plant.

• (1710)

At a time like this, 150 jobs in a city of some 16,000 people is extremely important. What it means is payroll, it means a spin-off that is unrelated to agriculture. It means, in fact, that some people in the agriculture community who have been relying on straight grain farming will in fact be able to supplement their incomes through the obtaining of jobs in enterprises such as the one I have described, or in others which are being put forward through the innovative results of the Western Diversification program, a $1.2 billion program which makes repayable loans to enterprises which have new product, new market, new technology, that are seeking to replace imported goods.

I agree very much with the hon. member when he speaks in terms of diversification. I think any measures that can be taken which will lead to diversification of the areas that are so dependent on agriculture are most welcome.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this opposition day debate at this point. At the onset I will just speak for a moment about some comments made by the minister this morning. When he said there is a 39 per cent net increase in farm income, this is realized farm income.

I should just go back a little bit and point out that during the years 1984–89, the average farm net income increased by only 11 per cent. In 1984–89 the average income of all Canadian families increased by 39 per cent. During this period, due to the lack of farm income, more and more farm families were forced to resort to off-farm income to make ends meet. They had to take jobs off the farm and this level of income, this additional income that came from off farm jobs, increased by 34 per cent.

In spite of those statements, we still have to face reality and realize this government has allowed the people of rural Canada to fall even further behind the rest of society and forced them to take off-farm jobs in order to subsidize their farm operations to grow food for the people of this nation.

On page 9 of the Farm Income Financial Conditions, government expenditures data book, January 1991 you can find these figures. I just want to put that on the record because more and more people are coming to me who are in financial difficulty, people from the riding of Lambton—Middlesex, which is a very large and diversified base of agriculture production.

I have a letter here from four diversified tobacco farmers who are trying to stay afloat. They explain that they are a group of farmers who produce hydroponic lettuce year round. They tell me their product is pesticide free, it is clean, and with the roots intact with moisture, it has a much superior shelf life. I should point out that there is no need to spray this kind of lettuce to keep it fresh on the supermarket shelf. They also advise me that they have five family farms producing their product for the past five years, with private money.

It has taken a lot of determination to produce their unique product and to put together a workable marketing plan which, they tell me, is working well. However, it is becoming increasingly difficult for them to compete with American lettuce, mainly from California, that is being dumped into the Ontario market at prices which, questionably, may or may not cover transportation costs.

I will go on and read the rest of the letter:

> We feel that we are victimized by American subsidization and policies of their produce. We are aware of their irrigation equipment grants, illegal Mexican labour and large corporate incentives, just to mention a few advantages that we, as Canadians, do not have access to. Free trade has also enhanced dumping procedures.
> It does not stop there. These big American dealers, with their government money, have obtained methods to encourage major buyers here to always buy American first. As Canadians, are we put into the back seat of our own market? The major buyers in Canada, in general, feel that they cannot be bothered any more by buying from the family farm in Canada.
> Our costs to produce our product is determined by materials, labour and other activities that are generated right here in Canada. If we had the same national privileges as the Americans do, we would be more stable in the marketplace.
> We want fair action from our government to make the produce marketplace a fair place to deal. If we are at the woes of the Americans all the time then we are headed for a broke country. We cannot pay enough taxes if we cannot produce enough money to pay them.

That is the end of the quote from this letter. I think it tells it all.

Another of my constituents, or close by to the constituency, is a tobacco grower as well. He calculated that his crop, about 90,000 pounds of tobacco, will translate into roughly $9 million revenue for two levels of government this year at the federal level and the provincial level. In 1990 Ontario tobacco growers sold a total of $123.2 million pounds to Canada's big three cigarette manufacturers, worth $181.1 million or $1.47 pound. In 1989 cash receipts added up to $261.1 million. Between them, the federal and provincial governments collect more than $5 billion a year in revenue from tobacco products.

When we look at the revenue income from tobacco products and distilled products in this country, they take in billions upon billions of dollars from that primary producer of this nation and yet, at the same time, this government brags about handing out $1.3 billion to the Canadian farmers to help bail them out of trouble, bailing out the people who lay the golden egg in terms of the department of revenue of this nation.

I cannot help but look back at two years ago now when on the floor of this House I asked the Minister of Agriculture about the no-rolled beef being imported into this country, a million pounds a week at that time. He assured me that he would look into it, but the closure of six packing plants since 1989 is due in part to the government's inaction on no-rolled beef being allowed to come into Canada from the United States.

One of these packing plants has re-opened, but the fact is that the amount of no-rolled beef—a cheap product coming into this country from the United States, most of it dairy cows that have been slaughtered over there after one or two lactations—coming into this country which is not graded, and that is why it is called no-rolled. When you grade a carcass of beef in the slaughterhouse, you run a roll down the side and it tells you whether it is A-1, A-2, A-3 or A-4. If it is cow beef, they call it C-1, C-2, C-3 or C-4. All this is coming in here and the consumers do not know what they are buying. The amount of that has tripled since 1989. The feedlot industry across this province has been decimated.

Yesterday, in The Ottawa Citizen there was a story about Ontario's once powerful beef industry taking it on the chin. It is having an impact on our environment, it is having an impact on the income of this country and it is taking away jobs. We have to look to our food processing industry in this nation, whether it is the beef packing industry, the lettuce producers, to see what is happening to this country under this government in allowing imports of products from other countries. While we cannot export beef that is not graded, we are letting it into this country. I ask the government to do something about it, to put a stable foundation under the beef industry in this country so that we know precisely where we stand and what lies ahead of us.

I am going to share my time today with another member. I believe my time is almost up, so at this point I will sit down and turn the floor over to him, and perhaps we can share questions at the end.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree with the suggestion of the hon. member that the opposition split its time between two speakers?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to address the motion before the House imploring and encouraging the government to take some immediate action to assist primary producers in this country to get over the hurdle facing them as a result of the disastrous prices in 1990–1991.

I will refer first to the situation of grain farmers in western Canada who went through several years of drought. They did not have anything to sell. I would like to draw a little comparison. That is like someone else in the rest of Canada having to sit down at the dinner table every night and saying to the family: "I am sorry, folks, I still don't have a job so we don't have an income", because they just did not have anything to sell, there was nothing in the bin.

If we follow on to what happened in 1990, they got a job or they got an excellent crop. They did. They had an excellent crop, pretty well evenly spread, although there were pockets where it was no so good. That always happens when dealing with mother nature. But they got that crop and because of what is going on in the world in trade wars it was not worth anything. Basically they had a job but they still were not getting a pay cheque.

That is the conundrum they are in at this time of year. They need money to get them through.

We met with the prairie pools the other day. There is talk, I agree, good talk; I just came from a committee meeting in which we were talking about the GRIP and NISA programs. They are not going to kick in for the 1990–1991 crop year. They can and will kick in down the road, but they are not going to provide that bridge financing for the 1990–1991 crop year. That assistance is definitely needed.

The Western Grain Stabilization Act will put some money in there, but the prairie pools tell us that to bring them up even close to the average net farm income they had in the last number of years they need $1.1 billion or $1.16 billion; somewhere in that neighbourhood, a considerable sum of money.

I know money is not easy to come by, and I am not here to say to the government: spend, spend, spend. What I know, what those of us in the agrifood industry know, and what we should all realize as Canadians is that every dollar that arrives at the farm gate will multiply seven times before it is through our economy and our society. That is a lot of money when it goes through.

One out of five Canadian jobs results from what happens at the primary producer level. One out of five Canadian jobs is in the agrifood industry. It is important that that sector of our economy, that sector of our business world in this country, is kept sound. What we are asking the government to do today is to react, to realize that and to do something now.

I wish I did not have to stand here and ask this today, to discuss this with the government, to debate this in the House of Commons, but it is a reality of where we are as a result of what happened in 1990.

I would like to give some examples of what is happening in the horticultural industry as well. In discussions about the agrifood industry we hear about third line of defence, second line of defence, and working back to first line of defence. What I can say and what I am hearing is that there is nothing wrong. There are some good things with the second line of defence, such as the GRIP and NISA programs and the Farm Income Stabilization Act which takes into account the hopefully not needed necessity of a third line of defence. The government also has to move quickly, and quite frankly in some cases has to move, on the first line of defence. That first line of defence talks about border inspection, grade standards, equalizing and levelling the playing field for such things as crop production requirements, be they chemicals or whatever, with our major competitor in the horticultural field, the United States.

The horticultural industry in Canada is a $2.2 billion industry itself and $500 million of that is exported. It is important that our players, our producers, be on an equal playing field and equal footing with those they are competing against.

The Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds stated last week that action had to be taken within six weeks. One of those weeks is gone already, and we have not seen the action. I just saying that the producers need to know. Producers are looking at a longer term situation, but right now their bankers are saying to them: "What are we going to look at and what is there so that we can get to the 1991 crop?"

Some very startling things are happening out there. In my own riding a food processing facility announced about six weeks ago that it was no longer going to process food. I heard the minister stand last week and say that a number of new food processing facilities are being constructed in this country in the last number of months. I spoke as recently as this morning with the chief executive officer of a major food processing company, and his answer was: "I am in the industry, and I do not know where they are. If we have got new food processing facilities, they must be hamburger and fast food outlets in the city some place". He did not know where they were.

When they pulled out of processing tomatoes, pumpkins and peas in my riding in Prince Edward County, it took out $1.3 million from farm gate prices. If we multiply that by five, six, seven or whatever figure we want, we find that is a tremendous removal of funds from there and the employment that went with it. The chief executive office also said to me this morning: "The rules are changed. The tariffs are changing. We have globalization," et cetera. His answer to me was: "Mr. Vanclief, it is cheaper to buy it south of the border".

I understand that those business decisions have to be made. I am asking the government: What does it suggest that these producers turn to in order to make their living? The neat answer is: "You have lost your job because of competitiveness", but what will the government put in place to allow these people to make a living? What is the government going to put in place immediately to provide the producers who are still there with a financially sound basis in order to get through the disastrous results of the 1990 crop year?

I cannot say it enough: A bridging type of program is needed. Horticultural producers in the province of Ontario have worked their figures. They claim that they need $70 million to get them even close to where they have been on the average in the past number of years. That is one province.

I know all provinces in the horticultural industry were not affected in the same way. British Columbia has been affected, as has the maritimes, but they agree that the main hurt this year have been in the province of Ontario.

I ask the government to react to this as quickly as it possibly can so that producers know where they are at for 1991. I will leave it at that, Mr. Speaker, and there may be some comments.

• (1730)

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a comment.

There is no question about the seriousness of the agricultural situation, especially in the grains and oilseeds, but I think there is also a very clear indication, particularly in the farm groups and among farmers, that this government has stood with farmers through difficult times. There has never been a government in the history of this country that has stood with the farmers like the Conservative government, the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Agriculture. There has been strong representation throughout the grains and oilseeds industry, horticulture and agriculture as a whole.

If we look at the numbers, I think we will find that this government put about $22 billion into agriculture in the last six years. I am not saying that is enough, nor that it has solved all the problems, but certainly if there has ever been a government that has been sensitive to the need, it is this government.

What about the present situation? This past winter the Minister of Agriculture called together farm groups from across the country: 19 farm groups, all the wheat pools, all wheat growers. All the organizations were represented. Farmers themselves, with support from the federal government and the provincial governments, brought together programs that are now called GRIP and NISA. They are being well accepted.

I just want to assure the opposition and our farmers out there that if ever there has been a government that will stand with them, this government will, has, and will continue to.

The importance of the strength of this government is that we represent all the regions of this country. We represent Quebec, Ontario, the west, the maritimes, and right across the country. One important point our farmers are making is that it is important this country stay together as a strong federation so that we can continue to do what has been done in the past: support agriculture. I just want to make the point that our government has stood with the farmers, will continue to stand with them, and these programs will work in the future.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, I do not quarrel with some of the comments of my friend across the floor about the dollars that have been put into agriculture. What he did not address is the subject matter of the motion today.

He talked about what he has done in the past. He talked about what he hopes to do in the future. But farmers want to know what he is going to do now.

The programs and the action taken for the 1989 crop year are not going to take place again. We are talking constructively. We are talking about what will happen or what can happen for 1991 on. However there is a gap or a bridging in there, and we are asking the government what it is going to do.

Today the Minister of Finance says the money is not available, the $1.3 billion increase in the agriculture budget this year is used up for the Canadian Wheat Board for western grain stabilization. He says the money is not available.

The government is making promises to bring. That is what it is saying. The government is giving it lip service. We hear the rhetoric all the time, but it does not have anything.

What we are saying is that we want the government to make a commitment and come out with a program to put it up. Put it on the table. We don't even know where it is going to get the money. Where is it? It is used up.

Is it going into consolidated revenue funds in order to get the money or, because of its importance, is it willing to go into contingency funds to get the money? With what the government has said it is going to do and the dollar value it put on it, it does not have enough dollars even to begin.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State for Agriculture.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I take the floor today to emphasize the impact of many measures taken by the federal government to enhance the economic situation of Canadian and Quebec farmers. A number of comments have been made and heard today, but let us keep in mind the progress we have accomplished over the past six years. On many occasions this government has shown a concern about the socio-economic well-being of the agri-food producer. Never did the federal government back away from its responsibilities in this sector. On the contrary, as hon. members will admit, the government did intervene whenever the situation called for constructive action. My colleague who is now the minister showed determination and commitment when in the fall of 1989, and this bears repeating, he launched the most exhaustive review of our national agrifood policy ever undertaken in our history.

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, provincial representatives met here in Ottawa and endorsed a series of major principles, namely agrifood sector autonomy, respect for regions, enhancement of sustainable environment, and market awareness.

The numerous interest groups got down to work. So far a number of people sat on a dozen-odd different committees. They were confident that they would find practical solutions in the interest of the general public and contribute to re-assure the farming community. That is what they did, and they produced entirely relevant reports. The job is not finished yet, I agree, but in most cases these reports have been unanimously endorsed by the participants, be they from the government sector, the processing sector, the academic sector, or any other sector.

One of the first task forces was set up to study the matter of income security, particularly with respect to grains and oilseeds. Having considered the issue from every angle the members of the committee opted for a two-prong income security program. Earlier this afternoon several speakers said that we have been talking about this for years, and that is true enough. But it is only after consulting farmers, producers, processors and provincial spokesmen that our government launches new programs.

Federal and provincial ministers of Agriculture and almost every farm association, including Quebec's Union des producteurs agricoles, approved in principle these two programs, the Gross Revenue Income Plan, usually called GRIP, and the Net Income Stabilization Account, NISA. Unable sometimes to attend federal-provincial meetings, in view of the current political situation in Quebec as my colleagues know representatives of the Quebec government regularly inquire about the policy review process. The many Quebeckers who sit as members on these committees have greatly influenced the debate and its progress.

The government of Quebec had absolutely no trouble accepting some of the measures resulting from the policy review. Such was the case for example with the objective of progressively reducing the countless interprovincial trade barriers which applied to a lot of agrifood products.

More recently, Mr. Speaker, I thought my colleagues would be interested to know that last Thursday, on March 4, the government of Quebec and the federal government reached an agreement allowing Quebec grain producers to participate in the Gross Revenue Income Plan. This program will be in effect for the 1991-92 crop year, which means that one more provincial government joining this national program that was prepared by them and for them. The two levels of government have agreed to let the Régie des assurances agricoles du Québec manage the program, hence making its implementation easier, improving communications, and allowing for more positive results for the Quebec farmers.

I am happy to see that public authorities can provide farm producers with such a good safety net which will enhance the current crop insurance and stabilization programs which apply as we know to all Canadians.

We are all aware just how difficult a farmer's life can be, not just because the weather conditions can have such an impact on the expected yield, but also because of the export subsidy war which has now been going on for some time, with the result that all farm producers must face depressed world prices which make it extremely difficult for them to get an adequate income from their hard work.

Recent statistics indicate that in some areas of our country, some producers are better off than others. This makes it necessary—my hon. friends of the opposition will certainly agree—for these programs to be as flexible as possible, so that the regions which are hurting the most, such as Saskatchewan, as well as some regions in Manitoba and in other provinces—may benefit from this flexibility.

That is the way our government has applied and prepared the programs for the farm producers. The purpose was to make these programs flexible enough to provide producers with adequate help when they need it most.

The new safety net will help remedy a situation on the basis of the prices paid over the past 15 years. This program will require the personal involvement of the producers and of the two levels of government. As I said on a number of occasions in this House, a government can no longer keep throwing money at a problem to make it go away Long-term solutions have to be considered and producers themselves must contribute to this long-term effort, as well as the provinces. Statistics show that some of them have made no significant effort to help farm producers.

It is with this objective in mind that for the past two years, federal programs required that the federal and provincial governments as well as producers do their share.

Mr. Speaker, I now want to tell you about the dairy industry. In its effort to deal quickly with a difficult situation, our government, with the invaluable support of the people who devoted themselves heart and soul to achieve this safety net has managed to improve the lot of wheat producers in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada. Several other policy review initiatives focus on other industries which should not be neglected. I refer for instance to the task force on dairy policy and the task force on poultry which were created as soon as the review of the Canadian farm policies were announced and which are doing a tremendous job.

Everybody will agree that supply management is more important in Eastern Canada. I want to emphasize what is being done in each of these industries. Like other food processing industries, the dairy industry is presently undergoing major disruption. In Quebec, particularly, as well as elsewhere in the country, dairy cooperatives joined forces to realize economies of scale and better compete on the North American market. In this context, the thrust of work of the task force on the dairy policy is toward the adaptation of the dairy industry to change. It is up to the industry to determine of its future. Even then, the days are over when the government would decide everything for the agrifood sector. It is now up to the sector to set its objectives and find the means to achieve them.

The government of Canada fully intends to follow the recommendations from the final report to be presented in a few short weeks, on April 1. Of course, these proposals will first have to be agreed upon by the whole group. The policy review process is designed to create partnerships between producers, processors, dealers and consumers. The future of an industry can be managed properly only once a good partnership is established. No one can impose his ideas nowadays. Their consequences on every link of the agrifood chain must be weighed. This need is more and more obvious to everyone.

Earlier this year, the Canadian Dairy Commission was asked by the government to set the support prices for butter and skim milk powder. This decision was in keeping with the objective of increased independance for the sector. Why would the government have to make such a technical decision? So, our government requested that price-setting mechanisms allowing the industry to exercice greater freedom and responsibility be investigated and reported on. Other subjects of investigation include allocation of quotas, price-setting, competitiveness, research, etc.

I am convinced that the members of this task force will introduce proposals that will strengthen this sector. I was told that the poultry task force's report, which is expected to be very interesting, is about to be released. Another sector that has a quota system! Last May's preliminary report emphasized the need for improving supply management in the poultry industry. What remains to be seen is whether they can agree on how to do this.

We must not forget that we cannot expect the government to deal in advance with every problem that might arise in these industries. It will always be up to the sectors—which are very dynamic, I may add—to establish with us how we can improve things for the future. Perhaps I may remind you, Mr. Speaker, that we introduced a long-term dairy policy, something which had been lacking for five years. There was one when our friends the Liberals were in power, but during the subsequent four or five years, it was treated in a rather desultory fashion. It was just renewed annually, and there were no safeguards for producers.

As my colleague said earlier today, we introduced a long-term policy that passed the test over a five-year period, but before we introduce a new policy, we want to ensure that it will provide an adequate and firm response to the needs of the dairy sector in the years to come.

Another sector that concerns us and which, in fact, has hurt us somewhat in recent years is the pork industry. In September 1989, the U.S. government imposed countervailing duties on our exports of fresh and frozen pork.

The U.S. Department of Trade judged that certain federal and provincial programs in Canada were subject to countervail, including the tripartite national stabilization program which we introduced after consultations with the parties concerned and which responded to the needs of all provinces, producers, processors and the various governments. The U.S. International Trade Commission, however, judged that Canadian exports represented a threat of injury to the U.S. pork industry.

Our government, together with the industry and several provinces, is working very hard to get the countervail removed. We called for two special binational panels under Chapter XIX of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and we also filed a complaint with GATT. For the benefit of those who criticize the free trade agreement, I would like to say that without this agreement, Canadians would have had no recourse at all. Thanks to the free trade agreement, Canada was able to establish these binational panels to make itself heard. I think that is a very important point. It was quite an event. It was one of the first times ever that we were heard before this kind of tribunal. In fact, and I will get back to this later on, this is an opportunity to defend and obtain recognition of the rights of Canadian producers.

The two special panels ruled in favour—I repeat, in favour—of the Canadian arguments. The number of programs and the value of the support systems that would be subject to countervail were reduced following decisions by the special panel which examined the definition of subsidies subject to countervail. Furthermore, and this is most important part, the other special panel looked into the matter of injury and caused the International Trade Commission to reverse its judgment of threat of injury. This reversal repealed the imposition of countervail, retroactive to September 1989, one and a half years ago.

Finally, a special GATT group ruled that the U.S. legislation applied in this case did not conform to GATT regulations.

Since their original representations were successful, pork producers in the United States recently asked their government to use the last recourse provided under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, i.e. extraordinary challenge. The United States are to decide by March 29 the middle of next week whether they believe such recourse is justified. If they do, an extraordinary challenge committee must hand down a ruling within forty-five days. Whatever the Americans decide to do, we remain confident that we will be vindicated. We explained our case before the special panels under GATT and the Free Trade Agreement, and we believe that the request for an extraordinary challenge is wholly unjustified. Once this matter has finally been resolved, I am sure that the collaboration among the Canadian parties, as well as our joint perseverance, will prove to be an unqualified success.

In the final analysis, this government has proved it is capable of acting responsibly to help its Canadian and Quebec farm producers.

What I think is very encouraging is that we always act in consultation with the sector and the provinces, and that at the same time we are promoting partnerships within the agrifood sector. I remember the week we met when I was in Brussels last December. There were representatives who were aware of the importance of the agrifood sector for Canada and the provinces. Representatives from all over Canada, from the entire sector, were in Brussels. Everyday we talked and consulted through a number of advisory committees representing the entire industry, not only the agricultural sector but all sectors.

Everyday, we would discuss the issue around the table, and I will always remember the last Friday when we were facing some very serious difficulties in the GATT. In spite of those very serious difficulties, provincial representatives around the table, headed by Premier Devine, Mr. Picotte, the Quebec Minister of Agriculture, and representatives from other provinces as well from the industry said: Never have we been so well represented, never a government represented Canadian interests so faithfully. That is a mark of appreciation for a government which preferred to work with Canadian organizations— I am not exaggerating, I was there. It is on the record, and you know it.

For the past seven years, we have seen a government like none before caring for Canadian farmers and taking the best actions in the interest of Canadian agricultural producers. The agricultural producers have a good memory; they will know who they can trust because this government has always dealt with their concerns.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you that the minister was not shy about patting himself and his government colleagues on the back.

But the reality is somewhat different, and people like me who look at the situation from a more objective standpoint will tell you the same thing. Still I should like to direct a few questions to the minister.

In his remarks he spoke highly of the Free Trade Agreement, emphasizing all the benefits it brought to the agricultural community, or so he said. I wonder whether he remembers the debate we had about ice cream and yogurt just before the 1988 election. Perhaps the minister will recall that, at that time, Canadian farmers asked the government to ensure that ice cream and yogurt would be on the import control list. The government opposite simply said: "Yes, it will be done."

And some of us asked: Fine, but, Minister, dear conservative friends, don't you know that, if you do that, perhaps the other side will object, you will be brought before the GATT and you will lose the argument? Is it not exactly what happened, in all respects? Is it not true that the opposition was right to warn the government?

And is it not true also that the government was derelict at that time, because when the GATT panel rendered its decision, the government simply accepted it without appealing to the GATT as a whole. We will recall that the government said at the time: Well, we will accept the panel decision and we will implement it after the new GATT negotiations, hoping that, first of all, those will be successful—it is not yet the case, although I also wish it were. But at the same time, for example, in case of failure, what is the government going to do to help dairy producers on the ice cream and yogurt issue, all of which was precipitated by the free trade deal of the minister opposite and his colleagues?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is second to none when it comes to clouding the issue. First I would just point out that since the Free Trade Agreement became operative we have been witnessing a sharp increase in exports, and even in the agrifood sector our export trade with the United States has gone up by more than 20 per cent, a figure which goes to show that the FTA has been a very successful venture, Mr. Speaker. All the fears expressed by those who were dead set against this agreement proved to be unfounded.

With respect to yogurt and ice cream, Mr. Speaker, indeed I vividly recall discussing the matter with dairy producers as well as the federal and provincial federations, fully aware as I was of the danger of adding these two products to the list of controlled exports because the FTA negotiations did not have anything to do with GATT. Sure enough, the Americans won when they took their case before GATT officials. However my colleague would know that we have not yet accepted that ruling, which is still in limbo like many others concerning yogurt and ice cream. We are not particularly pleased about the situation, Mr. Speaker, and I too could have done without yet another debate on the issue.

In any case, we consulted with dairy producers and they were strongly supportive of our position. Not a single word was written nor a single step taken in this matter without the full endorsement of the Dairy Farmers of Canada. When we filed our request with GATT they were behind us all the way. We sought to have Article 11 strengthened and clarified precisely to avoid any future argument over yogurt and ice cream. To this day, Mr. Speaker, the case has been dealt with only after full consultation with and approval of the Dairy Farmers of Canada. Never before had any government held so many consultations with producers, Mr. Speaker, and that is what we will continue to do because we believe the industry can be prosperous only if it gets to have a say on its own future.

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate my colleague—

Mr. Boudria: Why?

Mr. Bernier: —the hon. minister of State for Agriculture, the member for Bellechasse, which is adjacent to my constituency. His constituency is also half-urban and half-rural. But I would like to say something to my colleague of the opposition who has just spoken of failure. Sure enough, failure is a familiar word when it comes to Liberals. Let me remind him these words by Cervantes, in Don Quixote: "He who goes for wool comes home shorn." I believe it is extremely important to give a lot of consideration to the speech made by the Minister of State for Agriculture.

• (1800)

A few minutes ago, the minister mentioned the benefits of free trade for agriculture, and I think free-trade has been very profitable for us. There are 3,000 pork producers in my constituency alone who benefit from a free access to the American market.

So today, because of the decision that well-known panel has just rendered in favour of our Canadian, Quebec and Beauce producers, we are going to get 17 million back. It is our money and I think a good deal of it will end up in Beauce and Bellechasse counties.

But without this court decision that, would not have been the case. In my opinion, our producers are quite aware of the significance of the American market for them. But enough said about the benefits of free-trade to our farm producers, I would now like to talk about GATT.

After displaying a great deal of discipline, we, the Quebec and Canadian producers, have sacrificed ourselves. We have set limits for ourselves without joint programs, marketing boards and quotas.

Today, we are asking for increased protection under Article XI of the GATT, and the Opposition member said that we failed in that regard. I do not think that we failed since negotiations are not completed yet. Is there any reason for producers from Quebec and Canada to believe that, one day, we will have all the protection we want and asked for under Article XI of the GATT?

So our farmers, our pork, egg, milk and poultry producers, are asking themselves some questions and I think they deserve an answer from the government.

Therefore, I ask that question to my hon. colleague.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. minister of State for Agriculture. You have two minutes left.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as to the comment of my hon. colleague regarding pork producers, it is clear that all producers, the thousands of pork producers in Quebec, Ontario and the West, will benefit from that decision, since that industry grew as a result of the requirement to process locally its procucts for export.

Regarding the GATT negotiations, I would like to say, that the Canadian position was nearly unanimous since all groups representing producers, processors and the provinces were supportive. This is a clear victory which proves that the Canadian position was truly in line with what Canadian producers want. I would say that, like the hon. member for Beauce, I am optimistic. I am optimistic and I believe all will agree that these negotiations which are beginning again will require compromising from everyone. This will lead to a settlement which could be near the Canadian position, since if we look at the two extreme positions, the American one and the European one, our position is in between.

So, what I would call the centripetal force, which is tending to pull toward the center, should bring people to be reasonable. And the more they will be reasonable, the closer they will be to the Canadian position. I am therefore relatively confident and I think we must look to the future with optimism, despite the problems. I firmly believe the GATT negotiations will end up with an agreement which will profit the Canadian agricultural producers, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to rise on debate to discuss this question of calling upon the House to take immediate action to deal with the drastically reduced farm incomes resulting from the 1990–91 crop year and to make required assistance available in time for spring planting to insure viable returns for grains, oilseeds and horticultural producers. I think this debate was initiated by the tabling of the estimates. In those estimates you will recall that the amount of new money being allocated to handle agricultural problems was set at $1.3 billion. Producers and politicians began to look at what was on the government's plate in the form of new expenditures. We see a bill that was subsequently presented to implement GRIP and NISA, to provide long term assistance to agriculture which would have swallowed a couple of deficits that are existing now by rescinding the WGSA account and the crop reinsurance account.

WGSA had, at February 1, a deficit of about $1.1 billion. The reinsurance account had a deficit of $471 million. We know that the Wheat Board initial price will create a bit of a deficit and a call for government assistance as well in the coming year, covered by this budget. That is expected to be somewhere between $.3 billion and $1 billion. As well there will be premiums for the new GRIP and NISA programs when they come into account.

Out of those expenditures of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2 billion or $2.5 billion, to find where this $1.3 billion would cover all those things and still provide some assistance for the 1990–91 crop year. That crop year is going to be missed out, it appears. That was the reason, I suppose, that the Official Opposition wanted to raise it in its opportunity today for an opposition day.

The lack of funds for the farm aid program, which has been estimated at about $1.25 billion for a grain and oilseed industry right across the country, is something that is concerning farm communities and farmers in particular.

I thought what I would do, however, today is go back a little bit over the last decade and try to find out why it is that the 1980s were not been a particularly good decade for farmers and what the 1990s might hold for that sector of our economy. The eighties were hard times for farmers. We began the decade with net farm incomes in the range of $4.5 billion to $5 billion. In the last several years that means farm income has dropped to $3 billion or $3.5 billion. We saw in the committee stage of Bill C–98 some departmental estimates that put the coming year's net farm incomes around $2 billion or slightly lower.

We are dealing with net farm incomes that are less than one–half what they were at the beginning of the 1980s and a precipitous drop of more than one–third in this year alone. That is why this bridging money of $1.25 billion is being asked for.

I do not think we have to ask ourselves what that drop in net farm income will buy at the end of the eighties and entering the nineties as compared to what could be purchased with it in the early eighties. The buying power is down almost one–half. In fact, numerous observers have noted that a bushel of wheat this year buys less real goods than it ever has in the history of keeping records. Wheat is at the lowest price it has ever been in this year of 1991.

The question we have to ask ourselves is why is this happening. When we look at global output and think in terms of the old economic thinking where we use supply and demand to try to arrive at what prices are, there are no answers. The old market economics do not work in agriculture right now because when you look at the global output over the last three or four years, you will see that during three of those four years the world failed to produce enough food to meet global needs. Yet, during those four years prices continued to drop even though supplies were falling and the needs of people continued to grow as population increased.

Some economists will argue that that is because of differences between real demand and effective demand, the new population are all children and they do not have any money and, therefore, they cannot affect the market, which is true, but the facts still are there that the supplies are not meeting the demand and yet the price is falling. So we have to look at the market a little more closely than what has been the bent in textbooks.

You can see over the last couple of decades a fairly substantive shift and change in the way that a price is arrived at. We do not have world markets for agricultural products in the way that the textbook looks at a world price. What we have are markets that are very much adjusted and manipulated by active involvement by governments and by active involvement by very large multinational trading corporations. The two often, almost always, are working hand in hand to manipulate these markets and to keep the farm gate price relatively low.

To back that up, I would just like to go through the two major grain and agricultural producing blocs, the Americans and the Europeans, to show how their so–called price support systems work to achieve extremely low market prices or world prices. I say that in the context of a current situation where wheat at U.S. gulf ports is being exported at an effective price of about $80 per tonne even though the cost of producing that wheat in the U.S. is about $150 per tonne.

How does the U.S. do it, you ask. They do it by a system of support prices and loan rates that have been devastating for countries like Canada, Australia and Argentina, countries that have not got similar kinds of programs in place. They begin with a target price, just take it for wheat, where they attempt to have a target price for 1991 of approximately $4 a bushel for wheat in Canadian funds. That is the target that the government attempts to get the farmers and they come very close to it. Farmers have to sign up to the program and they have to comply with certain alleged or so–called restrictions to acreage. Those restrictions to Canadian farmers are a bit of a misnomer because when you look at the U.S. border between Alberta and Montana you will see that these restrictions to acreage, so–called, south of the 49th parallel have resulted in most of the grassland being broke up.

When you look at satellite pictures you will see that the 49th parallel marks exactly where grasslands start on the Alberta side and where farmland continues on the Montana side and there is no agronomic difference between those soils, the weather or anything else on either side of the 49th parallel at that point. Yet, the American farmers have found it profitable to break up those rather fragile prairie soils and put them into wheat because of the program that the Americans are offering which is sometimes sold world-wide as being a program to restrict production. In effect, it has increased production and put soils into production that should probably never have been put into production.

What does the farmer do if he is an American farmer. After he has harvested his wheat he can take out a loan. The loan rate for this year of $2.04 American translates into roughly $2.40 Canadian.

In effect, the U.S. government has control of that grain at the loan rate. If the price goes up, the farmer can pay the interest and storage charges, buy it back and resell it on to the market. The reality is that there is enough wheat in the United States so that that very rarely happens.

Effectively, the loan rate becomes the price that the U.S. government turns into holdings, which it accumulates over time. The grain becomes theirs and it is then turned over to the multinational grain corporations to market outside of the U.S.

The price of that grain becomes the U.S. loan rate. Those multinational corporations found that the U.S. loan rate of $2.40 a bushel Canadian did not make that wheat really easy to sell. They had to compete against everybody else because the rest of us have cut our prices accordingly. They have convinced the government that they need a second tool, which is the Export Enhancement Program, whereby the U.S. government supplies funds to those companies which lower the cost to those companies by as much as $55 a tonne more.

Hence, the United States is able to offer grain out of the Gulf of Mexico ports at approximately $80 a tonne. Meanwhile, the Europeans have created a system, called the Common Agricultural Policy, which relies on a host of import levies and export restitutions. They try to keep their price of wheat to approximately $8 a bushel Canadian. Any grain products that go into the European community enter at the international price, which is generally considered to be the loan rate in the United States, plus a difference between $8 and that price.

Grain and oilseed products going into Europe have to pay this very large levy which goes into a fund and assists the European community to provide export restitutions to their farmers when they over-produce and have to sell some of their produce outside of the market.

As a consequence, the cost to the European treasuries are not very high, but the cost to importers is quite high. The effect on other exporters around the world is quite devastating because they use their restitutions to roll the price back down to the U.S. loan rate.

Everybody is happy in this system, if they happen to be Americans or Europeans, but the rest of the world is very unhappy with this system.

The multinational grain companies benefit. They do very well by it. They still handle their volumes. Forty per cent of their world trade is in U.S. wheat and grains. Approximately 20 per cent of their business is European grains. As a consequence, the synergy between the multinational corporations and the big power governments in this case has worked very well for them, but it has been pretty hard on Third World countries and farmers like we have here in Canada.

We have no ready way of being able to subsist against that kind of competition. It is often asked: "What can we do about this kind of system?" There are two answers that have been pursued, one with some vigour. There was a proposal which began in the Uruguay Round to try to limit these kinds of subsidized activities as they apply to agriculture. There was an attempt to include agricultural subsidies and trade in the recent GATT round.

That round fell apart in early December. It may be extended for another year or two, but so far that is depending almost exclusively on the reaction in the U.S. with its President and Congress. Currently, there are some discussions going on to tie the new fast track to the U.S.-Mexico trade arrangements so that the GATT fast track and the Mexican fast track will be together, which means that the President and his advisers will be able to use the good that the American economy will extract from the U.S.-Mexican arrangement in getting access to cheaper labour along with the further internationalization of its trade commitments under the GATT. The politics are that they are trying to tie the two issues together for fast-track purposes so that the growing concern in the U.S. about including agriculture in the package will not scuttle the fast track and with it any agreement the President and his people might achieve outside the country.

The second thing that could be done which very few people are talking about would be to raise the loan rate. There is an awful lot of good that can accrue even to the Americans if they would raise the loan rate. It would reduce the amount of U.S. farmers' dependency on taxpayers. It would help resolve a very large government deficit situation that the U.S. finds itself in. It would reduce the taxpayers' liability and it would increase farm prices. It would not hurt the farmers in the U.S. but it would help farmers outside the U.S.

I contend that is one of the reasons why the U.S. is not doing it. What we have here is not market economics, as I noted earlier, but it is power economics. The Americans seem to want it, as do the Europeans, because they are finding the system works very well for them in international power games. It keeps the rest of the world quite dependent on their political actions.

The people who benefit are their own producers. The people who are hurt are the competing producers in other countries, and Canada is one of those countries being hurt by this program. The Third World countries are being hurt. Not only does this provide access to power on an international scene, but complying governments and complacent governments such as our own continue to go along with this international power game because the multinational corporations are good supporters at times of election. They supply them with free advice, or almost free advice. They pretend to supply them with jobs, always at the expense of local communities and farmers, and they argue that they certain things have to happen or food aid or world debt problems will not be alleviated.

Even on the domestic scene we have witnessed in just the last few years the use of political power over farmers by following and accepting this particular kind of economic gain.

The Canada–U.S. trade agreement was predicated upon this kind of thinking. GRIP and NISA which are supposed to be the key that will unlock our ability to collect third line of defence payments in emergency situations is that kind of program. It is called voluntary, but if one does not sign into the program and agree to fairly substantial levies over the years one does not get any assistance.

It is a little bit like having a gun put to your head by a person who says: "You don't want to commit suicide, do you?" And, if you shake your head, the trigger goes off and they say: "Sorry, he committed suicide". This is the kind of dependency that our government is trying to foster on our communities with this kind of program.

I think it is time we looked at the real solutions to world agriculture and returned to self–sustaining, self–supporting, self–sufficient agriculture, instead of the dependency that this government and other world governments are foisting on us today.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to talk about this government's efforts to give Canadian horticultural producers income stability and predictability. The industry has a farm gate value of close to $2 billion and a processing sector of close to $1 billion and growing. This growth comes from a willingness to respond to the challenges of constant change. This industry is dealing with changes in market conditions, changes in consumer demands, changes in technology and changes in trading patterns. It has proven that it can respond successfully to these challenges.

The B.C. Wine Institute is a clear example of how this industry can turn a challenge into an opportunity. It has responded to changing consumer tastes and competition from imports by aggressively marketing premium B.C. wines under the the Vintners Quality Alliance. As a result, sales in December 1990 were up 61 per cent over December 1989.

What about growth in trade? Other sectors of this vast and diverse horticulture industry are also benefiting from increases in exports. Exports in floriculture and nursery products reached $204 million in 1990, compared with $171 million in 1989. The blueberry industry continues to enjoy a trade boom. Export sales in 1990 reached $23.5 million, up from $20 million the year before.

In 1990 we also exported more apples and apple juice, cranberries, peaches, onions, fresh tomatoes, cabbage and carrots, just to name a few commodities. In all, our fruit and vegetable sales to the United States alone increased to $328 million from $257 million between 1989 and 1990.

There is some exciting news in the processing sector as well. Canada's agrifood processing companies have so much confidence in our primary agriculture sector that they are making new investments. In the past two years some 50 new processing plants have been established, 54 have been expanded, and 26 new investments in modernization have taken place.

Our processors and producers are also recognizing that success comes with working together as partners. Producers need processors and processors need producers.

Ontario's vegetable processing industry is a clear example of the kinds of partnerships being forged. Growers and processors have developed a new bargaining and pricing system that has given the tomato industry a promising future.

Here is what Bob Kerr, a prominent southwestern Ontario grower, said about this industry during the recent annual meeting of the Ontario Vegetable Growers Marketing Board:

> I am really excited about the potential for growing tomatoes for processing. When I look around at all the commodities in Ontario and ask myself "where do I think is the most rewarding place to invest equipment and capital?", I would say it is the tomato industry.

When we review policy we see that partnerships in the agrifood industry have been fostered and strengthened in the past year, thanks to the government's agrifood policy review.

During 1990, more than 300 men and women from all facets of the industry worked through 11 task forces to put our agrifood policies under the microscope. Most of those task forces have submitted their reports and recommendations to federal and provincial agriculture ministers. When the ministers met earlier this month in Regina, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture outlined 12 areas where he believes action must be taken in the year ahead.

These include: properly launching a new safety net program, taking steps to enhance the competitiveness of the agrifood sector, freeing up the system by reforming regulations that have created barriers to competitiveness, broadening our agriculture base by encouraging diversification and value added production, strengthening our processing sector, reducing production costs right through the system, strengthening the management capabilities of our industry, expanding our efforts on the environment, looking at ways to provide adjustment support when necessary, strengthening our regions and rural communities, maximizing our trade opportunities, and aggressively challenging unfair trading practises that hurt our industry.

We have heard much about the safety nets. As members of this House know, the government has introduced the Farm Income Protection Act which will allow us to put in place new safety net programs. The legislation is now before the House agriculture committee. That legislation reflects a new way of thinking in the agrifood business because those safety nets, which I might say were designed in full consultation with producers, are part of a comprehensive strategy for dealing with a full range of farm income situations.

The Farm Income Protection Act will establish the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan known as GRIP and the Net Income Stabilization Account known as NISA. The federal government is offering to make GRIP and NISA available on edible horticultural crops in as many provinces as possible in 1991. We have a government–industry committee looking at strengthened stabilization programs for 1992 and beyond.

GRIP and NISA represent one part of a three–part strategy and form what has become known as the second line of defence. Under the first line, producers are responsible for effectively managing their operations. Government has a responsibility to provide an environment that allows for effective management and, to that end, the Minister of Agriculture wants to strengthen management capabilities by, among other things, introducing a national farm business management program. An industry–government group is developing details for this program, and a discussion paper will soon be circulated.

Until such a strategy is in place, the government is providing funding for the farm management initiative program. The government is also looking at the recommendations of the farm finance task force on providing stable, long–term interest rates and special assistance to beginning farmers. The government also wants to reduce production costs by improving producer access to farm chemicals.

One of the recommendations in the pesticide registration review deals with price monitoring. Work in this area has been fast tracked to ensure producers are not left at a competitive disadvantage with their U.S. counterparts.

The government also wants to put more emphasis on research projects aimed at lowering production costs. The GST is already lowering those costs, a fact that will become more apparent as farmers start making their purchases for spring planting.

The third line of this three-part safety net strategy deals with income situations that cannot be adequately addressed by effective management or programs like GRIP and NISA. A national horticultural safety nets committee is in place and is dealing with issues that span the three lines of defence. It is studying ways to enhance the long-term income stability of the industry and will submit its recommendations to federal and provincial ministers when they have their annual meeting in Alberta in July of this year.

The federal government is also working closely with the Government of British Columbia, the Okanagan Tree Fruit Authority and the B.C. Fruit Growers Association to look at what needs to be done to revitalize the tree fruit industry.

We also plan to work closely with the province of Ontario and its tender fruit growers in looking at long-term solutions to some problems affecting that industry.

In conclusion, clearly this government is concerned about the well-being of Canada's horticulture industry. We are taking the steps necessary to ensure its health and well-being in both the short term and the long term. By working in partnership with the industry, we are taking the action necessary to build a vibrant, durable horticultural sector for this decade and the 21st century.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech of the hon. member opposite with a great deal of interest. I recognize that he has some personal interest in the horticultural sector. I applaud him for that because it is an important part of the agricultural sector.

The main part of the motion put forward today dealt with the government coming up with the required assistance in time for spring seeding this year. One of the things the finance minister, in his February budget suggested, was that there would be additional spending, $1.3 billion in additional funds provided for farmers in need.

In Saskatchewan where I come from, there are a large number of farmers in need, mostly grain producers. I realize the member opposite understands the grain sector as well as the horticultural sector. We have farmers in need who are looking for that $1.3 billion in funding that the finance minister has identified as money necessary right now for spring seeding.

The prairie pools have indicated that if we just take current market conditions, at least $1 billion is necessary in order to ensure that the farmers on the land in western Canada will have enough money to put their seed in the ground and harvest a crop.

The other part of it is the economics, the massive debt that exists in the agricultural sector: $22 billion now exists as the accumulated debt.

I would like to ask the hon. member opposite two questions. We have a massive debt on the prairies and a great need for immediate money, immediate funding. Would the hon. member agree that the money in the budget, $1.3 billion in additional spending, should be earmarked for spring seeding funding for grain producers on the prairies? Would he see an opportunity for the government to put in place a special interest program for farmers who are holding that $22 billion debt in the agricultural sector?

Mr. O'Kurley: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member identified a problem that is certainly an important issue in the region of western Canada, and in particular in prairies ridings where agriculture is an important pillar in their economies, as it is in Elk Island.

As the member from Saskatchewan pointed out, our agricultural sector is experiencing some very difficult times. Those difficulties are to a large extent created by the subsidy trade war between the European Economic Community and the Americans. Certainly it is important that the federal government play a role in addressing that very important difficulty.

The program that was set out by the federal government was a program to include the producers, provincial governments, as well as the federal government. It was also suggested with regard to immediate assistance prior to seeding that any assistance or any type of program would have to be included in the proposed structure of the GRIP and NISA programs.

I am sure that the government of the province of Saskatchewan will be looking very closely at this issue. I am sure that it will be listening to farmers and trying address the needs of the farmers. I know that Premier Devine of Saskatchewan has done a great deal to address the concerns of farmers in that province. I know very well that he will be working closely with the federal government, with the Minister of Agriculture, with the province and with the farming community to ensure that those concerns are resolved.

• (1840)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the hon. member for Elk Island and the hon. member from The Battlefords this afternoon because I think they raised two very important points.

One was the point made by the hon. member for Elk Island about the horticultural industry. We know from those producers in Ontario who appeared here just last week that the shortfall for their industry is some $70 million just this year. That is just in the Ontario region. We know there are other horticultural producers in his constituency in B.C. and certainly in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick where they are facing some very serious shortfalls because of the special circumstances there.

I wonder if the hon. member is as concerned as I am, when the Minister of Agriculture stands in his place and says: "Look, if the horticultural producers want help this year, they have got to sign up for the GRIP program in the future and indicate they are going to take the program". There is only one little problem there, and that is there is no GRIP program. The one for grains and oilseeds has been developed over the last 18 months by a very hard working group of producers and other officials over a long period of time.

The negotiations for having some kind of gross revenue insurance program, or NISA program, for the horticultural industry has just begun. They hope that by next year at this time there will be a program. That causes a problem.

How do you sign up for GRIP for the horticultural industry if there is not one? The minister is us the sleeves out of his vest. He is saying: "You sign up for GRIP and we will give you an emergency support system. The only thing is you can't sign up for GRIP because there isn't a GRIP for the horticultural industry". I am sure he is concerned, as I am concerned and the horticultural producers right across this country are concerned that they are not going to have any interim emergency funding.

The hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings related this earlier this afternoon. Four of the prime producers in Ontario sat down last week and looked at their net losses for the last year which totalled over $400,000. The president said he lost $44,000 last year for the first time and it was the largest loss in a 35 year period.

There is great concern as to whether the government is actually going to come through with assistance for the horticultural industry. Likewise, there is very great concern whether there is going to be an immediate deficiency payment or support for the grains and oilseeds system.

The minister of finance in Saskatoon just last week said that there is no more money, that this is to support a number of deficit funds but left in serious doubt whether there is any assistance for emergency deficiency assistance for these those producers who are in the worst financial crisis of their lives.

Mr. O'Kurley: Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to be brief in response to the member's comments and questions. Generally speaking in the horticultural sector, there are some challenges which have to be worked through. I am sure he will recognize, as other members of the House will, that horticultural products fit into categories of edible products as well as non-edible products. When we are establishing a program we have to first recognize the distinctiveness of that sector of the agricultural industry.

Second, it is important that when we are designing a program, we design a long-term program which will ensure a certain sense of stability and predictability and that we do not go for the quick fix emergency funding that does not recognize a long-term structure and a long-term program.

The third thing is that it is important in establishing and designing these programs that we engage in full consultation with members of that sector to ensure we develop the most effective program possible.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to the House today about the concerns of rural Canada and primarily the concerns of farmers in farm communities.

A number of my colleagues have already addressed the general problems of Canadian agriculture and have spoken of the specific problems being found in the horticultural industry and the grains and oilseeds sectors.

In addition, there has been an extensive discussion of the safety net program, the national GRIP and NISA programs and a third line of defence. Therefore, I want to confine my comments for the most part to Atlantic concerns, especially those relating to my home province of Prince Edward Island.

Prince Edward Island is basically a rural province. Its economy is driven by two main industries, the farming and fishing industries. The economic health of the whole province is heavily dependent upon the state of these two industries, both of which are our primary industries.

The policies of this government since 1984 have made it increasingly difficult for these two industries to survive, let alone grow. Further impediments have been placed in the way of primary producers in their attempt to make a decent living. For example, in the fishing sector we have been confronted by a refusal to make adequate repairs to wharfs and to keep harbours dredged. The government has forced our lobstermen to increase the carapace size, posing a further loss on their catches.

The dockside monitoring program has now been forced through. Fishermen throughout the whole gulf area have objected to this program and the way the costs are being passed on to them but all to no avail.

In the agricultural sector, we have been confronted by increased user fees, increased inspection fees, cuts in assistance programs, increased crop insurance fees and a cut of $1.8 million over the past couple of years.

These types of policies have eroded the capability of our farmers and fishermen to make a decent living. When these policies and programs are combined with general weak economic conditions, recessionary in many parts of the world, with high costs of production, especially long-term high interest rates and with the increasing levels of competition from foreign producers, Canadian farmers are in extremely difficult times.

Add to that, the subsidy wars between the United States and Europe, of which we are a casualty, and the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, the result is that our agriculture industry is seriously adrift.

At this point, I would like to deal with a problem which directly involves the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and, indirectly, any other province which depends on P.E.I. for their supply of seed potatoes. The potato industry has long been the lifeblood of our agricultural industry in Prince Edward Island.

It has often been said that potatoes are to P.E.I. what wheat is to Saskatchewan. The provincial minister of agriculture made this statement just last week. Given the importance of the potato to the economy of P.E.I., it is not difficult to understand the degree of potential economic devastation being faced by potato producers on the Island. In light of the discovery of the potato virus PVY-N and the ensuing embargoes imposed first by the state of Maine, then by the U.S. department of agriculture and then by the Government of Canada and the Government of Mexico, it has pretty well frozen out all seed potato exports to anywhere in North America.

When producers were informed last October that the virus had been discovered, there was considerable concern among producers whose crops were infected. This concern turned to shock in February when the USFDA imposed a total ban on the imports to that country which meant that even those producers who did not have the virus were unable to sell any of their seed potatoes.

A modification of this ban left only Prince Edward Island seriously affected. The province of New Brunswick, which had three incidences of disease, was cleared.

Right now the industry in P.E.I. is in turmoil and it is feared that many farmers will go out of business. A severe eradication program has been agreed upon. This was a necessary first step, although a bitter one to swallow. A compensation package is now being negotiated.

I sincerely hope, as do the producers and those in related industries in P.E.I., that this compensation package will be a just and equitable one, that it will be one which will keep our growers in business and allow them to rebuild P.E.I.'s reputation of being the producers of the highest quality seed potatoes in the world. After all, Island growers are the victims of the virus and not the perpetrators.

• (1850)

In view of the eradication plan already agreed upon, it is estimated that losses, whether through the destruction of crops or through drastically reduced prices for both seed and table potatoes, will be in the $25 million to $30 million range. This amount would be the minimum required just to keep the industry afloat.

We must consider the situation in the context of declining farm incomes. Agriculture Canada's estimate is that total farm income has declined by 30 per cent from 1990 to 1991. When we factor in the unexpected potato losses, we can see why the economic plight of potato farmers is so terrible, and we can see why the industry is in such turmoil.

At this point, when a compensation package is being negotiated, there is little point in trying to assign blame. We have to understand the position of those who are directly involved and who find their livelihoods in jeopardy. The question that is being asked by potato producers on Prince Edward Island is: where did the virus originate? No one seems to be able to tell the potato producers where the virus came from and how it arrived on Prince Edward Island.

One of the reasons why the seed potato industry has been such a success on Prince Edward Island is the very fact that we are an Island and it is easier to control disease when separated from the major land mass of the country. On top of that, the stringent inspection and growing standards that we have for seed potatoes, which were forced upon us especially by the European Economic Council, have resulted in the high quality of seed potatoes and the fact that we can export seed potatoes all over the world, to all provinces in Canada and to 22 states in the United States.

Where the virus originated is still a major mystery. Another question people are asking is: When did the officials become aware of its presence and, why did it take so long to react? There is a rumour this disease was discovered last June. Of course, the first question producers are asking is if it was discovered last June, why were the crops not immediately ploughed down in order to control the disease? Why then, as one farm group has asked, was the panic button pushed?

I think Agriculture Canada is well aware that PVY-N virus has been around for many years. Apparently it is all through the United States. It is widely spread in Europe, and there are instances of it being in the province of Ontario as long as 15 years ago. Why all of a sudden has the PVY-N virus become such a major issue? The thinking follows that the State of Maine, which has been harassing our potato exporters for many years on the border crossings and so on, has discovered an opportunity whereby it can take advantage of the P.E.I. markets if the P.E.I. products are eliminated.

It has used this as a political tactic. I think Senator George Mitchell is not shy about saying that he will fight for his people. The question we are asking is who is fighting for our people, especially when our department went to the United States and argued that its ban was unfair. Then in a matter of days it came back to Canada and, without consultation with the provincial government and the producers of Prince Edward Island, instituted the same ban.

The other question producers are asking is why were the producers informed so late in the game? If the producers had been informed earlier on, drastic measures could have been implemented much earlier.

In time, these concerns must be addressed. Hopefully, when that time comes, all our growers will still be in business and none will have to, as one grower put it, drop her keys on the banker's desk. This is one of the many grave problems facing farmers in every region of the country. Our farmers have done everything humanly possible to make our operations effective and viable. We are not competing on a level playing field. Other countries are taking steps to assure their food security. We have to do the same.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the member from Prince Edward Island that I enjoyed listening to his comments about Prince Edward Island potatoes. I certainly have a great love for your province. Prince Edward Island is a part of Canada that I, from Saskatchewan, enjoy visiting probably more than any other area of the country other than my own. I envy you the Island, to a certain extent.

P.E.I. also has a lot in common with Saskatchewan in that the rural nature of your province and the rural nature of my province are very similar.

The government is well aware of the problems that are being foisted upon rural Canada. Prince Edward Island felt the brunt of post office closures before any other part of this country, and now post office closures are affecting communities in my constituency and across Canada.

RCMP budgets are being affected. Emergency vehicle communications are being affected because of increased licence costs. One thing that I have just become aware of with the increased tax on reading materials, the tax on books, is difficulties at some of our regional libraries. I don't know if there are regional libraries in Prince Edward Island but there certainly are in Saskatchewan, and those regional libraries are now having a difficult time buying the books that are necessary to help inform members of our rural communities.

I feel very strongly that this government has launched an attack on rural Canada, with Prince Edward Island feeling it first and those of us in western Canada feeling it next.

My question is for the hon. member who spoke mostly about P.E.I. potatoes. I should mention before I put the question directly that I think Prince Edward Island potatoes are the second best in the whole world. The first, of course, come out of my garden.

Anyway, my question to the member from Prince Edward Island, Mr. Speaker, is; would he agree with me that there is an attack on rural Canada and it is starting with cutbacks in services and decreasing prices paid and attention paid to our primary producers who make up the backbone of rural Canada?

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his complimentary remarks about my province of Prince Edward Island.

I would just like to say that the reason the potatoes in his garden are so good is because the seed came from P.E.I. in the first place.

A lot of Islanders in the past, especially in the 1930s, left P.E.I. and the other provinces in the maritimes, went out to Saskatchewan on harvest excursions. They stayed, made their living there, contributed very much to the economy and to the farming sector of Saskatchewan. One of those people included—and I hope he is watching today from the city of Calgary—is my uncle Ernest McGuire who left in the late 1920s, early 1930s. He is 88 years old, still hale and hearty and living in the city of Calgary.

To respond to the hon. member's concern about rural Canada, there can be little doubt that rural Canada is under siege. One of the main illustrations of that fact is what is happening right across Canada as a result of the free trade agreement with the United States. We find food processing facilities, especially in southern Ontario, are closing, and there is very little hope that these food processing plants will ever reopen. For example, Campbell's Food in Manitoba is closing and it will never reopen as a food processing facility again.

He also mentioned the closure of rural post offices. This hit Prince Edward Island extremely hard, especially recently with three additional post offices closing. This is cutting off in the rural areas one of the few federal presences existing in rural Canada and in rural P.E.I. It is just one example of how this government is contributing to the depopulation and the lack of hope in the rural areas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 7 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, on December 17, 1990, I asked in this House if Canada has taken advantage of and is using the instruments available to it under the free trade agreement to call for consultations with the United States regarding the losses incurred by the Canadian Wheat Board and Canadian farmers for the 1990–91 crop year.

I am talking here about article 1804 in the free trade agreement that allows for the government to call for consultations on any other matter that it considers to affect the operation of the agreement. In this context, under article 701.4 of the free trade agreement, the United States is to take into account the effects of its export subsidies on other nations, and how it affects Canada, and to ensure that they do not prejudice our exports.

Therefore, I call on the government at this point to use the instruments provided for it in chapter 18 of the agreement to seek compensation for losses incurred by the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian farmers as provided for under articles 1804.3 and 1806.3 of that agreement.

Under these articles, article 705 in particular, there is a provision to open the borders to movement of grain between our two countries. It appears that Canada may be heading in this direction and that border opening may occur this coming crop year.

I ask the government today, because it apparently has not called for consultations, to consider instead revoking provision 705 of the free trade agreement because the United States is using its export enhancement program to buy its way into markets normally filled by Canada.

With the U.S. grain reserves at the lowest point since the early 1900s, there is no acceptable reason to have such low world prices and such high export subsidies. These prices are bankrupting our Canadian farmers and in no way do they reflect supply and demand. Rather, they are prices resulting from export subsidies, acreage set aside programs, deficiency payments, and corporate concentration in the marketplace.

I ask the government now to demand consultation with the United States as laid out in the agreement or withdraw from article 705 in retaliation.

When I see what is happening in the food processing industry with 22 food processing plants closing in the last 26 months in the province of Ontario, I say we have got to stop the haemorrhaging now. Thirty-two hundred jobs have been lost in Ontario alone. I know the government is going to brag about new plants and new investment in Canada in the food processing industry, but I have not yet been able to find out where they are. Perhaps I noticed a new chip wagon a year ago on the corner of Metcalfe and Laurier Streets. Is that a food processing plant? It is the only one I could see in the area.

We have asked the minister's office if it can provide information; we have asked the Department of Agriculture, but it has not given us an answer. Yet there have been 3,200 jobs lost in the food processing industry alone in the province of Ontario in the last 26 months.

Food production and processing is the foundation of this nation. If this government continues to allow those foundations to be undermined, the economy and the agriculture sector of this nation will surely collapse.

I spoke earlier this day about what is happening in the beef industry in this nation, the fact that the importation of no-rolled beef has tripled since 1989 through to the last year, an increase of 20,636,000 kilograms of beef into this country that is not graded. Our consumers do not know what they are buying. Consequently, it is a haemorrhage that has got to be stopped.

I suggest very strongly that because of the fact the minister apparently did not know what I was talking about on December 17 when I asked the question, asked him if the government would call for consultation with the United States into the export enhancement programs and the fall-out effect this has on our Canadian grain markets, I ask him to respond. If it has not made any decision or made any progress with the consultation process, I ask that it revoke Article 705.

The questions are: Has the government started consultations? If not, why not? If the consultations have not been successful, will the government revoke Article 705?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked for assurances that the Canadian farmer will continue to have the support of the Canadian government. I am pleased to assure the hon. member that Canada will live up to its commitment to support farmers who are caught in the international price squeeze.

Since 1981 federal and provincial assistance to farmers has averaged $2.4 billion a year. This support has been provided through such programs as the two special Canadian grains programs in 1986-87 and in 1987-88 and by the Canadian crop drought assistance program in 1988.

As well, in March 1990, the federal government announced a $500 million special income assistance program that was cost-shared with the provinces. Then on October 13, the government announced a new cash flow enhancement program which is expected to provide a benefit of $95 million in interest rate relief to farmers for the 1990-91 crop year. As of January 2, 1991, more than $1.5 billion has been advanced interest free under this program. On January 11, 1991, the government announced the details of a new generation of farm safety net programs which will go a long way toward easing the hurt that producers are facing because of this international trade war.

Bill C-98, the farm income protection act, will enable the federal government to implement the gross revenue insurance plan, commonly known as GRIP, and the net income stabilization account, NISA, which is now before the House. GRIP and NISA will provide an estimated $3 billion in benefits to grain and oilseed producers for the 1991-91 crop year.

The federal budget tabled on February 26 earmarked $1.3 billion to agriculture and this money will be allocated in part to pay for the government's share of safety net premium rates. Some of it may also be used to pay for a possible deficit in the Canadian Wheat Board's wheat pool account, a deficit caused by the excessive use of trade distorting subsidies by both the United States and the European Community.

While Canada can cushion some of its producers from the impact of the trade dispute, we cannot support our farmers to the same extent that the U.S. and European Community can with their much larger treasuries. Their actions are unfair and irrational and Canada must continue its aggressive pursuit of a fair set of international trade rules through the GATT multilateral trade negotiations.

Canada has also complained recently to the U.S. over the use of the export enhancement program. Through this program the Americans continue to subsidize grain sales to the U.S.S.R., China, Algeria and other major Canadian markets without the economic rationale of competing Canadian and EC exports.

The government opposes these subsidized sales and continues to work both bilaterally and through the multilateral trade negotiations toward their elimination. While we work toward that goal, we stand by Canadian farmers.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the debate today and to follow up on a question that I put to the minister, the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, on November 6 last year. It was in regard to questions I was pursuing with the minister about the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding. I questioned the minister on this most important issue and debate to draw attention to how this government, in co-operation with the current Government of British Columbia, sold out our forest policy and the sovereignty and ability of Canadian governments to set policy in the forest area, in particular, when it relates to very important questions of stumpage.

• (1910)

What I was relating in my question to the minister at that time were questions I had placed on the Order Paper to attempt to get some indication of just how far reaching the U.S. commerce department and U.S. administration officials have come in trying to raise and control Canadian forest policy.

It became very clear from the questions raised on the Order Paper, the list of documents and information provided by the government over the course of a year or two, that the commerce department actually ended up providing some 60 directives, comprising over 250 pages of in some cases censored and blanked out orders to Canadian companies and officials. It is a pretty clear indication that we sold out our sovereignty on this issue.

Of course they had a hand in that from the premier of British Columbia who at the time said that the signing of this tariff was a great day for British Columbia. He was helped by the minister of trade, of course the now Senator Carney, who has left us in this ugly Catch 22 situation whereby thousands of forestry jobs in British Columbia and northern Ontario are being lost due in part to the tariff brought on by this government in co-operation with the Government of British Columbia and signed with the United States government.

The important point I was pursuing was the question of sovereignty, the ability to set our own policy ourselves. I will cite three circumstances that I think the minister should consider in his current round of discussions, in his hopes to get support from the provinces to carry the fight to Washington.

Section 6 of the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding allows the United States to question any policies that are pursued "directly or indirectly, which has the effect of offsetting or reducing the export charges or replacement measures". In my province a new stumpage regime was brought in. The commerce department took it so far as to question under section 6 when Canadian National Railways offered to reduce freight rates on lumber products as a violation of the memorandum of understanding.

In this particular case, I think I have applauded the government because it told the Americans to take a hike, that it did not apply.

Given the powers that obviously the Americans have interpreted in this section—and I hope we have some information on that when the parliamentary secretary responds—what other so-called indirect measures have been taken which may in fact have led to many decisions by this government, largely due to U.S. influence and how we signed our forest policy decision-making ability away.

I refer to a second measure which came late in 1986 when the Government of Canada exchanged notes with the U.S. government. Really the crux of the issue is the question of what is the determination of the replacement value with stumpage from the various provinces. The Canadian government has agreed with the U.S. government to impose an additional tariff again, if in fact the replacement measures, the stumpage systems which have been brought in, are actually reduced. This government has gone hand in glove with the U.S. commerce department in trying to implement this policy.

The final point is the side letter that accompanied the MOU amendments in late 1986. It is a letter signed by the then Secretary of Commerce and the U.S. trade representative and reads: "It is the understanding of the U.S. government that the U.S. government would have to approve any changes in the export charge or calculation of the value of any replacement measures. Any changes made without U.S. government approval would be considered a violation of the understanding".

This government, in co-operation with governments like the government of Mr. Vander Zalm, have sold out this country's ability to set its forest policy in particular on important questions like stumpage. We must at every opportunity now get out of the softwood lumber tariff so that we can set our own forest policy here in Canada.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, on November 6, the hon. member requested the tabling of certain documents relating to the Canada—U.S. softwood lumber memorandum of Understanding. These same documents have been provided in response to a request under the Access to Information Act, but I will answer in some detail again.

Like any bilateral agreement, the softwood lumber memorandum of understanding includes a requirement for ongoing consultation. Under the terms of the memorandum of Understanding, Canada has agreed to provide certain information to the U.S. This includes the volume and the value of softwood lumber exports and the value of export charges paid, forestry regulations and statistics on forestry production in Canada.

Such an exchange of information in no way interferes with provincial rights to manage their forest resources. The government consulted closely with British Columbia and with other provincial governments before agreeing to the terms of the memorandum of understanding in the first place.

Most of the correspondence provided to the hon. member relates to routine matters. It is largely intergovernmental in nature, involving such routine things as settling dates and agendas for bilateral consultations or requesting information concerning the implementation of the memorandum of understanding. This can hardly be characterized as dictating how Canada manages its forest resources.

The memorandum of understanding does not give the U.S. the right to approve or disapprove changes in provincial forest management policies. In fact, provinces are free to implement changes to forest management policies as a basis for reducing or eliminating the export charge, subject to the agreement of the U.S. on the values of such replacement measures in relation to the export charge.

When a policy change is made in provinces which have replaced the export charge, Canada and the U.S. must agree on the effect that these changes may have on the value of the original replacement measures.

On the larger question of addressing the memorandum of understanding itself, the hon. member will know that the Minister for International Trade is consulting closely with the provinces and the industry on this issue. The Prime Minister also referred in this House on March 14 to his productive discussion of the issue with President Bush on the previous day.

The Minister for International Trade has made clear the government's position. The memorandum of understanding never was envisioned as a permanent arrangement. It was understood during negotiations of the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement that the MOU would not exist forever and that the government would want to revisit this issue.

Circumstances have changed significantly since the memorandum of understanding was negotiated in 1986. Stumpage rates have increased in British Columbia and Quebec. These provinces together account for 90 per cent of Canada's exports of softwood lumber to the U.S.

The value of the Canadian dollar has appreciated significantly, vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar since 1986. Canada's market share in the U.S. has dropped by six points from 33 per cent to 27 per cent. Based on a reasonable and objective review, the memorandum of understanding has served its purpose. There are no subsidies now to the Canadian lumber industry. The memorandum of understanding is being re-examined in consultation with the provinces and with industry, and a decision to take up the issue with the U.S. will depend solely on the outcome of these consultations.

The minister has indicated in this House that his first priority is to conclude these consultations, particularly with the four major producing provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with regard to the decision which was taken by the Government of Canada on December 5 whereby the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation announced a $110 million cut to CBC. This matter has been raised on the floor of the House of Commons by my colleagues and I, too, raised it with the Minister of Communications on or about December 19.

In putting my question to the minister, I noted that the CBC has a particular role to play in fostering national unity. For those members who are present I wish to quote from a former Conservative Prime Minister who was very involved in the legislation leading to the institution of the CBC.

This is what the former Prime Minister R.B. Bennett said some years ago: "This country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference or influence. Without such control, broadcasting can never become a great agency for the communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals and without such controls it can never be the agency by which national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened."

The CBC, from time time, has treated politicians, if you will, with disdain and perhaps rightly so, but one thing that it has been able to do over the years is it has given those regions of the country who wish to be part and parcel of a united country, an opportunity to show the best of what they have. In doing so, it has added immensely to national unity in this country. Whether it is in Sept-Iles, Sydney, Nova Scotia, Corner Brook, Newfoundland or Calgary or parts of Ontario, the CBC has been bringing information to Canadians across this country.

Our history tells us a number of things, one of which is that yes we are a large country in terms of its geographical mass, but population wise we are very small. We are also young in years in comparison to other countries throughout the world. Hence, the need for a very active, a very comprehensive mandate by the CBC.

The cutbacks at Sydney have affected us in an extremely negative way. Not only will individuals be losing their jobs—and I want to speak specifically to that in a moment—but it also precludes us as a people on the Island of Cape Breton from communicating in a profoundly effective way with other citizens of this great country. But little ought not to be made, in fact a great deal ought to be made, of those individuals who will be displaced by the Government of Canada's decision to cut CBC by $110 million. These are employees, most of which are with NABET, the National Association of Broadcasters, Employees and Technicians, who are going to be losing their jobs. Those of us in Atlantic Canada who have seen the erosion of VIA Rail, the massive cutbacks with regards to Air Canada, the gutting of the Atlantic fisheries and the over-all massive erosion of medicare and now another national institution is waning in the wind.

It is not overly appealing for the major centres of this country to learn that such far off places as Sydney, Nova Scotia next to my constituency and/or Corner Brook or Sept-Iles or Rimouski are losing their stations.

It must be said, Mr. Speaker, that what we are doing at a time when national unity has never been as important as it is today, we are helping to foster a belief in a view from coast to coast that the government is not really concerned about national unity. Because if it was, it would not be cutting away at those very same national institutions which foster unity in this country.

I would hope that the parliamentary secretary could rise in her place this afternoon and explain to my constituents why those individuals who were employed with CBC Sydney have lost their jobs; why the people in that community of a population of over 130,000 are without the facilities of the CBC. Yes, they have some reporting mechanisms to have a few news stories out, but it is entirely different from the way it was.

I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if the parliamentary secretary could be candid enough to tell us the true reasons why the government has fingered this particular institutions in my riding for closure.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and I am glad to dispel some of the confusion he obviously has over the CBC.

All hon. members recognize the importance of our national broadcaster, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in providing services from one coast to the other. I know that many Canadians were concerns by the December announcement of the CBC. The restructuring measures that they announced were approved by the CBC board of directors in an effort to bring the services they provide in line with what is available in terms of resources.

This decision was taken in order to avoid operating in a deficit in the coming year. The board's decision was acknowledged generally as being fiscally responsible. And I believe it is important at the outset to stress to the hon. member that no transmitter, whether it be radio or television, is going off the air. All of the more than 1,600 transmitters owned and operated by the corporation will continue to serve Canadians, including those from Sydney.

Radio continues to be deeply rooted in all the regions of Canada and it continues to provide service at the local, regional and national levels. This is as true in Sydney as anywhere else, and I am assured that CBI-Radio in Sydney continues to provide all the local programs which existed before this restructuring announcement.

Television complements radio. It has withdrawn from programming intended for purely local audiences to concentrate on regional, national and international programming; in fact, to deal with that very issue of unity that the hon. member has mentioned.

This means that in Sydney as in other Canadian centres, the local productions have been replaced by strengthened regional programming. CBC continues to operate a local news bureau in Sydney and to assure local news stories are part of the strengthened regional news casts.

It is instructive to note, Mr. Speaker, that CBC's total planned resources for 1991-92 amount to $1.4 billion. These resources consist of parliamentary appropriations and revenues. Since 1984 the CBC has been allowed to retain in full the revenues it generates from advertising, and these revenues are projected to amount to $354 million for the next fiscal year.

Despite budgetary restraint, the Government of Canada has injected more than $645 million in new funds into the CBC's budget since 1984. This is over and above increases for salaries and other unavoidable operating costs. As a result, the corporation's total resources have increased by 33 per cent in the period from 1984–85 to 1991–92.

All federal departments, agencies and Crown corporations must do their part to deal with the current financial burdens and pressures on the government and on the Canadian taxpayer.

The CBC has experienced some reductions in its parliamentary appropriations. This is necessary. These reductions are extremely modest when compared to the large amount of public funds that the CBC receives each year. For example, the reduction to CBC's appropriation of $23 million announced since 1989 represents only 1.8 per cent of CBC's projected total resources.

As the hon. member is undoubtedly aware, the Canadian Radio–television and Telecommunications Commission this morning began a week–long hearing to examine CBC's restructuring activities. The CRTC will hear comments and concerns from more than 70 interveners, as well as the CBC, before it retires to consider its decision.

The Minister of Communications is following these proceedings carefully, like all interested Canadians, and we await the decision of the commission with a great deal of interest.

In closing, I would like to assure all—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize, but the rules are the same for all members and your time has expired.

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

BILL C-73

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-73, an act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, with one amendment.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure this morning to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, who point out a whole set of reasons why they feel the government ought to be paying more attention to passenger rail service and point out how they believe VIA Rail service could be improved to compete with some of the European railways. They are simply asking the government to reconsider its decision to cut back on VIA Rail service in Canada.

• (1110)

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present another petition on behalf of a large number of British Columbians, particularly from the communities of Kamloops, Salmon Arm and Sorento, who point out a number of concerns regarding the situation in the gulf as it has occurred and as it is unfolding. They are asking for Canada's participation in a most positive way in the post-conflict period.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have several sets of petitions today. The first set of petitions comes from constituents in my riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, concerning the goods and services tax which my constituents still feel is an onerous and unfair tax and they wish to make Parliament aware of their ongoing opposition to this tax.

The petitioners are from West Arichat, St. Peters, and various places in my constituency. They wish to register their ongoing opposition to this tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): The second petition concerns the elimination of VIA passenger rail service from Truro to Antigonish, Nova Scotia. The petitions come, first of all, from the students of St. Francis Xavier University, who are opposed to the government's decision to abandon VIA Rail passenger service. They point out that since that passenger rail service was abandoned over a year ago, the transportation needs of the students are much more difficult to meet. It is a burden on students in the area who want to leave on weekends because the alternatives to passenger rail transportation are much more expensive.

Another group of petitions concerning VIA Rail passenger service comes from the town of Antigonish. The residents of the town of Antigonish, more than one year after the elimination of this service, are still opposed vigorously to the government's decision and have shown up in large numbers to express their concerns by signing a petition to that effect.

Supply

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Finally, on a totally different issue, but one which the government still has an opportunity to correct before it is too late. This concerns the imposition of exorbitant dock-side monitoring charges to the inshore fishermen of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, many of whom happen to live in my constituency.

These charges are absolutely ridiculous, when it is considered that they come at the same time as fishermen in my area are forced to endure drastic reductions in their quotas and increases in their other costs. They are not only an imposition on the fishermen, they are also an unnecessary bureaucratic measure.

They call upon Parliament and specifically the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to rescind these measures before they are obliged to pay them. They have submitted their names, in large numbers, on a petition to that effect.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North) moved:

That this House reaffirm its commitment to Medicare.

He said: Mr. Speaker, medicare belongs to all of us, to all Canadians. It is shared by every member of this House and all of their constituents. Medicare is no less prized in Winnipeg North than it is in Kelowna, B.C., or Port aux Basques, Newfoundland. Medicare is the undeniable right of every Canadian citizen. It belongs to my sons, and their children to follow. It belongs to the children of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and to his colleagues and their children. It is perhaps the most precious thing all Canadians have to pass on to the next generation.

Medicare is not a partisan issue and ought not to be. It should be the issue of each and every one of us. I ask the members of this House: Will we now be the ones to see medicare die? For this reason, to allay the fears I and others have for the future of medicare, I have called for this opposition day motion supported by my associate critics, the members for Hamilton East and Mississauga, and by my other colleagues.

I want this government to reaffirm in the minds of Canadians that it is committed to medicare. I want to challenge this government to make its agenda known. We have proposed a motion that this House reaffirm its commitment to medicare, a very positive motion.

I want Canadians to see that the Liberal Party, of which I am the critic for health and welfare, cares deeply about the future of our health care system and that we still believe in its universality, comprehensiveness, portability, and accessibility, and that it is a system that has to be funded continuously, publicly, on a non-profit basis.

I hope today we will all openly declare our resolve to nurture medicare and not let it be trampled by short-sighted government policy or by lack of government initiative. What is at stake here is inconceivably dear. It is the one thing we have that is unique to every Canadian despite race or religion or region. Rich or poor, young or old—it is a birthright. I cannot reiterate this enough.

I hope members will all vote with conscience and listen to the things about to be said on each side of the House. Measure their value and remember very few matters concern your constituents the way health care does. It touches the lives of everyone. Those who do not protect medicare, those who do not reaffirm their commitment to our hospitals and nurses, doctors and other allied health care professionals, and to our sick, will be held accountable.

With this accountability in mind, I will proceed.

For months I have been watching the steam building on the issue of medicare. It started with the budget of last year. At that time the government put its first restraints on money delivered to the provinces for health care. Then came the introduction of Bill C-69, the complicated government expenditures legislation which slipped past this House into the Senate and was given Royal Assent early in February this year. This Bill C-69 launched a critical government-backed assault on medicare.

As the social and health care groups across the country can attest, Bill C-69 is a deadly bill for health care and other social programs. It freezes and cuts transfer payments, the moneys transferred by the federal government to the provinces to aid medicare, and post-secondary education.

It is my feeling that this fiscal change will cripple medicare. I can already see the end commencing. This bill passed into legislation was only a few weeks old when the new federal budget was released by this government in February.

• (1120)

As we well know, this budget further increased the freezes and caps on the federal money needed for provincial health care. An additional $2.3 billion was taken from transfer payments, an incredible sum. They cannot slice $2.3 billion from transfer payments without seeing health services suffer. It is impossible. I defy the government to tell me and the Canadian people that our hospitals and health care will be left unscathed. Impossible. The strain is too great.

Things are already beginning to crack under the pressure. A domino effect will be the result. Crisis after crisis, one test after another will assault a weakened Canada Health Act. It only stands to reason that without the federal money maintaining national standards will be an unattainable goal.

Right now the steam is continuing to build. Adding to the pressure was a particular meeting in the autumn of last year when western finance ministers grouped in Winnipeg, my home city, to lead very significant discussions about health care. While the theme was good, the potential results and the emerging results are ominous.

The western ministers agree the federal government should deliver transfer payments while relinquishing control over national standards of health care. We cannot allow that. The western ministers want disentangling of federal funding and autonomy for health care policy in the provinces. We have to maintain a national health care system in the country.

In December of last year came an announcement from the minister of health for Quebec that he planned to revamp his province's existing health care system. The main bone of contention, if I could mention one, in the proposed reform is a proposed $5 disincentive fee, which I prefer to call a user fee. This fee would be for non-essential visits to emergency wards.

When I posed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on this issue, he said he would consult with his provincial counterpart in Quebec. Have we heard the response yet to date? I have not heard, but perhaps later in the debate the minister would be kind enough to inform the House.

To me this development is highly reminiscent of the early 1980s when user fees and extra billing threatened universal medicare. Sometimes it only takes a spark to light a fire. From east to west health care is coming apart at the seams.

In Newfoundland, 360 acute care hospital beds and 900 health care workers have lost their jobs. Finance Minister Kitchen told the Newfoundland legislature that he had no choice but to make the cuts. His province has lost $180 million in transfer payments in the past year. Who is truly the culprit? This federal government.

In New Brunswick, members of the provincial legislature are travelling across the province trying to find new ways to trim health care costs while meeting their budget. Mr. Maher, the province's finance minister, has said he would consider farming out services. He also said New Brunswick would be one of the first provinces to reconsider seriously compliance with the terms of the Canada Health Act. That certainly is very ominous. I would like the Minister of National Health and Welfare to be prepared with his answer.

In Ontario, Minister of Health Evelyn Gigantes has been quoted as follows: "When it comes to over-all health policy, we have a lot of work to do. We know that certain populations, natives, francophones, multicultural groups, are not participating fully in the benefits this society makes available to others".

Meanwhile, the Ontario minister of finance said: "I think Mr. Wilson is making it very difficult for the provinces to maintain their commitments to medicare".

Ontario is currently spending 30 per cent of its budget on health care. Farther west, closer to my constituency in the province of Manitoba, hospitals have been told to slash their budget by $19 million. This announcement came from the provincial government last week. The province told hospitals in Brandon and in Winnipeg to shave operating costs. There is fear that beds will be closed and services cut. The hospitals may also be called upon to absorb any additional costs from the dreaded goods and services tax.

Saskatchewan, we all know, was the first Canadian province to obtain public medical insurance. That was 45 years ago. Who back then would have envisioned our hospitals of today where babies small enough to fit into the palms of our hands can survive and grow? But even Saskatchewan declared that its provincial medicare is facing cutbacks in health care services.

Alberta and British Columbia are perhaps the two provinces best able to meet national standards despite cuts in transfer payments. Yet their governments have made no secret of their interest in again charging user fees and of disentangling the federal hand from provincial health care.

In the northern communities, especially in the isolated Indian reserves or the villages of the Dene and Inuit, proper health care has often been lacking. Inuit babies are 28 times more likely to die in infancy than are babies in the south. Native Indian babies are 19 times more likely to succumb during infancy. Those death rates are Third World in their nature. The huge gleaming hospitals of the provinces, whirring with technology, are but a dream to these people. Medicare is a concept they deserve to know. That should be a government priority: creating services, not restricting them.

It would be scaremongering to say the rest of Canada could have their hospital care stripped away, but the reality remains. Daily our health care system is becoming more taxed and stricken with debt and fiscal restraint. The purchase of new equipment, even the maintenance of old equipment, becomes exceedingly difficult to fund.

Meanwhile, the largest health research funding agency, the National Health Research and Development Program, had its budget cut by $2 million this year. I believe research into new medicines, a more efficient health care delivery system and preventive treatments are absolutely necessary if we are to control health care costs, yet only one-tenth of all money spent on health is channelled toward prevention.

I believe, by not focusing more attention on prevention, we cannot hope to maintain services while coping with burgeoning health costs. Some costs of health needed to be addressed long ago. By not dealing with them, the provincial and federal governments have left themselves vulnerable to an impending health care crisis. I am speaking about wage disputes and high turnover of nurses.

On February 20, in a full-page ad in a local daily newspaper, the Ontario Nurses Association printed a letter entitled Nurses Continue to be Taken for Granted. I quote from this letter:

> Recession or no recession, the nurses have continually received short shrift in terms of financial remuneration. They have fallen further and further behind comparable workers. It almost seems that society considers them dedicated amateurs who neither need nor deserve full monetary compensation.

This full-page ad was a call for public support. Just like the nurses in Manitoba earlier this year, the nurses in Ontario are set for contract negotiations. They too are caught in the funding slash that denies them wages, of provincial governments which are unable or claim to be unable to meet their wage demands. The problems are already coming to fruition as qualified nurses become harder to find. From every angle, from without and within, our health care system is being pressured.

• (1130)

I ask the government to turn its attention to hospitals closing beds due to lack of funds and to explain to patients and staff that transfer payment cuts are not a problem and that direct taxation by the provinces will fill the void.

Meanwhile, our nurses and doctors are flocking to practise in the United States. American companies hand out glossy brochures displaying sunshine and smiles. Money is not an object, the way it is in our country. More of the American Gross National Product goes to health care than that of any other country.

As our shortage of nurses becomes critical in Canada, we will see them disappear, beckoned south by higher wages and salaries commensurate with the respect they deserve.

There are other things as well: treatment facilities for new diseases and for the elderly. Care centres for the elderly are desperately needed as their numbers swell with the addition of the baby boom generation. These are problems we Canadians face today: beds closing, inadequate care, stressed health care professionals.

I challenge you, Mr. Speaker, to ask any American which country, our or theirs, has a better health care system. American will say Canada, because in Canada we are guided by five basic principles of the Canada Health Act: accessibility, portability, comprehensiveness, universality, and non-profit public administration. These principles ensure that every Canadian, rich or poor, has the right to proper treatment.

The United States has many beautiful facilities with technology that is the envy of the world, but those centres are for the people who can pay to be well. It is a two-tiered system of health care, where what one earns and where one resides determines the treatment one receives. Without proper health insurance, one accident, one disease, can destroy the life savings of a family, ruining their lives.

There are many issues in our health care system that need to be addressed. There are issues that have been left to fester and problems that are new today, but there is no question in my mind these problems must be tackled. But are transfer payment cuts the way to do it, or will that make the suffering worse? I submit that the suffering will be worse.

Some people believe the government will introduce new legislation to protect medicare, as was said in the budget, that the government will give away tax points to the provinces in exchange for the reduction in transfer payments. But I ask: What is the policy basis? Have we told Canadians?

The problem remains: What will happen to the have-not provinces? They do not have a tax base that can deliver more tax to them for medicare funding. Those provinces will have no choice, as was recently seen in Newfoundland, but to cut services.

There are two points which must be considered. First, medicare is slipping away right now. Beds are being closed. Without proper funding a breakdown is occurring. Only a renewed financial commitment to medicare will halt this collapse. Second, with the change in funding policy the government will lose the penalty measures for provinces not abiding by the Canada Health Act. It is imperative the government move to find another penalizing system.

Medicare is a Canadian institution that must be protected. It was promised to Canadians in 1919 by the Liberal Party. It was given birth by the Liberal Party and we would like to continue to nurture this great social program.

As I conclude, may I say I hope we can again find the support for medicare we had in 1984, only six short years ago. I would like to hold the minister of health to a statement made in the House on December 17, and I quote:

> One thing the (government) does is respect the Constitution of Canada. We respect the fact the delivery of health care services is given to the provinces within the confines of the Canada Health Act.

I pray this respect for the Canada Health Act is still part of the Conservatives' tenets. I hope the Conservatives and every member of the House will join me and my party in support of medicare.

I ask this House to reaffirm our commitment to this basic right of citizenship and move to address the problems confronting our health care system.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to turn the tables and to be able to be the one posing the question to my hon. friend for a minute or two.

I have two questions for my hon. friend. I listened with a great deal of interest to his call for members on all sides of the House to support the motion. One assumes that was a sincere call. I want to ask the hon. member these two questions.

Is the hon. member aware of the fact that the motion he has placed today asking for support for medicare is put in the guise of an Opposition Day votable motion which, if passed, would be a motion of non-confidence in the government?

Second, is the hon. member aware of a single instance or can he cite a single instance where such motions have been treated in any other way other than as a motion of non-confidence?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I am not a person esteemed in procedural rules. However, we should go beyond the procedures and go to the substance of the motion.

To the specific question of whether it will be a non-confidence motion, I would leave it to the experts on rules. I would like this government to make its commitment during debate that in fact it is committed to medicare, that it will restore funding for medicare, that it will prevent the "Americanization of Medicare" as published by Frances Russell in Canadian Forum, and that it will prevent Ontario from potentially looking at user fees when Ontario says it will copy Quebec's new health plan. We do not know.

I would like the government to be concerned. In this week's issue of Medical Post the headline is: "Medicare Murdered". In this weekend's issue of the Free Press one focus article reads: "Budget may spell the death of medicare".

Without going to the refinements of procedure, I would really like to tell the minister that I offer this as a sincere motion. That is why I saw to it that we introduced the motion in a positive way.

I believe it is a non-partisan issue. I believe it is an issue for all Canadians. This House must support this motion if each member and each political party truly believes that we are committed to the continuing life of medicare.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, let us get greater precision from the hon. member as to what he is expecting today. The hon. member cannot cite a single instance when a votable Opposition Day motion has been treated as anything other than a vote of non-confidence in the government, which would have the effect if the motion were to pass of requiring the government to resign.

Does the hon. member seriously expect that any government could support a motion like that, knowing it is treated as a vote of non-confidence? Again, can he cite a single instance where his party, when in power, treated Opposition Day motions which stem from the old motions of non-confidence in any other way? How can he be expected to be taken seriously when he calls on members on this side of the House to support a motion of non-confidence in the government?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I think this side of the House and all Canadians are truly disappointed with this government because it is treating medicare with disdain. It is trying to kill medicare. By the year 2014, if we continue with the current trend of funding, medicare will be dead. It will be earlier in Quebec. It is estimated to be in the year 1995-96.

To the specific question of the minister—and I have the highest respect for the minister whom I have always held in high esteem—this motion has been carefully thought through and considered. We certainly would like the government to come to its knees and defend itself.

• (1140)

When we have listened to all the debating points, we will see. I challenge the government. Perhaps it is time we declare openly we have no confidence in this government because it is trying to kill medicare.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am quite fascinated by this whole motion put forward by the Liberals.

I must say that for once I agree with the minister. There is no question that this motion is being put forward facetiously by the Liberals in the hope that the government will vote against it.

I would like to ask the member how he can reconcile his position with the fact that the erosion of medicare was initiated by the Liberals. Read the budget of 1975 of the former leader of the Liberals, John Turner. He is the one who capped the transfer payments and brought in the whole business of block funding to get away from the partnership that was built with the provincial governments so that they would not be required to pay 50 per cent of the costs in the early 1980s.

The Liberals unilaterally moved away from the revenue guarantee which costs the provinces $1.2 billion every year in lost revenue for medicare. The Liberals did that. How can the member stand up and say the government is eroding medicare when the foundation for that erosion and abandonment of medicare was laid by the Liberals in those three instances?

Why did the Liberals bring in the measures which eroded the medicare system and actually brought in the foundation for the federal government to erode it?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I am really excited that there is an active debate emerging on the issue. In fact, it is part of the rationale of why we decided to put this motion before the House.

We would like the attention of all Canadians focused on this, because if we review the history and the commitment of this government to social programs, we see that it has done away with many the social programs step by step.

Now, Mr. Speaker, through you to my colleague from the New Democratic Party who would like to pontificate and would care to forget the lessons of history, I am glad that today he did not say that the NDP started medicare. Once before, he did say that. Finally, he has learned the lesson that it was the Liberal Party in the 1919 Liberal convention that made a commitment to Canada to introduce medicare.

After we conceived the idea, unlike the NDP, we put action into it. We gave birth to it. After having given birth to medicare, we would like to continue to nurture it like a good parent to any child.

I think the hon. member forgot that the newest Canada Health Act was introduced in 1984. I do not know where his history book is. I ask the NDP to put on record whether he will join the government and defeat this motion. I would like him to say "yes" or "no" when his opportunity comes during debate.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today is about medicare and whether Parliament continues to support it.

That is the motion, but the issue is something very different indeed. It is about truth and whether members on all sides of this House will deal openly and honestly with the challenges facing Canada's health care system.

In the exchange which just took place with regard to the nature of the motion before the House, we learned the facts. The motion itself is very symptomatic of the problem. What it does is demonstrate the tactics which are being employed.

On the face of it, it is a very straightforward motion calling upon members of Parliament to announce their support for medicare. The vehicle being used, as is conceded by the Liberal Party opposite, is a non-confidence motion. Were it to pass, it would require the government to resign. We can hardly accept this as an honest attempt, a straightforward attempt, on the part of the Liberal Party to encourage non-partisan all-party support for the principles underlying medicare.

The opposition parties say that they support medicare, and I accept their word for that. On this side of the House we also continue to support this country's system of national health insurance, although the Liberals and the NDP would sow false fears among Canadians and have them believe that the government has a secret plan to do away with medicare.

What evidence do they tender for such a claim? From time to time, it is simply unsubstantiated claims that some element of the free trade agreement which they have as yet been unable to find would require it. The fact that the free trade agreement does nothing of the sort has not dissuaded them. It is politically convenient to sow the seeds of fear.

More recently, they have added a new claim; that federal financing for medicare is drying up. It is a claim that is equally false and which becomes no less false with repeated telling. The most recent example of this tactic was reported in Saturday's issue of the Saskatoon Star-

Phoenix, which reported the deputy leader of the Liberal Party telling Liberals:

> —what we are really talking about here is a scheme to totally end federal payments for Medicare across the country.

Federal payments to the provinces in support of medicare take two forms—cash and tax points—which together will total more than $14 billion this year. Per capita payments will remain the same as last year, although total payments will grow by about 1.2 per cent. The latest scare tactic is based on the fact that since 1977 when the Liberals introduced the new formula for funding of medicare, the way in which Ottawa transfers money to the provinces has been shifting away from direct cash payments and toward tax transfers.

The net effect for both the federal government and the provinces is identical, no matter how the payment is made. When cash payments are made, the federal government simply uses money raised from federal taxpayers and transfers it to the provinces. When tax points are used, the federal government reduces income taxes in the province by a specified amount, and the provinces increase their taxes by an identical sum. Both methods represent a draw on the federal treasury and both put money directly into provincial hands to pay for health care.

[Translation]

This year, as I said before, transfers to the provinces will total over $14 billion, about $10 billion more than when we came to power in 1984. Of that amount, more than $8 billion will be in the form of tax points.

For Quebec, the figures are as follows: one billion dollars in cash payments and $2.5 billion in tax points, a total of more than $3.5 billion.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we cannot make the deputy leader of the Liberal Party give Liberals the straight facts. It is a matter for Liberals themselves to deal with. What we can do, however, is to make sure that Canadians as a whole are not misled.

[Translation]

Before the Budget was brought down, concerns were raised about the federal government's future ability to enforce national standards for health care as set forth in the Canada Health Act.

It was feared that if the federal government were unable to withhold payment of cash transfers to the provinces, there would be no incentive for the latter to observe the five basic principles; portability, accessibility, universality, public administration and comprehensiveness.

That is why the Minister of Finance announced that the federal government would amend the Fiscal Arrangements Act to allow transfers to provinces to be withheld for purposes of enforcement, if necessary.

This is a clear indication of the government's intention to maintain its authority to enforce compliance with the Canada Health Act.

• (1150)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are passionate supporters of the system. From its inception, it has enjoyed support from all three of our major political parties and today enjoys the support of 90 per cent of Canadians.

Canadians are proud that each of us has equal access to medical care. They like it because they are free to choose which doctor to see and are entitled to a full range of services no matter what their level of income.

Canadians support medicare because they can travel anywhere in the country, safe in the knowledge that they will have access to the care they need, regardless of where they need it.

These principles have become part of how we see ourselves and how we distinguish ourselves from others. Medicare is more than just an issue in Canada. It has become a fundamental social value. It is, in fact, a social value that many other countries would like to adopt. A Harris and Associates poll conducted in the United States reported that some 61 per cent of Americans favour adopting the Canadian health care system.

A November 1990 study by the Department of Human Resources in Oregon, concluded: "The Canadian system is attractive to many American observers, because it combines capitalism with social responsibility".

Anyone who finds this hard to understand need only put himself in the position of one of the 37 million Americans who has no medical insurance of any type.

Has medicare improved the health of our population? Absolutely. At the time we introduced the first element of our health system, our infant mortality rate was running 40 per cent higher than Australia's, 30 per cent higher than the U.K.'s and 5 per cent higher than that of the United States.

By the end of the first year that the system was in place, our infant mortality rate was identical to Australia's and the U.K.'s and 10 per cent lower than that of the United States. Today our infant mortality rates are 20 per cent lower than the American rates and among the lowest in the world at 7.8 per 1,000 live births.

When medicare was introduced, we found that pregnant women started showing up a couple of months earlier for prenatal care than they had previously. The result is that our maternal mortality rates have dropped by a third.

It is not surprising that Canadians support their health care system, nor is it a surprise that all of Canada's political parties say that they support it too.

When I began my remarks I said that while the motion today was about medicare, the issue was the truth. By that I mean not just the false claims by members opposite that the government wished to dismantle medicare, but also whether Canada's political parties are prepared to take the measures necessary to ensure that medicare and our other social programs will still exist in the future.

In his budget, the Minister of Finance announced a tough plan to control expenditures at all levels, including money transfers to the provinces. Per capita payments under the Established Programs Financing will be frozen. Canada Assistance Plan payments will increase at a maximum of 5 per cent a year for the three richest provinces, although it remains uncontrolled for the other seven provinces. In order to protect those poorer provinces, equalization remains unchanged.

In total, transfer payments to the provinces will rise by 3.7 per cent a year for the next three years. We are not asking the provinces to follow any restrictions that we are not prepared to apply even more strictly and stringently to federal programs. Federal program spending will increase by only 3.4 per cent over the next three years.

From members opposite and from my hon. friend from Winnipeg, we have heard a great deal of apocalyptic talk: medicare is dead, they say. The sick and the poor will be thrown into the streets; the Canada Assistance Plan cannot continue.

The opposition would have Canadians believe that provincial governments cannot possibly bear the burden being imposed on them. We heard it again today from my hon. friend from Winnipeg. The facts, however, paint a very different picture. The restrictions on transfers this year will amount to one-half of one per cent of total provincial revenues. What the provinces are asked to do is to examine the other 99.5 per cent of their spending and to set priorities, just as we have done at the federal level.

If you look at all of the nations in the world which have publicly financed health care systems, you will find that Canada spends the highest percentage of GNP on its system. Each year we spend nearly $60 billion on health. The sector employs 7 per cent of our workforce, including 57,000 physicians and a quarter of a million nurses.

You can imagine my surprise when I heard members of the opposition state on budget night that medicare in Canada is dead. Indeed, my hon. friend from Winnipeg quoted an article from the Winnipeg Free Press of this last weekend suggesting that the budget could have killed medicare.

I would cite to him instead another article, an editorial which appeared in his hometown newspaper, the Winnipeg Free Press, on February 28, 1991, under the headline: "Medicare Still Lives", the first sentence of which reads: "The death of medicare instantly proclaimed by the Liberal Party's deputy leader, Sheila Copps, and others in the wake of finance minister Michael Wilson's budget is not after all imminent".

We can all choose to cite selectively what articles or editorials we would like to have quoted on the floor of the House of Commons. I would hope that when my hon. friend is reading his hometown newspaper, he would read what they say in their editorials as well as what they run on their op-ed pages.

It is simply not true when members opposite suggest that medicare is dead, but to survive it needs to be built on a sound economic foundation. Simply running up ever-higher national debts will not protect medicare. Instead it will threaten its ability to survive.

All members of this House should know some basic truths. The first 36 cents of every tax dollar that the federal government raises goes simply to pay the interest on the national debt. In Ontario only 10 cents goes toward servicing the debt. Alberta pays 8.5 cents and British Columbia pays less than 4 cents. It simply makes no sense to have the federal government, which is already running a $30 billion deficit, borrow even more money to give to provinces which have much smaller debts.

Fortunately not every one has taken an irresponsible approach to this debate. Monique Bégin, the former Liberal health minister, speaking at a conference just after the budget was tabled, said that federal restraints would not end our health system. Frank McKenna, the premier of New Brunswick, showed that he understood the ramifications of the debt when he said: "The leaders of the 1960s and 1970s have placed a first mortgage on the future of Canada. The leaders of the 1980s and 1990s are placing a second mortgage on the same assets. There is no equity left. We must once and for all put an end to the suffocating debt load we are placing on the backs of our children."

The people I have quoted are not, to say the least, known for their support of the Conservative Party. What differentiates Madam Bégin and Premier McKenna from their fellow Liberals in this House is that they recognize that the cause of preserving medicare in Canada is not well served by inflammatory statements, wild hyperbole, and political gamesmanship.

The cause of protecting medicare will be best served if we can act today to control the deficit while maintaining the principles and the high health standards which have made our system the envy of the world.

I mentioned earlier that Canadians are spending close to $60 billion each year on health care. We are second in the world in the percentage of our GNP that we devote to it. But there is evidence that our large expenditures have not brought us the greatest possible return on our investment. Japan, for example, spends less at 6.8 per cent of GNP and yet they have better life expectancy rates than we do. Their infant mortality rates are 5 per 1,000 live births versus 7.9 for Canada. The issue is not whether we are putting enough money into health, it is whether we are using the money we have as effectively as possible. In many cases the answer to that question is that we are not.

We know that elderly Canadians with chronic problems are being kept in expensive acute care hospital beds because we have not developed less expensive, more effective options. We know that hospital stays are longer in Canada than in other western industrialized countries when both the procedures and the outcomes are virtually identical. We know that the number of doctors is growing three times as fast as the population. Most importantly, we know that it is infinitely cheaper and wiser to prevent injury and disease than it is to treat them once they have occurred.

The fact that we are not providing health services as efficiently as we might has a very real impact, not only in the quality of care we provide, but also on our ability to provide other services. Every dollar that is spent on health care is a dollar that is not spent on education, on job creation programs, on reducing illiteracy or poverty or preventing disease.

There is no reason to think that we can reverse the situation in the immediate future but there are changes taking place within our society that will bring new pressures to bear on our system.

• (1200)

[Translation]

We should judge our system not only in terms of its present strengths and weaknesses but also in terms of its ability to deal with new challenges such as an aging population, the surfacing of new diseases such as AIDS, and a constantly changing technology. Seen from this perspective, our system is far from perfect, and if it is to meet these challenges on a limited budget, improvements wil have to be made. The Canadian medicare system was the result of a consensus. A great deal of compromise and co-operation by the federal government and the provinces was necessary to get where we are now. Future challenges will require us to rediscover that spirit of co-operation and sharing.

[English]

We need to allocate our funds to prevent health problems before they arise, so that we make better use of services in the community and so we adopt only those technologies which are efficient and cost-effective and which produce real improvements to a patient's length and quality of life.

Some people argue that we should simply transfer all of the federal money to the provinces and give them carte blanche to spend without restriction.

I do not believe that it would be desirable for Canadians to do so.

For example, Preston Manning, the Leader of the Reform Party of Canada, believes the federal government should tax away the money from federal taxpayers, give it to the provinces and then have no say whatsoever in setting national standards. He is suggesting it simply hand over $14 billion with no strings attached. To my mind, that money gives Canadians 14 billion reasons to expect that the federal government should maintain the principles of medicare.

In the cold, hard language of dollars and cents, the argument is both logical and sound. If you invest money you have a right to say how that money is spent.

I believe the case for national standards is built on more than just an economic right born of a sizeable financial commitment. It goes much deeper than that. Canadians see these standards as a fundamental right of citizenship, one that reflects qualities and principles that are quintessentially Canadian: a belief in treating all people with dignity and equality; a commitment to fairness and justice; a conviction that economic freedom and a market economy are not inconsistent with caring and compassion for those less fortunate than ourselves.

By all means, let us debate today whether MPs still support medicare. We can even debate what the federal share of medicare should be. Most important, it is time for straight talk with Canadians about where that money is coming from, whether it can be spent more effectively and what share of our national wealth we are prepared to put into health care.

Sadly, answers to those questions were missing when my hon. friend from Winnipeg spoke in defence of his motion earlier today. Canadians have a right to answers to those questions to as subsequent Liberal and NDP members rise to speak.

Canadians are watching this debate and they are expecting much more from each of us than cynical promises that we will simply spend more of their money without having to worry about where it is coming from. They are too sophisticated to be fooled by political show games.

Those who love Canada's social programs must do more than simply love them to death. Just as we know you cannot spend yourself rich, we know that year after year of uncontrolled deficits will not make our social programs stronger; they can only threaten those programs' very existence.

That is the issue before the House today. The young people of Canada in particular ask for honesty from all of us when explaining how we propose to deal with these issues. It is not enough any more for this generation to continue to spend today and to simply send the bills to our kids. Already that debt of over $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada stalks the next generation of Canadians. It is time for us today to deal with that issue.

In the hours remaining in today's debate, let us put aside political posturing and let us have straight answers to these important questions.

Canadians have a right to expect no less.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the minister speak of the need for honesty in government and I challenge the government to live up to that call.

Speaking of honesty, I have here a write-up from the Winnipeg Free Press which says that apparently there is a secret Statistics Canada study. The article says the report may not be revealed yet in public but that it exists, and that 44 per cent of Canada's colossal $400 billion national debt is due to tax breaks for corporations and the wealthy, and that another 50 per cent is caused by the compounding growth of interest payments applied on interest. Only 6 per cent can be attributed to living beyond our means.

On this point, my question to the minister is: Is it true that there is such a Statistics Canada study and would he table that report in the House of Commons?

Referring to the editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, which says "Medicare still lives and death is not imminent", I would say that in fact even the editorial, if you read between the lines, is truly concerned about the health of medicare.

In terms of creative proposals, I would challenge the minister today to undertake a commitment to this House, if he has not already done so, to look at the report by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, Is There a Crisis?, released in June of last year, which examined the accessibility to hospital services. Has he had the time to study this document, and what is he prepared to tell the House today in response to the many recommendations incorporated in this document, including the creation of a national health care resource plan?

Those are my comments and specific questions and I would like the hon. minister to kindly provide this House with the appropriate answers.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to what he called a secret report within Statistics Canada concerning the national debt. If such a secret report exists, it is a secret to me as well.

I very much appreciate my hon. friend raising the question because it gives me the opportunity to challenge him. He mentioned that a certain percentage of the national debt burden we have each year is coming from compounding interest on the national debt.

The obvious question this begs is: Who was in office as the national debt was driven up and as we found that year after year the national debt was being added to?

If you take a look at the period from 1984 to 1991, you will find that the government during that period generated sufficient funds to pay for all of its ongoing expenses. Increases in the national debt since that time have come as a result of compounding interest payments on the national debt.

The hon. member attempts to dismiss this as being unimportant or somehow irrelevant. The point is that today the first 35 cents out of every dollar that comes from Canadians' tax funds goes just to pay the interest on the national debt. That is before we have a penny for pensions, before we have a penny for medicare, and before we have a penny for assistance to the poor.

We see that figure continuing to grow. The real challenge we all face in this debate today is to be honest with Canadians and say whether or not we are prepared today to make the commitment to turn that around.

We will be spending over $40 billion this year on interest payments on the national debt. That is more than we have in the whole budget of National Health and Welfare. Imagine what we could do for health care in Canada if that money were available instead of going for interest payments on the national debt. Imagine what we could do for the poor, for illiteracy, for aid to refugees, for the defence of Canada, or for a whole range of other programs that we in this House believe in.

We cannot because that money is going to pay interest payments on the national debt.

The government has made its position clear; that figure must be brought down. We cannot allow Canada's social programs to continue to be threatened by an increasing debt load which each year reduces the amount of money available to the federal government to pay for these important services.

• (1210)

My hon. friend says that the Winnipeg Free Press believes there are challenges facing medicare. Indeed, so do I. Should all Canadians be concerned? Yes, all Canadians should take an interest in their national system. What we see are pressures on the system which challenge it around the world. If we are to preserve our system of medicare, it is important that we adapt to change and not simply live in the past.

The hon. member cites a Senate subcommittee report; yes I have had a chance to take a look at that. He asked me how I respond to it. I respond to that and to the issues he raises today in this way: It is important for all Canadians to set aside partisanship and to come together for a fundamental discussion on the role of health care and the promotion of health in our society.

We must ask ourselves questions concerning the percentage of our Gross National Product we are prepared to consecrate simply for the delivery of health care services, and how we want to use our moneys in the future most effectively. We must take tough decisions in some cases, tough decisions which were not recommended by the hon. member opposite. We must sit down and work together with all the stakeholders: the hospitals, the professionals, the scientists, governments and consumers of health services to ensure that our system remains strong and improved for future generations.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker I wonder if the minister could identify the speaker who said the following: "The Progressive Conservative Party is in favour of quality medicare, universal medicare delivered to our citizens. The problem arises because of unilateral and arbitrary cuts by the federal government to the provinces which are charged with footing the bill."

I have another quote from the same person: "National health care is not a political issue. You are entitled to the same kind of quality service irrespective of the place of residence. That may mean higher than 50 per cent."

In cases such as northern British Columbia, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, the federal share would likely be higher than 50 per cent. I will not even bother to test his memory regarding who said this; it was of course the Prime Minister in 1983.

What has happened to change the Prime Minister's mind in the last four or five years when he talks about not only a commitment to medicare, but a commitment to returning to the 50–50 funding formula?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member treats the debate on medicare as if it were a trivia quiz. It is something considerably more profound than that.

The hon. member raised questions with regard to the federal share of medicare, particularly in have not regions of Canada. He will be aware of the fact that the system was changed in 1977 to move to block funding under EPF. My friend from Winnipeg overlooked the fact that it was done at that time.

He will also be aware that in addition to funds transferred to the provinces under EPF, the federal government continues to transfer funds under equalization, which are designed expressly to ensure that have not regions of the country receive extra money to enable them to provide the level of services available in other areas of the country.

A good share of that equalization money can be used by those provinces in their health care system if they choose to do so. Because of the fact that the delivery of health care services is the responsibility of the provinces constitutionally in Canada, it is a decision which they take.

The federal government continues to make a key contribution to financing of health care in Canada; through EPF alone this year, some $14 billion. Again, the question which comes back to all of us, including my hon. friend opposite, is: Is it the position of our political parties that the share of the Gross National Product to health care can and should continue to grow without constraint, or should we be taking a look at the system and asking ourselves whether we can use the money more wisely?

If their answer is that it is time we begin to look at our priorities, then it is incumbent on members opposite to spell out those priorities in this debate, and not to play shell games with something as important as Canada's health care system.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased to be able to enter into the discussion in this House concerning medicare.

I would like to start off with disagreeing with my hon. friend who says that this is not a partisan issue. I think health care is very much a partisan issue. This is a place where it should be discussed on that basis. If he means partisanship by the different political parties, there will be different philosophies, different priorities, different points of view and different records when it comes to the support of medicare.

We in the New Democratic Party are not afraid to be partisan, to set out what our record is, and what our priorities and points of view are. We are not afraid to contrast the Progress Conservative Party and the Liberal Party.

It is very important that people have a historical understanding of what has happened to national medicare. National medicare was really started in Saskatchewan by Tommy Douglas. It was the New Democratic Party and its predecessor, the CCF, which was willing to take the initiative to stand firm in spite of difficulties with the medical profession and to introduce a universal government-sponsored medical program.

In 1964 there was the Hall royal commission which I think gave a blueprint for Canada's national medicare which was brought in in 1966. I would like to point out it was brought in when there was a minority government, when the Liberals needed the support of the New Democratic Party in order to continue to govern. That was one of the prices the Liberals paid; the introduce of national medicare.

Medicare started on certain principles: universality, portability, public administration. It was also based on a partnership between the federal and provincial governments; a cost shared partnership in which the federal government, using its spending power, would give to the provinces 50 per cent of what they were spending on medicare. There has been an erosion of that partnership and of the principle.

I think it is important to document as to where this erosion started. It started most dramatically as soon the Liberals got a majority government. By 1975 the Liberals were determined to back away from their commitment of a 50-50 partnership.

I will refer to some of the budget of the then Minister of Finance in the Liberal government in 1975. It reminds me of, and I would have sworn it was, the current finance minister. It states: "The government proposes to set an example of restraint in this regard by imposing strict controls over activities and programs. All are directed to bring outlays under more effective control to slow down the rate of growth this year and into the future. Our target of cuts this fiscal year is $1 billion".

He goes on to say: "under the Act the federal government must give five years notice before the present agreement can be terminated and new arrangements undertaken. I therefore wish to announce that the government will give immediate notice of its informal intention to undertake these steps". That was the notice to get out of it. It was not done by a Conservative government. It was done by a Liberal government. That was the beginning of the erosion of the 50-50 partnership, right there.

The introduction of block funding in 1977 came out of that. The federal government had limited transfer payments and it forced upon the provinces block funding in which it was saying: "We will give you so much money and you are on your own". That was the basis on which future governments could then unilaterally pull out.

In the early eighties even the Liberals started to renege on their agreements under the block funding program.

• (1220)

They did it by withdrawing the revenue guarantee. They unilaterally withdrew the revenue guarantee, and it cost the provinces $1.2 billion a year in lost revenue directed toward health care. That $1.2 billion is an escalating figure because it cuts off the base. At the same time, they attacked other parts of the transfer by the six and five, which was more specifically directed to post-secondary education but had the cumulative effect of the moneys being directed toward health care.

What we have here is the example that the Liberals would have done the same thing as the Tories have done if they had only continued in power. They set the basis and the agenda. It is the Liberals who made the legislation possible. It is the Liberals who started the whole erosion of health care.

When the Tories came into power we got the 1986 budget with its freezing of the transfer payments to GNP minus 2 per cent, the 1990-91 budget and Bill C-96 which froze the transfer payments, and this budget in 1991-92 which extends that over a long period of time. What has happened is that the Conservative government only did what the Liberals taught it how to do. It may have learned to do it a little better, to cut the transfer payments a little more effectively and a little deeper, but it only followed what its good teachers the Liberals taught it.

We have to take a look at the effect of these cumulative cutbacks started by the Liberals and carried on by the Conservatives. Prior to the 1991-92 budget the parliamentary library documented the loss in revenue to the provinces. It was a cumulative loss in revenue of $22 billion. With this budget the estimates now are that there will be a little over $29 billion in lost revenue. We have to take a look at what this means to a number of provinces, particularly some of the have not provinces where there is a tremendous erosion of their ability to provide health care.

The loss of $29 billion also means that the federal government is no longer anywhere near that 50 per cent figure. The figures before this budget indicate that the federal government is now contributing only 37 per cent both through the tax points and the cash transfers and that the provinces are in fact picking up 63 per cent.

Another thing that has happened is that the cash transfer payments to the provinces have been going down. The Library of Parliament documents again show that they have been going down dramatically, and the projections are that they will cease totally as early as 1995-96 in Quebec and 1997-98 in Ontario and be completely finished in the early part of the next century.

For a long time the federal government said that this was not going to happen, to start with. Then it said that it did not matter, but in its own budget it admitted that without that cash transfer payment it could not enforce the Canada Health Act.

Therefore it is proposing to amend other acts: the Financial Administration Act which has to do with equalization payments. The problem is that the three big provinces—Alberta, B.C. and Ontario—do not get equalization payments. The biggest pot of money that they would then have to start holding back would be from the Canada Assistance Plan. It would very difficult for them to justify the holding back of moneys designed for child welfare services, child abuse or income support programs because a province did not comply with national health care standards. We have not seen any great enthusiasm on the part of any federal government to enforce national health care standards.

I turn my attention now to some other things that must looked at when one looks at people's priorities, commitment and record in terms of medicare. We should look at what the provincial Liberal governments are doing? What is the Liberal commitment to medicare, when we look at the track record of Liberal provincial governments?

First of all let us take a look at Newfoundland. That province has closed 360 acute care beds this week, including closing acute care hospital service in Port aux Basques, which means that community must drive three hours to receive basic health care. There is no question of accessibility any more.

They are not living up to the spirit of the Canada Health Act. There is no accessibility. They have laid off 300 nurses or 10 per cent of the nursing staff. Is this the Liberal's idea of maintaining national health care standards?

Jack Harris, a New Democratic member of that legislature, asked Premier Clyde Wells if he would make the provision of national medicare and the federal spending cuts a national crusade and go across the country in order to save medicare. Of course, Premier Wells declined by saying it was not a priority for him. He talks about trying to save national unity, and one of the major components of national unity is our health care system: a national, portable health care system that is equally available to all people across Canada. He is not prepared to try to make sure it is not eroded.

Let us take the Liberal government in the province of P.E.I. Unilaterally it denies all women in that province access to a fundamental, basic health care service: abortions. That is the Liberals way of deciding universality and accessibility to health care. The Liberal government simply says: "It is not available, period". Is that a commitment to a national, portable, universal, accessible health care system? Is that the Liberal record? Is that the Liberal philosophy?

In the province of New Brunswick the Minister of Finance is saying: "Of course we cannot comply with the Canada Health Act and national standards. We do not have the will. We do not have the means". Basically he is simply saying: "We will no longer comply with the Canada Health Act". There is no commitment to national standards.

In Nova Scotia, not one of the four remaining provinces that have Liberal governments, what does it say? Minister of Health George Moody said: "If people want certain levels of care, maybe they want to pay an extra $25 or $30". He could not rule out that there would be more and higher co-pay charges to consumers, user fees. What is the record of the Liberal government in that province?

• (1230)

The Liberal Government of the Province of Quebec is on record as saying that it wants the federal government out of funding of national medicare so that it can introduce user fees. It is even willing to forgo some of the revenue, because it wants to introduce user fees.

What we have is a Liberal record that relates to how they are the responsible ones for eroding medicare at the federal level. Of course we can look at the provincial level and decide what is the role of the provincial governments in how they interpret national health care standards. At the first opportunity they have simply backed away from them.

The Prime Minister was very much in favour and supportive of medicare when he was in opposition. He indicated that the federal government needed to maintain and restore its 50 per cent funding of medicare.

Let us not have blinders on and think there are not problems which the health care system in this country must address. Changes are taking place in health care across this country in which the federal government has to take leadership. It must work with the provinces to deal with them. I want to spend just two or three minutes outlining what some of the problems are.

Before I do, I just want to correct something I may have inadvertently said a minute ago, namely that the Nova Scotia government is a Liberal government. I believe that is a Conservative government, but I have difficulty telling the difference between Liberal and Conservative governments. When one comes from B.C. one has great difficulty because in B.C. we have this amalgamation of Liberals and Tories and they are called Socreds. We have difficulty sometimes distinguishing between a Liberal and a Tory, particularly at the provincial level.

There are three or four things that I think the federal government has to show some leadership in, in working with the provinces to deal with medicare. I see my time is starting to run down, so I will just mention them.

First is the changing demographics in this country with the aging population, where increasingly people are living longer and the elderly rely more upon our health care system. We have to resolve that by developing community based alternatives to acute, institutionalized care. That is something we all must do.

The whole question of high technology is expensive, often unproven, and sometimes leads to heroic interventions that do not either prolong the life expectancy, the comfort or the functioning of the person. We have to start looking at and dealing with when we actually use high-tech constructively to improve the health and functioning of people and when we simply say: "Look, it is not beneficial to the patient or to the total community to spend that amount of money".

Another whole area we have to look at is the question of personnel. There are indications we are training far too many physicians, that they are concentrated in urban centres, and that the rural areas of this country are not being served.

I want to go back to the Prime Minister's statements in 1983 wherein he talked about the need to restore the 50 per cent cost sharing, the partnership. He was quite passionate about it and said that was what was needed to restore the viability of medicare in this country.

Because of that, I think I would agree with him. Therefore I would propose the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, British Columbia:

> That the motion be amended by adding the following words:
> "specifically its original commitment to restore 50 per cent federal funding for provincial health care costs".

If we are to have a commitment to reaffirm our commitment to medicare, we should do so in concrete terms, not simply in hollow rhetoric.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend. What particularly peaked my curiosity was his reference during the course of his speech to concerns that he had about the maintenance of standards under the Canada Health Act.

He made considerable point of the fact that the balance is shifting in Canada between transfers to the provinces in the form of tax points as opposed to transfers in the form of cash. He made it clear that he would prefer that those transfers take place in the form of cash.

What was most interesting though to me was he followed that by talking about the government's proposal that as we shift to tax points away from cash, we would be able to protect the standards in the Canada Health Act by being able to attach other funds transferred to the province. He attacked that proposal.

My question for my hon. friend is very simple. It is not what would be the optimal method of enforcing standards but his party, as will all members of this House, will be forced to deal on a yes or no basis with a bill which will give to the federal government the ability to protect national standards by withholding other funds from provinces. How will his party vote?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, the whole question of how we protect national standards when the moneys are no longer transferred for health care is going to be a very difficult one. Our proposal is to reinstate the type of funding so that they then have moneys to withhold.

Mr. Beatty: How will you vote on the present bill?

Mr. Karpoff: I cannot speculate as I have not seen the bill. The minister wants me to commit myself to how I am going to vote on a bill. I do not know what the bill is. I do not know whether it is something that we would support.

We would support the reinstatement of the 50–50 funding, which means that there will be cash transfers going to the provinces. If they then do not live up to the Canada Health Act, the government has some moneys to hold. It is directly related to health care.

There are two aspects to this issue of enforcing national health care standards. There is one that the minister seems to keep looking at. He says: "We are going to call the tune even if we are no longer paying the piper. We are going to insist that provinces provide services even if we have pulled the rug out from underneath them in terms of money. We are going to say that they have to meet this national standard, but we are going to turn our back on them in terms of financing it".

What we have right now is not surprising. The financially disadvantage provinces are now backing away from provision of medicare that would meet national standards, because they are the ones who are financially under the most pressure. They do not have high employment. Let us take a look at Newfoundland. It has very high unemployment. They do not have the large numbers of people working. They do not have the industrial base of B.C., Alberta or Ontario to raise tax revenue. Yes, they are more dependent on transfer payments including transfer payments for medicare.

The federal government is saying to them very nicely: "You have to meet these standards, but we are going to wash our hands of any responsibility for your funding of them". I say to the minister that he cannot have it both ways. He can bring in all the punitive legislation he wants, but if persons cannot afford to meet those standards it is going to be almost impossible to force them.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when I was listening to my colleague from the New Democratic Party, I almost felt that we were in government. Of course we will form the next government.

• (1240)

He kept attacking the provincial Liberal ministers across the country. I ask my colleague from the New Democratic Party, since when has it become a virtue that you criticize the victims and not the victimizer? Have you not said during debate in the past that the federal government has been passing the deficit burden to the provinces, and now you say you are blaming those people, those ministers? Mr. Speaker, this is a classic example of double-speak.

Then he alluded to Ontario. I was glad. But he did not say that the Ontario government is now run by the New Democratic Party. Here is a headline from a newspaper: "Ontario looks to copy Quebec's new health plan". Part of this plan, as the member indicated, is the utilization of user fees. Are we going to see the NDP government of Ontario apply a user fee? I tell you, when the NDP provincial government of Ontario does just that, we will fight it.

I would, therefore, like to ask the member if he has spoken to his counterpart in his own party in Ontario.

My second comment is in terms of history because the member alluded to it, Mr. Speaker, that is, that we have to have an historical understanding of medicare and its documentation. I would like to put on the record, very briefly, that the first stage in Canada's national health insurance known as medicare, came with the unanimous approval of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Service Act of 1957 by the House of Commons. Actually, the earliest record is before Confederation in 1832. Medicare as a national idea at the federal level, as a political issue, occurred in 1919 at the Liberal Party convention.

In 1939 we had the Rowell-Sirois report and then in 1947 Tommy Douglas tried to implement his program in Saskatchewan, and finally did so in 1962. In 1966 it was the Liberal government that introduced the medicare act of 1966 and modernized it in 1984–1985. I would like to set the record straight. If we would like to study the history of medicare we must study it thoroughly so that we can tell Canadians how it has evolved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have to recognize the hon. member for Surrey North for two minutes to answer.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to say that I have spoken to the New Democratic Party minister of health for Ontario and I look forward in the next few months to being able to speak with the New Democratic minister of health from British Columbia and the New Democratic minister of health from Saskatchewan.

When we get three or four of the provinces, which will represent 50 per cent of the population, being governed by New Democratic governments, then I think we may get a sense of the difference in priorities that those governments may set in terms of health care.

I could get into a long historical debate with my fellow colleague about the position the Liberal Party took on health care, particularly his reference to the early days. I have a copy of the Liberal platform from 1921 and I could have sworn it was Michael Wilson speaking because it says: "In so far as may be practical, having regards for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, old age, and disabilities". It includes all of the cop-out words "as may be practical", "having regard to Canada's financial position". That was in 1921. The Liberals never even bothered to put it into their election platform until 1949 and that was only because by then the CCF was starting to make inroads into the traditional Liberal support.

Our medical system in Canada is under tremendous pressure, and it is under pressure largely because of escalating costs at the provincial level and the withdrawal of financial support from the federal government.

I have enjoyed the discussion. I hope Canadians have been listening because I think it is important for them to realize that the only party which has always been firmly behind national medicare is the New Democratic Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair finds the amendment moved by the New Democratic Party member in order.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate to the House that we would like the next set of Liberal speeches to be 10 minutes and five minutes for comments and questions, with the permission of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree with that motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mississauga East for 10 minutes followed by five minutes of questions and comments.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, since 1967 Canadians have been comforted by the knowledge that they could obtain the high quality health care services they need, irrespective of their ability to pay. Every Canadian, whether rich or poor, has protection from the medical cost of sudden illness. Of the current generation of Canadians, there is no one who has been turned away from a medical institution because of his or her inability to pay.

We have always believed there is a common starting line for free enterprise and competition; that everyone would be guaranteed an equal level of medical care; that someone's failure to compete in the business world would not impede one's access to hospital or professional care. Canada is a nation where a bad credit rating is not a health hazard.

It has been suggested that the U.S. offers a two-tiered health care system, one for the rich and one for the poor. In reality, it has a fabulous system for the rich, a mediocre system for the middle class and no system at all for 37 million of the poor.

Canadians today are beginning to see their own much-coveted medicare system looking more like its predatory counterpart south of the border. Those that have recently been ill or hospitalized will know that the quality of care in Canada has been deteriorating since 1984.

[Translation]

The lack of funding is such that the number of beds is dropping steadily. In January, one of my constituents had a heart attack and had to lie on a stretcher for nearly a week. Why? Because of a chronic lack of beds.

Canadians are all aware of reports that at any given time, more than 1,000 people are on the waiting list for bypass surgery in Toronto.

In Quebec, people may wait up to eight or nine months for a bed. In Toronto, at the Hospital for Sick Children, 40 young patients had to wait up to eight months for open-heart surgery. Why? Because scheduled operations were constantly postponed due to a lack of beds. In most large cities, emergency wards often lack the capacity to take care of new patients. Why? Because of a constant lack of beds.

[English]

Emergency rooms in major cities often have no capacity to handle new patients because they do not have enough beds into which previous patients could be transferred. Wealthy Canadians, are choosing to go to the United States where they can receive immediate treatment for immediate cash.

It is small wonder that Canada's medicare system has fallen ill, for it is has been so under-nourished since this government came to office in 1984. At that time Canadians took comfort in the Prime Minister's declaration that "medicare was a sacred trust". They now realize that they should have put their trust in someone else. Some may even remember the present finance minister saying in 1982 that cuts to Established Programs Financing could have disastrous effects on hospital funding and on their operation. He went on to preach:

> Let us not make hospitals a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve those problems not on the backs of hospitals, let us solve those problems outside of that arena.

• (1250)

When the minister took his new seat on the other side of the House, it is obvious he left his social conscience behind. Perhaps on election night he did not just see stars but saw stripes as well.

The Canadian medicare system has become the favourite target of Tory attacks since they took office in 1984. Cuts to Established Programs Financing have resulted in the inevitable destruction of the five principles of medicare. Universality, portability, accessibility, public administration, and comprehensiveness will all be an historical footnote if the Wilson fiscal knife is not dulled.

The spirit of the government's free trade agreement is embodied in its current medicare policy. We all remember American objections to our social program subsidies during the free trade negotiations. We also remember that the American Medical Association spent a great deal to dissuade the U.S. from ever adopting any kind of universal medicare.

According to polls, 60 to 80 per cent of the American public want the U.S. to copy the world-renowned system to which Canadians have become accustomed. The AMA is desperate to protect its $600 billion a year business. Our Canadian example is the AMA's greatest enemy.

Under the guise of fiscal restraint, the ministers of this government continue to divest themselves of programs that even they once called sacred trusts. Most cherished of all social programs, medicare is now certainly under the knife on the Tory trade table.

While inept on most accounts, this government has excelled in the art of camouflaging its real agenda, thus being able to slowly divest the federal contribution to medicare. In 1984 the Prime Minister boasted that Canada is open for business. Sadly, we find ourselves in the midst of a fire sale, the value of our social programs being marked down year after year.

In order to avoid public wrath, the government is gradually and deceptively passing the vast majority of costs on to the provinces. Continuing to promote the reduced deficit they have failed to achieve for the past six years, medicare and other social programs continue to be scrapped for parts. Instead of investing resources and devising policies to create wealth in this country, this government has chosen instead to sell off our social assets.

As the party that introduced national medicare to Canada, our commitment is as strong today as it was in 1966. With any system, improvements must be made. This requires innovation, foresight and direction. We do not advocate that money be mindlessly spent throughout the system.

On February 26, 1991 the finance minister introduced a budget telling Canadians they must pay their own way. We have been paying his way for the last six years.

This government tells us that the only way to bring down the deficit is to shred our social programs. The way to get out of debt is by creating wealth, by investing in people, in education, in technology, in research and in jobs. The 1.5 million unemployed Canadians are willing to make a contribution to Canada, and this government has failed to give them that opportunity.

The Canadian medicare system is increasingly mirroring the American model. Soon we may expect to see government ads for an American Express medicare card: "Don't get sick without it!"

The polls show that Canadians are wise to this government's tactics, and they will not be fooled again. Today we are asking the government to reaffirm the longstanding federal commitment to publicly funded universal medicare on a national level.

Canadians are watching their response from the sacred trust people. Medicare is one of our national treasures that Canadians will one day reclaim from our Tory pawnbrokers.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the member's discussion of national medicare.

Basically, I have two questions on which I would like her to comment. First of all, could she explain why the Liberal finance minister in 1975 pushed through a cap on medicare which led to the block funding formula of 1977. This was the backing away from the basic concept of 50–50 sharing of medicare with the provinces. Why did the Liberals and the finance minister do that?

Second, why in the early 1980s, did they back away from their own formula of block funding to the tune of $1.2 billion a year in erosion of payments to the provinces? Why did the Liberals do that? Why are their cuts different than the Tory cuts to medicare? They are about the same. It was $1.2 billion in the early 1980s as opposed to $1.1 billion by the hon. Minister of Finance.

Third, what is her reaction to the proposal by the Quebec Liberal government to introduce user fees?

Ms. Guarnieri: I am very baffled by this member's obsession with history and the past. I am more interested—

Mr. Boyer: We expect better than that from you.

Ms. Guarnieri: Unlike the member who is cackling right now, I am more interested in focusing my attention on what is being done right now and where we will be in the future. I think it would be more useful if we would put our industry into reviewing what is going on in this government, rather than the obsession with Liberal days that this colleague shares with members opposite.

I am more interested in reviewing the earlier assessment of the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he showed righteous indignation that Liberal members would put forward a motion asking the government to reaffirm its commitment to medicare. I fail to see the dishonour in members opposite voting with us on a motion that we have heard a lot of talk about which says that the Conservatives support medicare. We want to know, and Canadians want to know, exactly what are this government's intentions.

Mr. Boyer: You are playing a parliamentary game.

Ms. Guarnieri: No. We heard earlier that the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that we should put aside partisan politics. The motion is a good one. Admit it, and you will be a better person for it.

Mr. Boyer: It's a non-confidence debate.

Ms. Guarnieri: I do not mind the debate. I am happy to stay all day if I have to.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, in an article I have here, denies that he ever made an allegation that the U.S. system has one system for the rich and another for the poor.

Does he believe that the poor in the United States have equal access to health care as the rich? If he does, will he accept that he is alone in that belief?

The minister says that the government is increasing the total level of funding by 1.2 per cent. He knows that in Ontario alone, it will rise 12 per cent just to maintain the same level of care as last year. Once again, we are asking the government to simply reaffirm its support. If it is not prepared to do that, it should resign.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, many challenges face Canadians today. None is more compelling than the challenge to make Canada a society that is proud of its diversity, a society that is committed to the equality of all its citizens, a society, quite simply, that is free of discrimination.

The International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, to be celebrated this week, is a time to review our successes and failures in combatting racism and racial discrimination in Canadian society. It is a time to renew our efforts in combatting this social ill.

The Government of Canada, through the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, works in partnership with key institutional sectors, such as community associations, unions, police departments, educators, the media and municipal governments, to highlight the importance of March 21 and the need to work together to end racism.

I am convinced that the will to make Canada a more just and equal society is present wherever Canadian values are held in high esteem. Ours is a country in search of lasting unity, and we can regard March 21 as a central building block in this process.

FORESTRY

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, the debate over national unity is having adverse effects on the economy of this country. The surtax of our softwood lumber export provides a glaring example.

The Americans, lovers of fair trade when they are beaten at free trade, claimed that our stumpage fees were too low and amounted to an unfair subsidy. Our response to this was to levy a 15 per cent export tax on our producers before the Americans could, instead of fighting this ridiculous claim.

I wonder if the Americans will claim that Mexico's cheap labour costs constitute an unfair subsidy when they conclude free trade talks with them. Better still, perhaps Canada should claim that the Americans are subsidizing all their industries because they have almost no social programs and, thus, are not on a level playing field with us.

Whatever the case, the point should be clear: By the U.S. meddling in our forestry practices and having their way with us, our sovereignty is becoming compromised.

We must balance the interests of all the regions of this country and build a consensus to forge ahead in our efforts to revoke this softwood surtax and strengthen our economy.

We must resolve the question of national unity and stand together; for today it is forestry, tomorrow who knows what it will be?

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, when the federal Minister of Finance refused to exempt books from the GST we said he was wrong. Now, as we predicted, the Saskatchewan provincial government is expanding its retail sales tax and is also refusing to exempt books.

This is shameful. The combined taxes will lead to fewer books being purchased and fewer books being read, particularly by young people. The provincial and federal governments must remove this hurtful tax from books immediately.

In my own constituency, the Lakeland Library Region reports that the two new taxes will cost them $20,000 in 1991. That represents one-half the book budget for their resource centre or one-third the budget for their 39 smaller branch libraries.

Regional public libraries provide equitable access to information and reading materials to rural residents. They are already trying to cope with decreased revenues. Unnecessary financial pressures like these regressive taxes that can be removed must be removed. The federal and provincial governments have no mandate to tax reading, literacy and learning.

CANADA–U.S. AGREEMENT ON AIR QUALITY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the Canada–U.S. agreement on air quality is the result of the very special relationship between Messrs. Reagan, Mulroney and Bush.

Since the two heads of State met in March 1985, striking progress has been achieved by this government with respect to pollution. Thanks to the co-operation of the federal government, provincial governments, industry and environmental groups, the Canadian program to control acid rain was successfully implemented.

The signing of the important Canada–U.S. agreement on air quality is a milestone in the history of environmental protection. This bilateral agreement establishes a framework for Canada and the United States to deal effectively with present and future air pollution problems involving both countries.

Mr. Speaker, this historic agreement sets forth clearly and concisely the commitment of both governments to dealing with the problem of air pollution.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, today a country is defined by its communications, by how and what it communicates. This distinguishes us on the global map. In this light, the CBC has a unique and dramatic role to play, providing the cross-country links that truly connect and reflect all of Canada and all Canadians from sea to sea to sea. With the exploding spectrum of program choices available all around us, today, more than ever, we must have that distinctive Canadian voice.

The CBC is more than a bottom line on a balance sheet. CBC is measured in terms of how it reflects local ideas and national ideals. Canada is rooted in the realities of its small local communities and its regions through their singers and performers, their values and stories. This then becomes Canada's national voice.

The CBC is critically wounded in its ability to ensure the development of Canada's national personality by the Conservative Party's unconscionable cuts to the CBC. This is why 11 members of the national Liberal caucus care enough to express their views today at the CRTC hearings on why a strong, local, regional and national CBC is needed now more than ever. It is a priority at this sensitive juncture in our political history as a nation.

The government should review its support for our national public broadcaster. Eleven cents per Canadian per day is very little for the cost of a bilingual radio and TV service across this land. I think it is worth at least that much to ensure that the hearts, minds and attitudes of our children and our future are that as distinct Canadians on the world map.

BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it has been said in many commentaries that the middle class is dying in Canada. I think there is a real understanding now as to why that is happening. Last night, when he was before the Commons finance committee, the Governor of the Bank of Canada defended his salary and increases for his senior officials, saying that they needed the money to attract top people. He himself earns a salary which is between $168,000 and $253,000 a year. That is an $85,000 difference between the top and the bottom level.

How can Canadians expect any fairness if the people who earn the most in our society have deliberately set up rules supported by the present Conservative government, often implemented in the first place by previous Liberal governments, which create secrecy around the salaries which are much higher than those of ordinary Canadians? The secrecy is not there to defend a postal clerk who might be earning between $23,000 and $25,000 or a clerk in the federal government who might be earning between $23,000 and $26,000. This secrecy is set there to defend the deputy ministers, the political appointees and those who give advice to this government.

It is time to defend all Canadians. Make all government salaries public for all Canadians.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, two days from now on the first day of spring the world commemorates and reaffirms its commitment to the elimination of racial discrimination. We in Canada are especially enriched by the many races and cultures which comprise our population.

Our government has established the legislative framework for a society which should become free of racism; most notably, through such statutes as the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Employment Equity Act and Canada's Multiculturalism Act.

There is still a sad reality, however, that racism and bigotry remain everyday facts of life. These demeaning attitudes violate the dignity of those they attack and they devastate the very fabric of our society.

It is time for each of us to recognize that diversity is the essence of Canadianism. It is the combination of tolerance, goodwill and respect for every citizen, regardless of race, language, colour or creed that makes us a distinctive society among the nations of the world. Multiculturalism is an asset that benefits every one of us, culturally, socially and economically.

DEBT SERVICING AND REDUCTION FUND

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a letter I sent to Mr. Wilson, the Minister of Finance, on March 7:

> Mr. Minister,
> The Budget you brought down on February 26 proposed to create a special fund into which will flow net GST revenues, plus the profits on the sale of Crown corporations that will be privatized and all private contributions.
> All monies from the special fund will be used to pay off this country's enormous deficit.
> Mr. Minister, I am enclosing a personal cheque for $100 which I would like to see applied to the deficit reduction fund. I hope many more Canadians will do likewise, and especially members of Parliament.
>
> In addition to the taxes we pay, a joint effort is in order, and I am convinced that many Canadians would be willing to do their share.
> Furthermore, members of the Government and Parliament will be asked to accept a drop in income. I do so gladly, because I realize that the economic situation demands it. Next December, I will be glad to do so again.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I would like to share with you an old Chinese saying: As the river returns to the sea, so what man gives comes back to him.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, our country was built and strengthened by communication links: rail, air, the post office and the national public broadcasting system.

During this perilous time when Canada seems to be slipping into a regional mentality, the CBC must provide a strong national voice and a sense of shared value and purpose.

[Translation]

Canada is a cultural mosaic that thrives on diversity. However, this diversity must be nurtured. If we do not know and do not understand our differences, whether they are geographical, cultural, social or economic, we lose our common goals as a nation.

Here in the National Capital Region, programming produced locally by English and French television networks has made it possible for Francophones and Anglophones in eastern Ontario and western Quebec to share what they have in common, to laugh and cry, and to live together in harmony.

[English]

CBC has helped us to show the country and each other we are more than a national capital. We are a vibrant community that is a microcosm of the nation.

The decision to axe local programming will diminish the important role of the CBC in our community and in all communities. Local programming is essential to Canadian unity, and we urge the government, which is busy dismantling our national institutions, to listen.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, small business in south-western New Brunswick got some welcome news this past weekend with the announcement that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is setting up an office in the city of Saint John.

New Brunswick has 31 per cent of the region's employment and has netted 37 per cent of the $658 million ACOA has committed between 1988 and 1990.

This should go a long way to generating a stronger working relationship between the agency and local business interests. It will ensure the region and the province will continue to benefit fully from the many programs available under the action programs.

There is no shortage of good ideas in south-western New Brunswick. By taking this action, ACOA is attempting to bring a greater focus on the special needs of the region.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, when the federal science minister appeared before the science and technology committee, he pretended that there was $1.5 billion in new R and D money, but later revealed that this referred to sub-inflationary budgetary increases over five years.

The minister then told 7,000 recipients of NSERC grants that many of them did not deserve the grant money. Today, we learn that one employee in 15 is interested in early retirement at NRC.

In fact, if everyone who wanted to quit were allowed to go, entire sections would be wiped out. This is how demoralized Canadian scientists are. They are sick and tired of a government which is destroying their mission, their grants and their jobs.

They are sick of watching R and D expenditures fall, and they are sick of watching the erosion of NSERC, NRC and the entire federal science structure. They are insulted when a minister who is supposed to be their advocate not only defends this sorry record, but obscures the real facts about funding levels and then adds insult to injury by kicking them while they are down.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, average farm incomes are expected to be extremely low in 1991 in this country, but this government is dragging its feet on the subject of helping farmers with their seeding programs. This is a recipe for disaster.

As far as prices are concerned, last year was a terrible one for producers of grain, oil seeds and fruits and vegetables. The result is that farmers need financial assistance to be able to seed their land.

Mr. Speaker, many producers have never faced cash flow problems of this magnitude.

As a result of government cutbacks, especially in support programs for 1991, we expect that total net farm income will be down 54 per cent. Our farmers have a right to know how the government will help them.

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR THE ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, this year again, thousands of Canadians will meet to take part in demonstrations throughout the country to mark the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, on March 21.

This day is an important one, because discrimination still exists. Despite undeniable progress, Canadians have not yet managed to create a society that is consistently respectful of cultural, linguistic and religious differences.

We all have the same basic needs. We all need understanding, respect, friendship and equal opportunities, values that are essential to the survival of this country. And that is why racism, racial discrimination and racial prejudice must disappear in Canada.

Together we can build a society that is fairer and less racist.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): The Canadian Coast Guard inshore rescue program has existed for 14 years, providing both summer employment and a quick response prime research and rescue unit, but the latest budget threatens to change the entire character of the program.

It has been suggested that the qualifications necessary to work in the IRP will be eased in order to open the program up to career oriented summer employment plan jobs at a lower hourly rate and that the jobs will simply be opened up under a non-close up agreement, saving the ministry even more money per hour.

There are six IRP stations in Atlantic Canada, employing 36 students. They assist the RCMP and local authorities in the exercise of their duties. They conduct safety examinations; search for lost vessels; tows for vessels in danger and other distress situations.

These stations performed 250 rescues in 1990 from May until October and saved an estimated 30 lives.

The importance of this program and the need for trained and qualified personnel is clear. Therefore, I ask the Minister of Transport to carefully consider the Canadian and tourist safety and maintain the same high standards that the IRP has kept for 14 years.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Yesterday we heard in this House that the government intends to spend millions of dollars to send propaganda information to households across this country to sell this government's disastrous budget and the GST.

Today we learn, in a report tabled by an advisory committee to the government, the National Council of Welfare, that in fact this government is the first government in history to pull back from its basic commitment to the needs of the poor.

I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare why it is that his policies do not support those people who most need our help and why his government is pulling back from its basic commitment to the needs of the poor and the sick across this country.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, just the opposite happens to be the case. What we are determined to do is to ensure that Canada's social programs are founded on a firm foundation.

I want to indicate to the hon. member that simply proposing that we continue to pile deficit upon deficit, debt upon debt, without any restriction in the future, is the single greatest threat to the existence of Canada's social services network.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): It is no wonder that the National Council on Welfare, the government's advisory body has said about the 1990 budget that it has reinforced the council's concerns about leaving social policy to the finance department. Is it not about time that the Minister of National Health and Welfare took his responsibilities?

I would like to ask him how he and his government can justify taking $865 million over the next two years out of the mouths of mothers and their children and those people on welfare benefits who most need the help. How can he justify an $865 million cut to those people who really need our help, the poor of this country?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is sincere when she claims to be concerned about Canada's children, she will be aware of the fact that every man, woman and child in this country has a debt in Ottawa of over $15,000. She may believe that the appropriate way to deal with Canada's children is for this generation to spend and for us to simply send the bill to our kids. On this side we do not believe so.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am talking about food for poor children now living in Montreal, Quebec City, and Chicoutimi.

I have a question for the Minister of National Health. If he really believes in the health of our children, why would he and his government implement this unfair policy over the next two years under which they are taking $865 million off the funds earmarked for poorer families only in Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia? Why is he taking this kind of action against the children of Canada?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is the acting leader of her party. As such, one would expect that she would at least have some understanding of the subject that she raises.

She should be aware of the fact when she cites the province of Quebec that the restriction on the Canada Assistance Plan does not apply in the case of Quebec. It is totally unrestricted.

REVENUE CANADA

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. This question is about another of this government's inane economic policies.

Yesterday, in British Columbia, the Minister of National Revenue announced a program that actually encourages Canadians to shop in the United States. It amounts to a life in the fast lane program for a select group of shoppers who can pay an up-front fee and who have credit cards.

Why is the government putting into effect a new policy that will help the economies of Michigan, of Washington and of New York and has no new policies to help the economy of Canada, to help the economy of our own country?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has as usual only partially read the announcement of the Minister of National Revenue.

When the Minister of National Revenue announced this pilot yesterday, the Pace Program, he mentioned that in the fast lane there would be random checks, there would be heavy fines, and there would be important sanctions against those who abuse the fast lane.

Therefore what the fast lane will do is make sure that Canadians now pay fully all their duties and taxes, something that did not happen under the previous government. Second, it will speed the flow of U.S. tourists into Canada. Third and most important, it will maybe encourage Canadians to shop in Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this program at this stage applies only to Canadians. Instead of being checked each time they cross the border, they will just throw a little card in a box. That does not sound too strict to me.

Statistics Canada has reported that the number of same day car trips to the United States in January jumped 15.2 per cent above the same month last year. Retail analyst, John Winter, speaking of this increase, said it was directly due to the GST. He went on to say:

> This is bleak economic news for municipalities on the Canadian side of the border. But it is bonanza days for merchants on the other side.

Why does the government want to create an economic bonanza for merchants on the American side of the border rather than for those on the Canadian side? Has its policies not done enough damage already to merchants in our border communities?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would be the first person to stand up if we stopped every car for a half hour each and rifled through them. He would be the first one to complain.

The member also knows that the Retail Council of Canada asked us to come up with a scheme whereby we would start to collect fully all duties and taxes. This scheme allows that.

We have also been asked by thousands and thousands of tourist operators to make sure that the three-hour wait at this particular border crossing where we are doing the pilot is so long that American tourists are deciding not to come to Canada.

We are coming up with a scheme in which we can increase the flow and speed the flow as well as make sure that Canadians who return pay their fully duties and taxes.

BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada, John Crow, has run a monetary policy that has taken Canada into a recession, yet last night he refused to say even what he was paid despite his immense power. He also refused to say if his bank employees would be affected by the public sector wage freeze.

Crow's salary has to be approved by cabinet. The salaries of everybody in this House are known in detail. Why is it that John Crow's salary should be privileged and secret?

Would the minister also tell us if in fact the Bank of Canada is subject, as it should be for fairness sake, to the public sector wage freeze if the rest of the public sector is supposed to be affected by it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have communicated in a letter to Mr. Crow to discuss with him the application of the public sector wage policy. I can tell my hon. friend that the Bank of Canada will be subject to exactly the same rules as the Public Service will be in wages and salaries in the coming three-year period.

My hon. friend knows the policy that the government reached on salaries of senior public servants. We have set a range. The boards of directors of these organizations establish a level within that range which is subject to approval by the government, but the range is very clearly available and is subject to public knowledge.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question has to do with the report by the National Council of Welfare which calls on the government to rescind its cap on CAP, its cutbacks in Canada Assistance Plan funding for the provinces of B.C., Alberta and Ontario, in which it states that it is no time for cuts to our safety net of last resort.

The minister of health has defended this cap by saying that we cannot send the bill for the deficit to our kids. Will the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Health and Welfare tell us why it is right to send the bill for the deficit to the 700,000 poor children who depend on the Canada Assistance Plan? Why is it right to send the bill to them for the deficit?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at least this hon. member, unlike the hon. member for Hamilton East, knows which provinces the cap applies on.

The premise of his question is fundamentally wrong. It is not our intention to send the bill to the unemployed or to children in Canada. The restrictions, in terms of transfers to the provinces over the coming year, will amount to about one-half of one per cent of provincial revenues.

What we are asking the provinces to do is not to penalize the poor or not to penalize the disadvantaged, but rather to look at the other 99.5 per cent of their expenditures and to set priorities in exactly the same way as the federal government has had to do.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, what we would suggest is that the government send the bill for the deficit to all the corporations which have been receiving tax breaks over the years.

In that respect, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance or the minister responsible for Statistics Canada whether the government is aware of the study done by Statistics Canada which shows that 44 per cent of Canada's debt is due to tax breaks for corporations and the wealthy.

Apparently this study is so far a secret study. We want to know why it is a secret study, and we want to know when the government is going to release that study so that Canadians can see the big lie that exists behind this government's deficit reduction ideology and who is really at fault for the deficit.

Release that study, why don't you?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such study. My hon. friend has raised the question of tax preferences as it relates to corporations. I discussed these item by item in committee last week. I told him why the government has taken the position that if we followed the approach that the hon. member from Winnipeg is suggesting we should do, he would lose a lot of businesses in Winnipeg that would move down to the United States. It is the same in any part of the country.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend is talking about a previous question. If he wants to ask a question on that, I would be happy to respond to that as well.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In his budget the Minister of Finance cut $2.3 billion in cash transfers to provinces, much of which was for health care. This morning the minister said that he would compensate provinces with tax points.

Can the minister be frank with Canadians and tell this House today that tax points, particularly with the have not provinces, will not fully compensate for loss in cash?

• (1430)

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly very much in your hands. As the hon. member prefaced his questions saying that he was referring to a matter that was before the House in debate today, I am in your hands as to whether or not I should be responding to that question. I would be pleased to do so, although the convention in this House has been that matters addressed in debate are not dealt with during Question Period.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I think the subject has been discussed for many weeks. I would like to ask the minister the second question, if he does not wish to answer the first one.

Provincial ministers are not impressed with this minister's unilateral plans. Can the minister commit to this House that he will immediately consult with a view to reaching a consensus with his provincial counterparts, before going any further and thereby save medicare?

That was not asked in the question before us today.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the same concern applies here. Notwithstanding the parliamentary conventions, let me attempt to respond to my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister does not wish to answer, of course that is the minister's right. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take advantage of the opportunity to try to put one of these shibboleths to rest.

The net cost to the federal government, the net benefit to provincial treasuries as a result of a shift from cash transfers to tax point transfers, is identical.

The hon. member asked whether or not I am prepared to consult with colleagues at the provincial level as well as to consult with people outside government. Of course I do that regularly, but the plans that were announced in the budget by the Minister of Finance is the announcement of the policy of the Government of Canada. It is important that we all work together to ensure the fiscal soundness of this country.

[Translation]

Mrs. Albina Guarnieri (Missisauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Patients throughout Canada who need medical attention, such as victims of heart attacks, are already queuing up and waiting for costly operations. Some of them may have to wait for up to a week on a temporary bed. With a medicare system already on the decline, how can Canadians ever hope to have an effective system or even hope the existing system to survive, threatened as it is while the decisions of his government continue to undermine the institutions which Canadians hold dearest? How?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, this year alone the federal government will transfer some $14 billion to the provinces for the administration of health care in Canada.

When she criticizes the delivery systems, for example in our home province, she is really criticizing the provincial Liberal government which is responsible for administering those services.

It is worth while for the hon. member to note the fact that since we came to office increases in transfer payments for health care have been in the order of about $4 billion in Canada.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, we have heard this minister's protest before. Tonight his bluff will be called at six o'clock. This government will have to vote against or for medicare.

During the first five years of this government, the average increase in established programs funding was 6.3 per cent, and yet the quality of care declined over the period.

Earlier today the minister repeated that his government's contribution to medicare will extend by only 1.2 per cent in the coming year. This can only accelerate the deterioration of health care services.

Why is the minister allowing federal support for medicare to erode faster than the rate of inflation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has made reference to a long-standing rule in the House that questions ought not to anticipate the Order of the Day. Despite that the minister has, as is his right and if he wishes to, responded. This question is clearly taken right out of the debate which has been taking place in this House. I think I have to say that it is out of order. If the minister wishes to reply he can, but he does not have to. I want to make it very clear that the minister does not have to reply.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, precisely because of the information that was put on the record by the hon. member I want to reply. She refers to our bluff being called tonight at 6 p.m.

What members opposite, in the guise of a motion in support of medicare, are doing is proposing a motion of non-confidence in the government. In order to vote for medicare members of the government would have to be voting non-confidence.

Surely the people of Canada expect greater honesty and sincerity from the opposition than that.

Some hon. members: Hear. hear.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is about the Meme breast implant and it is for the minister of health and welfare.

Over a million Canadian women face breast cancer in their lifetime. Twelve thousand Canadian women have received Meme breast implants. Forty cases implicating the Meme breast implant are currently before the U.S. courts. A Canadian woman from Delta, B.C. is before our courts in Canada. Surely the minister has some concept of all the horrors of cancer and knows there are serious concerns about the Meme implant.

Why then does the minister continue to refuse to order that the Meme breast implant be withdrawn from the market until all questions of its safety have been answered?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Because, Mr. Speaker, all of the evidence available for the Government of Canada to date indicates that the Meme is equally safe as other breast implants.

What is taking place in the United States is the FDA is reviewing evidence with regard to all breast implants. We will review that evidence as well.

What we have done in Canada is commission independent studies, for example the Kerrigan report. Second, a study done by the University of Ottawa demonstrates that the Meme does not release carcinogens under conditions which are found in the human body.

We will be following carefully any new scientific evidence that is educed at any time, but based on the evidence that is available to the Government of Canada today there is no reason to believe that the Meme breast implant is not safe.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it would appear that there is systemic sexual discrimination in our health care system. The minister is screwing up his face and saying that is not true, but I would like to ask a question.

When there is a stated health hazard in this country the minister and the health ministry act. On this issue consistently we have asked the minister to withdraw or to stop the use of the Meme.

If the minister is not willing to stop the Meme, is he willing at least to issue information to those who might get the Meme implant that it could possibly be dangerous? If he is concerned about all implants then all implants should have the warning.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, of course I reject the very unfair assertion that was made in the premise of the hon. member's question.

The key issue is this: just because the hon. member makes allegations does not make those allegations correct. The obligation of the Department of National Health and Welfare is to weigh scientific fact. If the hon. member has any scientific facts as opposed to unsubstantiated allegations, let her bring them forward.

I have offered to all members of this House a full briefing by the scientists from health and welfare. I renew that offer to her, and I also invite her again to tender any information she has whatsoever that would suggest there is a lack of safety.

Second, she asks whether or not we are prepared to give information to Canadian women considering breast implants about the safety and effects of breast implants. Yes, we do that today by helping to finance a brochure which gives Canadian women that information.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Chairman of the Standing Committee on the Environment.

The Minister of the Environment told us on Friday that the environmental assessments of all government projects since June 1990 must be filed with the environment committee. This is a good initiative, somewhat surprising though it may be because as a member of that committee this the first time I hear anything about it.

Here is my question, Mr. Speaker. Can the committee chairman confirm that the committee was told about it and when? In addition, can he tell us whether he has received the funds required to do that job?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, to respond briefly, I am aware of the commitment because it was very clearly stated in the Green Plan, as confirmed by the minister the other day. When those preparations are completed, I look forward to receiving these studies. Obviously, if the committee is to do its work effectively in reviewing these important environmental assessments, we may need more assistance because I think this is a very important step in making sure that all of the Green Plan priorities are adhered to.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, it is evident from the reply of the chairman of the committee that he found out about that responsibility at the same time as the rest of us did and that was on Friday when the minister announced it in the House.

My question, therefore, given the chairman's somewhat puzzlement, is for the Acting Prime Minister. Last Wednesday, the Minister for International Trade stated that it would be the height of nonsense to do an environmental assessment of the Mexican free trade agreement. On Friday, the Minister of the Environment flatly contradicted him, saying that it would be done. We have just heard the chairman of the environment committee respond in some wonderment at this infighting among dinosaurs.

My question for the Acting Prime Minister is this. In all of this confusion, who is speaking for the government, the Minister of the Environment or the Minister for International Trade?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. colleague opposite had cared to listen to the comments I made last June it was very clear. This is not something I announced in the House last week. This is something that was made very public last June.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): How come the committee didn't know about it?

Mr. de Cotret: It was made very public—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put a question to the minister and the minister is clearly prepared to respond. I am sure that hon. members would want to hear the minister.

Mr. de Cotret: It was made very clear the days following the cabinet decision to deal with this issue. Those assessments of environmental impact that deal with cabinet documents will be made available to the House committee on the environment, as we stated back then. The commitment stands, it is there and it will be done.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In Saskatchewan last week the Minister of Finance said the $1.3 billion that was added to the agricultural budget for this year had already been committed before the bridge financing, that is being requested by producers, had been met. The Minister of Finance also said that there is no more money.

Does the Minister of Agriculture still promise Canadian farmers that he will find that money for the bridge financing before seeding this spring?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to correct what my hon. friend has said. He obviously received some misleading information or else he would not have repeated that.

What I said in the meetings I had in Saskatchewan, Alberta and also in British Columbia last week was that there is an increase in the budget for agriculture of $1.3 billion next year. There will be a western grains stabilization payment. There will be transition to the new Gross Revenue Insurance Program and transitional costs relating to that. There will also be funds available for the so-called third line of defence, which was the topic of discussion among the agriculture ministers in Saskatoon a little over a week ago.

The final details of that third line of defence are not available at this point because we are still working on the details, but I am sure that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, will be anxious to get that information out as soon as the details are ready.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance said last week, in discussions at the same meeting, that the Canadian Wheat Board deficit could approach $900 million. The western grain stabilization payment is probably going to approach $400 million. The minister just stated that payments for premiums for GRIP will have to come out of that same $1.3 billion. The money is committed, and there is nothing left over if he pays all of those bills to cover bridge financing.

Will the minister stand in his place today and say that, if necessary, he will use government contingency funds to bridge finance producers for this spring?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may try to draw whatever conclusions that he wants.

The facts of the matter are that there is an increase of $1.3 billion in the moneys that will be available for agricultural producers, principally in the grains and oilseeds sector. As I have indicated, as soon as we have precise numbers, the Minister of Agriculture will be getting that information out.

I do want to caution the hon. member on the use of some of the figures that are there, because some of those figures I did not use in my discussions with people in Saskatoon last week.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question to the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation deals with the Corporation's decision to increase by as much as 500 per cent the postal rates for the delivery of regional newspapers.

This major cost increase may jeopardize a number of businesses, because they owe their cost effectiveness to the exclusive sale of commercial advertising. They will have no other choice than to pass this increase on to business people. Last week, two weekly newspapers in my own riding had to lay off 4 employees in order to make up for this increase in their costs.

Could the minister reassure the House and the business community that he will urge the Cabinet to reverse this decision, in view especially of the fact that Canada

Post is already competing unfairly with these newspapers for the delivery of circulars?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the new postal rates my hon. friend is referring to have been in place since March 1st, except those which apply to weekly newspapers. These will only be applied as of June 1, 1991.

This increase in postal rates is the result of a change in the magazine distribution assistance programs. The Department of Communications is currently developing new assistance programs.

May I add that some time next month, representatives of Canada Post corporation will meet those of the weekly publication association to discuss the circular delivery issue.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

Last December, while the minister sat on his hands, the CBC closed 10 regional TV stations and threw 1,100 Canadians out of work. Yesterday, at the CRTC hearings, CBC President Gerard Veilleux revealed that the corporation faces a further shortfall of some $50 million and a further possible loss of 500 to 600 jobs.

I would like to ask the minister why he continues to refuse to meet with the CBC management to discuss these cuts, and why he has abdicated, essentially, all responsibility for the CBC. Can he assure this House that he will not allow future cuts to further emasculate the CBC and throw 500 more people out of work?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, hearings are taking place this week. I imagine we should wait until those are complete before making any further comment to what the CRTC might say.

I might say that back in February, Mr. Watson said that he did not feel the CBC needed more money. He said: "I am, frankly, embarrassed that we cannot manage on $1.4 billion a year. That is a lot of money."

We are all very appreciative of the fine work that the CBC has done through the years. We are deeply supportive of their initiatives, but frankly we should let them manage their own affairs. This is what you would expect us to do, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the pinch hitter for the Minister of Communications.

On the weekend, the Prime Minister promised to save Radio-Canada International, which is also waiting for the axe to fall come April 1. Can the minister confirm that the current funding of $20 million for RCI will be cut in half, and that the 14 languages that are currently broadcast will be reduced to four? Is this the Prime Minister's great promise of saving Radio-Canada International, to only sacrifice half of the 193 employees upon the altar of restraint?

• (1450)

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did indicate on the weekend that the government intends to continue Radio-Canada International service. Details of how this will be done and the budget for the service are now under active consideration.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. On February 8 and on February 15, the hon. minister reiterated her commitment to go ahead with effective gun control legislation. My question is this: When does the minister expect to introduce this legislation in the House of Commons?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward to introducing this legislation in the House soon, in response to the Special Committee report and I hope that the House will continue its work on Bill C-80.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to know exactly when, for we know that if the Tory caucus is divided on this issue, the Canadian people are not. The people concerned are therefore worried and wish to know when the minister will introduce the bill.

[English]

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is a source of great interest to us that even the tiny Bloc Quebecois caucus is occasionally divided on issues as well.

An hon. member: Never together.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, a special committee of this House engaged in a in depth study, not just of C-80, but also the entire package of proposals I put forward on gun control. I received the report February 15. I have now had a chance to review the report and work is under way. I have indicated that Bill C-80 lives; Bill C-80 will be acted on. I am hoping very soon to be able to present to the House my response to the report of the special committee and we can get on with second reading of Bill C-80.

FRIGATE PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. I am informed that the government will be paying about $100 million to the contractor of the frigate program to do the necessary translation of technical manuals.

The government, by using its own translators, could save at least $50 million. Why did the government not insist that its own translators from Secretary of State do the job to save money and to ensure a professional translation?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the cost for doing the translation through the company which was set up by the prime contractor is competitive with the cost of doing translations within government and other areas.

I want to inform the hon. member that it is highly technical work and it seemed sensible to have the person who did the engineering and wrote the book in one language would also do the translation into the second language.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): That is as convoluted a justification as I have ever heard.

Is the minister satisfied that there are sufficient safeguards to ensure that taxpayer's dollars are spent wisely and prudently in this case? Can he explain to Canadians why a contract of such magnitude, even though it is technically a subcontract, was given without public tenders having been called?

An hon. member: I thought you supported the private sector.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): The hon. member will be aware that the contract was given in 1988 to the prime contractor because the prime contractor wrote the manuals for the work he was doing on the frigates. They are highly technical manuals and it seemed sensible to also have him do the translation.

If the member is trying to say that he is against setting up a large translation firm in the Province of New Brunswick, why does he not say so?

HARBOURFRONT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. The people of Toronto are now learning that as part of the government's plan to sell Harbourfront public lands, the Minister of Public Works intends to set up an endowment fund that a reputable accounting firm says is severely underfunded and inadequate, cut a special deal giving real estate developers a $36 million windfall, and sell out Harbourfront's parking facility to private owners.

Will the minister agree today to reverse his position on these three issues before it is too late, and do what is right for the people of metro Toronto and Harbourfront?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): No, Mr. Speaker, we will not reverse the decision that was taken at Harbourfront.

We followed the decision of the royal commission on the future of the Toronto waterfront. In its publication of last summer it stated the following in regard to what the government had accomplished at Harbourfront:

> The royal commission commends all three governments, the Government of Canada for leadership and the province, city and Harbourfront's board of directors for their co-operative support of the federal actions over the past year, and looks forward to the successful resolution of the Harbourfront situation.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I would say that the leadership is somewhat in doubt. The government says its actions are consistent with the McKeough report. Harbourfront's own directors do not agree with the McKeough report, city of Toronto council did not, and metro council wrote to this Parliament just three weeks ago to say that it had not been fully consulted, and objected.

Who is the minister trying to snow here about this agreement? He is not fooling the people of metropolitan Toronto. Why won't he take some action to safeguard Harbourfront's cultural programming and facilities and block this windfall to developers which will come right out of the taxpayers' pocket?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the recommendation of the royal commission was to move planned condominiums—which were put there by the previous government, I might say—off the waterfront. This has been accomplished through negotiations, through the McKeough report, and through the work of Duncan Allan with the provincial government, who was then adviser to the Liberal government who recommended this.

These follow the Liberal recommendations from the province. They support the city of Toronto, who get 40 acres of park handed to them, which has been developed by the federal government following a promise of the Liberal government back in 1973 that it would develop this area and then return it to the people of Toronto. That is exactly what this government has done.

INDUSTRY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister knows that broken federal promises have killed Versatile Pacific and shipbuilding in British Columbia, laying off hundreds of workers who have no guarantees of severance pay, no adjustment compensation or retraining. He also should know that Polish crews are doing repair jobs at Versatile which should be done by Canadians.

Will any federal help be forthcoming to save Versatile since the government cancelled the Polar 8 ice-breaker and has invested literally millions in the past which will be lost?

Will he also look into the protections and benefits for displaced workers who confronted him last week?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): The hon. member should be reminded that since 1985 VPSI has been awarded approximately a quarter of a billion dollars in Government of Canada contracts to begin with. At present this company, as she knows, owned by Shieldings, is experiencing financial difficulties and has sought protection from its creditors. There is over-capacity in this industry; the government has a policy to deal with that. We have asked this company to step forward with a viable plan. They have not done so as yet.

But what we want to do is to see those properties properly used so these people can be employed. The government stands ready with an offer, our offer is still on the table as well as our adjustment programs for the ship workers.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The Canadian Honey Council is concerned that the Minister of Agriculture appears prepared to allow the importation of Hawaiian honey bee queens this spring, even though there is an import ban on U.S. bees until December 31, 1991.

What assurance can the minister give Canadian honey producers that these Hawaiian queens will be free of the varroa mite, tracheal mite and other bee pests?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): I am sure the hon. member is aware that since the closure of the Canadian border to the importation of honey bees for Canadian use as a result of the infestation of the tracheal and varroa mites, it has created a hardship and indeed a difficulty for many beekeepers, particularly in the Peace River district in northern Alberta. They have made strong representations to allow the importation of bees from Hawaii which are not infested with the tracheal and varroa mite. In that connection, we commissioned a group of experts from Agriculture Canada and the Alberta Department of Agriculture, along with other specialists, to go to Hawaii to determine whether it was in fact feasible. They have really found no technical reason for not bringing in honey bees from Hawaii.

• (1500)

We are looking at that and hope that we will be able to put in place the appropriate kind of protocol so that these beekeepers who are faced with having to bring in bees from New Zealand and Australia at considerable expense will be able to be accommodated. It is in that spirit that we are responding to this issue.

I will give the hon. member the assurance that we will ensure that the integrity of the bee population in Canada will be preserved.

POINT OF ORDER

ALLOTTED DAY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I understood that there was a point of privilege, but with respect to my point of order, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said in the House in answer to a question that the motion before the House on supply day was a matter of non-confidence. Ever since the adoption of the McGrath committee report, these motions have not been matters of non-confidence. The language of confidence was taken out of the Standing Orders precisely so that motions of this kind would not be regarded as motions of confidence or non-confidence by either government or opposition.

I call to your attention the day that we unanimously passed a motion, exactly the same kind of motion, having to do with the preservation of South Moresby.

Is the government saying that it should have fallen on that day because we unanimously adopted a motion of this kind? Not so. The same thing applies today. We could adopt this motion unanimously affirming medicare. The government refuses to do that. But do not let them hide behind the Standing Orders.

Point of Order

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there is no attempt to hide behind Standing Orders. There is an attempt to follow the Standing Orders on this side of the House.

An hon. member: Bull.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member should clean up his language a little bit and perhaps do the courtesy of being civil enough to listen.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has risen on a point of order. The hon. government House leader is replying. I know all hon. members would want to give him the courtesy of being able to make his reply.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as you know, allotted days for the business of supply, which is what opposition days are officially called, are a replacement for a previous practice of some years now, back prior to 1969, where in fulfilling the fundamental purpose of Parliament, namely challenging the question of supply, members used to challenge the Appropriations Act, indicating their concern or objection to various items within the Appropriations Act.

For reasons of efficiency or what have you in the House of Commons, those rules were changed in 1969 and the opposition was allotted certain days for which they could put down motions to challenge items in the Appropriations Act which were, by definition, matters of confidence; that is, appropriations by the government goes to the fundamentals of what Parliament is all about.

Supply is what this place is all about.

The hon. member sits in his seat and keeps barking. Why will he not do the courtesy of allowing me to reply to his point of order. He shouts profanities and he shouts from his seat as opposed to listening.

If the hon. member were raising in more temperate tones the concern about whether in fact these motions, in the way they are worded, in fact meet that purpose any longer, I think that would be a valuable discussion.

I would ask him to consider that taking his suggestion, his declaration, at face value will then have in essence removed from the procedures of Parliament the one mechanism wherein Parliament challenges the appropriations government asks of this House. That is the purpose of—

Mr. Blaikie: Why don't you tell the truth. That's not true.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member sits there shouting from his seat. He is—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: As I was attempting to say, in moderate terms, the purpose of this place is the appropriation of supply. The opposition, in challenging that, is fulfilling its role as the loyal opposition in challenging the government. To suggest that we remove totally from our Standing Orders any implication of challenge to supply in these opposition motions on allotted days is a suggestion that goes right to the root of what we are all about. It is certainly worthy of discussion. Things have changed; we have evolved. I would not dismiss arriving at an agreement consistent with the hon. member's view of what that agreement should be, but we have not reached that point. We have not had those discussions. We have not reached that position. When we do, perhaps it would be appropriate to look at the changes that might be made.

In the meantime, this must be viewed by our side as a challenge to supply, to appropriations. We are therefore duty bound to vote against a motion which we absolutely support in terms of its substance. That is the dilemma.

I perhaps could get a little indignant about this tactic, but I think we invented it when we were in opposition, didn't we, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the minister does not want me to answer.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Perhaps the government House leader would simply explain to those Canadians who are viewing and those members of the Chamber why it was that the government of which he is a part did not resign in May 1987 when this Chamber unanimously adopted the motion in my name on South Moresby.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, since I moved the particular motion, I would like to advise the Speaker that it was done with considerable thought, with careful sensitivity, and a commitment to the issue.

I am told that our rules give this government a chance to make a choice, to choose whether this is a confidence motion or a non-confidence motion. If that is so, is it possible that it has chosen it to be a vote of confidence so that it can escape the issue?

The ball is in the hands of the government: it can either support it or not.

Mr. Speaker: We are getting a long way from a point of order. We are getting into debate and that is, after all, what the House is debating today.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will try to stick to the point of order that is before the House.

The fundamental question here is whether or not support of this motion is tantamount to a vote of non-confidence in the government.

My colleague, the government House leader, made it quite clear earlier that this particular type of motion, an opposition day motion, has its genesis in the supply procedure. If the hon. member can be quiet for a minute and listen for 30 seconds, if he looks at the Order Paper for today, Tuesday, March 19, he will see under Government Orders, Supply Proceedings: Consideration of an Opposition Motion. Then it states: "Note: Seventh of nine allotted days and third votable motion for the Supply period". These motions always have been linked to supply.

• (1510)

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, can the hon. member not show a modicum of courtesy to other members in the House and at least listen for a minute?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has raised on a point of order a question which affects the debate that is taking place today and whatever may happen later on in the day. He has said that this ought not to be treated as a motion of confidence.

The hon. government House leader has responded and set out the position of the government. The hon. minister is adding to that and I want to indicate to the House that I think I have been as generous as I ought to be, as Speaker, in letting this discussion go on for as long as it has.

I will hear the minister, and I know that he will not need to keep us very much longer.

Mr. Beatty: No, Mr. Speaker, because the issue is very clear indeed. I will not take much time at all.

Mr. Speaker: My difficulty is that in extending appropriate courtesies I need some indication of which minister wishes to speak. The hon. minister, and I will come back to the hon. House leader in just a moment.

Mr. Beatty: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I will conclude very simply by reiterating the point that on today's Order Paper it is made clear that this motion is intimately connected to the Business of Supply. Since the earliest days of Parliament the traditions have been abundantly clear that a defeat on a supply motion is a defeat of the government. That remains the case today. That was a point that was acknowledged. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona should be aware of the fact that that point was explicitly acknowledged earlier today by the hon. member for Surrey North of his own caucus, speaking on behalf of his caucus. He condemned the Liberal Party for proposing such a motion under the guise of a motion of non-confidence.

That was the case this morning. It is still the case this afternoon.

The members opposite can propose that the traditions in the House be changed, but that should be a subject of negotiation. It certainly does not apply to their simply unilaterally announcing that they have been changed today.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make an offer that indeed, if there is a desire to have this motion voted on, then by unanimous consent we can agree to put down another motion: "This House has lost confidence in the government", an appropriate supply motion for whatever reason and we could have a separate vote on this House supports the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North: "That this House supports Medicare", separate the two, so there is one on the supply question and one on the question of medicare. I am sure we could reach a resolution. I would be pleased to discuss that with House leaders and reach that accommodation if that is the desire.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, this morning when the issue was raised, I accepted the explanation of the minister of health. Since then I have done some checking and found out that there in fact have been some precedents. He said: "Is there any precedent". Of course, my hon. colleague has established that there is a precedent, that in 1987 there was a similar motion that the government ruled was not a motion of non-confidence.

Based on my finding out that there were precedents, I now would like to inform the House that I am in total agreement with my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona, that there is no need for the government to interpret this as a vote of confidence.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, if there is a heaven for parliamentarians, somewhere Eugene Forsey is commenting on this debate. We all know the late respected senator was an expert in the matters of confidence. It was he who came before the special committee on the reform of the House of Commons and made the argument that we needed to find ways in which the House could express itself in ways which were considered not to be matters of confidence or non-confidence.

It was in response to that recommendation, as well as the recommendations of others and the consensus of the committee, that we made recommendations that the language of confidence be taken out of the Standing Orders. That is what I am referring to here today.

I know about the rules in 1969. I know about the origins of opposition days in the mechanism of supply. What I am contending here today and what no one has even acknowledged is that something happened in 1985. What happened in 1985 was that because that language was removed, both opposition parties and the government party were freed up to express themselves on the substance of the matter when it came to opposition day motions. This was to avoid precisely the kind of sheltered arguments that we are getting in this case from the government which sometimes we have got from both opposition parties. The confidence mechanism was used by all parties of this House to hide behind the substance of issues. There is no need for a second motion. I am saying to the government if it wants to reaffirm medicare as it says it does in substance, then let it vote for the motion and we can be done with all this tomfoolery.

I am saying that as of 1985 the government can vote for these kinds of motions and affirm the substance of motions and nothing happens. It just allows the House to express itself. What could possibly be wrong with that.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who has raised this matter has wound up the exchange and has made his position very clear. The question of confidence, of course, lies with the government. The hon. House leader has made the position of the government very clear. He has also put forward a suggestion which he says he is prepared to discuss with hon. members. It seems to me that there is time to have those discussions before the day is over if hon. members wish to do so, but short of that I think we must proceed with orders of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Is this on the same matter?

Mr. Lapierre: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: So this is another matter. Very well. The hon. member for Shefford.

SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTIONS ALLOWED DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order because I would like to hear your interpretation of what happened during Question Period when our New Democratic Party colleagues asked a question about the success or lack of success of Versatile in Vancouver. Subsequently, they asked a supplementary about the honey industry.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether you allowed this question on honey, bees, queen bees and the rest, because of some connection with Versatile. I would like to know what the rules are on supplementary questions, because we know you are very strict about applying the Standing Orders where the Bloc Quebecois is concerned. So I would like to know the connection between Versatile and the honey industry.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I think I can say to the hon. member that I will look at the context in which the question was asked. I would say on the surface if the supplementary should be linked to the principal question, but I wonder if the hon. member would let me look at the matter and I will get back to him. Prima facie the hon. member is correct in his interpretation.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—HEALTH CARE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pagtakhan (p. 18648).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate at one o'clock, the opposition had the floor. I recognize the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain for 10 minutes.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, as I rise today, I feel a deep sense of history. I do not believe, as perhaps the government would assert, that this is a debate about financial realities. This debate is in fact about the nature of our country, Canada.

Great nations of the world are not simply held together by geographic boundaries. Witness the Soviet Union today. Nor are they united, in the final analysis, by words written in a constitution. At the heart of all great nations is a common belief in a set of fundamental principles.

Canadians have developed, through 123 years of history, a mutual understanding of what their country represents. Through their elected representatives they have legislated a social contract. This social contract essentially states that we each look out for not just ourselves, but each other, and that fundamental services in society such as health care should be equal in both quality and accessibility to all Canadians.

This government, I would assert, has set about through its eight years in office to destroy what had taken Canadians the previous 115 years to build: a sense of nationhood. The development of the principles of Canadian nationhood, I believe, can be closely charted alongside the development of our medical care system. How a society cares for its sick, elderly and disabled reflects on its most basic principles.

At the time of Confederation government involvement in health was very small. People relied on their own resources and those of the family. Initially provinces were responsible for the minimal role of government in health care. As Canada developed more as a country and the government began to assert a greater role in health care, the federal role increased substantially.

In 1919, the idea of a national health insurance plan first emerged at a federal Liberal Party convention. In 1959, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act established a national program of hospital insurance. In 1966, the National Medical Care Insurance Act provided for public medical insurance.

The Canadian commitment to its system of medicare has come to be one of the first things Canadians point to in defining what their country stands for. The importance of this cannot be minimized. The cutback in Established Programs Financing grants will radically change the medicare system which in so many ways has come to symbolize the Canadian principles of fairness and equality.

Those on both sides of this House will recall that in the 1988 election both the opponents and proponents of free trade judged the effects of the agreement on Canadian sovereignty in the context of medicare. Although both sides came to a different conclusion about the future of medicare under free trade, each in essence was acknowledging the incredible symbolic nature of medicare to the Canadian identity.

The cuts in EPF transfers between 1990 and 1996 will represent a drop in federal funding of over $40 billion. There can be no question that this will have a serious effect on the Canadian health care system.

At a time when hospital beds are being closed across Canada, I find it impossible to see how this can be justified. The logic behind this is difficult to understand when the aging population, AIDS, drug addiction and other serious illnesses are increasing the burden on the health care system. If the government will not believe me, perhaps it should listen to the following persons directly affected by health care cutbacks. Lionel Savoie, president of the Canadian Medical Association, representing 46,000 doctors across the country, said the following about federal cuts in health care funding:

> The Government of Canada is financially strangling medicare. It has systematically reduced the planned level of federal support for provincial health care five times since 1982. This budget will speed up that process—Health care will suffer, especially those in less affluent provinces.

At the recent task force on the economy in a recession, in Hamilton, David Watts, vice-president of the Hamilton Civic Hospitals, offered the following analysis:

> The province has had to restrict its transfers to the hospitals to the point where we feel that the amount of money received is less than the inflationary requirements to keep things going at the level they were the previous year.

Things have to be shuffled around and priorities have to be reset, and things that we used to do we cannot do.

The last crisis in health care in Canada occurred in the late seventies and early eighties. At that time large numbers of doctors were extra billing patients. In response, in 1984, the Canada Health Act came into being. For every dollar the provinces received in extra billing and hospital user fees, the federal government withheld a dollar in health grants. By 1987 extra billing and user fees disappeared across Canada, as all provinces complied with the Canada Health Act.

Because of cash contributions under EPF, the federal government was able to enforce the basic principles of Canada medicare. With the ever-decreasing cash contributions by the federal government under EPF, this enforcement mechanism will no longer exist.

It is estimated by the National Council of Welfare that federal cash payments to Quebec for medicare and post-secondary education, could be gone in 1996-97. Payments to Ontario could disappear by 2002 or 2003. For the other provinces and territories, they could disappear by 2007 or 2008. How will this government enforce medicare standards then?

The government no longer has the financial clout to enforce national health standards. In the near future the provinces will no longer have the means to provide universal, portable and accessible health care if the government does not reverse its course.

Certain provinces may be able to raise provincial tax revenues to maintain a semblance of medicare, but rest assured that the poorer provinces will end up being left with second-class health care.

As opposition critic for the status of disabled persons, I would like to offer my views on the effects to the disabled community. Disabled Canadians are among the poorest citizens of this country. Approximately 80 per cent of them are unemployed. Of those disabled people fortunate enough to be employed, the majority are ghettoized and underemployed.

In 1986 almost two-thirds of those employed had a total income of less than $10,000. The dependants of disabled persons on social programs such as universal medicare is the highest of all economically disadvantaged groups.

Disabled persons must face the daily challenge of trying to cope with the extra burden of their special care and living needs while in most cases having insufficient resources to make ends meet. It is a fact of life for most disabled Canadians that they are severely constrained financially, a situation that is only marginally alleviated by government programs.

It is also a fact of life that their chances of gainful employment are still very slim. Opening the door to the possibility of user fees or lower quality medical service will severely hurt the disabled community, which can least afford it.

The disintegration of universal medicare will further marginalize and isolate the disabled community. Once again, it will relegate its hopes of economic integration to the back burner.

As members of a society who need medicare the most, the disabled will be the first casualties of federal withdrawal from health care. There can be no question that there are financial challenges involved in maintaining medicare at its current level.

By cutting health care funding, the federal government has turned financial challenges into economic impossibilities. It has made a bad situation into a disaster.

Why did it not examine alternative means to reduce health care spending? Why, when many provinces have begun their own studies into the health care system, has the federal government decided to run away from the problem?

Health care professionals have claimed for years that health care costs can be greatly reduced through prevention. It is estimated that reducing the occurrence of low birth rates even by 1 per cent could save billions of dollars a year.

The point is that there are many other ways of making the health care system more cost efficient without trashing the fundamental principles of medicare. An honest examination of the issues of health care in Canada is needed. We on this side of the House support this. We do not, however, support empty promises and the dismantling of medicare which this government has already begun.

The cuts in federal health care funding attack the most basic principles of equality, caring and fairness that make up the Canadian identity. For the sake of Canadians and Canada, the government must restore health care funding.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, again I listened intensely to the comments of the member about the commitment toward medicare. It is very nice to make, as she called them, empty promises. I think the government has been good at that, but I think the Liberals have even been better at empty promises.

It is all very nice for them to talk about what they should do, but the reality is that when the Liberals were in power and had the right and ability to demonstrate their commitment to medicare, what did they do?

Would the member like to explain what was the commitment to medicare of the previous Liberal finance minister when he put a cap on medicare in 1975? What was the commitment to medicare when the Liberal government in the early eighties $1.2 billion in transfer payments from the provinces, the same amount of money that the federal government is taking this year? What was the demonstrated Liberal commitment to medicare when they started gutting medicare when they had the power to protect it?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Perhaps I may point out that we now have five minutes for questions and answers. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

[English]

Ms. Phinney: Mr. Speaker, I have been here all day and there is something that confuses me. I have heard these gentlemen on the left, and they have been gentlemen today who have been speaking. The member has gone on and on and on all day, commenting on what the Liberals have done with medicare, what he did not like about what the Liberals had done with medicare, and what he thinks they should have done with medicare.

I studied history and, as far as I know, this party on the left has never been in power so it has done nothing about medicare. Instead of continually criticizing what the Liberals have done, it should be glad that we have had a medicare program in Canada for many, many years. It is not perfect and nobody has ever said it is perfect, but it is a medicare plan that people in Canada have felt comfortable with.

Instead of arguing about something they are upset about because they did not do one single thing to get medicare in this country in that they have never been elected federally in this country, they should be protecting the medicare plan and using their energy in a positive way to make the government across the way keep our medicare in a whole unit that will help Canadians, all Canadians.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Maurice. There are two minutes left.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, we just listened with great interest to a lively discussion between two real socialists. The NDP are clearly socialists, but the socialists in the Liberal Party do not always come across as the real thing.

In any case, Monique Bégin, once a member of cabinet under the Liberal government, said after the Budget was brought down that people should ignore the Liberal Opposition her own friends and stop listening to them because what they were saying about the Budget wasn't true. Mrs. Bégin said, the day after the Budget was brought down, that Mr. Wilson's latest budget did not in any way affect our medicare system in this country.

I think the hon. member should listen to this former minister who was part of the Trudeau government. Now that she has retired from the partisan side of political life, she tells us quite clearly: "Don't listen to the Liberal Opposition. They want to scare people". Just like the Liberals scared senior citizens in my riding, in Saint-Maurice, during the last federal election campaign, when they said: If you vote for the Conservatives and free trade, all old age pensions in Saint-Maurice will be scrapped.

The Liberals are using the same kind of scare tactics again, but I think Canadians will ignore them and maintain their confidence in our national medicare system, a system we want to maintain and preserve for the years to come.

[English]

Ms. Phinney: Mr. Speaker somewhere during that little dissertation the hon. member mentioned listening to. I do not know what the government members do when they go back to their ridings. I wonder how many phone calls they get about this budget. I wonder how many people are phoning, wondering what is going to happen if they get sick or if the federal government continues to stop giving grants to the provincial government and there is not enough money for the hospitals.

I cannot believe that they even ever turn up in their constituency offices, and they are still talking the same way about listening. The party people across the floor should be listening to the people of Canada and they would not touch medicare; they would leave it the way it was.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to join in this debate this afternoon.

However, I must point out to the people who are not here in the House but are out in listening land that the motion before us says "This House reaffirms its commitment to medicare". We on this side would dearly like to be able to vote for it. Nonetheless, by a quirk of the rules, it would be considered non-confidence in the government if we were to vote that way. It has been explained earlier, but I just wanted to go on record as restating that position. I will be voting with the government against this motion when the vote is taken at six o'clock this evening.

What I would like to do for the next few minutes is speak about some of the media coverage that we have had over the last few weeks regarding medicare. There certainly has not been any shortage of this media coverage.

Some of the headlines have been: "Strangling of Medicare", "Death of Medicare", "Limit on Transfer Funds Called Medicare Threat", and so on.

This coverage seems to have been prompted by the exercise of expenditure control on federal health transfer payments to the provinces. The limiting of these transfers is part of a broader program of expenditure control that touches virtually all aspects of federal government spending. Transfers to the provinces comprise over 20 per cent of federal government expenditures and cannot be exempted from control. Even with the controls, transfers to the provinces will continue to increase at about 3.7 per cent per year over the next five years, while other government program spending will be limited to a growth of 3.4 per cent.

The recent media coverage tells us a lot about what Canadians feel and think about this country and about their world-class health care system. I would like to give my interpretation of what we have seen in the press.

First, it tells me that Canadians love medicare. Our universal, publicly financed health care system is part of a value system of this country. Second, it tells me that Canadians see the federal government as the guardian of medicare. They want the government to retain its ability to enforce the Canada Health Act. Third, it tells me that many Canadians still link dollars to health. They assume that the system is underfunded and that if we only spent more all our health problems would be solved.

These are strong messages, and I would like to explore them a little more in detail.

This country has embarked upon an historical debate about national unity. Canadians across the country are assessing what it means to be a Canadian. It is clear to me that our beliefs about health care play a fundamental role in defining us as Canadians. Medicare is a central component of Canadian culture. Ask any Canadian what he or she values about this country, what makes this country a good place to live, and I know that in almost all circumstances they will say: "Our medicare system".

Canadians also believe that the federal government must play a strong role in our health care system. They look to the federal government as the guardian of medicare. This government accepts this role and is comfortable in it. This government stands by the principles of the Canada Health Act which are: universality, accessibility, comprehensiveness, portability, and public administration.

This legislation has not been amended since it was passed into law with the unanimous support of this House almost seven years ago. The government has announced that it will be taking action to ensure that it has the means to enforce the act. The Minister of Finance made this clear in his budget last month, when he said in The Budget Papers:

> The federal government will be amending the Fiscal Arrangements Act so that, if necessary, other cash transfers to provinces could be withheld for purposes of enforcement. The conditions and criteria governing medicare will not change. Indeed, this action will strengthen the government's ability to uphold the conditions and criteria which govern the national medicare system.

That is a pretty straightforward statement made on behalf of the government by the finance minister, and there is no room for misinterpretation.

The federal government has this guardian role, but its involvement extends well beyond this. The federal government is a partner in health. This partnership role is manifested in many ways. The federal government is a partner in financing health care.

Under Established Programs Financing, the government will be contributing about $14.5 billion in 1991–92 for health, over $13 billion for insured hospital and medical services, and $1.5 billion for extended health care services. These amounts are substantial and clearly indicate the government's commitment to health care.

• (1540)

Another example of federal partnerships is in combating tobacco use. Our national strategy is a comprehensive, co-operative, integrated effort to combat tobacco use. It brings together health officials of federal, provincial, territorial governments and eight national voluntary public health organizations. These organizations are the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health, the Canadian Lung Association, the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Nurses Association, the Canadian Public Health Association, the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada and Physicians for a Smoke-free Canada.

The strategy has three goals. The first is prevention, to help non-smokers stay smoke free. The second is cessation, to encourage and help people to quit smoking. The third goal is protection, to protect the health and rights of non-smokers.

This approach is bearing fruit. Since 1986 per capita tobacco consumption has fallen by 24 per cent. The annual decline in tobacco consumption was 7.6 per cent. This was the largest decline ever recorded and it looks like the numbers for 1990 will be even better. The tax increases announced in the latest budget should reduce the number of teenage smokers by 100,000.

The government is also a partner in the national drug strategy. The strategy was launched in May 1987 with the objective to reduce the harm to individuals, families and communities from the abuse of drugs through a balanced approach. Activities and programs to fight drug abuse are undertaken in partnership with the provinces for treatment and rehabilitation, with community based groups for education and prevention programs, with universities for research and with business through corporate sponsorship of prevention programs.

AIDS is another area where the federal government is a strong partner. The national strategy was announced on June 28, 1990, and involves partnerships in five major program areas: in education and prevention; in biomedical initiatives; in care, treatment and support; in support to non-governmental organizations; and in co-ordination and collaboration with a wide range of partners in Canada and around the world.

The government is also involved in partnerships in health and the environment. The health and the environment component of the Green Plan was developed through nation-wide consultations with individuals, communities and organizations. The partnerships developed through the Green Plan consultations include native people in addressing native health and environmental issues; communities; and international organizations such as the World Health Organization high level mission on health and the environment, OECD technology and environment program, and international program on chemical safety.

It is easy to see why many Canadians would feel that health care is threatened if it does not get ever increasing funds. It seems that there can never be enough resources where your own health or the health of your loved ones are concerned.

But as a society, we have to be objective about how much we spend on health, at least as objective as we can be.

Canada is the highest spending nation of all countries with a publicly-financed health care system, $56.1 billion or 8.9 per cent of the GNP in 1989. Spending on health care is one of the fastest growing areas. Canadians are among the healthiest in the world, but increases in health spending have not produced commensurate increases in health status. The gap in life expectancy between the richest and poorest Canadians is almost two years for women and five and a half for men. This gap increases significantly if disability is factored in.

Other nations spend less and have better health status. Japan spends 6.8 per cent of GNP and has lower infant mortality rates: 5 per 1,000 live births versus 7.9 for Canada. Resources are finite; every dollar that is spent on health care has an opportunity cost. It is a dollar not spent on education, accident reduction programs or reducing illiteracy. There may be other areas where benefits, in terms of health status of the population, might well be higher.

Tough choices have to be made and they are not going to get any easier. As we learn more about the the determinants of health status, we will have to consider a broader range of allocative choices. There are other factors that affect the well-being of populations beyond health care and public health measures like education, environment and poverty.

Most of the recent provincial task forces and commissions that have examined the health system have recognized, once again, that health is not just health care.

More money is not the answer. A consensus is emerging on this, but clearly we have a distance to go. It is important that we build on this consensus. We have to challenge ourselves not to spend more but to spend better. In the end we are all seeking the same goal: a better and more equitable distribution of health status for all Canadians.

I welcome the opportunity of speaking to this motion today.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague and my friend from Fraser Valley East for the very thoughtful presentation he made to the House. I am wondering if he would allow me to ask him several questions with respect to the comments that he just made.

Let me list those in order of importance. The question that I get constantly as I travel through my riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon, where there are several hospitals and many senior citizen complexes, concerns most senior citizens. They worry about their personal safety and the delivery of adequate health care which they have come to expect from other governments in this country.

As a first question, I would like to ask my friend if he could unequivocally state to the seniors, not only in Thunder Bay—Nipigon but the seniors throughout this country, the question that comes to me on almost a weekly basis when I have the opportunity to get back to Thunder Bay—Nipigon, whether this government is going to do anything to jeopardize the delivery of health care services to seniors?

As we know, these people all live on pensions and they are sometimes in very frugal surroundings. They are concerned about the application of user fees in this country. They are concerned about having to go to a doctor and having to pay a fee. They are concerned about the availability of drugs which are getting very expensive. They are concerned about the user fee or a deductible portion that they are going to pay.

I would like my hon. friend, who has just given this fine treatise on his government's plans for the medical system in Canada, to assure the seniors in my riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon, but also assure all the seniors throughout the country, that this in fact is not going to be a program that his government will entertain during its term of office.

The second and perhaps equally important issue that my friend alluded to in his remarks is that medicare has come to be one of those very important services that this government provides to all its citizens and one of the factors that unify this country.

I am certainly glad that the former minister of health is in the House. I am concerned that when we talk about what is going on constitutionally in this country, that we are going to separate the powers, that we are going to stop being a federal state, that it is contemplated to give so many more powers to the provinces. I am concerned about this fundamental right that all of our Canadian citizens, especially those who are approaching the senior level, have to the availability of medical care and drug care that we have come to expect.

I am sure my colleague, who is such a thoughtful man, has put his mind to this. What happens if we become something less than a federal state? What happens to our medical system, our plans and what we have come to expect in this country? What happens to this very important facet of our daily lives should we become something less than the federal state, such as is being proposed in our country today?

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend opposite for his questions.

We have to think of what sort of controls are in the medical system now to prevent people abusing the emergency wards? It is strange that we should find that emergency wards in our hospitals are far more widely used on the weekends. I remember the hospital at home when B.C was the last province to stop user fees.

B.C. had user fees in the system. In 1983 when the Canada Health Act was brought in, it said that user fees could not be used. If a province had user fees, it was penalized by the amount of money charged, which was held in trust for a certain amount of time. That money was lost if it did not stop charging user fees.

It was strange that as soon as the user fees were stopped, the use of in the emergency ward in the hospital at home went up dramatically in the following month. It was really strange that there should be a correlation between the user fees and that.

It was also asked by people in the British Columbia government whether we would consider bringing user fees back in. I said to them: "If you would bring that forward to the federal government through your health ministers' meetings and had a significant number of health ministers requesting it, then we would seriously look at it. Unless that was to come with a very strong mandate from a number of provinces, then we would not look at it."

The hon. member asked about whether or not we are committed to the delivery of services. Yes, we are. The hon. member can assure his seniors that we are as committed to it today as when it was brought in so many years ago.

What is going to happen if our country splits up? I hope our country does not split up, and I am doing everything I can to ensure that it does not. I am glad to see that the majority of people in this House do not want to see our country split up. We have representatives on both sides of the House, and there is only a very small minority who want to see a different arrangement of Canada than the Confederation that we now have.

I am still an optimist about our country. I still have faith that we will continue to be the dominion of Canada from sea to sea and that the health system we have grown accustomed to and which the whole population expects to be delivered by our senior levels of government will continue to be so.

One thing that is not widely known or understood is that when the federal government reduces any of its payments in the Established Programs Financing, there are tax credits which are given to the provinces so that they can pick up the slack. The amount of dollars that the province will have to use will still be the same amount.

Many people say that we are cutting down on medicare. Nonetheless, we have frozen the dollars on the EPF—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I want to recognize another member who wants a question or comment.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for his speech.

There is a report published today which states: "One in four report lengthy delays in health care." It goes on to state, for example, that of the 25 per cent who reported problems getting treatment; 12 per cent waited longer than four weeks.

I for one understand the fact that it is not necessarily always a question of funding or more money towards programs. Sometimes it is a question of efficiency.

I was just wondering if the member can tell us what ways or means he has in mind to increase the efficiency of our health care system.

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very good question. I am not sure sufficient work is being done on how we might improve the system. Have we really gone out and brought to bear all of the minds that are in our health care system to see how they can improve it?

I know that when a patient goes in to see his doctor for a check-up, the doctor has a little check off pad for the various tests he wants. He can check every one off. Whether all are necessary or not, I do not know, I am not a medical doctor. But really, is anybody looking over his shoulder to see how many of those tests were necessary for the general health of that patient?

I am sure there are many, many cases across our country, from coast to coast, of things being performed that are not necessary for the health and well-being of the patient.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance announced in last month's budget that the freeze on the EPF, that is the Established Programs Financing, would extend to the fiscal year 1994-1995. As all members in the House know, these entitlements cover payments to the provinces for health and post-secondary education.

I am the critic for youth for the Liberal Party and as such I want to mention of how these cuts in medicare are going to affect the young people of our country.

Some years ago the Liberal Party put its caring stamp, as I call it, on the nation by bring in the universality of social programs. The minister of external affairs who was here today, mentioned Lester B. Pearson in his speech a few days ago, when he was talking about the peace process in the gulf. Well, Lester B. Pearson—I call him the man of peace—whose work did lead to a Nobel Peace Prize, brought us medicare and the Canada Assistance Plan as well as bringing us great renown because of his work for peace.

The programs he brought in followed those which were brought in by Mr. Mackenzie King; old age pensions; family allowances and unemployment insurance.

The viability of these programs is now in jeopardy, due to a succession of brutal budget cuts by the Mulroney administration. We generally tend to think of medicare as a program for older Canadians. But as I look at the frightening statistics and the ravages of AIDS on our youth, I become more convinced that our commitment to health programs must be greater, not smaller and surely, not endangered by lack of funds.

I recall 25 years ago when the thalidomide babies first came to our attention. The plight of our young thalidomide Canadians must be adequately remembered, considered and finally, I believe, they must be compensated by this government very soon. They cannot wait much longer.

From the period 1986 to 1996, the government's cuts to the EPF payments will reach $40 billion. A cutback of this magnitude is unprecedented in the history of federal-provincial relations. To compensate for the loss of federal support, the provinces and the municipalities are either going to have to increase taxes or cut services. Given the priority nature of health care, as well as that of welfare support and quality education, tax increases at the provincial levels are an inevitable result of federal buck passing. Statistics released yesterday indicate that by the end of this century, and that is only a few short years away, there will be 10 million orphans in the world due to the ravages of AIDS. Unfortunately, Canada will not be spared its share of this terrifying statistic.

It is tragic for a child to die of AIDS, but even more tragic and heart-wrenching is the discovery by a mother that she, too, may soon die knowing that she has infected her baby and is leaving her other children as orphans.

In 1993 more than 7,000 people with HIV infection in Canada will have progressed AIDS. Canada has one of the highest rates of infection in the developed world and the epidemic has spread rapidly. It is estimated by the Canadian Public Health Association that 50,000 Canadians are now infected with HIV.

Several organizations work at preventing and informing the public about the dangers of the infection, but until a cure is found, and we are going to need money for that in research and development, it is our responsibility to care for the sick. The Canadian Institute of Child Health states that: "Canadian children's health is poorer than other western nations in the mid-1980s". In the mid-1980s the infant mortality rate was higher in Canada, that is 7.9 per 1,000 live births, than in Japan which had 6.0 per 1,000 live births, and several other western nations. This rate is traditionally regarded as an indication of the health status of children in this society.

Canada's death rate from all causes for school-age children was higher than that of Sweden, the Netherlands, Japan, Germany and England. This is just not acceptable to the people of Canada. The Canadian experience is even worse for deaths due to injury. At 13 deaths per 100,000, school-age children in Canada die more often from injury than children in eight other western developed nations.

Canada's death rate from all causes for teenagers is nearly double the rate for the Netherlands. We even see inequalities among the children of Canada. Infant mortality rates are more than 1.5 times higher in Saskatchewan and Newfoundland than in Ontario and Quebec. In 1986 death rates for poor children were 56 per cent higher than for higher income children and this rate of 56 per cent is doubled again among our native infants. That is not acceptable.

This government is playing Russian roulette with our nation's health system. Perhaps the intention is not to kill medicare. As the hon. member who just spoke said, it is not the intention of this government to kill medicare, but the Minister of Finance must stop this relentless pursuit of budget control through cuts to our social programs. It just does not make sense. It is a fallacy to say that Canada's social programs are responsible for the deficit. They are not. That would lead to another whole debate as to why we are in the economic predicament we are in but it is not because of our social programs.

Our medicare program was at one time the envy of many countries around the world. In fact most Americans would abandon their health care system and join one like ours if they could, that is the system as we knew it before, as it was implemented by the Liberals during the Pearson administration. There have been too many horror stories in the last few years, stories of long waiting lists. One in four is said to be now waiting for surgery, as my colleague pointed out a few minutes ago. There is postponed surgery, overcrowded emergency facilities and perhaps saddest of all is the total lack of adequate programs and care for Canadians of all ages who suffer due to mental illnesses.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is almost up. I would have wanted to delve into the problem of mental illnesses and how we care for our people, but perhaps that will come in another debate.

We in the Liberal Party have a strong commitment to Canada's medicare program. We fear that the lack of interest from this government might lead us into expensive private plans to which only a small percentage of Canadians would have access. Our interest in social programs remains one based on universality. That means that we are all equal and we should at least have equal medical care in this very rich and prosperous country.

I would say to the minister and to all of my colleagues who would think otherwise: Keep your hands off of our medicare system. It is one for which we have worked very hard and one which is surely worth preserving for our children and our children's children.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): I listened with great interest, as I always do when my hon. friend from Welland speaks. He did leave me a little bit confused on one point and I would like to put a very specific question to him in that regard, and I am sure that his answer will be as specific as my question.

I heard him very clearly say that we should be spending more in provincial transfers. I must say I know that if we were able to do that we would very much ingratiate ourselves with the government of my province, the government of Nova Scotia. I notice in the budget this year that the government is indeed increasing EPF payments by 3.7 per cent while limiting its own growth to 3.4 per cent.

Therefore, my question to my hon. friend is: Would he specifically tell us which programs of the government he would cut in order to make available the additional moneys that he thinks should be applied to health care.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, I do thank my hon. friend from South Shore for his question. He said that they were going to increase the payments by 3.7 per cent. If it is true that inflation this year is going to be, I believe, well over 6 per cent and possibly 7 per cent, I think that what we would have there is not an increase but a decrease because they are not even keeping up with inflation.

But the question was very specific and very fair, and I imagine it comes down to priorities. The hon. member asked for an opinion from me, and I could tell him that my priorities would be to put our moneys into our social programs rather than into defence spending. I think it is much more important to save lives and to take care of Canadians than to have all of the weaponry which would be destructive, not only to Canadians but to other people.

And that is a specific suggestion to a very specific question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Is that Liberal Party policy?

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): I would be happy, Mr. Speaker, to begin by answering the hon. minister's question except I did not hear it, so he can wait and ask me in the proper way at the end.

I am delighted to stand and speak in support of the motion by my hon. colleague, the member for Winnipeg North, that this House reaffirm its commitment to medicare, and that we reaffirm this commitment not by idle words, not by pious mouthings, but by putting some money where those pious mouthings are.

Another friend of mine, the hon. member for South Shore, got up and talked about how Liberal policies would gladden the hearts of his own government—my government, too, —in Nova Scotia, and I want to talk a little bit about what this government policy is doing in the province of Nova Scotia. Today a headline in the Halifax Chronicle Herald states: "Cuts in federal payments put medicare system in danger". I quote: "Medicare is something most Canadians take for granted but shouldn't. It may not be with us much longer".

This article goes on to tell us about the cuts, which my friends on the other side keep saying are not cuts, that Bill C-69 freezes transfer payments to the provinces for health and education at the 1989-90 until 1995. Given the inflation rate and given the way this country is developing, that is a cut. And a cut is a cut is a cut.

These observations are not coming from partisan politicians. They are coming from the Canadian Medical Association and the director of government relations for that august body. He says that the CMA's concern is the impact that this freeze on transfer payments will have on the quality and accessibility of health in the country as a whole, but in particular, in the Atlantic region.

It is the same old story. If it hurts anywhere in Canada, and my friend from South Shore knows this and knows it well, it is going to hurt even more in the Atlantic region.

Since the inception of medicare in 1965, Canadians have had a tremendous boon and a tremendous gift. They have not had to worry. They have not had to worry about paying for their health care and the health care of their children. This was brought home to me in a very significant way in the late 1960s.

In 1967 a very close friend of mine, who was a student in university, married an American student and they went back to the United States for two years. During that two-year period they had one daughter. They came back to Canada in 1970 to resume their university careers in Halifax. They were barely in the country a week when their daughter contracted pneumonia and had to be hospitalized. Because my friend had been out of the country for two years, she had to be back in the province for three months before being covered by medicare.

I remember very well two very frightened, very young parents with a very sick baby. Every one of us I think can empathize with that situation. Certainly my colleague from Winnipeg North as a paediatrician has seen that many times and the fear, the stress and the anguish of parents in that situation. Added to my friend's fear, stress and anguish was there they were living on the money they had managed to save for two years, living with a small amount of student loan, the fact that both of them had part-time jobs and they were going to be faced with an horrendous medical bill for their child's health care because they had fallen through one of the cracks, a crack that we need to have I suppose. I understand the situation. It certainly brings forward how crucial, how important medicare in its original state is to the health and well-being of this country as a whole.

I remember another evening, shortly after I was elected, spending some time after a committee with two of my colleagues, the member for Willowdale and the member for Dartmouth. We each started talking about the reasons that we had such a strong commitment to social programs in this country. It turned out that each one of us had a story about what it was like in our families to suffer incredible medical bills and the incredible insecurity vis-à-vis the cost of health care in pre-medicare Canada.

Every one of us in the House can delve back into our families and find a story that relates to those that I have mentioned here today. Every one of us is committed, at least to the principle of medicare, but we need more today than just the principles.

I have heard over and over again, I heard it today in Question Period, I have heard it ever since this budget came out, that there is not really a cut taking place because the federal government is transferring tax points to the provinces. Well, maybe that works in B.C. Maybe it works in the hon. minister's province of Manitoba, although I am sure my colleague from Winnipeg North will have something to say abut that. Maybe it works in Alberta and Ontario. As the hon. member from South Shore will have to agree, it does not work in Nova Scotia.

You could transfer tax points until the cows come home, and if you have an economy that cannot support that kind of a tax base, that does not engender that kind of a tax base, all the tax points in the world are just points on paper. They are not dollars for medical care, and they are not going to assist in the payment of medical care for Nova Scotians. They are not going to give any sense of security to the people in my province who woke up this morning and read in their newspapers that cuts in federal payments put the medicare system in danger.

Mr. Geekie from the Canadian Medical Association said that what provinces decide to do is going to be on an individual basis. But the very fact that the cuts are taking place is going to pretty well erode or eliminate national standards or criteria from health care.

We live in perilous times for this country. Every one of us in this House at some point, at many points during our day, thinks about the country. We think about the future of the country, and we think about what Canada means to us. I was 17 years old when medicare came in. One of the things that makes me intensely, emotionally proud to be a Canadian is medicare, is the universality of that program, is the fact that at least on a regional basis—not perhaps in every community because of our geography and our small population, and so on—there can be access to a reasonably high standard of medical care in this country.

If this devolves on to the provinces, particularly the have not provinces, that concept is dead. It is gone. It will mean that if you live in Atlantic Canada, or if you live in northern Canada, or northern Ontario, or parts of Quebec, or parts of the western provinces, you will not have the access to the same level of medical care as if you lived in downtown Toronto, downtown Montreal, downtown Vancouver. That is simply un-Canadian and that is simply unacceptable.

Every one of us is concerned about the deficit. Every one of us is concerned about balancing our budget, about paying our way, and about making sure that this country survives fiscally as well as constitutionally and spiritually. We cannot do it by cutting out the heart of our nation's belief, the heart of our nation's existence, and that is by cutting out the heart of those programs that Canadians have come to rely on, that they swear by, that they are sending a message to each and every one of us here in this House to maintain. The jewel in that crown is medicare.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I compliment my hon. friend for Halifax. I listened with great interest to her remarks, but she did say one or two things that I wanted to question.

The hon. member said that medicare should stay exactly the same as it was when it first came back—and it could not be too many years ago if my hon. friend was 17 then—and I am tempted to ask her if she is suggesting that all aspects of the medical system should remain the same as they were then, but I am sure she would not mean that.

My question to the hon. member is with respect to the existence of medicare. In particular, I refer to our own province. I think the Minister of Health in our province would be delighted to infer from my hon. friend's remarks that she feels the medical system and the health system in our province cannot be improved upon. My question is: is she completely satisfied that no improvements in cost effectiveness can be made in the health care system in Nova Scotia?

• (1620)

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for South Shore for his question. I suggest that he remove some of the Hubbard sand from his ears.

I did not for one instance suggest that the medical care system in this country could not be improved upon, nor did I for a moment suggest that—

Mr. McCreath: I heard what you said.

Ms. Clancy: The hon. member clearly misheard. What I said was that it must not be diminished or retrenched from. Improved, definitely.

I refer in particular to a study going on right now in the health and welfare committee where we are looking at and will be reporting on in due time ways to improve the delivery of health care systems in this country. There is absolutely no question that there are myriad ways to improve the health care system. There are myriad ways to make it more cost effective, unquestionably.

One thing we know is that there is a very high level of satisfaction with medicare in this country by Canadians. We also know that our costs on a per capita basis are not as high as those of our neighbours to the south. We therefore can extrapolate from that and from various other empirical data that we have received in the committee that, for example, a user-pay system is not the answer to the cost overruns in medicare today.

I would invite the hon. member, as I am sure he will, to read the report when it comes out and perhaps even to go to the committee Hansard and read some of the testimony. We have heard from some fascinating witnesses at that committee.

One thing that particularly interested me was the whole question of standardizing communication and management administration of the medical care system through computers and the fact that computerization is still something relatively foreign to medical practice and hospital administration in this country.

I will refer to a perfect example of this. I was speaking to a specialist in Halifax not too long ago. He told me that a patient came to him with a particular problem, but the hospital of first instance in another part of the region had neglected to send the patient's x-rays. Because it was a situation that could be urgent depending on what was going on, the doctor in Halifax ordered new x-rays, doubling the cost. If that man's x-ray package had been sent with him, there would have been one form of money saved.

I am also told that there are communication systems that can be set up where reports of that nature, pictures, and so on can be sent on an electronic or computerized system.

What I am saying is that we may have to look at tremendously innovative ways of reducing the cost of the health care system, but let us not look at that reduction by reducing quality and standard of care to Canadians or by reducing the absolutely imperative standard of universality.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On debate. The hon. member for Saint-Maurice has the floor.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian peole following this debate on our health care system must be wondering. Since this morning, we have been hearing opposition members paint an overly bleak and pessimistic picture of health care in Canada. Yet, when we leave that kind of planet away from earth, get out of Parliament and take a look at the situation in the field, with both feet well on the ground, as we say in Quebec, we realize that it is quite different.

The Canadian people who pay their income taxes each year know how expensive the Canadian health care system is. And I think it is normal to want to afford the Canadian people the best health care services in the world. However, we must remember that all that costs money. If we were to implement all the good ideas the Liberal and NDP members have come up with up to now—I am not mentioning the members of the Bloc Quebecois, Mr. Speaker, because they did not show more than one quarter of one hundredth of one per cent of interest in this very important debate on the universality of health care in Canada—we would have to double, triple and even quadruple the income taxes collected across Canada to finance their projects.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people have to know that, in 1991, their health care system will cost them the tidy amount of, not $60 million, but $60 billion. This is no big thing, of course, only the largest amount ever spent on health care in Canada's history. Yet, when listening to the Liberal and NDP members, one gets the impression that almost all hospitals in Canada are closed, that there are no old folks homes left and no community health care services in the various provinces of Canada.

That is far from the truth though. The health care system in Canada got gradually better over the past few years. The provincial governments as well as the federal government invested billions and billions of dollars to finally reach that $60 billion we will be spending this year, that is to say $2,500 per capita. This means that the health care system is costing $2,500 per capita to the taxpayer, and heaven knows we have a lot of taxes to pay in this country.

I think that the Canadian people are nevertheless entitled to one thing—and the big difference between our philosophy and that of the opposition members is that we learned to be realistic.

The members on this side of the House have learned to say: Considering the present state of government finance, considering the current national debt, the major part of which was created by the successive Liberal governments in the 1960s and 1970s, considering this extremely difficult situation we are in today, this is no time to increase government budgets, whether at the municipal, provincial or federal level. I suggest we have reached a crucial point where we must master the art of managing whatever money we have and ensuring that the $60 billion that health care will cost in Canada in 1991 will be used in the most efficient way possible instead of just investing more and more money in the system. As I see it, Mr. Speaker, the key element of our present situation is to know how to use the funds available to deliver the world's best health care system to the Canadian people.

I say this because it is a very important question. But there is one thing that Canadians have to know, something which Liberals are wont to forget: the federal government is not responsible for the management of hospitals and health centres throughout the country. That responsibility belongs to each and every provincial government. Earlier I heard the hon. member from Nova Scotia blame the federal government for the long hospital waiting lists in her province, as in other provinces indeed. That is not a federal responsibility. The federal government has invested a lot of money in terms of transfers for medicare.

The main question now, Mr. Speaker, is what are we going to do to ensure that the $60 billion expended each year for health care throughout Canada are put to good use. That is the direct responsibility of the provinces. Let us take just one example. Go anywhere in Canada, in Quebec, in other provinces or in the Territories and you will see for yourself that a considerable number of hospital beds in this country are occupied by senior citizens, people aged 65 or over. And as everyone knows, in the health sector if a chronically-ill elderly person has to lie in a hospital bed this represents almost prohibitive social cost charges against the budgets of health ministries in the various provinces. That is the prevailing situation in all regions of Canada.

• (1630)

Mr. Speaker, instead of investing this money in keeping senior citizens in hospitals at a prohibitive cost, we should look for alternative solutions and try to provide accommodation for senior citizens that puts less pressure on our health care resources.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention another phenomenon in this country: when Canadians go to the hospital, they tend to stay longer than patients in other industrialized countries I am thinking of France, Great Britain, United States, The Netherlands, Sweden, Finland and Norway. Now, I don't suppose Canadians are sicker than the Swedes, the Finns or the Norwegians. But I do think that we have a very serious problem here in our health care system. Why should Canadians, given the same standard of medical care, stay in hospital longer than people in other industrialized countries?

Mr. Speaker, I think we should remember that the provinces are responsible for running our hospitals and are therefore responsible for admitting and releasing patients. The provincial governments should take a long, hard look at this situation.

Mr. Speaker, in Canada our health care system costs $2,500 per capita. Today, in 1991, 57,000 physicians are being paid by taxpayers to look after the health of Canadians. We have a quarter of a million nurses who provide care in our hospitals. However, Mr. Speaker, despite the billions of dollars invested in this sector, the federal government has very little control over the money it gives to the provinces, because it just hands over the money and the provinces apply the national policy adopted by previous governments—despite all that, we still have a higher infant mortality rate than other countries.

What does this mean? Here in Canada we spend more money than any other country in the world with a comparable medicare system, in terms of our Gross National Product. We spend more money than Sweden, Norway, Finland, France, Great Britain all countries with a national system. We spend more per capita in terms of our Gross National Product than all these countries.

Although our national health care system, which is in good shape, has a number of shortcomings, it is the provinces who are responsible for doing something about those shortcomings. It is high time, Mr. Speaker, that the NDP and the Liberals stopped blaming the federal government, because the provinces are responsible for doing something about this. That is the crux of the matter. That is what we have to consider if we want to do something about the health care system in this country.

There is also something else, something very important that Canadians must realize. Since we started the debate this morning with the hon. member for Winnipeg North, the Liberals kept saying it was the end of our medicare system in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that there is not another country in the world that spends as much money as Canada does in this area. What more do the Liberals and the New Democrats want? There is enough money in the system, but the problem is that we have to improve the way we use the resources at our disposal.

There is another tactic the Liberals are using to get their message across, Mr. Speaker. The formal federal Minister of Health, Ms. Monique Bégin, said the day after the Budget was brought down: "Now listen, I am no longer in politics so I am not going to approach this in a partisan way". Ms. Bégin, well known for her radical position on health care and her emphasis on universality and former Liberal minister in the Trudeau government, told Canadians: "Listen, don't worry, stop listening to what the Liberals, my former colleagues, are saying; stop listening to those people. The present government is introducing budgetary restrictions, that is clear, but it will have no impact on our national medicare system". That is what Ms. Bégin said. Is there anyone more qualified and more competent on the Liberal side than Monique Bégin, who was a minister? She said, without a hint of partisan politics, to stop scaring people.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention a few other scare tactics indulged in by Liberals and New Democrats in the riding of Saint-Maurice during the campaign leading up to the election on November 21, 1988.

At the time, the NDP candidate and the candidate for the Liberal Party of Canada were walking around the riding in Shawinigan, and they went to the senior citizens clubs and told them—I remember they wrote about it in the papers: "If you vote for the Conservatives in the next election, you will lose your federal old age pension". The Liberals and the New Democrats said this in my riding. They said it in the riding of Champlain, in Trois-Rivières, in Richelieu—Yamaska and in all the ridings in the heartland of Quebec.

And today, they want to scare senior citizens again, people who are more vulnerable than the average Canadian, by telling them: Watch out for the Conservatives! They are going to abolish medicare.

Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the senior citizens in my riding that we, as a government, will continue to respect their heritage and the country they worked so hard to build. Canada is my country, I have always said so and I always will, and the senior citizens in my riding may rest assured that the Progressive Conservative Government of Canada will continue to ensure they receive the best possible care for many years. We will keep up the good work in this area.

However, I also want to say this to my senior citizens—and Opposition members may wish to consider this—that we have a problem in Canada, in all the provinces including Quebec, Ontario, the West and the Maritimes, and whether we happen to be separatists in Quebec or federalists, the problem is the same. Mr. Speaker, senior citizens, as you may know, take far too much medication. This is a serious problem. We must take a long hard look at over-medication among senior citizens and take steps to remedy this social problem. There is a whole range of measures that can be taken by the provincial governments.

The Government of Quebec—I realize I am not supposed to say the members of the Bloc Quebecois are not in the House, Mr. Speaker, but I think you can draw your own conclusions regarding their absence here in the House. Mr. Speaker, members—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but I must remind the hon. member that we have a tradition in this house not to allude to absences. There are 30 parliamentary committees currently sitting and people who are listening to us now must know that hon. members have also much work to do in those committees. I recognize again the hon. member for Saint-Maurice.

Mr. Pronovost: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since we are not allowed to mention the absence or presence of other members, I will tell you that Bloc québécois members in Ottawa do not even have secretaries in their offices. When you phone them, you end up talking to answering machines. So much for those people who, supposedly, are in Ottawa to protect Quebec interests. We will probably have an opportunity later to talk about this.

I would like to conclude by saying that it is very important, in a debate such as this, to tell Canadians that our difficult financial situation is due to previous governments. The problem will not be solved in a matter of one, two or even five years. It is quite impossible with a national debt such as ours. But despite the enormous pressures that the national debt puts on our budget, our government is committed to providing the same health services to Canadian citizens across the country.

What we have to do, Mr. Speaker, and I want to invite my Liberal colleagues, particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North, to think about that, is to allocate these funds in a way that would be more efficient and forward-looking. That would allow us to provide the best service that Canadian men and women can expect from the Parliament of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I certainly compliment the member on his debating points. I would like to make a very short comment and then pose two simple questions.

When he indicated that no other country spends more for health and welfare, I think it has to be recorded that while Canada spends about 8.5 per cent of its Gross National Product on health care, the United States spends more. We have a far better health care system and therefore we must preserve it. In terms of the need for other programs to make our system more productive and cost efficient, my colleague from Halifax and I this morning alluded to that. In fact, we are prepared to offer those initiatives to you and we have mentioned some.

• (1640)

My two questions are: I would like to ask this member if he and his government are considering the application or implementation of user fees?

Second, what legislation is intended to help enforce the principles of medicare that now do not exist in the current Canada Health Act?

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North for his comments concerning the speech I have just made.

I should like, however, to correct his first statement. I indicated a while ago quite clearly that among the countries of the world with a health care system Canada spent the most per capita for health care services as a proportion to its GNP. I insisted twice on that fact. So the hon. member is quite right to say that the Americans spend a lot more, although their system is a private one. But I referred to most industrialized nations with a public health system.

Canada is by far the country which spends the most. People in Canada are not more stupid than people in the Scandinavian countries; they have a right to expect their government to spend their taxes the way they want, and God knows they do pay a lot and will continue to pay for a long time. Everybody knows that there are taxes in Canada. We are just starting to reimburse the accumulated national debt. They have a right to know that this money—I am not talking here about the cuts—will be spent more efficiently.

There is another point I should like to raise as a result of the hon. member for Winnipeg North's question.

The cuts in Mr. Wilson's last budget will affect payments to the provinces, but Canadians should realize that, all in all, these cuts represent only half of one per cent. Only half of one per cent of the total revenues the Canadian provinces are getting now.

The federal government did not tell the provinces to reduce their health care spending by half of one per cent. When we compare the budgets of the various provinces, we realize that the Ontario government budget was increasing at a rate greater than inflation, while the budget of the federal budget was increasing at a rate smaller than inflation—

I wish all governments in the provinces and territories would imitate the federal government instead of increasing their budgets by 10 or 12 per cent. Last year, some municipalities—my colleagues could deal with that—increased their budgets by as much as 15 or 20 per cent, while inflation was a lot less than that.

The federal government is making an honest effort. But if we want all Canadians to benefit eventually from our budget restrictions it is imperative that the efforts made by the federal government be duplicated by all provincial governments, all municipalities, Hydro-Québec, Ontario Hydro, in short by all Canadians involved. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if the serious, difficult and sometimes unpopular efforts we make in this House are not followed by similar efforts on the part of the provincial governments, Canada will not have the promising future we are all looking forward to enjoy. That is where we are at in the national debate, Mr. Speaker.

I have stated over and over again that I am not a separatist, that I am a Quebecer and a Canadian—I am proud to be a Canadian—but I know that the people in Quebec are listening to the members of the Bloc Quebecois who are telling them: Look at the size of the national debt in Ottawa, let us split and we will get rid of that.

The national debt happens to be the main problem. It is our problem of national unity. Quebecers are slowly drifting away from the country because they consider that the national debt is much too heavy. They are quite right. It is on that point that I seek the co-operation of the Liberal and NDP members.

If as members of this Parliament we can find a reasonable solution, acceptable to the federal, provincial, and municipal governments to deal with our national debt problem in the foreseeable future, I believe that we can save our country and give Canada a fresh start in a renewed federation. In conclusion, I would say that when all the members of this federal Parliament understand this fundamental issue, we can look to a better future, and present, for our children, as well as for the Quebec and the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I just have two quick questions for the hon. member. I would like to give him another chance to try and answer the very easy question from the member from Winnipeg. Yes or no, does he support user fees?

The second point follows from his comments where he said that the funds should be used more effectively, an argument that I can support. I would like to ask his views on whether he would support new measures which would ensure that those funds which are transferred from the federal government to the provinces that are supposed to be spent on health and post-secondary education are, indeed, spent on health and post-secondary education?

The member may know that, at least in my province, there are many allegations the Government of British Columbia takes federal money designated for health and education and spends it on paving highways. I would like to know the member's views on that matter as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first part of the questions, I would say we must, first, maintain the universality of the medicare system in Canada. We will allow provincial governments and the federal government to review the conditions because we cannot be trapped or locked in a system that is fifteen or twenty years old. That is what counts. We must consider all the options, but retaining at the same time our national system.

On the second point, I would say I agree with the member of the New Democratic Party. Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, I am not at all convinced that all provincial governments really use the transfer payments or for that matter the health care transfer payments for that purpose.

My colleague talked about British Columbia. We could easily say the same thing about Quebec. I am not convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the Quebec governement uses the money we transfer each year for health care. And we have a very tangible example of that in Quebec with the tax on gas. That money is intended in part for road repairs, but what we see in reality is that only 35 per cent of it is used for the purpose it was established for initially.

As for user fees, frais modérateurs as they are called in Québec, one thing remains: they are not at the heart of the matter. The issue is not user fees. The question is not whether you're going to charge $3 or $5 or what have you every time someone shows up at the hospital's emergency department in Shawinigan-Sud or Grand-Mère.

That is not the way we are going to solve health care problems in Canada. It is not by charging a tax here and a tax there in an effort to discourage users that the problems are going to be solved. What we must do—I will say it one last time in conclusion—is to review the way we spend the money, which is up to $60 billion every year. That is the main problem we have in Canada as far as health care is concerned: we must review the whole process and find more efficient ways to do it, Mr. Speaker. Other countries have done it, and Canada has the resources to do the same.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for this opportunity to speak on this very important motion which has been introduced by my colleague from Winnipeg, and has been amended today by the New Democratic member from Surrey.

From the debate earlier on, there were some serious questions, I suppose from all sides of this House, concerning exactly what was the intent of the member from Winnipeg in bringing this motion forward. Some questions were raised by the minister of health regarding whether this is in fact a question of confidence in the government. The member wanted to know if the vote would mean that if the government supported the motion it would have to resign and call an election. Well, I don't think that would be such a bad idea, in any case,

Mr. Speaker, because I think if you check, most Canadians would like to have an election so they could express their opinions on the actions of this government.

• (1650)

I refer also, just on this particular procedural point, to the comments that were made earlier by the member from Winnipeg, who made some very important interjections in this House regarding procedure. I understand he has had some previous experience debating the role of this House, the rules of this Chamber, in particular motions and the work of private members. He made some very compelling arguments, I think, suggesting the Minister of National Health and Welfare may have been wrong on this matter. I leave it to people much more learned in procedure and policy than myself to decide that. But obviously the NDP member from Winnipeg who made those interjections on procedure made some very important points.

That is the setting for the debate we are having today. I trust the government members will hear the arguments presented by my colleague from Winnipeg, and will be brave and show all Canadians that they do in fact have a commitment to medicare. What is the big deal? Show your support for medicare.

I would like to just pick up on some of the comments that were just made by the member across the way. I appreciated his support on the question I put to him. Because, of course, when we are talking about health care in Canada, it means we are also talking not only about what the federal government does, but of course what the provinces have to do as well.

The question, and I think a very important one, is how do we go about setting health policy in Canada.

Most current historians would give the credit for the start of medicare in Canada to the CCF government in Saskatchewan. Tommy Douglas is noted for that. Many will recall better than I the fight that was put up at the time by some who were against medicare. Tommy Douglas and the CCF, the forerunners of the New Democratic Party, really showed the rest of Canada exactly what we had to do in this country to ensure we had a health care policy that was going to ensure above all else, if there are some basics in life, health care has to be one of them, and that it is a duty and an obligation of government.

The federal government has some significant powers and responsibilities in this field, especially when we are dealing with spending powers. That has often been the club that the Government of Canada has used with the provinces, and some of that was evident during the debate on the Canada Health Act, the discussions at that time over user fees—another question I put to my colleague across the way, and I appreciated his answer. He is probably quite right that three $5 user fees here and there are not going to solve some of the problems we have in health care policy.

But he did respond positively to my comment and suggestion about how do we deal with the questions of federal transfer payments of funds, particularly in health care. I think he used the words in his comments about how do we use those funds effectively?

Some time ago I asked the Secretary of State, who is responsible to some degree for post-secondary education—it was in a debate like this, it turned out to be a quiet debate that afternoon—I asked if he could tell this House with confidence that those funds the federal government was transferring to the provinces for health and education was spent on health and education.

Mr. Speaker, the response from the minister was I suppose a little scary; he said that we would have to trust him. He said that we would have to trust him that in fact that was happening. I am glad to see that he has some colleagues on his side who maybe do not quite share his confidence that that is happening. I had mentioned British Columbia. The member across the way had mentioned Quebec and his concerns there. It sounds like they are about the same. In fact, if we start looking at the constitutional position of the Liberal Government of Quebec and the Social Credit Government of British Columbia, they are starting to sound almost the same.

It is no wonder that the Liberal Government of Quebec and the Social Credit Government of British Columbia might use federal health and education dollars to pave highways. That is an allegation that many people have made.

With regard to what we have to do with medicare though, I am more convinced than ever, we as parliamentarians must debate what is the effective role of government in Canada today, in society today. Many often on the opposite benches argue that the government has to get out of everything because government restrains and restricts the individual. We have to let the benefits trickle down, when of course usually they dry up.

I would argue that if there is one particular field where we need expanded government participation in, it is co-operation at all levels between the federal and the provincial governments in health care. It is an old cliche I suppose about an ounce or prevention is worth a pound of cure. I think we need a revolution in health care in Canada.

Let us start at the community level. Let us start there rather than what many people have written about in our country, that we have put a heavier emphasis, if you like, in terms of technology and equipment and large buildings, that we have been top heavy in terms of our approach to health care in Canada. I am not an expert on this matter. I usually prefer to stand up and talk about trees, fish and VIA Rail. Nevertheless, it is an important initiative to talk about health care in this country because it is one that in the end is going to affect us all.

The motion that is presented today by the member from Winnipeg is an important one because as I argued, if there is a way now or a greater room for participation by government, I would say it is to work at all levels on the health care field and most importantly, to work with the schools. We know it is going to be some years from now, when who knows what happens in some years, when they see ourselves or children with the vaccination mark. People will wonder what that was. It is how we have evolved and changed.

I think if we are going to start developing a health care policy, we have to go beyond just a debate about transfer payments and funds. We have to talk and work with the provinces who obviously have the major responsibility for the delivery of health care. We have to work with the school districts and other areas as well to ensure that a comprehensive health care policy is developed. In that way we can ensure that national standards are there.

I am not one, like the Government of British Columbia, and some provincial governments across the country, to sort of piecemeal take apart our health care system. What Canadians call upon this Parliament to do is to guarantee some degree of accessibility so that those services are available to all Canadians, no matter where they live. Again, I approach this because I think health care is one of those basics, one of the pillars of this country that we are talking about and is also one of the foundations of just a better nation of people.

That means that even Prince George in my riding has had to battle, if you like, with the provincial government in trying to get a cancer clinic located in Prince George. Yet what does the B.C. government do? It expands or builds new facilities, if you can believe that, in Kelowna and Kamloops, arguing about geography and what have you.

• (1700)

There is a clear example where a provincial government has made a decision like that. Unfortunately, in this case it is a bad decision. I am also reminded by the many community health clinics that approach me and talk about how difficult it is to attract professionals to stay in their communities.

I am sure I am not alone. Many members have smaller, rural communities in their ridings. The community clinic, Belmont in my riding for example, advertises in the newspapers in the U.K. to try to get doctors to come there. I do not know what kind of newspapers. It is trying to promote and bring professionals like that to our communities.

We produce some nice pamphlets with snowmobiles on them. We used to have a northern tax allowance in some parts of the country to try to encourage people to come to those parts of British Columbia.

Again, without dragging it out, accessibility is an important question not just in terms of across the border of the province with the United States in the band of the major population as we know it, but also in the distance that is growing in many areas between the urban and rural communities, often within provinces themselves.

Also, I would argue strongly. I think there is a role for the federal government and this Parliament to use its spending clout. That is what it is all about. Mr. Speaker, you know that. When the federal government sits down with the provinces, it hammers out agreements on questions like universality which have to be written into any kind of agreement. Public administration of health care is written into any agreements with the provinces as well.

That is what it comes down to in terms of governing the country, in using the spending clout, if you like, Mr. Speaker. I have suggested that maybe we could use a little more clout in some cases with the provinces which were not doing the proper kind of spending on health care that there should be.

I mentioned earlier about prevention. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. There is not a better way to spend money than ensuring that young people, particularly in schools, are guaranteed their health care.

With regard to health promotion, my colleague from Surrey has had to start a health watch, because we have to keep track of what the government members are doing to our health care system. Daily, we have reports from the different provinces about how they are, piecemeal, taking apart our health care system.

That is not the kind of health care system we want to have in this country. I would encourage the members opposite to really show their courage. I know that they will be called upon to do that at some point in the mandate of this government when they are called to go before the people again.

There could not be a better issue to get support from your constituents on than health care. I would strongly encourage the members opposite to support our amendment to the motion and to support the main motion as well.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a few questions to my colleague from Prince George.

He mentioned the matter of trust, and I think this is something that we have to question with regard to the government's motives with respect to health care. During the last election, comments were made by government members about the level playing field with regard to the free trade agreement and so on.

They made comments about how the Americans were concerned about our social programs and we were notified by the government members that our social programs would not be affected. Yet, we have seen the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which now means the government has completely withdrawn its contribution to unemployment insurance and which brings about the level playing field that the Americans were calling for.

We have seen the clawback to the old age pensions whereby the social programs are being attacked there.

We have seen the cutbacks in the transfer payments to the provinces. We have seen the equalization grants being attacked. We have also heard comments from a former cabinet minister of the Conservative government with regard to the commitments to keep the Canadian dollar high, all part of the free trade agreement. When the member talked about the matter of trust, I say to him that it is important that we also identify the fact that the free trade agreement possibly has some of the ramifications of what the government is trying to bring about here.

I would like to ask my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley if he identifies that as probably the biggest problem we have today with regard to the cutbacks in our social programs.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Kootenay East for raising some very important questions. I know the tenacity with which he has raised other matters within the party and the caucus, and I know the hard work he has been doing in his riding on many issues, such as health care.

I made notes and there are three points which I picked up during his comments. The first one is trust. He is absolutely right. I suppose we have reached the stage where I am not sure that this government can be trusted. Certainly the question of trust is reflected in the correspondence I receive from my constituents about this government in particular and, unfortunately, regarding all elected people. That makes it more difficult for those who feel there is an alternative, a different way to do things. Of course we in the New Democratic Party believe very much that there is a different and better way to run and administer the affairs of the Government of Canada in order to develop a better country.

Some of the Conservative members opposite got a little excited when my hon. friend made reference to a former colleague of theirs who, during discussions on the free trade agreement, made some references to a secret deal between the Canadian government and the U.S. government in terms of letting our dollar go up and develop the level playing field, et cetera.

We will find out the truth about that as time goes by. Maybe Mr. Stevens will be writing a book some day and we will find out the real story behind a lot of it. But we do know this—

Mr. Epp: He wasn't even part of the agreement.

Mr. Gardiner: He was not even part of the agreement. Well, Mr. Stevens will write the book and we will see just exactly what the truth is behind it all, the truth behind the higher dollar.

Last night during discussions here in the House about the softwood lumber tariff, a subject with which I am very familiar, and how the rising dollar has helped destroy our forest industry in this country, we learned the thinking on the part of this government is that the memorandum of understanding on the softwood lumber tariff has done the job. Well, the job was done by the increase in the Canadian dollar that this government allowed in co-operation with their friends in Washington, D.C.

The question is, why does this government do this. I think perhaps we should look at Ronald Reagan's memoirs or something like that to get to the bottom of the thinking of this government. It is their view that the freeing up of government—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Several members have questions and comments. Therefore, I must interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that the amendment put forward by the NDP adds the following words: "specifically its original commitment to restore 50 per cent federal funding for provincial health care costs".

The member who has just spoken was, in essence, running down the federal government.

Now they are coming through with an amendment of this kind that we would assume means the restoration of costs shared of all provincial health expenditures. That would cost $5.4 billion.

Is the member aware that this could probably replace provincial health care dollars? Can the member be honest with Canadians and tell them where they would get the $5.4 billion that the amendment he is supporting would have the government come forth with? What would they do? They should be honest with Canadians. Will they eliminate programs such as the illiteracy reduction program? Would they create job creation programs? Would they get the money from family allowances? Let's come clean with Canadians as to where they would find the $5.4 billion. Would it be from research, from the green plan? Be honest with Canadians for once and tell us where you would find these dollars. It is easy to come out with these amendments.

It is time that the NDP, rather than call down this government that spends $42 billion a year on human resource development, covering health and education, told Canadians where it would find the money.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I have had plenty of advice from my colleagues and others to answer the member's question.

First of all, I suggest that it is unfortunate that the Prime Minister is not here right now because it was the Prime Minister who said across this country in 1983 that he thought that federal health care funds should try and reach 50-50. When the Prime Minister returns to the Chamber, I know the member will ask his own Prime Minister about his position on that.

The member asks: Where are you going to get the money from? Here are two quick answers. I would seek from the members opposite unanimous consent on a motion of the House to amend the budget to eliminate the entertainment tax which would bring in $1.1 billion to the Government of Canada; and I would eliminate the $153 a day to the Senate. Let's spend that money on health care policy instead.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. I ask the honorable members to revert to the subject before the House.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to rise to participate in this debate. I compliment the hon. member for Winnipeg North for bringing forth this very important topic for discussion in the House today. There is no question in my mind that every member of Parliament in this House strongly supports medicare and is fully committed to medicare. I for one certainly would reaffirm, if ever there were any doubt, my commitment to medicare.

As an aside, there has been some discussion with respect to the motion that is before us, which of course is an opposition motion presented on supply and therefore is a confidence motion in the government. Naturally, in accordance with long-standing tradition, government members will vote against the motion. However, that is really irrelevant in terms of the government's commitment to medicare.

What is important here is that all members of this House, representing all parts of Canada, stand here today and make known to their constituents and indeed to all Canadians the strong commitment that we have to our health care system in Canada and to medicare. That is what is important: where we stand on the issue and not the health of this particular motion.

Canadians probably value their health care system more than just about anything else that we have in Canada, and for good reason. We all have stories of our experiences travelling abroad. One time when I was in the United States, I had a very minor illness and had to see a local physician and buy some medication. Before it was all finished, it cost me approximately $125. We do not want to see that kind of situation in Canada, and Canadians do not want to see that situation in Canada. Indeed, that is one reason Canadians commit as much money as they do, through their government, to our health care system. In Nova Scotia we have a provincial sales tax of 10 per cent at the moment. That goes toward our health care system.

When we go to the United States and some other countries and pay a sales tax, we do not necessarily get a return for that or the people of that country do not get the health care system that we get in Canada. So, it is something that is important to Canadians and all members of the House should stand today and make that point.

In my province of Nova Scotia, we have what we consider to be a health care system second to none. That does not mean, of course, that it cannot be improved. It does not mean that there are not facilities that we would like to have that we do not have. But the fact is we can be very proud, not only of the system in general but, indeed, of the people who make the system, the health care professionals we have in our province.

In my constituency of the South Shore, we have a beautiful new facility in the South Shore Regional Hospital with a dedicated cadre of workers, as we have in our other three hospitals in the South Shore; the Fishermen's Memorial in Lunenburg. I publicly commend and thank the Minister of National Health and Welfare for his support and his financial commitment to the establishment of a drug dependency clinic in the Fishermen's Memorial Hospital.

We also have good facilities in the Queen's County Hospital and the Shelburne Roseway Hospital. All of these benefit, as do Nova Scotians generally benefit, from a very dedicated cadre of health care workers in our province.

Medical services in hospitals, in particular, require more than professionally trained and professionally paid health care workers. They also exist because of the volunteers, the ordinary citizens who commit their time on a voluntary basis to work as auxiliary members within the hospital, as board members or, indeed, in various fund raising projects to support the work. Work that is supported from the public purse, yes, but work that is supported because many Canadians, many Nova Scotians commit their time, energy and enthusiasm to working to raise money and to do voluntarily tasks that contribute to making our health care system what it is.

As an aside, I might say that as a member of Parliament, of course, like all of us in this place, I spend time in Ottawa. No more so than I have to but, nevertheless, I do. I had occasion earlier this year to be a patient at the National Defence Medical Centre, which was the subject of some controversy when the Auditor General's report came down. I am not particularly interested in getting involved in the controversy, because one thing I noticed did not come out at that time was the quality of health care provided in that institution. As a patient there for five days, I have to say that I have never been anywhere where I was so impressed, not just with the professionalism of the staff of that institution, but with the friendly environment there in the way they treated me as a patient. I thought it was superb.

Shortly thereafter, when a number of people from that institution went to serve in the Canadian field hospital as part of the Canadian contribution to the coalition in the gulf war, I thought about some of the men and women who had made my stay in hospital a less unhappy occasion than a stay in a hospital might be. Of course, like all Canadians, I am delighted that they are all returning home safely.

While it is sometimes popular to get up and criticize things, I think we also have to be prepared to stand up when things are good and say so publicly. In a sense, I am bootlegging an opportunity to publicly thank the people at the DNDMC for the wonderful service and support I received when I was a patient there.

The issue here is really our commitment to medicare. As someone said earlier in the debate, we can all stand on principle and say we support our medicare system. And of course we do. The issue we have to consider is how tangibly and most effectively do we support that system?

What I seem to hear some of my hon. colleagues opposite saying is, the more money you throw at it, the more you support it. I notice that it does not seem to matter what the program is, many members opposite frequently stand up and say: "No matter how much you spend, you should spend more". That is not really a realistic solution to the problem.

The best way to preserve and provide a solid long-term base for our health care system and the financing of our health care system is, of course, a sound Canadian economy and sound government financing, both at the federal and provincial levels.

• (1720)

That is one of the reasons that this government, in what I consider to be a highly responsible manner as well as priority, has said that we have to put the finances of the nation in order so that we have a sound economy and a basis from which we can ensure the long-term viability of not only our medical and our health care system, but indeed our entire social programs in Canada.

It is well and good to go out and in an hysterical manner try to convince Canadians that we are on the verge of seeing our health care system destroyed. Let there not be any illusions as to why that is going on. People on all sides of this House know how much Canadians value their health care system. If we go out and try to convince Canadians that it is being destroyed, there might be some partisan advantage in that to my friends opposite.

This is not the first time we have seen that in this House or in this country. I recall in the fall of 1988 the hysterics and the scare tactics that were disgracefully used, in my opinion, in trying to convince Canadians they were going to lose their health care system. I suppose what we have going on in this debate today is an effort to say: "See, we told you so". Guess what, folks: that is not the case.

What we have going on in this country today and indeed in this House is that we have a government that is responsible in handling the affairs of the nation and an opposition, no matter which end of this House we look at, that simply says, no matter what it is: "Spend more, spend more, spend more". That is the order of the day. I am sorry, but that is not what is in the best interests of this country.

We talk about commitment. If we look at the expenditures, transfers to the provinces in the present budget are 14 per cent of expenditures and 27.4 per cent of expenditures are debt charges. That is what we have to get control of. Then we will have the funding we need to spend as much as is appropriate and is needed to allow our health care system and other support systems to continue to grow.

The fact of the matter is that transfers to provinces are increasing by 3.7 per cent this year while at the same time the government is controlling itself to the extent of 3.4 per cent. We will end up without having a medicare system if we do not get the finances of the nation under control. We all have to come to grips with the reality of that situation.

The fact is that Canada is a federal state. The fact is that under our Constitution health care falls within the jurisdiction of the province. The fact is that provinces have a major if not the lead role to play in the handling of decision making with respect to our health care system. Quite simply, the provinces must accept their responsibilities.

We just had a major royal commission on health care in Nova Scotia which, among other things, pointed out very clearly and unequivocally that the challenge of growing health care costs is probably the greatest challenge that is going to be faced by governments in this country, both federally and provincially but particularly provincially, over the next few years. We have to come to grips with that.

We have to ask ourselves a number of questions. How do we control that cost so that we can maintain a quality health care system? How do we ensure that we are getting the best value from our expenditures with respect to health care? Do we have to have all the procedures that are there? When new technology comes out, do we necessarily have to go out and acquire it and put it in all facilities? Do people always have to go to hospitals when in fact what they may need is a visit to a doctor? Do people have to attend at the doctor's office as often as they do?

The provinces are going to have to face these types of questions in terms of access to the health care system. The important thing is that we have to have a system that can respond to every need, every health care need of every Canadian. But at the same time, we have to ensure that those valuable resources are used for the benefit of those who need them, and not to provide entertainment for people on sunny days.

We have to also go on and ask other questions. Do we have adequate emphasis on prevention? What is the quality of health education in Canada? Certainly there have been improvements in health education in the schools in recent years, but what is the attitude that students have toward health education?

I have a son in junior high school. I know the attitude that he and many of his friends have with respect to health education. They do not recognize it as the priority that they should recognize it in terms of the school curriculum. It is something that is every bit as important if not more important to them personally than math, reading, social studies and some of the other things.

We have to look at the quality of health education and we have to look at preventive measures. The most cost efficient health care system is one in which we prevent people from becoming ill who, with some appropriate education, in fact would avoid the illnesses that have got them there.

We have to ask questions about institutionalizing people. It is a simple solution to a problem to say that we will institutionalize them, but that may not be the best solution. Not only may it not be the best solution from a cost point of view, but it may not be the best solution from the point of view of the individual.

This takes us a little beyond simple health care to the question of geriatric care. Are we adequately responding as a nation to the implications of the fact that we live in an aging society, that the percentage of our population who are senior citizens is growing all the time? How are we going to cope with the financial implications of that?

Should we be just simply pushing people toward institutionalization, or should we be making greater efforts to make it possible for people to stay and have independence within their own homes? It seems to me that these are questions we should be asking.

Our system in Canada is unquestionably a good one if we compare it to some others. For example, the cost of health care in Canada is equivalent to 8.9 per cent of the GNP, whereas in the United States it is 11.6 per cent of the GNP and at that there are 30 million people without access to proper health care in the United States.

An hon. member: It is 40 million.

Mr. McCreath: One of my hon. friends says 40 million. Let it be 40 million. The bottom line is that we have a significantly better system. We all know it and we want to maintain the quality of it.

The provinces must take the lead in pursuing reform. For many of these questions, the answers must come from them because they are the delivery agents. It is all well and good for them simply to say to the federal government: "Give us more money". Let us be frank, the federal government has no assurance that the money is even going to be used for health care.

Let us face it that provinces can raise revenues as well. They can raise taxes too. I do not know what my hon. friends opposite think about that, but the fact of the matter is it is there.

The federal government does have a role to play obviously in providing financial support. The federal government also can and does play a significant role in encouraging co-operation among the provinces. Indeed every six months there is a federal-provincial meeting of ministers, officials and so on. There is a variety of advisory committees which attempt to explore solutions to problems by working together, and that is as it should be.

In the last two years, for example, several new initiatives central to the better management of health resources have been launched. I would like to mention a couple, if I may.

In 1989, the federal government, the provinces and territories created a new Canadian co-ordinating office for health technology assessment and a new National Health Information Council was established. A project was undertaken on health care quality assurance and a paper was commissioned on medical manpower issues and the strategies available to better manage human resources. There is a role for the federal government to act as a co-ordinating agency.

We have to remember first and foremost that we have our responsibilities as a federal government, but then the provinces have theirs and they must live up to theirs.

In conclusion, what we are here to talk about is our commitment to our health care system. It seems to me there are four bases upon which Canadians can establish and confirm, as it were, their commitment to our health care system. First, we must have a cadre of well trained and committed health care professionals supported by a large number of volunteers committed to the system. That we have.

Second, we must have good health care facilities, the infrastructure for health care facilities. While these things can always be improved, compared to the other countries of the world it seems to me we have pretty excellent facilities.

Third, Canadians themselves must believe in the importance of our health care system and our medicare system. I would submit that every member of this House would recognize the commitment that Canadians have and the high level of value that Canadians place in their health care system.

Fourth, we must have a solid financial base to ensure the long-term security of that health care system. That comes from governments that manage their affairs soundly and that live within their means. It ensures that we have sound financial management of the government, which in turn will lead to a sound economy in the country. That is probably the most important reaffirmation and confirmation of the long-term viability and future of our health care system in Canada.

• (1730)

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the member's comments and to professions of commitment on the part of the government to the health care system in Canada, while all the while it is ensuring that the provinces have inadequate resources to fund their medical systems.

If the member wants to look close to home, he will see the Newfoundland budget just last week with cuts in beds in the health care system there. In the Manitoba budget it is in the same situation. The budgets of today will no doubt be reacting to last month's federal budget.

We see the implications of the cuts to medicare, the cuts in transfers to the provinces, very quickly by seeing the cuts that have been made at the provincial level. Let us not pretend that this government's budgetary and financial measures are not having immediate detrimental impacts on the health care system across this country.

Let us not pretend that we could not predict that is what was going to happen. After three years in a row of cuts by this government we are seeing major inroads into the quality of our health care system.

It is interesting—and I will come to my question in a moment—that the Liberal Party moved the motion referring to a commitment to medicare. After all, when it was in government, on at least two very clear occasions it also cut funding from the federal government to the provinces for medicare. While in government both the Tories and the Liberals have ensured that resources available to the provinces for health care have been cut. In opposition, both those parties say different things.

If we go back and look at the record, we see that when the Liberals were making cuts the present Minister of Finance was chastising them for undermining the future health and post-secondary education prospects of Canadians. As soon as the role reversal takes place, we have cuts made by the Conservative governments and protestations by former Liberal government members.

We have both parties attacking medicare when they are in government and, when they are in opposition, saying positive things about the health care system and the need for further support.

I want to ask the member two questions. In terms of determinants of health care, we are well aware that lower income Canadians are much more subject to problems with their health than those Canadians who are better off. Their problems with nutrition, problems with housing, and problems with lower levels of education illustrate themselves in a much greater use of the health care system and much more morbidity in that community.

I want to ask the member one very simple question. If he is so concerned about the health care system, why is it that his government has chosen to attack social programs across this country, putting more and more people into more difficulties with poverty, attacking the very poorest of our society? Why is he doing that if he is so interested in ensuring that the health care system survives?

I want to ask him one last question. I would like to ask him who he thinks said the following in 1983: "The problem with medicare arose because the federal government reneged on commitments it made to the provinces and cut back very drastically on the dollars it sent to the provinces who are charged with administering and paying for medicare. The problem has arisen because of unilateral arbitrary cutback by the federal government to the provinces who are charged with footing the bill. That is the problem".

I will put the member out of his suspense. That was the present Prime Minister who said that and now, while he is in government, he is of course making exactly those same cuts that he criticized. I wonder if the member might want to comment on the question that I raised.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his contribution to the debate. Indeed I will attempt to respond to his question as best I can.

I think his good friend, the premier of Ontario, is going to find out a little bit about the realities of being in government as opposed to the realities of being in opposition; being in opposition where one can do, as my hon. friend does and say: "Spend more, spend more, spend more. Don't worry about who is going to pay the piper at the end of the day".

The reality of the situation is that it is not that simple. I would remind my hon. friend that we are not going to be able to have any social programs at all in this country if we do not get the finances of the nation under control.

My hon. friend uses the example of the recent budget in Newfoundland to illustrate his point. Perhaps I might be permitted to quote the premier of Newfoundland himself who he will admit, I am sure, is a most definitive source. Mr. Wells' comment on the federal government was, and I quote from the news report:

> I am kind of relieved, I would say. It will not cause us to make significant changes to our own budget.

He went on to say that that documents was expected next week. Mr. Wells does not share my hon. friend's view that the federal government's budget is going to interfere.

There is no question that they may have some problem in the financing of the Government of Newfoundland. I know that in our own province all Nova Scotian taxpayers including myself await with trepidation the provincial budget that is going to come down there. They forecast a $30 million deficit this year and, as of four months ago, they had it up to a $150 million deficit. I have some concerns about that.

However the bottom line is—and this is what my hon. fiends in the New Democratic Party seem to forget sometimes—that at some point in the process we have to pay the bills.

I was raised—and maybe it is an old value—to know you have got to cut the cloth according to the pattern. I was brought up to believe that you have to pay your bills, that you just cannot endlessly borrow money and let the thing go and go and go until you have bankrupted the next generation who are left with it.

As I said in my remarks—and I know with assurance that my hon. friend listened very, very carefully to them—the best support for a health care system, as for other programs that Canadians want and value, is a sound basis for the economy of the government as well as for the economy of the nation. That is the strongest basis upon which we can support our health care system.

Unfortunately my hon. friends opposite may not share that view. They have credit cards that evidently do not have bills sent back to them at the end of the month. They have credit cards that evidently do not accrue interest. But it is not that way in the real world and it is not that way in government.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It has nothing to do with the remarks being made by my colleague from Nova Scotia.

I wonder if I might seek unanimous consent of the House for my colleague from Scarborough—Agincourt to make a brief statement of personal privilege. I indicate to the House that it would take no longer than 30 to 40 seconds, and I seek unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree with the request of the opposition House leader?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

APOLOGY OF MEMBER FOR SCARBOROUGH—AGINCOURT

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege.

As members will know, I just returned from a trip to Trinidad and Tobago which caused a great deal of controversy. I stand here to apologize unequivocally to the members of this House, to the leadership of my party, to the people of Canada, and to the Government of Trinidad and Tobago for my actions.

I shall henceforth not engage in activities outside my responsibilities as critic. I have taken this statement to the leadership of my party and apologized to my leader and to my Liberal colleagues for this unfortunate incident.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—HEALTH CARE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pagtakhan (p. 18648), and the amendment of Mr. Karpoff (p. 18662).

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): I have just a very quick question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member could pass on his opinions to me about whether he thinks there should be guarantees that federal funds on health and education sent to the provinces are actually spent on health and post-secondary education.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, naturally, as with all members of this House, I would like to think I could control what other people can do, but one of the things I have learned in life is that one cannot do that. One of the things I learned when I studied the history and the politics of my country is that we are a federal state.

• (1740)

The provinces have their responsibilities, and the Government of Canada has its responsibilities. As much as the Government of Canada, in its wisdom and particularly because we have such an excellent and wise government in Canada today, might wish to dictate to the provinces of the country what they shall do, unfortunately that is not the nature of our federal system in Canada and unfortunately that is not possible for us to do. It is phoney, unrealistic and fundamentally dishonest to suggest that it would be appropriate for this government and this House to attempt to do that.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to rise tonight to take part in this debate on this motion:

> That this House reaffirm its commitment to Medicare.

I feel very strongly that one of the saddest facts in our country is the growing gap that separates the health care of the rich and the poor.

Health care statistics speak for themselves. Well-off Canadians live longer and healthier lives than do poorer, low-income families. In my view, the health care gap can be measured by two standards: the have provinces and the have not provinces.

This can be translated into terms of people, the gap between the high income Canadians and the low income Canadians, which also translates into 10 to 11 years of longevity for high income Canadians compared to that of low income Canadians.

It was in 1986 when the present government finally recognized the health care gap. Let me quote what one of Health and Welfare Canada's many documents said: "The first challenge we face is to find ways of reducing inequities in the health of low versus high income groups in Canada".

Instead of doing this, it introduced Bill C-69 which limited funding to the provinces. In the next two years, Prince Edward Island, which is the smallest province in Canada, will lose $12 million in transfer payments. This will spell higher taxes, less social programs and, most of all, the cutting of Atlantic Canada's lifeline.

The fabric of social programs is starting to fray and medicare will be the first to go. Smaller provinces or territories will not be able to hold the system together or to support the development of the new and innovative health programs that are needed.

How can the federal government expect a small province or territory to maintain national health care standards, given that it has slashed Established Programs Financing. Moreover, the estimates of accumulative loss to provincial and territorial health care funding from 1986–87 to 1991–95 will total at least $22 billion.

It is frightening what this government is doing to what once was called a sacred trust of our country and our community. It is ironic that Canada has been held up as a model for the United States while we ourselves, are in danger of losing our medicare and ending up with a worse system than they have with user fees, extra billings and, most of all, two systems; one for the rich and one for the poor.

Speaking of my own province, we have a small tax base with 125,000 or 130,000 people. Has the Government of Canada forgotten the small areas of this country? With an already aging population and with the youth of the province going to have to leave and relocate in the Golden Triangle of central Canada, P.E.I. has a higher than average age group.

With this age group comes a greater demand for health care. Of course, with a greater demand for health care comes a greater need for financing. The freeze in federal–provincial transfer payments, as was said in the House a few minutes ago, has already resulted in the harshest budget ever handed down in Newfoundland.

Nine hundred health care jobs were lost; 360 hospital beds were closed. If this plan of action continues, health care will be eliminated.

In conclusion, I just want to say that I have heard the member opposite from South Shore speaking that his commitment to medicare will continue. I hope that the members of this House will see that we will not lose this sacred trust that is famous and renowned world-wide.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

FORESTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Forest Resource Development Agreement with the province of Ontario expired in March 1989.

This deal was for $150 million, funded equally by the provincial and federal governments.

During the last two years, the Minister of Finance has cut the Department of Forestry's budget by $60 million. It is no wonder that the Minister of Forestry had only $25 million to offer Ontario to renew the agreement. Provincial officials had no choice but to refuse such an offer. An offer that contains a cut of 66 per cent in funding is unacceptable.

I therefore urge the Minister of Forestry to stand up for the forest industry at the cabinet table and obtain the necessary funds to renew the agreement with the province of Ontario.

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR THE ELIMINATION OF DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, hon. members, I would like to take a few minutes of your time to reflect on the importance of Thursday, March 21 the International Day for the Elimination of Discrimination.

Canada is known as a country where justice and equality are the rule. We all know that but today, that is something that bears repeating. We have the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Employment Equity Act and the Canadian Multiculturalism Act. Soon we will have a new Canadian Race Relations Foundation and a new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Racism exists, however, and unfortunately, some Canadians do not live up to our reputation as a nation.

That is something to think about, Mr. Speaker. Racism is a pernicious evil and it requires our utmost vigilance. It undermines people's confidence and prevents them from reaching their full potential.

Only when we have managed to root out this evil will we be worthy of Canada's reputation as a just and tolerant society, a model for the rest of the world.

LEBANON

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the conflict in the Persian Gulf has managed to obscure completely the very serious situation that exists in Lebanon. Canadians of Lebanese origin have made an impressive contribution to Canada's economic and social development. For this reason—one of many—it is unacceptable for the Canadian ambassador to be absent from Beirut. Lebanon is an occupied country. There are flagrant and constant violations of international law. Unfortunately, Canada has been very slow to react and to denounce those responsible. This is an intolerable situation. The Canadian government's silence on this matter should be a reason for Canadians to do everything they can to help the Lebanese people recover their independence and freedom.

EQUALITY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is shocking but not surprising that the 1990 report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission highlights how this government has perpetuated gender based discrimination.

Canadian women are still over-represented in underpaid and part-time jobs. "Better child care arrangements", the report states, "would give women a better chance to participate in the workforce on an equitable basis".

But where is the national child care program that this Prime Minister has wholeheartedly promised more than once?

The broken promises are as abundant as the pink-collar ghettos that this government has increased, and that this report laments.

We should all be lamenting the fact that last October our Status of Women minister was quoted as saying that her government has no intention of adding targets and timetables to the hollow Employment Equity Act.

No targets, no timetables, no commitment. That is the record of this government on women's equality.

DUCKS UNLIMITED

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, Ducks Unlimited of Canada has been in the business of conserving waterfowl habitat and enhancing our wetlands across Canada for over 50 years.

Last year, Ducks Unlimited spent close to $60 million on projects from coast to coast, $60 million that went toward preserving and constructing new wildlife habitat.

Ducks Unlimited is a good corporate citizen. It not only spends this money on preserving waterfowl habitat, but it spends it as well to educate and inform Canadians, particularly young Canadians, about the value of our environment.

Ducks Unlimited deserves recognition and the thanks of all Canadians for a job well done. Even before it was popular to be an environmentalist, Ducks Unlimited was on the job of conserving.

When a flock of waterfowl fly over you this spring on their way back from the south, give a thought of thanks to Ducks Unlimited.

LA FRANCOPHONIE

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to announce today that at the next Francophone summit, Canada intends to move a resolution that would designate March 20 as the Journée internationale de la francophonie.

In 1986, at the first Francophonie summit, the Francophone community project took shape. Since then, there have been summit meetings at Quebec City and Dakar. Participating countries have constantly broadened the cultural concept to include science, technology and economic issues. Consisting of more than 40 nations and nearly 400 million men and women, la Francophonie is based above all on language and a set of values. It has already set a number of goals in the areas of training, scientific research, and the advancement of cultural industries and communications. La Francophonie is not utopic but a forum for exchanges of views and a source of growth for all member countries.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the attempt to show support for our Canadian merchants in border towns by introducing a fast lane at border points is nothing more than a licence to import goods illegally into Canada. I suggest the revenue minister would be hard pressed to find one Canadian border town merchant who would support this initiative.

What was needed was more employees at border point crossings to enforce the import rules. In an effort to facilitate Americans entry into Canada, the government has abandoned the concerns of Canadian businessmen in border towns just at a time when they are already witnessing severe business downturns.

This new procedure does not even warrant a trial period. On behalf of the retailers in all Canadian border towns, I am asking the government to close the fast lanes now and start to show some real concern for the problems confronting merchants in border towns.

GALA DES FIDÉIDES

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday evening in Quebec City, 800 people attended the Gala des Fidéides to celebrate excellence and top performances in the business world.

I would like to congratulate all finalists and award winners: Restaurant Melrose, Transport Besner, Berclain Gestion Opérationnelle, Multitel Inc., Centre d'arbritrage commercial national et international du Québec, Systèmes Fortune 1000 and Glaverbec, and pay special tribute to the organizer of this event, the Sainte-Foy Chamber of Commerce, which together with other local chambers of commerce made this evening a tremendous success.

This is further proof that the Quebec City area has a dynamic business community.

MANPOWER AND OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, annually, the federal government and the Government of Quebec spend nearly one million dollars on manpower and occupational training programs. Forty per cent of these expenditures is earmarked for program administration.

Duplication and overlap resulting from both governments' failure to co-ordinate their initiatives are responsible for another $100 million being wasted. In fact, what we have here is a net loss of $500 million. Taxpayers are getting only 50 cents worth of direct services for every dollar invested.

That is why the Conseil du patronat, the central labour bodies, the Co-operative Movement, the Quebec Liberal Party, the Parti Quebecois and the Equality Party are asking for patriation to Quebec of all powers with respect to manpower and occupational training.

CHILD POVERTY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the National Council of Welfare, an advisory committee to the government, tabled a report which stated that this government is the first government in history to pull back from its basic commitment to the needs of the poor.

In January, the Senate Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology tabled its report "Children in Poverty: Towards a Better Future". In its list of 16 recommendations, the committee calls on the government to fully support the objective of substantially reducing child poverty in Canada and show leadership by undertaking co-operative strategies with other levels of government and the public at large to address the needs of our country's children.

The report also recommends that a national conference involving all levels of government and the general public on the subject of shared solutions to the problem of child poverty be held within the next 12 months.

In light of the Prime Minister's commitment and that of his government to the ratification of the UN declaration of the rights of the child, it is indeed pressing that such a meeting be called. Allowing children to grow up in poverty is not an option we can afford to leave unaddressed.

EARTH DAY 1991

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, 10.02 p.m. tonight marks the vernal equinox, the beginning of spring, the time when light and darkness are equal in both hemispheres of our planet. It also marks the celebration of Earth Day 1991, which this year is being held at the United Nations General Assembly.

At exactly 10.02 p.m., the United Nations Peace Bell, a symbol of global harmony cast in 1954 and made from melted coins collected by children around the world, will be rung three times by the personal representative of the Secretary General of the United Nations signalling a global moment of silent reflection and prayer for the well-being of Mother Earth. After the minute of silence, all available ambassadors from UN member states will each ring the bell one time to indicate global solidarity and the desire to preserve and nurture our common home, Earth.

In speaking with the Canadian Ambassador to the United Nations, the Hon. Yves Fortier, yesterday morning, it is my understanding that Canada will be represented at the ceremony.

At the moment the United Nations peace bell rings, I hope all Canadians will pause and pray with the world community that we all find the strength internationally to become responsible trustees of earth, each in our own area of ability and influence.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the National Council of Welfare, the government's own advisory board, said what the NDP has been saying all along: Cuts to the Canada Assistance Plan are irrational and unconscionable, especially at this time of a recession.

It is just the latest indication of how ill-equipped the Minister of Finance is to deal with issues of social policy, and how inappropriate it is for him to attempt to do so. The budget is not the appropriate vehicle for major changes in social policies such as the cap on CAP.

Where did the Minister of Finance get his advice from? From bankers and businessmen who have never spoken to a person on welfare in their lives? Where was the highly publicized Children's Bureau when the latest cap on CAP was being considered? Was it even consulted, or are its powers so limited that it has no real say in how the policies of this government affect children? These policies do affect children because children make up 37 per cent of Canadians receiving welfare.

If this is what the Prime Minister means when he says children are our most valuable resource, then I fear for the future of children in this country.

This government does not listen to Canadians, but should it not listen to its own advisers and stop these attacks on Canada's social programs?

SPRING

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, over the past dozen or more years, CKNW-98 in New Westminster, British Columbia has celebrated the arrival of spring by distributing B.C. grown daffodils to all members of Parliament.

In spite of the snowiest winter of the last 40 years on the B.C. lower mainland, these daffodils remind us that spring comes to B.C. first and symbolize the start of a new season of tourism in British Columbia.

Thousands more daffodils are being distributed to shoppers throughout the lower mainland today by CKNW hostesses.

By the way, the station CKNW stands for Canadians Know Nice Weather. We welcome you all to truly beautiful British Columbia.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, March 21, the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, commemorates the day in 1960 when more than 70 people were killed and over 180 wounded while demonstrating peacefully against apartheid in Sharpville, South Africa. Six years later the United Nations proclaimed this date as a special day of observance when people of all nations should not just examine their own record on racism but do more to combat it.

Racism is a violation of human rights and dignity. It limits an individual's potential and dehumanizes both its victims and it perpetrators who themselves are victims of ignorance and fear.

I invite every citizen of our great country to renew his or her commitment to equality and freedom. The Canadian dream will not be complete until all people across this nation are accorded equal dignity, equal access and equal participation. In our hearts and minds we have to make every day the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. We have the vision; we have the drive; we have the will.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PROSTITUTION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister.

Over the past several weeks we have been raising a number of concerns about this government's abandonment of Canadians most in need.

Seeing the Prime Minister now, as well as wishing him a happy birthday, I would like to ask him a very serious question.

As the Prime Minister knows, there is probably no sadder situation than young people who have turned to street prostitution. I have now had a chance to review in depth the decision of the Minister of Justice to refuse to fund programs to help get street prostitutes off the street. Is the Prime Minister aware that, in rejecting these programs, the Minister of Justice stated that she was doing so because of:

> —the reality of budgetary constraints, the multitude of issues competing for government's attention—and the need of the government to spend money where it's most needed.

What can be more needy than the need of the street prostitute to get off the street? My question is to the Prime Minister.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to a very complex social problem. I have not said that I am not willing to participate in such programs. My remarks were made in the context of a response to a report by the standing committee of the House, and my concern is that the evidence shows that many street prostitutes are not getting off the street. Therefore, if we focus our program solely on those who are willing to come off the street, we will miss the opportunity to provide a very important connection between society and its caring services and those who are on the street.

However, I made it very clear in the report that I was interested in discussing the matter further with provincial governments who have the primary responsibility of delivering services in that area, and I am very open to supporting programs that can be shown to be effective.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in fact the studies show the exact opposite. The studies show that the majority of young street prostitutes want to get off the street.

Does the Prime Minister agree with the statement made by his Minister of Justice, which reads:

> It is open to question whether such projects—

That is referring to projects to get prostitutes off the street.

> —would have much impact on prostitutes, given the reality of the minimum wage that is available after having completed most training programs.

The minister's statement can be interpreted in one of two ways: either the minister is admitting that government training programs are a complete failure and people would be better off in prostitution, or she believes that people choose to be prostitutes in order to make a lot of money.

Will the Prime Minister dissociate himself from the remarks that were not made off the cuff, were not made in passing in a random interview, but were tabled in a report in this House? Are those his views and the views of his government?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's comments on my remarks are in a sense taken out of context of what I was doing, which was responding to the recommendations of the standing committee. I have in fact been involved in the city of Vancouver with programs that are designed to help people who want to get off the streets, not just prostitutes but other kinds of street kids.

• (1420)

Clearly it is a complex situation. The report of the standing committee seemed to be of the view—solicitation was in fact what it was reviewing; it was making recommendations on how to deal with the solicitation of responding or doing a review of the application of the government's law—that there was a simple connection between those programs and getting people off the street.

I was simply making the point that that is not clear, that it is a much more complex problem than that, and that all of those young people who are on the street need to be dealt with whether or not they show at any time a willingness to get off the street, as opposed to providing programs for those who indicate a willingness to get off the street before they enter the program.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the hon. minister has not even read the Badgley Report on this subject. If she had, she would know that the majority of young street prostitutes do not want to be on the street. She is giving the wrong impression. It is absolutely not true that they are on the street because they want to and this is a totally ridiculous answer to a genuine social problem. I will direct this question to the Prime Minister. Given that his Justice Minister has turned her back on the young street prostitutes, will the Prime Minister at least give the young men and women who want to get off the street the chance to do so with federal programs or will he also turn his back on this major social problem?

[English]

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, the program is designed to assist young people on the street, whether they are prostitutes or not. The program is delivered by three levels of government. I come from a city in fact where the question of street solicitation is in fact more severe than in any part of the country, and I do not have anything to learn from the hon. member about that.

My response was to a suggestion that getting young people off the streets and out of street solicitation was a simple question of providing those kinds of programs. That is not the case. It is a much more complex problem than that. I believe it has to be dealt with by all of the levels of government that are involved in it.

I indicated very clearly in my response my willingness to continue to discuss these programs with provincial governments that have the primary responsibility in that area.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The Human Rights Commissioner indicates that the list of aboriginal issues continues to grow. The government has repeatedly ignored its responsibility to address the complex issues aboriginal peoples face. Many native communities are living in Third World conditions.

Will the minister commit himself to end the tragic price aboriginal peoples are forced to pay because of government policies that foster economic dependence instead of autonomy and self-reliance?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question from the hon. member today, because it gives me an opportunity to speak on behalf of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and say that the four pillars the Prime Minister announced in last September's speech are well under way.

There is a very great concern in this government to see that the issues that have been dealt with in the human rights report are addressed. We are working toward that as rapidly as we possibly can.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Human Rights Commissioner would like to hear that, because it is a very well-kept secret if anything is happening. I assume that even CSIS does not know about it, it is such a well-kept secret.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Aboriginal people and their leaders continue to be excluded and ignored in all serious constitutional talks. Last night, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development withdrew the government's promise of last summer for a royal commission on aboriginal issues. Another promise is broken.

Will the Prime Minister today announce a specific timetable and agenda for including the aboriginal people and their leaders in the constitutional process?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, nobody has ruled out the possibility of having a royal commission.

However, I think the program the government has launched on right now is one that is working and that should be allowed to work.

If the hon. member is really serious—and I am sure she is—about seeing that these very real concerns of the aboriginal people of this country are addressed, she will join with us in helping to resolve these issues through step-by-step progress on the four pillars that this Prime Minister announced. That is what we are doing.

BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The news gets worse. Bankruptcy is up 68 per cent. Our national exports are down by $353 million. This means thousands of people have seen their dreams across this country die. It also means that the government's hopes of an export led recovery look out of sight.

The Canadian dollar continues to rise against other currencies. Will the government admit that this is forcing thousands into bankruptcy, cutting back our exports, and seriously threatening the national unity of this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, nobody is pleased with bankruptcies.

Although the bankruptcy report today is not a pleasant one, there are signs that the incidence of bankruptcy has dramatically slowed down. Therefore we feel that the economy is starting to turn around.

I might remind the hon. member that in the period of time from February 1990 to February 1991 there have been 132,613 new incorporated businesses in Canada. So businesses are being created; put that in the proper perspective.

There is economic activity going on, and there are businesses being created. We do not take heart in the statistics that came out today, but we do see signs that that type of activity is slowing down and that the economic activity is starting to perform much better.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact in the past year there have been 430,000 permanent jobs lost in this country. If that is prosperity, you can have it, because we do not want that kind of prosperity in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, here is my supplementary. Last November, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs promised to introduce a new bankruptcy legislation to protect the workers. All that has happened so far is that the number of bankruptcies increased every month. The government did nothing. Why? Why not have helped the people during this terrible recession?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as mentioned earlier and as I said myself on a number of occasions, the government is just finishing the outline of reform of the Bankruptcies Act. As soon as all is in place, we will announce the concrete steps that will be taken and, considering the effort that was put into this, I am convinced that the Canadian people will be satisfied with what we will put on the table.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I hope I have his attention.

I think we should keep in mind that most developed industrialized countries do not pay their investment brokers to sell government bonds.

How does the Prime Minister justify taking money from children to reduce the deficit when at the same time his government is paying Bay Street investment brokers $20 million to $60 million to sell Canadian bonds?

• (1430)

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, this has been done for decades. The hon. member knows that. He is bringing a red herring to the floor of the House of Commons as usual.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In the past 24 hours we heard that 1,800 employees lost their jobs at General Motors in Sainte-Thérèse; 125 jobs were lost at Emballage Sommerville in Longueuil and 90 jobs were lost at Ballin Inc. at Saint-Laurent, where a foreman and a vice-president were wounded by an employee who was told he was fired.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: When will he and his government announce economic policies that will stop this steady stream of unemployed workers that is engulfing Montreal? Montreal has become the unemployment capital of Canada. When is he going to do something about it?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, I welcome this opportunity to answer the question put by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard. As far as General Motors is concerned, the hon. member claims that 1,800 employees were fired, while the truth is that General Motors management announced they were considering temporary lay-offs to prepare for the new Firebird production line, which takes quite some time. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard is probably aware that our government, together with the Government of Quebec, was responsible for bringing General Motors to this location by providing a $220 million interest-free loan, and that employees affected by these lay-offs will be 95 per cent protected as far as their salaries are concerned.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, there we have the results of the government's economic policies. After investing over $200 million, we now have 1,800 employees laid off for a year. So much for the government's policies! When will you introduce policies that will put Montrealers, Quebeckers and Canadians back to work?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, I may again remind the hon. member for Saint-Léonard that he is hardly in a position to criticize the government, since the party to which he belongs was responsible for record job losses in the Montreal area from 1980 to 1984. When they fortunately were defeated in 1984, Montreal Island had been laid waste by a government that did absolutely nothing for Montreal Island during all the time they were in power.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Finance.

One of the principal justifications for the GST was that in replacing the manufacturers' sales tax it would promote Canadian exports. Yet, today Statistics Canada announced that in January imports rose by more than $500 million while exports declined by more than $300 million.

If the GST was intended to help our exporters, why has Statistics Canada concluded that "the net effect of the tax change was to generate an upsurge in imports, not exports"?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who just asked the question is one of the most intelligent members of the opposition, so it throws me into despair that he would ask such a question when he knows that we cannot go by the immediate short-term one-month results. Everybody has to look at a period of at least five or six months to see what the trends are.

At the end of this year, believe me, the GST will have more than proven itself with the improvement we will have in our exports during the year. However we simply cannot go by one month only, and he knows that.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister might prefer to read the comments of Statistics Canada if he does not want to worry so much about what I say. The fact remains that the success of the recent budget will depend in large part on export led growth. Yet, recent trade figures suggest that the very opposite is happening. This is a direct result of this government's failure to close the major gap between Canadian and U.S. interest rates and to lower the value of the Canadian dollar.

How can the Minister of Finance expect export led growth when he persists in maintaining interest rates that do little or nothing to close the gap between Canadian and U.S. interest rates?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, apparently the outside world looks very favourably upon Canada and wishes to invest in Canada. We can hardly blame our Minister of Finance and the government because we have done such a good job that more people want to invest in Canada than want to deinvest in Canada.

One of the penalties is that our Canadian dollar increases in value. This is not something that we can deliberately wreck.

I would like also to point out to the hon. gentleman that today we are announcing that we are accelerating tariff elimination again at the insistence of the private sector. We are going to have a second acceleration of tariff reductions with the United States on over $2 billion worth of goods to follow up on last year's accelerated tariff elimination, which once again proves the success of the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Human Rights Commissioner Max Yalden has said that the number of complaints received by his office increased by 10 per cent last year. He expressed concern about racist incidents that have taken place in many parts of the country, such as flag trampling and the desecration of graves.

My question to the Minister of Justice is: When will she finally bring to this House the important amendments to the Human Rights Act that she has promised?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I hope to bring them forward some time this year. It is a source of regret to me that I am not able to bring them forward at this time. It has simply been the press of work and the other things that have gone forward from the Department of Justice.

It is a very, very comprehensive review, and I hope within the year to bring the amendments before the House.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister acting for the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Yesterday, the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, according to The Globe and Mail, rejected Mr. Yalden's call for a royal commission on aboriginal affairs.

Will the acting minister tell this House why the minister rejects that proposal and how their government plans to address what Mr. Yalden calls, and I quote: "this country's number one human rights priority"?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, nobody has rejected anything in terms of dealing with the question of Indian affairs.

What the government has done is launched on a program of real progress to address some of the issues that are outstanding.

For example, we have made great progress in the outstanding land claims issue in B.C., in spite of the court case that we heard a while ago. We intend to continue with that commitment regardless, in co-operation with the Indian bands out there and in co-operation with the B.C. government.

We also have a chiefs' committee which is in the final throes of discussions about how to fast track some of the specific claims that have been outstanding for years and years and years. We feel that we will be able to bring that forward very shortly.

We have just signed a framework agreement with the Westbank band of B.C. for self-government. We have many AFA agreements. Two of the latest: one in Saskatchewan gives the Lac La Ronge band the authority to manage $54 million and there was another one in Nova Scotia. There are a couple of AFAs coming up in Manitoba next week.

PROSTITUTION

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I want to know what the Prime Minister thinks about the tragedy of young people forced into prostitution.

We know what the Minister of Justice thinks because in her reply to the Standing Committee on Justice report on prostitution she said: "The Badgley committee and the Fraser committee have demonstrated that very few prostitutes really wish to leave the street solicitation trade".

The Badgley report says that 57.2 per cent of prostitutes wants to leave prostitution and start a new life.

Outreach and community workers are appalled by the fact that even a low statistic like that would be quoted by a reputable group like Badgley. They say it is much higher. Why is the government backing away from this? Why are they trying to slough off this problem? Why does the government not show some overdue and much needed compassion by bringing forward educational programs for the prostitutes to get them away from prostitution and on with their lives?

• (1440)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it must be a slow day on the other side of the Chamber for the hon. members to be—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): —repeating the same questions over and over again. I addressed the same question when it was asked by that member's deputy leader.

Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the Acting Leader of the Opposition would ask that question, but I am surprised that the hon. member would ask it since he is a lawyer and would have the knowledge of the Constitution of Canada and the constitutional jurisdiction. He would know that the provision of social services falls primarily within the provincial level. I can tell him that I am aware of and have been involved in discussions with people offering services at the provincial level to deal with those who are on the streets.

If the hon. member would be intellectually honest and would read the whole of my response to the standing committee report, he would know that I responded to three recommendations. Among the things that I did for example was indicate that I would not follow the recommendation of that report to fingerprint prostitutes, which is a very distinct way of confirming their identification as criminals and making it harder to get them off the street and back into a life. They are not criminals as such. They are people with deep social problems that need to be addressed.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the definition of slowness is how long it is taking this minister to act on this very serious problem.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLellan: How can we as Canadians and parliamentarians go blindly forward, knowing that the average age for young people entering into prostitution is 15—sometimes as young as 10 and 12—and they are out of the business by the time they are 25. If it is so lucrative, as the minister would have us believe, it is strange that they are out of this profession by the time they are 25. They do not want to get into prostitution. They are forced into prostitution. Physical violence and drugs threaten their every day.

Why will this government not act to do something to provide immediate help for these people?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, regrettably volume does not improve the coherence of the hon. member's comments.

The hon. member knows that social services are delivered primarily at the provincial level. The two senior levels of government have very specific responsibilities and I believe that our government has addressed its responsibilities seriously. Street prostitution and prostitution among young people are symptoms of a much deeper social problem. One of the aspects of that problem is family violence. Many of these young people go on to the street as a result of trying to escape from violent and abusive relationships in their families.

This government has just announced a very significant program to deal with that and the justice aspect of that is quite considerable. My colleague, the minister of health and welfare, is the lead minister on this.

We have our particular responsibilities as a federal government and our responsibilities push us in the direction of addressing some of the root causes of this terrible social problem. We are doing that. We are living up to our responsibility.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, how can the Prime Minister reconcile Canada's national interest and the sale of our key Crown corporations to foreign competitors?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): What key corporations, Mr. Speaker? For if the hon. member is asking me whether there is something incompatible between the sale of some Crown corporations and the national excellence of Canada, quite the contrary is true. For too long now the federal government has endorsed intervention into the private sector on the part of the central government and its public servants who have not always had the experience required to run some of these companies which normally should operate in the private sector.

[English]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, yesterday de Havilland announced 110 more lay-offs at its plant in Downsview. These lay-offs are just part of the downsizing of de Havilland to make it more attractive so that the Italian and French governments can buy it off.

Will the Prime Minister step in a block this sale of de Havilland to its major international competitors, or is the Prime Minister still insisting on going down in history as the architect of Canada's deindustrialization.

This government's policies are so bankrupt that that bankruptcy is matched only by Canada's record bankruptcies today.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, that particular firm announced a productivity strategy in 1989 which stated that there would be some downsizing. The whole market for aircraft around the world has levelled off and has declined. They cannot be immune from that plus, these cutbacks were in the productivity plan tabled over two and a half years ago.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

A series of Conservative ministers of transport have presided over the destruction of our national transportation infrastructure, VIA Rail and trucking in particular. Now this Minister of Transport wants to add the marine sector to the list of transportation modes disabled by the government.

Will the Minister of Transport listen to the warning voices from the marine industry and cancel the government's cost recovery program?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, under the previous ministers of transport of this government, there has been a great increase in the amount of service to the Canadian public. The trucking industry has had some difficulties, but we are working on that.

The airlines have increased service, and my friend well knows that particular fact.

The question of cost recovery has come up. I put out a discussion paper and allowed three months for input. I was asked to extend that deadline and I did so, from November 1 to the end of January. There were several submissions to my officials. We are looking at them and reviewing them and trying to come up with a solution which is reasonable for both the airline industry and the marine industry.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the people of Brandon who lost all air service because of deregulation would be pleased to listen to the minister's remarks on the great things that deregulation has brought us.

In The Montreal Gazette this morning, the Canadian Exporters Association is quoted as saying:

> The higher charges will unreasonably discourage Canadian exports and encourage the expanded use of U.S. sea and air ports by Canadian shippers.

They said that in a letter to the department.

Given the fact that we have already had a number of ships reflagged to foreign countries, a number of ships carved up for scrap, because there is not enough work on the Seaway or on the Pacific coast, will the minister not recognize that at very least in the marine industry, we cannot afford any additional costs. If we do so, there will be less ships, less taxes paid and less people working.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): As I indicated to my hon. friend, we are looking at the submissions made by the marine industry and will factor them into whatever decision we come up with.

My friend made some comment about air services. I tell my hon. friend that we are working on a rather new concept these days. It is called market determining service.

DISASTERS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

As the minister is aware, an unfortunate tragedy occurred in my riding on Monday when a Coast Guard ice-breaker collided with The Captain K, a smelt trawler, about 20 miles south of Port Dover with a tragic loss of life.

How could the ice-breaker Griffon, part of the Coast Guard's fleet responsible for the safety of our Canadian waters, with radar equipment which should detect boats in a 10-mile radius, not know The Captain K and crew were in its path. What assurances do the fishermen and their families have that every rule of safety was followed, that all the equipment used by the Coast Guard vessel was checked regularly and was completely functional the afternoon of March 18?

• (1450)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I join with my hon. friend, and I am sure, everyone in this House and in the country, in expressing regret about the loss of life.

I can tell my hon. friend that the search has been undertaken by the OPP. We are providing any and all assistance we can to the OPP in that search. The circumstances of the accident are under investigation by the Transportation Safety Board.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the same minister. Will the minister give his commitment in this House today that an independent federal inquiry will be held so as to assure the fishermen and their families that everything is being done to determine the cause of this accident and prevent any further occurrence of such a disaster?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to my hon. friend that the Transportation Safety Board of Canada is in fact an independent board. I have every confidence that such an independent investigation will take place.

FRIGATE PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services.

The minister said in the House yesterday with regard to the $100 million contract for the translation of the frigate technical manuals:

> —the cost of doing the translation through the company which was set up by the prime contractor is competitive with the cost of doing translations within government and other areas.

Will the minister tell us exactly what he means by competitive costs of such a task?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): First of all, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is dead wrong. It is not a $100 million contract. It is a contract for $21.9 million.

An hon. member: That is a big difference.

Mr. Dick: The Department of Supply and Services canvassed industry throughout North America and around the world to see who could do some bidding. Industry has cited to DSS cost estimates of $300 to $500 per page for this type of technical translation. That works out to a contract, for the amount of pages being done, of between $30 million and $50 million. In fact, we were able to arrange a contract with a firm in the province of New Brunswick for $21.9 million. That is a cost saving to the Crown of Canada.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, the figures I have seen are quite different. If the minister was doing his homework he would know, through the Secretary of State's translation department, that he is paying about three times the normal price for that kind of technical translation. The cost of such a job is about 35 cents per word. Canadians would save at least $50 million.

In view of this situation, will the minister explain why a contract of such magnitude was given without public tenders having been called? The minister refused to answer yesterday and today. Canadians want answers.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are getting answers, unfortunately the member is not listening.

Translating incredibly complex technical design pages is much different than doing instantaneous translation here in the House of Commons. We insist on making sure that we have good translations. We are not prepared, in any way, to jeopardize the safety of Canadian men and women at sea because the manuals, which explain how this sophisticated ship functions, are inaccurate or slightly different in their English and French versions due to translation errors. The law requires translation and we believe that francophones in this country should have the same opportunities on those ships as anglophones.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for science and technology.

The National Research Council has laboratories in every province except Alberta, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. In its five year plan, the NRC stated that it would like to build a major laboratory in Alberta. The lab would compliment Alberta's economic strength and help us in our drive to diversify the economy.

My question is this. When will the government establish a major NRC presence in Alberta?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a definitive answer, but I can tell the member that the five-year plan for the National Research Council has been approved. The regional initiatives have all been approved in principle, and we are going to continue to develop the plans for these regional initiatives. When those plans are complete, we will then look for the appropriate funding.

MANPOWER AGREEMENTS

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Shared jurisdiction over manpower creates over-all duplication of programs and wanton waste of human and financial resources. This is why Quebec is asking for the repatriation of its powers. In the short term, however, that is between now and March 31, agreements between Quebec and the federal government will end.

Therefore I would ask the minister whether these agreements involving $433 million will be renewed on a temporary basis to avoid penalizing unemployed Quebeckers, particularly in Montreal which now has the highest unemployment rate in Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for quite some time now officials of both government levels have been discussing the terms of the agreement due to expire at the end of this month. But we have often said that the Canadian government does not negotiate on a piecemeal basis with the Province of Quebec, that is clear.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am not asking for total repatriation, I am asking for the renewal of the current $433 million agreements within the existing constitutional framework.

I want to know whether the minister intends to renew these agreements on a temporary basis, in fullest respect for the letter and spirit of existing agreements. That is a clear question.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister gave the appropriate answer. We do not share the member's opinion concerning the dramatic outcome he envisages without first consulting all Canadians.

Indeed I am not the only one who thinks that way. In an article published in the March 15 Vancouver Sun the deputy leader of the Bloc Quebecois, Mr. Lapierre, is reported as saying, and I quote him because this is an interesting comment which the hon. member ought to read: "Well, as long as the political contract remains unchanged, I am a Canadian", said the Bloc Quebecois House leader on Thursday, "I am still a Canadian, I still have my Canadian passport and, in the end, I will probably remain a Canadian".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On December 10 I asked the minister—I will wait until the House quiets down a minute.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will please put his question.

Mr. Karpoff: On December 10 I asked the minister whether he would uphold the Canada Health Act in respect of deterrent user fees planned by the Government of Quebec for people using hospital emergency wards. At the time the minister said that he would ensure that the principles of the Canada Health Act would be fully respected and that he would communicate this to Quebec.

My question for the minister is this. Since the Quebec minister of health made it clear yesterday that he was proceeding with the introduction of deterrent user fees, can the minister tell the House if he did inform Quebec that these fees are a violation of the Canada Health Act and will he inform the House how he intends to enforce the Canada Health Act now?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, Quebec is well aware of the provisions of the Canada Health Act. As the hon. member knows, following the proposals made by Minister Côté in Quebec, the federal government got in touch with the Government of Quebec to request more information.

• (1500)

The minister in Quebec has indicated that he believes that what he is doing can be done within the confines of the Canada Health Act. The ball is in Quebec's court to demonstrate that it can be done.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East on a single question.

PROSTITUTION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my single question to the Prime Minister. It is in response to the ridiculous answers that his Minister of Justice gave to the opposition's suggestion that 15-year old prostitutes should be given help to get off the street.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister to give us his view of whether in fact he supports the position of the Minister of Justice that there should be no federal assistance to help get street prostitutes off the street, or whether in fact he rejects the position tabled by his minister on the first—

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is: Do I support the position of the Minister of Justice, as described by the Leader of the Opposition? No.

Do I support the position of the Minister of Justice, as articulated by the Minister of Justice? Yes.

Apart from the sensitivity and knowledge that the Minister of Justice conveyed in her responses, she also conveyed an intention of the Government of Canada to work very carefully with the Government of British Columbia, other provincial governments, and the municipalities, to make certain that as a society, since it is an important societal problem, Canadians make progress to ensure that this problem is dealt with in an effective way.

That is what the Minister of Justice said. That is the policy of this government. And that is what we are going to do.

POINT OF ORDER

ESTIMATES—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Friday, March 8, 1991, the hon. member for Ontario rose on a point of order to object to the inclusion of items in the Supplementary and Main Estimates which would authorize the payment of $153 per diem allowance to senators. He argued that the authority to pay such an allowance should have been sought by means of an amendment to the Parliament of Canada Act. He quoted extensive authority to the effect that spending estimates cannot be used to amend legislation, and he invited the Chair to use its authority to rule the offending estimates out of order.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands spoke to the issue on March 11, 1991. He asked the Chair to take into account that the Estimates are recommended to the House by the Governor General but that this recommendation is secured on the advice of Ministers of the Crown.

[English]

The hon. member then referred the Chair to two precedents. One concerned provisions in Appropriation Act No. 2 in 1965 for the payment of a gratuity to the spouse of a deceased member. The second related to the inclusion in vote 1 under Privy Council Office in Appropriation Act No. 3 in fiscal year 1989-90 of the salaries for ministers of state who do not preside over a ministry of state.

The hon. member for Churchill expressed the view that vote 2c in the Supplementary Estimates violated the Financial Administration Act in that it sought moneys to be used beyond the current fiscal year. Furthermore, he noted that the allowances in question should have been sought through an amendment to the Parliament of Canada Act. For this reason, he explained, the decisions of previous Speakers have been breached.

Finally, the hon. member for Churchill concluded that it was particularly inappropriate to secure an individual profit for certain members of Parliament by a means that are in any way questionable.

[Translation]

As both the items objected to are estimates requested by the Upper House, the Chair's initial reaction was to consider the propriety of this House interfering with the Estimates of the other place. In the last 20 years or so that the items from the Senate have been before committees of the House of Commons, no witnesses from the other place have appeared before the standing committee charged with considering the Estimates from the Upper House. Therefore no guidance can be sought in the review of those Estimates.

[English]

The "parentage" of the particular items challenged also remains doubtful. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands pointed out that these estimates were recommended to the House by the Governor General, and by constitutional convention, he notes, that must indicate that they are approved by cabinet. The hon. member for Churchill was more direct. He claimed that the government had improperly brought these estimates before Parliament and that the government had responsibility for ensuring that they were in proper form. The hon. member for Calgary West, on the other hand, has clearly distinguished between government estimates and the estimates from the House of Commons and the Senate.

These latter two, he stated, are not government estimates and come before us through the mechanisms specified in the Parliament of Canada Act. Now, section 51 of the Parliament of Canada Act provides that the estimates of the House of Commons "shall, on approval by the Board of Internal Economy, be transmitted by the Speaker to the President of the Treasury Board who shall lay them severally before the House of Commons with the estimates of the government for the fiscal year." On a plain reading of these words, it appears that the hon. member for Calgary West is perfectly correct in claiming a special status for the House of Commons estimates. The Chair was not, however, referred to nor has it uncovered any similar legislative provision as respects the Senate.

[Translation]

Against the issue of ownership of the Senate Estimates and the propriety of any intervention by the House of Commons is arrayed a formidable force composed of a substantial body of significant rulings by my predecessors and the provisions of the Financial Administration Act and citation 233 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which states that:

> "The cardinal principle on which the whole of our financial system is based is that of parliamentary control, and by this is understood not the control of Parliament in its constitutional sense, but control by the Commons alone."

[English]

The hon. member for Ontario has made his case carefully and well. In his intervention, he set out all the relevant sections of the Parliament of Canada Act to demonstrate that there is no provision in that statute upon which the Senate's present request for an allowance could be based. The hon. member then marshalled the various rulings of the Chair since 1971 in support of the concept that authority to act is received through legislation, whereas money to finance authorized action is received through the passage of an Appropriation Act. He contended that the allowance sought by the hon. senators should have been obtained by means of an amendment to the Parliament of Canada Act and, in an impressive survey of Speakers' rulings, demonstrated that in the past, attempts to legislate or to amend statutes other than Appropriation Acts by means of items inserted in the estimates have been disallowed.

The hon. member for Churchill agreed that there was an attempt here to do through appropriations what should be done through legislation and that this was in breach of the Speakers' rulings. He also made the point that the estimates according to section 27 of the Financial Administration Act should relate only to expenses for the current fiscal year and drew attention to the fact that Senate vote 2c in the Supplementary Estimates sought authority for the payment of the allowance in the current and subsequent fiscal year. It should also be noted that Senate vote 5 in the Main Estimates 1991–92 seeks the same authority not only for the current and subsequent fiscal years but for all subsequent fiscal years.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands in his intervention did not question the impact of the authorities quoted by the hon. member for Ontario. Rather, he provided for the Chair's consideration two precedents which the Chair will discuss briefly.

[English]

It appears common ground in the arguments that have been made, first, that statutes ought not to be amended by means of items in the estimates; second, that authority to act in cases where statutory provisions already exist should be sought by the passage of amending legislation and only then the money to finance that action should be sought through appropriation acts and, third, that funds requested in the estimates must relate only to the fiscal year for which they are requested.

• (1510)

In this event, there remains only for the Chair to decide, as the member for Kingston and the Islands put it, whether the items in the estimates providing for the senators' allowance fall into the impugned type of estimates.

[Translation]

The hon. member referred the Chair to a particular item in the schedule to Appropriation Act No. 2 for 1965 which authorized the payment of a gratuity to the spouse or estate of a deceased member of the Senate or House of Commons. I believe the hon. member himself recognized that this precedent is of little utility in the current circumstances, because it relates to a time when there was a radically different supply process in this Chamber and, of course, it predates the significant ruling of the Chair in the 1971–84 period.

[English]

The hon. member's second precedent referred to an item in the schedule to Appropriation Act No. 3 for the financial year 1989–90. Vote 1 under Privy Council Office, he noted, provided for the payment to ministers without portfolios, or to ministers of state who do not preside over a ministry, a salary equal to the salary paid pursuant to the Salaries Act to a minister of state who presides over a ministry. There are other provisions therein, but it is not necessary to quote at length. On June 18, 1982, the hon. member for Calgary Centre challenged precisely this item. He said, as recorded at page 18607 of Debates:

> In spite of the Chair's very clear rulings there is one vote—which seeks to amend legislation. I am referring to Privy Council, vote 1 which states:
> > Program expenditures, including the operation of the Prime Minister's residence; the payment to each member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada who is a minister without portfolio or a Minister of State who does not preside over a Ministry of State of a salary equal to the salary paid to Ministers of State who preside over Ministries of State under the Salaries Act, as adjusted pursuant to the Senate and House of Commons Act—
> The Salaries Act, as amended last July, states the remuneration to be paid to each minister. Section 5 states:
> > The salary of each Minister of State, being a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, who presides over a Ministry of State is $30,800 per annum.
> What Vote 1 of the Privy council seeks to do, is amend that act, because it says that ministers of state who do not preside over a ministry of state will have a salary equal to that paid to a minister of state who does preside over a ministry of state. That is exactly parallel, Madam Speaker, to a vote which you ruled out of order, appropriately so, last year, being vote 30 of Agriculture in the 1981–82 Main Estimates. That vote stated, and I quote:

> Agri-Food Regulation and Inspection—Contributions including compensation at rates determined in the manner provided by Section 12 of the Animal Disease and Protection Act to owners of animals affected with diseases coming under that Act that have died or have been slaughtered in circumstances not covered by the Act.

So that vote attempted to extend the act to situations not covered by it. Quite properly, Madam Speaker, you ruled that was an amendment to the legislation. Privy Council, vote 1 does exactly the same thing, and is clearly out of order based on your ruling of last year.

Madam Speaker Sauvé ruled on June 21, 1982, as recorded at page 18646 of Debates:

> The next item objected to by the hon. member for Calgary Centre is Privy Council, Vote 1 on the grounds that it seeks to amend legislation and, on this basis, the hon. member makes a parallel with Agriculture, Vote 30 in the 1981–82 Main Estimates which was ruled out of order on June 12, 1981. I must admit this vote caused particular concern to the chair. Agriculture, Vote 30 was specifically seeking to go beyond Section 12 of the Animal Disease and Protection Act and was ruled out of order for attempting to amend existing legislation, whereas Privy Council, Vote 1 does not refer to specific legislation but is in fact a continuation of a vote in the 1981–82 Main Estimates covered by the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981–82. In other words, Privy Council, Vote 1 does not attempt to amend the Salaries Act but provides for the salary of certain Ministers of State assigned by virtue of Section 23 of the government Organization Act, 1970, which is itself the legislative authority required. The authority for the amount can be found in the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981–82. I therefore find Privy Council, Vote 1 also in order.

That 1982 precedent, based, as it was, on existing legislative authority, is not on all fours with the present case. By extension, neither is the 1989–90 identically-worded item referred to by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

There is a clear line of authority evinced through Speakers' rulings as to the distinction between the proper subject-matter of legislation and the proper subject matter of supply.

[Translation]

Twenty years ago on March 10, 1971, when the House was just embarking on the present supply practice, Speaker Lamoureux ordered three one-dollar items struck from the motion to concur in the Supplementary Estimates. He explained as recorded at pages 4125–7 that such items when "—they are clearly intended to amend existing legislation should come to the House by way of an amending bill rather than as an item in the Supplementary Estimates." Speaker Lamoureux had occasion to confirm this principle in both 1973 and 1974.

[English]

Mr. Speaker Jerome, called upon to rule on a number of disputed items in Supplementary Estimates on March 22, 1977, characterized the central question to the issue as "whether or not the government can obtain, through the passage by Parliament of a supply item in an appropriation bill, authority which it does not have under existing legislation." He capsulized the discussion held in respect to that central question around two key points:

> First, changes in legislation ought to be dealt with by legislation and not by supply items. The opportunity to debate, to consider, and to discuss the two are totally different. Therefore, where changes to legislation are sought, they ought to be done in the proper way of all stages of a bill. The second point is that appropriation acts have temporary duration, being for the balance of the fiscal year. Therefore, they ought not to be used as a vehicle to finance or authorize ongoing programs.

That is in Debates, page 4220. In pronouncing on the general question for the sake of providing future guidance, Mr. Speaker Jerome said:

> On the general question, it is my view that the government receives from Parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item in my opinion ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation;

That is in Debates, page 4221. This was further expanded upon on December 7, 1977, in a similar ruling where Mr. Speaker Jerome said:

> I think all honourable Members understand that the supply process is confined in its method of debate and exposure to the House in that it is put forward by way of an estimate which is examined by the committees of the House, and, at the end of that process when the estimate is deemed to be reported or in fact reported back to the House, it is dealt with rather quickly by way of a supply bill on the final supply day of the particular semester in which the estimate was originally advanced.

Speaker's Ruling

> This is a process which has long been adhered to by the House which provides for an examination of the estimates in rather great detail, but does not provide for extensive debate between the various stages of the supply bill. As a result of that, it has long been a tenant (sic) of the House that supply ought to be confined strictly to the process for which it was intended; that is to say, for the purpose of putting forward by the government the estimate of money it needs, and then in turn voting by the House of that money to the government, and not to be extended in any way into the legislative area, because legislation and legislated changes in substance are not intended to be part of supply, but rather ought to be part of the legislative process in the regular way which requires three readings, committee stage, and, in other words, ample opportunity for Members to participate in debate and amendment.

That is from Votes and Proceedings, page 184.

[Translation]

As the hon. member for Ontario acknowledged in raising his point of order, Madam Speaker Sauvé in a carefully-structured ruling on June 12, 1981, set out the principles established by her predecessors. She said: This history shows that during the past ten years, members have objected that in one way or another the estimates that have been submitted from time to time by the government have attempted to do more than set out the spending requirements of the government for the next fiscal year. This is of course supposed to be the acknowledged purpose of estimates and appropriation acts. (Debates, page 10546)

• (1520)

[English]

In light of this line of authority, the direction the Chair must take in this regard is evident.

The language of both Senate vote 2c in the Supplementary Estimates 1990-91 and of vote 5 in the Main Estimates 1991-92 is specific. Vote 2c reads as follows:

> To authorize the implementation of the Forty-first Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, 2nd session, 34th Parliament, adopted by the Senate on June 5, 1990, and to authorize, in the current and subsequent fiscal year, payment of the allowance referred to within the report.

Vote 5 reads:

> To authorize the implementation of the Forty-first Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, 2nd session, 34th Parliament, adopted by the Senate on June 5, 1990, and to authorize, in the current and subsequent fiscal years, payment of the allowance referred to within the report.

In both instances authority is sought, first, to implement the Senate committee report which recommended the allowances and, second, to pay the allowances. The very wording of the votes confirms that there is no existing statutory authority under which the allowances could be paid. If the statutory authority existed there would be no need to seek approval for implementation in this fashion. The type of authority sought here is akin to approval in principle and, as was made clear in the rulings of both Speakers Lamoureux and Jerome, should be sought through legislation other than appropriation bills.

The lack of legislative authority on which to base a request for funds exceeding an existing and continuing act of Parliament, alone, would be reason enough for the Chair to order that the offending items be struck from the estimates; but authority is also sought to spend in a time period beyond the current fiscal year. That too is also clearly prohibited. The cycle of supply is articulated at page 677 of May's 18th edition "According to the "principle of annuality", which is strictly enforced every financial year is treated as a closed period separate from every other financial year. Money voted for and revenue received during a particular year cannot be applied to the use of a subsequent year; furthermore citation 483 of Beauchesne's fifth edition refers to "the Main Estimates to cover the incoming fiscal year". Citation 484 states:

> The purpose of the Estimates is to present to Parliament the budgetary and non-budgetary expenditure proposals of the Government for the next fiscal year.

[Translation]

May and Beauchesne read together leave no room for doubt on this point. Supply requests, through main or supplementary estimates must relate solely to the fiscal year for which they are granted.

[English]

The weight of precedent and the strength of the argument made by members in the House compel me to find that vote 2c under Parliament in the Supplementary Estimates 1990-91 and vote 5 under Parliament in the Main Estimates 1991-92 are not properly before the House, and are therefore deleted from the estimates. All proceedings relating to those specific votes are declared null and void and there can be no further proceedings relating to those two votes.

The Chair extends its appreciation to the hon. member for Ontario who so carefully set out his point of order and to the hon. members for Kingston and the Islands and for Churchill and for Calgary West for their contributions to this procedural debate.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege deals with the Standing Committee on Transport. I raise this matter now, based on the motion agreed to last week by the House pertaining to the standing committee on corporate affairs. That decision impacts directly on the point I want to make today.

My colleague from Ottawa—Vanier correctly pointed out, at page 18323 of Hansard for Tuesday, March 12, that the consumer and corporate affairs committee had not been convened for some time due to the resignation of the chairperson and had not met because there was no chair to preside.

I will spare the Chair the remaining details of that case. However I cite it for reasons of precedence because the next day, at page 18427 on Wednesday, March 13, the government Whip introduced a motion, agreed to by the House, that facilitated the committee's resurrection. In fact the Whip then noted the actual date and time the committee would be convened to hear representation regarding the Spicer commission.

Your Honour also conjectured, at page 18326 on Tuesday, March 12, as to why a resignation of the chair of the consumer and corporate affairs committee had not yet been filled. As the House knows, the chairman of the transport committee also resigned six months ago and the committee has not been able to meet say for one token attempt.

I respectfully submit that the transportation committee has a great deal of important work to cover in the interests of Canadians, including the parliamentary scrutiny of nearly $50 million in supplementary estimates, public fund expenditures which will not have been examined because of this government's refusal to have the committee sit.

I request that a similar motion to that adopted with respect to the consumer and corporate affairs committee be moved immediately.

Mr. Speaker: I may be able to assist hon. members. First of all I think I should point out that if I had to rule on this I would have to say, given the circumstances, it is not a question of privilege. It is more a point of order raised probably to invite the government to respond.

As I had to say the other day, this is not something in which the Speaker, under the present rules, can intervene. The Speaker can encourage hon. members to try to settle these matters. There may very well be discussions taking place at this very time. It is not necessary for the government to respond under the circumstances, but I would invite the hon. member for Calgary West to comment if he so chooses.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for raising the issue. It has been of considerable concern to government members that we have had eight of our committees, one special and seven standing committees that do not represent the balance of the House. We were pleased to be able to stand last Wednesday and resolve one of the problems.

The government's point of view on this from the beginning has been that there is a need, if we want to retain the same number of committees, to reduce the size of committees because the large size committee of 14 was not working well. The solution we had for consumer and corporate affairs was to increase that one to 15, which provides something closer to the composition of the House.

I want to report to the House that that committee has met successfully twice, but of the seven seats assigned to opposition members only three have been filled on each of those occasions. Thus there have been four vacant seats.

The obligation of governing has required us to fill the eight seats. Last night that led to a dilemma in that opposition members who were present did not want the government members each to have their turn in questioning the witnesses from the Spicer commission. They felt that the questioning process went on too long because there were in fact 10 members involved before getting to the second round. In fact some visitors to the committee who are Independents in the House walked out because they were having to wait so long and did not have a chance.

I think it speaks to the issue from the government point of view that if the committees in many cases, not all, were to be somewhat smaller then the participation rate of members both on the opposition and the government side would be fuller and more complete and we would not have the phenomenon of filling the chair simply to fulfil the voting function of a committee.

With that in mind—and I do not know if the member who raised this issue speaks for his party—I have said to at least one Whip of a recognized political party in this place that I would be only too happy to guarantee the consent of my side of the House immediately, if members would like, to a motion that would create the transport committee based on the same membership that we established for a special committee on transport in December and November to deal with a major transport issue. That is different from the solution for consumer and corporation affairs. That was to make the committee one larger. As I say the experience with that is the largeness was not really necessary and in fact has not been helpful.

If we go to the special committee which we created for November and December to look at the issue of open skies, that committee is smaller. It has eight members. It is something that approximates much better the balance in the House. If we have unanimous agreement at this point, within the next three minutes we could have that committee formed, and then I would be glad to instruct the Table to call a meeting to select a chairman.

It is an eight-member committee, with five government and three opposition members. That is the composition of it as a special committee. It worked very well on the open skies issue. What I am objecting to is too many 14-member committees where government members have to attend, but it frustrates the opposition because those who come from the opposition do not have adequate time and certainly the government members do not have adequate time. All we have been after is restoring the composition to reflect the House in all eight cases.

In this particular case, a committee of eight has already demonstrated its capacity to work well and would work well in the future. I stand here right now prepared to agree to that as a resolution if I can have agreement from the other two parties.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the offer which has been extended by the chief government Whip and we will take it under advisement.

I want to put on the record that in point of fact some of the statements alluded to by my colleague opposite are not correct in their totality. The member, I think, referred to the fact that the committees are not working. That was part and parcel of his understanding and desire to have change, particularly in the composition vis-à-vis the number of members on each of those committees.

From our perspective there are times and occasions whereby members of Parliament who may be assigned to a particular committee may not be able to attend for a variety of reasons, constituency related or what have you. By and large the committee system we are operating under has worked reasonably well for most members of Parliament, particularly those of us in the opposition. I cannot speak for my colleagues in the New Democratic Party. I wanted to put on record that there was no profound dislike for the committee system we operate under at the present time.

We have difficulties in the fact that the government has not wanted to proceed with calling these committees together for the purposes of reviewing various estimates and various Orders of the Day as they pertain to those committees.

I thank the hon. member for his offer. We will give it due consideration.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, having raised the point, I too want to thank the hon. member opposite. I also plead with the Chair and the House to take one step back for a moment. I am not trying to raise an issue where we can go into a period of negotiation across the way.

I respectfully submit that point of privilege I raise is a point of privilege because I do feel my rights and privileges as a member to participate on the transport committee to do its work are being infringed upon. That aside, Given the precedents of the past, last week; given the concern of Canadians on the transport committee, I am asking you, Sir, to rule specifically on whether that committee, as it is presently structured, will come together again to fulfil the work we were sent here to do, and not enter now a period of negotiation with the Whip across the way.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has certainly put forward his case with great courtesy and obvious sincerity. I thank the hon. member for that. I thank the hon. member for Calgary West for indicating, as the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has responded in like kind, a willingness to discuss the matter.

As I have said to the hon. member for Hamilton West, I have some serious doubts as to whether there is in this matter any question of privilege. However, he has asked me if I would look at it quietly. I will take that into consideration. I think hon. members know that it is a rare case indeed where the Speaker ought to try to intervene in a committee. There is an indication on the government side that maybe this can be resolved and an indication by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, speaking for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, that that willingness is at least appreciated. I suggest that hon. members might want to have further discussion concerning the matter.

I think it is legitimate to say that all members are concerned, and I would think that the public would be too, when a long period of time goes by without a committee being able to function, whatever the cause of that might be.

I thank hon. members. I will come back and comment on the point made by the hon. member for Hamilton West.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

THIRD REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the third report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture in relation to Bill C–98, the Farm Income Protection Act, with amendments.

In recognition of the importance of this bill to Canadian farmers, I would like to thank the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of State for Agriculture, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister, the officials, farm groups and my committee staff who worked so diligently to allow us to make a rapid yet thorough examination of this bill.

Finally, may I thank the members of my committee, particularly those from the two opposition parties, who at all times worked toward the welfare of the farm community without partisan debate.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS—PRESENTATION OF TWENTY-SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the twenty–sixth report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure regarding joint sittings of standing committees.

[English]

TWENTY–FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the twenty–fifth report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in relation to the order of reference from the House of Commons dated April 30, 1990, in relation to the rules and procedures as they relate to the limiting of debate in cases where the committee has reached an impasse.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a series of petitions from residents of my constituency who note that property taxes are escalating for health care, education, infrastructure replacement, social and leisure services, and protective services.

In that regard they note that the federal government should continue to bear at least 30 per cent of the cost of maintaining security of Canadian citizens and petition this House to continue with the 70–30 per cent cost sharing ratio between provincial and federal governments so that the RCMP can continue to be a national police force throughout this country.

They reject the federal government's proposal to off–load that on to the provinces and make it a 25–75 per cent sharing.

MIDDLE EAST

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 412 people to present on behalf on the students of Polyvalente Henri-Bourasse who are concerned about the effects of the war on their future. These high school students are asking us to look actively for peaceful solutions to the diplomatic stalemate in the Middle East to allow them to keep faith in dialogue and in life.

Mr. Speaker, the war may be over but there are still problems in that part of the world. A solution will have to found that is satisfactory to all concerned if we want it to be lasting. In the name of my constituents, I urge the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and all members of Cabinet to pursue their efforts, using the influence gained by Canada among the members of the United Nations, to identify and implement means of ensuring durable peace for our young people.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-97, an act to provide borrowing authority, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. McDougall (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, as we start the third reading on this borrowing bill, I am sure that most of us in this House of Commons realize that the greatest issues facing this nation today is national unity and of course the recession.

This borrowing bill allows the government to raise money under the Financial Administration Act:

> —by way of loan or by the issue and sale of securities of Canada, in such amount or amounts not exceeding in the whole twenty-six billion, four hundred million dollars, as may be required for public works and general purposes.

At the outset, I want to say to the Minister of Finance that when he stated during the 1984 election campaign that it would not be necessary to raise taxes to cut the deficit because all that needs to be done is cut government expenditures, he was laying the groundwork for his own financial management failure.

Since that time, not only has the government cut government services but the Minister of Finance has raised taxes 33 times. The last big tax hike was the GST. What is very discouraging to all Canadians is that in spite of all the cuts and the tax increases, the national debt is still growing by leaps and bounds. Financial management on the part of the government appears to them to be out of control.

Added to this is the longstanding and ongoing concern about the national unity of our country. This does nothing to create confidence in the economy of our nation, and that is sad. It is also sad that we are in the middle of a government created recession.

In spite of six years of economic growth which the Minister of Finance himself has called extraordinary, and in spite of 33 separate tax increases to which I have made reference, the accumulated public debt has more than doubled from $166 billion in 1984 to $351 billion in March 1990, and is expected to climb to $389 billion this year. In six years this government has more than doubled the national debt and is well on its way to tripling it. Yet the Minister of Finance back in 1984 thought that this whole matter was so simple that all he had to do was to gain power, get the finance portfolio, cut government expenditures, and the deficit would go away.

That did not happen. Canadians should not bother to listen to what this Minister of Finance has to say about the deficit and the public debt because he has no credibility left on this issue or on any other. The made-in-Canada recession, the Conservative government's first ever made-in-Canada recession, has reduced domestic demand and created an extra burden for our producers here at home.

The Conservative government's monetary policy has caused the dollar to increase from a low of about 69 cents U.S. in February 1986 by 26 per cent to its present level of nearly 87 cents U.S. The Canadian Exporters Association has reported that each cent increase in the exchange rate costs Canada $1.3 billion in lost export sales. That is certainly beginning to tell on the jobs and the unemployment figures across this country.

High interest rates have been used to prop up the Canadian dollar. Although Canadian interests rates have dropped dramatically from a high of over 14.05 per cent on May 24 of last year, they are still about four percentage points higher than the United States rates. This has made the cost of borrowing to modernize or expand prohibitive.

For those in the forest industry, it has had another effect. That famous memorandum of understanding was signed by the present government a few years back on the eve of the signing of the free trade agreement with the United States, whereby Canadian softwood lumber producers were charged a 15 per cent export tax to sell their lumber into the United States. They called it free trade.

Our Canadian manufacturers have had to find other markets and some have gone to Europe. In so doing, after they have sold their product and shipped it, they found that they had to wait for a long time—90 days and even over 100 days in some cases—for their money. As a result, they have to borrow money in order to keep their business floating. They borrow at high interest rates, and this adds to their costs of operation in addition to the 15 per cent that blocked them out of the United States markets. These people are having a very difficult time.

Then there is the old story, all the promises and all the rhetoric about research and development. In spite of Conservative government commitments to raise the level of research and development to 2.5 per cent of the GDP, spending on research and development has declined steadily over the six years of the present government's management, from 1.43 per cent in 1986 to a measly 1.28 per cent of GDP in 1989. The Conservative government has cut funding to the National Research Council by over 20 per cent since 1984-85. Certainly other scientific ventures in this country have been attacked as well.

At a time when the government brags about cutting back and being thrifty, the Fraser Institute, a private non-profit research organization, which monitors government spending and taxation trends, stated in a release on February 18 that "government spending is at an all-time high". The report goes on to say that "spending on defence, police and fire protection across the country are receiving a declining share of the financial pie".

It is very interesting to note that spending on defence, police and fire protection amounts to $835 per capita and has not kept pace with other categories of spending. In fact these functions now get a smaller fraction of total government budgets than they did in 1970.

Cuts in transfer payments to the provinces have meant that provincial funds have had to be redirected in order to make up the shortfall at the provincial level.

Last fall unemployment insurance certainly became a great issue in my area as it did in many others. The bill which was stalled in the Senate for a long time and which was supposed to be such a great boost to all Canadians came into force. In that bill there was a clause that emphasized the benefits to Canadians who are working for relatives, called the arm's length clause. Certainly we can use eastern Ontario as a good example because we have family owned businesses all over the place. When a father laid off his son or brother-in-law or sister-in-law, they then went to apply for unemployment insurance only to find their case had to be passed on to National Revenue for a special ruling to make sure that they were at arm's length from the business.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration says: "That is right". I just wish that minister had been standing in my office when I had some of these people there making representations to me when they had not had a pay cheque for eight or nine weeks and that included Christmas. The government should be ashamed of itself for imposing that kind of restriction on people.

One person had worked for 20 years and had never claimed unemployment insurance. When he went into the office to apply, he ran into this great unemployment insurance rejuvenation bill that was supposed to be such a great boost to him only to find that he had to go through Christmas and New Years and nine weeks without a pay cheque.

There were so many calls over this that the department finally started getting it sorted out. The fact remains it was mismanagement of the legislation. Neither the department of employment nor was the Department of National Revenue was ready for it. Yet we heard screams in the House day after day about how terrible it was that this legislation was being held up. There are many people out there who wish today that it was still being held up.

I have obviously got my message through to the minister today, and I am glad, because many people have suffered through her trying to straighten out her department's relationship with National Revenue and to get the system working. It was not they who straightened it out, it was all those who had complaints and who were having their livelihood taken away from them or denied them.

Mr. Speaker, on the issue of national unity in Canada, which has so much to do with the future direction of our country, in fact almost everything to do with it, I want to share with everyone a very moving experience I had yesterday.

There is a little humorous incident I would like to relate to everybody. While we were in the VIP lounge at Uplands yesterday with the Governor General, the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence, senior military personnel, policy people, and several others, a colonel stepped out and in his usual brisk and efficient manner said that they were going to divide the group into two parties. He said: "We are going to have the red party and we are going to have the blue party". At that stage, the Prime Minister spoke up and said: "Len Hopkins is going to be very lonely out there, we will have to give him a podium all by himself".

The irony of the whole matter is that the Prime Minister ended up in the red party and I was in the blue party. Can you imagine a situation like that for parliamentary unity? There are some great sacrifices one has to make from time to time in this place.

The other thing I want to really zero in on here is the tremendous welcome home for the first field hospital group. They were so glad to hit Canadian soil. You have to witness it to realize what an impact it really has on people. One young man said to me: "Len, I just feel like getting down and kissing the ground". A young nurse said: "You know, in this country we say we live in the greatest country of the world. But you never witness it until you have gone abroad, up to your ankles in mud, unhealthy conditions, see the economy in other certain parts of the world, see the difficulties that people face. You come home and you thank God for your nation".

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you and every member of this House, and all Canadians, will agree that these people are great ambassadors at home for the work they do, but they are fantastic ambassadors when sent abroad. They have done a super job for us.

It presented a real challenge to me yesterday to talk to these people who had gone outside the country, and who had performed their duties so well for Canada, and who delivered the good Canadian message to foreign groups. Here we are at home, in this great nation they love so much, and we have issues here that could split the country wide open.

If there is anything that we, as Canadians, must take from this great experience, it is that we should back off a bit. We should take a look at ourselves in a mirror—and I do not mean just some, I mean everybody—and ask ourselves where we are coming from. Here we do in fact have everything that any human being would want on the face of this earth. God has blessed us with everything that any human being would really want.

• (1600)

The Fathers of Confederation put this nation together with great difficulty. Other people have come along since that time and have had tremendous input into it. Many people across this land have come from many other countries and built this nation and developed it. They worked long, hard hours.

I remember, even though I was not very big, the Great Depression of the 1930s. I was not even going to school, but I can remember what people went through at that time. I sometimes look back and wonder how people ever survived that. I think of my mother and father. The thing that I feel brought them through it and helped them to face up to those issues of providing food for their family and remaining very loyal to their country and very interested in their country and managing their affairs very scrupulously was the fact that they had a faith. They had a faith through their own religious beliefs and they practised them.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you have witnessed this yourself, where your own parents taught you many great qualities: humanitarianism, your religious duties, your duty to your country, your duty to do a day's work for a day's pay, and a duty to look toward the future and find out what you can do for mankind.

I can really get carried away on this subject because there is nothing that is more important to every Canadian, from coast to coast and from south to north in this nation today, than to sit down and talk and put this nation together so that it is going to last for generations and centuries to come. It is going to mean a flexibility of our minds. We cannot all be staid in our ways and it is either my way or the highway. That is not the philosophy we are going to have to exercise in this country. It is part of our relationship with our own fellow people.

We as civilians in Canada need the same kind of dedication, breadth of mind, personal discipline, desire and seriousness to keep this country together. We will require a commitment on the part of all Canadians and a flexible attitude on many matters. That is what those young Canadian Forces personnel taught me yesterday. I have been groping for some time to find a real, sincere and open way to express my feelings. I must say, with the words they were expressing yesterday and what they have come through and their dedication to duty, we must as civilians in this Canadian nation can do our work out there across the country, we must, as 295 members in this House of Commons do our work in a sincere and dedicated manner for this country and open up our minds and communicate well with each other and have a firm commitment. But we must also have faith in ourselves, we must also have faith in our maker and ask for his guidance and we must have faith in our fellow parliamentarians. That is what is going to keep this nation together. I think it would be a great idea if all parties in this House of Commons, perhaps even through you, Mr. Speaker, had a world day of prayer for the Canadian nation, a special service in every church, in every religious centre across the country.

I am delivering this type of speech at this time because we are today passing a bill to borrow billions of dollars to cover the costs of operating the country. We cannot just go on doing this forever. We must work closely together to put things together in this nation and to build the Canadian nation, but we must have that communicating factor and have our total act together.

Those men and women who have returned from the Persian Gulf are expecting parliamentarians in general to work to keep our country strong here at home. If we can do our work here at home as well as they are able to do theirs abroad, we will have it made.

It is important to have a strong federal government in Canada, one that relates in realistic terms to the regions of this country. If Canadians are going to continue to have any of the fine qualities and services of life that have been available to them for many years, this must happen.

There is another angle to this. If Canada is strong at home then we can continue to perform constructively and with humanitarianism in international affairs. When we look back over Canadian history, we have seen many Canadian statesmen who have led the way in many very useful operations in international affairs. Canada has played a role in international affairs far beyond our size and, I suppose, importance as a nation but it has been done. Only if we are strong here at home and have a unified nation in the future, only then can we continue to be a great influence on other nations of the world.

In order to put this country on a solid footing, accountability on the part of government is extremely important. We had a recent example in this House, and it was raised again today, and I was very much interested in that subject when it was raised in the House today because I had it in my notes to mention it here this afternoon. We had a recent example where the government actually referred the Supplementary Estimates which contained the estimates for the Spicer commission to a parliamentary committee that had not had a chairperson since last September. As you know, this led to a great confrontation in this House.

It also had implications for the public accounts committee, which I have the privilege of chairing because, as you recall, some members in this House wanted to refer the matter to the public accounts committee. That could not happen because I had to reply to a letter that I received requesting this, and I know it was brought to the Prime Minister's attention as well. I must point out that there are serious procedural limitations contained in the mandate of the public accounts committee to carry out such an inquiry in this House at that time. Standing Order 108(3) defines the mandate of the public accounts committees as follows:

> The mandate of the Standing Committee on
> (e) Public Accounts shall include, among other matters, review of and report on the Public Accounts of Canada and all reports of the Auditor General of Canada, which shall be severally deemed, permanently referred to the Committee immediately they are laid upon the Table; > and any other matter which the House shall from time to time refer to the standing committee.
> The term "among other matters" refers to an order of reference from the House of Commons.

• (1610)

The most recent public accounts tabled in October 1990, before the establishment of the Spicer commission, are a comprehensive record of government expenditures for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990. Expenditures after that date would not be shown in the 1989–90 public accounts and, therefore, we had no estimates from the Spicer commission.

Similarly, the last report of the Auditor General of Canada covers the period ended March 31, 1990. The Spicer commission was brought in after that, so it was not included in that report either.

I regretfully had to say that our existing mandate of the public accounts committee does not permit us to carry out the relevant enquiry. The committee would need an order of reference from this House. However, it is important to note that all commissions of inquiry are accountable to Parliament for the expenditure of public funds. Treasury Board policies govern these expenditures, including the guidance given to all departments and agencies in matters of financial administration by the Office of the Comptroller General.

In addition, financial controls are exercised by the Receiver General's department in the disbursement of moneys. Of course, these expenditures are subject to audit by Parliament's auditor, the Auditor General of Canada.

As members are aware, Supplementary Estimates C, 1990–91, relating to the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, have been referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations. Because this committee does not have a chairperson, it has not been meeting. Failure to take steps to appoint a chairperson and activate the committee in question will simply indicate a lack of will on the part of Parliament to control the public purse effectively and credibly.

I am glad to see today that Parliament is grappling with that question and I hope it will soon be settled.

The other item I wanted to bring to the attention of the House is a letter that was written to me by the President of the Treasury Board, and it gives me great concern. It does deal very specifically with public accountability.

He said:

> In response to the concerns expressed in your previous letter about the participation of my officials at a meeting that was held on November 28, and in the future I would like to make my position clear.

We had requested certain officials to be there to reply and that did not occur. There were officials there, but they were sitting back against the wall.

> It is my view that officials of the secretariat should, in general, testify as witnesses before the committee in two circumstances.

The rules of this House point out very clearly the powers of committees, and a minister of the Crown should not be telling a parliamentary committee, and particularly the public accounts committee, that on two specific occasions would his officials appear.

The first he said is, and I quote:

> —when the Auditor General has specifically directed recommendations or observations to the Treasury Board.

The second is:

> —when, in certain instances, it is useful for the committee to have officials of the secretariat available to respond to general questions on specific Treasury Board policies. Beyond these two instances, however, I feel that it is generally inappropriate for secretariat officials to testify as witnesses on matters that relate primarily to the operations of other departments.

The problem here is that Treasury Board is supposed to be the controller of the purse, and lays down guidelines for government departments and their expenditures.

We have taken it, and it has been a tradition, that officials from Treasury Board can appear when the Auditor General is there or appear when people are there from other departments.

Going on with the minister's letter, he says:

> The accountability of other departments to the Public Accounts committee would not, in my view, ordinarily be served by such participation. These criteria govern the arrangements that were explicitly made with members of your staff regarding participation of the secretariat at the committee meeting of November 28, 1990 which was addressing the project to modernize the CCGS Louis Saint-Laurent, the icebreaker.

There are differences of opinion on that discussion as well. He goes on:

> Pursuant to discussions with senior officials of the secretariat, your staff agreed that my officials would only observe at the meeting.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that that was not my understanding at all.

> It was also agreed that any issues raised by the committee touching on the role of Treasury Board would be promptly followed up on thereafter.

With regard to "thereafter", the purpose of holding committee meetings, particularly those on accountability, of an accountability role, is to have these people there to answer questions, and put those answers on the records of the committee meeting at the time. A person who was there did not come up to the table at the time when we asked for a person from Treasury Board. Another person did, but apparently nobody was really designated to do it.

The minister went on to say:

> With respect to the meeting of your committee on December 18, 1990 on the subject of the Louis Saint-Laurent icebreaker, please be advised that either Mr. David McEachran, deputy secretary of the Administrative Policy Branch, or Mr. Richard Paton, Assistant Secretary in the same branch, will be attending in order to respond to questions of the committee on Treasury Board's policies touching on the management of projects.

They came to that meeting. There is no sense in senior officials advising ministers that they do not have a role to play at committee meetings in the House of Commons. I totally disagree with the suggestion that Treasury Board should not be present at meetings when they are asked to be there in relation to other departments. I want to make that very clear.

It is spelled out clearly in Beauchesne that a parliamentary committee can send for persons, papers, et cetera, and can invite people to appear before the committee. If those people do not want to attend, the committee can order them to attend. You are well aware of that, Mr. Speaker.

I want to send a message to senior people in Treasury Board that they, too, are accountable to the Parliament of Canada.

I hope that Parliament will come to grips with picking a chairman for the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations so that that issue can be heard and decided upon.

• (1620)

I want to touch briefly on Public Service 2000, which is a very important part of government policy in the management of its employees. Our public accounts committee recommended that a special committee be set up to hear the Public Service 2000 issues. We felt that this would have to be an in-depth study. We certainly did not have time to do it, even though it was in the Auditor General's report. We had about six meetings on it and we submitted our report to the House. The President of the Treasury Board said that he would like to have a special committee study Public Service 2000. He also went on to say that he was going to consult with other people in the Public Service and with unions.

There was a time at a news conference when I was a bit concerned because the President of Treasury Board had indicated that there was no agreement for a special committee on this, and he blamed my own House leader at the time as one who did not agree with it. That was certainly not true. Our own House leader did agree with it.

I hope that the President of Treasury Board will continue to agree, as he did in a recent letter to me a second time, saying that he will refer the matter for a special hearing. There are certain things about which Treasury Board has the full right, as the government of the day, to make regulations. However, as we continue here, we should have some in-depth hearings on this because these people are the backbone of government in doing the work and providing a service to Canadians.

Budget matters are closely related to the bill before us today because the borrowing bill supplements what the budget does not provide for. There are many things here that are really very important to Canadians. Again, it is a matter of getting our house in order.

The government of the day is simply passing the responsibility for a larger share of medicare and post-secondary education over to the provinces. This is coming right down to the municipal level in the provinces because the provinces have to transfer more money into providing these other services and they have fewer grants to offer to municipalities. Therefore, the addition has to be made up in the taxation of the local municipality.

The government now admits that it will need amendments to the Canada Health Act to protect Canadians. It will have to use a big stick in the provinces, forcing them to provide proper services to Canadians because the federal government is refusing to give the provinces the cash.

Then we go on to unemployment, where the Minister of Finance in his budget predicted greater unemployment. We are certainly seeing it across the country and we are certainly seeing it in my own region of eastern Ontario.

We forecast that the government would have to raise unemployment insurance premiums to cover the cost of unemployment insurance changes contained in Bill C-21.

The government promised gradual increases. Its interpretation of gradual increases was the 24 per cent increase that it brought in, in the budget, to cover UIC changes. That has hurt small business and it is certainly taken from the people's paycheques.

Training and education have both been hit by the budget. A new study on transfer payments is supposed to come out this spring. I have said before, and I will say it again, that the day is not far off when there will have to be a royal commission once again into the study of the dividing up of the financial pie in this country between the federal government and the provinces. Otherwise, the whole thing is going to be out of whack again.

I am talking about a commission similar to the Rowell-Sirois commission of 1937, which has served us well over the years but which is now being torn apart.

Regional development was not really mentioned. It is going to come later, and we can expect that it will be all bad news. In eastern Ontario we have lost VIA Rail service from Ottawa to North Bay. The forest industry is down. Large numbers have been laid off in that industry. Agriculture is certainly not witnessing very pleasant days in many respects. Industries have closed. Nobody seems to be listening. We do not have any regional development plans for eastern Ontario.

I do not want to burden the Minister of Employment and Immigration any more. I hate to see her disturbed because she is such a nice individual to talk to. She is approachable as a minister, but I know she has been rather upset by some of my comments on that terrible UI legislation.

I want to close by making a tribute to the Auditor General of Canada. I can well recall some of the governments which I supported over the years; we did not always like what the Auditor General said. This government is no different. As parliamentarians, and the Auditor General being a servant of Parliament, there is not a member of the House who should not support the Office of the Auditor General very firmly.

I think Kenneth Dye has served this nation well. I have had the privilege of working very closely with him over the last two years plus, as have other members of the committee. We have found him to be very candid, open, up-front and well informed on his subjects.

He comes out with his reports and we see in this House where they become a great foofaraw for a couple of days. Then it dies down, and it is left to the public accounts committee to do the work for days thereafter. It is a pleasure to do that. We who serve on the public accounts committee have enjoyed it. It is a very broad perspective on government.

Kenneth Dye is a dedicated man. He has done his utmost to serve Canadians and this Parliament well. He is also served well by a very capable staff, people who are in place to do a job for him, to do his research. Also, in his important role to Canadians, he is seen as the defender of the purse.

I said to him the other day that during his term in office he learned the approach of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, when Franklin Delano Roosevelt used to have his little fireside chats. He would turn on the American nation, get them over to his side, and then Congress would have to vote along with him or the pressure came from the American public. We have known Kenneth Dye to be an outspoken person who had no hesitation to raise issues publicly. When the Canadian people heard him speak, they respected him and brought that to the attention of parliamentarians. This is an office, Mr. Speaker, that reports to Parliament through you. The Auditor General is a servant of Parliament. We thank Ken Dye and his people for the service they have provided to the House, to the Parliament of Canada in general and to the people of Canada.

We wish our new Auditor General every success. It is not an easy job dealing with politicians from time to time, but they all come into it knowing full well what their role is. I hope the new Auditor General will have the support of this House as he takes on his new duties.

There are other things about which I would like to speak, but I am going to stop here because I am sure there are other people who want to comment. Besides that, I am losing my voice, so it may not be by voluntary consent. I want to thank you for your time, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank the members of the House for their patience.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Under Standing Order 43, the hon. member did have unlimited time with no questions or comments.

We will now proceed to the next speaker who will have 20 minutes plus 10 minutes of questions and comments.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speakers, I have first to congratulate my predecessor on a marathon session which has covered a great deal of ground. As usual he has made some very important points reflecting his experience in the public accounts committee.

We have in front of us a very large amount of money which this government is asking this Parliament to grant it. This bill, if it passes the House, will authorize the government of this country to borrow as much as $26.4 billion.

That is such a large amount of money that it is almost inconceivable to the average person in this country. It is not the kind of thing which is easy to think about. If we think of it in terms of this country of 26 million, each of us is permitting the government to borrow $1,000 on our behalf. Each and every person across this country is giving authorization to this government to borrow $1,000.

We have to ask the question: Is this a government which has earned the right to do that kind of massive borrowing on behalf of the people of Canada? Since it came before Parliament and last asked for authority to borrow from the people of Canada, does its record in the past year show a sensitivity to the concerns of the people of Canada? Does its record show that it has financially organized its affairs well? Does its record show that its economic leadership in particular gives reason for confidence to those 26 million Canadians?

Mrs. McDougall: Absolutely.

Mr. Langdon: The minister says: "Absolutely". I have to say absolutely not.

I am sure when the minister has had a chance to work her way through the large amounts of correspondence with which she has to deal and looks at some of the fresh statistics which have emerged today, she will realize how devastating they are with respect to this government's record. I am sure that she cannot be pleased to see that the number of bankruptcies in this country are up by 68 per cent in the past year. Bankruptcies, especially in the province of Ontario, are more than double what they were.

Mrs. McDougall: There is an NDP government there.

Mr. Langdon: She mentions that there is an NDP government there. The reason for that is that the Liberal government in Ontario, as well as this government, did such a poor job that on September 6, 1990 it was swept out of power, just as this government will be hopefully swept out of power in the very near future. I hope the minister survives because the minister is somebody I look forward to facing when she is in opposition.

A total of 430,000 jobs have been lost in this country in the last year. This government used to boast about how it would have created 200,000 jobs a year. I think at one stage it even got up to 300,000 jobs a year. Whereas in one year it has lost 430,000 permanent jobs. That comes directly out of Statistics Canada's own figures, in case the minister is searching for the source.

The impact has been especially difficult in the manufacturing sector. Employment in manufacturing has declined by 11.7 per cent in the past year. That means that out of every 10 jobs in manufacturing a year ago, 1.2 of those jobs has disappeared. Can you conceive that there has been such a destruction of jobs in manufacturing, Mr. Speaker? If you think that is bad, you just have to look at construction where the result has been a decrease of 12.1 per cent in the past year.

Part-time employment, it is true, has increased. Part-time employment has gone up by 98,000. That is not because people want part-time jobs. It is because that is all they can get. However, 430,000 of those permanent jobs that they would prefer have disappeared.

It is not just bankruptcy statistics and unemployment statistics. It is the international trade statistics that came out today that we should also look at. What the government said to us was that we in this country were going to thrive because of free trade. Free trade was going to be the solution. The minister's business friends went across the country spending millions of dollars to buy the last election for this government on the promise that there would be hundreds of thousands of new jobs thanks to trade.

What has happened? Let's look at the statistics.

The statistics tell us that for January exports actually decreased by $352 million and that instead of imports decreasing too, imports increased by $244 million.

• (1640)

That means in fact that the surplus which existed in January of this year was just $166 million. That compares with a surplus of a billion dollars in the month previous. In fact, if we look at the trend, it has been downward in that surplus. Instead of the free trade deal giving us benefits, it has been costing us exports and leading to new imports into this country.

That is why we see the jobs disappearing across Canada. That is why the 430,000 jobs that have been lost, disappeared in this last year. Of course it has to do with things like the high interest rates this government has followed. It has to do with the fact that the value of the Canadian dollar, which they have kept, is far too high.

A former cabinet minister from this government suggested that this was part of the free trade deal arrangement, that the dollar had to be kept high, to keep the United States interested in signing the free trade deal. The 430,000 jobs lost as a result of that high dollar and the high interest rates are probably related to the free trade deal too.

I can tell you that in my constituency, and in the constituencies of many of the people that are around me today in the House, there has been a devastating loss of jobs directly, because of free trade.

In my constituency, 40 plants shut last year, 40 factories that were providing work with people. In many cases they not only shut down, they transferred their operations to the United States or to Mexico. The government, with its immense wisdom, looking at this trend, has decided to make it even easier for companies to transfer to Mexico. Instead of trying to do something about the loss of jobs and the loss of factories, they have entered into trade negotiations with Mexico, to try to make it possible to shift even more jobs to the low wage parts of Mexico. Sheer insanity.

If this was just a set of statistics, if it was just a set of bad numbers, if it was just something one could point to as signs that the government had not given us what it promised, that would be one thing. What we have seen is terrible, terrible human consequences across this country as a result of what has taken place. These consequences are obvious when you talk about hundreds of thousands of jobs being lost.

What is even worse is that many of those people who in the past would have been able to get unemployment insurance so that they could support themselves and help the rest of the economy through the support they were getting, have as a result of this government's deliberate policy been cut off unemployment insurance.

The consequence has been contrary to anything that the minister of employment ever predicted would happen. We have thousands and thousands of people, in her own home city, who are having to go on welfare; skilled workers, people who are anxious to find training, people who go to unemployment insurance offices and ask for training. They ask for the chance to be part of training programs, and you know what they are told, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Milliken: You're on your own.

Mr. Langdon: They are told: "Well, we'll put your name on the list, but we have a two-year waiting list".

Mrs. McDougall: That is because you held up the legislation.

Mr. Langdon: They are told that there is a massive waiting list. They are told that this government which promised people training has instead cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

For instance, if they happen to be refugees they are told—as a group who spoke with us on Monday night, the Ontario Coalition of Agencies Serving Immigrants, a group which later met with the minister's department—that there simply is not enough money.

Every time the minister comes back into the House she gets straightened out. I am sorry about that.

The reality is that her extra money which she talks about for language training has led to groups telling us on Monday night, for instance groups from her own home city, who are part of this Ontario Coalition of Agencies Serving Immigrants, that they had only 75 places to be able to offer and over 3,000 people were asking for the chance to get help, for the chance to have an ability to learn languages, to be able to work in this country. I am sorry she has been scared out again.

The reality is, as somebody from Peel told us, that they have pages of waiting lists of people who need help and who are not able to get that help.

The reality is that people across this country are being severely damaged. Refugees, of course, but also millions of Canadian families who have seen people within their family face unemployment, have not been able to get unemployment insurance and have had to go on welfare. They have seen their dignity, their pride in their ability to provide for their families destroyed.

What does this government do in its budget, having cut back unemployment insurance already? It takes the next step and it cuts back its support to welfare payments.

This is a shameful government. It is a government which has shown on issue after issue, case after case, that it does not care about people. It has shown that it is incompetent as well.

An hon. member: But cares about some people.

Mr. Langdon: As my colleague from Edmonton suggests, it cares about those people to whom it extended the 21-year trust agreements. It did not have to do that, but for those large family foundations, those family fortunes which were tied up in trust, that were supposed to run out this year, yes it had something for them. It has had something for the large corporations that wanted to maintain their memberships in golf courses and their special boxes in the Sky Dome, and their special boxes for Edmonton Oilers games. Oh yes, it permitted

It permitted those companies to continue to deduct 80 per cent of the cost of those entertainment expenditures from the taxes that people across this country pay. It ends up, Mr. Speaker, and I know you feel as strongly about this as I do, that you and I and the 26 million Canadians across this country have to pay more taxes to support these freebies for corporate executives and their friends who get to go to sporting events.

Now you and I, Mr. Speaker, both like to go to sporting events, but we are prepared to pay the cost, as people across this country pay the cost, unless the giant corporations in this country get the chance to buy in to special privileges and deduct it from taxes that you and I have to make up.

Lest you think that this is just a New Democrat raving in the wilderness, let me quote from another judgment on the budget from the Toronto Dominion Bank. I think you would agree—even the minister of defence would agree—the Toronto Dominion Bank is not usually an ally of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. McKnight: The Toronto Dominion Bank is a friend of the socialists.

Mr. Langdon: See, he agrees, it is not usually an ally of the New Democratic Party. Therefore, let me quote from the Toronto Dominion Bank's analysis of this budget. I could quote a great deal from this, but let me just quote perhaps the most devastating comment: "This 1991 budget is probably the most economically inept and destructive budget since the 1930s." That is not us speaking, that is the Toronto Dominion Bank.

What we have got is a set of judgments from across the country from the people whom we represent that tell us this government has lost its compassion, if indeed it ever had it. It has lost its ability to listen to Canadians. It has lost its ability to care about Canadians and, most important, it has lost its ability to lead Canadians. Canadians no longer trust this government. That is why we will be voting against letting this government borrow over $26 billion from the Canadian people.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I was listening to the hon. member of the NDP, who said earlier that members on this side of the House work only for Canadians who are well off. Perhaps I may comment and I will also have a question a little later on that I have three riding offices. In those offices, I have assistants who are working with me on cases involving disabled persons. We even work on cases involving the province, unemployment cases, welfare cases, cases of economic hardship, and we certainly do not work exclusively for families that are well off. We also work for the middle class, including miners.

He referred earlier to freebies for big corporations. Perhaps we should also talk about isolated post allowances for people who live in Abitibi and in northern Quebec, and I am referring to the designation of isolated posts for the purposes of Northern benefits, something we have finally been able to obtain for our workers, our union members, miners, forestry workers and nurses. Everybody—low-income people, the middle class and the upper class—will be on the same footing. They will all get these isolation allowances from the federal government. This is important in the north and in Lebel-sur-Quévillon, Matagami and Joutel. The same applies to Chapais and Chibougamau. In Chibougamau, they were never able to get these allowances but they are now getting 50 per cent. This is wonderful, and we won thanks to the work done by ministers like Benoît Bouchard who represents the riding of Roberval an excellent minister.

I also have a question for the hon. member. He often refers to newspaper articles. In today's papers, Mr. Speaker, and more specifically in La Presse, on the business page there is a reference to something he didn't mention in his speech, and I am talking about mortgage rates. He didn't mention those at all. However, it's all here in the papers. But I know why he didn't mention this, because when he read the papers this morning, while he was having breakfast, he must have felt he couldn't mention this in his speech because the news was much too good.

I have here an article by Nicole France Bernier which says: "Outlook for mortgage customers brighter than in 1982. The number of people in arrears on their residential mortgages has increased substantially over the past few months, but the situation is certainly not alarming, according to financial institutions contacted by La Presse. In fact, it compares favourably with the situation during the last recession". The article goes on to say, Mr. Speaker: "At the Confédération des caisses populaires et d'économie Desjardins, which has about 40 per cent of the residential mortgage market in Quebec, Mr. Gaston Sirois, vice-president, financial credit, said that in his opinion, the recession in the early 80s had been much harder on residential mortgage holders, because interest rates were much higher, which made things much harder for people who had to renew their mortgages."

So I would like to say to the hon. member that the situation is better than in Ontario, because in September 1981, mortgage rates were as high 21.5 per cent, compared with 11.5 or 11.75 per cent today.

My question is: Why didn't he mention mortgage rates in his speech?

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to say that Conservatives and Liberals are different. It is not for me to say that the Conservatives kept interest rates lower than the Liberals did during the previous recession. That may be true, but the important question for ordinary people, for all Quebeckers, is this: With the Conservatives or the Liberals can we expect to have an economic policy which would be a promising approach for ordinary people?

I for one cannot see that. I see very high interest rates with the Conservatives, and I saw very high interest rates with the Liberals. I saw the Conservatives offer a number of tax concessions to the major corporations, just as I saw the Liberals do the same thing. There is no difference. Here is the important message getting through to the people of Quebec, to the voters of Quebec. The important message is that there is another choice, there is an alternative, and that is the NDP which can change the situation for a good many Quebeckers. That is reality.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there is consent for the following motion:

> That notwithstanding Standing Order 76(1), the House waive the usual 48 hour notice required to debate Bill C–98, an Act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose in the name of the Minister of Agriculture at report stage on Thursday, March 21, 1991.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we concur.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible for us to concur at this stage. This is the first I have heard of this. It is certainly something I will consult about with others who have responsibility for these matters in my party, but it is not something which I can immediately concur with.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, if the request is to drop the 48–hour requirement it is our understanding that that would in fact happen provided, of course, the amendments are permitted to be put in a shorter time as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is so ordered.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1991–92

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–97, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate on such an important piece of legislation affecting the Canadian economy.

Last February when the Minister of Finance presented his sixth budget, we in the Official Opposition said that it was a blueprint for a made–in–Canada recession.

As I rise to address the House today, we have a made–in–Canada recession and the blame for it lies squarely on the doorstep of the Minister of Finance and his boss, the Prime Minister of Canada.

We told the government and members of Parliament on that side, if they continued with their high interest rate, high dollar policy that thousands of Canadians would go bankrupt and hundreds of thousands would lose their jobs.

Just today, the statistics for the month of February were released and we find that bankruptcies have increased significantly in this country, particularly in the province of Ontario, and we are seeing thousands upon thousands of Canadians losing their jobs on a monthly and regular basis.

We told the government of the Prime Minister that if it insisted on cutting payments to the provinces for things like health care and higher education, it would lead to cutbacks in service, higher tuition fees and higher provincial taxes. This has come to pass. We told the government at that time if it went ahead with the GST, it would push an economy on the brink of recession into full recession and add dangerously to inflation. It too, came to pass. But the government would not listen. It would not listen to the concerns of the opposition and, more important, it would not listen to the concerns of Canadians from coast to coast. It would not listen to the unemployed, to people struggling to pay their rent and to meet the mortgage. They are victims of its terrible, terrible economic planning. It would not listen to leading economists and business people, all of whom warned the government that it was on an economic collision course. The government, much to my chagrin and I am sure to that of many Canadians, still is not listening with regard to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you know that the Minister of Finance did not even have the common decency to stay in the House of Commons to listen to the budget response of the Liberal finance critic, the hon. member from Windsor. In fact, there was only one government minister in the House, the Minister of unemployment and immigration and she was so wrapped up in what she was reading that she didn't seem to hear a word of what our finance critic was saying on behalf of thousands of Canadians across this country.

We now have an economy in serious recession. Unemployment is at 10.2 per cent nationally—and I want to come back to that, Mr. Speaker—10.2 per cent nationally. It is more than 11 per cent in Nova Scotia, and in my constituency in the Cape Breton region, it is a shameful 18.5 per cent.

The figures in parts of Newfoundland are equally high. Parts of northern Ontario and other communities throughout the country, even in the city of Montreal, unemployment is at a shameful high.

It all adds up to close to a million and a half unemployed people in this country, every one of them a tragedy in economic terms and, more important, in human terms.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is there anything in this budget for those people that would help them find jobs or learn the skills necessary for good jobs?

The answer, unfortunately, is no.

All the government has done for the unemployed in this country is to take off $100 million under the Canada Jobs Strategy program. All the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, and of course his senior political minister in my province of Nova Scotia are saying to the unemployed, those thousands of individuals in my small province, is that "you're on your own; the federal government will not be there to assist you in any way".

In this very budget the Minister of Finance is predicting double digit unemployment right across the country for the rest of this year. He is predicting not much better for the year following, 9.8 per cent right across this country. Shameful predictions, and I think it indicates quite clearly that the government and this Minister of Finance and this Prime Minister have lost control of the economic agenda in this country.

What he is saying is, in effect: "We don't care what the cost is in economic and human terms. Stay the course and, before you know it, this cut and slash approach will lead us out of the recession". Ha, ha, ha; that is what Canadians say to the Minister of Finance. Or, better still; shame, shame, shame on the Minister of Finance of this country.

I see the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader has entered the House. He knows only too well, coming from a province like Alberta, that they understand, particularly in his riding, what it means to be unemployed. I am sure that he shares with me wholeheartedly my sentiments as expressed toward the Minister of Finance.

Canadians have good reason to be sceptical about this government. Last year the Minister of Finance told Canadians that after a bit of a slow period in the spring and summer of 1990, we will be into a mini-boom by the fall. That is what he said—Ripley's "believe it or not".

When his economic policies drove the country into a real recession, he was the last to admit it. No matter how hard he tried, he just could not get that "r" word, "recession", to roll off his tongue.

His boss, the right hon. Prime Minister, had an easier time. Not only did he acknowledge that the economy was going down the drain, he, in this House and outside the House, had the unmitigated gall to try to take credit for it.

• (1710)

When asked last October about the recession, the Prime Minister said:

> We have induced a slowdown. Mr. Wilson said as much in his last budget. Look at the budget. It is as clear as spring water. Mr. Wilson spelled it out.

That is what the Prime Minister said, and he and the Minister of Finance took credit for inducing the first ever made–in–Canada recession. I say again through you, Sir, that that is shameful behaviour coming from the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister of this country.

If the Prime Minister wishes to take credit for this made–in–Canada recession, he must also take credit for inducing a million and a half Canadians out of their jobs. That is no laughing matter. That is a serious indictment against any government and against any Minister of Finance. Now we are in a recession and the government has taken credit for it. What is it going to do? What are the ministers going to do to try to get us out of this recession? I wonder what the Minister of National Defence, who is in the Chamber, would do if he were the Minister of Finance. Does he have a plan? No, there is no meaningful plan.

When you pick up the plan for economic recovery, there is nothing in it. It is the government's so–called plan for economic recovery, over nine pages long and not even full–size pages at that. That is all that the thousands and thousands of economists, statisticians and analysts working for the Minister of Finance could come up with for the million and a half unemployed people in this country. I would have thought that the Minister of Finance, who is from one of the wealthiest areas in the country, could have found within his budget a small sum of money to enter into a contract with numerous consultants to come up with some better economic plan than nine short pages for the million and a half Canadians that are unemployed because of this government's first ever made–in–Canada recession.

The Minister of Finance ought to be, must be, ashamed of himself and of the policies that he has been putting forward for quite some time.

We know it is not in the budget. There is no meaningful and complete plan to get us out of the recession created by the Minister of Finance. There is nothing to help the unemployed. The victims of the government's made–in–Canada recession accept the $100 million cut, as members on this side have alluded to on numerous occasions. But what is in the budget? The Minister of Finance would say that there are no new income taxes in the budget. That is what he said in response to my colleague, the deputy leader, the hon. member for Hamilton East, and to the finance critic for our party.

What he will not admit, Mr. Speaker—and I know you find this somewhat misleading; I would not want to say that it is unparliamentary—is that there are things in the budget that will be quite taxing to people's incomes, like the 25 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums.

Let's picture for a moment the Minister of Finance saying "no new taxes". A small businessperson running a small store, a retail outlet, a small manufacturing plant, a consulting business, now has to pay higher premiums for the unemployment that he will give to those individuals that he will have to lay off because of the minister's made–in–Canada recession, which he took credit for. The employees will also pay higher premiums for the unemployment insurance that they will get eventually because of lay–off notices.

That is going to take a bite out of the pay cheque of every working man and woman in this country. The Minister of Finance will not come clean with Canadians and call it a tax.

An hon. member: He does not care.

Mr. Dingwall: That is right. A colleague of mine has referred to the fact that he does not care. I think that is a very appropriate statement with regard to the Minister of Finance.

Do not forget either that this is the same minister who, in 1985, hit Canadians with an income tax surtax which he said was only temporary. In 1986, he made it permanent, and in 1989 he increased it from 3 per cent to 5 per cent on the income of every working person in this country. He does not talk about these income taxes in his budget, even though they are still going on. No new taxes. What do you call that? There is also a three cent per cigarette tax. At least the minister is honest about that particular tax.

The most staggering tax in Canadian history, the GST, just took effect this past January. I suggest to my colleague from Newfoundland, that the Minister of Finance would have to be deaf, dumb, and blind, to suggest that this has not hit hard on the pocket-books of Canadians. It is absolutely, unequivocally ridiculous for the Minister of Finance to allude that the GST is not a tax and it is not part of his particular budget. Does he say that in the budget? Of course not. What does he say about the GST? I will tell you. Here is what he says: "The Prime Minister has given a commitment that any above-projected revenues from the GST will make a contribution to deficit reduction".

The Minister of Finance wants to use the GST to reduce the deficit. This is about the most cynical thing I have seen from this government in recent time.

The GST and the implications that it has for average Canadians is absolutely devastating. The member opposite is shaking his head in agreement. I know that the hon. member is an honourable individual. I know it was difficult for him to vote in favour of this government's policies. And I know that if the occasion were to arise again, he would want to stand in his place and say to his colleagues in the government: "Scrap the GST, let us move on to real tax reform; let us not aggravate and exacerbate this first ever made-in-Canada recession by the Minister of Finance".

The Minister of Finance in implementing this particular tax led us to believe it was going to be revenue neutral. Well, that is supposed to mean that when you bring in a so-called replacement tax, it will not bring in any more money for the government than the tax is supposed to replace.

We in the Official Opposition said all along that the GST was much more than just a replacement tax. We said the government was just using the replacement tax concept as a smoke-screen to raise revenues by picking the pockets of ordinary Canadians. But when we raised these points, the Minister of Finance said things like this: "Canadians will not pay one penny of additional tax as a result of the GST." Now, it would be very, very unparliamentary for me to stand in this Chamber and question the honesty and the integrity of the Minister of Finance. But if I may, in candour, share with the Speaker and with my colleagues in the Chamber as to what my constituents say; I am their representative. I have to listen to what they say about the Minister of Finance.

An hon. member: What do they say?

An hon. member: Can you print it?

Mr. Dingwall: They question his honesty and they have used the l word, Mr. Speaker. Not the r word, but the l word. And they even use the l word for the Prime Minister. I tell members opposite that they do not mean loving when they use the l word. I want hon. members to know that.

• (1720)

There are many things about the economic policies of this government that ought to be addressed in full debate. In view of the fact that I have limited time, some five or six minutes remaining, I want to say that there are two other items which have a profound effect on the economy in Atlantic Canada. One is the continual slashing of the Established Programs Financing Act.

I wish the minister of health were in the House today because we could get involved in a really good debate. He is saying to the people of my province: "We are going to cut your budget". However, he is not saying to the health worker, the janitors in the hospitals, the nurses in the hospitals and all other individuals who are employed in the health care system that there are going to be lay-offs because the economic pie is becoming smaller and smaller and smaller.

Those provincial governments that cannot afford it are going to have to do something as drastic as they did in Newfoundland because of the federal government's policies. It was a shameful act by a shameful government, but Canadians have come to learn and to expect the worst of this lot across the way. That is with regard to health care.

On education, it is equally so. I happen to represent a poorer province in this country. We are going to be further restricted with regard to education and providing opportunities for our young people in our province. The government's answer is: "I am sorry. You are out of luck. You are on your own".

The third and final point is that in my region, in my constituency, this government has done nothing to assist the unemployed other than to exacerbate their situation.

I would hope hon. members opposite, who I know agree with the substance that I have put forward, would see their way clear to raise these integral, important matters in their caucuses; to have the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has become a complete and utter joke as far as Canadians are concerned with regard to health care in this country, reverse these policy initiatives; and to have them come before Parliament and the Canadian people with an economic plan which will address the high unemployment regions of this country, our health care system, our educational system, as well as our monetary and fiscal policies, as opposed to taking us into the first ever—imagine, Mr. Speaker—made-in-Canada recession.

I say shame on the Prime Minister, shame on the Minister of Finance. Let us get rid of this lot once and for all and put a Liberal government on that side of the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION TO EXTEND HOURS OF SITTING

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That this House continues to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of the third reading stage of government Bill C-97, an act to provide borrowing authority.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Abitibi, the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke is unable to move his motion during Private Members' Hour on Thursday, March 21, 1991.

It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94. Accordingly, I am directing the table officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

Private Members' Hour will thus be cancelled and, pursuant to Standing Order 94, the House will continue with the business before it prior to that hour.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-97, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): I should like to make a comment, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member asked if there was anything in the budget for us northern residents or for the people of Quebec. I want to tell him that the budget of Minister Michael Wilson does contain something for us. There is something for the people of Quebec and, for the first time, there is a project to build a $15 million research centre or laboratory. Never did we get that under the Liberals, and he is a good Liberal. Never did we get anything from Ottawa that was transferred to Quebec. If this has been transferred to Quebec, Mr. Speaker, it is precisely due to the Conservative caucus, to the members from Quebec who helped us get these $15 million for Abitibi and for Quebec.

I have another comment. The hon. member suggested there is nothing on the economy. We have just learned that a project has been launched this month where 500 people will have jobs. This is a new mine, a new resource and one of my friends is on the board of directors. These 500 new jobs are important. Unemployment declined this month. And there is something else I want to say by way of comment, Mr. Speaker. In the budget we did get something for northern residents, for unionized mine workers, for union members working in forestry, in pulp and paper mills, in sawmills and in hospitals, and this is not to mention northern benefits for people in isolated regions north of the 49th parallel. We got that project after 14 months of constant representations. The workers were mad at the time, but they are in a better mood today.

True enough, Mr. Speaker, we are experiencing difficult times. We are in the midst of a recession, I agree. One thing I want to say is that my staff and I have three offices in my riding. I spend weekends there and when I have an opportunity to visit my constituents I listen to what they have to say. Quite a few of them are getting mad, but they are not bad people. We work together to find solutions. That is what I wanted to say. I hope they will listen to us. There is one topic which the hon. member would rather not deal with, and I refer to mortgage rates. These rates stood at 20, 22 and 23 per cent during the 1981–82 recession when the former Liberal government was in office, but today they are way down around 10 or 11.75 per cent. He did not say anything about mortgage rates in his remarks. I would like to hear what he has to say about that.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to respond to my colleague opposite who I know has a more than average work ethic when it comes to representing his constituents. I understand and realize that he attempts at all times to be very effective on their behalf. I would be remiss if I did not congratulate him on his efforts.

The hon. member opposite must understand that we are not just dealing with his particular constituency and/or a particular portion of his constituency. That is important. I concur.

We are asking the Government of Canada to put before the people of Canada an economic plan which has some semblance of strong pillars that will provide Canadians, not only in a small portion of his riding but also in British Columbia, in Nova Scotia, in Ontario, other parts of Quebec and the western provinces, with meaningful opportunities so that they too can raise their families and enjoy a lifestyle and a quality of living.

However the government has not produced that economic plan. It has been remiss. In fact, there are some Canadians in various quarters who would say that the government, the Minister of National Defence who is there and his cabinet colleagues have been grossly negligent in terms of managing the economy.

My colleague has lobbed a reference to the 1981–82 recession across the aisle. No one has ever said that that was a first ever made–in–Canada recession. It was part of a world–wide recession. What we have today, by the admission of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and others, is that this is the first ever made–in–Canada recession.

I do not know if the Minister of National Defence is shaking his head saying yes or he is just nodding to get something off his forehead. He knows that this government has caused havoc for Canadians across this country, whether it be in regard to the EPF, health care, post–secondary education, or whatever it might be. It has so frustrated, so exacerbated the economic plight of Canadians that it is playing havoc with the national unity of the country.

• (1730)

I will give one example to the hon. member who posed a question. Workers in my riding have been fighting for five years to become part and parcel of the Older Workers Adjustment Program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The hon. member should know better than to bring another person into the House.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I did not know whether you were speaking to me. I know there are numerous members opposite who would want to come over to this side of the House after the interventions we have made, but I say to the hon. member that they have been working for fives years to become part and parcel of the Older Workers Adjustment Program. To date, they have not been successful. These are Canadians 54 to 57 or 58 years of age who have no hope of meaningful employment. This government has denied them not only a program but also the benefits of the existing program that they have in order to make their lot in life more successful. That to me is a prime example of a budget void of any substance to address some of the more important, fundamental and human issues that this country faces.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre brought a person from the outside into the House, and I just want to correct what I said.

No member should be bringing individuals into the Chamber. I am sorry about the outburst, but hon. members should know better than to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this opportunity to take part in this important debate. It is a very clear message emanating from the Budget which the Conservative government tabled a few weeks ago. It is definitely a disaster for ordinary Canadians. How not to reach this conclusion, when we realize that this Budget will seriously damage the social fabric of our country with its tax increases and spending cuts.

Clearly, Canadians will wonder what they did to deserve such a government. The economic situation now is far from brilliant: 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed because of the government's economic policies. Last year, the number of bankrupticies reached 55,000. One out of every six Canadian children goes to bed every night on an empty stomach.

When faced with such a serious situation, what does the government do? Well, Mr. Speaker, I am going to tell you. It shirks its commitments. Not only is it responsible for the economic mess everywhere in this country, but its policies are only making a bad situation worse. As a matter of fact, the government has withdrawn nearly $1 billion from its programs for the needy and increased by 24 per cent the unemployment insurance premiums and this, right in the middle of an economic recession.

For that matter, Canadians were looking forward to a Budget which would ease to a certain extent the devastating impact of the recession and would help promote national unity. Unfortunately, they were offered a Budget which slashes in the job creation programs, attacks health care, education and the unions, and continues the Prime Minister's policy which is to transfer to the provinces the burden of its federal deficit.

What is really unbelievable about the deficit is that the Tories have the gall to tell Canadians they must tighten their collective belt to reduce it.

Whoever looks at table 3 on page 91 of the document entitled "the Budget", published by the Minister of Finance, realizes that the government is playing an interesting little game. The government has increased personal income tax by 8.7 per cent, while reducing corporate income tax by 3.5 per cent.

Moreover, according to the government's budgetary document, personal income tax will have increased by 22.5 per cent in the fiscal year 1990–91 and 1991–92, while corporate income tax will have decreased by 15.9 per cent. It is unbelievable!

On the basis of these facts, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the government is not really serious about debt and deficit reduction. In fact, since coming to power in 1984, it has more than doubled the national debt.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Tory government is only using the debt as an excuse for slashing social programs.

[English]

The aim of this government is to dismantle Canada's social programs by cutting back in transfer payments to which the provinces have a constitutional right. It is in the Constitution that the Government of Canada has to help out with regional disparities and has to try to equalize. It is those very equalization payments that the government is cutting back. It is cutting back on payments that will serve to go toward health care and post-secondary education.

In the projections of this government from 1986 to 1996 it expects to cut $40 billion on these transfer payments to the provinces. In my province of New Brunswick alone, it expects to cut over a billion dollars in these transfer payments. These transfer payments are for education. They are for health care. Certainly this is a direct attack on medicare.

Speaking of medicare, last evening we had occasion to witness the government in full bloom, so to speak. We had a motion in the House concerning medicare and saying that this House now supports medicare, wants to support it, and wants to continue it. We know how that vote came about and what the results were. Again it is a demonstration that this government has no commitment to medicare. It is a direct attack on medicare. It is just a matter of time with the cuts to these transfer payments that medicare will be a thing of the past.

Looking at the money that this government wants to borrow to institute its budgetary plan, we must look at the state of the economy and see what part of the economy is suffering and what type of plan this government is putting in place to help these people who are suffering.

There are, as I mentioned previously, a million and a half people out of work. The projections the finance minister has given us so far have stated they are going to be in double-digit numbers for the next year or so, and he has accepted that. It is one thing to accept it, but it is another thing not to do anything about it.

The high unemployment rate is a direct link, a direct cause, to the high interest rate and high dollar policies of this government. There is no doubt about it. It has cost businesses jobs. It has cost industry jobs. There is no doubt about it. There is a direct link.

• (1740)

As many members mentioned today on the same topic, the high interest rate and high dollar policy has affected our export ability and has created this first made-in-Canada recession.

What has the government done to help the unemployed? If we look at the budget documents, we find that in the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the area where it is supposed to be helping the unemployed, it has cut $100 million.

If we try to figure out what that will mean to each province, we would have to play a guessing game based on past traditions. In New Brunswick alone, this would mean a cutback of $6.5 million. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there are many places in New Brunswick that suffer from high unemployment.

I come from such a region, and I want to point out some of the figures that exist in my region. In February, the unemployment rate in my riding was 16.3 per cent. The average rate for Canada in February was 10.2 per cent. What has the minister done? He has cut these programs to help these people get back to work.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is no relief for the fishermen in my riding. There is no relief for the farmers in my riding. There is no relief for the workers in the mining and forest industries in my riding.

[English]

I have to say it is not getting much better. I do not want to seem a pessimist, because I am noted for being a person who likes to move ahead and talk about positive things.

Just this week alone, I received a call giving me some very sad information. Two major industries in my riding; one, a kraft mill—we know what type of employment it has—has been put up for sale because of poor markets and because it is not competitive. It exports, and we know what the high dollar has done to exports. Hopefully a buyer will be found and the mill will continue.

Even sadder, in Kedgwick which is a small community with very high unemployment, the sawmill is up for sale and must be sold by the end of June. If not, the present owner plans on closing. The unemployment rate in that area is probably much higher than most other areas in my riding, well above 20 per cent. That impacts on about 100 full-time jobs and well over 200 seasonal jobs. It is a small community of roughly 2,500 people.

I may as well make the pitch now and hope that the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Labour will look upon this area as a special area, that they will try to apply some of the adjustment programs that now exist into this area and that they will use a little more flexibility.

Speaking about flexibility, I should also say that my region has been hit by a number of strikes in the past year. One is still ongoing from July 1990 where approximately 1,500 employees have been out on strike. I have written to the minister asking for more flexibility in applying UIC regulations. I would again hope that for the sake of the families of men, women and children involved, with the suffering that they are going through that the government would show more flexibility in that regard. I would also hope that the government would try to convince both sides to get back to the bargaining table and resolve those labour disputes as quickly as possible without, rightly so, interfering in the process. I know it is private sector.

I would also like to talk a little bit about income tax because the government is saying there have been no increases in taxes. The government is telling us how it has closed loopholes on corporations. I want to refer to this government document entitled "The Budget". I think many of us are familiar with it. On page 91 of the budget, Table 3 sets out budgetary revenues. I guess the government needs money to operate and that is what we are debating tonight. We are looking at where that money is going. When we look at where it is getting that money from, there is a table on page 91 that is very interesting. It is a breakdown of where it gets its money in relation to personal income and corporate income.

We find on that table that in 1990–91, the government would be getting 13.8 per cent more revenue from personal income than the year before. This is an increase. It is getting more revenue from individuals. If you look at the same table for corporate income tax you will see a decrease of 12.4 per cent from 1990 to 1991. What this table is telling us is that individuals are paying more and corporations are paying less.

If we look at the table a little further and in more depth, we will find that from 1991 to 1992, which are only projections but the minister lives by those projections, we will find that the individual personal income tax revenue for the government will increase by 8.7 per cent and the corporate income tax will decrease by 3.5 per cent. If you add up the totals for both years, you will find that the revenue from income tax for individuals will be increased to 23.7 per cent while, in fact, for the corporations it will decrease to 15.6 per cent. Again, individuals are paying more and corporations are paying less. I think it is very important that that point was made this evening.

In conclusion, because I know my time is limited and I do not want to go on too long, I just want to make the point that the government seems to have, as my hon. House leader mentioned a while ago, more or less embarked on a policy of telling Canadians: "You are on your own". We have talked about transfer payments, medicare: "You are on your own, provinces." We talk about post-secondary education for students: "You are on your own."

I was speaking to a student just the other day who was at the ceremony for Rev. Sean O'Sullivan, and I asked him when he was home last. He was from Cape Breton and a former page of the House. He said it had been quite some time. I said: "You did not go home last summer?" He said: "No, I didn't. There was no work back home, unfortunately." He said: "I had to work all summer. I am working now part-time. You know, even with all that work, I still do not have enough money to pay for my post-secondary education."

It is getting worse. There is a tax on the administration of student loans now. What is coming to is that post-secondary education is going to be for the rich, unfortunately, very unfortunately.

This budget and this bill are both linked. Bill C-97 is linked to the budget because it will provide the money for the budget to operate. This is a disastrous budget; it is simply disastrous. It is an attack on the regions, it is an attack on the poor, it is an attack on students, it is an attack on national unity. You may ask, why national unity? We all know the crisis situation that Canada is in, we know that when people are unhappy they like to look at other options. So it is quite obvious what this budget has done.

• (1750)

It is an attack on rural Canada, it is an attack on the fabric of Canada, it is an attack on medicare. I would hope that the government would come back to a compassionate type of system, a system which I think is necessary to solve and to resolve the problems that Canadians are being faced with, not only on a national level but on a regional level as well.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): First of all, I want to congratulate the hon. member on an excellent intervention on a very important subject affecting the country. However, I have an observation, Mr. Speaker, and then a question to my colleague.

My colleague has shared with me on a previous occasion, and indeed with members of our party, his concern with regard to Canadians who live in rural communities and the lack of services provided to them.

I ask the hon. member if he would care to comment on whether or not the present fiscal policies of the government—borrowing, build, budget, the various cutbacks—are addressing any of the concerns of rural life?

The hon. member will know there has been a large number of post offices closed in rural communities throughout Canada. He is fully aware, as I am, that VIA Rail, which has been an integral part of our transportation system in many parts of the country, has been terminated. He is fully aware that the fishery which impacts on small rural communities has been gutted by the policies of the government opposite. He is also fully aware that privatization has had an exceptionally negative impact on our rural life, I think of Air Canada, for instance, and what it does in providing services to Canadians.

I ask my colleague whether he believes that these policies of the government have been addressed in any way in the budgetary programs of the Minister of Finance, and whether he believes, as I believe, that rural revitalization ought to be a major component of any economic plan that any government would put before the people of Canada.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. House leader for the question.

I think, in all honesty, if we were to look at what has happened to rural Canada in the last number of years, we will find that, yes, the budget does address rural Canada, but in a negative way unfortunately.

I don't know whether there is a misunderstanding in cabinet, in government, but it claims that: "Oh, we have the programs, if you can't find a job in rural Canada we are going to move you, you can apply for a little grant and we will move you and you can find a job in Toronto or in Montreal". Well, we know what has happened in Montreal and we know what is going to happen in Toronto and Vancouver.

Its little plan is to take rural Canada and practically dismantle it. That is quite obvious. It is a plan that has been there all along.

We look at the cutbacks to VIA Rail. We look at the cutbacks in the CBC. It didn't worry about the regions. It just said: "Let us cut" and that is it. We look at lay-offs in Marine Atlantic; we look at the GST. Rural Canada is what gave Canada its uniqueness and it is a necessary item. To any government in office it is necessary. It is necessary that the government take care of rural Canada. It is a must.

We look at what is happening in the fisheries on the east coast. We have heard a lot about the east coast, but look at what is happening on the west coast as well. There are problems with the fisheries on the west coast.

What is wrong in agriculture? There are no family farms any more. People are getting out of farming. Why? We have to preserve those traditions. That is what Canada is all about. That is what will keep us united, our uniqueness. There is nothing wrong with being different. But what is happening is that there is a malaise out there. People in rural Canada feel they have been forgotten.

Maybe the service has not changed in the rural post offices. I am not going to debate that point with the government, because they have their point of view and I have mine. Individuals want to go down to the local post office, meet their friends and have a little chat. They want to go by and see a Canadian flag here and there in their community. For many people in rural Canada there are no Canadian flags flying any more because Canada Post does not exist in their community any more. Canada Post, even if they do exist, are flying a corporate flag now. What is wrong with the Canadian flag?

We are facing an identity crisis. We are facing a crisis in our nation and we are refusing to step up front and say that we are proud to be Canadians. I think to be proud to be a Canadian we would have to go back and look at what has made us Canadians in the true sense. We have to go back and look at our roots. We have to go back and look at rural Canada and say: "We are falling apart here. Let us put it back together. Let us put the programs back in to help rural Canada", not necessarily just throw money at the problem. There is a structural problem and we have to handle it.

I suppose some people would have different ways of doing it, but it is important that we sit down someday and decide how we are going to help rural Canada prosper, how to revitalize it because at the present moment there is a serious problem and we are not handling it very well.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled at this point to note for the benefit of those who may be watching these proceedings on television tonight, that we are actually debating something concrete. What we are debating is a request from the government, in the form of a bill, to borrow $26 billion to keep the machinery of government running over the next fiscal year. That is the amount the government estimates it will need to make up the difference between what it proposes to spend and what it assumes it will receive by way of taxation and other revenues.

The question before us tonight is the third reading of the bill that will authorize the borrowing of that $26 billion. I would like just very briefly to note why I, as the member for Edmonton East, cannot support that request and thus cannot vote for the bill.

I would like to start by reminding members that for better than a year and half, in fact, in some instances a lot longer than a year and half, members of the New Democratic Party caucus have been advising the government: "You have to reduce interest rates". The high interest rate policy maintained by the Governor of the Bank of Canada with the delighted acquiescence of the government ministry was crippling the Canadian economy. If those high interest rates were not reduced, unquestionably a recession would be induced and quite possibly it could be a very deep, severe and harmful recession.

That is precisely what has occurred. However, we are now treated with the remarkable spectacle of the finance minister, among others, saying—now that the collapse of the economy has by itself completely destroyed the market for money and thus allowed interest rates to fall, the Minister of Finance and other members of the government are saying— "Well, there you are. We have reduced interest rates".

It is rather like watching the fire truck pull up to the burning house after it has burned to the ground. It is nice to know the fire truck is there, but it is a little late.

If I may extend this little metaphor, what is required now is for the carpenters and the electricians and the roofers and the plasterers to be hired to rebuild the house. We can send the fire truck back to the fire hall. The period of need has passed. What we need now, to make the metaphor plain, is government programs aimed at rebuilding the economy.

That means two things. It means stimulating consumption and it means encouraging new business investment. The budget does neither. The budget discourages consumption by all save the very rich, and has absolutely nothing to encourage business investment in product, plant and equipment.

We are left asking ourselves why the heck then do we need to borrow $26 billion, $1,000 for every man, woman, and child in this country? I regret to say, the answer is what makes it impossible for me to support this bill.

The answer as to why we need to borrow that money is precisely to continue to let the good times roll for Tom d'Aquino's Business Council on National Issues, for whom the ministry and its supporters opposite constitute so effective a fan club.

For several weeks now, members of my party in this House, most notably the member for Winnipeg—Transcona, have been pointing out to the Minister of Finance and other members of the government that, in a budget that is virtually an assault on the wallets, well-being and standard of living of the Canadian people, there is one group that has got off scot free. There is one group that has not been called upon—in the heroic words of the finance minister—to share the burden. It is that small group of Canadians sufficiently wealthy to take advantage of the tax breaks that are there for the rich and the super-rich and the corporations they hold.

In the last couple of weeks, the member for Winnipeg—Transcona has identified five such key loopholes. They are the capital gains lifetime exemption and preferred rates, which will cost the treasury $2.8 billion all by itself. That is enough to exempt the entire population of Alberta from that $1,000 a head required by the borrowing bill.

The business and entertainment tax deduction—the famous three-martini lunch, the box seats for the favoured of the corporate elite that the member for Essex—Windsor was speaking of earlier—that accounts for $1.1 billion a year. The dividend tax credit is another $1 billion a year. The manufacturing and processing tax credit, that gift to the corporate sector which was otherwise so grievously inconvenienced by the manufacturers' sales tax—that is what we were told during the period when the GST was being hawked—that remains, and it is worth another billion dollars a year to those corporations. The interest deductibility rule is all by itself worth $800 million to the wealthy in this country.

Those five considerations alone add up to $6.7 billion. That is better than one-quarter of the entire borrowing requirement identified in the bill. If those loopholes were closed—and closing them would not hurt ordinary Canadians, would not hurt the overwhelming majority of constituents of Edmonton East whom I represent, or the overwhelming majority of constituents of Edmonton North whom you, Mr. Speaker, represent—that borrowing bill could be cut by at least one-quarter. That is real money we are talking about here. There is more.

In its unfettered pursuit of good times for the rich, the continued program of tax reform that this government has pursued has made more inequitable, more uneven, more unfair what was already an unfair income tax system bequeathed to it by previous Liberal governments.

If I may offer a little aside, I was astonished to hear the hon. member for Restigouche a few moments earlier berate the government for making more inequitable the relative shares paid by the corporate sector through the income tax levied on it as opposed to individual Canadians and the income tax levied on them. It is mostly successive Liberal, but as well Conservative, governments since the 1950s that have taken what was a 50–50 share of income taxes paid—and it is virtually a straight line progression—to what is now 90 per cent collected from individuals and 10 per cent collected from corporations.

It is grossly inequitable. For a member of the Liberal caucus to get up and complain about it strikes me as hubris of a truly Homeric scope.

Just to make this point clear, I note that the most recent book of stats we have on personal income tax was published last fall covering the taxation year 1988, which you will recall, Mr. Speaker, is the first year of the much heralded income tax reform. It was when the finance minister's changes to the income tax system were supposed to take effect and make things a whole lot fairer for all Canadians. This book now lets us see what actually happened.

Do you know what happened? What happened—to the surprise of some, I suppose; to the surprise of none in my caucus—was that the income tax system became more unfair. In fact, the average tax paid by Canadians making more than a quarter of a million dollars a year—of those who paid tax—from 1987 to 1988 dropped by 15 per cent. It dropped $20,597. The average tax paid by those earning a quarter of a million dollars a year or more went down.

What happened on the other end? The average tax paid by those making 15 grand a year or less, from 1987 to the first year of tax reform in 1988, went up by 13 per cent, or $71. By any dispassionate measure, that is grossly unfair.

Just to rub salt in the wound, the same year the number of those Canadians earning a quarter of a million dollars or more who paid no tax went up by 40 per cent from the previous year. In 1988 we had 140 Canadians who made a quarter of a million dollars a year or more and did not pay a penny on it, not one red cent. Those earning 50 grand a year or more who paid no tax went up 87 per cent, to 5,430. That is one whale of a tax reform. That is one heck of an example of fairness.

I would suggest that no Canadian who has been paying attention is going to be surprised by these numbers. It is just a continuation of the policy of ever greater unfairness in the taxation system that has been pursued by successive Liberal and Conservative governments since the end of the Second World War.

It is my constituents in Edmonton East, the folk who work at the chemical plants, the folk who work at Gainers, the folk who work in the public sector in the schools and in the federal government offices, who are being made to pay more and more so that the rich can pay less and less.

That is why I, on their behalf, cannot support this borrowing bill.

• (1810)

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, with this bill, the government is asking the House the authority to borrow $26 billion, $400 million of which for the 1991–1992 financial year. This request, made necessary by this government's policies over the past few years, must be set in the context of the projections contained in the last budget.

Obviously, the government failed to reduce the deficit after promising to do it. Now, it is presenting a budget that goes against the role traditionally played by the federal government during a recession.

Of course, we are aware of the phenomenal size of the accumulated national debt and the deficit which is remaining high in spite of the repeated promises of the Minister of Finance. We knew that there was little leeway and that not much could be expected from the last budget. Still, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance managed to disappoint us on three grounds. First, the Minister of Finance took no responsibility for the present situation. Second, the measures announced in this budget will deepen the recession and prevent the economy from making a strong recovery. Third, chances of finding effective long-term solutions are very slim.

What responsibility does this government have in the current national finance crisis? For seven years now, the Minister of Finance has been posing as the brave white knight trying to improve a disastrous situation inherited from the Liberals. I have no qualms about condemning the Liberal mismanagement but, as the years go by, the minister must come to realize that his government also made major mistakes that contributed to a large extent to the deterioration of our national finances.

Let me give a few examples of mistakes that were later corrected. There was the $500,000 lifetime capital gains exemption introduced by the Conservatives, not the Liberals. This exemption even applied to capital gains made on rental properties, which brought speculative pressure to bear on those properties without attracting productives investment. The government has to backtrack and reduce the exemption to $100,000.

Another example is VIA Rail. While the Liberal government had the courage to propose the required streamlining plan, this government, when it came to power, was only too eager to cancel it and reallocate hundreds of thousands of dollars to a recovery plan that failed. But they finally carried out the streamlining planned by the Liberals. What was ironic was to see the former minister, the hon. Jean–Luc Pépin, become the major advocate of this government which was carrying out his plan five years too late.

There are many other examples, but I am more concerned, Mr. Speaker, about the mistakes that were not recognized. Think of the Hibernia project for instance. More than $2 billion in federal government funds were pumped into a venture that will never be profitable and which will require more enormous capital outlays to be kept afloat in the years to come. In addition to not being viable, the project's potential for damage to the environment is far greater than in the case of hydro–electric projects.

Actually, the Lower Churchill project, which is marking time as a result of the Newfoundland government's stubborn position, would have created more jobs than the Hibernia project, without government subsidies and with minimal risk to the environment.

How are we supposed to make sense of a decision, that includes the construction of a new shipyard in Newfoundland, at a time when Canadian shipyards are losing money and the industry has been subject to costly restructuring during the past ten years? The present problems at Versatile in Vancouver are just one more episode in the restructuring process we already experienced in Quebec. In fact, Davie Shipbuilding in Lévis, which is technically bankrupt, is still waiting for the federal government's decision, which keeps being postponed, to give the green light so it can continue work on its defence contracts.

The shipyards under construction in Newfoundland will never be viable. How can the Minister of Finance defend such wasteful policies? Is this a sensible way to manage the country's finances? I may add that the Liberals' support for getting the necessary legislation through the House of Commons and the Senate is certainly no guarantee for good management. This is electioneering at public expense.

After seven years, the Minister of Finance can no longer deny his responsibility for the deplorable state of the nation's finances. He must take the responsibility for his government's decisions.

And now, what about the future first of all, the immediate future. What is the government doing to get us out of the recession? Nothing. In fact, it is increasing pressure on wage earners. The most intolerable measure in this entire budget is probably the 24.5 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums. This is a clear incentive to increase lay–offs and unemployment. This comes at a time when the minister says one of the major problems in our economy is that our labour costs are higher than those of our competitors. So why increase them in the middle of a recession? I found only one explanation, in the speech made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration when she introduced this bill. She said that if premiums had not been increased this year, and I quote: "The expected deficit in the UI account would have required large premium increases in 1993". Economically speaking, this alternative would have been entirely acceptable, since in 1993, we should be in the middle of an economic recovery. So why not wait until then? Probably for political reasons.

In spite of the polls and the desertions, the government hopes to stretch its mandate up to 1993. Election logic has clearly won over economic logic.

Another cut, that of $70 million in the subsidies to non-profit organizations dedicated to help the needy, is also unacceptable in the present context. In fact, we were not expecting miracles from the Minister of Finance. We are aware of the difficulties involved in public finances. On the other hand, when election logic prevails over a minimum of compassion for the unemployed and the poor in the present situation, it must be denounced Mr. Speaker. But let us look further.

Are there in this budget directions which would indicate that the government will seriously deal with the basic reasons behind the chronic deficit as well as the very ineffectiveness of the federal system. Unfortunately, the answer is no. The government is making cuts everywhere, but maintains its determination to meddle in all aspects of the lives of the people and the provinces. We are back to the era of liberal centralization which built a political and bureaucratic structure which is forever creating deficits, unless the provinces and the people demand a quick change in policy.

Remember the Tory government which preached both decentralization and consultation! Where are we now? By systematically cutting in transfer payments to the provinces, the Tory government decentralized the accounts payable, while maintaining and even increasing its control over the taxation areas. Now that it is no longer able to pay, does the federal government intend to return to the provinces their areas of jurisdiction? No at all; quite the contrary. It intends to introduce new legislation, especially in the health care area, to increase its powers. It intends to give itself the powers it needs to compel others to spend while imposing its own national standards.

Is that the only area, Mr. Speaker? Not at all. Read again the speech which the Minister of Employment and Immigration made when she introduced her bill on March 5 last. She explained her manpower enhancement strategy by saying and I quote: "Our strategy is based on the idea of partnerships; partnerships with employers, with labour, with education and with provinces and territories."

After reminding the House of the announcement concerning the new Canadain Labour Force Development Board, she exclaimed, and I quote: "What a breakthrough for Canada, to be able to build the kind of partnership that is going to be needed in the decade ahead". What breakthrough is the minister talking about?

She talks about a fresh initiative, a new intrusion on the part of the federal government which, no longer financially strong enough to maintain its presence in the vocational training field, chose to grab the unemployment insurance funds and re-affirm its intention to continue with the kind of jurisdiction duplications that led to the wanton resource wastes of which we are all aware. In Quebec, all groups representing management, labour and teachers have refused to sit on this board. They are all in favour of the Government of Quebec repatriating all powers in the field of vocational training. What success is the minister referring to? It is in fact a failure, a new confrontation, yet another example of federal arrogance.

Whatever happened to the willingness of the Conservative government to decentralize? After a few years we have to admit that the willingness has disappeared and been replaced by the old Liberal arrogance. The speeches of the Prime Minister increasingly attest to that fact. Should we be surprised? Who have been his closest advisers in recent months? The likes of Tellier, Dicerney, Gagné and Tassé, the best soldiers Trudeau had to send to the front lines in the referendum battle, a team that is quite prepared to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to maintain an outdated vision of the way to govern this country, a team whose sole aim is to hang on to the power of the federal government's bureaucratic and political machine, not to give this country the political and economic institutions that would meet the aspirations of the Canadian public.

The economic failure of the federal government cannot hide the political failure. The political reality of this country is that it is made up of two nations, two peoples that must quickly undertake an in-depth review of their political and economic institutions. Of course, when the Conservative government came into office, we were hoping for progress in that direction.

But with the Meech Lake failure, confrontation is the order of the day. Quite clearly, the Prime Minister and his government are doing exactly what the Liberal Party did in the past. I am utterly convinced, Mr. Speaker, that that is not what Canadians and Quebeckers are wishing for. Bureaucracy and the federal government's policy have become the main obstacles preventing Quebeckers and Canadians from reaching an agreement. And we will be working relentlessly in the next few months to reach such agreements.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I listened well to the Hon. Member for Rosemont. He referred earlier to VIA Rail. When talking either about engines or workers,—I come from a distant area—when talking about the railway line between Senneterre and Montreal and back Montreal—Senneterre—Cochrane and Shawinigan, the way my good friend the Hon. Member for Shawinigan, Denis Pronovost, pronounces it, something must be said. We are reaping what the Liberals have sown. After investigation, the House will remember that the line from Senneterre—Cochrane provides $60,000 in revenues, while it costs a million dollar a year to adminster VIA Rail from Senneterre—Cochrane. Yet, there is something strange. As Members of the Opposition, whether within the Liberal Party or the NDP—and even you who are part of the Bloc Quebecois, although you were elected under the Conservative banner—you accepted a number of things when you were elected. Mr. Speaker, one thing must be said: The VIA Rail passenger train often arrives in Senneterre. But the administrators of this Crown Corporation do not have even the teams they need to drive the train to Amos, La Sarre and Cochrane— Often, however, VIA management doesn't even have a crew to run the locomotive, to go to Amos, La Sarre and Cochrane. I never saw anything like it. That's VIA management for you. It's not the government's fault. This is a Crown corporation.

You mentioned Meech and the fact that we lost everything. I, for one, hope that Quebeckers are pleased with the Canada-Quebec agreement referred to in Meech, the agreement that has just been signed by the federal government and the Government of Quebec, the Canada-Quebec agreement on immigration. The people in our area are pleased with this agreement.

You also referred to the Minister of Finance and his Budget, when you said we had lost everything. Thanks to the Conservative members from Quebec, thanks to the Quebec caucus, Quebec was able to patriate a number of things that were here in Ottawa, including a research laboratory we got in Abitibi. This had never been done before. The Liberals never did it. The NDP never supported us in this respect, and the Bloc Quebecois certainly never gave us their support when it came to patriating research and development.

There is another item I would like to mention in my comments, and that is the matter of isolated post allowances. This was a very positive development for workers, for union members, for all the workers in Matagami, Joutel, Lebel-sur-Quévillon, Chapais Chibougamau. Now they have isolation benefits. That is an important development.

I noticed recently Mr. Speaker, that members of the Bloc Quebecois keep saying they are defending the rights of Quebeckers. I just made a speech on March 7 on the subject of the precautionary withdrawal from work for pregnant women in federally regulated businesses. Well, there are a lot of women in Quebec who work for unions like the FTQ, the CSN, the Metal Workers, but in this debate on the defence of pregnant women, in the federally regulated businesses, the Bloc Quebecois was nowhere to be seen. They never defended us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would the hon. member kindly put his question?

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, my question or comment can last ten, twenty minutes, according to Beauchesne and to Mrs Sauvé. Mrs Sauvé has always said that we could speak for ten minutes, make a good speech, and put our question after. We have ten minutes to speak, and that's the truth. Remember what Mrs Sauvé said in the House when she was in the chair, that we had ten minutes to speak before putting a question.

However, there is one thing I wish to say, Mr. Speaker. I hear the member talking over there, she is trying to cut me off—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are hon. members who would like to ask a question or make a comment, so I would appreciate it if the hon. member would put his question.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Perfect. My question is thus as follows, Mr. Speaker. It follows from an article in today's La Presse which said that the mortgage rates of today are hurting us less than in 1982, according to the Mouvement des caisses populaires Desjardins. Does the hon. member for Rosemont agree that the mortgage rates are better today than they were in 1982?

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): I will give a quick answer, Mr. Speaker.

You know, I do not blame this government for the cuts they made in VIA Rail. We find that they did it five years after having spent hundreds of millions of dollars. So this is the thrust of my remark. They have to take the responsibility; they cannot blame it only on the past.

As for the defence of workers, you know, the hon. member for Abitibi is a very sympathetic and hard-working member, whom I respect, but if he really takes to heart the workers' interests, I wonder how the Conservative members from Quebec could vote against the anti-scab legislation put forward by the Bloc Québécois—

Mr. Saint-Julien: I voted for it.

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, I know you voted for it yourself, but your colleagues voted against it. That is why it was defeated.

I agree with you totally that mortgage rates are much better than they were in 1982. It was an absolute disaster in 1982! I agree that, because of the very tight management by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, we now have relatively stable long-term rates. Putting the brakes suddenly is what threw us in a much deeper recession—the Governor of the Bank himself admitted it. I am not blaming it all on him. It was indeed hard to predict, but the Governor did decide to apply the brakes even though everyone was anticipating a recession. Today, he admits that he should have changed course earlier, but we are already in a deep recession.

Why not have waited until 1993 to increase the unemployment insurance premiums? Because the Conservatives hope that 1993 will be an election year. That is why. This is where electoral considerations took precedence over economic considerations. That is the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions and comments period is now over. On debate. The hon. member for Nepean.

• (1830)

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am delighted to have the opportunity to speak during consideration of this stage of Bill C-97, an act to provide borrowing authority. Billions of dollars are to be borrowed to feed an insatiable appetite of a government that knows not what it is doing.

My colleagues on this side of the House have done an admirable job of pointing out the inadequacies of this budget and of laying bare the very twisted ideology which drives this government to deliver blows time and again to the people of this country. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to add my voice to this debate at this time.

I would be the first person in this House to say that we need fiscal accountability and responsibility in government; there is no doubt about it. I would be the first to say that we must all do our share to rid our country of the deficit so that future generations are not saddled with paying for the government's impetuous spending habits.

However, let us begin by looking at the situation in the manufacturing sector and how the policies of this government in its repeated budgetary fiascos has snuffed out the fires in the so-called "engine of Canada's economy—the province of Ontario".

It would come as no surprise to many Canadians outside Ontario that it is actually this province that is feeling the greatest pinch during these difficult economic times. According to the findings of a Liberal task force, Ontario accounts for four out of every ten lost Canadian jobs. Ontario is now feeling the greatest impact with respect to plant closures, bankruptcies, unemployment and the general economic slowdown.

The issues which are consistently cited as reasons for the dramatic downturn in the economy are: high interest rates, Canada's artificially high dollar, high rate of taxation compounded by the GST, the negative effects of the free trade agreement, and the government's mismanagement of the federal debt.

Here in the national capital region, which my riding of Nepean and my constituents are a part of, we were once known for economic stability. We in the nation's capital are not immune any more to the effects of this government's economic policies, as a shrinking and demoralized Public Service, bankruptcies and rising unemployment in the region all add up to a greater reliance on already strained social service agencies.

In essence, we in the nation's capital are suffering from the trickle down effect, at a time of increasing dependence on social assistance programs brought on by this government's policies. We are watching those programs dry up due to a lack of funding by this government.

In straight economic terms, this budget and this government are costing Canadians dearly, but it is the human cost that is most tragic. The real tragedy is that this government conveniently glosses over the hardships which it has inflicted on Canadians. Middle-class Canadians are taxed to death. They are generally unable to enjoy the same tax loopholes which rich friends of this government enjoy.

Women continue to struggle toward true equality in our society. The government causes further setbacks by cutting funding and programs which might assist women in their cause. In some ways the plight of women has grown worse, not better, under this administration.

It is a well documented fact that the incidence of family violence and family breakdown increases as financial pressures mount. We can be sure that every Canadian family is feeling the bite of the hard economic times brought on by the policies of the government. It is almost always women who are at the receiving end of family violence.

Even then I suspect that a solution would involve a glitzy public relations campaign designed to gloss over the problems of increasing family breakdown and violence against women.

Next in the line of this government's fire are the children. There are approximately 100 million children today living in poverty in Canada and close to 200,000 of them must rely on food banks for their daily bread. That is unconscionable.

I ask: What kind of future will these children have if all they ever know is poverty, hunger and hopelessness? Undernourished, they find it difficult to learn. Many of them will end up by dropping out of school or certainly not doing as well as they could if given better circumstances in which to grow and learn. They will become part of a vicious perpetual cycle of poverty. They will know nothing else. They will grow up with a deeply rooted sense of cynicism and mistrust.

The government which claims to despise the so-called welfare state mentality is actually creating a much greater malaise. Once entrenched, there will be no social safety net to prevent the fall of all of the people who will be in its grip.

This all comes at a time when an international agreement to which 30-some countries throughout the world agreed was signed last May: the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. We may recall that the Prime Minister of Canada went to Washington and chaired, I believe, that committee. We were all so enthused and pleased that Canada was going to be involved.

To this date, Canada has not signed the agreement. What a farce: travelling to Washington, all this hoop-la, chair the committee, and then he does not sign the agreement. It outlines minimum standards for children, among other things, in health care and education. It encourages the development of different forms of secondary education systems both general and vocational. It ensures appropriate health care, family planning and education. This should be available and accessible to all children. The list goes on and on. I could cite many examples.

Does this government expect that the provinces are going to submit happily to spending even more money in the areas of health care and education at a time when the federal government is cutting them off?

I was delighted when Canada agreed to be part of this convention. I do not know what has gone wrong. I would encourage all members on the opposite side of the House to put pressure on their cabinet, on the people who have the power to issue a signature in Washington on the rights of the child.

The public servants of this country have also been singled out for punishment in the budget. Not since this government attempted to deindex old age pensions have I seen a more direct and cynical attack on a specific sector of society. This government believes that Canadians feel their public servants are nothing more than overpaid and underproductive bureaucrats.

The government, by its actions, is telling every employer in Canada that it is acceptable to throw away the right to bargain and it is acceptable to hold over the heads of the workers the threats of job losses and contracting out. Women in the Public Service have also been hurt.

Another sector which is carrying more than its share of this country's economic burden is small business. Any small business that has managed to survive the recession, which this government has created and now ignores, deserve a medal of valour for they have survived a war that has been waged against them by their own government. They are now required, along with the employee, to pay all the unemployment insurance bills. The federal government is no longer paying part of that program. Eighty per cent of new jobs in this country are created by small business and yet this government will turn around and stick a knife in its back.

I had a call from a plumber recently with regards to the FST. He said: "I thought when GST was implemented that I would no longer have to pay the FST." His supplier was charging him for both. He said: "I cannot afford it. What do I do?" I phoned Revenue Canada, and what did it tell me: "The marketplace will sort all this out." In the meantime, there is a plumber who cannot pay for his supplies because someone had refused to remove the FST. It is a paperwork jungle for the small business person. The GST has created horrendous problems.

The finance minister and the Prime Minister are being less than truthful when they say this is a budget aimed at deficit elimination.

Actually they are passing the buck to the provinces, the municipalities and, through the back door route, to the taxpayers of this country. We are already overtaxed; programs to help women, the unemployed, the disadvantaged, have been slashed. Now this government in this budget has furthered its vicious assault on our health care and education programs. It has pitted workers against each other, and it has left the provinces and municipalities holding the bag.

Yesterday, the Canadian Human Rights Commission released its 1990 annual report. It has made recommendations in several areas which require action, not cuts; aboriginal issues; in issues affecting the disabled; with respect to women, immigrants, visible minorities. Many of the recommendations in the report have been on the books for five years or longer. In other words, every year, the Human Rights Commission is recommending these things and the government is doing nothing about it.

The report calls for the acknowledgement of the government of debts owed to aboriginal people. Some 41 per cent of unattached women 65 years of age and older continue to remain below the poverty line, despite a recommendation contained in the 20 year old report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada. When will these women get their due?

The commission report calls for measures to foster improved race relations, yet the pieces of pie for all groups and programs working toward this end, get smaller and smaller.

This government has further proven that it, and its policies, are incapable of saving, let alone building, this nation. This government should try to use some creativity and imagination in attempting to solve our nation's problems. Let us provide, not cut, training and education to get people back to work.

One of the things I have been doing recently in my riding, and I started about six weeks ago, is meeting with the business community. Appointments are set and I meet people from the business community on an average of three businesses a week for an hour, sometimes up to two hours in the morning. I have met with companies as large as Northern Telecom, which employs 3,000 people in the city of Nepean and I have also met smaller businesses that employ maybe only 10 people.

Without fail, the business community is saying to me that this government is destroying business in this country. They cannot compete because of the policies of this government. Some 90 per cent of their business is now outside of the country because they cannot compete within their own country.

A company I visited yesterday has computer systems in the House of Representatives and the Congress in Washington. Do you think he can get something into the Parliament of Canada or in the House of Commons? Not on your life. He told me of the paperwork, the bureaucratic red tape. This gentleman said to me: "I could cry when I see what this government is doing to business in Canada".

Let us provide adequate health care so that people can feel secure and get on with living. Let us reform our system of taxation to a more fair and level playing field, so that the average Canadian does not feel cynical and over-burdened. Let us create a fair justice system so that people do not feel persecuted and resentful.

I say to the government, I say to the Prime Minister, and I say to the Minister of Finance: let us invest in people, and they will give us back much more. We will have a better country. They can spend their time and energy just getting on with living, rather than spending their time and energy resenting the government and each other for their difficult predicament.

This approach, in addition to solving the economic woes of this country, would go a long way toward promoting national unity. The two major issues that I see in the country today are national unity and the economic problems we are faced with. In many ways they probably go hand in hand. With a positive outlook, and with a hand-in-glove approach to the people of Canada, I think we can succeed. We are a great nation. We have a wonderful future, and I think we have to be sympathetic. We have to get to the grass roots and find out what people are hearing, find out what they are saying, find out what they are feeling, and continue to build this great nation.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Nepean for her contribution to the debate this evening.

I point out that when she commenced her discussion, she indicated she would advocate that this government face up to its deficit, that the people of this country do have to pay for the benefits they have received while living here. But then she proceeded for the next 15 minutes to discuss item after item after item in which the government would have to pay out more money, not less, that would be adding more to the burden, not only to the taxpayers we have now, but more burden to the taxpayers we are going to have in the future, the young people, the people who are truly our future in Canada.

I would like to ask the hon. member to contemplate that situation. Could she go back to her opening statement and indicate to the House and to the people who are watching, how she would propose to achieve all of the things she mentioned, and yet still be responsible to the country, to the taxpayers today and the young people who are going to inherit the debt that we do not pay.

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his question.

I would like to go back to the years 1984 to 1988. Canada had, in those four years, the largest unprecedented growth in its history. In other words, the growth over the anticipated revenue was so large and so massive that it never before happened in the history of this country. That was during the first term this government held office in Canada. Did it reduce one dollar of the deficit? Not on your life. And do you think I can find out what it did with all that money during that time? No, sir, I cannot, because the books are closed to me as an opposition member. This government had billions and billions of dollars, I believe it was something like $100 billion, in excess revenue over anticipated revenue in those four years and it doubled the debt in that time.

What do I say to the member sitting opposite me? If he cannot manage the economy in the good times, and here we are in the tight times and he wants to impose a GST when everybody is already in a tight situation. He wants to increase taxes. In other words, hit a guy when he is down. Oh, sure, hit a guy when he is down and see what it is like. Why did you not hit them when they were up, when we were up those four years. You are poor managers. You do not know how to manage the economy.

For instance, money should be poured into research and the education system. Every one of those businesses I have been attending mentioned this. Northern Telecom used to hire the top ten percentile from the University of Waterloo. They are not staying in this country any more, they are going to the States. Do you know why? Because we are over-taxed in this country. They will not stay here. They can earn $50,000 in the United States and it is worth $100,000 here in Canada. We cannot compete. We are losing our students to the American sector.

Another thing that was mentioned was to hire an American engineer and bring him to Canada. In order for that same engineer who might be making $40,000 in the States, to bring him to Canada to work for a company like Northern Telecom, they have to pay him $75,000. They cannot afford it any more.

Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate the gentleman's question to me, I find it absolutely incredulous that here are people who are unemployed, their incomes have been cut and we are wanting to hit them even harder with the high interest rates, with the GST, with all of the other cutbacks in the programs.

I just say to him that this is not the year to do it. You should have done it between 1984 and 1988. I would still like to know what you did with those billions of dollars. If you ever find time to slip it across the aisle, I would love to have it.

• (1850)

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on the estimates and the budget. The finance minister's budget is a continuation of this government's destructive economic policies. As is the case in all regions of Canada, those living in the Hamilton area are suffering from the made-in-Canada recession.

On January 23 and 24, as chairman of the Hamilton-Niagara caucus, I conducted hearings on the economy and the recession. The participation of the hon. members from Hamilton East, Hamilton West, Haldimand—Norfolk, Etobicoke North, Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold, and London East in the task force on the economy and the recession contributed a great deal toward its success.

We heard from 25 groups and individuals representing a cross section of the community: social service groups, labour unions, food banks, hospitals, small businesses, Mohawk College and McMaster University, low cost housing organizations, the construction industry, and the steel industry, among others. The presentations that we heard put a human face on the cold statistics that we hear in this House day after day.

The citizens of the Hamilton area painted a grim picture of how the region is suffering as a result of this government's policies. It was amazing that witness after witness, representing interests from across the spectrum, all expressed deep concern about the direction this government is leading us. In this time of great national division, the one unifying factor may be the Canadian public's rejection of this government's economic policies.

The shocking thing is that there is nothing accidental about what the government has done, nor is the current recession the result of global factors. This is the Prime Minister's one truly Canadian effort: a made-in-Canada recession. The Prime Minister even bragged last fall about engineering an economic slowdown. Despite his many other failed initiatives, I must admit that on this one the Prime Minister has really outdone himself.

This recession is the result of very deliberate actions by this government. The government's high interest rate policy, for example, is hitting all sectors of the Hamilton economy. Traditionally, Canadian interest rates have been 1 to 2 per cent over their American counterparts. Over the last year, Canadian interest rates have been 4 to 5 per cent higher than those of the United States. This has prevented young families from buying homes, has forced companies to lay off workers, and has prevented small businesses from expanding.

If the government is not prepared to go out and hear what Canadians have to say about their economic policies, then let me make it easier for them by repeating what my colleagues and I were told by witnesses at the task force in Hamilton.

Family Services of Hamilton-Wentworth described at the hearings what high interest rates are doing to young families:

> This stage of the family life cycle is marked by high rates of borrowing and low rates of saving, due to the demands of household formation. As a result, young families are affected by the higher costs of borrowing but receive few of the benefits of the high rates of return on saving.

Alderman Don Ross, chairman of the Hamilton-Wentworth Economic Development Committee, offered the following overview of the problem.

> For improved economy we need the Bank of Canada to reduce interest rates to a level that will enable people, industry, and commerce to feel comfortable enough to re-invest in major capital projects; whether that be a new car, plant or merchandise.

Bob Crockford, chairman of the Hamilton branch of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, raised further concerns with respect to the manufacturers' spending on capital investment.

> —the loss of manufacturing investment may be the single greatest cost of the government's high interest rate policy.

Cameron Nolan of the Hamilton Construction Association described the effects of high interest rates on the construction industry.

> The result has been slower growth and resulting unemployment— Our industry urges the federal government—to amend its interest rate policy to one which calls for reducing interest rates. A reduction will bring us out of the recession.

The Hamilton and District Chamber of Commerce in their presentation focused on the high Canadian dollar:

> The high cost of the Canadian dollar is impeding the country's ability to sustain its export capabilities in world markets.

The introduction of the goods and services tax in the middle of a recession has only served to make a bad situation worse for those in the Hamilton area. By pulling dollars out of an already depressed economy, the GST has dealt a severe blow to the Hamilton area.

Scott Jacks, owner of a small Hamilton natural food store described what the goods and services tax will do to small business:

> Many small businesses find cash flow to be a difficult challenge at the best of times. I must point out that the GST could have a devastating effect on cash flow, even to the point of putting someone out of business.

The wonderful prosperity the Prime Minister predicted under free trade has unfortunately not been apparent anywhere north of the 49th parallel. Since the signing of the free trade agreement there has been a flight of Canadian jobs to the United States. Stelco in its presentation at our hearings noted the increased difficulties in doing business as more and more of its customers are closing their doors and moving production to the United States.

Ed Herchuk, president of the Ontario Council of Labour, told us that under the free trade agreement American construction workers are enjoying far greater rights in cross border work than Canadian labourers and as a result "they daily take jobs away from Canadian construction workers".

The deliberate policies of the federal government have all contributed to the deindustrialization of Ontario, the heartland of Canadian industry. The effects are as clear as they are shocking.

In the last year unemployment has doubled in the Hamilton area. Today there are 30,000 Hamiltonians out of work. For the Prime Minister's benefit, that is more people than live in his home town of Baie Comeau.

Consumer bankruptcies in Hamilton shot up to 1,062 in 1990, an 80 per cent increase over 1989. Business bankruptcies went up 30 per cent during the same period.

Food banks in Hamilton now report approximately 20,000 people using their services each month. Social service agencies report a 67 per cent increase in the case load in the Hamilton–Wentworth region. Line–ups for social assistance housing continue to rise.

And how, Mr. Speaker, in this budget has this government addressed the concerns so eloquently expressed by the witnesses at the Hamilton task force hearings? Obviously, it is not concerned. For example, under this year's budget job retraining funds were cut by $100 million. It is small wonder unemployment has risen 10.2 per cent, just as the Minister of Finance predicted. Hamiltonians only wish he could have been as accurate with his predictions of economic prosperity in the last election.

Another example of the government's lack of concern is with consumers and businesses already struggling due to the GST and high interest rates, the finance minister has decided to hike unemployment insurance premiums by 24 per cent. Funds for social assistance housing have been slashed.

This budget will not only worsen the current economic recession in Hamilton, but it will also prevent Hamiltonians and all Canadians from improving their situation in the long run. Cuts in transfer payments to post–secondary education will hurt our universities and colleges and make it even more difficult for us to compete in the global market.

This government has declared war on Canadians with high inflation, high interest rates and general mismanagement, a war in which unfortunately the average Canadian now has little defence except the next election.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have a chance to speak in opposition to Bill C–97 by which the government intends to borrow $26.4 billion from the Canadian people and of course, saddle them with still more taxes to pay the interest to those rich Canadians who lend the government the money.

• (1900)

This $26.4 billion is something in the range of $1,500 per year for every Canadian family. The government does it very lightly. This government is not listening to the Canadian people. We can see that by the way the Canadian people rate the government at the bottom of the polls.

It has been cutting taxes on the rich. It has been raising taxes on the poor. It has been cutting the unemployment insurance benefits at a time when it knows that unemployment is going to rise. It has been giving Canadian jobs away to the United States and other countries through the free trade agreement, giving jobs away to corporations that take them to the United States as they took 600 jobs away from the Inglis washing machine plant in Trinity—Spadina within a year of the free trade agreement by lowering the tariffs, or to U.S. based companies for the most part that contract those jobs out to very low wage countries of the Third World.

It has not been listening to the Canadian people about its war spending during 1990 and 1991. It has not been listening to the Canadian people about the many, many millions of dollars that it spent oppressing the native people with the Canadian army around the Oka dispute.

We have all read in our public and high school history about how the English people three and a half centuries ago decided it was time to tell the king and the other rich landed gentry that they did not have the right to raise taxes on the king's whim and to spend the money on the king's whim. They argued that the king did not have the right. He said he did, he had the divine right, that he was made king by the decision of God. Therefore whatever he did had the authority of God. The people did not believe him and under Cromwell they were willing to fight to tell the king that he not only did not have the right, but that he did not have the power. To prove their point, they cut off his head.

Then for a while England became governed more by democratic means through the parliamentary system. But in the last couple of decades this Parliament has been losing even the limited power that it has had. That is to say, the people who are elected to this Parliament as members, constituency by constituency, have less and less control over what this government does. This government makes wildly false promises during election time that it clearly does not intend to keep.

While I was in Mexico last week, I found it interesting to hear the President of Mexico, through the media, solemnly promising that he would not give up one iota of Mexico's control over its natural oil and resources, solemnly promising that he would not make any trade deals that would bring contracts or jobs into Mexico that would damage the environment and so on. It all sounds dismally familiar on the basis of what we heard three years ago from this government. We heard, in 1984 when this government was seeking election, it promise solemnly that it would have nothing to do with a trade deal with the United States because it would be a marriage of the elephant and the mouse and when the elephant roles over, the now Prime Minister said it would be the finish of the mouse.

They deceived the voters at election time and then when representatives elected here to Parliament complained about what the government was doing and used this forum to explain to the people how the government has deceived people, the government used a gag. It has gagged this Parliament more times in the last six years than all governments did before it. It even has the nerve to spend millions and millions of tax dollars, further deceiving the people, as it tried to deceive the people about Bill C–55, the anti–refugee law it introduced three and a half years ago, with misleading, quite false interpretations of it, as it did last year, putting out millions of dollars to mislead people about the goods and services tax which was thoroughly unpopular.

My point is that Canadians have been losing control of their government. We still have the right to vote at election time. They did in Samosa's Nicaragua. They do in the ARENA parties in El Salvador. They can come and vote, but those people under Samosa in Nicaragua and under the ARENA party now in El Salvador do not control their government through that vote.

In Canada it a little more subtle. By law, for example, Canadian people are prevented from acting, through the members of Parliament, to decide whether Canada goes to war. Last year this government sent ships, planes and troops to the Middle East without consulting the Canadian people through their elected representatives. For six weeks Canadians and members of Parliament asked the government to convene Parliament.

There was a little concern about 174 unarmed people with dark skins landing in Nova Scotia. The government declared it an emergency. It talked about an invasion. You would think we were being invaded by thousands of troops armed with machine guns and tanks—174 dark skinned people wading ashore in Nova Scotia was an emergency. Parliament was recalled. A law was passed authorizing the Canadian government to commit piracy on the high seas by seizing ships and turning them away in waters that Canada does not own.

But when the government is going to spend millions upon million upon millions of dollars on a war project in the Middle East, it is no emergency. The government did not use the emergences act which it passed. It sneaked around the corners instead and in connivance, not with the premiers, but with the business interests who profit by war, it simply sent the ships and then later recalled Parliament, not really to give permission, but only to give loyal support, which the government majority gave.

In the same way, it never asked Parliament for permission to send the troops against Oka, a dispute which could have been settled any time in the last 200 years by fair negotiation with the people who lived here before we Europeans came.

Later, after it was all finished, it asked Parliament and its tame majority to pass a resolution approving it. But there was a long, long struggle for months before there was any willingness to have a parliamentary committee open up the facts.

Again in 1991, when President Bush pressured the United Nations Security Council—not the United Nations General Assembly, the only really democratic body of the United Nations, but the Security Council, controlled by a few holdovers from the power system 45 years ago —to pass an ambiguous resolution which President Bush interpreted as authorization for war, it scrapped the sanctions, which were working, because President Bush wanted war. This government delayed recalling Parliament. The American Congress came back to debate it before the bombing began. This Parliament was not allowed to begin debate until the bombing was already upon us.

It made a mockery of this Parliament in that debate. It made a mockery of the speaking and made a mockery of voting.

In Cromwell's time, England was ruled by the rich nobility and the king. It was the merchants, the working classes in London and many of the peasants in the countryside who provided the strength of Cromwell's army which ended that rule.

• (1910)

Canada is now ruled by the Business Council on National Issues, the chief executives of 150 of the largest corporations in Canada. They called for three things: they called for a trade deal, they got it; they called for cuts in the social programs and they are getting it; they called for a boost in the arms budget and they are getting it. Those are the ones who call the tune in this country, not the Canadian people.

It is wider than this. It is not just a matter of Canada alone. Canada has its allies, that is to say this government has its allies. When the Prime Minister was elected the first time, practically the first act he did was to go to the White House to take his orders from President Reagan. Now he does the same with President Bush and the American arms manufacturers and their junior partners in Canada.

Another of the allies of Canada is the landed oligarchy and the army that control El Salvador, not that Canada gives direct aid there except for a few million dollars that it gives indirectly through a so-called aid project, but because Canada keeps silent. Canada keeps silent about the crimes committed by the government of El Salvador and by the army of El Salvador which is armed to the tune of more than a million dollars a day by the government of the United States.

Canada refuses to criticize the U.S. as Canada refused, with one minor exception, to criticize the U.S. proxy war against Nicaragua. Canada refuses to criticize the allies of the United States which maintain corrupt and oppressive regimes, such as the corrupt and wealthy rulers of some of the states in Arabia: the feudal lords and so-called kings in the Middle East who control those oil resources on behalf of the United States and literally for many years past got away with murder.

Now this government is asking Parliament to agree to lend it $26.4 billion. There will be no control over how it is spent because there is no control either over how it is raised. As my colleagues have pointed out before, one-quarter of that amount, one-quarter of that $26.4 billion could have been saved if the government had closed five of the major loopholes. The capital gains lifetime exemption fuels a great deal of the speculation that raises housing prices in Toronto beyond the reach of ability to pay, but the government gives a tax break of $2.8 billion, nearly $3 billion.

The business entertainment tax deduction, over $1 billion to the people who need it least. They claim they have to compete with others. Jones has to have this subsidy to entertain customers, to take them away from Smith, who has to have the same subsidy to entertain customers to take them away from Jones. They all benefit, all these top business people. But the Canadian working people have to pay extra taxes to feed them in luxury.

The dividend tax credit cushions the taxation that might be levied against the people who live partly off the dividends of corporations.

The manufacturing the processing tax credit amounts to another billion dollars. This was supposed to be done away with by the goods and services tax, but the government played a little bit of a shill game there and just slipped it through anyway.

The interest deductibility rule is another welfare scheme for land speculators. Nearly a billion dollars. The total of this is $6.7 billion, one-quarter of what the government wants to borrow.

Another way of putting it is that two or three years ago, in 1988, the average tax paid by Canadians making more than $225,000 a year went down by over $20,000. Twenty thousand dollars is a lot more than some people make by working for a year in Canada. But these people had $20,000 taken off their taxes, about 15 per cent of their income. At the same time, taxes paid by Canadians earning $15,000 or less rose by $71 which is a hike of 13 per cent.

This is the policy of this government. It could have saved one-quarter of this loan by a fair tax system, but it refused to do it, although this question was raised time and time again in Parliament by our party.

It can save another one-quarter of this loan money, if not right away at least soon, by taking our troops out of Europe. Whatever may have been the argument for putting the troops into Europe 30 and 40 years ago, it is agreed now that there is no threat of the Russian tanks rolling into Berlin and Paris. In fact, they are going the other way. But the government insists on spending over $6 billion to keep those troops there, the direct and indirect costs. It could take that money out. Those people could be more appropriately applied back home in Canada or, if necessary, in peacekeeping operations elsewhere.

As I say, if it could not be done all in one year, it could be begun this year.

Instead, this government has shown that it will get this money by cutting the programs for native people, which are a miserable small part of the obligation that we owe them for the land we took from them; by cutting programs that would benefit women who are still earning no more than two-thirds of what men earn in this country; cutting programs for higher education, pressuring institutions such as the University of Toronto to refuse to bargain in good faith with the men and women who keep that physical plant running; cutting programs on health; and, cutting programs on housing.

While I will be voting with my caucus against this borrowing bill, the issue is much larger. What Canada needs is a new Constitution, not just a new back-room division of powers between a Prime Minister and a bunch of premiers, but a Constitution in which the people of Canada participate and build up strong public pressure so that the people of Canada can regain control of the government by regaining parliamentary control of the cabinet.

I see you are signalling that my time is up. I hope that there will be more occasions when these same points can be raised in this House before the government decides to gag all debate.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my strong objections on behalf of my constituents in Haldimand—Norfolk to the spending priorities of this government.

My riding has been hit hard by the government's six years of economic mismanagement. Hundreds of farmers have declared bankruptcy. Hundreds of plant workers have lost their jobs. Hundreds of stores and small businesses have shut their doors. People are suffering. I say that to the member for Cariboo—Coquitlam, who is now not going to stay around to listen to this. After six years of taking money from the farmers, the storekeepers and the plant workers of Haldimand—Norfolk and giving nothing in return, frustration and anger is rampant. Cynicism with politicians is at an all time high. I feel it is incumbent upon this government to do something about that cynicism.

For six years, the people of my riding have seen this government cut their agricultural programs, cut their social programs, chop away at the mainstays of rural communities, the post offices, the railway stations and now, the community newspapers. Every year, while this government has chopped away, it has raised taxes. After six years of cutting valuable programs and raising taxes, the public debt has doubled. The deficit still continues to rise.

The government has brought our country into a recession. Canadians want to know where all the money has gone. They want to know why needy Canadians, middle-class Canadians, unemployed Canadians, farmers, fishermen, plant workers, and small entrepreneurs are always the first ones to be taxed and the last ones to be served by this government.

The Minister of Finance likes to paint himself as the sole, lone voice of fiscal sanity, a preacher of fiscal restraint. It is on the basis of these preachings that all criticisms are dismissed as irresponsible, fiscally naive. The problem is that these preachings are little more than self-serving and empty rhetoric, designed to obscure the fact that the government has fumbled its chance of bringing down the deficit and that it has made some major economic miscalculations, which have put many Canadians, including Canadians in my riding, in dire straits. Now the government is asking Canadians to bite a few more bullets.

The fact of the matter is that this government has squandered the public's trust. It has squandered Canadian tax dollars. The Canadian people do not believe the government any more. It is going to make it more difficult for us as politicians to come up with solutions to this fiscal mismanagement and this mess.

This government has very little credibility left. Last year, for instance, the Minister of Finance said that the deficit would fall below $28.5 billion in 1990. In fact it rose to $30.5 billion. Last year the Minister of Finance said that personal income taxes would rise by 9 per cent from the year earlier. Now he says that they will have to be raised by 15 per cent. Last year the Minister of Finance said that corporate income taxes would fall by 2 per cent. Do you know what they will fall by now, Mr. Speaker? It will be 10 per cent.

I do not think that is fair and I do not think Canadians believe that is fair. Unfortunately they do not feel they have a way of telling this government—or they do not have a way of making this government listen—that these things are not fair.

Last year again the Minister of Finance said the economy would grow by 3 per cent. He now says he thinks it will shrink by 1 per cent: 1, 2, 3 per cent. He is not sure. Last year he said employment would grow by 1.2 per cent. Now he says it will actually shrink by 1.5 per cent.

The facts speak for themselves. The Minister of Finance has no credibility. The things I have pointed out show that his credibility is seriously lacking not only in the House, not only with ordinary Canadians across the country, but also with the business community, those so-called people whom he represents, his Bay Street buddies.

This year's spending estimates signal to Canadians that this government has still not learned from its past errors. This government seems to be prepared to mismanage and fumble its way through yet another year and bring yet another year of unnecessary financial hardship all across this country, as each of us has heard in the House and in our constituency offices. On a weekly basis I heard from farmers who have lost their farms and from small businesses that have put enormous amounts of effort, time and money into providing a business and into trying to provide a future for their children. They come to my office in tears because they feel that they have been wronged by this government. They feel that had they just been left alone to their own avails they could have survived, they could have got through this recession.

Because of this government's economic policies they feel they have just not been treated right.

Turning to tobacco farmers, once again this year they were hit hardest by this government's budget, by this government's taxation on tobacco products. This year's budget brought yet another massive tax increase on tobacco products so that an additional $1.5 billion could be pumped into the government's coffers.

It was a tax grab. The finance minister unfortunately knew that if he did not do it the Ontario NDP government would have done the same thing. Every year it seems to be a fight to see who can first put out their budget, who can first tax tobacco products and hurt the tobacco farmers who produce those products.

Not many people across this country realize that tobacco brings in close to $6 billion annually into the coffers of government. Where does that money come from? Unfortunately that is a question this government and the Minister of Finance are not prepared to even look at. He did not have the courtesy before he brought down this budget to have a meeting with the tobacco board, to have a meeting with tobacco farmers, or to have a meeting with the communities affected by tobacco, to see how such an increase in tobacco taxes would affect them.

An hon. member: He doesn't care.

Mr. Speller: As the hon. member says, he doesn't care. It was just a tax grab. He needed the money and he was not prepared to look at the consequences of his taking that money.

That money comes out of my community. It comes out of the corner store that provides the tobacco farmers with their weekly needs. It comes out of the farm implement business, the small business person or entrepreneur there who provides them with the tools they need to farm the tobacco. It comes out of the students who work in the tobacco fields, who will not have a job this summer and who will not have any alternative to turn to because unfortunately the government has again cut money it is giving to youths for summer employment.

These are the Canadians, the people in my riding, who are affected by this government's budget. I wish the Minister of Finance would listen to these people when they say they only want the time to plan. They only want to know what their future holds. Why cannot this Minister of Finance tell these people for 10 years down the line what his plans are? Don't spring it on them one day so that they cannot plan. They need that time.

While the government now collects over $5.5 billion in tobacco taxes, how much is it planning to allocate to the program to help tobacco farmers get out of the business, what is known as the REDUX program?

There is nothing allocated this year. The AEI program, the alternative enterprise initiative, runs out this spring also. It was an initiative to help tobacco farmers, if the government truly wanted to get them out of the business, move into alternative crops. There is a major investment in these crops or in this business by these tobacco farmers, by these tobacco communities. What does the government do? It leaves them high and dry once again.

This government has not allocated one dime out of the $1.5 billion in taxes from tobacco back into the REDUX program.

• (1930)

This the same government whose Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture said just two years ago, to farmers in my riding: "Ottawa wants to send a stronger signal to the industry that we are here to support tobacco producers in their time of need and adjustment". That is exactly what he said. Unfortunately it was another broken promise. You have heard many, I know, Mr. Speaker; you have been in that chair a long time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Years.

Mr. Speller: This was a promise made by this government. The people of my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk have always felt that if a government makes a promise, or if a man makes a promise in rural Canada, it sticks by that promise no matter what the cost. Unfortunately this government has not stuck by its promise and is not prepared even to look at the issue to help these people out. It met with them but gave no commitment whatsoever on programs that it plans on bringing in to help out with the problem.

It is always after the case: knock it out from under their feet. There are 400 or 500 people wanting to get on REDUX. Probably that will triple within the next year or so because of this devastating impact.

This government is taxing a group of people right out of their livelihood. Yet, it does not provide the means for these people to leave their livelihoods with at least some sense of decency.

Members opposite seem unwilling to accept any responsibility for this. Members opposite can no longer expect Canadians to pay for their own mismanagement. Canadians have already paid too heavy a price. They have paid with their money. They have paid with their jobs and their businesses. They have paid with their homes. Thousands of Canadians have been put out of work in the last few years by this government, and yet this government has the audacity to pull its share of funding for unemployment insurance. In so doing, it has signalled that the federal government was no longer willing to accept even partial responsibility for Canada's unemployed.

I see you signalling, Mr. Speaker. I have seven minutes left; I stated at 7.20 p.m. When members opposite pushed Bill C-21 through the House, they promised Canadians that they would consider reintroducing government funding for UI if the fund ever ran into a deficit. They said that the money the government would normally have provided for UI funding would now be used for retraining. That was two years ago.

Today the government is singing another tune. The government is now asking ordinary—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member started at 7.18 p.m. He has five minutes left.

Mr. Speller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government is now asking ordinary Canadians who still have jobs to pay yet again for a growing number of unemployed. In the recent budget this government announced that employers and employees would face, combined, a 24 per cent increase in unemployment insurance premiums.

Mr. Speaker, do you know what that does to the small entrepreneur across Canada who was just weathering the storm of these sad economic times? He is on the borderline of either making it or not making it. Now he is forced to pay an increase of 24 per cent in unemployment insurance premiums. That is going to put a number of small entrepreneurs out of work and the people that they employ.

What about the money that the government promised to put into retraining when it pulled out of UI funding? That promise like so many before has also been broken. In fact, this budget cut $1 million from Canadian Jobs Strategy.

This government likes to talk about level playing fields and about this new competitive world. This government has thrown Canadians into open seas, but the they are not the level seas of fair and full competition. They are the seas rocked by waves of foreign export subsidies and non-tariff barriers. One would think that the government, seeing Canadians gasping for air, might throw a life preserver or two, such as an adjustment program. In fact an adjustment program was promised in the last election. Instead of throwing life preservers, this government is busy tying lead weights around drowning Canadians.

The government is burdening the economy with high interest rates, a high dollar, and it is cutting real spending on education, training, research and development, and unfortunately on science and technology. Canada has lost over 220,000 manufacturing jobs since January 1989. The biggest losses have been in steel, textile, clothing, furniture, food and beverage, and chemical industries.

My riding of Haldimand—Norfolk has had more than its share of these manufacturing job losses. In the last two months alone three plants have shut down in my riding, leaving close to 300 people without jobs. In a town like Simcoe with 14,000 people, 300 people out of work is a large number. It is tough on an economy that has also been hit by taxation on tobacco.

What hope has this government's budget brought them? Absolutely none; no help. Just more education and retraining cuts and more government abdication of its responsibility. Nor is there in the budget spending estimates any redress for the unfair tax burden that this government has given to middle-class Canadians. After 33 separate tax increases since 1984, the finance minister's tax reform has meant that the average Canadian family is paying more than $1,000 more for tax per year, and that is not including GST. By contrast, 640 of Canadians earning $100,000 or more paid no income tax at all; up from 580 Canadians from the year before. The additional burden placed on the average Canadian family from these increases in UI and tobacco products will be $217 per year.

In the midst of our current recession, the budget estimates offer absolutely no relief to our 1.3 million unemployed or the 500,000 Canadians who must resort to food banks. It offers no relief from the increasing gap between Canadian manufacturing levels and those of the other G–7 countries. There are no measures to assist low income Canadians, women or aboriginal people, and no measures to improve Canada's ability to compete in the new global economy.

It is not a question of getting more money; it is a question of getting more from the money one has. Canadians want fairness, competence and a vision that works. Canadians want a change, and they want a change in government.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on the borrowing bill as it gives me an opportunity to make my comments on the government's recent budget, not having had an opportunity to do so before the vote on the amendment. There are two days remaining in the budget debate, but given the attitude of the government it seems unlikely that we will have those for some period of time.

I can understand its reluctance to discuss this particular disaster.

When I was considering my remarks this evening, I had a look at some old magazines, and I pulled out the Maclean's magazine for January 7, 1985, which had this headline on its front cover: "A Confident Nation Speaks Up". The magazine ran a story about polls that had been conducted by some friends of the government, Decima Research.

An hon. member: I didn't know we had any.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says:"I didn't know we had any". Well he does not have many left now, but this was in 1985. He may recall that in 1984 his party won a very substantial majority, to the great chagrin of Canadians today. The first paragraph of this article says:

> Treading water is no longer our national sport. Instead of cringing before uncertain economic indicators, shaking fists at politicians or bowing to hidebound social restraints, most Canadians at mid–decade are confident about themselves and optimistic about their country.

• (1940)

That is what Peter C. Newman wrote in an essay based on the Decima poll conducted by Maclean's magazine in December 1984 and published in January 1985.

Then I took out the January 1, 1990 edition of Maclean's magazine, six years of Conservative government mismanagement. It said: "An Uncertain Nation, Canada at a Crossroads". That was on January 1.

On January 7, it said: "A Shaken Nation Bares its Anger." These are all based on the same poll done by Decima research obviously in late 1990. Six years of disastrous government have brought Canadians to their knees begging this government to get out so we can get a proper government that can administer the affairs of this country in a way that will give Canadians confidence in their future and optimism that the whole place is not falling apart as a result of the policies of this government.

Let me read the quote from the January 7 issue of Maclean's. This is describing the Decima poll:

> The poll paints an unsettling portrait of a nation that has lost its way. English–Canadians have only grudging tolerance for continued negotiations over the status of Quebec. As they lose respect for their politicians, people are demanding more personal influence over critical decisions—with a significant 27 per cent flirting with the idea of eliminating government altogether. As well, large numbers of respondents, alienated by the size of their tax bills, want to restrict government's ability to spend. They are less optimistic than ever before in the history of the Maclean's/Decima poll about their own, and the country's, economic prospects. And on a personal level, many of them say that they feel unsafe on the streets of their communities—or even in their own homes. Said by veteran pollster, Allan Gregg, president of Toronto–based Decima Research Limited, which conducts the poll: "Certainly, in the seven years that we have been doing this research, we have never identified a blacker mood."

Allan Gregg is no friend of the Liberal Party. He is in on all the Conservative Party conferences. I am sure that all the hon. members opposite have seen him at meetings that their party has had. He is considered their principal adviser on polls. Here he is saying that Canadians are in the blackest mood they have ever found in the polling that they have done.

I say it is the direct result of the disastrous policies pursued by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

I would like to go back again in history to a budget speech delivered in this House on March 23, 1985. We know it was the present Minister of Finance who was finance minister in 1985 who did it. Let me read part of another wonderful quote from the hon. minister's speech of May 23, 1985:

> I am implementing a clear and realistic medium-term plan to control our debt. That plan requires tough actions to be taken now. There will be expenditure reductions and tax increases. The impact of these actions, and those taken in November, will continue to grow. Our actions will directly reduce the annual deficit at the end of the decade by more than $20 billion. Between now and then, our actions will cut a total of $75 billion from the projected increase in the public debt.

I do not know where the Minister of Finance got his figures. I will bet it was from a crystal ball. It ceased to function, because the end of the decade was 1990. That was the end of the decade in which he was speaking, and the deficit in the financial year ended March 31, 1986 which was the year in which this budget was delivered was exactly the same as it is today. Exactly the same.

In other words, the minister defrauded Canadians in March 1985 with his statistics and his figures. He did not keep his promise to reduce government expenditure. He increased taxes. He has increased them 32 times since he took office, and a whole bunch of them were in this budget in 1985.

Government expenditure has continued to increase throughout the period, and the deficit has stayed at $30 billion. It has not gone down. It has gone up for the last three years. That is the record of financial incompetence on the part of the minister that has caused Canadians to lose confidence in their government and their governmental institutions in this country.

Mr. Speaker, in case you think I am being unfairly critical with the minister, let's look at the information that he gets. We all know that the Minister of Finance, in the course of preparation of his budget, consults with various groups across the country. He is sent free advice. He gets it from the Economic Council of Canada, from business and labour groups and, I presume, the minister listens to these groups in the course of his discussions.

I have here the pre-budget submission to the Minister of Finance prepared in December 1990 by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. I apologize for the extensive quotations tonight, but I could not put the words better myself. I should say that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business is not a particular friend of the Liberal Party. It has got, I am sure, more Conservatives than Liberals in it, but listen to what they say about the Minister of Finance and his inability to manage the affairs of this country. I will read from the introduction of their pre-budget submission.

> The Canadian small and medium-sized business community is currently saddled with the greatest number of negative factors affecting their business that they have faced in some time. Even in the recession of 1981-82, the outlook was not as consistently negative as it is today.

Mr. Bjornson: I dispute that.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says he disputes it. He should have met with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and disputed it. This is the submission they gave to his minister and his minister knows that this is exactly correct.

It then goes on:

> However, all Canadians are now having to pay for this government mismanagement.
> There is no doubt that action on government overspending may soon be forthcoming, but it will be forced upon, as opposed to chosen by, a bankrupt government. Since the government squandered the opportunities available through the mid-to late-1980s to get its spending under control in an environment of economic expansion, it will now be forced to cut back at the worst possible time—in the middle of a serious recession. And even worse, the introduction of a major new tax, the Goods and Services Tax, will only exacerbate the problems for small and medium-sized companies. Although the GST as proposed is rife with structural and design flaws, perhaps its most daunting long-term implication is that with such a money machine in place, any incentive that may currently exist for government to contain its spending will be gone. For all of these reasons, the 1984 to 1990 period can truly be described as six wasted years.

I suggest to you that they were worse than wasted. The government has damaged Canadian confidence in themselves. It has weakened their confidence in their country. It has been more than a waste, it has been a disaster.

The other point that is made in this report, I could go on reading.

> When the current federal government assumed power in 1984, the small and medium-sized business community was willing to give the benefit of the doubt to the election platform promise of improved fiscal management, and believed that small firms would at least be given a fair hearing. It is now apparent to small business owners that they have been disappointed on both counts. As a result of fiscal and > monetary policies that have been at odds for several years, but notably over the past 18 months, small firms now face the deadly combination of very high interest rates and a burgeoning federal debt. Adding these unfortunate circumstances to an inevitable slowdown in an economy after seven years of economic expansion, and the result is a self-imposed recession, that will be deepened and prolonged by government policy.

For weeks and weeks in this House, we have been asserting this fact that the policy of the government has contributed to the recession and has deepened and made it worse for Canadians.

The one other point I think that is worth mentioning in this report, and I could go on at great length on this, unfortunately my time is limited, is the gap between Canadian and U.S. interest rates. The report says of them that although these rates did not widen in 1981–82 although rates in both countries rose, this gap has been persistently in excess of 4 percentage points for some time.

> The devastating impact of such an interest rate differential, and its role in maintaining the Canadian dollar at an uncompetitively high level, has been demonstrated in the recent spate of layoffs, plant closings, bankruptcies, the migration of Canadian firms to more competitive environments in the U.S. and elsewhere, and in the increased competitive pressure Canadian firms are experiencing from foreign firms from their own domestic markets.

The hon. member for Etobicoke North has asked questions regularly in this House on this subject demanding to know why the Minister of Finance will not stop his crazy interest rate policy, why he will not tell the Bank of Canada Governor to stop paying himself and his employees substantial increases and get the interest rate down, take a penalty instead of a bonus for their incompetence in managing this aspect of our policy and see that we get the differential and the rates down between Canada and the United States to increase our competitive position.

Unfortunately his pleas fall on deaf ears. The Minister of Finance gives facile answers and we get nowhere.

• (1950)

The other aspect of the budget that I think is extremely important is the cuts that the government announced to the provinces in respect of medicare and education. Clearly, they have put our medical care system at risk. Clearly they have weakened the ability of our provinces to deliver in the education and medical field.

We keep hearing from the government, whenever this objection is raised, that: "No, no, we have no intention of dismantling medicare. Everything is safe and sound". Although it has not used this term recently, I suspect it is nervous, the sacred trust argument is something that medicare once was. We have not heard that expression lately, but I expect if we press the Prime Minister on it, he would say it is still a sacred trust.

Yet last night in the House we had the spectacle of the Prime Minister of Canada and every single member of the Conservative Party who was here rise in his place and vote against a motion that read as follows:

> That this House reaffirm its commitment to medicare.

In other words, the Conservative Party disaffirmed its commitment to medicare last night in the House. The Conservative Party, through the government House leader, who squawked and yacked yesterday afternoon about this, said that it was not possible for him to vote for this motion because somehow it would bring the government down.

He has a very short memory. On November 24, 1989, in this House, and this government was sitting on those benches, I was sitting on this side, there was an opposition and there was a government, the same one, the government allowed to pass unanimously a motion on a supply day moved by the hon. member, as he then was, for Oshawa, Mr. Broadbent. The motion talked about aid for children, expressing its concern for children living in poverty. The government could vote for that and yet it could not support medicare. In other words, the Conservatives said: "We are prepared to write medicare off". They said it by their vote last night and we know perfectly well that their actions in the budget have purported to do exactly that.

Mr. Keyes: It is a secret agenda.

Mr. Milliken: It is a secret agenda, as the hon. member for Hamilton West says.

The government has no intention of assisting the provinces in this regard. It is saying to the provinces: "Raise your own money. If you can't afford the medicare system that can be afforded in Hamilton, or Toronto or in Kingston, that's too bad". Canadians are going to end up with different standards of care across this country. This government could not give two hoots about it. That is the attitude, that is the approach. I submit it is not a good approach.

I could go on about waste too. I am tempted to do so, but let me pass on to education. The minister also received advice in respect of education. The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada in its pre-budget submission to the Minister of Finance in December 1990 among other recommendations recommended this:

> That the government commit itself to a genuine reform of the Established Programs Financing arrangements.
> That, until such time as the Established Programs Financing arrangements are reformed, the federal government honour its EPF funding commitments in support of postsecondary education as they stood prior to the introduction of Bill C-69.

Not only did the government not honour the commitments that existed prior to the introduction of that much opposed bill, but it also changed the rules to reduce the payments under EPF transfers to the provinces for a period following the restriction contained in Bill C-69. That is hardly the way to enhance and improve the quality of education in Canada. I of course having a very famous university in my riding, two in fact—Queen's University and the Royal Military College—I can only point out the disastrous consequences of these cuts.

While all of these events may not have happened at Queen's, they are happening at other universities across the country, in McMaster for example in the riding of Hamilton West and I could name others. Obviously there cannot be many in Conservative ridings or they would be more concerned about this. Members on the other side would be up condemning their government for cutting these transfers.

It is stated to me, and I have every reason to believe it to be so, that first and second year science students in Canada are denied a place in the laboratory to work. They are not allowed to work in a lab because there is not sufficient laboratory space in the universities for them to work in those labs. How can one maintain an interest in science if one is denied hands-on work in a laboratory as part of your educational experience until year three on a limited basis and then in year four.

Class sizes have increased enormously because there is not enough money to pay for professors to be hired in the universities to do the teaching. Equipment and facilities are deteriorating in universities because they cannot be maintained on the tight budgets they are operating on. They cannot be replaced on the tight budgets they are operating on and new purchases cannot be made because there is no funding available.

In the province of Ontario, my home province, the situation unfortunately, is probably going to get worse, because not only have we got a tight-fisted Conservative Government in Ottawa, but we are saddled with the New Democratic Party government in Toronto who has done nothing to show leadership and try to offset the disastrous consequences of federal government policies launched by this government on the other side.

Indeed, we have no expectation that the situation will improve in Ontario with the government there.

An hon. member: Order over there.

Mr. Milliken: Even my hon. friend from Edmonton East would acknowledge that the NDP government has been a terrible disappointment in the many months it has been in office.

At the end of my remarks I would like to say that we in the Liberal Party would have expected this year, certainly a continuation of the policy of restraint we supposedly have witnessed for six years. I say that we have not had that kind of expectation when there has been a serious recession put upon us by the government's own policies in the latter part of 1990.

Mr. Bjornson: Spending your way out of a recession does not work. We found that out in 1981.

Mr. Milliken: We expected the government to come up with some extra generosity. Loosen the purse strings to help Canadians who are finding themselves unemployed because of the hard-hearted policies of the government.

An hon. member: Is there anything good about this government?

Mr. Milliken: At a time when the government is asking Canadians to restrain themselves, it goes on spending binges and wild extravagances on little things. But they add up.

I just got an answer the other day to a question on the Order Paper. I put a question on the Order Paper about royal commissions. We know about the Spicer Commission and its budget of $27 million.

Mr. Bjornson: Is Spicer wasting money? Say it. Say national unity is a waste of money.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member asks if Spicer is a waste of money. I say the Spicer Commission is costing millions more than it should be costing if it were properly managed. He knows it. And if he does not know it, he should go to the consumer and corporate affairs committee and hear it.

Mr. Bjornson: I was there last night and I listened.

Mr. Milliken: Well listen again on Thursday.

I want to talk about the other royal commissions. I know the hon. member does not want to hear this. He is embarrassed by these facts and he should be. The Royal Commission on National Passenger Transportation is projected to cost $23 million. The Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies, $24.7 million and the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing, $19.9 million. We have over $100 million committed to royal commissions in Canada, that this government has set up in order to generate business for a good number of its friends and keep the various researchers and so on, working in Canada. I say this is not a wise or prudent expenditure of public funds. It is time the government acted the way it is preaching and tightened up the purse strings in reasonable areas, instead of cutting training programs for those who are unemployed. It is a hard-hearted way to run a government.

An hon. member: Resign. Resign over there.

Mr. Milliken: I suggest the Minister of Finance should be ashamed of his budget and withdraw it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: It being eight o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

PETITIONS

AIR CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition, signed by 135 citizens of Edmonton who note that Air Canada intends to yank 200 jobs from the Edmonton International Airport and the Edmonton reservation office. I believe this is a proposal that has since been implemented. They call upon Parliament to express its profound opposition to the further centralization and retrenchment of its regional services by Air Canada, our former national air carrier, and urge the federal government to request Air Canada to revoke the proposed lay-offs.

• (1110)

It is obvious that these 135 citizens are joining with millions across the country to express their dismay at the ongoing dismantling of national institutions by this government.

RURAL REVITALIZATION WEEK 1991

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): I am proud to present this armful of petitions today during Rural Revitalization Week 1991, a week in which we celebrate the organization Rural Dignity and oppose government cutbacks in rural services.

These petitions are signed by the residents of rural Saskatchewan who live in The Battlefords—Meadow Lake constituency. The petitioners claim that the GST, cuts to VIA Rail, rail line abandonments, farm support program erosions, cuts to the CBC, and the closure of rural post offices constitute an attack on the rural way of life, and they call on Parliament to support, not attack, that rural way of life, including the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services.

The petitioners say they want Parliament to reject any more cuts or closures.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I am sure the parliamentary secretary is aware that question No. 410 standing in my name has been there since November 29, 1990. It is a 45 day rule, as I understand it, for response to such questions. It is simply seeking information about the government's green plan on the costs of polling and contracts, public relations advertising and promotion.

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can explain why in four months there has not been an answer produced. I thought that 45 days would have been more than adequate.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have been watching the hon. member's question with some interest and concern, and I do recognize that it is late. It is my understanding that it is in the minister's office now, with some final drafting to be done. Certainly I will deliver an answer to him as quickly as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are 11 report stage motions on today's notice paper in amendment to Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose.

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mackenzie, caused the Chair to examine at length the procedural acceptability of the motions. But, after careful reflection, I have decided to give the benefit of the doubt to the member.

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 will be grouped for debate and a vote on motion No. 1 will apply to motions Nos. 2 and 3.

Motion No. 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings, and motions Nos. 6, 7, 8 and 9 standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma, are all procedurally acceptable. They will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 10, standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings, and motion No. 11 standing in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, both deal with reports to Parliament, more specifically review of act. Both motions are in order. They will be grouped for debate and an affirmative vote on motion No. 10 obviates the need for a vote on motion No. 11. A negative vote on motion No. 10 will require the question being put on motion No. 11.

I will now propose motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 to the House.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out line 37 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"program provided the maximum account built up by any one producer does not exceed $100,000 in 1991 dollars;".

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out line 38 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"(b) a gross revenue insurance program provided maximum payments to any one producer do not exceed $100,000 per annum in 1991 dollars;".

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-98 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out line 39 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"(c) a revenue insurance program provided maximum payments to any one producer do not exceed $100,000 per annum in 1991 dollars; and".

He said: Mr. Speaker, the basic reasoning behind these particular amendments is one of permitting Parliament to exert its normal influences. This particular piece of legislation is one of the most wide open chunks of parliamentary business that I have seen in my 11 years in the House. There is no recourse to the normal role of parliamentarians to set limits to the amount of money being expended, to have any control over expenditures, which is one of the basic roles that Parliament plays in our system, or is supposed to play in our system.

Because we are representing taxpayers in this bill, as well as farmers, I felt that it was incumbent upon us in the House to decide what the maximum limits, liabilities if you will, to the public purse should be with some clarity. I have proposed that the maximum limits of liability from the public purse in each of the programs be set at $100,000. The GRIP program, which is motion No. 2, is a gross revenue insurance program. The maximum liability from the public purse, from the GRIP payment fund would be $100,000 per producer.

What does that mean? By my admittedly rough calculations, but all of the calculations I hasten to add having to do with GRIP are rough, this would catch farmers in the open plains with farms where they are seeding above 5,000 acres. In the higher producing areas of the country, it would perhaps catch people over 4,000 acres of seeded crop. When we get into the heavy corn producing part of the country, that acreage might be reduced to 1,500 or 1,800 acres as a rough guess.

At any rate, it cuts out very few people at the present time who would not extract the maximum possible payment on any particular year. The coming year is considered to be a year with a very large payment probability. Even under these expected high pay-outs, it would take a very large seeded acreage before the $100,000 ceiling would reduce the amount of payment under the price support part of this program.

• (1120)

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, being very observant, that I did not propose to put any ceiling on the pay-outs under crop insurance. There is a very good reason for that.

Crop insurance is a more direct insurance program which insures against production at current market prices. There is no perceived rip-off of taxpayers' money, to use the kind of wording I am already hearing in my towns and villages, to maintain very large farms.

However, when taxpayers are putting up 42 and one-third per cent of their tax dollars into this maximum pay-out of $100,000 on an annual basis and an additional 25 per cent of their provincial tax dollars into this pay-out, they are starting to think that that is quite a lot of money to go to one farmer. Therefore, I think we should be putting some ceilings on it at this stage.

The numbers that I have already put on the record sound very high and very scary to most taxpayers who perhaps are not as well inculcated into farm economics and who probably do not realize that this is still unlikely to give a net income to most of those farmers, even so.

Once we get into the sizes of operation where this ceiling will apply, I think there can be a justifiable public policy reason for putting these ceilings in place. I do regret that the three proposals were put under one set of debating points, because the first one is considerably different than Motions Nos. 2 and 3. It would have been easier to debate the concept and the principle, had Motion No. 1 been separated from Motions Nos. 2 or 3. I accept your ruling and your wisdom, Mr. Speaker, and will attempt to present the arguments in a series, even though some of the economic and accounting principles involved in Motion No. 1 are quite different from those in Motions Nos. 2 and 3.

Motion No. 3 places $100,000 a ceiling on the pay-out to be received by any one producer under those commodities now covered by the Agricultural Stabilization Act. That act did have some ceilings as did the old Western Grain Stabilization Act, which to a certain extent GRIP replaces.

The concept or idea of ceilings is certainly not new. The ceilings that are being placed here are very adequate. They will not offend very many people and will only trigger a reduction in a pay-out to a very minor groups of individuals. I think it is the role of this Parliament and the role of parliamentarians to set some limits, even though they are not particularly stringent limits, on the expenditures of this and future governments and on the ability to sign federal-provincial agreements which have absolutely no upper limit on the public purse.

Therefore I put these forward for consideration in the House. There is very little more to say on this issue. It does not assist in public policy, in economic policy, or in rural development for extended amounts of public money to be put into one particular economic group in rural areas.

It creates some economic problems, some economic disruptions, yes; but it also creates great social and political unrest when ordinary taxpayers, who are perhaps under current conditions sitting on an unemployment insurance cheque as their only source of income which is capped and cannot go above a certain limit, watch their farm neighbours reportedly getting pay-outs to address their particular economic difficulties which go even beyond $100,000 per year.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments. I certainly understand the hon. member's well-taken points.

I want to remind this House and all hon. members that this legislation was developed in close collaboration with Canadian farmers. We relied on the grains and oilseeds safety net committee, a majority of whom were producers. That committee, in its report presented to ministers of agriculture last August, did not call for caps on farm size or for payments. In its report, the committee indicated that "GRIP participation is open to all economic units" and "there should be no maximum on payments from GRIP".

This view was echoed by other farm leaders who appeared before the agriculture standing committee. Mr. Terry Daynard, speaking on behalf of the Ontario Corn Producers Association, indicated his group's policy was to oppose caps. Mr. Owen Mcauley of Keystone Agricultural Producers indicated: "I know our organization is opposed to caps".

Farm leaders, quite apart from anything else, know that once caps are put on any program administrative problems are created, as large farmers are virtually forced to split their enterprise into smaller units to avoid the maximum set by the program.

We do not feel that these motions would enhance the legislation. It could create problems, as I have just indicated. Therefore the government is not prepared to accept these three amendments.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the amendments put before the House today did not receive a lot of discussion in committee, although some farm groups did recommend that there be no cap. We believe there should be a review of the legislation within two years.

If we look at the government's program for interest assistance, it is providing for a maximum of interest-free support of $50,000. The western grain stabilization fund at the present time has a cap of $50,000 per year. There is a lot of uncertainties in this legislation as to exactly how it is going to work.

We in the House of Commons, and I am sure the provincial legislatures, feel rather outside the deals that are going on between the governments involved. This is part of the new executive federalism which has really replaced the parliamentary system in this country. Our ability actually to spell out what the GRIP program is going to be and what the NISA program is going to be is sharply circumscribed.

I can see problems with sharply circumscribing what those agreements can be. For instance, in the horticultural industry we are dealing with a high value crop per acre. This is all based on gross revenue not on the price of individual commodities, although that is a factor in what the gross revenue would be per acre. At the same time, when we are dealing with the NISA program, it is inconceivable that it will reach the cap until after the review takes place, if that review takes place as we have recommended in 1993.

If we are dealing with a legislation which is going to be reviewed in two years' time, the concept would be acceptable to our side of the House although the government has already indicated that it is not acceptable to it.

• (1130)

If there is any overriding situation in this whole thing, certainly for western farmers it is just not knowing what the limits are or what the premiums are. They received the estimates of premiums several days after the legislation was actually brought in. They really do not know what to do, whether to farm the program in order to maximize revenues or whether to go strictly on the market forces. The market signals of course are very limited as far as the price of commodities.

There was a report this morning by a forecasting group in the United States which projects a very marked increase in the number of acres being planted for grain crops in Canada. It associates this in some way with the implementation of the GRIP.

I think there are arguments on both sides. We certainly do not have any high value horticultural crops coming under NISA and GRIP at this stage because they have not been developed. They may be at a later stage, but we would hope the government would agree at a later stage in discussion of the bill today to accept an earlier review, rather that five years, in which case the cap of $100,000 as proposed probably would not cause any great hardship even to those high value crops such as the grains and oilseeds. In any event, this limit would increase the value, the pay-out or the benefit by 100 per cent from the existing western grain stabilization fund.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to some of these amendments today to Bill C-98, the legislation that allows the government to enter into agreements on the GRIP and NISA programs.

One matter that concerns me a lot about this process was brought home to me when the parliamentary secretary talked about the consultation process, the producers being involved in the process which led to this program being developed and now this legislation in front of us to enter into these agreements.

The parliamentary secretary said that this consultation process had occurred. What he neglected to say was that the consultation process involved general discussions about the need for safety net and some specifics about how we should go about it.

However, the consultation process with the farm community not only since the program has been developed, but this legislation has been entered into in this Chamber, has been very poor. The consultation process with people who at this point on the farm are still very confused about what the GRIP and NISA programs mean to them is something that should be examined in much greater detail.

I am quite concerned that the confusion out there and the need for an immediate infusion of cash are driving individuals both in this Chamber and in the provincial legislatures to reach agreements more quickly than they should otherwise be prepared to enter into them. That is why I believe this amending process in the Chamber today is so very important.

This legislation simply allows for agreements to be entered into. The bill calls for an April 1 implementation date, April 1 being of course just the end of next week, April 1 being a very close deadline to be working with.

The provincial legislature of Saskatchewan is not in session to pass similar legislation allowing the province of Saskatchewan to enter into an agreement with the federal government on this program. The provincial legislature has said that it will not even begin sitting until the end of the first or the second week of April.

As a result, the mandate from the provincial legislature of the province of Saskatchewan to allow that government to enter into agreement with the federal government cannot even begin to take place until several days after the legislation is supposed to come into force.

The farm community is certainly desperately in need of cash. This is one reason why I stood last week and called for the application of the finance minister's $1.3 million budgeted for farmers in need to be applied immediately for spring seeding. That would bridge the gap and allow for better understanding and the creation of a stronger safety net program so that not only those of us in the House understood completely, but that the farm community, farm producers and individuals operating on farms throughout Saskatchewan, western Canada and elsewhere, would have an understanding of what this program meant to them and could assess it properly.

My biggest concern in all of this is that in the long term we may have a very deficient program. The provincial leader in Saskatchewan, Roy Romanow, has said that this might be the shortest long-term program in the history of agriculture programs. What he meant by that was that farmers will be in it for the first couple of years to get the pay-outs that are predicted and will then withdraw from the program, leaving the program with a huge deficit and still no solution to the farm income crisis of producers.

The three amendments before us were put forward by my colleague from Mackenzie, a long-time New Democratic agriculture critic. He is someone who is respected throughout the agricultural community, particularly by producers in the province of Saskatchewan. The amendments try to put some reason to the carte blanche blank cheque legislation that is in front of us until such time as we can properly assess some of the long-term implications.

We cannot accept a blank cheque for the government simply to enter agreements with the provinces on legislation which may in fact over the long term completely alter the way in which agricultural support programs are delivered in Canada.

When we look at the pieces of that legislation that have to amend, we see that some of these deficiencies can be corrected in the short term. For example, putting a cap on the amounts of funds available in NISA, as this particular amendment proposes, prevents the government from doing in farming what it is already doing in banking, in business, and in running our economy, that is helping to reward those who already have a lot, the wealthy large farmers who are not part of the serious debt and income crisis on the prairies and allowing the government to match dollar for dollar farmers who are capable and able to put large amounts of money into the Net Income Stabilization Account.

By matching those dollars the government gives tremendous benefit to those who have the wealth and prevents those who do not have the wealth from getting into it. As we have heard in committee, in this House, and around the country, NISA does nothing to support the poorer farmers, the marginal farmers, the farmers who are in debt both to the banks and to the government's financial institutions. This bill does nothing to address that long-term debt problem. Therefore, if we can do anything at all to ensure that the discrimination in favour of the wealthy producers in this country can be held in check somewhat until we can address the debt and income problems in the long term, we are accomplishing something. This blank cheque legislation allows for agreements of almost any kind, and is contrary to the development of long-term success of income stabilization on the prairies. I would remind the House that we have not seen those agreements.

I urge the government to accept these few amendments put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie. I am pleased to hear that members of the opposition are prepared to accept these amendments. If the government can accept these amendments as well, we can achieve some small sense of fairness in a bill which does provide for quite a bit of unfairness if left to stand unchecked.

I will have other things to say on other amendments throughout the day. With that, I will provide the floor to other members.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to give my support to the position put forward by my good colleague from Algoma. I will restrict my few remarks to the matter of caps.

Farmers are very responsible people. They expect us to be responsible people. While in the eyes of some people, caps may be construed as being discriminatory, we do have to exercise some caution and certainly exercise responsibility.

The safety net programs which we are embarking upon are something very new to us. They are new to the country and new to the producers. We are, in a sense, going through uncharted waters. All the more reason, in my mind, why we have to be super-responsible. That is why I, and the rest of us on this side, favour caps at least for this particular time, and want a thorough review of this legislation two years down the road.

We want to be responsible. We do not want to hurt anyone. We do not want to discriminate against anyone. We are up against something which is new and we do not know exactly how these things are going to develop. For example, arriving on my desk just this morning is a report from a group in the United States called the Wharton Economic Forecasting Association. It claims that wheat acreage in western Canada is going to jump over a million acres this spring. I do not know whether it is going to be right or wrong.

This is one of the unknowns that we face. It combines two things; first, that we want to be responsible about this, and second, that we want to have a thorough review a couple of years down the road when we have the benefit of some experience and the benefit of some facts that may be not available to us now. I think it would be very, very prudent to go along with these caps, certainly on the NISA program. Prudence also demands that we place a cap on GRIP, at least for the next couple of years.

I simply want to put this on the record.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I have two or three very brief comments with respect to the amendments we have in front of the House.

Somebody mentioned the Western Grain Stabilization Act. I should point out that the act provides for coverage of 90 per cent of eligible income in the prairie region. In one sense, it provides a cap, but it is up to 90 per cent of the aggregate income in the prairie region. That has been adjusted, I believe, three times. It started out at 25 per cent, it went to 40 per cent and it is now at 60 per cent.

We came close to raising it to 90 per cent; $1,000 per farmer, $25,000 to $40,000 per farm to $60,000. We came close to raising it to $90,000 when we saw an increase in income as a result of some fairly favourable grain prices about four or five years ago. So in one sense there is a cap and in another sense there is not a cap.

Members should also know that within that legislation it is possible to apply for multiples. If a farmer has more than one or two people in his permit book, he can apply for multiples of up to three of whatever the coverage is. Currently, someone operating as a family farmer or as a limited corporation with more than one shareholder could be eligible for multiples of up to three. There is a case where in fact the cap, if you want to call it that, is certainly higher than $100,000.

I would also suggest it is very difficult in this type of legislation to enforce anything like this. I think the hon. member for Algoma made a very good point when he talked about some of the high value crops in the horticultural industry for instance, where literally with four or five acres of crop, one could be very close to the $100,000 cap because of the value of the crops on that acre. Some horticultural crops not only have very high input costs but returns per acre. It is very difficult when we get into some of these things just to pick a number and say we want to stay with this.

I have one last point I want to make. A pretty strong argument against the cap is that we would find very quickly that producers—to the extent that they would want to participate in this program, and we think the interest is quite high—would very easily find ways of getting around this by simply organizing their affairs in such a way they had operating units that could each qualify for $100,000. They would make those kind of arrangements so that they could very quickly have a cap that is higher.

On a procedural or on a performance basis, I do not think that this type of a cap in legislation works very well. Whether we farm big or small in this country, we have freedom to own property. Whether the farm is 10 acres or 1,000 acres, the cost per acre is the same. I do not think we want to get into the business of telling people, either directly or indirectly, what size of farm they should have. It should be up to their own ability, their own management skills and their own ambition.

I think, for those reasons, that this type of motion is not the right regulation to have in this bill.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, there is considerable concern, not only in the agricultural committee but right across the country, relative to the actual responsibility of this legislation, because it is open legislation which does not, in any way, restrict the amount of money that can be spent or called on by the government after the agreements are signed.

I suppose these three motions are an attempt to put into the legislation some kind of responsibility to the taxpayers and recognize that certain farmers would benefit from the cap not being in place.

Let us take a look at the three motions. The argument concerning Motion No. 1 has been made often enough and long enough so there is no need to go further on it. Motion No. 3 deals with the ASA tripartite, hogs and cattle and so on. It would limit very large operators such as feedlots controlled by large multinationals from receiving more than $100,000 per year of payments. If they received $100,000 per year, $67,333 of that would come out of the taxpayers' pockets. In other words, a $100,000 payment to a multinational which had a feedlot would get $67,333 from the taxpayers under the tripartite agreement. Is that what the taxpayers want?

• (1150)

Let us take a look at Motion No. 2. It deals with GRIP. This particular cap would have no effect on 95 per cent of the people who are likely to be in GRIP. I disagree with what the minister and the parliamentary secretary suggest. Large farms are not likely to divide in the short term. They might over a long period of time. To do so they would lower their coverage levels which they had accumulated over the last 10 years or so. That coverage comes from the good experience of crop insurance.

Only large farms operating below the production levels for their areas would divide their operations to take advantage of this sort of a situation. Other sections of the agreement are supposed to work against this kind of low productivity. It is not in the end a major effect even on that. It is unlikely that very many, if any, farms would divide to get more out of the program.

Many organizations which originally looked at this and suggested that there not be limits are now very concerned that there are not limits. They are concerned because they recognize that the danger to this program to a great extent is the fact it is uncapped. The danger to the stability of the program is the possibility that huge sums will be taken out.

We do not want to find ourselves in the situation in which the U.S. finds itself. In some of their programs 85 per cent of the payments go to less than 10 per cent of the farmers. That does not make farming a stable industry. This legislation is intended to bring stability to the farming community, to the industry. It should not have within it seeds for the actual instability which will eventually take place if there is a large extra payment for those of a particular size.

We are moving these motions for two reasons. First of all, the taxpayers deserve to have some responsibility in this legislation. I am sure the finance ministers would agree with that. Second, the seeds of its own instability should not be sown in the legislation so that eventually the legislation will become less effective because of an action that we should have been able to change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Lethbridge and then I will recognize the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I really just had some questions. Perhaps my friend from Prince Albert could respond. I was trying to follow his argument—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no time for questions or comments. Is the hon. member going to take his 10 minutes?

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, my comments are directed to members of the NDP. Maybe they can through another member to respond to these points. The hon. member talked about multinational feed lots.

I am from the Lethbridge area and I am not aware of any multinational feed lots in southern Alberta. I am not aware of any in southern Saskatchewan. I wonder if the hon. member could tell us to whom he was referring. I did not think they were even covered by this statute because they have a tripartite program. We are debating the farm income protection act. How do his comments relate to this?

Second, the hon. member seemed to be saying with this cap that it would apply to a farm, but what about all of the communal farmers and people who operate in partnerships and so on, if we are going to have caps? If there are 20 families living on a communal farm or there is a partnership, would it not be limiting? Surely the hon. member does not intend that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Mackenzie can answer and I will then recognize the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House I will outline some of this for the member. First, this legislation does include ASA. It is rescinding the Agriculture Stabilization Act under which this tripartite agreement is written. It integrates it into this bill. Section 41(c), dealing with revenue insurance programs deals specifically with it. That is what Motion No. 3 is amending.

It is already in there. It is a tripartite thing, so that two-thirds of the pay-out comes from federal or provincial taxpayers. Bill C-98 rescinds the Agriculture Stabilization Act and integrates it into this bill.

The proposal of a multinational feedlot was simply a proposal. It was an example of what can happen and what has, indeed, happened in the United States.

The $100,000 cap does not apply other than to GRIP or tripartite pay-outs or to the NISA maximum account.

Crop insurance stays as it always has been, covered yield times market price, so that the example previous speakers from that side have horrified themselves with could not happen. The horticultural crops would be covered for most of the $1,000 an acre that was proposed. It would only be the price differential which is in GRIP that would be limited to payments of $100,000 maximum per year.

I think it is important to get that straight so that government members, at least, know what it is they are voting on. I regret that they were not able to follow it closely in committee. That is partly why we have report stage in the House, so that all members can get more acquainted with the bills.

These proposals do not apply to crop insurance coverage. They apply only on those programs that are on top of that which are effectively price insurance programs, such as GRIP, the tripartite programs and the income account under the proposed NISA. A 4,000 or 5,000 acre wheat farm that lost all of its crop would be largely covered by crop insurance. The GRIP portion for most 4,000 and 5,000 seeded acre farms would not be limited in the receipts by the $100,000 cap.

I have done the calculations for the coming year and there is virtually no wheat farm in western Canada that would have its payments reduced if they seeded 5,000 acres of wheat and had a 30 bushel coverage level.

The levels we are talking about reducing payments to are farms that are very large indeed. It is still possible, even if these amendments were put in, from my checking, for a integrated farm or a mixed farm that is in the feedlot business or hog business, as well as in crops, to receive maximum payments to $100,000 under the crop side and $100,000 under the tripartite side. In fact, the real limit is something more than $200,000, because that kind of an operation might be drawing out of its NISA account that year as well. So these are very large sums of money coming from the public purse.

I think the government should reconsider whether to put some caps on this so that the tax paying public has some assurance that we have not all gone completely bonkers, even though it will not limit very many payments.

• (1200)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not want to set a precedent here.

We are into report stage. The parliamentary secretary started a question and comment period and the minister wants to reply. I would hope that maybe at the next motion, the hon. minister will have another opportunity. Otherwise, we will never get this done.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the amendments proposed the hon. colleague for Mackenzie are very important, indeed. He has very eloquently outlined the reasons why.

There is a problem in the agricultural community these days with the future it is facing. Rural communities and family farms in this country are disappearing. They have been disappearing at an alarming rate for a long time.

The purpose of this amendment is to begin to change the attitude that this government and past Liberal governments have had to the future of family farms. If we are going to maintain a strong family farming structure, we need to keep that in mind when dealing with legislation.

The $100,000 cap is going to include most farmers who exist today in this country. The concern is that as agriculture becomes bigger and bigger business and corporate enterprises become more and more involved, there is increased vertical integration in the agricultural industry.

Cargill, for example, is a tremendous interest in the U.S. It is expanding every day in Canada. It is important that we place some limits. A $100,000 cap is, for most people, not a limit.

As the hon. member for Mackenzie pointed out, very few farms would be affected. Those would be only the very large farms.

The point that the hon. minister and other members have made in the past is that people will abuse the system, that they will be dividing their farms and so on. There is no program that is perfect. That is for sure. Certainly, this will not be either, but there are ways and means of putting in safeguards to keep that to an absolute minimum.

With respect to the program that is before us, many of the witnesses who appeared before us in committee agreed that there were ways to work the program. That is possible regardless of what type of program we have.

We have an unemployment insurance program and there are certain people who try to take advantage of it. We have a whole list of programs in this country that people attempt to take advantage of, but by and large most Canadians are honest and try and do comply with the rules.

The argument of not being able to put a cap in place simply because people will take advantage of the program is not a valid one. It is one the government should quit throwing out.

The other aspect is that this program is not a cost of production program. The smaller family farm is not getting full advantage of a cost of production program. In fact, it is going to lose out in the end. This program will be a very rich program, but it has been predicted that GRIP will go tremendously in the hole in the next two or three years. We are going to have a program in which we may find ourselves with some very serious problems in a few years.

The difficulty is that as the 15-year average goes down, we are going to find that farmers are paying a higher percentage of their average crop production, of their average income, and receiving less and less for it. That certainly is a problem. One of the fundamental flaws with this program is that it does not recognize that fact.

If we had a cap on this program and geared the program to the family type farm, the more average size farms in this country, we would all be better off. Certainly those farmers would be better off because it would be possible down the road, as this program is reviewed and re-evaluated, and perhaps changed to reflect that, to bring in a true cost of production up to a set level.

That is why these amendments are important. They are important because they set a new direction. As New Democrats, we applaud that type of direction. We cannot understand why the government and the Liberal Party would not support such an amendment. To us, it is an important factor in maintaining viable farming families. I hope the government will reconsider and place that proposal before the House and be willing to support it.

The other point that has to be included in this amendment is to keep in mind that as this program goes into the hole, as it goes further into debt and is reviewed down the road, there may well be changes to it in five years. As the government has said, it is going to enter into a review process so that farmers who have a program for five years may find that, because of the richness of this program, because of the fact that a few very large producers have received the full advantage of this program, all producers will suffer. Surely that is not the objective of this program. Surely the goal of this program is not to reduce the number of farms. It certainly seems to be the effect.

The way this government has manoeuvred agriculture in this country over the last six or seven years bears that out. This government set up an environment which will hurt average farms and rural communities. With the changes to the Wheat Board Act, this government's attitude and actions do not bode well for the future of farming in this country as we know it today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

The question is on motion No. 1. A vote on No. 1 will include the same on motion Nos. 2 and 3.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-98 be amended in clause 4 by adding immediately after line 21 at page 3 the following:

"(b.1) the program should encourage the long-term social and economic sustainability of farm families and communities;"

He said: Mr. Speaker, since I was elected in 1988, I have had the opportunity to travel across this country. One thing I have noticed is that geographically, Canada is really a rural nation. We have pockets of population in various parts of the country. We have this so-called golden triangle in the Toronto area. We have the lower mainland of British Columbia. We have, I suppose, a population base in the Ottawa area. Outside of that we have largely a rural nation.

• (1210)

Even areas that Statistics Canada would include as urban are in fact rural. In my riding, for example, the riding of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, half the population lives in the city of Moose Jaw, which is considered urban by Statistics Canada, but in fact, it is a rural city. It depends on the rural infrastructure that exists around it, the economic infrastructure, the farmers and others who do business in Moose Jaw. There is an area which the city of Moose Jaw services.

There are many urban communities in this country which depend on rural Canada. This country was developed on a regional policy. Western Canada was settled because the government of the day desired that people should move to the rural areas of this country. In fact, that is why the west was settled. That is why people moved there. It is important to keep in mind that this country has largely developed on policies of government focused on regional development.

As I mentioned earlier, the problem we have today in this country is that we have a government that seems to have lost sight of that objective; I suggest it has clearly lost sight of that objective and that goal. We have a government now that is considered a bottom-line government, an open-for-business government. Tending to move toward a so-called free enterprise government is really putting us back into the 19th century. We have a situation where rural Canada has suffered.

As I said, I have had the opportunity to travel around this country. I can go out to rural Nova Scotia, a rural community there, sit in a cafe and have coffee with some of the local folks, and I can have virtually the same conversation there that I can have in my home riding in rural Saskatchewan. People talk about VIA Rail being lost; they talk about post office closures; services closing up; seniors who do not want to stay in those communities because they do not have the services; young people who do not want to move there because there are not the amenities or jobs. The only difference that I find between rural Nova Scotia and rural Saskatchewan in many ways is the economic base. In Nova Scotia it is fishing or it may be a different type of agriculture, fruit and so on. In Saskatchewan, in my area at least, it is largely grain farming. The economic base in all those areas is suffering.

We have a situation where the infrastructure of rural Canada is in a very bad state. Rural Canada has been shrinking since the end of World War II. Now it is starting to collapse.

Unless we have a commitment by Canada and by this government to work toward maintaining viable farming families, viable rural communities and a viable rural infrastructure, that trend is going to continue. It is continuing at a disastrous rate that is going to have a devastating impact on this country.

In the province of Saskatchewan we have lost over 60,000 people, a net loss in the last four or five years. People have been predicting that Saskatchewan in the next 15 years is going to lose somewhere between 150,000 and 200,000 people. If anything anywhere near that actually occurs, the province of Saskatchewan will be in real trouble.

What do we have? We have had deregulation in transportation that has affected transportation in Saskatchewan. We have had a loss of railways. We have had rail line abandonment. We now have UNITEL which wants to come forth and change the whole communications system, which is going to have effects on rural Canada.

This amendment that is being proposed here simply requires the government to keep in mind, to take into account the long-term social and economic sustainability of farm families and communities. That is a statement I would defy anybody in this House to get up and say is not a valid principle. It is a valid principle. Any member who does not support that principle really cannot say that they have the interest of rural Canada at heart. It is a fundamental principle that should have been in the legislation from the very beginning. It is a principle that so far this government has rejected. I do not know why. I find it extraordinary that it has rejected that principle. It should be in the legislation and it should be supported.

If we are going to maintain rural communities, if we are going to maintain farm families, then we have to be taking some direction to allow that situation to exist. I am not saying, to use the Saskatchewan example, that we need towns every eight miles and everybody living on a half section; that is not what I am saying. What I am saying is that we should be able to provide an environment whereby a family which wants to either live in a rural community or on a farm simply has the opportunity to do so. It is becoming more and more difficult all the time.

This legislation is going to be reviewed. This legislation we all agree has many problems with it, and we are going to find many other problems as we begin to work with it. It is important that when this legislation is reviewed, and as we change the legislation over time, and I hope to make some changes here at the report stage, or even if we do not, that this principle is kept in mind. What this does is require the minister and reviewers of this legislation to keep that basic principle in mind.

I simply conclude by saying that I hope the government can find its way clear to vote on this basic, fundamental and, dare I say, motherhood issue that we all deem, I would suggest, important.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before us, put by the hon. member who just spoke, talks about the long-term social and economic sustainability of farm families. Clearly, nobody has ever seen the kind of ravages that have taken place in western Canada since the present government came to power. I believe that this amendment would be useful because it might remind the government of what has happened to small towns.

Last spring I had the opportunity to go back to the community in which I practised as a veterinarian in the late 1950s for several years. I could not believe the kind of displacement which had occurred in that community, which I had not visited for about seven or eight years.

During the last eight or ten years when the Prime Minister talked about being open for business, it certainly has not been open for business to assist those small prairie communities which have been ravaged so drastically in the last four or five years.

Even though this legislation does give some long-term hope to those prairie communities, initially it is not great, because we put down the motion on Monday calling on the government to immediately implement a third line of defence, a deficiency payment, cash to producers this spring for the current crop year 1990–91. The government has given no commitment. All it has talked about is how much deficit there is in each of the three major accounts: the Western Grain Stabilization Program, the Canadian Wheat Board account and the demand for a premium.

To that extent, the provisions in this bill for special circumstances, Committees Special Assistance, at this time, are a failure.

• (1220)

I guess one could say that the NISA program is a failure also, because none of the provinces, with the exception of Saskatchewan, are able to participate in it. The problem with NISA is that most farmers do not have the resources to put money into the account in order to qualify for assistance this year. Clearly the GRIP program does not really provide much benefit this year. There may be an initial payment this fall, but there may not be. It is totally a decision of the Government of Canada and the signatory committees.

As the hon. member has said, to some extent this is a motherhood issue. We feel it would be useful to put it into the bill. We want to support it because perhaps it would make the government more conscious of the fact that we are not just talking about producers of wheat, canola, other grains and oilseeds, but we are talking about stabilizing the whole rural economy so that there are stores, businesses and other people existing in these communities.

We always felt that Canada had that special ability. That is why we have had programs like the western grain stabilization fund. That is why we have a Wheat Board, because we want to bring stability. That is why we have marketing boards.

This government is hell-bent on cloning the whole great American dream. That system has not been great for those states like North Dakota and Montana and the northern tier of the states. I do not think that cloning of the American system is going to be great for Canada and for our western prairie producers. We think this amendment would be useful, because it reminds the government of its responsibility not only to individual producers, but also to the over-all viability of the rural communities and the rural way of life.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C-98 was presented, it made an unusual but maybe a very acceptable difference in its approach to the whole program of safety nets and a considerable amount of legislation in that the bill contained a definition of what the government thinks or what the legislature thinks should be the aims of the programs being discussed today.

In that series of principles which it has placed before the House through this bill, the government has indicated a certain structure at which it feels agriculture should be aimed. Basically we as legislators should be keeping that in mind when we deal with agricultural legislation and when we deal with safety nets.

As I said earlier, this particular legislation provides or allows agreements between the provinces and the federal government to keep the structure of safety nets in place for the foreseeable future. It is very important, under those circumstances, to make sure that in the processes of review and of making decisions relative to this bill and to the agricultural industry we keep in mind the most important people as far as this matter is concerned. Those are the farmers out there who have managed to survive the ravages of the past few years and are hoping to be farmers 10 years from now or 5 years from now when the initial review happens.

In making those kinds of review, it is important that we have in place principles which do exactly what this amendment does. The program should encourage the long-term social and economic sustainability of farm families and communities.

If we were allowed to go back to the previous three amendments, we would say that they in themselves also contribute to the sustainability of long-term and effective farm communities, because they suggest that the massive consolidation of farm production should not be allowed to end up in the hands of multinational corporations.

Anything that encourages larger and larger developments should not be paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. If we allow the taxpayers of Canada to subsidize the large operations, we indirectly empty the rural areas of population. If the population is not there, the services disappear and eventually the communities themselves disappear.

That is why we think we should make sure by this legislation and subsequent legislation and by the agreements that are to be signed between the federal and provincial governments that farm communities and farmers themselves are the central figures in the thinking; not the production, not the export sales, but the life and survival of the farm family and the farm community.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is very tempting to respond to some of the comments of my hon. friend from Algoma when he talked about the ravages of this government.

We have had to do many things since we formed the government to deal with the shortfalls or the lack of support to agriculture when the Liberals were in government. We know that it is easy to slip down the slippery road to heavy deficits and interim programs which do not have a long-term meaning. It takes years to correct some of the things that have happened, and this is one of them.

With this legislation what we have done is provide a format for farmers or producers, the grassroots people, to formulate their feelings and to extend them beyond to this House of Commons for legislation. We are endeavouring to provide the most adequate legislation to meet and give agricultural communities the long-term security that is so necessary.

That has been lacking for years, but we are addressing it. I believe that the farmers and producers of this country are very satisfied and that we will all benefit from this legislation.

Most of our farm enterprises are family owned farms. It is a given that a family farm is a very important part of the whole agricultural industry in this country. This bill provides for programs that will ensure economic and environmental sustainability of our agricultural sector. If we do not implement these initiatives, we will be threatening the very fabric of our farming industry.

I would like to quote Mr. Geddes of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture who was a witness at the Standing Committee on Agriculture on March 13: He stated: "The safety net program was designed to solve one of the situations in the rural economy for grains and oilseeds at this time, and that is income stability".

When we start to talk about the family farm, I am sure that if we polled everyone in this House of Commons or wherever, we would get a different interpretation of what is a family farm. Sometimes that creates difficulties. When I look at my own farming operations, I say that it is a family farm operation. I am sure that would apply to many of us in this House. It is a view that we can hold and share with others, that it is difficult to determine what is a family farm.

• (1230)

We believe that the motion presented by the hon. member identifies in particular the family farm and the importance of the family farm to the whole fabric of Canada. Because of that, we feel that it does not change the legislation but it identifies the family farm. We feel that is very important and would be prepared to accept this motion.

Before I sit down, I would like to move under Standing Order 26(1):

That we continue the sitting through the lunch hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I will just speak very briefly to this very interesting motion.

Most of us who are connected intimately with agriculture would agree that the family farm is one of the reasons we in this country and in other parts of the world have been as successful as we have in agriculture.

There are three brief reasons why I think this motion has some merit. First, any time somebody else pays 60 per cent of a premium and the farmer pays 40 per cent indicates support for farmers and for family farms. That is the situation here: the farmer himself will pay on average 40 per cent of the premium, the provincial governments will pay 25 per cent, and the federal government will pay 35 per cent. That in itself is support for the motion.

Second, the safety net programs are designed to make the assistance that is available more predictable. We have heard many times in the past that if farmers knew ahead of time how much money they were to receive from various programs, even though they received the same amount of money later on, that knowledge of the exact amount of money they were eligible for would have been of more use to them ahead of time for planning what types of crops to seed and the type of financial arrangements they make with their financial institutions. That provides some support and stability for farmers and for family farms.

The third point I would make very briefly is simply that once this bill is up and running, once the subsequent agreements are signed with the provinces, and farmers begin making use of these programs available under this legislation, the type of coverage and support an individual farmer will receive is going to be very much tailored to his own capacity to produce on that piece of land. If he wants to work harder, use more chemicals or use better weed control, put in some irrigation, intensify his cropping practices so that he can earn more off that piece of land, he will then have that extra income and capacity to produce reflected in the way the program operates.

To summarize very briefly, the very fact that the producer will be paying 40 per cent of the premiums and governments will be looking after 60 per cent, the fact that the program is predictable, more so than anything we have had to date, and the fact that it will be tailored to an individual farmer's capacity to produce on that piece of land indicate some pretty strong support for the individual farmer and for the way family farms operate in this country.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on Motion No. 4, coming as it does in the section which sets out the principles the minister shall take into consideration in respect to any program he is establishing in conjunction with the provinces. We had four principles outlined in the original bill and none of them mentioned anything about farmers. It talked about levels of protection and it talked about being compatible with Canada's international obligations. It talked about not unduly influencing the decisions of producers of agricultural products with respect to production or marketing, and it talked about encouraging long-term environmental and economic sustainability.

However, it did not mention farmers and it did not mention communities. It was a little uncertain as to whether government members when drafting this bill really considered farmers and small communities to be a natural part of the economic environment in the countryside at the moment.

This will help to clarify that. It may not change the kinds of agreements arrived at, we realize that. This bill will simply require that the minister take these principles into consideration. It does not say he has to follow them.

For that reason, I choose to spend a couple of minutes urging the minister to give fairly high priority to this business of making agreements that will be cognizant of the needs of both farmers and the people who live in villages and towns in rural Canada.

I am from Saskatchewan, the more settled part of the prairies which was part of the forest belt at one time. It is more heavily settled than the wide open plains, but we are still fighting the same enemies as rural people elsewhere on the prairies. Our enemy is distance. Distance creates problems for people whether they are living in a small village, in a town or in the countryside on a farm. It creates problems as to our ability to sustain basic services that we all need, whether we live in the countryside or whether we live in metropolitan Toronto.

Turning to health and medical care, when we have to go more than 30 or 40 miles to find a doctor, a nurse or even a drugstore, it creates some problems for raising families. It creates problems when we are old. It is not a situation that leads to people staying where they are. They tend to shift away from that area to where those services are more readily available.

There is the question of educational services. It is the same thing. Younger families look at how long their kids will have to be on the school bus. They have to consider whether the roads the school bus travels over are going to be open year round and make the decision whether to stay in the countryside, in the small village or to move to a larger centre.

For people who are operating farms, distance is our enemy when we seek repairs or marketing services. The last decade has virtually decimated farm equipment suppliers. In order to get parts for our ever aging machines, we have to go farther and farther afield. The suppliers have kept up to date as much as economic conditions will permit. They are hooked into computerized networks and can tell us on the phone whether they have the part, whether it is in Flint, Michigan or wherever it might be in North America or even in Europe, and how long it will take to arrive. When it comes we will probably have to drive 50 or 80 miles to pick up a needed part, taking two and a half or three hours not counting the delay for shipping. Given the current financial situation, most dealers cannot keep in stock every part we might want. It has to be brought in from a central depot or from the factory.

These tough economic times and to some extent policies which are encouraging consolidation of towns and villages are creating double costs for people who live in rural Canada.

We have to pay for the services that we built in the recent past. Most of those hospitals, schools and roads are still in the process of being paid for. Most of the roads are built on a pay as you go basis, but the water and sewer systems are not. As people leave for other provinces or to big cities in search of jobs or better service for their aged parents, or their young children, they abandon those capital investments and force the new communities to invest in new schools, new hospitals, new homes, more water and sewage systems, to accommodate the new populations while the already produced accommodations out in the towns and villages go under-utilized. It is not good economics. It makes for very poor social conditions now and in the future.

• (1240)

We think that the provinces and the federal government should be much more cognizant of these very real issues which are occurring in rural Canada, whether it is in Newfoundland, Vancouver Island, the prairies, rural Ontario, Quebec, or the maritimes. This has to be part of the consideration in any of these agreements. We are therefore pleased to see that the government members and all parties seem to be willing to include this forgotten element in the final form of this bill.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in regard to Motion No. 4 and the theme that has been put forward.

It is important that we on this side respond and indicate that, contrary to the implication from the other side, this government does care about rural Canada and does care about the farm community. I think most people in the farm community are well aware of that, given the long string of initiatives which this government has put forward over the past six years.

Frankly, I find some of the rhetoric I have heard this morning a little bit disconcerting because there is a suggestion that somehow we can wish away reality. We have very difficult international circumstances. Over 80 per cent of the wheat grown on the prairies is destined for export. The world price has been decimated owing to the grain subsidy wars that have been going on between the United States and Europe. They have been mentioned before in this House many times and I am not going to go into the detail again. Suffice it to say that the world price is at a point where there simply is no return. That is why we have this enabling legislation to bring forward a new generation of safety nets which have been largely developed by producers themselves.

I do not think it is good enough to have a long litany of what is wrong from opposition members. What we would like to have is a little bit of co-operation from them in terms of saying what can be done. So far all I have heard is the suggestion of capping potential pay-out under these programs at $100,000 which the opposition already admits is meaningless.

What we need is something concrete. When the Liberal Party was in power in this country between 1968 and 1984, it did not do a whole lot for western agriculture. All I remember was the imposition of the capital gains tax which hung like a cloud over the farm community all through the 1970s and the early part of the 1980s. This government, in living up to its election promise, got rid of that capital gains tax.

I remember the LIFT program that the former government brought forward. Perhaps the greatest legacy of all was a national debt in excess of $200 billion in March 1985. The requirement to pay interest on that debt at the present time would constrain any government in trying to bring forward the necessary programs and to sustain the kind of support that Canadians would want and, indeed, became very much accustomed to under previous administrations.

There is no magic in the movement of people from rural areas toward the urban areas. This is going on in every country in the world. It has gone on in this country since the rural population peaked back in the 1920s.

We are largely talking about the prairies this morning because that is where the dire consequences of this international grain subsidy war are being felt. The prairies were laid out under the Torrens land title system before many people moved west. The land title system was laid out in square miles before people came. It was laid out on the basis of the steam engine and the horse and wagon. Every five or six miles there was a stop for the trains to take on water. It was based on hauling 15 or 20 bushels of wheat a few miles from the farm to the elevator by horse and wagon. We have progressed a long way over the last 60 or 70 years.

As the member for Mackenzie rightly pointed out, we are gravitating towards a system where there are service centres every 30 or 40 miles that have the amenities that people want. That is because the people are already doing that. They are driving past the small towns, the villages—some of which never did amount to much; others which have declined over the years—in large trucks and semi-trailers. They are going to the larger places. The end result is that in a sense they are voting with their feet. They are causing a reality out there.

As the member for Mackenzie indicates, there has been a gravitation from having these communities every five or six miles, based on the horse and wagon, and based on the steam engine to the kind of system that we see evolving today. Indeed, if there were no people on the prairies right now, and we were laying out a grid system with towns and communities based on the technology, the communications, the road systems and all of the things that we know are possible today, these centres would be laid out every 30 or 40 miles. It is exactly in accordance with the technology and with the wishes and decisions of people.

Having said that, yes, there is a need out there. The best thing that this government, or any government can do in terms of encouraging economic sustainability in rural areas and rural communities, is diversification. When I use that term diversification, it is not just in the sense of agricultural diversification. I am speaking about it in terms of things that are unrelated to agriculture, preferably completely unrelated.

That is where I would like to briefly touch on western economic diversification, because that is a $1.2 billion fund which was established by this government to encourage diversification in western Canada and on the prairies.

It makes loans, repayable loans to enterprises which have ideas, some technology, some innovation, some new products, some new markets which can replace imports. What it does is provide some much needed payroll jobs out there. Many of them are related to agriculture, it is true, but there are plenty of others that are not.

What that does is provide opportunity for people. It provides payroll. It enables them to stay in the smaller towns and in the prairie cities which have been so dependent upon agriculture.

It is important to recognize that significant contribution by this government through western economic diversification. It lends itself very well to the sentiment that has been expressed here and which we are all talking about and supporting. More important, it is not a matter of complaining, not a matter of a long list of problems.

We cannot do much about the world situation. We are at GATT. We are talking with the Cairns Group. I believe our people are doing all they can, but they are up against a couple of superpowers in the United States and the European Economic Community. We cannot wish that away.
